"Do what?" he asked angrily.

She raised her eyes, looked at him distressedly, lowered them again. "You know what I mean!" she said, her heart thundering. They were really quarreling!

"I know you're like all women!" he told her resentfully. "Conventional and reactionary—that's what you are!"

"Why, I introduced you to most of them!" Poppy said hotly, stung.

"Yes, and now they're not good enough for you! Now you not only want to knock them yourself, but you think they can hurt me. You know I'm no baby, Poppy," Bruce said, carried along on a rush of words. "I'm not the little Horatio Alger webfoot that you have to protect and instruct! By God, I say that these women are as good as you are——"

"Bruce!" She was white.

"Well, they're your friends!" he said loudly and indignantly.

"Bruce—if you please—on the street——"

"That's right, make a scene and then get mad at me because I get mad!" sullenly, out of a pause, said the entity that had, entirely to his own surprise, taken possession of Bruce.

Poppy looked at him aghast, her face olorless, her half opened lips dry.

"Oh, it's no use!" she said in a frightened hisper, not to him. "Oh, dear——"

The little forlorn inadequate word, reathed out in her anxious bewildered oice, and accompanied with one glimpse f her troubled eyes, was destined to live Bruce's memory for many a day.

For when she had said it he saw that the ears were coming, and she must have felt hem. She put her head in the air, gulped nd turned on her heel. Unable to move, is angry color and his angry mood ebbing ogether, Bruce saw her get into an mnibus. "I don't care!" he said, panting.

She was gone. He walked irresolutely or half a block, turned for no reason and alked back.

Far up the Avenue, in the opal spring wilight, was a jumble of motors and omniuses; the traffic lights flashed, the crowd owed forward like released water.

"I don't care!" Bruce said, his hands in is pockets. He stood still, his jaw set, is unseeing eyes fixed upon the base of lamp-post.

II

Poppy did not recover even a partial onsciousness of what was going on about er for fully five minutes.

"There!" she kept saying to herself. Now we've quarreled. I can't help it. We've quarreled. There!"

Her breath came short, she looked at er neighbor on the narrow seat blindly. There!" she said, panting.

The subway. The corner. Her own oorway, with two children of eight and en, who kissed her, playing there.

Poppy entered a commonplace apartent, with awninged windows over the treet, dark bedrooms, where she removed er hat, powdered her nose, said "I can't elp it!" again seven or eight times, and, t the back, with a glimpse of river view, clean, disorderly, homelike kitchen; here a big woman with gray hair and pectacles was placidly preparing a meal.

Poppy flung her youth, her beauty, her eartbreak into this woman's welcoming rms with a thoroughness and an enthusism indicative of only one relationship in he world.

"Mother, it's so good to have you home gain!" said Poppy with her kiss, her maner perfectly normal, but her voice still hick. "Are you a darling—are you an ld angel—are you just a gorgeous old aint, or what?"

"No, I'm not," said Mrs. Potter, readusting her glasses, serenely accustomed o her child's extravagances. "I declare 've begun to think I'm a very bad mother o you," she added as Poppy sat down at he kitchen table and began to gnaw upon cindery crust of gingerbread. "That's ust the sample I put into the oven to see my batter was firm enough," the older oman interpolated hastily. "Don't eat —don't spoil your good supper! You oor child, you, I've been going over your loset and bureau, and I think it was just bout time I came back!" she resumed. There wasn't an hour, day or night, that didn't think of you. But I do believe hat it saved your stepfather's life, and I on't think his own daughters—we saw hem in Chicago, I wrote you that?—are ny dearer to him than you are. It did

Would you wear Pajamas at a dance?

Of course not. No girl, no matter how daring, would dream of disregarding social good form like that. No girl, no matter how offhand, would think of insulting her hostess so flagrantly.

You wouldn't. But don't you often use a writing paper that is just as much out of place, just as inappropriate, as pajamas at a dance?

Many a girl never realizes that her letter paper is her social dress when she is not there.

She never suspects, when she thanks Claire's handsome new cousin for his flowers, that her robin's-egg-blue envelope made him say,

"That for me? I thought it was something for the cook."

She never guessed, when she said to herself, "Oh, it's only Geraldine! I can scribble to her on anything," that Geraldine would leave the untidy note on the library table, where her frank brother, observing it, inquired:

"Going in for settlement work, Jerry?"

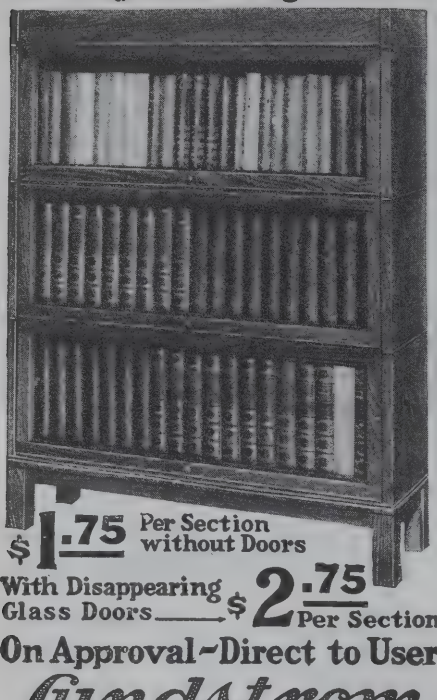
She never knew! But I know. I have seen so many girls judged wrongly by their letter paper. They know better, but they do not know as I do that using the correct letter paper is one of the surest ways of proving your right to the social opportunities that come to you.

You might even carry off the pajamas by sheer personality, but you aren't there when your carelessly selected writing paper is being judged. People think you don't know or that you don't care, and one thought is just as bad for you as the other.

It is so easy to do the right thing. Just get the correct paper, the paper everyone knows is absolutely right, and then use it—always.

I have written a little book which I will send you for fifty cents. It tells all about letters, invitations, acceptances, regrets, cards, etc. And I am always glad to answer letters. Write me about anything you want to know. I want to help you make the most of yourself socially, because I know that good style is a greater social asset than good looks.

Caroline De Lancey



Address me in care of
EATON, CRANE & PIKE COMPANY
225 Fifth Avenue, New York City

THE right letter paper is Eaton's Highland Linen. It comes in the correct sizes, with five smart envelope shapes and in all the fashionable tints. It is sold at a moderate price at all good stationery stores.

Style is a greater Social Asset than Beauty

EATON, CRANE & PIKE CO.—Sponsors for correctness in Correspondence—NEW YORK-PITTSFIELD, MASS.

A Good Bookcase for the price of a good book!

$1.75 Per Section without Doors

With Disappearing Glass Doors $2.75 Per Section

On Approval~Direct to User

Lundstrom
IT GROWS WITH YOUR LIBRARY
SECTIONAL BOOKCASE
Endorsed by Over 100,000 Users

Made for and universally used in the finest homes and offices throughout the country. Made in sections of different sizes, combining utility, economy and attractive appearance. Style shown above is beautifully finished in SOLID OAK. Price complete as shown with top, base and three book sections with non-binding, disappearing, felt-cushioned glass doors (Sections dust-proof) $12.75. Price for same combination, without doors, $9.75. Other styles in different grades and finishes at correspondingly low prices. Shipped direct from factory ON APPROVAL at a considerable saving TO YOU.

Write for new catalog No. 40

The C. J. Lundstrom Mfg. Co., Little Falls, N. Y.
Mfgs. Sectional Bookcases and Filing Cabinets

WINX
The LIQUID LASHLUX
For long, dark lashes

USE Winx to bead your lashes and make them appear longer, darker and heavier. Applied with the glass rod attached to the stopper, it dries instantly and lasts. Unaffected by perspiration, swimming, or even weeping at the theatre. Winx is harmless.

To nourish the lashes and promote their growth, use colorless Cream Lashlux at night.

Winx (black or brown), 75c. Cream Lashlux (black, brown or colorless), 50c. At drug, department stores or by mail.

Send a dime today for a sample of Winx. For another dime we will mail you a generous sample of PERT, the waterproof rouge.

ROSS COMPANY
74 Grand Street New York City

WINX
The LIQUID LASHLUX

us all good—the children, too. Over and over again he'd say, 'We can thank Poppy for this trip!' "

"Cry about it, Hannah!" Poppy suggested affectionately.

"Well, I can't help it!" her mother returned, smiling with wet eyes.

"I had a grand time," Poppy said slowly. "I set the alarm, and made my bed while the coffee boiled, and put out the milk bottle, and twice on Sunday I had parties—I had Mrs. Adams and the kids over to an ice cream party last Sunday——"

"But your Aunt Maggie came in every day or two?" Mrs. Potter asked.

"Well, darling," Poppy said, "I didn't tell you last night because you were just home, but the truth is that Aunt Maggie went to be with Mabel, in Wilkes-Barre, the day you left."

"Good grief!" said Mrs. Potter. "Who looked out for you, then?"

"I looked out for myself," Poppy said. "Darling, I'm twenty-three, and I've been to approximately two thousand movies. I was not—led astray—in the five weeks of my mother's absence."

"Well, Mary—Mary—Mary!" her mother said lovingly and softly. And she held out her arms to her, and Poppy—who had indeed been christened Mary in the Church of Saint Gregory the Lesser—went gladly into them, and clung there, and laughed a little and cried a little without exactly knowing why. "You looked a little peaked to me last night—and your father saw it, too!" said the older woman then. "It must have been very lonely for you."

"I went down to the Village quite a lot!" Mary confessed, back at the table now. "Don't worry—I was home in bed and reading every night at ten."

"Butter that pan for me—but you do look sort of tired, lovey," her mother said, unalarmed. "Is it the new job?"

"No-o. I like it much better. It's not writing, but it has to do with a magazine, and that suits me!"

"And did they make much fuss over your leaving, at the old place?"

"Well—I wanted to tell you about that, mother. I didn't tell them I was going, I just—walked out." Mrs. Potter looked up from her oven.

"I have a reason," Mary said, answering her look. "I—I've had a funny experience since you left, mother," she said, suddenly flushed. "I am—you won't believe this—but—I love—somebody."

The older woman, impressed in spite of herself by the girl's halting words, the wet lashes and forced smile, stood looking at her in surprise.

"Well, you've done that before," she said in a troubled tone. "There was Bob—and that White boy—and that tall, slim feller——"

"Yes, but this is different!" Poppy said gravely. "This man—is my man," she added, her voice thickening. And suddenly she put her head down upon the table and burst out crying.

"Tell mother," Mrs. Potter could say, after an interval.

"Well," said Poppy, gulping, drying her eyes and regaining her self-control, "I felt differently about him the moment I saw him. No, not the moment—but almost immediately——"

"Who introduced you?"

"Nobody did. He was sitting next to me—you know how things are down in those little places, mother. We just got talking. He's new here. He was all worked up about everything, of course, believed everything everybody said—he told me that this one was a great writer and the other a personal friend of Lenin; it was all real to him. Carter Poole had him in tow—you can imagine! I began stringing him myself——" Poppy said thoughtfully. "You have to, mother."

"How do you mean you have to?" Mrs. Potter asked, with distaste.

"Oh, mother, everybody does!" her daughter assured her. "I would have made an immediate hit—wouldn't I?—if I had said that my stepfather was a linotyper and that we lived in the Bronx and that he and my mother and the kids had gone to visit his married daughters in Chicago. No, I told him I was a Bohemian actor's daughter—and that I had been married——"

"Mary Alice Madison—with your poor dead father as good and as hard working a man as ever lived," ejaculated her mother. "What on earth possessed you? He didn't believe a word of it!"

"Indeed he did. Why, mother, do you suppose that all those people are sitting about in those places telling each other the truth?" Mary demanded pathetically. "Everyone knows that."

"They're ashamed of their decent parents," Mrs. Potter said.

"No, it's not that. But the whole thing is so artificial—so fantastic——"

"There was a time when you wouldn't go anywhere else, but I thought you were cured," her mother said disapprovingly.

Mary knotted her hands before her.

"I am now," she said somberly.

"Well, tell me about this man," her mother asked a little anxiously.

"Oh, Bruce! Well, he's big, and he has a brown sort of face, and he's desperately in earnest about everything. And he wears a tweed suit——" The thought of the tweed suit suffocated her; she stopped.

"And he has a—well, a terribly nice, decent way of ordering your meals, and—I don't know——" she presently resumed, and stopped again.

"And does he like you, dear?"

"Oh, yes, he likes me!"

"Better than any of the other girls?"

Mary had a sharp pang of jealousy and fear. So big, so kind, so tender and simple and honest—she had left him in their hands tonight!

"Oh, yes, I think so, mother!"

"He's—you're not engaged?"

"Not—formally!" A great despair shook her. They had quarreled—they had parted—nothing was definite——

"Has he kissed you, Mary?"

Mary looked up quickly, smiled at the kind, dear, worried face, the anxious eyes behind the spectacles. Her whole being thrilled at the memory of a night—night before last—at the Cardigans'. The big, hard arms, the touch of the hard chin against her own, the enchanting faint odor of tweeds and shaving soap——

The scarlet color flooded her face. "No, ma'am," she said.

You shouldn't have let him, dear," said her mother mildly.

"I love him," Mary said softly.

"Is he coming to see you here?"

"He doesn't know where I live."

"But why not, dear?"

"Well, with you and Aunt Maggie away——"

"Yes, that's true. That's true. But he could get it at the office."

"They don't know where I live at the office—they never have known."

"He's married, is he?" asked Mrs. Potter, at a loss.

"Oh, mother, no! He's just a small-town boy—he's going to be famous, I think. Everything about him is nice and clean—he told me about his only love affair, the village rich girl—he never even touched her hand. She married the village big man's son, and Bruce has done nothing but yearn and idealize her until he—met me."

"But of course he loves you, dear!"

"That," said Mary, her young face stern, "is what I want to find out! They've got him—down there, Poole and the rest. They'll ruin him if they can—I've seen them ruin men like him before. He thinks they're all gods—they laugh at home life, at decent books, at people who work honestly eight hours a day. The decent people—the real writers and artists—get away from them and marry and have children and houses in New Jersey or Long Island, and chicken on Sunday——"

"Why, Mary, I declare it's refreshing to hear you talk like this!" her mother said.

"I thought of—Kate's baby," Mary said suddenly. "I've had crushes before, of course. But when I think of Bruce I think of more than just—excitement. I think about butchers' bills, and having a woman in to clean on Thursdays, and being sick, with a baby on my arm——"

She stopped, but her mother did not speak. Mrs. Potter was a plain woman, cheerful, fat, insensitive on some counts. But she knew that this hour was holy, and sheer reverence kept her still.

"We've quarreled," Mary said suddenly, desolately. "Mother, I think it'll kill me!"

She got to her feet and went blindly out of the room, and her mother did not follow.

After that, those who loved her saw a new Mary. She worked hard, she came home early, she was always available when her mother, her stepfather or her small half-brother and sister needed her.

She grew thinner, quieter as the warm spring rains fell and fell and fell over the city, and as the trees in Central Park put on their tentative dots; their damp, unfolding fingers; their panoply of green.

If certain street corners, certain seats on the lumbering omnibuses, certain shaded tables in certain restaurants shook her heart with a violent pain almost nauseating in its intensity, she told nobody.

Beautiful, young, bitterly lonely, she dressed for the new work every day, put on the plain taffeta dress with the wide collar, pressed the wide shady hat over her bright spraying hair. Mary's mother wanted her to get a new hat, but she delayed it. Bruce had seen this one——

She clung, as only a woman who loves can cling, to the little calendar of their days together. It was only nineteen days after all since that afternoon that had so unexpectedly proved their last—it was only twenty-three days——

She would look at her telephone. In three seconds she could hear that dear, astonished voice: "Poppy!"

"Give him a ring!" her mother urged more than once, worried by the girl's loss of color, appetite and spirits. "Perhaps

HOUSE No. 111 Designed by Jefferson M. Hamilton

Designed for Service Department, American Face Brick Association.
This is one of the fifty designs in "The Home of Beauty."

Houses of Enduring Charm

Every year home-builders show a greater appreciation for the value of beauty. Beauty enhances the satisfaction one gets out of his home. It adds to the investment value. It is both a sentimental and practical consideration. The realization of this fact is leading more and more builders to Face Brick, for the Face Brick house is not only attractive when completed, but takes on new and more beautiful hues as it ages. Dollars-and-cents considerations, too, favor the Face Brick house—slow depreciation, a minimum of repairs and upkeep, painting only around doors and windows, low insurance rates and smaller fuel bills. "The Story of Brick" discusses these matters in detail. For your copy, address American Face Brick Association, 1744 Peoples Life Building, Chicago, Illinois.

Send for these booklets:

"The Story of Brick" is an attractive booklet with beautiful illustrations of modern homes, and discusses such matters as Comparative Costs, Basic Requirements in Building, The Extravagance of Cheapness, and kindred subjects. Sent free.

"Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" embrace 96 designs of Face Brick bungalows and small houses. These houses are unusual and distinctive in design, economical to build, and convenient in floor plan. "Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" are issued in four booklets, showing 3 to 4-room houses, 5-room houses, 6-room houses and 7 to 8-room houses. The entire set for one dollar; any one of the books, 25 cents. We can supply complete working drawings at nominal prices.

"The Home of Beauty" contains fifty designs of Face Brick houses, mostly two stories, representing a wide variety of architectural styles and interior arrangements. The houses were selected from 350 designs submitted in a nation-wide Architectural Competition. Sent for 50 cents. We also distribute complete working drawings for these houses at nominal cost.

"Orienting the House" is an illustrated booklet, with a sun dial chart and explanation for placing the house with reference to light and shade. Sent for 10 cents.

Here's a Prescription
for Coughs

For quick relief try PISO'S—A most effective syrup different from all others. Safe and sane for young and old. Pleasant—no opiates—no upset stomach. 35c and 60c sizes obtainable everywhere.

PISO'S—For Coughs & Colds

Be a Nurse

Learn in spare time at home
Earn $30—$35 a week

Every woman should learn. We train Beginners, Practical Nurses, Mothers and Religious Workers by our Fascinating Home study Method. Leading Chicago System. Endorsed by physicians. Established 22 years.

Earn while learning

If you are over 18 and under 55 years of age write for illustrated catalog and 32 Sample Lesson Pages with FREE details of Money-Back Guarantee and FREE NURSE'S EQUIPMENT

Chicago School of Nursing, Dept. 83, 421 Ashland Blvd. Chicago

$EARN MONEY$ AT HOME

Be your own Boss. Make 25 to 75 Dollars a week at home in your spare time. We guarantee to make you a Show Card Writer by our New Simple Method. No Canvassing or Soliciting. We sell your work if acceptable and pay you cash each week, no matter where you live.

Illustrated booklet and terms free.

THE DETROIT SHOW CARD SCHOOL

U. S. Office: 229 Dinman Bldg. Detroit, Michigan

Canadian Office: 29 Land Security Bldg. Toronto, Ontario

Flowers from Childs

Will make your garden beautiful. Everything for old-fashioned gardens, Perennial or Herbaceous borders, Shrub backgrounds, Rockeries, or any other situation—you will find them offered in

Childs' Catalog—The Guide to Greater Garden Success—FREE

Highest quality and reasonable prices. Special Premium for early orders. Write promptly and mention this paper.

JOHN LEWIS CHILDS, Inc. Floral Park, N. Y.

The freshness and charm of youth

What more engaging than women who, far into middle life, still retain the radiance, the freshness and the charm of their youth?

Why are such women the rare exception rather than the rule?

Simply because of the prevalence of wrong eating habits!

The greatest menace to the health, beauty and vigor of American women lies in the food they eat. Too many foods are entirely devoid of a precious element without which you cannot have strength, vitality, firm tissues or clear, youthful skin.

To supply this deficiency, eat Yeast Foam Tablets. They are the richest known source of an element you need.

Yeast Foam Tablets are whole, selected, dried yeast. Easy to take; they keep and they don't cause gas.

Get them from your druggist; eat them regularly and see how much better you look and feel.

Yeast Foam Tablets

A Tonic Food

Send for LARGE FREE SAMPLE

Name _____

Address _____

C-3

Mail coupon to Northwestern Yeast Co.
1750 North Ashland Ave., Chicago, Ill.

the poor boy has been searching the city for you—perhaps he's not had a happy minute since you quarreled——"

"No," Mary would answer, frowning. "This is a test. I want to make sure!"

"But how could he ever find you, no matter how anxious he is, deary! Be reasonable with the poor man——"

Mary would not be reasonable. She could not. She was suffering unreasonably, the whole world was one agonizing hunger for just a look at him, just the touch of his hand again, and to capitulate meant to lose all her boundaries at once, to feel all walls crashing forever.

Reasonable? Was it reasonable to wait every day for the postman who could not possibly have a letter from him, to shut one's eyes with a sensation of actual faintness just because brokers named Bruce, Williams and Company happened to advertise bonds in the morning paper? There was nothing reasonable about it, and Mary knew it, even as Shakespeare and Dante and Heloise knew it before her.

This went on for nineteen—twenty-three—twenty-seven days. Then came the terrible morning when Mary said to herself, heartsick: "It's a month today!"

Her mother, her stepfather, Jim and Maxine had plans today; they were going to Aunt Maggie's. But Mary had no plans. She was at the end of her endurance, she told herself that she would have to telephone Bruce, flesh and blood could stand it no longer.

Determined, and almost dizzy with the joy of the mere thought, she put on her new dotted Swiss, pink with crimson dots, and pushed her riotous hair into a net. She stood in the darkened bedroom studying with unavoidable exhilaration the effect of all this, when her mother, bustling about with last preparations for departure, came in. Mary's cheeks, her blue eyes, were aglow, her mouth rippled into smiles.

"Mother, do I look nice?"

"I've never seen you look better. You're going to phone him?"

"Mother, I have to!"

"Well," said her mother, "the way you've been going on I think you ought to! There's the bell," she said in an undertone. "You go! If it's anything to delay us the children will be wild! Good grief, whatever is it!" added Mrs. Potter in terror a moment later, as the sounds of what are only describable as shrieks came from the entrance hall. "Mary—God save us all!" she stammered, hurrying out.

Mary, pink gown, pink cheeks, tears and laughter, was in the large tweed arms of a large man. The man, her mother saw, was crying too, and kissing her.

"My God," he was saying in a low, hard voice, more as a prayer than an ejaculation, "my God, I've found you—I've found you! My little girl—I was going away—I was going back home—oh, my God! I thought I'd lost you. My darling—my darling——"

"I knew you'd come—I knew you'd come!" sobbed Mary. "Oh, Bruce—this is mother——"

"Well, Bruce, I'm glad you've come, and I hope you'll take her off and talk some sense into her!" Mrs. Potter said in her downright, motherly way, studying the ecstatic pair through her glasses. "She's been nearer mad than sane for I don't know how long! We're going up to my sister Maggie's for the day, at White Plains——"

"Give me a few hours of her and I'll bring her up there," Bruce said, still holding Mary tight, but with a big free hand to grip that of Mary's mother. "I want to meet the family—I'm never going to let go of her again—I can only warn you of that!"

"But however did you find her?" Mrs. Potter asked, roused to sudden recollection.

"Oh, that's part of it, mother!" Mary herself answered, tears on her April face. "That's why I was waiting for him! He's the son of an old friend of yours—Mrs. Bruce, mother, who was Ada Ransome, of Lorain, Ohio! He's got a letter of introduction to you——"

Coming: A new story by Fannie Hurst in COSMOPOLITAN for April at all news stands March tenth

Otherwise Sweet William

(Continued from page 31)

helmets; the hope of being an exempter or a lady oxiliary—in nearly every bosom there, splendid ambition had, in that electric quarter-hour, been aroused.

Before the mass meeting adjourned, committees in ways and means and on plan and scope had been named. It seems almost needless to add that upon both committees the honored name of Barbee appeared and that he was the unanimous choice of his fellow members for the chairmanship of the more important one.

Promptly then did he proceed to justify his election to the post of executive responsibility. His example stirred the efficient; it stimulated the laggards. Why, the man spawned thoughts as the roe-shad spawns her roe—not singly but in clumps. For the debit page of the ledger it might have been entered up that authority and power and the deference of the multitude enhanced, if such a thing be possible, his air of arrogance. With conscious self-sufficiency he ran over the top and spilled down the sides. But has not the same thing been true of Napoleon and Cromwell and many another leader of causes?

It took a Napoleon to shape the common enthusiasm into a definite channel; this genius did it. Talking about the Plunkett Hill's All-Colored Volunteer Fire Fighters' Brigade was one thing; having visions of it as an accomplished reality was part of that thing; but providing the financial framework for it was another. To the Professor the credit must in justice go for the notion of the great home talent benefit entertainment—a notion which caught the popular fancy as a flame catches tow.

There would be given a grand benefit performance where every worthy local amateur might have full chance to shine; a dance afterwards on the cleared stage; refreshments for all at a price, these last to be provided by the Ladies' Oxiliary—and the entire proceeds, less bare expenses, to be devoted to leasing suitable quarters for the Brigade and equipping it with the

Come in and see the NEW CORONA

AN INVITATION

You are most cordially invited to visit any of the 1300 Corona stores, from Maine to California, where the New Corona is now being shown. Whether you are one who has never tried personal typing—or an expert from the ranks of Corona's half million users—you will want to try this new Corona with your own hands, and see what an advance has been made in portable typewriter designing. To locate the nearest store, find "Corona" in your phone book, or write for our new folder.

CORONA TYPEWRITER CO., INC.
GROTON, N.Y.

ere are Corona
's rooms and rice stations ll parts of the
ld. Above is limpse of the ona store in hester, N.Y.

New Features

The New Corona is really an office typewriter in portable form.

A few of the improvements are:

1. Automatic Ribbon Reverse.
2. 10-inch Carriage.
3. Standard Portable Keyboard.
4. High-Speed Carriage Return and Line Spacer.

$538

Buys this

5-Room House

You can buy all the materials for a complete home direct from the manufacturer and save four profits on the lumber, millwork, hardware and labor.

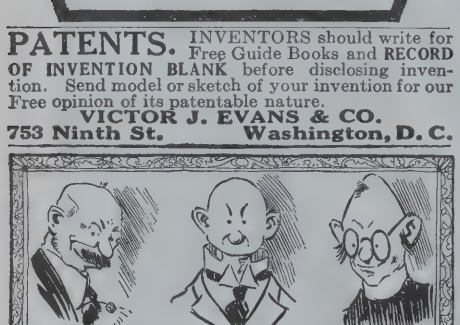
ALADDIN Houses Not Portable

Prices quoted include all lumber cut to fit, windows, doors, woodwork, glass, paints, hardware, nails, lath, roofing and complete drawings and instructions. Highest grade lumber for all interior woodwork, siding, and outside finish. Send today for Free Aladdin Catalog No. 469.

The ALADDIN Co., BAY CITY MICHIGAN

Also Mills and Offices at Wilmington, North Carolina; Portland, Oregon; and Toronto, Ontario

Here's a Prescription



for Coughs

For quick relief try PISO'S—A most effective syrup different from all others. Safe and sane for young and old. Pleasant—no opiates—no upset stomach. 35c and 60c sizes obtainable everywhere.

PISO'S—For Coughs & Colds

PATENTS. INVENTORS should write for Free Guide Books and RECORD OF INVENTION BLANK before disclosing invention. Send model or sketch of your invention for our Free opinion of its patentable nature.

VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
753 Ninth St. Washington, D. C.

Learn to Draw at Home

Illustrators, Cartoonists, Commercial Artists earn big money. $25 to $100 a week and more. Learn at home in spare time under personal direction of one of America's most famous newspaper, magazine, advertising artists of 35 years' successful experience.

BE AN ARTIST

Delightful, fascinating profession. Wonderful new home-study method makes drawing easy! Send coupon or postal today for special offer telling of complete Artist's Outfit FREE to new students. Write for handsome book, "How to Become an Artist." Don't delay—write or send coupon at once. Address

Washington School of Art, Inc.
Room 1974 Marden Bldg., Washington, D. C.

FREE COUPON

Washington School of Art, Inc.
Room 1974 Marden Bldg. Washington, D. C.

Send me particulars of FREE ARTIST'S OUTFIT offer and Free Book, "How to Become an Artist."

Name.....
(State whether Mr., Miss or Mrs.)

Address.....

City..... State...

necessary apparatus. No part of the fund would be needed for the purchase of uniforms. Dozens of prospective fire-fighting gallants already had sent in their personal measurements, accompanied by cash remittances, and thus early various white residents had been startled by the sight, on Sunday afternoons in the colored quarters, of dark pedestrians who wore heavy metal helmets and brass-mounted belts and the reddest of red shirts adorned frontwise with the pearliest of all possible buttons. Some of these apparitions jauntily carried pickaxes, also privately purchased; it was a sort of dress rehearsal, satisfying to the principals and giving added vivacity to the weekly promenade.

Such pleasant preludes were as so much free advertising for the approaching benefit; not that it needed the advance publicity. The date drawing nearer, the affair grew in scope of its own momentum. Three weeks before its natal night it became apparent that Colored Odd Fellows' Hall could never hold the audience; the main committee met and, in one splendid sweeping gesture, leased the Franklin Street Opera House. Professor Barbee put through this ambitious deal.

Only a man of parts could have crowded into his days the duties which he assumed. He drafted the program, he selected the cast for the playlet which would precede the olio of single appearances, he drilled the cast in their lines—which he had written—and he taught them their stage business. He passed supreme and final judgment. Finally he found time to compose, especially for the occasion, what he spoke of as a characteristic and descriptive overture march.

But none save the members of his orchestra—and they all pledged to secrecy—was permitted to have knowledge of the nature of this offering. They practiced it behind locked doors; to friends they hinted at novelties in theme and treatment which would make the grand opening number the outstanding feature, really, of the whole eventful evening.

Nearly all the white folks ate cold suppers or warmed-over ones on the big night; else they cooked their own suppers. Long before dusk the customary goddesses and chieftainesses of the kitchens of the Quality had vanished.

Was it a big night? Was it the biggest of all conceivable nights? The ayes have it, unanimously. The doors of the Franklin Street Opera House opened at seven forty-five. The audience began assembling shortly after half-past six, drawn thither by a delicious fever of restlessness.

It was fine to see the multitude assembling, finer still to be seen there in one's most gallus and most gala raiment. For once, at least, the colored population would not be cribbed off in the uppermost balcony which ordinarily was reached by a side way and, even had there been no greater lure, surely this alone were worth coming early and beforehand for. The side door was closed now. All might march in by the wide front entrances; any, having the price, might appear for this night in dress circle or parquet or stage box. And did! It subtly marked the change in the ordinary regulations governing the theater that by eight o'clock every chair on the sloped main floor was occupied; but the top gallery was as empty as an empty grave. Who would deign to sit in his old place aloft when he might reveal himself downstair

At the front of the house no white fur tionary showed himself. Green Wilg sold tickets through the box office windo Amasi Steger, in his red shirt and l glazed belt, took them up at the doo The ushers were recruited from this yea graduating class of Magnolia Colored Hi School; back of the scenes the stage han were members of what might be called t younger Colored Owl Lunchwagon set dashing blades of the night life grou young men-about-town, taking on this j for the novelty of it and the joy of havi an anonymous part in the benefit.

There was visible but one white fa which was a broad red face belonging Officer Brack Mount of the city constab lary. By police ordinance a represent tive of the uniformed force must be prese at any public performance in any pub place of entertainment; Brack Mou who measured forty-nine inches around t chest and was as strong as Holy Wri prize bull of Bashan had drawn the deta He inclined his mighty bulk against t rear wall, his hands in his pockets, l slouch hat on the back of his head, while dark tidal wave burst through the pe sluiceway of the door jambs and we flooding and cascading down the slant of t floor to inundate each inch of seating spa

There might be a milling to and fro a a heartening excitement at the front the house, and there was. There might a delectable anticipatory flutter behi the lowered curtains where performe in make-up got in everybody's way a stumbled over the stage properties and g up again and were altogether happy; whe also, the two leading ladies—there we two of them—stood quite apparently ease and in seeming amity, swapping co pliments upon the effectiveness of ea other's costumes. If the straw-ton Ophelia Stubblefield had the advantage complexion over her sister actress—t latter's prevalent tint being a clear col rado maduro—it was not to be denied th there was something compelling abo Melissa Grider. Beyond question she d fill out those cerise fleshings of hers.

Racketing confusion might prevail o there; secret gnawing jealousies might he be masked. But in the mien and mann of Professor Wild Bill Barbee whe promptly at eight-ten, he entered t orchestra pit, coming through the tra from beneath the stage, there was no su gestion of a febrile pulse, no sign of ner ousness. He came, as befitting a ca tain, at the head of his special comman the Barbee Orchestra. He was exact and sharply on time as announced on t printed program—not one half-secon ahead of it, nor one quarter-second lat but precisely on the clock's tick. He bo himself as should one bear himself who h been the guiding spirit in a large unde taking now substantially accomplishe and who is a champion unchallenged any department of his various supremacie

Responding to a clamorous welcome, h took his bow, first alone, then beckone his squad forward to take another bo with him. The lesser men seated then selves, adjusting their music racks, finge ing their various instruments. He stoo erect and for a dramatic half-minute l looked into the mounting faces whi beamed upon him, row on row, and he sa more fine ivory than the average elepha nter finds in a good season in Equatorial rica. He saw something else most warm- to the heart of an artiste—admiration, preciation, all the sweet essences that distilled from popular idolatry; all se rich proteids and filling butter fats the milk of human adulation. He ost could feel himself taking on flesh; y almost could see him taking it on.

"Ting!"

He rapped with his little black baton on the rail in front of him, threw his head k and stiffened into a wide-aimed pos- e, and, on the signal, the salutatory ains of his original composition, which s to keynote the evening's entertain- nt, fell upon all those attentive ears.

t introduced itself quietly, the special rture. There was, at starting, a soft hering of bows on the strings of violins l a harmonious sound which, were it a ible thing, might have been described shimmery. Into this there crosscut an rruption of trills and chirps. It was trap-drummer, executing upon a small rbling device the sounds which in all hestras whatsoever are regarded as rectly imitative of the notes of any or all our native songbirds. Quickly then, tempo changed; loud interpolations ceeded, these also the doings, mainly, the busy trap-drummer. As a sharp h shrill passage occurred, with the colo strains predominating, the drum- r clanged a gong sharply three times; n, after a little pause, three times more. A moment later he was clattering two onut shells against the rim of his snare m; next he was uttering siren notes a short reed instrument shaped rather he form of a sweet potato; next sliding ny dried peas back and forth in a swiftly nipulated tin cannister; next was drop- g all else and catching up cymbal and s drum stick to add brazen clamor and l rumbling roar to the ensemble as his ows suddenly soared out of their shivery l quivery comminglings into a blaring, ashing, crashing discord purposely and lodically contrived.

To those who played and to him who ayed above their bent forms directing m, the intent and the picture of all this s clear enough. To them it was typical l topical, appropriate and highly illus- tive. In term of music, it was a chapter m the life of a volunteer fire fighter:

First the ethereal evening filling the opy community with its peace and qui- de; the glimmer of the moonlight upon stilled bosom of the old bayou, the enade of that winged minstrel of the uthern night, the mocking bird; then, ddenly, the alarm bell ringing out upon silent air—the harness dropping in ce upon the backs of the prancing horses—the reverberating thunder of ir shod and eager hooves when they ged out and across the sidewalk—the ating whistled warning from the throat the engine's steam escape pipe as the nting red monster sped toward the dangered spot—the hiss of the water rtling through the hose, spraying out l forth in a solid column, leaping up m the aimed tip of the nozzle like a silver mitar to slash its way into the red heart the devouring flames—the tinkle of ndow glass breaking in the terrific heat— e downward sweep and deafening smash tumbling walls—the distress, the fright, running to and fro; and then, for a

You've no idea what nice things you can make

MAKING useful, inexpensive things with LePage's is easier and quicker than sewing—a surprise to all who try it.

To make cretonne wastebasket

THE cardboard for this wastebasket cost 5 cents; the cretonne 30 and the braid 25. You can easily make one.

Cut six pieces of cardboard 4½x14 inches, with quarter oval cut out of two corners. Cover whole of one side of each with LePage's and place side by side, close together, on wrong side of cretonne 18 x 32 inches, allowing 2 inches of cretonne top and bottom and 5 inches at one end. Smooth carefully.

Fold in and LePage cretonne top and bottom, slashing around quarter ovals. Join first and last pieces of cardboard by LePaging the extra 5 inches of cretonne over the first section, cutting it off to match figure in cretonne. LePage plain material inside for lining, first turning its edge under all around and LePaging a narrow hem.

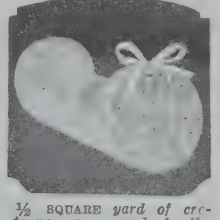
For bottom use heavy cardboard. LePage small blocks of wood under it to sides of basket for support. LePage band of upholstery braid around outside for decoration.

To cover flower pot with cretonne

FIRST wrap paper tight around pot. Let ends overlap and LePage together. Cut around top and bottom of pot, leaving cuff around pot but not fastened to it. Slit vertically, use as pattern.

From pattern cut out cardboard leaving 1 inch extra at one end; lap over and LePage to other end. Cut out cretonne, leaving ½ inch top and bottom and 2 inches at end. Coat entire outside surface of cardboard with LePage's and draw cretonne smoothly over it. Where cretonne overlaps, cut neatly around the design and LePage. Fold over the extra ½ inch top and bottom and LePage to inside.

For lining, cut enamel cloth a little smaller than pattern; LePage smoothly to entire inside surface. To cover saucer, spread coat of LePage's on outside surface and glue cretonne all around top edge first, drawing it smooth and close over sides and underneath in pleats. LePage upholstery braid around top of pot and saucer.



To make a doll's cradle

Take a round cardboard oatmeal or salt box. Remove paper wrapper. Cut box in half lengthwise, leaving cover and bottom for headboard and footboard. LePage the cover on. Cut circles of cretonne to fit inside headboard and footboard. Coat each with LePage's and put smoothly in place.

Take strip of cretonne wide as cradle is long, and long enough to fit outside and inside. Coat cradle outside and inside with LePage's and fit cretonne over it, slashing where body and rim meet. Cut cretonne for outside of headboard and footboard ¼ inch larger all around; LePage in place; slash edges and LePage over rim. LePage bias strips of cretonne inside and outside of rims, first LePaging narrow hem in them. LePage bow of ribbon on headboard.

A FLOWER pot can be covered easily in ½ hour, at a cost of 20 cents.

½ SQUARE yard of cretonne was enough for the box we used, making the cost of the cradle just 10c.

RUSSIA CEMENT CO.,
Laboratory and Factory: 71 Essex Ave., Gloucester, Mass.

LE PAGE'S GLUE

Watch LePage's advertisements for new things to make

THE STOPPER IS ALSO THE SPREADER.

A FREE COPY

Send this coupon for free copy of valuable book.

RUSSIA CEMENT CO.
71 Essex Avenue, Gloucester, Mass.

Please send me your book, "LePage's Glue—the Handy Helper for Making and Mending," and put me on your mailing list to receive new ideas of things I can easily make.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

climax to this phase of the composition, the outcry of the frenzied populace.

The concluding measure would deal interpretably with the rescue of the imperiled ones, with the extinguishment of the flames, with the triumphant return of the brave fire laddies to their station; then, once more, the moonlight, the calm of night, and for finale, the farewell sleepy note of the mocking bird repeated thrice and slowly, plaintively, dying away into sweet nothingness.

Creators often are like that—often are prone to assume that their symbolism will be as clear to those before whom it is expressed as it is clear to the mind of its originators. Certainly Professor Wild Bill Barbee was like that. So, too, were the members of his orchestra; their leader's confidence had been to them an example and a patterned model.

So now, midway of their rendition of this, his masterpiece, and immediately succeeding the manufacture by them of the crescendo effect of falling masonry, they paused. It was the cue for him to inject the most graphic touch of all his designed realism. He swung about, facing the sea of faces that rose before him and beyond him, and he stretched his jaws to full gape and at the top of his voice delivered himself of three words, to wit, as follows:

"Fire! Fire!! FIRE!!!"

The third word, though, the one here spelled out in capitals in an effort to express the intensity with which the Professor voiced it, was never finished. Really, he got only about this much of it out:

"FI——!!!"

His mouth, open to its widest diameter, froze in a round congealed orifice of stupefaction, and the last two letters froze with it. One instant he had been blaring his outcry into the sea of faces aforesaid. In the next, stunned and confounded, he stared at a tossing ocean of backs—backs of heads, backs of necks, backs of convulsive, weaving, kicking legs, backs of backs and of yet more backs.

Who, fitly and amply, can describe a panic in a crowded hall—the stark, primitive emotions of the huddled pack, the trampling underfoot of the weaker ones, the screams, the rending of garments, the mad strugglings, the shucking-off of the flimsy fabric of a vaunted civilization and the instantaneous reversion to elementals and to the caveman's cardinal instinct for self-preservation? Who, I ask you, properly can describe that? I know I can't. I shan't try. I shall be content with trying to tell, not how one panic rose and spread, but how this one was checked.

Until now, the narrative has had a single central figure. From now on, for a briefened space, it must have a second. The main rôle herewith transfers temporarily to Officer Brack Mount, he who was fashioned on the lines of the Scriptural bullock. He made a competent successor. Why he, the sole Caucasian present, should more clearly have translated the imagery of the Barbeeian overture than any other there is one of the mysteries, for he ordinarily was rather a plodding thinker and musically was by no means so apt to catch shading and cloaked rhythmic meanings as some of his Afric neighbors should have been. But about his behavior when the first dazed quick scrambling had merged into the rush for the outdoors, there was nothing enigmatic. Anybody with half an eye could have told exactly what intent was in this large white man's mind.

To its last frenzied unit that audience, in a solid groundswell, rolled toward the one remembered exit. It sought for safety and would find disaster. The jamming in the aisles might yield only minor casualties, but once let the fugitives begin blindly stumbling down the stairs, once let them start tripping over one another on the steps, piling and writhing and crushing together in a suffocating mass, and there would be a vastly different tale to tell.

Right in the face of the foremost of the fleeing crowd the broad double doors were slammed to, and against these doors, with a back to them, Brack Mount interposed a mountain of brawn. His fist flailed against the chin of the first onrushing figure to come in arm's reach of him. It fell to the lot of Logan Dismukes to be vicarious sacrifice. I'll say he fell.

Logan formed the bottommost layer of a structure magically reared. Brack Mount struck again and found a second mark in Babe Givens, and the said Babe, who was long and limber, folded up like a carpenter's rule and lay down to peaceful dreams on top of Logan Dismukes. Brack struck again, again, once, twice, thrice again, and the ring of stunned forms on the floor at his feet was growing. He couldn't miss. He didn't. Regardless of age, sex or size the big white man caught them, right swing or left hook, as they flew into range, and added them to his collection. It was rough surgery but he had a most desperate case on his hands.

Before the menace of the towering, pitiless figure that blocked the way, the front wave of the flight wavered, then gave back slightly, blocking the retreat of the press behind; and in that blessed second of grace the voice of Brack Mount came out of his commodious chest in a roar that dominated the mounting babel of screams and cries and groans as a fog whistle cuts through the mewings of the sea gulls when a storm is on:

"Hold on, you fools, there ain't any fire! There ain't any danger!"

Somehow his sincerity held all of them, or nearly all, as his fistwork already detained the damaged makings of a dozen. Somehow, even in that unreasoning time, they knew him for a savior and not an enemy, blocking the lone path of escape. That is to say, most did. Some few didn't. Ginger Dismukes didn't, for one. For ever so long after he revived he just couldn't be convinced that any white man who had his best interests at heart would have hit him that hard.

Brack Mount was prompt to reinforce his argument, the crowd swinging and heaving in irresolution:

"Course there ain't any fire! Don't you-all get the idea?—that crazy nigger down yonder—that one that runs your string band for you—he only just yelled 'Fire!' to make his music sound more natural. Why, don't you get it yet?—he was imitatin' a fire department with his fiddles and whistles and things. Just makin' believe —the derned idiot!"

His words made converts manifold. Scores, stalled in their tracks, stared at him over the intervening heads, still no more than half convinced. Others, who believed thoroughly, twisted about in press of bodies that confined them looked toward the orchestra pit. what they saw there was proof confir tory. A hum of anger like the hummin hornets—with some shaky bursts laughter in it—began to override abating chorus of fright.

Sist' Callie Meriwether, who was re any time to meet her weight in wildcat prime selected No. 1 red winter wildc at that—broke free of the jam.

"So tha's de way 'tis, is it?" she shriek "Skeerin' de giblets out of me fur nut an' gittin' my bes' clothes all tore off Lemme at 'im—tha's all—lemme at 'i

As passionately she headed back d the center aisle, Sister Meriwether too deep breath and amplified her threat:

"Lemme git my two hands on 'im on —I aims to turn 'im ever' way they is loose!"

She charged, and she charged not al She but voiced the sentiments and intent of nine hundred others, more or She but led the hunt. They followed f Their hats were smashed, their holi gear was damaged, their dignity had b beleaguered and upset. Their ever had been spoiled, their toes most cru had been trodden on, their jostled bo were bruised and sore. It looked as tho Officer Mount would have to take another life-saving job—an individual this time—whereas heretofore toni he'd been strictly a wholesaler.

A brave man may fear no single ene but who is there among us that can w stand the spontaneous and therefore the more whole-hearted hostility of entire race? The Professor saw tempery Aunt Callie coming. He Uncle Juny Tallers coming—old Ju the blue-gummed man, whose bite sure death—and old Juny's lips w skinned back in a snarl of rage and blue gums showed. He saw a great h coming down upon him and he heard w they promised him. He had not got b yet his powers of coherent speech which previously stated, quit him half through that fatal ill advised third w but the prospect of immediate destruct by mob violence restored bodily activ to his palsied person. Before him, between the paralyzed legs of two of associates, yawned the opening of passageway leading from the orchestra under the stage and on out through stage door. He went in it like a fly squirrel in a knot hole.

Some two weeks later a white gentlem was asking Æsop Loving what had bec of that tall dark brown fellow na Barbee. The white gentleman said hadn't seen him lately about town an had been wondering.

"'Ain't nobody seen him lately, s said Æsop, smiling happily, "an' reason they ain't is 'cause he's went f 'mongst us. Seems lak he must 'a' tired of flinchin' ever' time anybody y out 'Fire!' behind his back on the st w'ich wuz toler'ble frequent. He sutt was right tamed down an' pitiful loo to'des the last. I reckin' also mebb got tired of hearin' the new name w they'd taken to callin' 'im by. He ma been Wild Bill w'en he hit this town bu wuz Sweet William w'en he went aw

"The Eminent Dr. Deeves," by Irvin Cobb, announced for this issue, will appear in April.

WHAT SURPRISED THE CHEF

Real Cream in Cream Soups

"You don't mean to tell me," exclaimed a noted chef, who was visiting the "Home of the 57," "You don't mean to tell me that you put real cream in your cream soups!"

His specialty was cream soups. His exclamation of surprise came when he saw the great cans of real cream, fresh from the dairy, waiting to be made into Heinz Cream Soups.

"Of course!" was the reply. "What else?"

"But I never use cream in my cream soups—or even milk. It isn't necessary. Nobody notices the difference."

He was told, however, that real cream was necessary for Heinz Cream Soups.

Doesn't the label say "Cream"?

When a Heinz Soup is called "Cream Soup" it is because it is made with real cream.

When Heinz Beans are called "Oven Baked" it is because they are really baked in dry heat ovens.

"Pure" means pure, and there are 57 Varieties of HEINZ pure food products.

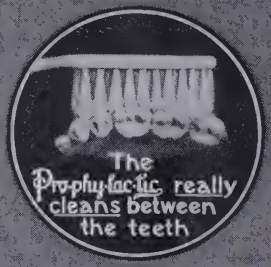
H. J. HEINZ COMPANY
57 Varieties

57

Pro-phy-lac-tic

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Tooth Brush



"A Clean Tooth Never Decays"

And this brush is designed in shape and quality to clean teeth thoroughly. Uniformly good. Three sizes — children's, youths', and adults'; and three textures — hard, medium, and soft. Always sold in the Yellow Box.

FLORENCE MANUFACTURING CO.
Florence, Mass.

Canadian Agents: 247 St. Paul Street West, Montreal

Semper Fidelis

(Continued from page 45)

"Hello, there's another panther track—no, by Jupiter, there are two of them. An old lady with two yearling cubs. Great snakes! I hope they're all females! That would be ninety dollars bounty from the State, sixty from the Diamond Bar Cattle Company and at least twenty dollars for the pelts. Here's where I land a Christmas present for Martha!"

He pressed eagerly on. Once he paused, listening. Far down the hogsback he heard, very faintly, a short, sharp, apprehensive bark. Timmy, doubtless. "Little lobster," Dan soliloquized and pressed on swiftly. For a quarter of a mile he followed the trail, momentarily expecting to catch a glimpse of the three panthers squatting around the carcass of the deer. He was disappointed, however.

"Dragging it home," Dan thought. "Well, if I don't get a shot at them before dark I'll find their den and come back after them tomorrow with the hounds. Hello, they've left the timber and gone down over that broken country . . . they hole up in one of the caves in that limestone wash."

He ran at top speed along the trail and as he ran he heard again, far behind him, the eager bark of a dog. Dan was running downhill now and the grade was growing more and more precipitous. The snow had piled in huge drifts on that side of the hill and the sun had warmed it; Dan's feet sank deeper and deeper. The gory trail led straight ahead.

Dan paused. Ahead of him the slope of the hill pitched abruptly downward at an angle of about sixty-five degrees. Forty feet in front of him three panthers stood with their backs to him, the carcass of the deer lying on the snow between them. As Dan had suspected from the tracks they were an old female and two yearling cubs.

"Don't like these end-on shots," Dan murmured, and raised his carbine to his shoulder. Then he whistled. Instantly all three cats half turned and Dan knew he just couldn't help placing a bullet back of the old lady's left shoulder.

To his amazement and chagrin the firing pin fell on thin air or a defective cartridge. He jerked back the bolt and slammed it home again, his glance still on his quarry—and then something struck him in the middle of the back and knocked him forward on his face. It was a snow avalanche. He started to slide downhill with incredible swiftness, straight toward the trio of panthers, who, seeing him coming, abandoned their kill and fled before him.

Their speed, however, was not greater than that of the avalanche of snow upon the crest of which Dan Pelly rode; almost instantly it engulfed them and hunter and hunted, rolling over and over, suddenly shot out into space and landed with more or less shock in the bottom of what Dan realized must be a deep ravine. He was not hurt, however, and he still clung to his rifle; in a few seconds he had fought his way clear of the few feet of snow in which he was buried. Up he came, like a ground hog to have a look at the weather, and his first thought was:

"Where are those doggone panther?"

Almost instantly he saw them. They were three very badly frightened cats—likewise they were very angry and that they held Dan Pelly accountable for their fright, their undignified tumble and the loss of their supper, Dan had not the slightest doubt, for all three stood in a row on the snow about thirty feet from him, growling low, throaty growls, flashing huge, businesslike teeth, and slowly switching their tails from side to side.

"Gosh!" Dan Pelly thought, "they mean business. They'll jump me for less than a stale cookey." He took aim at Mother Panther's broad forehead—and again the firing pin fell harmlessly. As if at command, all three cats squatted and glared at him; then the old lioness crept forward a few feet on her belly and Dan backed hurriedly away, pumping his gun swiftly.

It was empty. "Oh, Martha, Martha, why can't you respect my one simple wish, my sole inflexible rule?" Dan muttered. He was so angry he yearned with a great yearning to sit down in the snow and blubber like some great lubberly boy. Instead he compromised by swearing what is technically known as a blue streak. He hadn't been so angry in thirty years.

"You damned fools," he yelled at the panthers, "I can't shoot you, so why don't you beat it?" He backed away some more and Mother Panther, reading this move as a sign of weakness and indecision, crept after him. Goose flesh ran up Dan Pelly's spine.

Dan looked about him, found a stone as large as a baseball lying on top of the snow, and hurled it at the old panther. It struck her fairly on the nose and she screamed with rage and amazement; followed by her progeny, she turned to retreat and leave Dan Pelly in possession of the field.

And then to Dan Pelly came a realization that started his heart to thumping furiously. His unwelcome neighbors could not retreat. They had all fallen into a huge "pot hole" at the head of a ravine through which, except in freezing weather, a little stream had run for untold centuries. At the head of this ravine, where the slope of the hill pitched so precipitately, Dan remembered that ordinarily there was a waterfall some eighty feet high. The water, mixed with gravel and occasional stones, and falling from that height, had gradually eroded in the sandstone formation below a pot hole about fifty feet in diameter.

From the crest of the waterfall—now frozen solid—the hill sloped abruptly east, so that the walls of this hole were some sixty feet perpendicularly at the upper end but decreasing gradually to about forty feet at the lower end. As a usual thing this pot hole contained a pool the surface of which when the stream was flowing normally reached about halfway to the top of the lower wall and trickled out through a six inch fissure in the sandstone—a fissure which gradually widened into a little gully that divided the floor of the cañon below.

Despite the fact that the avalanche, piling in on top of the frozen pool, had half filled the pot hole with snow, the problem of escaping from this natural prison was not an easy one, although Dan realized that given his time he could climb out of it via this fissure, albeit as he contemplated the prospect of three panthers clawing at his trouser seat while doing it, he was filled with misgivings.

Meanwhile the panthers padded around their half of this natural cage, striving to climb the almost perpendicular wall and falling back ignominiously on their haunches each time they tried. Dan knew they could not escape from that pot hole; they were still his panthers, and it behooved him to climb out, hasten home for some cartridges, return and dispatch them.

He essayed to claw his way up the lower wall by using the inequalities of the formation on each side of the six inch fissure. He was up six feet when a ledge upon which he had been clinging with one toe broke and precipitated him back into the snow on the floor of the pot hole. Again and again he tried it, but each time he failed and fell back into the snow. Each time he fell, the panthers growled and spat, facing about on him as if to repel an attack.

"Dog my cats," murmured Dan, "this is no business. A mountain lion is the greatest coward on earth—maybe! Hence the old saying: Brave as a lion. But I know panther well enough to realize that the more frightened they become the braver they get. An animal always charges because it is frightened. These panthers are hungry, they've been robbed of a meal, they've been rolled end over end in a little snow avalanche and dropped into a cage with their enemy. Pretty soon they're going to realize they can't get out that way and they'll take a notion to try to get out this way. Then I'll have to slide by them somehow and as we pass each other the old lady's going to maul me out of respect for her cubs. I'll have to start cutting toe holds in this sandstone crevice with my pocket knife and get out of here P. D. Q. If I'm to get out alive."

Far above him, on the hilltop over which he had come, a dog barked.

"That wasn't Timmy," Dan Pelly thought. Sounds like Toby, but it can't be. And yet—I ought to know Toby's voice. It can't be——"

He backed against the north wall of the pot hole in order to gain a clear view over the crest of the southern wall and up the hillside down which he had been swept. On the skyline, sharply outlined against the snow, stood an extra large Airedale terrier, with a dash of red at his breast; and as Dan Pelly gazed the dog started slowly and weakly down the hill, following the trail he and the cats had lately taken. From time to time the dog barked, but there was an anxious, whimpering timbre in that bark—a sort of "Wait for me boys I'm coming" note—and then Dan Pelly knew that the impossible had happened.

Clonmel Knight, alias Toby, was afield again—for the last time. He would be in at the death—his own and Dan Pelly's—unless—unless——

What was that red thing at his collar? Dan thrilled. A bandanna handkerchief! Martha had sent him! He was bringing cartridges! That was it! He was bringing the cartridges!

Dan's joyous whoop echoed up the pot hole and reverberated against the surrounding hills. "Oh, you Toby! Come on, boy! Here I am, Toby. Come, Toby, come on, boy! Hot trail, Toby!"

MRS. GRACE HORCHLER, 4352 MICHIGAN AVENUE, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

From 234 lbs. to 160

The amazing story of Mrs. Horchler, who took off 74 lbs. through a novel method of weight reduction, and became a new woman in health and figure

WALLACE

I HAD just about given up hope when I got in touch with Wallace. Every reducing method I had tried, from fasting and Turkish baths to drugs and machinery, had failed me, and I looked with question on the Wallace method.

"Just like all the rest," I thought. "You either have to stop eating or work yourself to death to get any results at all. Finally I persuaded myself to try out Wallace's first-lesson reducing record in my home, on his free trial offer. That opened my eyes! My reduction in one week was so great and so delightfully achieved as to be almost unbelievable. Continuing with my reducing records—well, here is what I did—took off 74 pounds in 4 months, and made a remarkable improvement in my health, figure and whole appearance."

Mrs. Horchler is only one of Wallace's many cases of wonderful reduction. More than 200,000 people in all will tell you that Wallace's is the method that works—just as surely as heat or cold works on the thermometer!

No Starving—No Punishment

The Wallace Method one of real pleasure!

Wallace can take off your surplus weight just as he took off Mrs. Horchler's. He can take off the necessary number of pounds, whatever it be—20—50—70—or 80. He can make your figure normal in weight and dimensions. And he won't ask you to starve yourself or tax yourself with book reading or any other irksome rigamarole. His method is a simple and easy one because it goes hand in hand with Nature. What Wallace gives you to do takes care of the food you eat. It causes the food to make only blood, bone and sinew. Nothing is left to make fat.

What You Should Weigh for Your Height and Age

Height in Inches	Age 20 to 29 yrs Lbs.	Age 30 to 39 yrs Lbs.	Age 40 to 49 yrs Lbs.	Age 50 and Over Lbs.
60	111	116	122	125
61	113	118	124	127
62	115	120	127	130
63	118	123	130	133
64	122	127	133	136
65	125	131	137	140
66	129	135	141	145
67	133	139	145	150
68	137	143	149	155
69	141	147	153	159
70	145	145	156	163

Results in 5 Days

Just try Wallace's method for a week! That's all he asks. You'll see results in a week that will once and for all settle the question of how to reduce.

Send No Money

Not a cent! Just mail the coupon and get Wallace's first Reducing record (in a plain container) free for 5 days' trial in your home. Put Wallace's method to the test. Note your reduction in 5 days. Let the scales tell you. If you are not more than delighted and amazed with your reduction and the ease with which it was made, just return the record at Wallace's expense and you won't owe him a cent for anything. Fill out and mail the coupon and be prepared for a wonderful surprise.

WALLACE, 630 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago (133)

Please send me FREE and PREPAID for 5 days' free trial the original Wallace Reducing Record for my first reducing lesson. If I am not perfectly satisfied with the results, I will return your record and will neither owe you one cent nor be obligated in any way.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

He glanced toward the panthers. They had abandoned their futile efforts to climb the walls of their prison and now, the old female realized that the affairs of herself and family had reached an impasse. She knew dogs! To her, poor, feeble, staggering Toby and his dauntless war cry spelled death. However, all was not yet lost. It might not be too late to escape after all—via that crack in the east wall; and between her and possible liberty stood nothing more formidable than a man who showed no disposition to molest her—who showed, indeed, a most unmanly desire to escape. And the creature uttered cries! He appeared more distraught than she! She would chance it, for the sake of her cubs.

Dan saw her crouch low to the ground and noted her fixed, blazing glance bent searchingly upon him. Slowly she advanced, a few inches at a time. She would bluff him out of the way if she could, but if he would not be bluffed——

A dozen yards from the brink of the pot hole Dan saw Toby stagger, turn a complete circle, and flop on his side. Was this to be the finish? Would Toby, done in with victory in sight, give up the ghost where Dan could not reach the precious cartridges, or would he make one more effort? If he would only start rolling he was bound to arrive, dead or alive. But no, he lay there, utterly spent, and with a shriek Dan gathered a handful of snow, pressed it into a ball and hurled it at the advancing death. The old female shrank back and considered the situation a moment, seeing which Dan threw snow with both hands, made a short dash at her, still shouting, and flung his hat at her.

Here was a situation Mother Panther had not counted on. She could smell Toby—a light breeze, blowing from the south, brought her the unmistakable scent; but—he was not coming closer, and his barking had ceased. What did this mean? And what meant this sudden furious advance on the part of the natural enemy she had already, against her better judgment, commenced to hold cheap! She retreated to the other end of the pot hole with her cubs to consider the situation, but she still growled and swung her tail.

In the slush that remained in the track of the avalanche Toby still lay motionless. He had come to the end of the trail. For some mysterious reason the footprints of his beloved Dan had disappeared, likewise the footprints and scent of the hereditary enemy. Toby was puzzled and broken-hearted. Dan Pelly and the panther had been swept out of his ken.

Down in the pot hole Dan retreated to the crack in the wall again and feverishly commenced digging toe holds with his pocket knife; seeing which, the mother panther crouched flat again and regarded him speculatively. The whole situation was a most suspicious one and she was loath to start an assault until quite certain she could win. The dog was not advancing and he no longer barked. She would think it over.

Up on the hillside Toby stirred in the chilly snow slush. He was gasping, a-tremble all over, and he wanted very much to lie there and die quietly. But the will to live, to struggle on, to fight on, is never absent in an Airedale, and Toby was resolved to cast about in a couple of wide circles and see if he could not pick the trail up again. He stirred and whimpered and willed that his crazy hind quarters might obey him, but they refused, for at last the short circuit had been completed and Toby would never walk again. But he might crawl. His front legs would still obey that adamant will to follow on and ever onward, for somewhere out front there things were happening, Dan needed him and he must come. He barked encouragement to the unseen master and faced forward.

Hark! What was that? Toby's old ears were erected. In his poor puzzled brain a faint voice beat ceaselessly: "Toby, Toby boy! Come on, Toby, Toby! Toby!" Toby wasn't certain that he heard, but he barked a reply—and then there came to him a sound which even his old dull auditory nerves were not proof against—the shrill, piercing whistle of a man calling his dog from afar.

Toby's answering bark was almost a sob. He was catching up! Dan had seen him, was inviting him to the fray—at last! In his pocket Dan had found the powerful "warble" whistle which he used when training dogs for the field trials, and he was blowing it like mad, while the she panther, puzzled and somewhat repulsed by this inexplicable noise, retreated still farther.

"Coming, Dan!" Toby barked, and down the slush trail of the snow slide he slithered, his dead hind quarters dragging behind him. Inch by inch, foot by foot he came, whimpering, barking, crying—and presently he reached the brink of the pot hole and saw his master. Dan waved his hand in encouragement and without a moment's hesitation Toby crawled over the edge of the pot hole and tumbled down—into Dan Pelly's waiting arms!

Dan laid him on the snow and with a slash of his knife ripped the bandanna from his neck and found the cartridges. But the arrival of Toby had thrown the old lioness into a panic, and as Dan jammed the last cartridge into the magazine and stood erect, she charged. As she left the ground on her first leap Dan fired, but failed to stop her; almost before he knew it her heavy body struck him full on the breast.

Involuntarily he had thrown up his rifle to guard his face and as he went over backward with the big cat on top he heard the teeth of the lioness crunch into the stock of the gun. And then Dan Pelly shrieked—a single word:

"Toby!"

The sleek flank of the lioness was within six inches of Toby's muzzle, where he lay in the snow at Dan's feet—the pungent odor of cat assailed his old nose for the last time. With a growl he summoned his little remaining strength and all of his courage to the aid of his stricken master. He rose on his good front legs and hurled himself forward; his long jaw closed over the cat's flank and the few snags of teeth he still possessed sank to the gums in her flesh.

With a roar of rage, the old lioness, who had just managed to free her mouth of the stock of Dan's rifle—for on the instant that she bit blindly at it Dan had thrust it farther into her mouth with his free hand—whirled to meet this new assault, and for a couple of seconds Toby and the panther sprawled together across Dan Pelly's legs, with Toby hanging on resolutely and the big cat twisting her body to reach him.

She succeeded! She bit him and crunched in his loins. But what did Toby care for that? He did not even know he had been bitten, for had he not died in his rear end five minutes before? Nothing now mattered save the front end of him—the business end—and that still lived and was all Airedale! Toby continued to chew silently, so with a snarl of rage the lioness commenced whirling like a pin wheel in an effort to shake Toby off.

Ah, if Toby had only been the dog he used to be! If only the big, ripping chisels of teeth he used to have had still been his! They would have met in that panther's flank and she might whirl and be damned to her! But alas! Toby was very old and half dead, with the other half dying; his teeth were few and short and the strength was gone from that long and powerful jaw. At the second whirl he was catapulted off into space, rolling over and over in the snow; before he had finished rolling the old lioness and both cubs were on him—and Dan Pelly was momentarily free with a loaded rifle beside him.

Toby died fighting, in absolute silence in so far as he was concerned. One of the cubs mouthed him just back of the shoulders—and that hurt, but Toby did not whimper. He died with the cub's foreleg in his mouth, and as his canine soul —granting, as Dan Pelly believed, that all good hunting dogs have souls—mounted to the Happy Hunting Grounds where Johnny waited, Dan Pelly, scratched, bruised and somewhat dazed, rested his back against the east wall of the pot hole and placed his shots where they would do the most good.

An hour later he had his toe holds dug up each side of the crevice and was ready to go home, but before he started he sorted what was left of Clonmel Knight, called Toby, out of the bloody snow, bound the rapidly stiffening legs together with the ruin of the bandanna handkerchief, swung the old hero around his neck as he was wont to carry deer and climbed laboriously out of that gory amphitheater. On the morrow, his scratches attended to, he would return for the pelts, but for the present he needed all of his strength to carry a dead forty-five pound dog four miles and arrive home before Martha should begin to worry.

Shortly after dark he staggered in, a welter of blood and rags, and stood in the middle of the kitchen, weaving a little on his old legs and gazing upon Martha with extreme severity.

"Martha," he said very distinctly, "the next time you fuss with my rifle I'll be tee-totally doggoned if I don't let you hear from me something scandalous!"

"Oh, Dan," she cried tremulously, "are you badly hurt?"

"No," he replied, "not very, but I've been mighty badly scared. I been playin' the part o' Daniel in the lions' den. Got three of 'em—one male an' two females. When I had 'em cornered and discovered I'd been carrying an empty rifle, Martha, I was that angry I swore I'd keep every cent of the bounty for myself, but after Toby arrived with the cartridges I commenced feeling a little better disposed toward you, so I reckon you get the bounty just the same."

"So Toby got there?" Martha queried, and sat down weakly.

"Yes, the going was hard on him, but he made the grade and was in at the death. At the finish he was granted a privilege he had always desired, but which I had always denied, because I knew it meant death to him if he ever tried it. He died with a taste of live panther in his mouth,

Thousands of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

By ELINOR GLYN

Author of "Three Weeks," "Beyond the Rocks," and other famous stories and articles, many of which appeared in Cosmopolitan

THOUSANDS of people can make money writing stories and photoplays and don't know it. This may seem to be a startling assertion, but it is absolutely true. Most anyone can tell a story. Why can't most anyone write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality to-day.

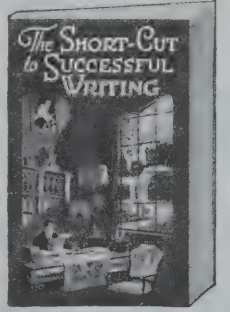
The time will come when millions of people will be writers—there will be countless thousands of scenario, magazine, and newspaper writers—they are coming, coming—a whole new world of them. And do you know what these writers-to-be are doing now? Why, they are the men—armies of them—young and old, now doing mere clerical work in offices, keeping books, selling merchandise, or even driving trucks, running elevators, street cars, waiting on tables, working at barber chairs, following the plow, or teaching schools in the rural districts; and women, young and old, by scores, now pounding typewriters, or standing behind counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are The Writers of To-morrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the Creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as He did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you haven't the gift. Many people are afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, they might have astonished the world!

But two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your Imagination. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it, the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard often turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing could be further from the truth. Many of the greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great, wide, open, boundless Book of Humanity! Yes, seething all around you, every day, every hour, every minute—even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays—a wealth of material, a world of things happening. Every one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would describe it all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you might be amazed to find your story would sound just as interesting as many you've read in magazines or seen on the screen. Now, you will naturally say, "Well, if writing is as simple as you say it is, why can't I learn to write." Who says you can't?

Listen! I have made arrangements with my publishers, The Authors' Press, Auburn, N. Y., to send you, ABSOLUTELY FREE, a handsome book called "The Short-Cut To Successful Writing." This amazing book shows how easily stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many who don't dream they can write, suddenly find it out. How bright men and women, without any special experience, learn to their own amazement, that their simplest Ideas may furnish brilliant plots for Plays and Stories. How your own Imagination may provide an endless gold mine of Ideas that bring Happy Success and Handsome Cash Royalties. How new writers get their names into print. How to tell if you ARE a writer. How to avoid discouragement and the pitfalls of failure. How to win!



Elinor Glyn

THIS surprising book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge. No obligation. Your copy is waiting for you. Write for it NOW. Then you can pour your whole soul into this magic new enchantment that has come into your life—story and play writing.

The lure of it, the love of it, the luxury of it will fill your wasted hours and dull moments with profit and pleasure. You will have this noble, absorbing, money-making new profession! And all in your spare time, without interfering with your regular duties. Who says you can't make money with your brain! Who says you can't turn your thoughts into cash! Who says you can't make your dreams come true! Nobody knows—BUT THE BOOK WILL TELL YOU.

This Book FREE

So why waste any more time wondering, dreaming, waiting? Simply fill out the coupon below and mail it to The Authors' Press. You're not BUYING anything—you're getting it ABSOLUTELY FREE. A book that may prove the Book of Your Destiny. A Magic Book through which men and women, young and old, may learn to turn their spare hours into cash.

Get your letter in the mail before you sleep to-night. Who knows—it may mean for you the Dawn of a New To-morrow!

LETTERS LIKE THESE ARE POURING IN!

"Since I wrote you about six months ago I have earned over $4,500.00 with my pen. I answered your ad out of curiosity, I didn't dream I could become a writer. I owe all of my success to The Authors' Press."—Janet Burrows, Cleveland, O.

"A very important company has just bought one of my comedies. It was my first literary effort and I realize that I owe my success to your institution."—Mary Moran, Mexico City, Mex.

"Bless the day I answered your ad. I just received a check for my first story. While the amount was small—only $250.00—the thrill was there just the same."—Peggy K. Reidell, Chicago, Ill.

"I am pleased to inform you that I quite recently sold a photoplay synopsis for $500.00. I attribute most of my success to my studies with The Authors' Press."—Edith Taylor, New York, N. Y.

"I have sold three short stories to Canadian Magazines."—John Mutter, Sasks., Can.

"I had an article, 'Back to the Farm' in the Nov. Woman's Home Companion, and recently sold my first fiction, a farm story, to The Farmer's Wife."—May Mumaw, Hiram, O.

THE AUTHORS' PRESS,
Dept. 60, Auburn, N. Y.

Send me ABSOLUTELY FREE, "The Short-Cut To Successful Writing." This does not obligate me in any way. (Print your name and address plainly in pencil.)

Name.....

Address.....

City and State.....

Useful 24 hours a day

Your Davenport-Sofa Bed—20c a Day

Upholstered in flowered tapestry or imitation leather. Cane-Panel ends. A roomy, attractive sofa for daytime. A restful bed for nighttime. This Sofa and 1,200 other equally attractive Furnishings offered in our big 104-page FREE Larkin Book of Better Homes. A trustworthy guide to thousands of home-lovers in home beautifying. Check below offer interested in.

1 to 4 Years to Pay

☐ Furnishings ☐ Symphonic Player Pianos
☐ Symphonic Pianos ☐ Symphonola Phonographs

(Check offer and mail ad Today)

Get at once our money-saving Factory-to-Family prices on these attractive Furnishings and Musical Instruments.

Get Our Low Prices

Hurry this ad—check offer—with full name and address TODAY for big FREE Book.

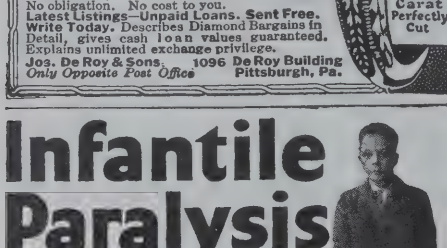
Larkin Co Inc.

Desk FCOS-323 BUFFALO, N.Y

60% of Market Price

Will Buy Diamonds Here

This 3/4—1/16 Ct. perfectly cut diamond, a snappy, blazing solitaire, at $42.65 among bargains in our lists. See the many big amazing values some as low as $60.00 per Carat, other higher per Carat bargains. This 75 year oldest largest Diamond Banking firm in all the world lends money on diamonds. Thousands of unpaid loans and other bargains. Must sell NOW.



This Ring $42.65 3/4 - 1/16 Carat Perfectly Cut

Why Pay Full Prices

Costs Nothing To See Any Diamond sent for absolutely free examination at our risk. No obligation. No cost to you. Latest Listings—Unpaid Loans. Sent Free. Write Today. Describes Diamond Bargains in Detail, gives cash loan values guaranteed. Explains unlimited exchange privilege.

Jos. De Roy & Sons, 1096 De Roy Building Only Opposite Post Office Pittsburgh, Pa.

Infantile Paralysis

Clarence Gossmeyer "crawled" 8 months after having had Infantile Paralysis. Then he was brought to McLain Sanitarium. Read what parents say about results secured in 6 months:

Our son could not walk or even stand up as the result of Infantile Paralysis. After six months' treatment he can walk and get around real good, considering the shape he was in when he entered your Sanitarium. Everyone thinks he has improved wonderfully. We will be glad to answer letters.

MR. AND MRS. W. H. GOSSMEYER
R. R. 1, Corydon, Iowa

FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN

The McLain Sanitarium is a thoroughly equipped private institution devoted exclusively to the treatment of Club Feet, Infantile Paralysis, Spinal Disease and Deformities, Wry Neck, Hip Disease, Diseases of the joints, especially as found in children and young adults. Our book, "Deformities and Paralysis" also "Book of References" sent free.

THE L. C. McLAIN ORTHOPEDIC SANITARIUM
936 Aubert Ave. St. Louis, Mo.

F-414

and he did it to save me. The old pup's gone, Martha. He was Clonmel Knight at the finish and died gloriously on the field of honor. I brought most of him home. It's lying in state in the woodshed."

He drew himself a dipper of cold water, which he drank with averted face.

Presently he queried in a husky, strained voice: "Martha, what's that mot—motto—of the—Mar—ine Corps?"

"First to fight," replied Martha, remembering the wartime recruiting literature of that gallant little corps.

"That isn't it, Martha. The Munson boy had it on the—insignia—in his—cap when he—came home from—the war. It's Latin."

"I understand, Dan. We'll carve it on Toby's tombstone. Semper fidelis, Dan. It means 'Always faithful.'"

Dan nodded and commenced to weep. He couldn't help it. He always paid his favorite dogs the tribute of a tear when they passed on, for Dan Pelly was a hopeless sentimentalist, as, indeed, are all who bear true faith and allegiance to the Little God of the Open Spaces. And moreover, Clonmel Knight, called Toby, had been Johnny's dog.

COSMOPOLITAN readers will be delighted to know that P. G. Wodehouse, of "Bertie and Jeeves" fame, begins a series of new stories next month a cobwebbed bottle of rare wine on the shelf of a New York grocer. Altogether a carefree, happy-go-lucky sort of person—a delightful companion, but one from whom you might shy as a son-in-law.

The Poisoner

(Continued from page 81)

Bridget O'Connell, the ancient janitress who made his bed, hung up his scattered garments and cooked that movable feast he called his breakfast, adored the creaking boards of his studio because he trod upon them.

"One o' thim glorious Kildares!" he was to her always. "I'll not disturb him, the poor lamb!" she would say to herself after frantic calls for her lodger on the telephone "And him so tired! The darlin'!"

She believed him to be the greatest sculptor of all time. Had he not made her the cutest little pig—a very spalpeen!—out of clay?

A strange friendship, that between this Irish will-o'-the-wisp and the exact, lethargic Nordic who did nothing upon impulse, had looked up his expectation of life upon the mortality tables and systematically invested his money at three and a half percent.

Kyran let himself in with his latchkey, bounded up the three flights to his studio and dragged out of its corner a modeling table on which was a mass of clay covered with a damp cloth. He had planned to do a daring allegorical bust of a pilot aviator, head lowered and eyes peering earthward, to be called "The Eagle." That was all over now.

"Tomorrow morning!" he declared. "I'll put the whole spirit of the Cinquecento into it! Then perhaps——"

He rearranged the cloth upon the clay, trod out his cigarette and entered his bedroom. Upon his bureau stood the photograph of a young girl, her hair done in the manner of a portrait by Parmigiano. An antique Florentine frame intensified the illusion that the photograph was that of a painting in some gallery. The face, which was in profile, was inexperienced, docile and trustful, but singularly sweet and alluring.

Kildare seized the picture in his hands and pressed it to his cheeks and lips, kissing it again and again.

"Margaret!" he said. "O Margaret!"

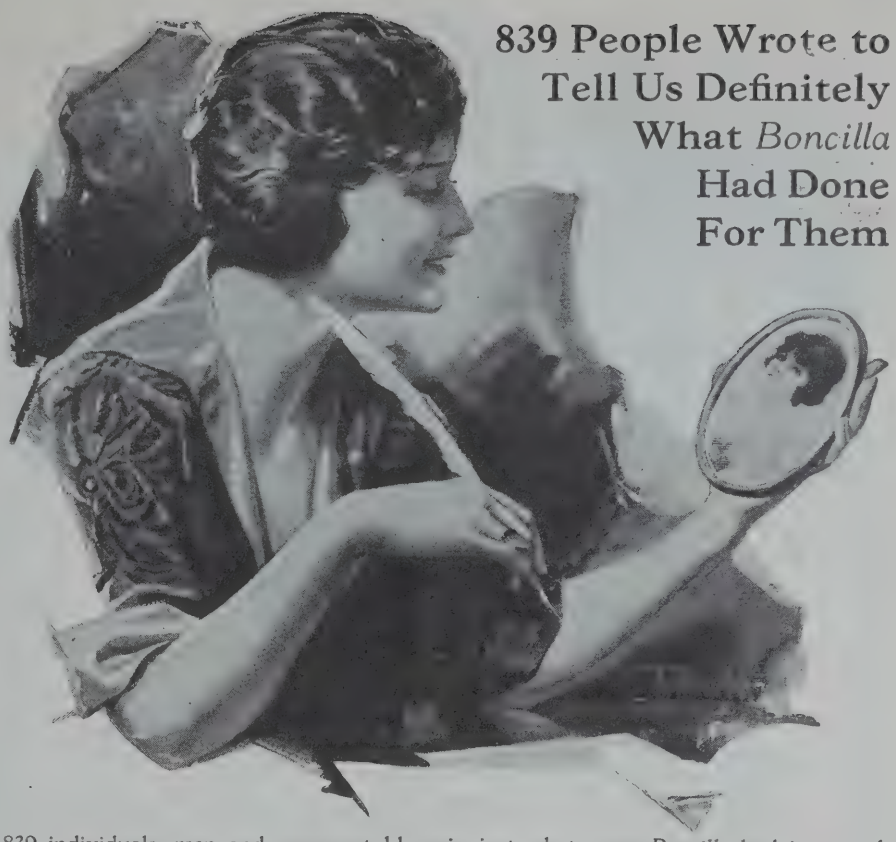
III

OSWALD CARVAL, having attained the age at which, ten years before, he had decided to marry, and after a methodical study of the relative desirability of the younger women of his acquaintance, had selected Margaret Welford as the object of his affections, if such they could be called. Various factors had entered into this result. In order, they were: first, that she was an only child of wealthy parents of prominent social position; second, that she was retiring in disposition, devoted to her parents, innocent minded and sufficiently immature to be easily controlled; third, her beauty, while of the gentle and fragile sort, appealed to him. She was dark and slight, with warm, transparent coloring and sensitive, mobile features.

He had figured it all out, even before he had ever been invited to the house of her parents, who were well known to be highly conventional, rather strait-laced people. Contrasted with the frivolity of the younger generation, his stability, commonsense and maturity were bound to appeal to them—a man among boys. He had cultivated a wide social acquaintance in New York, and he came to them well sponsored at a moment when Mr. and Mrs. Welford had become pretty well disgusted with the antics of juvenile society, and fearful lest their Margaret might fall in love with one of these fox-trotting, flask-carrying, philandering young hoodlums.

As he had foreseen, they welcomed him—almost with open arms. He played his game, however, with studied restraint. His must appear to be the sober, well considered devotion of an older man who hesitated to ask one who was still almost a child to be his wife. He courted her with respect and discrimination, trying to create in her a dependence upon him for masculine attention and companionship and the countless services that a man of affairs can render to any woman. He knew that there was nothing about his carefully clad, somewhat beefy personality to arouse romantic ardor. If he were patient her friendship would gradually change to affection, and finally to love. His must be the part of the amiable, steady old coach horse—the Major Dobbin—ready to renounce the adored one if another more fitted for her than he should take her fancy.

He made excellent progress. He became a constant visitor at the Welfords'—soon regarded as an old and trusted friend



Yet, knowing the delicacy of the situation, he avoided anything by which his name could be coupled with Margaret's before the time to make his declaration was ripe.

Then unexpectedly Margaret Welford met Kyran Kildare at a Greenwich Village studio, and fell most unreasonably in love with him. His very irresponsibility fascinated her. She had never felt towards anybody as she did towards this passionate, volatile young man who never did anything like anybody else. He filled her with a delicious terror, opening to her a thousand hidden doors leading into gardens of gay flowers filled with the melody of birds and the murmur of fountains. Her father and his friend Mr. Carval talked only of facts and figures. With each of them a dollar was a hundred cents. But with Kyran a dollar was something to toss to a beggar, to play at quoits or reflect a sunbeam with. In apprehension she watched him smoke cigarette after cigarette; and once she thought she smelled something like whisky when he was near-by. But she would have extinguished every one of the cigarettes on the flesh of her own fair arm rather than have him go away. His nearness was such an ecstasy! His absence such a poignant sorrow!

Carval saw that unless something were done and done soon his chances would be gone. Luck was momentarily against him, yet he was in a peculiarly advantageous position. He had not as yet given a hint of his own intentions. He was in no sense a rival. Margaret regarded him as a wise and disinterested friend, a sort of "uncle"; her father and mother as a trusted family advisor. They were distressed, frightened, at what they regarded as their daughter's infatuation for this young Bohemian from Washington Mews. To their conventional minds he might as well have been an actor. What more natural than that in their perplexity they should appeal to Carval for counsel?—particularly as Kildare was an acquaintance of his.

Carval professed at first to think their fears premature if not groundless. After all, he said, Kildare, while unsuccessful and irresponsible, was a good enough fellow. It was just a passing fancy probably—and if left to run its course would burn itself out. This did not satisfy them. They did not approve of Kildare, and they intended to break up the affair at the earliest opportunity. Meanwhile they besought Carval to find out whatever he could about this undesirable suitor. This he agreed to do; advising them, however, against any immediate or open opposition. It might only fan the flame.

This was the state of affairs when Kildare had shown him the ring. The conversation between them suggested something to Carval. Kildare devoted himself furiously to his bust of Cellini for the next two weeks, denying himself food and sleep and all intercourse with his friends. With his customary carelessness he neglected to communicate with Margaret during this period or explain his absence to her in any way; and Mr. and Mrs. Welford seized the opportunity to disclose to their daughter their distaste for the young sculptor's attentions. Margaret was deeply distressed. Brought up in a strict, almost Puritanical religious atmosphere, the idea of marrying against her parents' wishes seemed hardly

839 People Wrote to Tell Us Definitely What Boncilla Had Done For Them

839 individuals, men and women, told us in just what ways Boncilla had improved their complexions.

447 said that it removed pimples and blackheads.
105 said that it removed their wrinkles and gave the facial muscles a youthful firmness.
47 said it removed the oil from their skin.
119 said it closed the pores.
213 said it gave them color.
45 said it gave them that vigorous feeling.
8 said it took away that sallow look of the skin.
17 said it removed tan — sunburn — and bleached their freckles.

These letters are direct evidence that Boncilla Beautifier Clasmic Face Packs do everything we claim for them. Every letter breathes sincerity and enthusiasm.

Boncilla is Guaranteed to do These Six Definite Things for the Face or Your Money Will be Refunded:

1 Clears the complexion and gives it color.
2. Cleanses and closes enlarged pores.
3. Removes blackheads and pimples, and eliminates excess oiliness of the skin.
4. Lifts out the lines.
5. Rebuilds drooping facial tissues.
6. Makes the skin soft and velvety.

Boncilla Beauty Is Deeper Than Skin Deep

Boncilla Beautifier is a smooth, grayish clasmic pack that is simply spread over the face and allowed to dry. It goes to the very depth of the pores, cleansing them thoroughly and bringing your natural beauty to light. While it is drying you can feel its soothing, rejuvenating action; you can see its remarkable results after one application. Feel, See, Know Boncilla.

Three Complete Facial Packs Only 50c

The Boncilla Pack o' Beauty is a remarkable value. It contains enough Boncilla Beautifier, Boncilla Cold Cream, Boncilla Vanishing Cream, and Boncilla Face Powder for three to four complete facial packs. It costs only 50c and is a splendid way to find out for yourself just what Boncilla will do for you. The coupon below may be used by those who do not find it convenient to get to the store.

BONCILLA LABORATORIES Cos. 3-23
Indianapolis, Indiana
Boncilla Building
Please send Boncilla Pack o' Beauty to
I enclose 50c.
Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....

DeMiracle
Every Womans Depilatory

Hair Roots Cannot be Destroyed with Sealing Wax

WE will forfeit $10,000.00 if it can be proved that any sealing wax ever destroyed a single hair root.

Do not buy anything for removing hair unless you get a promise that your money will be refunded if you are dissatisfied after using it once. This is the guarantee under which DeMiracle is sold.

Pulling hair out with sealing wax is painful. It does not destroy hair roots but does enlarge the pores. A simple and inexpensive way to prove this is to try pulling hair out with a small piece of adhesive plaster.

Remember, DeMiracle is the only method that has ever been endorsed by eminent Physicians, Surgeons, Dermatologists, Medical Journals, and Prominent Magazines, for removing hair from face, neck, arms, underarms, limbs, etc. Write for free book, The Truth About Superfluous Hair.

Three Sizes: 60c, $1.00, $2.00

At all toilet counters or direct from us, in plain wrapper on receipt of price.

DeMiracle

Dept. S-11, Park Ave. and 129th St., New York

PATENTS

BOOKLET FREE BEST REFERENCES
PROMPTNESS ASSURED BEST RESULTS
Send drawing or model for examination and report as to patentability.
WATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer
624 F Street Washington, D. C.

We Start You in Business, furnishing everything; men and women, opportunity lifetime to earn handsome income operating our "New System Specialty Candy Factories" anywhere. Booklet free.
HILLYER-RAGSDALE CO., East Orange, N. J.

Let Your Children Decide

IF your children had the choice between some of the old time laxatives and delicious Analax, there is no question as to which they would choose.

For Analax is as pleasant tasting as any candied fruit. At the same time it is a delightful, effective and cleansing laxative. Sold by all druggists. Made by McKesson & Robbins, Inc., Est. 1833.

FREE: Analax Samples and Booklet on request. Write to McKesson & Robbins, Inc., 91 Fulton Street, New York City.

Nothing Acts Like ANALAX

conceivable. Theyhad given her no reasons for their antipathy to the young sculptor save that he was not the type of man they would like to see her marry. She insisted in justice both to him and to her on something more definite.

It was at this juncture that Carval informed Margaret's father that he had something of importance to tell him. He had, he stated, made a careful investigation of Kildare's mode of life, with the result that in one sense he felt that the latter had been done an injustice. His unaccountable disappearances were not, he was satisfied, due to drunkenness. Kildare did not, so far as he could ascertain, drink to excess. On the other hand, however, his investigations had resulted in the discovery—and here he spoke with manifest reluctance—that Kildare had another and far more serious habit—he was addicted to the use of drugs. Carval had, he assured Mr. Welford, been loath to come to such a conclusion, but all doubt had at length been removed from his mind when one evening after dinner Kildare had openly asked him to procure some for him. In view of this, many things difficult of explanation before were now fully understandable—Kildare's irritability, explosions of temper, fits of depression, vagueness, forgetfulness, lack of appetite—a thousand indications. Mr. Welford thanked Carval from his heart.

Margaret was duly informed of the damning facts. She had always been told, and believed, that the use of drugs utterly destroyed the will power and undermined the moral sense. She knew that the last thing an addict will admit is that he has ever taken drugs in any form. Carval had cleverly availed himself of the defenseless position in which one falsely accused of using drugs finds himself. He cannot admit it, as it is not true; if he denies it, no one will believe him.

Only one step did Margaret Welford take before effacing Kyran Kildare from her life. She herself put to Carval the direct question whether Kildare had ever asked him for drugs. With deep regret the chemist answered in the affirmative.

The following week the Welfords sailed for Europe, where Carval soon joined them. The heartbroken girl herself found him so sympathetic and considerate that she could not doubt his affection. Three months later she told him that, while her life could hold but one romance, she would be his wife, if he understood and wished her on those terms. They were married in December from her parents' house on Fifth Avenue and immediately took steamer for Jamaica on their honeymoon. Kyran Kildare had never seemed so gay and charming as at Margaret Welford's wedding.

IV

"It's so hot I think I'll take a stroll on the hurricane deck," said Margaret Carval to her husband as they sat side by side in their steamer chairs amidst the long line of somnolent passengers. The Royal Mail Steamer Barracouda was still two days out of New York on their return trip.

"All right," he grunted, without looking up from his book.

Two weeks before he would have arisen and offered to accompany her. But much had happened in those two weeks. Her former trust in him had given place to fear

His implacability had congealed her. To her surprise she had found him unyielding as ice, relentless as a machine. No element of consideration for others entered into his calculations. His cold "Well, what of it?" made her wish to scream. It was this ruthlessness that had at first offended, presently antagonized and in the end filled her with aversion. He got his rights at all costs, insisting upon a complete acknowledgment of his correctness in every case, so that she soon formed the habit of agreement.

After all, she had promised to honor and obey. If she could not love him, could she not at least carry out the balance of the bargain? She told herself that to loathe a man to whom she had been married for less than three weeks, simply because she was disappointed in what she had imagined him to be, was hardly fair to him. He was—she still believed or at least tried to make herself believe—in spite of his lack of warmth, a man of high principles, a doer of justice, who would be generous whenever his reason approved the cause. Surely she could honor such a man—such a "strong" man.

Yet, however much she tried to reassure herself, she knew that she had made a terrible mistake. His mere presence set her on edge. His touch revolted her. The terrible thing was that he failed so utterly to see the effect which he produced upon her. Even if he had, she perceived that it would have made no difference in his attitude towards her—were they not man and wife? She shrank from the contemplation of a lifetime spent in physical and moral contact with him. But as yet she had never doubted his integrity. He was at least honest. But was this all that marriage meant? She looked at his heavy form contemptuously. He would lie there immobile until the gong rang for luncheon.

Relieved that he had not taken the opportunity to prove to her that it was not hot, she climbed up to the hurricane deck. A group of young people were playing shuffleboard. One young fellow with rather long black locks reminded her of Kyran Kildare. He had the same way of tossing back his head.

She pressed her hand to her heart. Kyran! She had dreamed of him only last night—a terrible dream, in which she had seen him stretching out his arms to her and knew that he was in some danger. He had called to her wildly—"Margaret! Margaret!" The sound of his voice had been in her ears when she awoke and heard, above the creaking of the ship's woodwork, her husband's snoring in the berth below. How gay, how tender Kyran had always been! She turned hurriedly away.

The radio man was coming down the steps of his little house with a sheaf of messages in his hand. Should she send Kyran a message just for fun? She could send one to her mother and to a few other friends at the same time. Her husband need not know anything about it. But the thought of deceiving him was repugnant to her. The bugle blew as she was standing there, and she started down the companionway to rejoin him before going in to luncheon. A group of passengers were gathered about the radio bulletin board, and she paused there for a moment.

Among the death notices was one of Kyran Kildare the day before—"suddenly, of heart failure."

Except the eyes, no factor in beauty counts for more than white teeth

No Excuse Now

For dingy film on teeth

A way has been found to combat film on teeth, and millions of people now use it.

A few years ago, nearly all teeth were coated more or less. Today those dingy coats are inexcusable. You can prove this by a pleasant ten-day test.

Film ruins teeth

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Then it forms the basis of dingy coats which hide the teeth's natural luster.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film. No ordinary tooth paste effectively combats it. So, despite all care, tooth troubles have been constantly increasing, and glistening teeth were rare.

New methods now

Dental science has now found two effective film combatants. Their action is to curdle film and then harmlessly remove it. Years of careful tests have amply proved their efficiency.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, based on modern research. These two film combatants are embodied in it for daily application. The name of that tooth paste is Pepsodent.

Dental authorities the world over now endorse this method. Leading dentists everywhere are urging its adoption.

Other new effects

Pepsodent also multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize acids which cause tooth decay.

Old-time tooth pastes, based on soap and chalk, had just opposite effects.

It polishes the teeth, so film adheres less easily.

Thus Pepsodent does, in five great ways, what never before was so successfully done.

Used the world over

Now careful people of fifty nations are using Pepsodent, largely by dental advice. You can see the results in lustrous teeth wherever you look today. To millions of people it has brought a new era in teeth cleaning.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

In one week you will realize that this method means new beauty, new protection for the teeth. Cut out the coupon now.

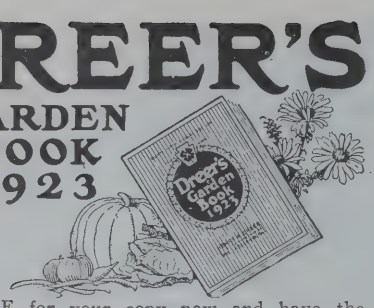
Pepsodent
PAT. OFF.
REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific film combatant, which whitens, cleans and protects the teeth without the use of harmful grit. Now advised by leading dentists the world over.

10-Day Tube Free 962

THE PEPSODENT COMPANY,
Dept. 667, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.



Mail 10-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

.....

.....

Only one tube to a family

DREER'S
GARDEN BOOK 1923

WRITE for your copy now and have the pleasure of planning your next garden during the long winter evenings. Much valuable information on gardening will be gained in the time spent in reading its contents and looking through the beautiful colored plates and hundreds of photo-engravings of Vegetables and Flowers, while making your selections.

This book is a sure guide to success in "making things grow." An acknowledged authority on everything pertaining to gardening.

It offers the best Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Lawn Grass and Agricultural Seeds, Garden Tools and Implements, Fertilizers, Insecticides, etc. Also plants of all kinds, including the newest and best Roses, Dahlias, Hardy Perennials, Garden and Greenhouse Plants, Bulbs, Hardy Climbers, Hardy Shrubs, Water Lilies and Aquatics, Small Fruits, etc.

Write today for a copy, which will be mailed free if you mention this publication.

HENRY A. DREER
714-16 Chestnut Street Philadelphia, Pa.

MAKE $100.00 per WEEK

1,000 good positions open in splendid territory. Our salesmen make big money selling Fyr-Fyters to homes, auto owners, garages, factories, hotels and schools. Cash or easy payment. We want only fast, hard workers. We train you Free if you have no experience. Easy to learn, easy to sell and make $2000 to $10,000 yearly. No capital required. You get cash every day. Blaik made $39 first week with no previous selling experience. Others made from $35 per week to $10,000 per year or better. Write today giving experience, if any, and references, and if you are willing to work we will put you in the way of making more money than you ever dreamed of.

The Fyr-Fyter Co., 3120 Fyr-Fyter Bldg., Dayton, O.

You Can Easily Get a
BIG PAYING HOTEL JOB

HOTELS need hundreds of men and women with training—positions waiting. We train you by mail for high-salaried position. No previous experience necessary. Big pay, fine living, interesting work, quick advancement, free meals and apartment. Free book explains all. Send for it today! LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOLS. Room 207 Washington, D.C.

Here's a Prescription
for Coughs

For quick relief try PISO'S—A most effective syrup different from all others. Safe and sane for young and old. Pleasant—no opiates—no upset stomach. 35c and 60c sizes obtainable everywhere.

PISO'S—For Coughs & Colds

Medium Brown HAIR

Looks best of all after a Golden Glint Shampoo. It gives the hair a tiny tint

25c at toilet counters or direct
J. W. KOBI CO., 131 Spring St., Seattle, Wash.

Giddy, she sank down on one of the cushioned seats. Her dream! She had always felt that there was some subtle form of communication between him and her. Had he killed himself? She saw black forms moving in front of her, heard the bugle call repeated, but was too weak and sick to stir. Her world was rent in twain and she was prostrate in the bottom of the abyss. She was conscious of her husband's presence beside her, but she did not look up. She could not bring herself to speak of Kyran to him.

"Hello!" he said, and there seemed to be almost a note of annoyance in his voice. "Here's a radio for you. I opened it because I thought it might be something important." He held it out to her. "Don't you want to see it? Well, Kildare's dead!"

She did not reply.

"It's a great shock, of course," he went on. "Died in his studio of heart failure. Too bad!" He appeared to be flourishing the yellow thing in her face. "Don't you want to see it?"

She shook her head mutely. O Kyran! Kyran!

Carval sat down beside her. She recoiled from him.

"He's left a will making you his executrix and leaving you all his property," he said, dropping his voice. "I guess there's precious little of it. This wire is from his lawyers. I don't like it, but there's nothing that can be done about it—out here at any rate. You needn't qualify unless you want to." His cold eyes scrutinized her face. "I think that part of it was bad taste. No use dragging you into his affairs. Only makes talk. However—— Want some luncheon?"

V

DURING the next forty hours Carval referred several times to what he termed Kildare's bad taste in making Margaret his executrix. His reaction to the loss of his friend seemed to be one of irritation rather than of sorrow. Margaret kept to her stateroom, but her husband did not hesitate to broach the subject when he joined her at bedtime. His callousness seemed to her brutal. She now perceived the depth of her passion for Kildare, and she began to abominate Carval with an equal intensity.

Why did he show so little interest in his friend's fate? It was almost as if he took a secret satisfaction in it. Suppose—suppose he had always disliked Kyran! Was it possible that he had said things about him that were not true? She now recognized between Kildare and herself a sacred spiritual tie. Whatever happened, she determined to do precisely what Kyran had wished.

The Barracouda docked late Sunday evening, and the Carvals spent the night at a hotel, as her husband wished Margaret to view her new home for the first time by daylight. Business obliged him to go immediately downtown the following morning, leaving Margaret to call upon her parents without him. They were shocked at her appearance. At her request her father accompanied her to the offices of Kildare's attorneys, where she learned that letters testamentary had been issued to her. The will, it appeared, had been drawn and executed less than a week before.

A horrible suspicion stole over Margaret's mind. Alone she drove to Washington Square to take upon herself those duti which now seemed so sacred to he Bridget O'Connell received her at the doo and conducted her upstairs to the studio The old woman appeared to be too over come with grief to talk, and having pulle aside the curtain from the big window went away leaving the visitor to herself.

Margaret had never been in Kildare' studio before, and she approached th inspection of its contents with an attitud of reverence. It was here that her lover—the lover whose memory she now held s much dearer than her husband—ha worked and dreamed; dreamed of her, a the photograph on his bureau testified.

She had been told that she must make a inventory of his effects, but there seeme to be so little as to make it hardly wort while. With blurred eyes she enumerate the pieces of furniture, the few pictures an objects of art upon the walls and tables and then threw herself into a wicker chai near the fireplace before entering the be room. An intense desire to know th more immediate circumstances of his deat possessed her. The lawyers had showe her a copy of the death certificate, i which the doctor had alleged the cause t be heart failure. Heart failure seeme out of character with a personality s vibrant as Kildare's.

Then for the first time she noticed in a corner a large covered object—evidentl the last piece of work upon which he ha been engaged. She was about to remov the cloth when she heard a noise at th door. The old woman, having mastere her grief, had returned. From her Mar garet learned the manner of Kildare' death.

"'Twas in the morning about te o'clock," said she, "when I came as usual t see if he was awake, that I noticed a smel of candles. 'He forgot to blow them out—the lamb!' says I to myself. Then I pull open the curtain and turns around an sees him lying there on the floor dead with a broken tumbler beside him. An on the table was his ring—the beautifu ring his uncle sent him from Italy—wit half the white powder gone out of it.,

"'Arrah!' says I, 'Sure and he's afte killin' himself for love of her! But no on shall ever know it!' says I. So I sweep up the pieces of glass and I hides the rin in a cardboard box and when the docto comes there's nothing there at all at al So he feels the poor lad's wrist and look him over and says that he died of hear failure. Thanks to Mary! So that's th truth of it. He killed himself for love o you, he did, poor, dear lamb. No hand somer or better lad in the city, and hi workin' early and late, and never a nigh away in all the five years he lodged here Never a night out an' I can swear it, fo I waked him every mornin'!"

Margaret listened with closed eye Somehow she had known all along tha Kyran had not died of heart failure. Sh was hearing what she already knew. Sh hardly listened to the old woman's eulog Suddenly it registered. What was sh saying? "Never away?" "Always work?" If anyone knew Kyran's habi surely it was this faithful old soul wh had looked after him like a mothe Margaret laid her hand on Mrs. O'Co nell's wrinkled one.

"Swear to tell me the truth!" she sa Swear it by the Mother of God and l

the love you bore for Kyran Kildare! Was he at any time, so far as you know or even suspect, guilty of taking drugs?"

Bridget O'Connell's decrepit body stiffened indignantly.

"Who says that?" she cried in wrath. "Who's the foul liar dares to stain the name of that dear dead lad with such a falsehood? Who would know but me, Bridget O'Connell, that cared for him every day these five years, winter and summer? Drugs? Never a taste of one on his innocent lips! A wee drop of the craytur, perhaps, but not so you'd notice it. And who is there doesn't now and again? But drugs! Never!" Her voice shook. There was no question as to her sincerity.

Together the two women finished the task of listing Kildare's effects. She moved heavily, struggling against an overwhelming horror that seemed to hover above her like some huge black bird with outspread wings. Surely, if Kyran could procure the poison with which to kill himself, he had no need to ask Carval for drugs! But where had he got such deadly poison? Poisons of that sort were infinitely more difficult to obtain than drugs. Only a few persons were licensed to have them.

She felt as though she were being smothered. "Carval gave it to him!" "Carval gave it to him!" were the words formed by her lips.

The vague object on the covered modeling table seemed to protrude itself from the shadow. She had refrained from examining this uncompleted work, feeling herself unable to bear the sight of the so recent marks of those dear hands. Less than a hundred hours had passed since he had laid the cloth over the damp clay and pushed the model into the corner where now it stood. Going to the easel she carefully raised the cloth from the clay.

It was the half-figure of a man in mediæval costume, working with hammer and chisel upon a ring. The man's gaze was concentrated upon his task, but there was a sinister expression on his face, as if he were planning some evil deed, which even then he could see successfully accomplished. Stepping to the other side of the pedestal, she examined it again. She had never before seen a face of such malignant cruelty, except—Carval's. It was he!

VI

Margaret Carval spent the rest of the day trying to adjust herself to her new surroundings. Her husband had left his house as it was, save that he had cut through the partition between his own room and the upstairs library and converted the latter into a bedroom for her. Everything about this house to which she had been brought to live by this man whom she now hated, offended and outraged her taste, just as he did. It had every comfort, even every luxury; but it was cold, utterly without personality, without heart or soul of its own. She was unused to Japanese servants, and the soundless movements of the expressionless yellow man who waited upon her at luncheon filled her with an undefined dread. All the afternoon as she walked through the rooms she had an uneasy sense of being watched from behind doors and portières.

Her husband returned late. She could hardly bring herself to look at him.

Free Bottle—to try on one lock of hair

Use It—then forget you ever had

Gray Hair!

My restorer brings back the perfect, original color and this color is permanent. There are no streakings or discolorations, no freakish "dyed" look to betray your secret, either in bright sunlight or strong artificial light.

This perfect natural color won't wash off or rub off and is not affected by perspiration, sea bathing, or marcelling. The wonderful results obtained let you forget that your hair was ever gray.

Clean as water

My restorer is a clear, colorless liquid, clean as water and as pure and dainty. It is easily and simply applied by combing through the hair.

There is no sticky, greasy sediment to make your hair stringy and prevent dressing it attractively.

Remarkable Letter From Liggett's Drug Stores

MARY T. GOLDMAN.

Dear Madam:

Your preparation enjoyed a good sale when I became connected with our Company, which is more than eighteen years ago. It is probably the largest selling preparation of its kind in our stores today, and we must conclude that it is giving perfect satisfaction to its users, because in all the time we have sold it, we do not recall of any instance where it has been returned because of dissatisfaction.

As you know, we have 231 stores in the United States, situated in more than ninety cities and twenty-six states. Your preparation is sold in all of them, as we consider it one of the staple, standard products, indispensable in every store that caters to the public's needs. Respectfully yours, (Signed) B. H. BADANES, Manager.

Mary T. Goldman's Hair Color Restorer

Over 10,000,000 Bottles Sold

I perfected my hair color restorer many years ago to bring back the original color to my own hair. Millions have used it and so will millions more. It is the most popular and biggest selling preparation of its kind in the world.

Recently my laboratories have perfected another important product — consisting of a new preparatory powder which puts your hair in perfect condition for restoration.

A trial sized package of this powder is included in my special patented Free Trial outfit, which I ask you to let me send you, absolutely free, postage prepaid.

This outfit contains trial sized bottle of my restorer, a trial package of the above-mentioned preparatory powder, with full directions and instructions for testing on a single lock of hair.

Mail coupon today

Fill out the coupon carefully, using X to indicate the color of your hair. If possible enclose a lock in your letter. The free trial outfit will be sent by return mail.

If your dealer cannot supply you or offers a substitute, write direct to me and I will supply your needs direct.

Please print your name and address

MARY T. GOLDMAN,
42C Goldman Bldg., St. Paul, Minn.

Please send your patented Free Trial Outfit. X shows color of hair.

Black..... dark brown..... medium brown..... auburn (dark red)..... light brown..... light auburn (light red)..... blonde.....

Name.....

Street.....City.....

IT Does the Cleaning —NOT You!

Sani-Flush cleans it for you. Don't scrub the toilet bowl. Nor scour it. Nor dip out water.

Sprinkle Sani-Flush into the bowl. Follow directions on the can. Flush! Watch stains, discolorations, incrustations disappear. See how the bowl shines. There's nothing like Sani-Flush. It's patented.

You can't reach the trap—hidden, unhealthful. Sani-Flush does! Cleans it thoroughly. Destroys all foul odors. Won't harm plumbing connections.

Always keep Sani-Flush handy in the bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. Price 25c. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

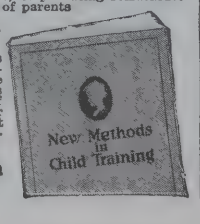
THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
Canton, Ohio

Foreign Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd.
Toronto, Canada
33 Farringdon Road, London, E. C. 1, England
China House, Sydney, Australia

Sani-Flush

Reg U S Pat Off

Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring



New Methods in Child Training

Now for the first time there is a scientific method in child training, founded on the principle that confidence is the basis of control. This new system shows you how in your own home to correct the cause of disobedience, wilfulness, untruthfulness and other dangerous habits which, if not properly remedied, lead to dire consequences. The trouble in most cases now is that children are punished or scolded for what they do. The new method removes the cause—not by punishment or scolding but by confidence and cooperation along lines which are amazingly easy for any parent to instantly apply.

Highest Endorsements This new system, which has been put into the form of an Illustrated Course prepared especially for the busy parent, is producing remarkable and immediate results for the thousands of parents in all parts of the world. It is also endorsed by leading educators. It covers all ages from cradle to eighteen years.

Free Book "New Methods in Child Training" is the title of a startling book which describes this new system and outlines the work of the Parents Association. Send letter or postal today and the book will be sent free--but do it now as this announcement may never appear here again.

The Parents Association
Dept. 343, Pleasant Hill, O.

Through her closed lids she seemed to feel his eyes fixed on her face, and to see his lips curved in a cynical triumphant leer. In silence they sat on either side of the huge carved ebony table, throughout an interminable meal, of which her husband ate heavily.

As for the girl herself, she tasted nothing, being obsessed by the same sense of physical oppression that had followed her now for three days. Yet nothing had happened which, by any law of logic or reason, should normally have affected her attitude towards her husband. She watched him consuming a huge helping of bread pudding. Was this unimaginative fat man capable of the malignant treachery of which she suspected him? The Japanese passed the finger bowls and stood waiting respectfully to pull back her chair. Was her life to be like this? She caught her husband's eye.

"Is anything the matter?" he asked. "You don't seem very fit."

"I have had a trying day," she replied.

He looked away from her. "Take a pony of brandy. It will pick you up." She shook her head. "Well, come into the drawing room. I always have coffee there."

The butler pulled aside the portière for her to pass, and then hurried after to turn on the electric lamps. By evening light the place seemed to her even more abhorrent than by day. Carval pulled up a chair for her and sat down on a pink upholstered sofa opposite the mantel.

"Well," he said, "I, for one, am glad to be back. Home for me!"

The Japanese had returned with the coffee, but Margaret asked for a glass of water. Carval emptied his cup and lighted a cigarette—awkwardly it seemed to her. They sat silent, conscious of something impending. Then Carval said nervously:

"Well, out with it! I can see something's the matter. Is it the house?"

They were seated exactly as Kildare and he had sat the last time the sculptor had dined there, the lamp partly between.

"No," she answered.

"What is it, then?" He gave an embarrassed laugh. "This suspense is too terrible!"

It fell flat, and there was something horrible to her in his attempted jocoseness. He knew that she had planned to go to Kildare's apartment. Why did he avoid mentioning it?

"I went to Kyran's studio this morning," she said meaningly, with her eyes fixed on his face. "He did not die of heart failure. He committed suicide."

It seemed to her that he reddened faintly. After a few moments he said:

"Indeed? How?"

"By taking poison."

"But the doctor—— He couldn't make a mistake like that!"

"We all know that they do make mistakes," she replied. "This one probably took heart failure more or less for granted. There was no reason to suspect poison. Every trace of it had been removed by the janitress."

"Nonsense!" retorted Carval. "A man can't poison himself and fool the doctors like that!" He got up and stood with his back to the gas log. "How do you know all this, anyhow?"

"Mrs. O'Connell told me. She"—her voice quivered—"she found him lying on the floor and near-by a shattered glass. There was a ring on the table beside him It had some white powder in it."

"A ring?" he said, after a pause, and hi voice sounded flat.

"Yes."

"Well, why should anyone suppose tha it held—poison?"

Something in her face suggested tha she knew more than she had disclosed Unconsciously he took out his handker chief and mopped his forehead. H realized that his question was a foolish one. What else could anyone suppose under such circumstances? She did no reply directly.

"You told me once that Kyran asked you for drugs. Was that true?"

"Why, Margaret!" he protested, stil holding the handkerchief in his palm. "O course! Do you think I would lie to you?"

Margaret arose.

"Did Kyran ever ask you for poison?"

He stared at her, his lips barely parted The fist closed on the handkerchief.

"Why—ye-es, once," he admitted hesi tatingly.

Her hands were shaking now as sh fumbled with the clasp of her bag, and he voice had risen to an unnatural pitch.

"Look at this ring!" She thrust it a him hysterically. "Did you ever see i before?"

"I did!" His voice was steadier now as if he had decided upon a course.

"Did Kyran show it to you?"

"Yes—in this very room. Right where you are standing."

"Do you see the powde caked in the bottom of that hollow?"

"I do!" He was smiling now. "Why such a tragedy queen? Don't get hysterica over nothing. I can tell you all abou that. Kildare was dining with me one night, showed me the ring, and asked m to give him some potassium cyanide t put in it. He had been talking abou suicide and a lot of other rot. You know how queer he could be sometimes. H said the ring would be a talisman and i worn in its original condition on his hand would give him some mystic power. H made such a fuss about it that finally, jus to shut him off, I pretended to fall in witl his plan."

"You say he had been talking abou suicide?"

He nodded. Suddenly he turned color

"My God, Margaret! You can' think——"

"Did you give him the potassium cyanide?"

"Of course not!"

"What did you give him?"

Her voice was an accusing scream.

"A couple of pinches of powdered sugar."

His face was livid, and with one han he had clutched the mantel.

"Margaret! You can't——" he stam mered. "My God! Do you think me murderer?"

"Then why did it kill him?"

He ran his fingers across his forehead.

"I don't know! I don't know!" h muttered as if to himself. "Just commo sugar! I always have a jar of it out there He asked for poison, and I gave him th sugar for a joke."

"But you told him it was potassium cyanide?"

He nodded, speechless.

"And you tell me now it was sugar!

Healthy lovely hair

WHEN you see a woman with an abundance of soft, lustrous, wavy hair—you can be sure that her scalp is soft, white and healthy.

Wildroot Taroleum Shampoo is a delicate combination of just the right products to keep the scalp healthy and to make the hair lovely.

Its creamy, abundant lather cleanses.

Its purified crude oil and tar feed the scalp.

Its antiseptic qualities keep the hair healthy.

Sold everywhere

She laughed wildly. "Do you expect me to believe you? When you admit you lied to him in the first place—and when he died after taking it!"

Carval raised his hand.

"Wait a minute! He thought he was taking potassium cyanide. I told him a single drop on the end of a dog's tongue would kill it instantly—that there was enough in the ring to kill a thousand men. He believed it. He expected to die instantly it touched his lips—and he did—of heart failure."

"How imaginative!" Her voice was scornful.

"People do die that way!" he cried. "Indeed they do! The heart is a delicate mechanism. Kildare was a very sensitive and emotional person. He might easily—— Margaret! You're my wife! You must believe me! You can't think I'd do a thing like that. It would be murder! I swear I gave him nothing but sugar—common white powdered table sugar. Absolutely harmless!" He picked up the ring and tried to laugh. "Why, it's a joke! Look here!"

He seized the half empty glass from which she had been drinking and emptied the remainder of the powder into it.

"There!" he exclaimed. "If I wasn't telling you the truth do you think I'd dare do this?"

With a smirk he lifted the glass and drained it.

For an instant he stood there gazing triumphantly at her. Then a look of horror spread over his face. His eyes leaped from the glass in his hand to the ring, and back again to her.

"You——" he cried, dropping the glass and clutching at his throat with both his hands. Then he pitched sideways to the floor.

We are glad to announce for an early issue a delightful new story by Fannie Heaslip Lee

The Hope of Happiness

(Continued from page 25)

out of pity, thinks I'm half-witted and right, at that!"

"Of course you'd have to marry a girl who'd make allowance for your mental infirmities," said Storrs. "Getting on in your profession, I suppose?"

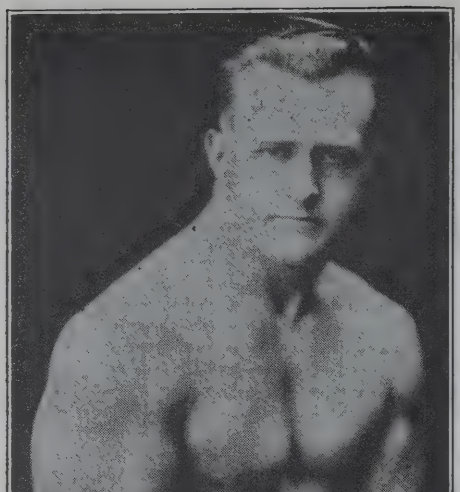
"Hell, no! I chucked that. There are too many really capable electrical experts and after Maybelle's father had tried me for six months in the grocery and I failed to show any talent for distributing the well known Verbena Brand of canned stuff he set me up in the automobile business. Shameful to relate, I really make money. I handle the Plantagenet—one of the worst cars on the market. You know it was a mistake—my feeling that I was called to be another Edison or Marconi. I was really cut out for the literary life—another sad case of a mute inglorious Milton, as per all school readers. I exercise my talents now designing ads and come-on letters as a lure to customers for the Plantagenet. Would you ride with kings? The Plantagenet is the car that takes you out and brings you back. That's my latest slogan;

She fascinated him

THERE were other women at the dinner party — but he didn't know it.

The charm and loveliness of one beautiful girl took all his attention. He didn't realize it, but the secret of her attraction lay in her hair—soft, fluffy, full of radiance,—and charmingly arranged.

She had found that Wildroot Hair Tonic brings out the hidden charm that is the key to loveliness for every woman. You can prove for yourself, that you, too, can bring out new charm.



After your Wildroot shampoo, massage Wildroot Hair Tonic into the scalp with your finger tips—Then notice the immediate results.

Wildroot Co., Inc., Buffalo, N.Y.

WILDROOT HAIR TONIC

Sold everywhere

EARLE E. LIEDERMAN
as he is to-day

How Strong Are You

Can You Do These Things?

Lift 200 or more overhead with one arm;
Bend and break a horse shoe;
Tear two decks of playing cards;
Bend spikes;
Chin yourself with one hand.

Can you do any of them? I can and many of my pupils can. It is remarkable the things a man really can do if he will make up his mind to be strong. Any man. It is natural for the human body to be strong. It is unnatural to be weak. I have taken men who were ridiculed because of their frail make-up and developed them into the strongest men of their locality.

I Want You For 90 Days

These are days that call for speed. It once took four weeks to cross the ocean—now it takes less than one. In olden days it took years to develop a strong, healthy body. I can completely transform you in 90 days. Yes, make a complete change in your entire physical make-up. In 30 days I guarantee to increase your biceps one full inch. I also guarantee to increase your chest two full inches. But I don't quit there. I don't stop till you're a finished athlete—a real strong man. I will broaden your shoulders, deepen your chest, strengthen your neck. I will give you the arms and legs of a Hercules. I will put an armor plate of muscle over your entire body. But with it comes the strong, powerful lungs which enrich the blood, putting new life into your entire being. You will have the spring to your step and the flash to your eyes. You will be bubbling over with strength, pep and vitality.

A Doctor Who Takes His Own Medicine

Many say that any form of exercise is good, but this is not true. I have seen men working in the mills who literally killed themselves with exercise. They ruined their heart or other vital organs, ruptured themselves or killed off what little vitality they possessed. I was a frail weakling myself in search of health and strength. I spent years in study and research, analyzing my own defects to find what I needed. After many tests and experiments, I discovered the secret of progressive exercising. I have increased my own arm over 6½ inches, my neck 3 inches and other parts of my body in proportion. I decided to become a public benefactor and impart this knowledge to others. The highest authorities on physical culture have tested my system and pronounced it to be the surest means of acquiring perfect manhood. Do you crave a strong, well-proportioned body and the abundance of health which go with it? If so spend a pleasant half hour in learning how to attain it. The knowledge is yours for the asking.

Send for My New 64-page Book

"MUSCULAR DEVELOPMENT"

It is chock full of photographs both of myself and my numerous pupils. Also contains a treatise on the human body and what can be done with it. This book is bound to interest you and thrill you. It will be an impetus—an inspiration to every red-blooded man. I could easily collect a big price for a book of this kind just as others are now doing, but I want every man and boy who is interested to just send the attached coupon and the book is his—absolutely free. All I ask is the price of wrapping and postage—10 cents. Remember, this does not obligate you in any way. I want you to have it. So it's yours to keep. Now don't delay one minute. This may be the turning point in your life. Tear off the coupon and mail at once while it is on your mind.

EARLE E. LIEDERMAN
Dept. 8003. 305 Broadway, New York City

EARLE E. LIEDERMAN
Dept. 8003, 305 Broadway, N. Y. City

Dear Sir:—I enclose herewith 10 cents for which you are to send me, without obligation on my part whatever, a copy of your latest book. "Muscular Development." (Please write or print plainly.)

Name .....
Address .....
City..... State.....

you'll find it glaring at you all over the landscape!"

"Oh, what a fall, my countryman!"

"Not at all. You know I always had a knack of making phrases. It's a gift, my boy. I suppose you're here to figure on a new state house or perhaps a hospital for lame cats. I know nearly everybody in town so if I can be of use to you just warble."

"My aim isn't so high," said Bruce, who remembered Henderson as somewhat eccentric but the kindest of souls. His manner of talking was no indication of his true character. Henderson had been a good student, who made a fine record with amazing ease, and as an uncle somewhere who paid for his schooling provided for him generously, Henderson had always been generous in sharing his pleasures with his fellows. Bruce's heart warmed to Henderson; already the town seemed less strange, and he at once disclosed his intention of establishing himself in the city, though without in the least surprising the imperturbable Henderson.

"Welcome!" he exclaimed with his mouth full of toast. "You shall be our Michelangelo, our Sir Christopher Wren!"

"I really want to get into a good office, and I'm not expecting to be taken right into the firm," said Storrs soberly. "It will take me a year or two to get acquainted and then I'd like to set up for myself."

"Certainly a worthy ambition, Bruce. It's a good thing I'm here on the ground to give you the true dope as to the people that count in this teeming village. The old order changeth, yielding place to new, and there's danger of getting pinched between the old hard-boiled bunch and the birds of gayer plumage who flew in when no one was looking and insist on twittering sweetly on our tallest trees. Let me be your social censor; no one better fitted. I'm the only scion of one of our earliest and noblest families. My grandfather's bank busted in 'seventy-three with a loud crash and I had an uncle who was convicted of embezzling public funds. He hid in Patagonia and died there in sinful splendor at a ripe old age. Talk about the aristocracy—I'm it! I derive a certain prestige among what you might call the paralytic group from the fact that my ancestors were mixed up in all the financial calamities that ever befell this town.

"But it's the crowd that are the spenders—build the lordly palaces and treat the Eighteenth Amendment with the contempt it so richly deserves—that you want to train with. Our best man in domestic architecture is Freeman—he's a Tech man, about seven years ahead of our class. He has a weakness for sun parlors with antique Italian fountains that are made for him special by a pottery right here in town. You're sure to like Freeman; he's a whist fiend but otherwise he's a decent chap. His wife and Maybelle are chums and we play around together a good deal."

While listening to Henderson's rambling talk Bruce had been turning over the pages of a memorandum book. He asked about several architects whose names he had noted. Henderson described them succinctly, praising or deriding them for reasons which struck Bruce as not necessarily final as to their merits.

"I don't expect to land a job the first day," said Bruce. "I may have to go through the list before I find what I want.

"Oh, Freeman will take you on!" replied Henderson easily. "But he never does anything important without consulting his wife—one of his eccentricities. My own system is to go ahead and tell Maybelle afterwards, being careful of course to conceal my mistakes. Let's get out and plant our feet firmly upon the city."

He dismissed as wholly unnecessary and foolish Bruce's intimation that it would be better for him to begin looking at once for a business opening. Freeman would find everything, Henderson declared; there was no manner of use in bothering with other architects. He led the way to his car and drove to the Plantagenet salesroom and garage.

A young woman whom he introduced as Miss Ordway apparently ran the whole establishment; Henderson said that she did. He sat down at his desk and signed, without reading, a pile of letters which she had written the day before talking to her meantime, not of business but of a novel he had given her to read. Her attempts to interest him in the fact that one of his salesmen wanted his assistance in rounding up a certain difficult customer were provocative only of scornful comments, but when she handed him a memorandum of an appointment with the prospect at ten o'clock the next morning he meekly thrust the paper into his pocket and said all right; he'd see what he could do. Miss Ordway was already busy with other matters; she seemed to make due allowance for her employer's peculiarities.

"This girl's mighty firm with me," he said in a tone perfectly audible to Miss Ordway. "A cruel tyrant; but she really does get some work out of me."

He sat on the edge of his desk as he talked over the extension telephone. Bruce was aware that he was talking to Mrs. Freeman, and it was evident from his tone that he had not exaggerated his intimacy with the architect and his wife.

"Maybelle's pushing the pill somewhere and won't be back for a week. This being Friday I'd like to be invited to your shanty for the week-end . . . Ah! That's nice of you. And may I bring a little friend . . . Oh, a man of course! And list, Dale, he's an architect—a Tech grad and everything pretty, and I want Bill to take him on—see? Nice boy and perishing for a job. You fix it for me—that's the girl! . . . Oh! my friend isn't fussy; we'll both sleep on the grass . . . What? Yes; I'll bring some poison; my pet bootlegger broke through the entanglements yesterday.

"All set," he remarked as he hung up the receiver. "Mighty nice girl, Dale."

II

HENDERSON spent the morning exhibiting the city's industries and wound up at the University Club for luncheon.

"Now I'll show you where the big frogs of our little puddle live," he said as they started off again.

In his racy description of the owners of the houses they passed, their ancestry, the skeletons in their closets, their wealth and how it was attained, Henderson shone effulgently. Bruce, marveling that one head could carry so much local history, was almost equally astonished by the sins and foibles of the citizens as Henderson pictured them.

"Great Scott! Are there no perfectly normal people in this town?" he demanded.

"A few, maybe," Henderson replied, lifting his hand from the wheel to stroke his chin. "But they're not what you'd call conspicuous."

Pausing before a handsome colonial house, the presence of an elderly gentleman on the veranda, calmly perusing a newspaper, inspired Henderson to a typical excursion in biography.

"Here we have Bill Fielding, one of the most delightful old scoundrels in town. Observe his pants—sleeps in 'em to avoid the fatigue of disrobing. To keep off evil spirits he wears the first nickel he ever earned on a string around his neck. He's the smoothest tax-dodger in America. His wife starved to death and his three children moved to California to get as far away from the old skunk as possible. Why does he live in a house like that? Bless your simple soul, he took it on a mortgage and camps in two rooms while he waits for a buyer."

"If you've got many such birds I'd better try another town," laughed Bruce as Henderson started the car.

"Oh, don't worry! He's the last of his school. Now we're approaching a different proposition—one that baffles even my acute analytical powers."

He drew up before a handsome Georgian house that stood lengthwise to the street in a broad lot in which a dozen towering forest trees had been preserved when the land was subdivided. There were no frivolous lines in this residence, Bruce noted, surveying it with a professional eye; it was beyond criticism in its fidelity to type. The many windows were protected by awnings of deep orange and the window ledges were adorned with boxes of flowers. The general effect was one of perfect order and uniformity. Bruce, with his interest in houses as an expression of the character of their owners whetted by Henderson's slangy lectures before other establishments, turned expectantly to his friend.

"Wind up the machine and put on the record! That's a sound piece of architecture anyhow and I can see that you are dying to turn out the skeletons."

"Painful as it is for me to confess it, the truth is that in this case I can only present a few bald facts and leave you to make your own deductions." Henderson lighted a fresh cigarette and drew a deep draught of smoke into his lungs. "Franklin Mills," he said, and crossed his legs. "Mills is around fifty, maybe a shade more. The family always had money and this bird's father never lost a cent in his life. Now Frank's rich—nothing spectacular but recognized as a rich man. His pop left him well fixed and Frank's piled up considerable mazuma on his own hook. Does this interest you?"

"You always interest me, Bud; please proceed."

"Well, you might call Franklin Mills the original man who couldn't lose. No active business now, but he controls a couple of banks and a trust company without figuring in the picture at all and he set his son up in a storage battery plant. Nice chap, by the way, young Mills; pleasant little cuss. Franklin Mills isn't one of the up-from-the-office-boy type nor the familiar variety of pushing business man; velvet glove stuff. Do you follow me? Only human touch I've

When imagination and common sense work together

PUT THE BONDS of strong Public Utility companies in your safe deposit box.

Your investment is secured by the actual properties that provide electricity to countless homes—to growing industry and to indispensable transportation.

When you see a well lighted city, thank the American investor. He has backed his belief in the development of electricity with his money.

The underlying values of every bond issue offered by The National City Company have been carefully analyzed. For a list of recommended bonds, address—

THE NATIONAL CITY COMPANY
NATIONAL CITY BANK BUILDING
NEW YORK

The National City Company
National City Bank Building, New York
Offices in more than 50 leading cities throughout the World
BONDS SHORT TERM NOTES ACCEPTANCES

BE AN ARTIST
WE CAN TEACH YOU DRAWING in your own home during your spare time. Twenty-five years of successful teaching proves our ability. Artists receive large salaries.
Write to day for Art Year Book
SCHOOL of APPLIED ART
Room No. 1 BATTLE CREEK MICH.

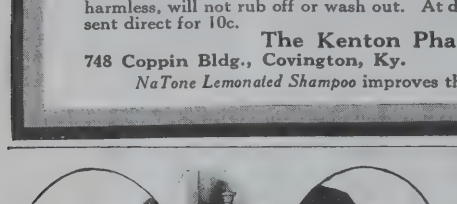
POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL
Sold Everywhere

Perfume Your Bath—Soften Hard Water Instantly
Bathe with Bathasweet. It adds the final touch of dainty luxuriousness to your bath—it refreshes and invigorates. Bathasweet keeps the skin soft and smooth. Bathasweet imparts the softness of rain-water and the fragrance of a thousand flowers. Always keep a can in your bath room. Three sizes: 25c, 50c and $1. At drug and department stores or by mail. Send 10c for miniature can. The C. S. Welch Co., Dept. C. N., New York City.
TRADE MARK REG.
BATHASWEET

"I will never consent to Gray Hair"

GRAY HAIR is appropriate only to age. Grandmother's silver locks becomingly frame a face lined and mellowed by time. But why should a young woman permit premature gray hair to place the seal of age upon her brow! Modern thought justifies the tinting of gray, faded or bleached hair to its original shade and splendor with

BROWNATONE



The Safe Hair Tint

Any shade of brown or black may be quickly obtained at home. Brownatone, guaranteed harmless, will not rub off or wash out. At dealers, or direct—50c and $1.50. Trial bottle sent direct for 10c.

The Kenton Pharmacal Company

748 Coppin Bldg., Covington, Ky. Canada address: Windsor, Ont.

NaTone Lemonated Shampoo improves the hair. At drug stores or direct 50c.

Combat Sore Throat

both Inside and Outside

Get at infection inside with germicidal spray or gargle. A ten percent solution of Absorbine, Jr. destroys the virulent germs, and the combined soothing and healing properties of Absorbine, Jr. relieve the rawness, hoarseness and irritation.

Break up the congestion outside by rubbing Absorbine, Jr. gently into the throat muscles. This powerful efficient liniment helps nature to restore normal blood circulation. It draws out the inflammation or soreness. It reduces the swelling.

Absorbine, Jr.—The Antiseptic Liniment—treats both cause and effect, promptly, thoroughly and conveniently and is both safe and dependable. It has a clean, agreeable odor. Keep it handy for other emergencies.

At most druggists', $1.25, or postpaid. Liberal trial bottle, 10c., postpaid.

W. F. YOUNG, Inc.
66 Temple St., Springfield, Mass.

Absorbine, Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

CLASS RINGS
FRATERNITY JEWELRY
CLUB PINS
WRITE FOR CATALOGS
THE D. L. AULD CO. COLUMBUS, O.
LOCAL JEWELERS WANTED AS REPRESENTATIVES

Pert
The Waterproof Rouge

Orange-colored, lasts all day

IT is because Pert Rouge changes color as it touches your skin—the bright orange blending to a lovely pink—that it is so natural looking. Moreover, it is a cream rouge, and therefore prevents the enlargement of the pores.

Pert lasts all day or evening; only cold cream or soap and water will remove it. 75c a jar. At drug and department stores.

Send a dime for a generous sample. And for another dime, you will receive a sample of Winx, the Liquid Lashlux, for darkening the lashes and making them appear heavier.

ROSS COMPANY

Makers of Winx, the Liquid Lashlux

74 Grand Street
New York

discovered in this house is the billia room, and Mills is a shark at the spo I've poked the ivories with him now a then just for the fun of watching him pla His style of playing is a sort of clue to h character—cool, deliberate, never miss One thing, though, I've never been ab to figure out; once in a while he makes wild shot, unnecessarily and with mali aforethought, as though to spite himse If you'd tell Franklin Mills he'd lost h last cent he wouldn't blink an eye b before you got out of the room he'd ha a scheme for making it all over again."

"A business genius," commented Bruc who had missed no word of Henderson sketch. "I can't say your snapshot's ve alluring."

"Oh, I may be wrong! If you'd a anybody else about him you'd hear th he's a leading citizen and a cultivat gentleman, which he is! While of our city back-number or paralytic group, he's f from being ready for the mortician. O sees him around socially now and then—o occasions when our real nobility shake t moth balls from their dress suits. A that's characteristic; he has the pride, y might say, of his long connection with t town. If it's necessary for somebody bunk a distinguished visitor Frank Mi opens his door—not that he's keen to g his name in the village sheet but he lik for the town to make a good impression

"There are other children, perhaps? house like that rather suggests a b family," Bruce remarked.

"There's Leila, the daughter. The must have been a naughty little devil some of the Mills or Shepherd tribe aw back yonder, for that girl certainly is lively little filly. Shep, who is named f his mother's people, never browsed in t wild oat fields but Leila makes up for Bounced from seven boarding schools holds the champeen record there. H mother passed hence when Leila was abo fourteen and various aunts took a hand bringing the kid up, but all they got f their trouble was nervous prostratio Frank's crazy about her—old stuff doting father bullied by adorab daughter."

"I think I get the picture," remark Bruce soberly as his thoughts caught u and played upon this summary of th history of Franklin Mills.

Glancing back at the house as Henders drove away, he was aware of the irony his very presence in the town, sent the by the whim of a dying woman to be pr pared to aid a man who in no imaginab circumstances could ever require any he it might be in his power to give. H mother had said that she had kept son track of Mills's life; she could never hav realized that he was so secure from an possibility of need. As Bruce thought it, Henderson had not limned an attracti portrait. Only Mills's devotion to th daughter, whom Henderson had describe in terms that did not conceal his ow admiration for the girl, brightened th picture.

"What can such a man do with his tim in a town like this?" asked Bruce medit tively. "No active business, you say

"Well," Henderson replied, "I've see him on the golf links—usually alone with the club professional. Frank's no one of these ha-ha boys who get togeth after the game with a few good sports an sneak a bottle of unlawful Scotch from the locker. Travels a bit; several times a year he beats it somewhere with Leila. Shep's wife bores him, I think; and Shep's not exciting; too damned nice. From all I can see Leila's her pop's single big bet. Some say he's diffident; others hold that he's merely a selfish proposition. He's missed a number of chances to marry again—some of the most dashing widows in our tall corn cities have made a play for him; but he follows G. Washington's advice and keeps clear of entangling alliances."

"Interesting personality," said Bruce carelessly. But Mills had fixed himself in his mind—he had even fashioned a physical embodiment for the traits Henderson had described. On the whole Bruce's dominant feeling was one of relief and satisfaction. Franklin Mills was as remote from him as though they were creatures of different planets, separated by vast abysses of time and space.

III

In spite of Henderson's sweeping declaration that he needn't waste time calling on architects, that Freeman would take care of him, Bruce visited the offices of the other men on his list. Several of these were out of town; the others received him amiably; one of them promised him some work a little later, but was rather vague about it. When he returned to the hotel at noon he found Henderson waiting.

"Next time mind your Uncle Dudley. Bill Freeman's the bird for you. You just leave every little thing to me. Now what else is troubling you?"

"Well, I want a place to live; not too expensive but a few of the minor comforts."

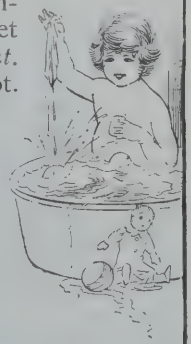
Two hours later Bruce was signing the lease on a small bachelor apartment that Henderson had found for him with, apparently, no effort. He had also persuaded some people who lived across the street to give the young architect breakfast and provide a colored woman to keep his place in order.

Henderson's acquaintance with his fellow citizens appeared to be unlimited. He took Bruce to the State House to call on the Governor—brought that official from a conference from which he emerged good naturedly to shake hands and hear a new story. At noon on Saturday Henderson drove Bruce to the Freemans', where he calmly exercised all the rights of proprietorship. The house, of the English cottage type, was on the river in a five acre tract in a new addition. A real estate operator had given Freeman the site with the stipulation that he build himself a home to establish a social and artistic standard for the neighborhood.

"Don't be afraid of these people," remarked Henderson reassuringly. "Take your cue from me and act as though you had a deed for the house in your pocket. Bill's a dreamy sort of cuss, but Dale's a human dynamo. She looks fierce but responds to kind treatment."

Bruce never knew when Henderson was serious, and when a diminutive young lady ran downstairs whistling he assumed that he was about to be introduced to the daughter of the house.

"Dale, this is old Bruce Storrs, one of the meanest men out of jail. I know you'll hate each other; that's why I brought him. At the first sign of any flirtation between



The Message Every Morning Brings

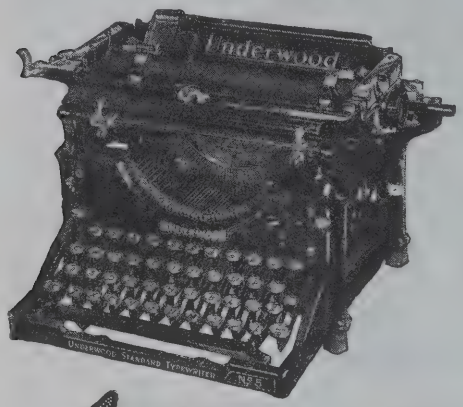
THE daily bath—with its stimulation of the skin to renewed activity—its suggested use of a pure and refreshing toilet soap.

It should not be necessary to urge the merits of Resinol Soap, nor is it necessary to people who have tried it. They know that it invigorates a sallow, sluggish skin, and helps to keep the complexion clear and fresh,—and the hair thick and lustrous.

The abundant lather, with its mild Resinol fragrance makes Resinol Soap a delight to men. They like, too, the freshened feeling and glow of health it imparts. Used for baby's bath it tends to prevent chafing, and keep his skin clear and velvety.

Women who use Resinol Soap find their complexions automatically cared for. It's the ideal toilet and bath soap for every home. It starts the day right. May we send you a free trial size cake? Write Dept. 5-D, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Resinol Soap



ONLY $3 Down

Brings You This Genuine Underwood Typewriter on 10 Days' FREE TRIAL

A perfect machine, complete in every detail. Read all about this great offer

Yes, We Will Positively Ship You

this splendid Underwood upon receipt of only $3.00. This is by far the most liberal typewriter offer that has ever been made on so perfect a machine. Nearly two million Underwoods have been made and sold, proving conclusively that it is superior to all others in appearance, mechanical perfection and all-round excellence.

Ten Days' Free Trial

We want you to see for yourself that this is the typewriter you ought to have, and, therefore, we make our great free trial offer. You merely send us the three dollars deposit and we ship the machine for you to try for ten full days before you decide to keep it. If not satisfied, every penny of your money will be returned to you.

Rebuilt Like New

Every Underwood we sell is rebuilt just like new. It is dismantled right to the very bottom, and remanufactured to make it just like a new typewriter, with new enamel, new nickel, new platen, new key rings, new type; a complete, perfect typewriter, with two-color ribbon, back spacer, stencil device, automatic ribbon reverse, tabulator, key shift lock, etc. Impossible to tell it from a brand new Underwood, either in appearance, durability or quality of work.

Easy Monthly Payments

Our easy monthly payment plan makes it possible for YOU to own this splendid machine without having to pay out any big sum of money. You will hardly know you are paying for it. REMEMBER, you have the full use of the machine, just the same as though it was fully paid for.

Over 325,000 Sold

Over 325,000 people have purchased and been satisfied with our product. What better proof could anyone ask of the perfection of our typewriters and the integrity of this firm?

Your Money Back

Yes, you can have your money back if you want it. After you have examined the typewriter carefully, used it to write letters, if you decide for any reason whatever that you do not care for it, you may return it to us at our expense and every penny you have paid will be cheerfully and promptly refunded.

No Obligation on Your Part

When you send in the coupon for either further information about our great typewriter offer or for the typewriter itself on our free trial plan, you are under no obligation whatever until after you have tried it and have decided for yourself that you want to keep it.

Write Now for Our Big Typewriter Book

telling all about our great big typewriter factory. In this book we illustrate and describe all of the various processes of re-enameling, renickeling and assembling this splendid Underwood. It tells in an interesting way how each part is examined and tested carefully and thoroughly to insure the finished machine being one you will be proud to own.

Write Right Today
Use Coupon Below

SHIPMAN-WARD MFG. CO.
2073 Shipman Bldg., Chicago
Check Either Way

☐ Send me your big bargain catalog and complete details of your surprising offer, without obligation on my part.

☐ Enclosed find $3. Send me the Shipman-Ward Rebuilt Underwood on 10 days' free trial. If I decide not to keep it I will return it at your expense and you will refund every cent paid by me. If I decide to keep it, I have the privilege of paying for it on easy monthly payments.

NAME_____
STREET_____
CITY_____ STATE_____

you two I'll run you both through the meat chopper and take a high dive into the adjacent stream."

Mrs. Freeman was absurdly small and slight and the short skirt of her simple linen dress and her bobbed hair exaggerated her diminutive stature. Having gathered from Henderson an idea that Mrs. Freeman was an assertive masculine person, Bruce was taken aback as the little woman smiled up at him and shook hands.

"It really isn't my fault that I broke in," he protested. "It was this awful Henderson person who told me you'd be heart-broken if I didn't come."

"I should have been! He'd have come alone and bored me to death. How is every little thing, Bud?"

"Soaring!" mumbled Henderson, who had chosen a book from the rack on the table and, sprawling on a couch, become immediately absorbed in it.

"That's the way Bud shows his noble breeding," remarked Mrs. Freeman, "but he is an easy guest to entertain. I suppose you're used to him?"

"Oh, we lived together for a couple of years! Nothing he does astonishes me."

"Then I needn't apologize for him. Bud's an acquired taste but once you know him he's highly diverting."

"When I began rooming with him in Boston I thought he was half-witted but finally decided he was at least three-quarters sane."

"One thing's certain; he's mastered the art of not being bored, which is some acomplishment!" said Mrs. Freeman, as Henderson rose suddenly and disappeared in the direction of the kitchen, whence proceeded presently a sound as of cracking ice.

Mrs. Freeman had something of Henderson's air of taking things for granted and she talked to Bruce quite as though he were an old friend. She spoke amusingly of the embarrassments of housekeeping in the new quarter; they were pioneers, she said, and as servants refused to bury themselves so far from the bright lights she did most of her own housework, which was lots of fun when you had everything electric to play with. There was an old colored man who did chores and helped in the kitchen.

"You've never lived here? Bud gave me that idea but you never know when he's telling the truth."

"I never saw the town before; but I hope to stay."

"It's up to us to make you want to stay," she said graciously.

She had settled herself in the largest chair in the room, sitting on one foot like a child. She was thirty perhaps, but her face had not lost its girlish roundness. She smoked a cigarette as she talked, one arm thrown back of her head. She tactfully led Bruce to talk of himself and when he spoke of his year-long tramp her eyes narrowed as she gave him a more careful inspection.

"That sounds like a jolly lark. I want to know more about it, but we must wait for Bill. It's the sort of thing he'd adore doing."

Freeman appeared a moment later. He had been cleaning up after a morning's work in the garden. He was thirty-five, short and burly with a thick shock of unruly chestnut hair over which he passed his hand frequently, smoothing it only to ruffle it again. He greeted Bruce cordially and began talking volubly in short, jerk sentences of the Tech and men he assume Bruce might have known there. He pr duced pipe and tobacco from the pocke of his white flannel trousers and smok fitfully.

Henderson reappeared wearing an apr and bearing a tray with a cocktail shak and four glasses.

"Don't flinch, Bill," he said, "it's n gin; you pay for the oranges. I say, Da I told Tuck to peel some potatoes. A you wanted those chops for lunch, didn you? There's nothing else in the iceb and I told Tuck to put 'em on."

"He'll probably ruin them," said M Freeman. "Excuse me, Mr. Storrs; y and Bill talk while I get some work out Bud."

It was some time before Bruce got accu tomed to Freeman's oddities. He w constantly moving about with a quic catlike step; or if he sat down his han were never quiet. But he talked we proved himself a good listener, and e pressed approval by slapping his knee wh Bruce made some remark that squar with his own views. He was pleased in frank, boyish way when Bruce prais some of his houses which Henderson h pointed out.

"Yes; clients didn't bother me; I h my own way in those cases. I've got son plans under way now that I want to sho you. Dale said you were thinking starting in here. Well, I need some he right away. My assistant is leaving me going to Seattle. Suppose you drop Monday. We might be able to fix u something."

IV

THERE was tennis in the afternoon a in the evening visitors began to drop in chiefly young married people of the Fre mans' circle. Some of these were of we to-do families and others, Henderson e plained to Bruce, were not rich but "right He wished Bruce to understand that was in a community where money didn matter if you were "right," "rightnes implying a capacity for good fellowshi broad tolerance and a sense of humo The talk was lively and pitched in th chaffing key which is only possible amo people who are intimately acquainte This was Dale Freeman's salon, Henders explained. Any Saturday evening y were likely to meet people who had som thing worth while to offer.

He drew Bruce from one group to a other, praising him or abusing him wi equal extravagance. He assured ever one that it was a great honor to meet man destined, as he declared Bruce to b to cut a big figure in the future of the tow He never backed a dead one, he remind them. Bruce was the dearest friend had in the world, and, he would rueful add, probably the only one.

A number of the guests had gone wh late in the evening the depleted compan was reinforced by the arrival of Shephe Mills and his wife.

"Shep and the Shepherdess!" Henders cheerfully announced.

Mrs. Mills extended her hand with gracious smile as Bruce was presente She was tall and fair and moved with sinuous sort of grace. She spoke lazily a low, murmurous tone little broken inflections. Bruce noted that she w dressed rather more smartly than the other women present. It seemed to him that the atmosphere of the room changed perceptibly on her appearance; or it might have been merely that everyone paused a minute to inspect her or to hear what she had to say. Bruce surmised from the self-conscious look in her handsome gray eyes as she crossed the room that she enjoyed being the center of attention.

"Shep just would spend the day motoring to some queer place," she was saying, "where a lot of people were killed by the Indians ages ago. Most depressing Ruined the day for me! He's going to set up a monument or something to mark the painful affair."

"Shep just will be serious; there's no escaping that!" remarked one of the young women.

Shepherd Mills glanced about, a smile wavering on his face. He was evidently inured to the jibes of his friends; but for an instant there was an appealing, hurt look in his eyes.

"You too, Jessie!" he exclaimed; but his attempt to take the remark lightly was not wholly convincing.

He greeted Bruce in the quick, eager fashion of a diffident person anxious to appear cordial but not sure that his good intentions will be understood, and suggested that they sit down. He was not so tall as his wife; and his face was long and rather delicate. His slight reddish mustache seemed out of place on his lip; it did not quite succeed in giving him a masculine air. His speech was marked by odd, abrupt pauses, as though he were trying to hide a stammer; or it might have been that he was merely waiting to note the effect of what he was saying upon the hearer. He drew out a case and offered Bruce a cigarette, lighted one himself.

There was to be a tennis tournament at the country club the coming week and he mentioned this tentatively and was embarrassed to find that Bruce knew nothing about it.

"Oh, I'm always forgetting that everyone doesn't live here!" he laughed apologetically. "A little weakness of the provincial mind! I suppose we're horribly provincial out here. Do we strike you that way, Mr. Storrs?"

One might have surmised from his tone that he was used to having his serious questions ignored or answered flippantly but hoped that the stranger would meet him on his own ground.

"Oh, there isn't any such thing as provincialism any more, is there?" asked Bruce amiably. "I haven't sniffed anything of the sort in your city; you seem very metropolitan. The fact is I'm a good deal of a hick myself!"

Mills laughed with more fervor than the remark justified. Evidently satisfied of the intelligence and good nature of the Freemans' guest he suggested that they sit down and began to discuss the effect upon industry of a pending coal strike.

His hand went frequently to his mustache as he talked and the leg that he swung over his knee waggled nervously. He plunged into discussion of labor, mentioning foreign market conditions and citing figures from trade journals showing the losses to both capital and labor caused by the frequent disturbances in the industrial world. Bruce, having tramped through one of the coal fields where a strike was in

Four out of Five is Pyorrhea's Toll

Nature warns with bleeding gums

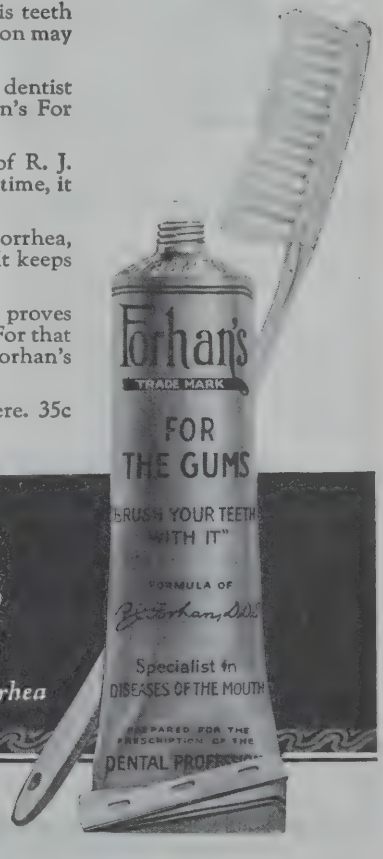
When Pyorrhea comes, the teeth loosen, and drop out or must be extracted. Pus-pockets form at the roots and poison spreads throughout the system.

Comparatively few persons are immune. Statistics show that four out of every five past forty, and thousands younger, are subject to this sinister disease.

Heed Nature's Warning

At the first sign of Pyorrhea, Nature gives her danger signal—tender gums which bleed easily when the teeth are brushed.

Fortunate is he who heeds that friendly warning; his teeth may be spared, while he who neglects that admonition may pay the extreme penalty.



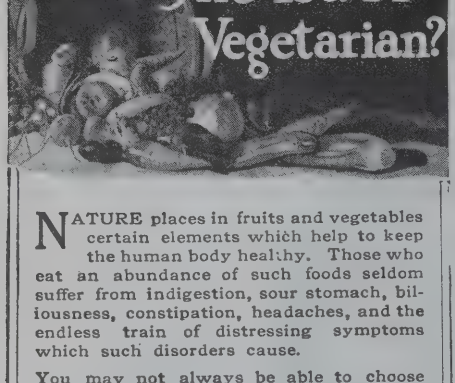
At the first sign of tender, bleeding gums, go to your dentist for teeth and gum inspection and start using Forhan's For the Gums at once.

Forhan's For the Gums is the scientific formula of R. J. Forhan, D. D. S. If used consistently and used in time, it will prevent Pyorrhea or check its course.

In addition to its efficacy in the treatment of Pyorrhea, Forhan's For the Gums is an excellent dentifrice. It keeps teeth white and clean and gums firm and healthy.

Remember, statistics are all against you. Science proves that four out of every five are doomed after forty. For that reason it is good health insurance to start using Forhan's For the Gums today.

Forhan's For the Gums is sold by druggists everywhere. 35c and 60c in tubes.



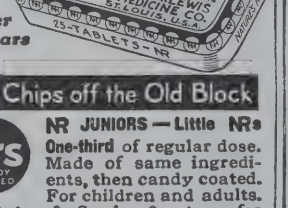
Forhan's

FOR THE GUMS

More than a tooth paste—it checks Pyorrhea

Formula of R. J. Forhan, D. D. S.
Forhan Company, New York
Forhan's, Limited, Montreal

NATURE places in fruits and vegetables certain elements which help to keep the human body healthy. Those who eat an abundance of such foods seldom suffer from indigestion, sour stomach, biliousness, constipation, headaches, and the endless train of distressing symptoms which such disorders cause.



You may not always be able to choose your diet carefully or to avail yourself of the benefits of a scientifically-selected variety of foods, but you can give your system the benefit of the same vegetable laxative properties contained in vegetable foods.

Nature's Remedy (NR Tablets) is made entirely of concentrated vegetable ingredients which are therapeutically the same as Nature furnishes in the most healthful of foods. That is why millions of persons use this pure, mild, natural aid to health in preference to anything else.

Nature's Remedy (NR Tablets) does more than a laxative. It tones the stomach, increases the assimilation and elimination, helps to cleanse, purify and enrich the blood by aiding nature to re-establish the vigorous and harmonious functioning which makes the body feel like new.

All Druggists Sell The Dainty 25c. Box of NR Tablets

Used for over 30 years

NR JUNIORS Jrs CANDY COATED

Chips off the Old Block

NR JUNIORS — Little NRs One-third of regular dose. Made of same ingredients, then candy coated. For children and adults.

Have you tried them? Send a 2c. stamp for postage on liberal sample in the attractive blue and yellow box. A. H. LEWIS MEDICINE CO., Dept. C St. Louis, Mo.

"WHY didn't someone think of it before?" Happy women users are asking this question about

The* RUB-LESS Washboard

Remember that rubber easily erases marks. How about dirt? RUB-LESS answers that question. Stout wooden frame. Rubbing surface heavy, resilient fine-toothed rubber. Guaranteed for two years. Won't rust or crack or break. No sore knuckles. Reduces labor two-thirds. RUB-LESS is little sister to washing machine. Sent C. O. D., postage prepaid for $1.50. If grocer or hardware man can't supply send his name with order and receive gift of pocket edition "Love Sonnets" by Shakespeare. Return RUB-LESS at our expense if not satisfied.

Agents Desired. Have other fine lines—men or women—for own business building. Write for booklet "Road to Happiness." Address J. Delaney, FEDERAL RUBBER GOODS CO., Akron, Ohio.

BROWN'S Bronchial TROCHES

COUGH AND VOICE LOZENGES

SAFE-RELIABLE

Banish coughing, sore throat, hoarseness—relieve catarrhal and asthmatic conditions. Not candy but a cough remedy. At druggists.

JOHN I. BROWN & SON, Boston, Mass.

General Sales Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc. New York London Toronto

progress, described the conditions as he had observed them. Mills expressed the greatest interest; the frown deepened on his face as he listened.

"That's bad; things shouldn't be that way," he said. "The truth of the matter is that we haven't mastered the handling of business. It's stupendous; we've outgrown the old methods. We forget the vast territories we have to handle and the numbers of men it's necessary to keep in touch with. When my grandfather Mills first started in business here he had fifty men working for him and he knew them all—knew their families, circumstances, everything. Now I have six hundred in my plant and don't know fifty of them! But I'd like to know them all; I feel that it's my duty to know them."

He shrugged his shoulders impatiently when Henderson's sharp little laugh at the other end of the room broke in discordantly upon Bruce's sympathetic reply to this.

"Bud, how silly you are!" they heard Mrs. Mills saying. "But I don't know what we'd do without you. You do cheer things up a bit now and then!"

Mrs. Freeman effected a redistribution of the guests that brought Mrs. Mills and Bruce together.

"Shep, you mustn't monopolize Mr. Storrs. Give Connie a chance. Mr. Storrs is an ideal subject for you, Connie. Take him out on the terrace and put him through all your degrees." And then to Bruce: "Mrs. Mills is not only our leading vamp but a terrible highbrow—reads all the queer stuff!"

Shepherd Mills was not wholly successful in concealing his displeasure in thus being deprived of Bruce's company. And noting this Bruce put out his hand, saying:

"That's a deep subject; we shall have to tackle it again. Please don't forget that we've left it in the air and give me another chance."

"My husband really wants so much to save the human race," remarked Mrs. Mills as she stepped out on the tiled flooring of a broad terrace where there were rugs and comfortable places to sit. There was moonlight and the great phalanx of stars marched across the clear heavens; below flowed the river. She seated herself on a couch, suffered him to adjust a pillow at her back and indicated that he was to sit beside her.

"I'm really done up by our all-day motor trip but my husband insisted on dropping in here. The Freemans are a great resource to all of us. You're always likely to find someone new and interesting here. Dale Freeman has a genius for picking up just the right sort of people and she's generous about letting her friends know them. Are you and the Freemans old friends?"

"Oh, not at all! Henderson's my only friend here. He vouched for me to the Freemans."

"Oh, Bud! He's such a delightful rascal. You don't mind my calling him that? I shouldn't if I weren't so fond of him. He's absolutely necessary to our social existence. We'd stagnate without him."

"Bud was always a master hand at stirring things up. His methods are a little peculiar at times but he does get results."

"There's no question but that he's a warm admirer of yours."

"That's because he's forgotten about me! He hadn't seen me for five years."

"I think possibly I can understand that one wouldn't exactly forget you, Mr. Storrs."

She let the words fall carelessly as though to minimize their daring in case they were not wholly acceptable to her auditor. The point was not lost upon him. He was not without his experience in the gentle art of flirtation, and her technic was familiar. There was always, however, the possibility of variations in the ancient game, and he hoped that Mrs. Shepherd Mills was blessed with originality.

"There's a good deal of me to forget; I'm six feet two!" he said leadingly.

"Well, of course I wasn't referring altogether to your size," she said with her murmurous little laugh. "I adore big men and I suppose that's why I married a small one. Isn't it deliciously funny how contrary we are when it comes to the important affairs of our lives! I suppose it's just because we're poor weak humans. We haven't the courage of our prejudices."

"I'd never thought of that," Bruce replied. "But it is an interesting idea. I suppose we're none of us free agents. It's not in the great design of things that we shall walk a chalk line. If we all did it would probably be a very stupid world."

"I'm glad you feel that way about it. For a long time half the world tried to make conformists of the other half; nowadays not more than a third are trying to keep the rest on the chalk line—and that third's skidding! People think me dreadfully heretical about everthing. But—I'm not, really! Tell me you don't think me terribly wild and untamed."

"I think," said Bruce, feeling that here was a cue he mustn't miss, "I think you are very charming. If it's your ideas that make you so I certainly refuse to quarrel with them."

"How beautifully you came up on that! Something tells me that I'm not going to be disappointed in you. We must see you at our house. I haven't quite Dale's knack of attracting people"—she paused a moment upon this note of humility—"but I try to bring a few worth while people together. I've educated a few men to drop in for tea on Thursdays with usually a few of my pals among the young matrons and a girl or two. If you feel moved——"

"I hope you're not trifling with me," said Bruce "for I shall certainly come."

Henderson appeared presently with a dark hint that Shepherd was peeved by their long absence and that the company was breaking up.

"Connie never plays all her cards the first time, Bruce; you must give her another chance."

"Oh, Mr. Storrs has promised me a thousand chances!" said Mrs. Mills.

V

SUNDAY evening the Freemans were called unexpectedly into town and Bruce and Henderson were left to amuse themselves. Henderson immediately lost himself in a book and Bruce, a little homesick for the old freedom of the road, set out for a walk. A footpath that followed the river invited him and he lounged along his spirit responding to the beauty of the night, his mind intent upon the future. The cordiality of the Freemans and their circle had impressed him with the friendliness of the community. It would take time to establish himself in his profession but he had confidence in his power to achieve; the lust for work was already strong in him. He was satisfied that he had done wisely in obeying his mother's mandate; he would never have been happy if he had ignored it.

He speculated a good deal about young Mills. The gentleness and forbearance with which he suffered the raillery of his intimates, his anxiety to be accounted a good fellow, his serious interest in matters of real importance—in all these things there was something touching and appealing. It was difficult to correlate Shepherd with his wife, but perhaps their dissimilarities were only superficial. Bruce appraised Connie Mills as rather shallow, fond of admiration, given to harmless poses in which her friends evidently encouraged and indulged her. She practiced her little coquetries with an openness that was in itself a safeguard.

It was bewildering, but it had come about so naturally that there seemed nothing extraordinary in the fact that he was already acquainted with members of Franklin Mills's family.

Bruce paused now and then where the path drew in close to the river to look down at the moonlit water through the fringe of trees and shrubbery. A boy and girl floated by in a canoe, the girl singing as she thrummed a ukulele, and his eyes followed them a little wistfully. Farther on the dull put-put-put of a motorboat broke the silence. The sound ceased abruptly, followed instantly by a colloquy between the occupants.

"Damn this fool thing!" ejaculated a feminine voice. "We've stuck!"

"I had noticed it!" said another girl's voice good naturedly. "But such is the life of the sailor. I wouldn't just choose this for an all-night camp!"

"Don't be so sweet about it, Millicent! I'd like to sink this boat."

"It isn't Polly's fault. She's already half buried in the sand," laughed the other.

Storrs scrambled down to the water's edge and peered out upon the river. A small power boat had grounded on a sand bar in the middle of the stream. Its occupants were two young women in bathing suits. But for their voices he would have taken them for boys. One was tinkering with the engine while the other was trying to push off the boat with an oar which sank ineffectually in the sand. In their attempts to float their craft the young women had not seen Storrs who, satisfied that they were in no danger, was rather amused by their plight. They were presumably from one of the near-by villas and their bathing suits implied familiarity with the water. He could hear them quite distinctly at times; then their voices became inaudible as they continued to confer as to the best means of extricating themselves from their predicament. The girl at the engine talked excitedly with an occasional profane outburst; her companion was disposed to accept the situation philosophically.

"We can easily swim out, so don't get so excited, Leila," said the girl with the oar. "And do stop swearing; voices travel a long way over the water."

She Had No More Idea

That She Could Write a Photoplay Than You May Have

—yet she sold her first one to Thos. H. Ince

ELIZABETH THACHER'S experience is not extraordinary.

It is not beyond possibility for you to become a successful playwright, as she did, for the motion picture industry—the fifth largest in the world—is seeking new writers everywhere. There is a great dearth of good screen stories and a nation-wide search for more trained writers is now in force.

Elizabeth Thacher, just a Montana housewife at the time, thought she could write a better story for the screen than many she had seen in the little town of Corvallis, and one day she simply sat down and sent us a coupon from one of our announcements, as you may do after reading this one.

She had never written anything for publication. She hadn't the least idea what she had to do to learn. She didn't know even if she had a chance. She was merely curious about it.

Within a few months after enrollment for the Palmer Course and Service—which she studied during spare time at home—she wrote a photoplay.

Much to her amazement and the surprise of her friends, Thos. H. Ince, the famous producer, purchased it. (We act as a clearing house for the sale of stories, as well as trainers of those who wish to learn to write.)

Mrs. Thacher was amazed because she never really thought of herself as actually a writer of photoplays, although she did have those flashes of suggestion that she could improve some films. Also she thought producers did not want scenarios by anyone except those who had "made a name for themselves."

She didn't know the truth about the moving picture industry, which is simply this:

There is no other industry that has grown so fast and consequently is so lacking in trained people to help carry it on.

Twenty million people, it is estimated, see moving pictures every day in this country. Thousands of theatres are necessary to accommodate so many, and they must change their programs at least once and more often two and three times, each week.

It requires a great many writers to supply so many photoplays.

Writers of fiction are unable to "turn themselves into scenarists" as easily as you might expect, for there is an entirely new technique necessary in the creation of motion picture stories. What you write doesn't appear on the screen, so even those who "have no style in writing and never could write a short story or a book" frequently can write the most successful photoplays. In fact, most of the highest paid men and women scenarists in the industry today came from other than the literary field.

Elizabeth Thacher

And as nearly every producer would tell you, few famous books and short stories are suitable for photoplay production.

So in motion pictures there is probably the biggest field and the widest opportunity for new writing talent ever offered to so-called "novices"—ordinary people in all walks of life—housewives, office men, department store workers, doctors, lawyers and others who would like to do something creative in a different way.

Recently a California school teacher, a New York society matron, a Pennsylvania newspaper man, an underpaid office man in Utah and many others have developed under our guidance the powers which we helped them to discover.

Practically all these new writers of today have developed with the industry as must also hundreds of new writers now unknown.

The Palmer Course and Service for the training of writers of photoplays is different from other kinds of correspondence courses in that you get the actual practice of the profession as you learn. You learn by actually writing scenarios that you can sell—either through our story sales department or to our own productions—if they are possessed of merit that makes them desirable, of course.

As you write scenarios while studying this course, a staff of experts supplies personal and detailed criticism of your stories, to help you make them salable.

If they attain that quality, and when they do, we will, if you wish, offer them to the big producers through the Palmer Sales Department, which keeps in daily touch with the entire industry in Hollywood and knows its needs and wants.

Or we ourselves will purchase them for our own production if they meet our standards—for we are offering a new opportunity to all writers now. Read it elsewhere in this announcement.

We offer, furthermore, an unique test to all who feel that they would like to know if they have any chance of developing into a successful photoplay-wright.

It is the Palmer Creative Test, which indicates the presence or lack of creative imagination in the one who wants to try.

It requires no special education or knowledge of writing to make this very interesting, simple test. You'll enjoy it. It is free. You incur no obligation in sending for it.

It is confidential. You try it in your own home.

If you are successful in it we will send you detailed information about the Palmer Course and Service, or advise you not to attempt this work as a profession.

We tell you frankly, for an institution of our standing and our varied interests in selling and producing better plays, earnestly desires to develop writers whose work we and others in the industry can use.

Don't hesitate to send for this fascinating test. Don't think you have no chance to pass it. Mrs. Thacher doubted her ability until she discovered this means of developing it.

You may be possessed of powers that you don't suspect—or even think you lack—so mail the coupon now and possibly learn something new and highly interesting about yourself. Do it now before you turn this page. The turn of a page and a little forgetfulness have spoiled many a promising career.

Palmer Photoplay Corporation,
Department of Education, Sec. 3503,
Palmer Building, Hollywood, Calif.

Please send me, by return mail, your Creative Test pages which I am to fill out and mail back to you for analysis. It is understood that this coupon entitles me to a detailed constructive report on my test by your Examining Board, without the slightest obligation or cost on my part. Also send me free, Carrol B. Dotson's book, "How a $10,000 Imagination Was Discovered."

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY.....STATE.....

All correspondence strictly confidential.

$1,000 and Royalties

The Palmer Photoplay Corporation will pay $1,000 cash and royalties on the profits of the picture for five years to the Palmer trained writers of stories selected for production by their own Production Division. Thus, for the first time, writers may share in the proceeds of their successful work as stage playwrights and book authors do. This plan is endorsed and authorized by the Palmer Advisory Council, the members of which are:

Frederick Palmer, Author and Educator
Thos. H. Ince, Veteran Producer
Rex Ingram, Director and Producer
Allen Holubar Producer and Director
C. Gardner Sullivan, Scenarist to Thos. H. Ince.
E. J. Banks, M.A., Ph.D. Director of Research Sacred Films, Inc.
J. L. Frothingham Producer of Features
Rob Wagner, Screen Authority
James R. Quirk, Editor, Photoplay Magazine

Educational Staff Officers

Clayton Hamilton, M.A., Director of Education
Eugene B. Lewis, Editor-in-Chief
Douglas Z. Doty, Associate Editor
Geo. Elwood Jenks, Associate Editor

Copyright, 1923, Palmer Photoplay Corporation, Hollywood, Calif.

Cosmopolitan TRAVEL SERVICE

Cosmopolitan accepts advertising only from resorts and travel concerns that we KNOW are reliable and truly serviceable to the traveling public.

TOUR EUROPE FOR $425

30 days of delightful travel under experienced and competent guidance. Longer tours up to $1100. Write for Booklet F 1.

GATES TOURS — Founded 1892
"World Travel at Moderate Cost"
225 Fifth Avenue, New York

BERMUDA

"Nature's Fairyland" — 2 Days from New York.
Sailings Twice-Weekly via Palatial Steamers
S. S. "FORT VICTORIA" and S. S. "FORT ST. GEORGE"
For Booklets and Full Particulars write to
FURNESS BERMUDA LINE, 34 Whitehall St., N. Y.

Clark's 20th Mediterranean Cruise
June 27, by specially chartered "Baltic", 23,884 tons; 61 days, $600 up including hotels, guides, drives, fees. Stop-overs in Europe.
SUMMER TOURS TO EUROPE.
F. C. CLARK, Times Building .....New York

FLORIDA

Fruitland Park land owners, not land men, desiring new settlers, offer you the opportunity of acquiring orange groves in this lake-jewelled highland section for only $140 an acre. Those in earnest write for book of actual photos and easy payment plan.
BOARD OF TRADE, Room 15, Fruitland Park, Florida.

Is This Your Idea of Florida?

A little piece of land near the water, a boat, a garden, some strawberry plants, and perhaps a few chickens; a vine-covered cottage among your own orange and grapefruit trees; fish and oysters in abundance; plenty of quail and game—a simple, natural, wholesome life in the open the year round — Home, Health and Contentment. All this is within your reach at modest outlay in this beautiful land of sunshine and roses. We are on the Gulf and a navigable river, also on the Dixie Highway. Here we have the freedom, comfort and economy of country life, yet are within easy access of the big cities and resort centres—Tampa, 36 miles; Tarpon Springs, 8 miles; Clearwater, 24 miles; St. Petersburg, 48 miles. Our community is new and prices have not gone sky-high; living expenses are moderate. Over 200 Northern families already here. They like it—perhaps you will. May we send complete information? BOARD OF TRADE, Box 504, New Port Richey, Fla.

Moore Push-Pins
Glass Heads-Steel Points
Moore Push-less Hangers
To hang up things
Ask your dealer to show them
Sold Everywhere 10¢ per packet
Moore Push-Pin Co.
Wayne Junction Philadelphia

Reduce Your Flesh in Spots
Arms Legs Bust Double Chin
in fact the entire body or any part without dieting by wearing DR. WALTER'S Medicated Reducing
RUBBER GARMENTS

Bust Reducer, $6.00
Chin Reducer, $2.50
Anklets
for Reducing and Shaping the Ankles, $7.00 per pair. Extra high $9.00

Send ankle measurement when ordering
Send for illustrated Booklet
DR. JEANNE C. WALTER
353 5th Ave., New York

"I don't care who hears me," said the other, though in a lower tone.

She gave the engine a spin, starting the motor, but the power was unequal to the task of freeing the boat. With an exclamation of disgust she turned off the switch and the futile threshing of the propeller ceased.

"Let's swim ashore and send back for Polly," said the girl addressed as Millicent.

"I see myself swimming out!" the other retorted. "I'm not going to leave Polly here for some pirate to steal."

"Nobody's going to steal her. This isn't the ocean, you know."

"Well, no fool boat's going to get the best of me. Where's that flask? I'm freezing!"

"You don't need any more of that! Please give it to me!"

She made the demand a little sharply and her companion resented her tone, bitterly protesting that it was her flask and that she would do as she pleased with it. But her companion snatched it away.

"You had too much before we came out. I oughtn't to have let you come!"

"I hope you are enjoying yourself," said the other petulantly. "I don't see any fun in this!"

"Hello, there!" called Bruce, waving his arms to attract their attention. "Can I be of help?"

Startled by his voice they did not reply immediately but he heard them conferring as to this unlooked-for hail from the bank.

"Oh, I'm perfectly harmless!" he cried reassuringly. "I was just passing and heard your engine. If there's a boat near by I can pull you off; or I'll swim out and lift your boat off if you say so."

"Better get a boat," said the voice he had identified with the name of Millicent. "There's a boathouse just a little farther up, on your side. You'll find a skiff and a canoe. We'll be awfully glad to have your help. Thank you ever so much!"

"Don't forget to come back," cried Leila.

"Certainly not!" laughed Bruce and sprang up the bank.

He found the boathouse without trouble, chose the skiff as easier to manage, and rowed back. In the moonlight he saw Millicent standing up in the launch watching him and as he approached she flashed an electric torch along the side of the boat that he might see the nature of their difficulty.

"I think we'd better get out," she said.

"No; stay right there till I see what I can do. I think I can push you off. All steady now!"

The launch moved a little at his first attempt to dislodge it and a second strong shove sent it into the channel.

"Now start your engine!"

The girl in the middle of the boat muttered something he didn't catch.

"Leila, can you start the engine?" demanded Millicent. "I think—I think I'll have to row back," she said when Leila made no response. "My friend isn't feeling well."

"I'll tow you—that's easy," said Bruce, noting that her companion apparently was no longer interested in the proceedings. "Please throw me your rope!"

He caught the rope and fastened it to the stern of the skiff and called out that he was ready.

"You can land us where you found the boat," said Millicent. She settled herself in the stern of the launch and took the tiller. No word was spoken till they reached the boathouse.

"That's all you can do," said Millicent, who had drawn on a long bath wrapper and stepped out. "And thank you very, very much; I'm sorry to have caused you so much trouble."

This was clearly a dismissal but he loosened the rope and tied up the skiff. He waited, holding the launch, while Millicent tried to persuade Leila to disembark.

"Perhaps——" began Bruce, and hesitated. It seemed unfair to leave the girl alone with the problem of getting her friend ashore. Not to put too fine a point on the matter, Leila was intoxicated.

"Now Leila!" cried Millicent exasperatedly. "You're making yourself ridiculous, besides keeping this gentleman waiting. It's not a bit nice of you!"

"Jus' restin' lil bit," said Leila, staring uncomprehendingly at Bruce. "I'm jus' restin' and I'm not goin' to leave Polly."

Millicent turned to Bruce. "If I could get her out of the boat I could put her in our car and take her home."

"Surely," he said and bent over quickly and lifted the girl from the launch, set her on her feet and steadied her. Millicent fumbled in the launch, found a bath wrapper and flung it about Leila's shoulders. She guided her friend toward the long, low boathouse and turned a switch.

"I can manage now," she said, gravely surveying Bruce in the glare of light. "I'm so sorry to have troubled you."

She was tall and fair with markedly handsome brown eyes and a great wealth of fine-spun golden hair that tumbled down upon her shoulders. Her dignity was in nowise diminished by her garb. She betrayed no agitation. Bruce felt that she was paying the compliment of assuming that she was dealing with a gentleman who, having performed a service, would go his way and forget the whole affair. She drew her arm about the now passive Leila, who was much shorter—quite small, indeed, in comparison.

"Our car's here and we'll get dressed and drive back into town. Thank you so much and—good night."

"I was only too glad to help you; good night."

The door closed upon them. Bruce made the launch fast to the landing and resumed his walk.

VI

WHEN he returned to the Freemans', Henderson flung aside his book and complained of Bruce's prolonged absence.

"I had begun to think you'd got yourself kidnapped. Go ahead and talk," he said, yawning and stretching himself.

"Well, I've had a mild adventure," said Bruce, lighting a cigarette; and he described his meeting with the two young women.

"Not so bad!" said Henderson placidly. "Such little adventures never happen to me. Leila is an obstreperous little kid; she really ought to behave herself. Right the first time. Leila Mills of course; I think I mentioned her the other day. Her friend is Millicent Harden. Guess I omitted Millicent in my review of our citizens. Quite a remarkable person. She plays the rôle of big sister to Leila; they're neighbors on Jefferson Avenue. That's Does Europe Lure You?

ravel in Europe was never more fascinating an now. There is the Old Europe—cathedrals, castles, picturesque ruins, immortal art. nd there is the Europe of the moment—gay easure cities, glittering shops, the Europe sport and fashion.

ever could an American see Europe more onomically than in 1923. European currency is down. What dollars buy in Europe ow will amaze you.

or the thousands of Cosmopolitan readers inking of Europe, we have written a booklet unusual interest.

tells in a humorous narrative style the periences of two Americans in Europe, vidly picturing Europe "as is." It explains assports and visés, the mysteries of exange, tells about baggage and tips. It escribes "one-cabin" ships. Shows what the avel bureaus offer. And there is a map ving principal distances.

he Travel Club of America helped us write ; therefore it is accurate.

Whether you have decided to go, or hope to go, dream of going, this booklet will help you.

end the coupon with ten cents in stamps.

Send 10c for booklet No. 6 on Europe

In addition to the European booklet the following are available at 4c apiece:

No. 1. South America and Central America.
No. 2. Southern Europe and the Mediterranean.
No. 3. Pacific Coast and the Great Southwest.
No. 4. The Orient.
No. 5. Florida, Bermuda and the West Indies.

If, after you have read your booklets you have any further question as to routes and prices, hotels or steamship lines, write us. We shall be only too glad to answer in full. The Cosmopolitan Travel Service has been instituted to make travel easier and more pleasant for Cosmopolitan readers.

strations Courtesy Bennett's Travel Bureau

Cosmopolitan Travel Service

119 West 40th Street New York, N. Y.

Cosmopolitan Travel Service, 119 West 40th Street, New York City

Enclosed find.....cents in stamps. Please send me booklets Nos.....(if you care to give the following additional information it will help us to help you.) I plan to travel in (Names of countries or localities).....

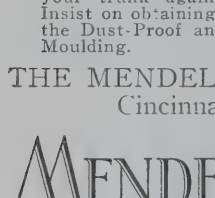
I will leave (Date).....

Name .....

Address .....

"Not a Wrinkle!"



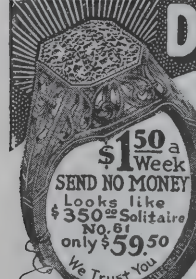
THERE'S a wonderful thrill of satisfaction in arriving at your destination with your lovely gowns, hats and lingerie in Mendel-Trunx in as good condition as they were when you started from home.

The interiors are exquisitely upholstered in rich fabrics, and contain many unusual conveniences.

Most important, Mendel Dust-Proof Trunx are equipped with a continuous tongue and groove joining of sturdy steel, finished in a beautiful gold bronze around all the openings, that protects your garments from travel stains and your trunk against rough handling. Insist on obtaining Mendel-Trunx with the Dust-Proof and Warp-Proof Steel Moulding.

THE MENDEL-DRUCKER CO.
Cincinnati, Ohio

MENDEL TRUNX
DUST-PROOF WARP-PROOF



"Why Your Trunk should be a Mendel"—beautifully illustrated brochure sent on request.
Address Dept. 12

Comedies, Dramas, Musical Comedies and Revues, Minstrel Opening Choruses, Blackface plays, Everything for Burnt Cork Shows and All Amateur Entertainments. Monologs, Dialogs, Speakers. CATALOGUE FREE.
PLAYS Vaudeville Acts, How to Stage a Play Make-up Goods
T. S. DENISON & CO., 623 So. Wabash, Dept. 24, CHICAGO

DIAMONDS

FOR A FEW CENTS A DAY

$1.50 a Week
SEND NO MONEY
Looks like $350.00 Solitaire No. 61 only $59.50
We Trust You
MONEY BACK GUARANTEE

Don't send a single penny. Ten days Trial. When the ring comes, examine it—if you are not convinced it is the Greatest Bargain in America, send it back at our expense. Only if pleased, send $1.50 weekly—at the rate of a few cents a day. This Bargain Cluster Ring with 7 Blue-White Perfect Cut Diamonds can be yours. No Red Tape. No Risk.

MILLION DOLLAR BARGAIN BOOK FREE

Million Dollar Bargain Book FREE Send for it today. It pictures thousands of Bargains. Address Dept. 1203.

J.M.LYON & CO.
2-4 Maiden Lane N.Y.

just a boathouse on the Styx that Mills built for Leila's delectation. She pulls a cocktail tea there occasionally.

"Millicent's pop made a fortune out of an asthma cure—the joy of all cut-rate druggists. Not viewed with approval by medical societies. Socially the senior Hardens are outside the breastworks, but Millicent is asked to very large functions, where nobody knows who's there. They live in that whopping big house just north of the Mills place and old Doc Harden gives Millicent everything she wants. Hence a grand organ, and the girl is a regular Cecelia at the keys. Really plays. Strong artistic bent. We can't account for people like the Hardens having such a daughter. There's a Celtic streak in the girl, I surmise—that odd sort of poetic strain that's so beguiling in the Irish. She models quite wonderfully, they tell me. Well, well! So you were our little hero on the spot!"

"But Leila?" said Bruce seriously. "You don't quite expect to find the daughter of a prominent citizen tipsy on a river, and rather profane."

"Oh, thunder!" exclaimed Henderson easily. "Leila's all right. You needn't worry about her. She's merely passing through a phase and will probably emerge safely. Leila's hardly up to your standard, but Millicent is a girl you'll like. I ought to have told Dale to ask Millicent here. Dale, in her broad tolerance, doesn't mind at all that old Harden's rolled up a few million by being smart enough to scamper just a nose length ahead of the federal grand jury carrying his rotten dope in triumph."

"Miss Mills, I suppose, is an acceptable member of the Freemans' group?" Bruce inquired.

"Acceptable enough, but this is all too tame for Leila. Curious sort of friendship—Leila and Millicent. Millicent is, in a manner of speaking, between the Devil and the deep sea in the social swim. She's just a little too superior to train with the girls of the Longview Country Club set and the asthma cure keeps her from being chummy with the Faraway gang. But I'll say that Leila's lucky to have a friend like Millicent. By George, I hope you'll meet up with Millicent soon! Don't get it into your bean that she's merely clever as many girls of twenty-four or five are. No, there's more! After you've met her we'll see what we can figure out. Here come our host and hostess. Being a gentleman, of course you won't mention the little episode on the river. Leila's such a nut!"

CHAPTER III

HENDERSON made his wife's return an excuse for giving a dinner—she had brought home a trophy from the golf tournament and her prowess must be celebrated. Mrs. Henderson was a tall blonde with a hearty, offhand manner and given to plain, direct speech. She treated Bud as though he were a younger brother, to be humored to a certain point and then reminded a little tartly of his limitations.

Several interviews with Freeman resulted in an arrangement by which Bruce was to enter the architect's office immediately. As Henderson had predicted, Mrs. Freeman was a real power in her husband's affairs. She confided to Bruce privately that with all his talents Bill lacked tact in dealing with his clients and he needed someone to supply this deficiency. And the office was a place of confusion, and Bill was prone to forgetfulness. Bruce, Mrs. Freeman thought, could be of material assistance in keeping Bill straight.

Bruce was put to work on tentative sketches for a residence for a man who had no very clear idea of what he wanted. This gave him a chance to show what he could do and he entered upon his work with enthusiasm.

The Hendersons were almost too zealous in their anxiety to promote Bruce socially. Someone was giving a large party at the Faraway Country Club, and this, Maybelle told him, he couldn't afford to miss. Bruce, yielding to their importunities, found the affair all they had promised. Late in the evening as he sought a girl who had promised him a dance Bruce found himself in proximity to Millicent Harden.

There was no mistaking her; she was standing in the hall outside the ballroom as though waiting for someone. Her eyes fell upon him passingly, then returned for a second glance. Seeing a young man bearing down upon her Bruce stepped forward and bowed.

"I beg your pardon," he said gravely. He lifted his head to find her regarding him with an amused smile.

"Oh, you needn't!" she said quickly.

"I might find someone to introduce us—Mrs. Henderson, perhaps," he continued. "My name is Bruce Storrs."

"Then Mrs. Henderson's looking for you now—she told me to remain right here till she found you and came back! So possibly we might assume that the introduction is accomplished. I'm Miss Harden."

"That helps a good deal! Shall we dance?"

After the dance he suggested that they step out for a breath of air.

"That's a happy thought," she replied. They found seats and she said immediately:

"Of course I remember you; I'd be ashamed if I didn't. I'm glad of this chance to thank you. I know Leila—Miss Mills—will want to thank you too. We must have seemed very silly that night on the river."

"Such a thing might happen to anyone; why not forget it?"

"Let me thank you again," she said seriously. "You were ever so kind."

"The incident is closed," he remarked with finality. "Am I keeping you from a partner? They're dancing again. We might talk this out if I'm not depriving you——"

"You're not. It's warm inside and this is a relief. We might even wander down the lawn and look for elves and dryads and nymphs. Those big trees and the stars set the stage for such encounters."

"It's rather nice to believe in fairies and such things. At times I'm a believer; then I lose my faith."

"We all forget our fairies sometimes," she answered gravely.

He had failed to note at their meeting on the river the loveliness of her voice. He found himself waiting for the recurrence of certain tones that had a curious musical resonance. He was struck by a certain sobriety in her that was expressed for fleeting moments in both voice and

es. He was grateful for intervals in ıich, even with the newest dance music ating out to them and the light and ıghter within, he was aware of an inde- able quality in the girl that seemed to ınslate her to remote and shadowy times. er profile—clean-cut without sharpness— d her manner of wearing her abundant ir—carried back loosely to a knot low her head—strengthened his impression her as a being a little foreign to the ace and hour.

But apart from these vague suggestions ere was nothing to differentiate her from her young women endowed with good ›ks. She spoke with quiet enthusiasm the outdoor sports that interested her— ling she enjoyed most of all. Nothing ve quite the sense of freedom one derived ›m a gallop on a good horse. Henderson d intimated that her social life was stricted, but she bore herself more like young woman of the world than any her girl he remembered. She was reshingly free of affectations, talked non- ıse, made amusing but not unkind com- ents on people who passed them. The rty, he imagined, only mildly entertained r; she several times excused herself when ung men sought her out for a dance.

"Maybelle Henderson will scold me for ding you away," she said. "I can't nce just whenever the band plays. It's t to be an inspiration!"

"Then I thank you again for one perfect nce! I'm afraid I didn't appreciate ıat you were giving me."

"Oh, I danced with you to hide my em- rrassment!" she laughed.

Half an hour passed and they had uched and dismissed many subjects ıen she rose and caught the hand of a l who was passing.

"Miss Mills, Mr. Storrs. It's quite fit- ıg that you should meet Mr. Storrs."

"Fitting?" asked the girl, breathless ›m her dance. Her escort left her and e trio were alone for a moment.

"We've all met before—on the river— ›st shockingly! You might just say ank you to Mr. Storrs."

"Oh, this is not——" Leila drew back d inspected Bruce with her head tilted, r eyes dancing.

"Miss Harden is mistaken; this is the st time we ever met," declared Bruce.

"Isn't he nice!" exclaimed Leila. "From ıat Millie said I knew you would be like is." And then: "Oh, lots of people are agging about you and promising to in- ›duce me! Here comes Tommy Barnes; has this dance. Oh, Millie! if you get a ance you might say a kind word to papa. e's probably terribly bored by this time."

"Leila's a dear child! I'm sure you'll e her," said Millicent as the girl fluttered vay. "Oh! I adore this piece; will you nce with me?"

As they left the floor Mrs. Henderson tercepted them.

"Aren't you the limit, you two? I've d Bud searching the whole place for you d here you are! Quite as though you dn't been hiding for the last hour."

"I'm going to keep Mr. Storrs just a oment," said Millicent. "Leila said r father was perishing somewhere and I do want Mr. Storrs to meet him."

"Yes; certainly," said Bruce.

He walked beside her into the big lounge, where many of the older guests were gathered.

"Poor Mr. Mills!" said Millicent after a quick survey of the room. "There he is, listening to one of Mr. Tasker's interminable yarns."

She led the way toward a group of men, one of whom was evidently nearing the end of a long story. One of his auditors, a dark man of medium height, was listening with an air of forced attention. His grayish hair was smoothly brushed away from his forehead; he wore a short, stubby mustache, a trifle less gray than his hair. Millicent and Bruce fell within the line of his vision and his face brightened instantly and he nodded to the girl and waved his hand. The instant the story was ended he crossed to them, his eyes bright with pleasure and a smile on his face.

"I call it a base desertion!" he exclaimed, bowing mockingly. "You and Leila bring me here and coolly park me where I have to listen to the oldest stories in the world."

"Don't scold! Mr. Mills—let me present Mr. Storrs."

"I'm very glad to meet you, Mr. Storrs," said Mills with quiet cordiality. He swept Bruce with a quick, comprehensive scrutiny.

"Mr. Storrs has lately moved here," Millicent explained.

"I congratulate you, Mr. Storrs, on having fallen into good hands."

"Oh, Miss Harden is taking splendid care of me!" Bruce replied.

"She's quite capable of doing that!" Mills returned.

Bruce was studying Franklin Mills guardedly. The man had probably been a handsome youth, and he wore his years lightly. Such distinction as he had was in his bearing; he held himself well. A man of reserves and reticences, not a safe subject for quick judgments. His manner was somewhat listless now that the introduction had been accomplished; and perhaps aware of this he addressed several remarks to Bruce, asking whether the music was all that the jazzy age demanded; confessed that his dancing days were over.

"You only think they are! Mr. Mills really dances very well. You'd be surprised, Mr. Storrs, considering how venerable he is!"

"That's why I don't dance!" Mills retorted with a rueful grin. " 'Considering his age' is the meanest thing that can be said of a man who's struck fifty."

Bud Henderson here interrupted them, declaring that dozens of people were disconsolate because Bruce had concealed himself.

"Of course you must go!" said Millicent.

"I hope to meet you again," said Mills as Bruce bowed to him.

"Thank you, Mr. Mills," said Bruce.

He was conscious once more of Mills's intent scrutiny. It seemed to him as he walked away that Mills's eyes followed him.

"What's the matter, old top?" Bud demanded. "You're not tired?"

"No; I'm all right," Bruce replied, though his heart was pounding hard, and feeling a little giddy he threw his arm across Henderson's shoulder.

Another absorbing chapter in the lives of Bruce Storrs, Millicent and Franklin Mills is told in COSMOPOLITAN for April, on sale at all news stands March 10.

Your European Trip need cost you little ~ ~

IF you are planning a trip to Europe learn today at what a moderate expense you can have the vacation of your life! Your Government has prepared a booklet of suggested itineraries and their costs. It is now possible to go to Europe and return on one of the finest ships afloat, first class passage, spending three weeks abroad, for only $750!

Great Government Ships

U. S. Government ships, operated to Europe by the United States Lines, are marvels of luxury, speed and safety. A voyage on the famous George Washington, the President Harding, or President Roosevelt, constitutes a supremely memorable experience. The ships ply between New York and Plymouth, Cherbourg and Bremen. You should know about them. You will be proud of your ships, and the unsurpassed service they offer at low cost.

Write Today

Send the information blank today for full details. Get your Government's handsomely illustrated descriptive booklet showing actual photographs of interiors on U. S. Government ships. Learn how economically you can make your trip to Europe. Send the blank today.

INFORMATION BLANK
To U. S. Shipping Board
Information Section Washington, D. C.
U. S. 1203

Please send without obligation the U. S. Government literature described about. I am considering a trip to Europe ☐ to The Orient ☐ to South America ☐. I would travel 1st class ☐, 2d ☐, 3d ☐.

My Name _____

My Business or Profession _____

My Street No. or R. F. D. _____

Town _____ State _____

For information regarding sailings address

United States Lines
45 Broadway New York City
110 So. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill. 75 State St., Boston, Mass.
155 Congress Street West, Detroit, Michigan

Managing Operators for
UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD

MAE MURRAY, star of "Broadway Rose," says:

"After a hard day's work nothing so refreshes the face and takes away the tired, strained look as Mineralava Beauty Clay."

MARION DAVIES, star of "When Knighthood Was in Flower," says:

"Mineralava is the perfect way to a perfect complexion. I have tried many clays for the complexion but Mineralava surpasses others so far that I use it and it only."

The Trinity Beautiful and its Debt to MINERALAVA

by Hector Fuller

THREE of the most beautiful women whose faces are familiar to thousands who have seen their reflections on the Silver Screen delight in telling their fellow-women the secret of their wonderful complexions.

This Trinity of Beauty, Marion Davies, Mae Murray and Priscilla Dean, are all agreed that the greatest corrector of skin evils: the most perfect creator of health and freshness for the complexion is Mineralava Beauty Clay.

Mineralava is not a novelty. It has been in use since its discovery, twenty-three years ago by Mrs. M. G. Scott, the famous Beauty expert. When she found that this product of the laboratories of Nature had remarkable affinities for the human skin she had it tested and tried by the most notable chemists in Europe and America who added to it certain medical ingredients of great potency, thus making it the most perfect specific for Skin Malnutrition that women have ever used.

Just what Sir Erasmus Wilson, M.D., F.R.S., the noted specialist of skin diseases, recommended in his famous work, "The Skin and Its Diseases," Mineralava accomplishes. It was Sir Erasmus who pointed out that there are two layers of human skin, the outer called the Epidermis, which bears the brunt of weather and the exposure to dirt and grime; and the under skin called the Dermis, waiting to take its place when the old skin flakes and falls away, and which must, therefore, be nourished, stimulated and invigorated.

PRISCILLA DEAN, star of "Under Two Flags," enthusiastically writes:

"There is nothing that so definitely clears away all the impurities from the skin as Mineralava does. It brings back the firm contour of youth and is the enemy of all skin troubles."

That is what Mineralava does so perfectly. It penetrates the myriad of tiny pores and reaching the under skin stimulates it to perfect skin-health. It absolutely corrects Skin-Malnutrition, that disease of lack of proper nourishment from which most mature faces suffer. In place of the sallow, dead-looking complexion, lacking vivacity and beauty, it gives you a face sparkling with vigor and free from blemishes.

Mineralava Beauty Clay builds up the tiny muscles and stimulates a healthy blood circulation through the tiny blood vessels; it clears away all the eruptions, draws out the impurities, drives off pimples and blackheads; corrects oily or too-dry skin, coarse pores, incipient wrinkles and sagging muscles. It so nourishes the Dermis that when the time comes for it to take its place as the surface skin, it appears as the perfect complexion, newborn and beautiful.

Countless thousands of happy American home women testify to the permanent qualities of Mineralava. Mineralava is a superior article for discriminating people. Originally Mineralava was sold only in Beauty Parlors at as high as $15 a treatment.

Today it is within the reach of every woman at $2.00 a bottle, each bottle containing eighteen treatments, or a trifle more than 10 cents a treatment. Full directions for treatment and a soft brush for applying with every bottle.

There is also an introductory Trial Tube of Mineralava at 50c.

MINERALAVA—makes Blemished Skin Perfect!

MINERALAVA—corrects all forms of Skin-Malnutrition!

MINERALAVA—keeps Young Faces Healthful and Rosy!

MINERALAVA—moulds Old Faces to the Contour of Youth!

Mineralava has 22 years' successful use behind it in the best homes of the country. Don't experiment with new and untried Beauty Clays. The original is your only protection.

Go to your dependable Druggist or Department Store. Ask for Mineralava Beauty Clay. If the Store does not happen to have it write direct to the manufacturers and they will see that your dealer is supplied to fill your requirements. Scott's Preparations, Inc., 251 West 19th Street, New York.

Mineralava
BEAUTY CLAY
PARIS VIVAUDOU NEW YORK
Distributor

VOL. LXXIV APRIL, 1923 NO. 4

COSMOPOLITAN

America's Greatest Magazine

This Month

Beatrice		by Harrison Fisher	Cover
The Life of the Party		by S. E. Kiser	15
Hokum	[Illustrations by Rea Irvin]	by George Ade	16
The Garden of Peril	[Illustrations by Dean Cornwell]	by Cynthia Stockley	20
Take Me Back to Old Broadway	[Illustrated with Photograph]	by O. O. McIntyre	28
The Eminent Dr. Deeves	[Illustrations by John Alonzo Williams]	by Irvin S. Cobb	30
The Map Eaters	[Illustrations by Charles D. Mitchell]	by Frank R. Adams	37
The Hope of Happiness	[Illustrations by Pruett Carter]	by Meredith Nicholson	42
Now That I'm Fifty	[Illustrated with Photographs]	by Albert Payson Terhune	50
Discipline	[Illustrations by C. D. Williams]	by Peter B. Kyne	52
Ukridge's Dog College	[Illustrations by T. D. Skidmore]	by P. G. Wodehouse	58
The Stage Today	[Photographs in Artgravure]		65
Miracles	[Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg]	by Gouverneur Morris	69
Happy Endings	[Illustrations by the Author]	by John T. McCutcheon	72
The Brinkerhoff Brothers	[Illustrations by Herbert M. Stoops]	by Fannie Hurst	74
Sherlock's Home	[Illustrations by J. W. McGurk]	by H. C. Witwer	80
The Lone Wolf Returns	[Illustrations by W. D. Stevens]	by Louis Joseph Vance	86
A Declaration of Independence	[Illustrations by Ralph Barton]	by Berton Braley	94
A Maker of Gestures	[Illustrations by John Richard Flanagan]	by John Monk Saunders	97
Stories That Have Made Me Laugh	[Illustrations by Gordon Ross]	by Montague Glass	102

Next Month

Comes a true story—one of the most inspiring you ever read.
A story of a once prominent minister and his life expiation for a moment's madness.
A story that never got into the newspapers because a whole city kept the secret of it inviolate.

PETER CLARK MACFARLANE

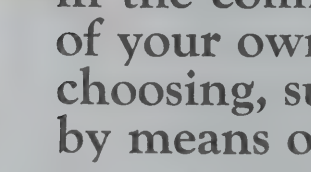
was commissioned by COSMOPOLITAN to investigate the facts and write them. The result is a human drama.



Published monthly by the International Magazine Company at 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST, President; C. H. HATHAWAY, Vice-President; RAY LONG, Vice-President;
JOSEPH A. MOORE, Treasurer; W. G. LANGDON, Secretary.

Copyright, 1923, by International Magazine Company (Cosmopolitan Magazine). All rights reserved under the terms of the Fourth American International Convention of Artistic and Literary Copyright. 35 cents a copy; subscription price, United States and possessions, $3.00 a year; Canada, $3.50; Foreign, $4.00. All subscriptions are payable in advance. We cannot begin subscriptions with back numbers. Unless otherwise directed we begin all subscriptions with the current issue. When sending in your renewal, please give us four weeks' notice. When changing an address, give the old address as well as the new and allow five weeks for the first copy to reach you. Entered as second-class matter, September 8, 1905, at the Post Office, New York, New York, under the act of March 3, 1879. Entered on July 1, 1918, at the Post Office, Atlanta, Georgia; Boston, Massachusetts; Chicago, Illinois; Los Angeles, California; San Francisco, California.

No need to wait for hours in the rain

Attend the opera and concerts as often as you have the opportunity, for great music should be part of every one's spiritual development. But on a stormy evening, how you will enjoy hearing the great artists through the medium of the Victrola and Victor Records in the comfort of your own home! Artists of your own choice in programs of your own choosing, such is the service at your disposal by means of the Victrola.

Victrola

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Important: Look for these trade-marks. Under the lid. On the label.

Victor Talking Machine Company, Camden, New Jersey

VOL. LXXIV
No. 4
COSMOPOLITAN APRIL
1923

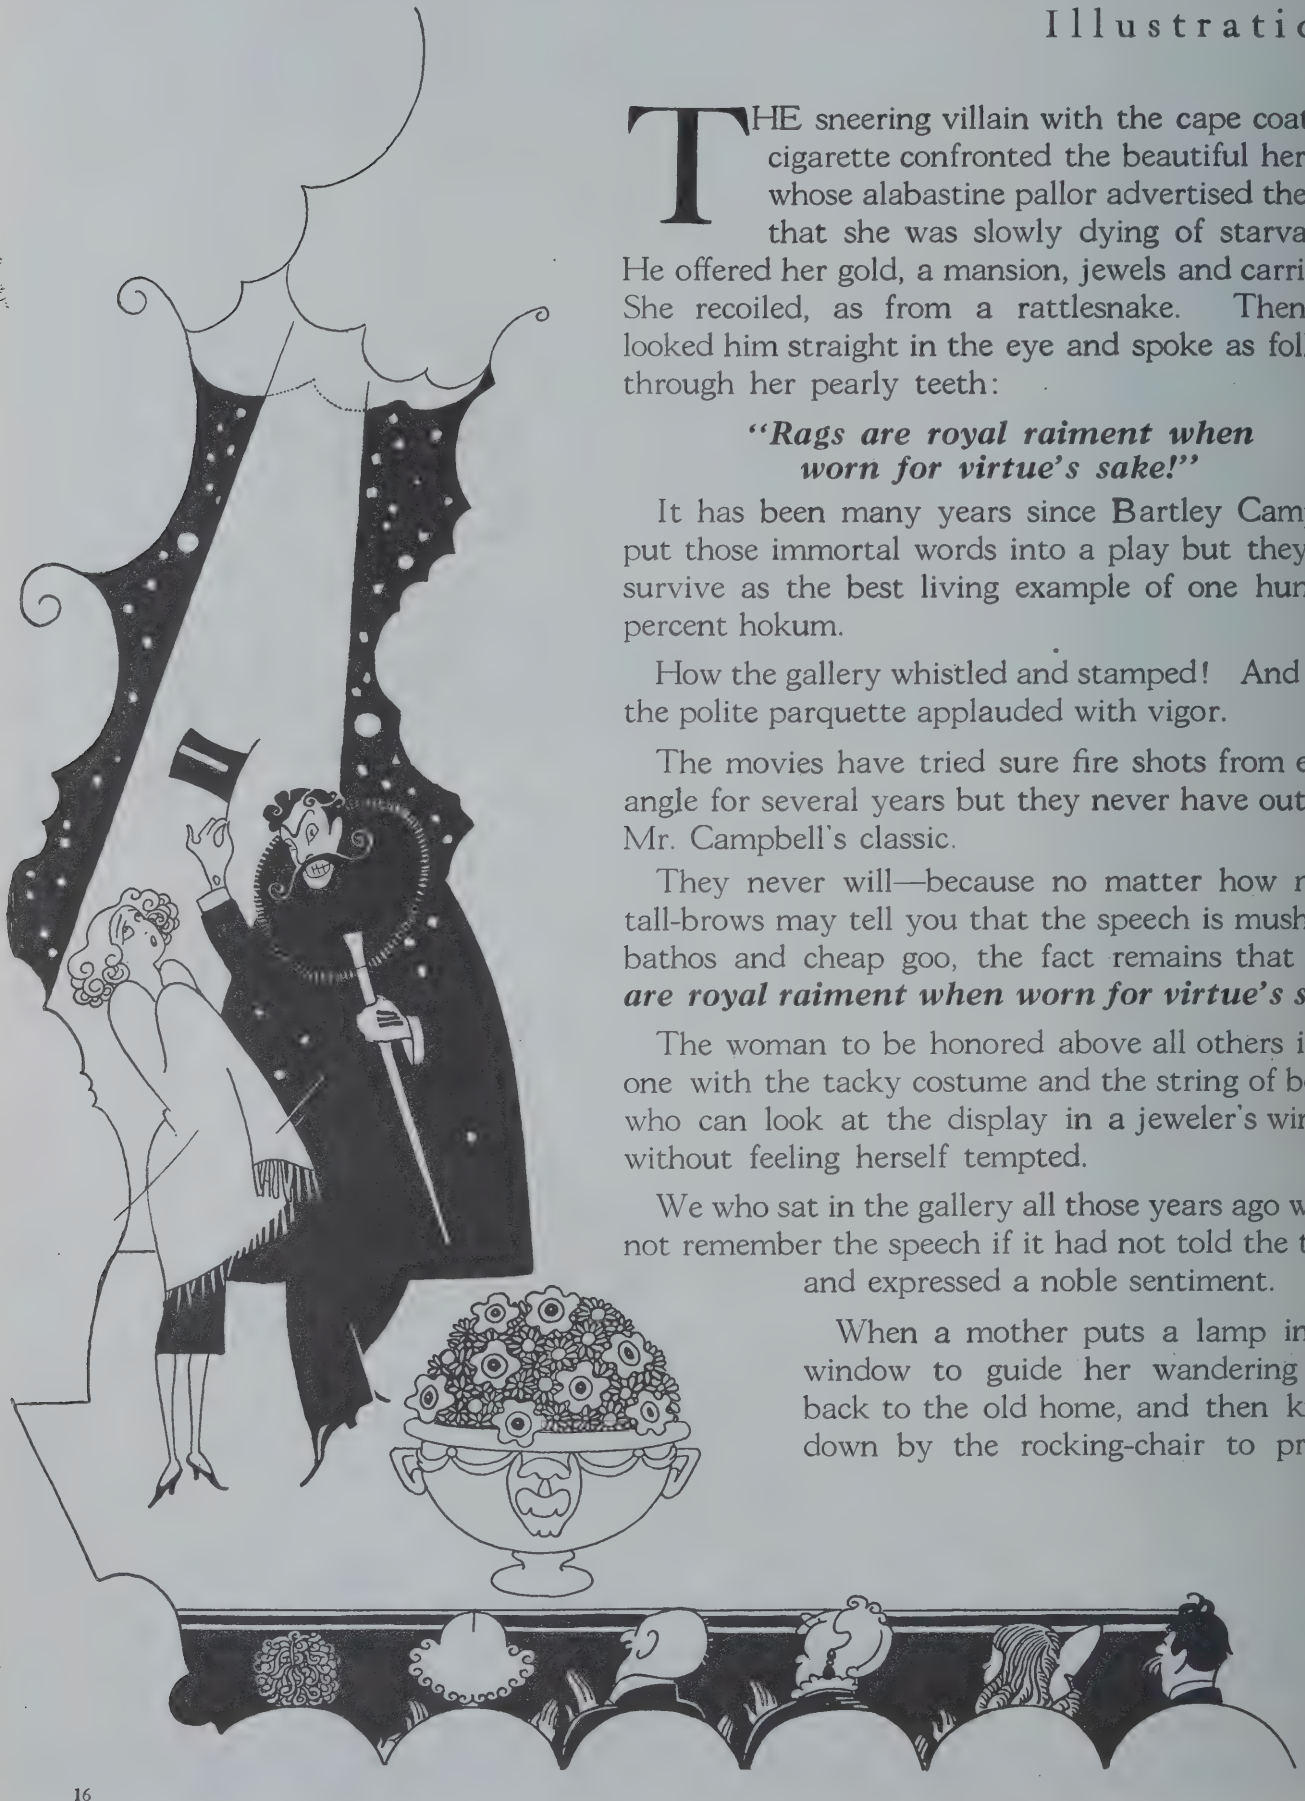
The Life of The Party

by S. E. KISER

I HEAR her fling a careless jest
Across the table richly spread;
Rare jewels gleam upon her breast,
A cluster glows upon her head;
Her beauty rouses envy, where
She dazzles mirth is fast and free,
But silently beside her chair
There stands, or so it seems to me,
A wistful child with wind-blown hair—
The little girl she used to be.

SHE has not failed to let her charms
Appeal for notice and for praise;
Her snowy breast is bared, her arms
Attract the jaded cynic's gaze;
The luster has not left her eyes,
She has not learned as yet to think
Of griefs that she must soon disguise,
Of dregs that she will have to drink;
She does not hear the moans that rise
From depths where she is doomed to sink.

HER laugh is merry; she forgets
The price her luxuries have cost;
She lets no moment bring regrets
Or longings for the soul she lost.
The party grows from gay to wild,
Her snowy breast and arms are bare;
The fragrant blooms before her piled
She tosses gayly here and there,
Unmindful of the wistful child
That seems to stand beside her chair.



THEY will forget who praise her now,
For beauty fades, and youth is brief;
Some day she will be learning how
To blame mischances for her grief,
And those to whom she turns to fling
Kissed roses still may find it droll
To sit where Pleasure, in full swing,
Ignores the innocence it stole,
But I will be remembering
The wistful child that had a soul.

COPYRIGHT 1923, BY INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE COMPANY, (COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE)

GEORGE ADE on

Which is American for the Honest-to-God Stuff that All of us feel but Illustrations

THE sneering villain with the cape coat and cigarette confronted the beautiful heroine, whose alabastine pallor advertised the fact that she was slowly dying of starvation. He offered her gold, a mansion, jewels and carriages. She recoiled, as from a rattlesnake. Then she looked him straight in the eye and spoke as follows, through her pearly teeth:

"Rags are royal raiment when worn for virtue's sake!"

It has been many years since Bartley Campbell put those immortal words into a play but they still survive as the best living example of one hundred percent hokum.

How the gallery whistled and stamped! And even the polite parquette applauded with vigor.

The movies have tried sure fire shots from every angle for several years but they never have outdone Mr. Campbell's classic.

They never will—because no matter how many tall-brows may tell you that the speech is mush and bathos and cheap goo, the fact remains that rags are royal raiment when worn for virtue's sake.

The woman to be honored above all others is the one with the tacky costume and the string of beads, who can look at the display in a jeweler's window without feeling herself tempted.

We who sat in the gallery all those years ago would not remember the speech if it had not told the truth and expressed a noble sentiment.

When a mother puts a lamp in the window to guide her wandering boy back to the old home, and then kneels down by the rocking-chair to pray—

H O K U M

so many of us are afraid to let our High-brow Neighbors know we feel

by Rea Irvin

That is super-hokum, the last word in emotional gravy, but even the dramatic critics weep!

They may pan it next morning but they shed unmanly tears when mother gets down on the rag carpet. Why? Because a million saintly mothers in America are waiting for bad boys to come home and be forgiven. If you can look at one of them without having something turn over under your belt, it simply proves that you yourself are not right.

When Georgie Cohan waves the American flag—that's hokum. He knows it. But also he knows that in these days of skim-milk patriotism and celluoid Americanism, the decentest thing that any native born citizen, born on the Fourth of July, can do is to stand up and salute the colors and declare his faith in the old organization.

Extract:

"By what right do you interfere?"

"By the right that every man has to protect a woman when she is in trouble!" Accent to be placed upon the words in italics.

Not a bad example. Curly-haired hero rushing to defense of girl in danger—never failed yet.

Cinderella in rags in the first act and seated on a throne in the fourth act—absolutely standardized hokum but it gets to the public.

When the human thrush who is running for office tells of a deep affection for his fellow citizens—that's hokum, but how they eat it up!

Hokum is the alphabet of our most worthy emotions. It cannot be abolished. We couldn't keep house without it.

Two of the GREATEST WOMEN WRITERS

This is

CYNTHIA STOCKLEY

who opens the Gate of Romance in her powerful stories of South Africa

FRANK NORRIS said: "There are only three big cities in the United States that are 'story cities'—New York, of course, New Orleans, and, best of the lot, San Francisco."

O. HENRY disproved the statement in "A Municipal Report."

FANNIE HURST disproves it again in "The Brinkerhoff Brothers," which begins on page 74.

And this is FANNIE HURST
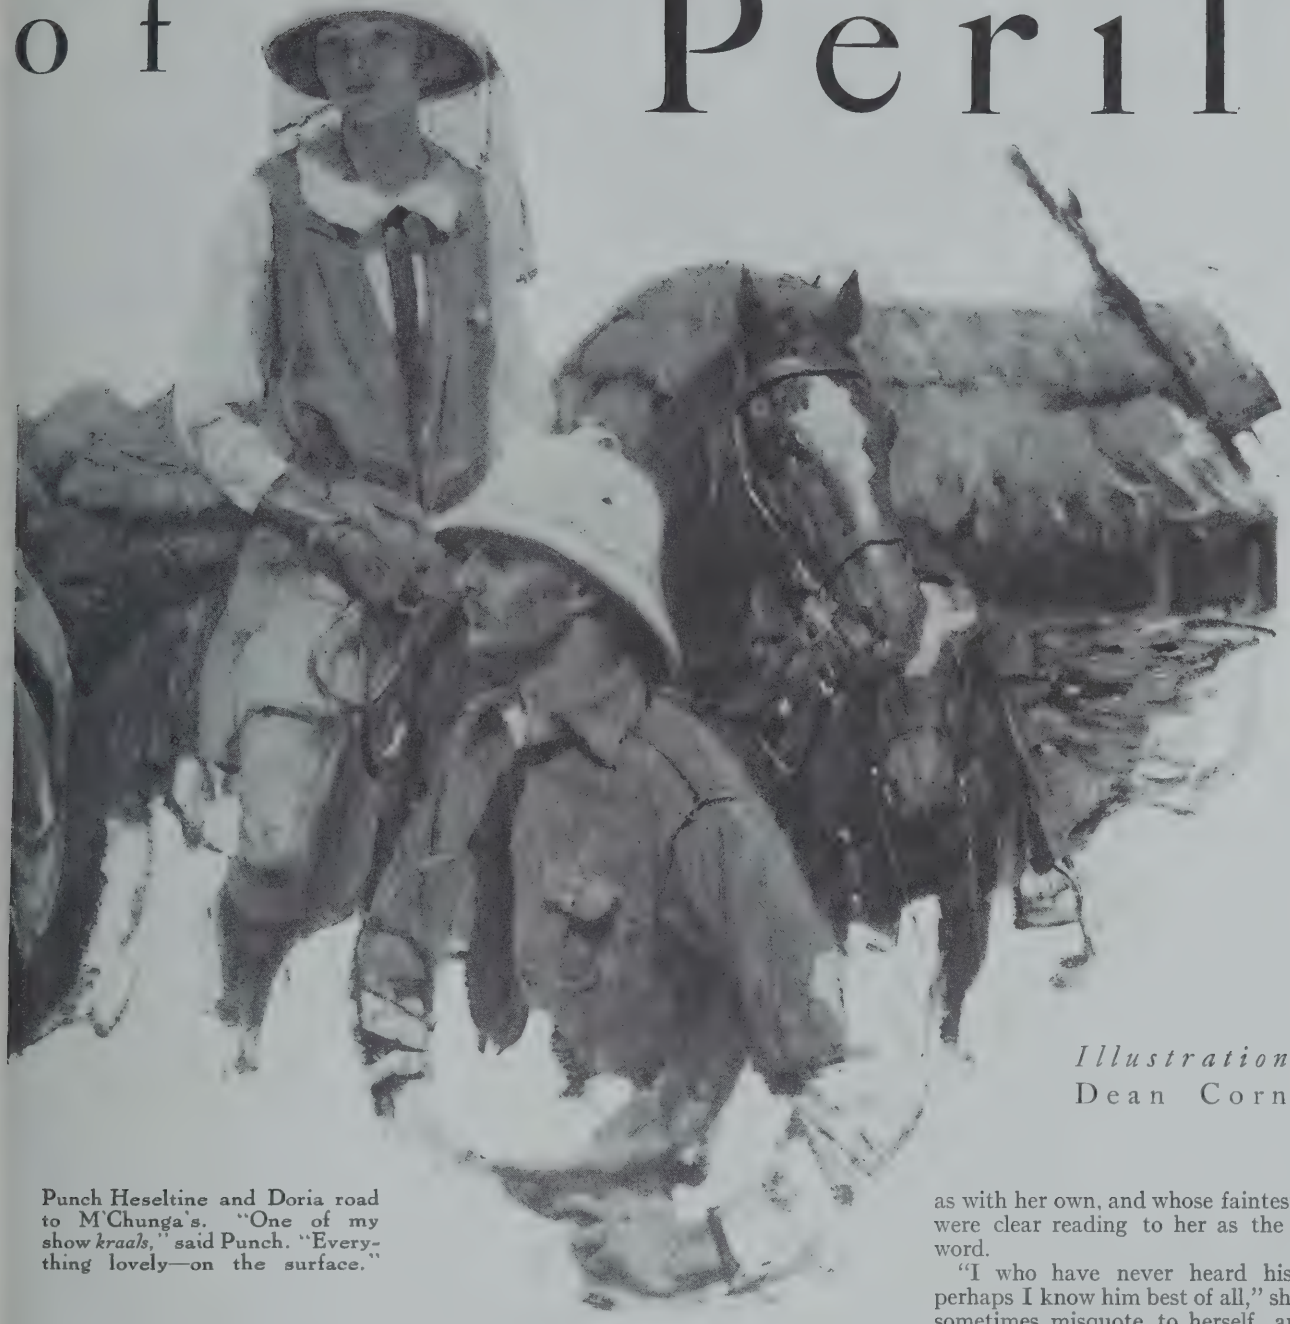
who was born and raised in St. Louis and makes that city as interesting a story background as Charles Dickens did London

A New Novel by CYNTHIA

The Garden

THOUGH Peril Kelly had been born a child of Rhodesia there was more of the fine Italian than of the frank colonial in her composition. Her father a scapegrace Mounted Policeman, dead sooner than strictly necessary because his malaria-overladen veins could not last the pace, left her no inheritance of Celtic rashness; nor, it seemed, had Perilla Kelly, that lovely Italian creature, dead too of the pace, bequeathed to her only child the torment of her noontide temperament. Passing strange that the sole issue of that tempestuous union should be calm and tranquil as a gardenia opening in the moonlight!



The garden in fact seemed to be Peril's most natural setting, and there she was chiefly found, though sometimes she worked with her uncle in his laboratory, spending long fascinated hours over glass tubes and Bunsen burners, sorting, classifying and testing the herbal plants for which he had a passion. Doctor Kelly's homeopathic potions were almost as renowned as his sound knowledge of modern surgery; but the one was his business, the other only his hobby.

Bruce Kelly had been a widower for many years, and his brother's orphan girl composed his entire family, except for Valpy, a capable St. Helena woman who ran the household on oiled wheels. So that few people in Rhodesia enjoyed a smoother existence than he and Peril in the house known as The Hill above the township of Umtété.

The Doctor had planned and planted his garden much about the same time as his niece was being planned and planted to fulfill her destiny in it, that is to say some twenty years before, and his foresight was now repaid. For, if you take clumps of blackthorn, mimosa, teak, euphorbia, and other fantastically branched and flowering veldt trees, pen them in with English roses, scented thymes, larkspurs, hollyhocks, lavender bushes and masses of mignonette, above a world's view of rolling kopje-country and a horizon of Mediterranean blue, you will have all the elements of enchantment at your daily disposal. The Doctor however, being a busy man, had little time for more than brief

STOCKLEY of Peril

AUTHOR OF "PONJOLA"

Illustrations by Dean Cornwell

Punch Heseltine and Doria road to M'Chunga's. "One of my show kraals," said Punch. "Everything lovely—on the surface."

tender glances at his paradise as he came and went; it was Peril who tasted its magic to the full.

Her favorite spot was a rocky terrace, leaf-screened and projecting from the hillside. Here at a rustic table she accomplished all the fine sewing of the household, or swayed in a hammock, nursing her bush baby—a strange little creature of the wilds, half monkey and half squirrel—or just sat in trance-like silence, elbows on table, gazing unseen at those who passed on the road within a few yards of her. Along that broad highway went most people of Umtété at some time or another, either in brazen sunshine, by the light of the moon, or in darkness lighted only by the red glow from the Doctor's lamp hung over the gate; and all unknown to them, behind the feathery veils of red pepper and jasmine, a girl mused upon these transient faces, studying their expressions of anger, amusement, sometimes of despair, with a pair of eyes golden and searching as an eagle's.

Steeped in the solitude of her garden and aloof from the world, she was by no means personally acquainted with all who passed. Indeed, she scarcely knew the names of half. Nevertheless, there were faces with which she had come to be almost as familiar as with her own, and whose faintest shades were clear reading to her as the printed word.

"I who have never heard his name, perhaps I know him best of all," she would sometimes misquote to herself, and then she was thinking of Punch Heseltine's gay eyes set in sunburnt surroundings, and the careless smile he kept for all the world. But she knew of another face that Mounted Policeman wore when he rode alone . . . a face with the gaiety and the dégagé smile dropped from it and a dark melancholy set about the lips.

He knew nothing of Peril, of course. Few people did. She had come back so quietly from her years of education abroad and disappeared so unobtrusively into the Doctor's garden that her advent was scarcely remarked. Modern Rhodesia has passed the stage when newcomers were heralded by the blare of a coach horn and everyone turned out to welcome them. Nowadays every town has its daily trains from the coast, its private cars to meet arrivals, its shoals of tourists and transitory visitors. Life has widened out, and yet become more reserved. You are no longer obliged to dwell in the pocket of your neighbor, nor suffer him in yours. Neither need you share the secrets of your soul, and your commissariat, with your fellow townsman because of the uselessness of trying to hide them from him. Rhodesia is still Rhodesia, of course, and existence there continues to maintain itself upon a peculiarly intimate plane; but it is not the family party of "the dear old early days." Even, it is possible for an inhabitant to withdraw into the utter seclusion of a hermit's life if so oddly constituted as to prefer it.

Doctor Bruce Kelly

Wherefore Peril found nothing to prevent her from following the even tenor of her ways. No one broke in upon her delicious reveries and solitudes, or interfered with her pastime of studying known and unknown faces. And if perhaps her tastes in this seem unusual, let it be admitted at once that her education in Italian convents had been unusual, and not inclusive of such accomplishments as tennis and dancing. These being the chief occupations of the younger portion of Umtété's population, it is understandable that socially she might have been a little out of the running; but as it happened this was entirely to her taste. As for the Doctor: wrapped in his own pursuits, it suited him very well that his niece should be the type of girl content with books and flowers and a secret world of her own.

So Peril sat daily on her terrace, with Umtété slumbering in the sunshine below, the Police Camp perched upon another hill to the right, and away to the left that scattered picturesque suburb of bungalows known as the Marshways. This afternoon she had witnessed, as many times before, the passing of Punch Heseltine from Camp to Marshways, and half an hour later his return, with Mrs. Pam Heseltine, his cousin's wife, riding beside him.

Pam Heseltine was a sick man; and one never likely to get astride of a horse again; but his wife had an ideal seat, habited herself to perfection, and from behind a fantastic sort of yashmak made of mist-blue chiffon and worn to preserve her skin, she sparkled like a jewel.

"Very well," Punch Heseltine was saying, "after tea at the Camp I'll take you on to M'Chunga's. It's one of my show kraals. Every nigger pays his tax regularly, never gets drunk and never splits his brother's skull. Everything at M'Chunga's is lovely—on the surface at any rate."

"Only on the surface?" Doria Heseltine's silver notes floated up and hung in the pepper branches.

"Nothing is what it seems," the man laughed ironically. " 'There are no fields of amaranth on this side of the grave.' "

"What a pretty quotation!" flung Doria carelessly, and they passed on.

But the girl sitting in the garden produced from a memory never inconstant to beautiful words that which Punch Heseltine's companion could not have known—the context of Landor's exquisite phrase:

"There are no fields of amaranth on this side of the grave: there are no voices, O Rhodopé, that are not soon mute, however tuneful: there is no name, with whatever emphasis of passionate love repeated, of which the echo is not faint at last."

She was still pondering this melancholy magic when the Doctor's voice sounded from the garden.

"Peril! I'm going to the Marshways. Coming too?"

"Yes—coming, Uncle Bruce." She pulled a shady hat down on to a head that shimmered sherry-brown in the sunshine, and sped after him, catching up to him at the little gate they used for their private path to Minto Lodge.

"I fancy Heseltine will be alone this afternoon," said the Doctor as she slid an arm through his, "and perhaps it will cheer him up if you stay and talk a bit, when I go on to the hospital. What do you think?"

"Of course, I'm always so sorry for him. O Uncle Bruce! Do you think you'll be able to help him?"

"It's late in the day," said the Doctor dryly. He was baldish, stoutish, reddish, with the vague manners of a profound thinker, and a pin-spot of piercing penetration in each gray eye. "He's paying the bill for the past, as we all have to do sometime."

They were entering the lodge gate when he added musingly: "But I'm trying a new injection on him. It may do some good. Make yourself scarce for ten minutes, child."

Poor Pam Heseltine! Being one of those people who could not be kept in bed, they found him propped in his wheel chair on the veranda, with Keable, his wife's maid, sewing near at hand.

He looked like some wild hawkish bird that had been winged and chained to a post, and that he had done the winging himself did not make your pity any the less for that gaunt shambling frame of bones and nerves, that dark racked face. A neurasthenic wreck, drinking too much, for he could no longer exist without drink, and getting no more than one hour's sleep in the twenty-four without the help of drugs. Odd that with it all he had a look of courage, and the same gay eyes as his cousin Punch.

"Ah! There you are, Doc!" he croaked cheerily. "And brought my specialist with you, I see!"

Peril smiled at that, and took his wasted hand.

"I've come to sit with you for a little, when Uncle has gone—if I may?"

"Rather! . . . I wish you'd come oftener. Get tea, please, Keable. Sit down, everybody."

The Doctor seated himself and took out a surgical case and two little bottles. Peril, murmuring that she would help Keable get tea, followed the maid indoors.

The Heseltines were among the few people in Umtété she knew well. That had come to pass because the ship which brought her back to her native land had carried them also, in a last despairing search of health for Pam Heseltine. It was the despair, combined with the subtle look of courage, stamped upon the ravaged but still handsome features, that had drawn the shy girl out of herself and into a certain deck-usefulness to the sick man. And when they found they were bound for the same little spot on the map it made a further cause for friendliness. Heseltine's point of interest at Umtété being the presence there of his cousin, who was in command of the Mounted Police.

"I want to see old Punch again before I go west. Perhaps you know him, Miss Kelly? 'A bold bad man, and a desperado' as they sing at the Eccentric's, but good to look at and very companionable."

No—Peril did not know him, having been away from Rhodesia since her childhood. She explained this to Pam, and also, gravely, that she had never met a bad man, at which he seemed grimly amused.

Most things moved him to a sardonic amusement, including his wife when she gently declined to be installed with him in the big state cabin, on the grounds that it would be neither wise of her to share a sick man's atmosphere nor good for him if she should "crock up" and have to leave him to the care of hirelings. That made him laugh like the dickens. Nevertheless the element of bitterness was always absent from the laughter he directed at his wife. He seemed to think, with the rest of the world, that nothing unpleasant or inconvenient should touch that lovely personage.

"Gad," said Heseltine to Peril, "if the Doctor can only keep me going long enough."

The ship's doctor being entirely in accord with this opinion, accommodation for Mrs. Heseltine had been sought for and, in spite of a full ship, found elsewhere. That was how Peril had come to know Doria Heseltine so well. Too well. For it was Peril's cabin that had been invaded, and Peril's good nature that had made invasion possible; yet, the arrangement once concluded, you'd have thought Peril herself to be the intruder, for no one could have been more unwelcome within the precincts of that sacred grove devoted to the cult of beauty.

From the first, and without any time lost in discussion, all the girl's possessions had been gently but firmly pushed from drawer and peg to make room for Mrs. Heseltine's. Then every morning found her departure impatiently awaited, and every evening, whether she liked it or not, the cabin door was locked against her for a couple of hours. However, there were times of sea stress when even selfishness had not the power to oust the girl from her berth; and then indeed she had seen what she had seen, and heard what she had heard.

It was a perfect revelation to the unworldly girl of a perfected worldly egotism. With youthful extravagance she had at first gone down in adoration before that softly curved and tinted face and sweet, inquiring gaze of periwinkle-blue; the lovely little yellow head, cropped and curled like a Florentine page's; the gracefully luxuriante form always swathed in tender blues and greens that threw up her fairness dazzlingly. But adoration faded, changing into amazement that those childlike eyes could turn to stone, the delicious red lips form a thin scornful channel for cutting and contemptuous remarks, and always for reasons that seemed to Peril utterly trivial; because, for instance, Keable had been late for the hour of massage, or given the goldy locks a twinge in curling, or left some pot of precious face cream where unsympathetic eyes might spy it.

Keable, it is true, bore these things with equanimity; though her patience might have been more admirable if not counteracted by a habit of gossip behind her mistress's back. As it was, other maids, and all the ship's stewardesses, knew of the "daily layer to be worked off" from Mrs. Heseltine's exquisite figure, and of the little slices of raw steak dipped in hazel extract laid nightly upon a delicate throat and cheek.

"At her age they put on a fresh layer every day, and if it isn't worked off every night, well—good by beauty! You see, she will be m'lady some day, and she means to dazzle them when she is—to spring forth like a crocus out of the earth, all fresh and new." Thus Keable, who was not without a certain gift of imagery.

"She shouldn't go to Africa if that's her plan," a stewardess succinctly retorted. Which expression of opinion, being duly separated from its context, was repeated to her mistress by Keable, never reluctant to bring pain to those lovely eyes.

"What did she mean?" breathed Doria fearfully. "The country's civilized, isn't it?"

"Oh yes, madame, in a way! But the heat is very shriveling, I understand. And the water hard. No electricity in most of the Rhodesian private houses—they're more like huts than Punch's eyes still held the dazzle of Doria Heseltine, but that did not prevent him from receiving an impression, as he was introduced to Peril, of something exquisitely composed of light and darkness, something clear and pure . . . like white flowers in the cool gloom of water.

houses, it seems—and I shan't be able to give you your electric baths, nor use the massage machine."

"You'll have to manage somehow." The hard look came into Doria's eyes, and Keable realized she was in for it. Not for nothing had Mrs. Heseltine paid heavy fees for her maid to take a course of Swedish massage. Keable's fate would be to do an imitation of electricity.

"And you'll have to make me sort of yashmaks of blue crepe de Chine, Keable, to wear out of doors. I won't have my skin ruined! Bring me my dispatch case. I'll write at once to Melisande about water softeners, and for a larger supply of her tropic cream."

A lovely woman on the wane, who has never cared for any but material things, is in a sorry plight. It is pitiful to see her putting up a daily fight with Time, that implacable witch who pulls apart Nature's fairest constructions and treads relentlessly "the loveliest and the best" of us back into the dust from which we sprang.

Thus it was with Doria Heseltine, eaten up by worldly ambition and cherishing her beauty as the weapon wherewith to gain her ends. Time and the encroachment of flesh were her bitter enemies, but she fought them like a tiger. Idolizing the exquisite shape of her body, she suffered torments at the pinching, pounding, pummeling, hands of Keable, to keep it. For the worst of those luxuriante women is that they don't know where to stop "putting it on," as Keable expressed it. There comes a time when the fine line of demarcation between delicate sveltesse and a fatal opulosity may be overstepped, and the beauty wakes up one terrible morning to find herself—stout!

Doria had long resolved that with her this thing should never be. It was absolutely essential to her type of beauty to stay young and slender. That Greuze-like gaze, that bobbed gold head, that silvery laugh, all appertained to a state of entrancing youth; on middle age they would seem out of place, fantastic; almost they might be absurd. Wherefore unceasingly she cried within herself:

A hurricane of sensation and emotion began presently to sweep and pierce him and then

"I won't get heavy! I won't lose my beauty!"

She was a fighter all right. Peril had never quite understood exactly what it was that she was fighting and why. But some facts transpired this afternoon that made things a little clearer.

After the Doctor had gone the girl poured out tea for Heseltine and could not help noticing how much brighter he seemed already for his treatment. Actually he began to talk about getting out a car from home—a matter of several months—and, as he didn't usually look ahead for more than ten days at a time, this was rather remarkable.

"I believe one can get a decent one out for something under three hundred. And Doria would like it too. She says she gets so sunburnt on horseback."

"She looks beautiful riding," said Peril with natural generosity. "I saw them pass this afternoon."

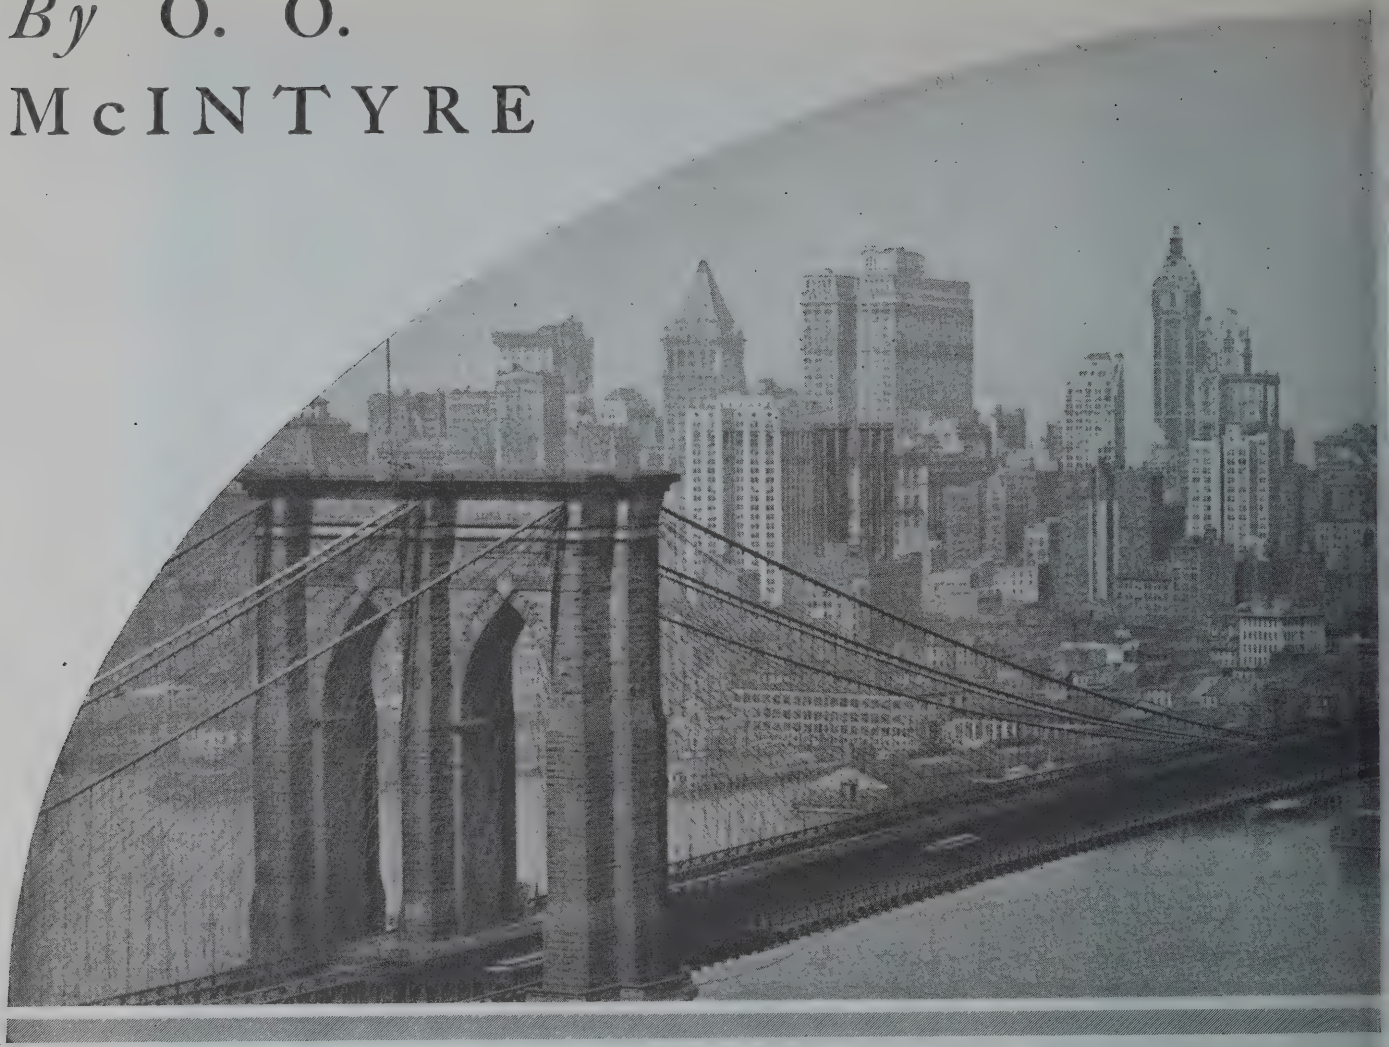
Punch felt a cooling peace, winging out of space and nesting in the fastness of his heart.

"She can sit a horse, can't she? And Punch has a couple of decent hacks—wouldn't be a Heseltine if he hadn't! But"—his voice grew warmer—"how I'd like her to have a chance at some of the Scawnshane horses. However——"

"Scawnshane? Is that your home?"

"Yes—the old place. Gad! if the Doctor can only keep me going long enough! It would be rough on her to just miss by a few months everything she hankers for—wouldn't it?"

Peril contemplated him with uncomprehending gaze.



"How could she miss it?"

"Well—I'm the heir of course, but supposin' I peg it before my uncle, old Lord Kenchester, the title and estates will go to my young brother Dick."

"I see."

"That's all right, of course. Dick's a fine youngster and will carry on with far more credit than ever (Continued on page 168)

By O. O. McINTYRE

© EWING GALLOWAY

When I'm BROKE Take Me

ROCK-RIBBED Manhattan—the Isle of Ice! Volumes have been written of its glacial front. From the cañons of Wall Street to the rise of Coogan's Bluff it is dubbed "the hard-boiled town," a friendless camp where no one knows his neighbor.

Poets sing of its haughty manner and superior smugness—a peacock, vain, strutting and forever preening its wings.

And yet——

Near gleaming Columbus Circle a member of the scarlet sisterhood sank to the curb. Lips that nightly framed the illicit question were seared by acid.

A surging crowd! An ambulance! And at the hospital it was found a sheaf of bills was clutched in one of her hands and a woman's jeweled bracelet in the other. It was the hurrying tribute of bystanders to a soul-sick stranger.

Not so many years ago a gifted writer battered his way to the portals of success—and pneumonia ended his career before he could enter. There was a penniless widow.

In the old Fifth Avenue hotel a magazine editor and a well known writer discussed the unhappy situation. They determined to tap Manhattan's generosity and wandered northward.

They accosted this acquaintance and that with the same story. A talented man who was nameless had died and funds were needed for the deserving widow. When they reached Forty-fourth Street several hundred dollars had been collected. No giver asked a question and not a single person refused.

And again——

In mid-afternoon she sits erect and stately—like an empress—as her horse-drawn four-wheeler rolls up Fifth Avenue. Around her is a Paisley shawl and over her head a tiny black parasol

The old driver in his faded plum-colored suit of a decade ago holds the lines. It is an anachronistic note in a motor age—and the old lady does not know that the venerable coachman is paying the bills from years of self-denial.

The Gondorfs, shrewdest of confidence men, did not fly their piratical flag in Big Pump, Nebraska. They operated in the marble magnificence of what was once the finest hotel at the corner of Forty-second Street and Broadway. From sophisticated New Yorkers they gathered their million.

Cynical, suspicious Broadway! An actress whose husband was arrested on a serious charge feverishly sought bail.

At a midnight show where she was forced to appear following a day of failure she passed a ringside table where sat a well known gambler. He whispered a message to her.

After the show she met him and he placed $70,000 in Liberty Bonds in her hands without the scratch of a pen. She had never seen him before. "You're a game kid and need help," he said with phlegmatic terseness.

Nellie Revell and the late William Raymond Sill were Broadway press agents. Both were stricken with long illnesses. Stony-hearted Broadway provided a private room in a New York hospital for Miss Revell to fight her courageous battle for health. Every comfort is hers.

And to Mr. Sill were given funds to purchase a Long Island inn where he spent his declining days in peace.

Each, in the Broadway vernacular, was a "good fellow"—and must not suffer.

Earl Carroll, a successful song writer, went broke producing plays. One year after he had stood penniless on a Broadway corner a theater bearing his name was opened on one of the finest Rialto locations—a monument to Broadway's faith in a courageous young man who ten years before was a theater usher in Pittsburg.

The truth is that no place is there a warmer and more generous pulsebeat than along the wickedest street in America.

Broadway scoffs the ordinary cadger and spinner of hard luck tales, but when adversity comes rushes to the rescue. No theatrical season is complete without half a dozen "benefits" to provide funds for those who have gone down in the battle of life.

Back to Old BROADWAY

And many of these benefit performances are recruited from the ranks of the jobless. There is sane philosophy in the vagrant ditty "When I'm Broke, Take Me Back to Old Broadway."

New York is the beggar's paradise. Penury indeed brings plenty on the streets of the metropolis. Any number of professional beggars ride in automobiles after "office hours."

Fifth Avenue's signless austerity seems coldly aloof to the stranger. The glittering shops strike an awesome note. It is a "high-hatting" street of suffocating grandeur and the last in the world where the ordinary mortal would ask for credit.

Yet nowhere is credit so easy. It is axiomatic that "the Avenue" assumes everyone to be honest until he is proved to be otherwise—reversing the popular conception. It was Paper Collar Joe who said: "Give me a fur coat, a silk hat and a gold headed cane and I'll live on Fifth Avenue credit for years in plenty."

O. Henry's Bagdad on the Subway is quick to forgive its erring sons and daughters. If they are caught in the whirlpool of Broadway's furious waters and come to the top again, they are welcomed with the loud huzza.

In a peaceful Connecticut village resides a young woman, still in her thirties. Very few who see her today, sitting quietly at the opera or the play, would realize that only a few years ago she made a sudden detour in the rush to Hell.

It was the ancient story along the Phosphorescent Path—youth, beauty and joyous health, the triple combination upon which Broadway feeds. First the cocktail. Then champagne and wild nights of revelry along the blazing trail.

In the end—a twitching, hollow-eyed wreck. Cocaine. But she came back! Her regeneration was complete and today she is Broadway's "Little White Sister"—to whom the bruised and beaten go for comfort. She is beloved, respected and admired. Her past is a Broadway symbol of hope. What other street could so elevate its fallen?

New York is merciful in its immensity. Consider its army of shabby genteel. It bivouacs in the attics of the fading brownstone fronts. Here are men trained in the universities of the world who have nothing left but frozen dreams. Life has passed them by. They are not the victims of drink or the mésalliance—merely unexplained failures, who eke out a living canvassing.

To them are offered free the things they love most—the finest art galleries, museums and libraries; and for a pittance they may hear the inspiring arias of grand opera. To be "broke" in any other city would be calamitous, but in Manhattan they find a certain peace and content.

"Blind George" for years hawked newspapers in front of the Herald building in Herald Square. One morning he tapped his sluggish way to work. His little hutch was gone. The Herald building had been sold and wreckers were dismantling it.

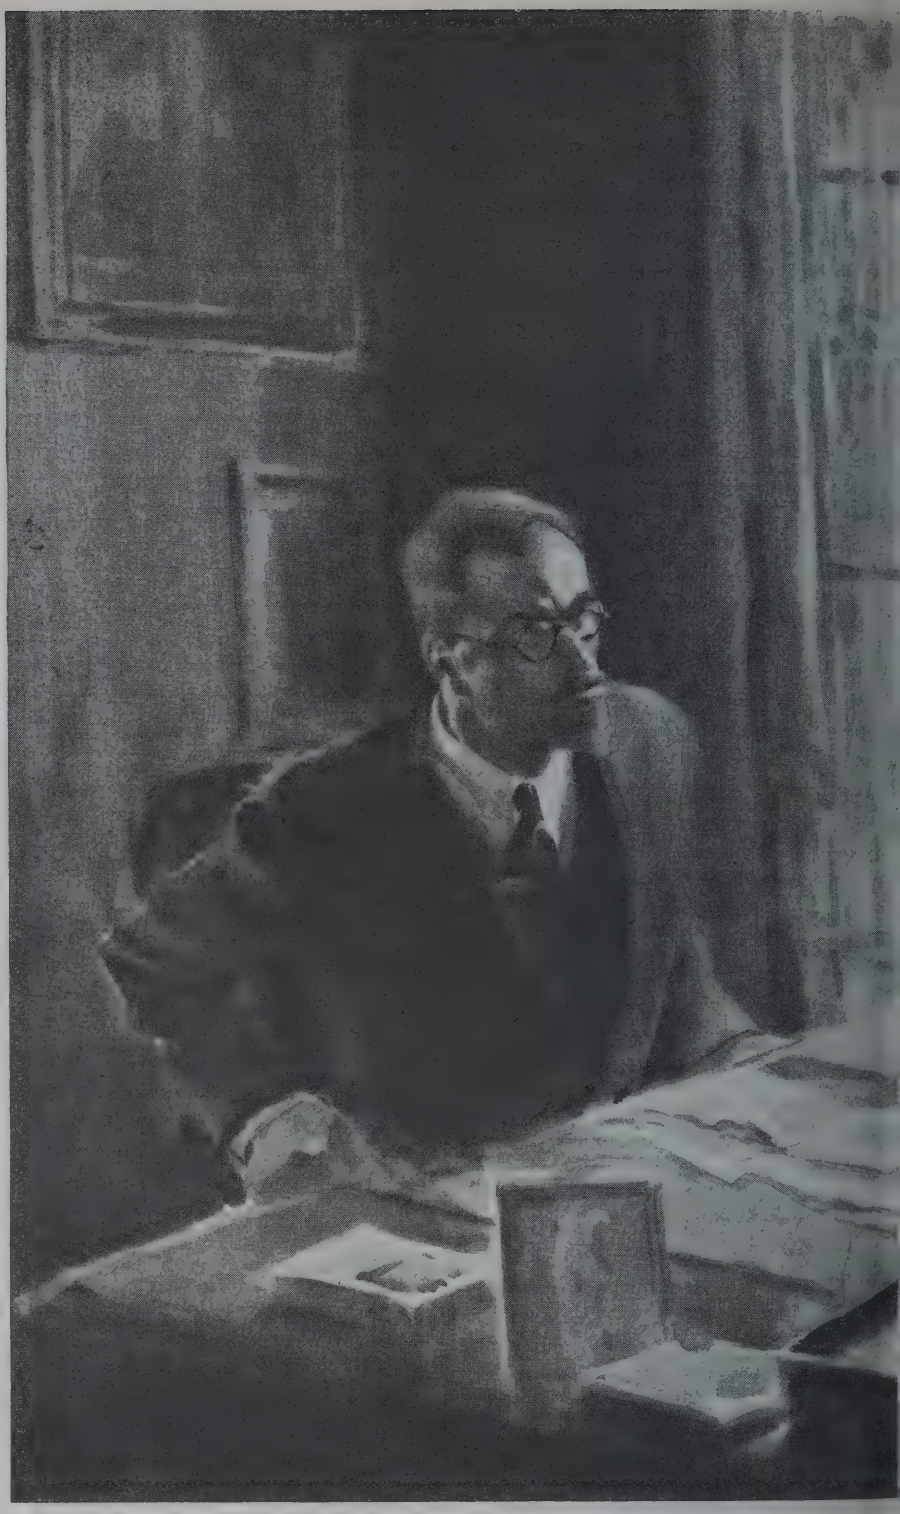
News of his adversity spread quickly northward and the next day Blind George was installed in a new stand with a purse of gold to boot at the Forty-second Street corner of Bryant Park—a gift from Broadwayites who had heard of his plight.

The late and deservedly beloved Frank Bacon did not reach his goal—Broadway—until his hair was whitened by the snows of many winters. He was marooned in the "sticks"—the dreary round of one night stands.

But he came, saw and conquered; and when, after a three years and a day stay at the end of the rainbow, he left, Broadway turned out en masse with a parade the like of which the metropolis had never seen before. Bacon, who had believed Broadway's heart as tough as steel, found it soft as putty.

There are more men living by their wits on Broadway than on any other given area in the world.

They know the truth and that truth is that behind Broadway's mask of sophistication is the naïve country bumpkin.



For after all, we of Broadway are merely gilded clods from Painted Post, Nevada, Gallipolis, Ohio, and Sandpit, Iowa.

IRVIN S. COBB

this Month Tells the Story of

The Eminent DR. Deeves

Illustrations by John Alonzo Williams.

"This is the only time," said Doctor Deeves, "you hav

THE eminent Doctor Deeves lived in a cottage which fitted into an indent in the high wall of rough field stones that bounded the grounds of his sanitarium on all four of its sides. The front breadth of this wall was the first thing, nearly always, to take the eye of a traveler turning out of the main county turnpike into the quieter byway that led northward past the establishment. It rose up straight and blank and it stretched away for a formidable run of four hundred feet. No gate or gap broke into it; the entrance, which opened on a graveled drive that skirted the east face of the enclosure, was entirely out of sight from the public road. It suggested seclusion and aloofness, which were the intents; and it made a mystery of what might lie back of it, and that was inevitable, and yet perhaps, on the part of its proprietor, not altogether undesirable.

This sanitarium, as it was called in deference to certain popular prejudices, was a place for the confinement and the care of persons suffering from mental and nervous disorders. It was a private asylum, or as those might say who favored the crueler old English name, a madhouse.

First, the approaching stranger would see the wall, then, coming nearer and alongside, would be aware of a massing of trees behind the barrier and, from one point where the road humped itself over a slight elevation in the earth, he could see—if he continued to look that way—the upper floors of some large buildings, like barracks or dormitories, rising in the middle distance. He must pass on several rods farther before he caught sight of the doctor's cottage where it snuggled into its jog o recess. At the back, the wall was joined to it, so that its rea elevation formed a proper part of the boundary.

It was rather a gay and jaunty little house, with a mottled slat roof on it to relieve the gray of its masonry construction, and wit many windows looking out on the flower beds and the narrow strip of lawn which made the approach for it. The passer-by felt that the architect had done well to invest this dwelling wit the look of a home, seeing that always it must contend for it cheerfulness against the frowning dominance of that long tal wall, springing away from it on the right flank and the left But in the summer, awnings and vines and porch furnitur helped to give it brightness. Also, frequently visible, there wa a child.

At least, in times gone by there had been a child. Docto Deeves was a widower with one child, a daughter. At the tim this account properly begins, though, she had grown out of child hood into girlhood. Doctor Deeves's wife was dead when h gave up practice in the city to move out here, three miles fron fered to interfere in the management of my institution. I hope it may continue to be the only time."

e small town of Amitydale, and set up this now famous insti-tion of his.

The daughter's name was Hazel Deeves and at eighteen she as pretty, in a subdued, quiet sort of way. If we bar the rvants and a governess she had for a while as a little thing, fore Doctor Deeves himself took over the undertaking of her lucation, and, after that, a housekeeper who served until the tle mistress was old enough to assume the domestic duties, ese two—the distinguished specialist and the young girl—ere the only regular residents that the house in the shadow of e sanitarium walls had ever sheltered. So far back as her emory went it was the one home she always had known; she as a baby on a pillow when her father brought her from the East.

Back there in the East he had been distinguished as an alienist. ow he preferred to be known as a psychiatrist, which to one rsed in the shadings of meaning conveyed by the phraseology his calling marked a change in the doctor's scientific estate. o the layman the titles might be interchangeable; inside the ofession there was a subtle distinction between them. Once upon a time his learned opinions, given in court under the head of expert testimony, had broken more than one will, had saved more than one insane murderer from the chair and had sent more than one sane malingerer to it. Now, in these latter days, his reputation more largely rested upon his diagnostic talents and upon his system of treatment—which sometimes worked cures—for unfortunate humans whose brains had gone awry.

To him the work he was doing was of such tremendous importance that he had neither time nor patience for anything else. It held him, to the exclusion of practically all lesser interests. Excepting when he dealt with his own business he had about him an air of supreme absorption, as though his thoughts were too precious for exposure to the common currents of discussion. He had no small talk for a company. Also he had about him the cocksureness which so frequently accompanies preeminence in a brilliant man's affairs. You couldn't tell Doctor Deeves anything, because if you agreed with his conclusions that merely was to him added evidence—not that he needed it—to demonstrate that he was right, and if you disagreed with him, why, that then was proof of either your blindness or your stupidity; so, in either event, what you had to say was of no consequence.

Make a mental picture of an arrogant, quick-gaited, generally silent man, with double-lensed glasses riding his nose and with a short harsh beard bristling forth from a stubborn chin and accenting rather than cloaking the clamped and dogmatic set of his lips, and for the purposes of this narrative you have a sufficiently full likeness of the eminent Doctor Deeves. See him once and you would know him again anywhere.

By all outward favors, his daughter was of another cast. She must have taken after her mother; certainly she seemed in no visible way to follow the parental mold. She was a gentle, almost a timid little thing, self-effacing, docile by nature, and in her temperament borrowing a protective coloration from objects about her. It was a strange life she led at eighteen, but no stranger than the life she always had led. Mad people had been her comrades from the hour she reached the age when comradeship began to mean something to her. She had no fear of them, and no distrust. They were, to her, as matter-of-fact as normal playfellows would be to a child brought up in different surroundings.

Her little world, the one she knew the best and loved the best, lay back of the cottage, on the sanitarium's shut-in acres. To the uninformed, viewing the place from without, it conveyed with its walls the impression of being jail-like, so built and so ordered as to insure that its inmates would be safely held. She could not recall a time when her understanding of the meaning of the boundary had not been a better one. It was set there as a bar against morbid curiosity; its intent was to save those who dwelt within it from prying eyes and mischievous annoyances. It was not their prison wall but a wall of protection for them. Shielded by it, they followed their pursuits and devices, which were many.

The housing of demented folk has gone a long way along the road of compassion and sympathy since the times of Bedlam with its iron chains for the limbs of the insane and its rods for the scourging of their poor backs.

If there are strait-jackets and padded cells and detention harnesses in the modern asylum, the casual visitor does not see them. He sees no maniacs mewing at barred windows. Workshops and reading rooms and rest rooms; singing birds in cages and flowers in pots; comfortably furnished rooms and wards; broad wide sunlit corridors; some times isolated cottages whose doors are not locked; pleasant walks winding along under shade trees and across wide smooth stretches of lawns; tennis courts and ornamental gardens—these are what he sees. Excepting for the look out of the eyes of some who live there and except for the gait of some of them—the legs lifted high at each step and then the feet thrown forward with a jerk—it is possible that in his visit he will see or hear scarcely a thing to suggest that these men and these women, here concerned with their various occupations and diversions, are in any wise abnormal.

This, then, was the sort of place the child, Hazel Deeves, grew up in. Her father's sanitarium was an expensive one. Only those unfortunates whose people might afford to pay well for their keep were sent to him, and only the most scientific, the most merciful and the most advanced methods were here employed. Music, sports, healthful employments, were provided; in the surroundings was all possible beauty and comeliness.

So the child's world was a world of flowers and trees and green grass, and for playmates she mainly had those who in age were adults but who, because of their infirmity, were in thought and habit children. There was a woman who played at dolls with her—a woman whose mind had stopped growing when she was twelve years old. There was an old man with a white beard and a soft brogue in his voice; he took her with him to far corners of the grounds on a search for a little man in a red jacket with a green feather in his hat, who worked magic. He was quite as sure as she was—surer even—that sooner or later they would find this little man.

Another of her favorite companions was also an old gentleman, one with chubby pink cheeks and a benevolent manner. He gave her advice for the fashioning of mud pies and the building of sand fortresses, but no actual help in their construction. For this there was a reason.

Seen at a distance, he appeared to have both his hands thrust into a curious sort of leather muff, rather like an overgrown roll for carrying sheet music. On drawing nearer one would discover that his wrists were strapped fast inside the device and that a light steel chain which threaded through a steel ring in his muff was fastened behind his back with a special lock.

Among all the patients who had run of the outdoor spaces this old man alone wore bonds. He had a passion for plucking the hair out of other persons' heads; otherwise he was quite rational. He was very vain of his leather wristlets and his waist chain. The inconvenience of wearing them was balanced off by the distinction they gave him. He was most happy and cheerful, though, when he was with or near the little girl. She liked him tremendously. He told such splendid fairy tales.

Sometimes in the night, and more especially in a moonlighted night, there came wailing cries from a certain secluded wing of one of the buildings; they went on for hour after hour. In her bed in the cottage the child could hear them as she dropped asleep, but they did not frighten her or give her bad dreams. She knew that when the fit passed the men and women who uttered those sounds would be quite friendly and quiet and that from them she need fear nothing.

Indeed, there were many among the inmates who would have died to protect her. She appreciated this fact, as it were, instinctively. She accepted their vagaries as verities; their delusions fitted in, often enough, with her childish conceptions of causes and effects. Her father made use of their devotion for his little daughter. When all else failed—cajolery or persuasion or disciplinary measures—there were certain patients who could be brought back from the beginnings of violent outbreaks by the threat that Hazel should not be permitted to speak with them or visit them. To Doctor Deeves it seemed perfectly proper that in controlling his more unruly charges he should invoke the power of his daughter's influence.

Nor could he see any possibility of harm coming to her from these associations. In his detached way he loved her as he loved his profession, which meant that he loved her with all his heart. For her he had all possible fatherly pride and devotion. He would have been the first, as often he told himself, to take her entirely away had he sensed peril of whatsoever sort for her in the life she lived. But he could sense none. All his own experiences and all the recorded experiences of authenticated neurologists from the earliest times to these present ones, told him that contact with the insane never had affected adversely the mentality of a sanely minded individual. There were no data to support so fantastic a theory as the contrary of this.

Once his younger sister came on from Baltimore to visit him and she, being a spinster, naturally and inevitably had pronounced notions of her own touching on the rearing of children. She was decidedly afraid of this autocratic brother of hers, but eventually a solicitude for the welfare of her little niece rose above her fearsomeness and led her to remonstrate with him. She did not get very far. The contemptuousness which blazed from his eyes and made two hot little burning glasses of his spectacle lenses silenced her, even before he made answer.

"Henrietta," he bade her, "don't be a fool. Hazel is not lonely. I deny emphatically that she is lonely. Merely because she is thrown so little with other children is no sign that she is lonely. For a child, her life is remarkably full. She never lacks for a playfellow. She gives comfort to these patients and they give company and pleasure to her. According to my best observation and belief, she is happier in their society than when she is with children of her own age. She is never in the slightest danger from any of them. I doubt whether there is a patient here who would offer to injure her. Besides, some one of the staff—a nurse or a man attendant or one of my assistants—is always within sight and hearing and easy reach. What danger could there be?"

"I wasn't thinking of any physical danger, Edgar," said the sister. "But don't you think that such constant intimacy with persons whose minds are deranged may in the long run be bad for her own mind? That's what I was trying to say—what I meant—the mental and the temperamental results—and all."

"Henrietta," he snapped, "again I repeat, don't make a fool of yourself." He bit the words off sharp and hard. "Insanity invariably arises from certain sources—congenital causes, hereditary causes, from disease, from shock sometimes, from grief, from bad habits, from alcoholism, from other things. But it is not contagious. It is not an infection which floats about in the air. All my active life I have been in constant contact with every imaginable phase of insanity. Am I insane? Do you expect me to go insane?

"Bah! Hazel is all right. I only trust that when she grows up her future may be as well safeguarded as her childhood has been. Kindly endeavor to disabuse your mind of these silly fancies which you seem to have entertained concerning my daughter. And, whether or not you succeed in doing that, please do not refer to the matter again to me or to any other erson about these premises. Above all, do not speak to Hazel—I'll have no false notions put in her innocent little head."

Stephen made Hazel believe his story and she, who never before crossed her father, consented to help.

During the remainder of her visit Miss Henrietta Deeves steadfastly heeded the warning. No one else ever so much as dared to suggest to Doctor Deeves that the course he had followed, and still followed, in the bringing up of his daughter might be open to criticism.

So he went on, this earnest, conceited, single-purposed scientist, following his bent and never suspecting, even in his occasional hours of introspection, that in certain respects he was neglecting the child. Such education as she got—and in some respects it was thorough enough—she got from him. Such traveling as she did was done with him and none other, so that at home or abroad she dwelt constantly in the coils of his will and his personality. Frequently, even when she was with him, he was but half aware of her. He might love her dearly but she did not interest him—she was not a case. So she grew up to the edge of her womanhood and was pretty in a pallid, almost a colorless fashion, and at eighteen the enclosure behind the walls still was where she spent the greater part of her time and where she felt the greatest measure of peace and content.

It has taken this much space and this many words to bring

Hazel Deeves forward to within a few weeks of her nineteenth birthday. Until now, her youth had been leisurely, placid, cloistered almost. Within the little mured community where she spent the greater part of her time one uneventful month had followed another without jar or jostle. For her, the place was like one of those quarters in the Orient where the white foreigners bide, knowing little of the races that hive and swarm outside the sheltering compound.

Now, though, came an interruption in the smoothened and isolated currents of her life. The thing may be summed in a sentence or two. She met a young man, five years her senior, by name Stephen Shire; for months they were in daily contact. Without exactly witting it, she fell in love with him. He fell in love with her, too. But on his side there was knowledge of what was happening. Under conditions that were peculiar the affair went forward, ripening with rapidity. The condition was most peculiar, indeed. She was the daughter of the great psychiatrist and he was one of that distinguished gentleman's patients.

One day in the fall of the year this young man, Shire, was brought to Doctor Deeves's sanitarium. He had gone overseas as first lieutenant of a company in a National Guard regiment for service against Germany and had been invalided home, a victim of shell-shock, with nerves pitiably shattered and his body wasted. His state was bad enough when they brought him back to America; and several months in a government hospital did not help him. Indeed, he grew steadily worse; his mind showed signs of weakening.

His nearest of kin was an older brother, who also was co-heir with him to a considerable estate. This brother took certain legal steps in conjunction with certain medical steps and the upshot of these proceedings was that a court, acting in the best of faith, declared the sufferer incompetent to care for himself or to administer his own affairs, and signed an order for his commitment to a suitable place of detention. So he was put into the capable hands of Doctor Deeves.

At the sanitarium, under treatment, he very soon showed signs of betterment. Mentally and physically he improved. But there was no hope, ever, for his complete recovery. Doctor Deeves himself said so, saying it with that finality and that unshakable emphasis which invariably marked his professional judgments. Eliminating the hard words and the long ones which enriched his speech, the situation in this case, as summed up and set forth by Doctor Deeves, left no room for doubt. Here it stood:

By reason of hardships and the strain he had undergone in France, the poor young man's reason irreparably had been overthrown. His malady was progressive and incurable. True, for a while he might show signs of mending—as, indeed, he already had done—and with proper care might at times appear to be quite rational. But one must not be deceived by such seemingly favorable indications; one must be guided by one's knowledge and one's experience; one must separate the prospects for a restoration to bodily health from the mental aspects of the case. Regardless of any temporary rallies, this man was to be accepted as one indubitably and definitely cursed with the seeds of derangement. Sooner or later the quality of his derangement would increase. This, in brief, was Doctor Deeves's pronouncement. It is fair to assume that the decision did not altogether displease the older brother.

There is no telling just when the young ex-lieutenant first began to take an active interest in the girl or when she began to feel for him an emotion deeper than pity. Perhaps to both of them the quickening came at once. It is true that very soon after their first meeting each began to seek and to desire the company of the other. His listlessness would quit him at sight of her, coming along the walk toward where he sat, on fine mild days in the late fall, drawing in strength for his limbs from the sunshine and the air and the peace of outdoors; and his melancholia had quit him almost overnight. Her step would brisken as she neared him. She would read to him, he listening for hours on end, soothed and comforted by the sound of her voice and by the mere fact of her being near him.

For playmates Hazel Deeves mainly had those who in age

In the winter, as he grew stronger, they walked together often. No one seemed to take cognizance of their growing intimacy. It was a part of the routine of the establishment that Miss Deeves should spend a part at least of nearly every day with this patient or that; her presence in the wards or about the grounds was accepted as a matter of course by the attendants. Probably none of them thought to look for romance in such surroundings as these, where the faculty for loving, like all the other faculties, was skewed and out of joint.

were adults but who, in thought and habit, were children.

So then, this was how and why it was that, unsuspected by others and, in a way of speaking, unsuspected by her, the love between these two grew and strengthened itself.

As vigor came back to his limbs and as his nerves untautened, he made her subject him to all possible tests of his sanity. He did this as much for her sake as for his own. Already he had convinced himself that, mentally, he was quite restored to the normal. His job now was to convince her of it. This being done and completely done, he told her his story—all of it.

It was such a story as those who deal with the inmates of an asylum hear often enough; it was such a story as she herself had heard many a time, all the while knowing the wildness of the claim set up by the one telling it. But this time she believed. He made her believe, and, besides, with all her heart she wanted to believe.

Even so, she must draw heavily upon what reserve of resolution she might have before she ventured to approach her father in Shire's behalf. You see, she knew her father much better than she knew herself; she knew that to ask him to consider revising his professional opinion would almost be in the nature of a personal affront to him. Finally, though, she went, frightened inwardly but armed with a sense of the justice of her petition.

He listened without interruption to what she had to say. It was his way when opposed or questioned in his decisions to listen for a bit silently and then suddenly to blast the adversary with one fierce sweeping counter-volley. Successfully the citadel of his conceit never yet had been assaulted; it was impregnable. You cannot, with argument, breach a fortress so built as to be absolutely proof against such ammunition. His daughter was wise enough to attempt no extended argument. She set forth her case, rather, in the form of a claim—a plea for the reconsideration and the reopening of an issue closed.

It was a simple enough thing that she asked. And she started out, bravely enough, to ask it. If, toward the close of her speech, she faltered and stammered and repeated herself it was because he sat there so quietly, with no change of expression, with no softening of the glower of disapproval that had formed on his face at those opening words from her which made clear the motive of her mission.

Doctor Deeves was exceedingly fond of his daughter but not even the daughter of an absolute monarch may altogether be excused for lese majesty to the father who must number his child among the subjects of his empire. Rebellion from those closest to the throne always has been most abhorrent to despots. And Doctor Deeves, with the best intentions in the world, nevertheless and to the contrary notwithstanding, was a despot.

"Are you quite through?" he said, when finally she made an end of what she had come to say. "Very well, then, now kindly give heed to me: This is the only time you have ever offered, directly or indirectly, to interfere in the management of my institution. I hope it may continue to be the only time. If it were any other person on earth than you who presumed in this way upon my stock of forbearance I know what the manner of my response would be. I think you also know what the manner of it would be. But because you are my own child I shall be patient with you. I shall do what I should not do in the case of another—I shall take the time required to show you how utterly wrong you are in coming to me with such a request as this one.

"I see very plainly what has happened. This young man's case has appealed to you; that is only natural. He is young; he has served his country in war; he has his whole life before him. But, my child, you must learn not to let your sympathies run away with your judgment.

"How often, in the course of a year or a month, is the claim set up by some person here—some person whom you know to be a lunatic—that he or she has been railroaded to this place, has been unjustly deprived of freedom on a trumped-up charge of insanity made by designing kinspeople, with selfish or dishonorable or dishonest motives at the back of it all? I hear it said every day; so do you—the commonest delusion of common madmen—and said generally by individuals who at that very moment, by their behavior, their language or their looks, betray the fact that they are hopelessly insane.

"Now then, merely because, in this particular instance, the patient has somehow convinced you that for the moment at least he is seemingly rational, that is no reason to assume that he is the exception to the rule. To me, it merely is added proof of what I have known from the time he was brought here. I studied his case with my usual care; I diagnosed it, I passed on it. In the statement which I made at that time I predicted what would follow. I said that for a time he might, and probably would, show some improvement. But sooner or later he will relapse; there is no other prospect, no other possible contingency. He is here because he belongs here, or in some similar place. This is the sort of place where always he will belong. As I have just said, I gave a verdict in his case when he was brought to me. I pronounced it incurable then. I pronounce it incurable now—absolutely. So, my daughter, let us consider this incident as closed for all time to come."

The belligerent tone in his voice softened somewhat: "Let me look at you, child. Hum, it strikes me you do not look well. You have been losing a little flesh, haven't you? And now that I think of it, it seems to me your appetite has been indifferent lately. I think I shall have to take you with me for a little change of air and scene on the next trip that I make. It will do you good to get away. And in the meantime I insist that you must not brood over things which are out of your control or beyond your understanding—remember, I insist on this." His eye strayed back to the mass of papers and printers' proofs on his desk.

"Well, now then, my dear, I think you'd better be running along. Concern yourself with what falls within your proper scope of activities. Just leave me to manage the professional side of this business. By your gauges I may be getting pretty old, but I'm not quite ready to retire yet awhile." He smiled at his conceit, and in his wiry beard the rows of firm, locked teeth showed like the tight edges of a strung trap.

So she went away from him and that afternoon when nobody was within earshot she told Stephen Shire what she had done and what the result of it had been.

It was early springtime by now, and the cherry tree under which they stood while she made her confession was a glorified bouquet of white blooms. She had acted on her own initiative; the original impulse had been hers without any prompting from him, and all the while her plan was taking shape and her courage hardening for the interview with her father, he had been left in entire ignorance of the design.

He was not disappointed at the outcome; some weeks before he privately had besought Doctor Deeves to submit him to an examination, however rigorous, and the manner of the refusal had convinced him that in this quarter lay no hope for him. Rather, by what he heard now, he was relieved. There was pleasure to him in knowing that he had this gentle little champion and that she had confidence in him and the hardihood to make, in his interests, and singly, the appeal she just had made. The appeal had failed utterly; very well, then, he must move for his deliverance in other directions and by other ways.

He told her, that same afternoon, what he had in mind, making it plain to her that he might need her help; and she, who never before in word or deed had crossed or deceived her father, consented to aid him.

Circumstances ran together to aid the pair of young plotters. Either Doctor Deeves forgot or he postponed his intention of taking his daughter traveling with him.

Anyhow, he was engaged that spring in writing the last chapters of his book, his great authoritative work upon disorders of the brain. Also, a little later on, in June, he would go to one of the leading Eastern universities to receive an honorary degree. Doctor Deeves collected degrees as a stamp collector collects stamps; getting one made him covet more. His vanity exulted in the string of letters he might tail after his name. Just at present his time, which he never wasted, was to him especially precious.

So, taking note somewhat absently that his daughter gained none in flesh and that she seemed paler than common and was abstracted and almost moody, he bought a small car for her and insisted that she learn to run it and that she spend so many hours a day driving about the country.

Only in part, though, did she obey him. She learned to operate the runabout but she shirked the country drives. She would start out alone, but very soon she would come hurrying back. It was as though the wide open spaces daunted her; as though the ability to whiz along quiet lanes and over the smooth-surfaced turnpikes gave her no pleasure. Nevertheless, the fact that now she owned an automobile and was in all respects mistress of it exactly fitted into the scheme which young Shire was devising.

On a day in the latter part of May, just after the noon hour, the two young people ran away together in the swift little car. Before this, though, there had been a deal of conspiring between them.

Under the sanitarium rules, a supervision was exercised over letters written by the patients. Through Hazel Deeves's connivance Stephen Shire evaded the censorship. Secretly he wrote a letter to a man of consequence, a certain Colonel Dougherty, in whose regiment of the A. E. F. he had served, and this letter he smuggled into the girl's hands and she mailed it in the town, supplementing it with one of her own.

Colonel Dougherty's answer, addressed to her, came back promptly. With the evidence of his former lieutenant's own statement before him, every word in it bespeaking a rational and ordered mind, he could not help believing that Shire was the victim of a great and a cruel injustice, and, guided by that belief, he stood ready and willing to offer the protection and the assistance which Shire had asked of him; so the Colonel wrote.

Let Shire make his escape from his confinement, and let him get safely into the state where Colonel Dougherty lived, which would mean out of the jurisdiction and beyond the ordinary legal processes of the state of which the young man was a citizen and in which he had been committed to detention. These things accomplished, Dougherty, for his part, promised to give him asylum under his roof and to furnish such surety as might be required for the orderly behavior of the fugitive and, finally, to invoke the proper authorities, whoever they might be, for an impartial hearing before an impartial tribunal with a view to establishing the present mental competency of his friend.

As Dougherty understood the case, what Shire desired was, first, his liberty and then a chance to prove his sanity. After that, in the Federal courts, he might seek redress against his brother for his denied property rights. The Colonel was no lawyer but he had heard, he said, of similar cases in which this procedure had been followed with success.

Now, Dougherty was a man of influence and consequence; his help would be a tower of strength, as Shire made plain to the girl. There was yet a further fact operating in the prisoner's favor. From the asylum gates to the river which marked the western boundary of the state, the distance was less than twenty miles. Even over indifferent roads an (Continued on page 104)

By FRANK R. ADAMS

of the Happiness Department

The Map Eaters

Illustrations by Charles D. Mitchell

Patsy May

THE CLEGG FOUR stock chassis, stripped of everything weighing an ounce that could possibly be dispensed with, roared through the mountain dawn.

The Crossland Six entry was less than a mile ehind, its motor exhaust spitting red defiance against the vanishıg shadows, and Jim Danger, at the wheel of the tiny Clegg ır, nudged his mechanician and indicated the oil pump. They ad gained a little at La Bojada Grade by taking all of the twenty-:ven reverse S curves on a maximum of two perilous wheels, ıt now on the straightaway down in the valley the pursuing ar was inching nearer. The Clegg was probably the best car ır ground and lofty mountain climbing that was entered in the ıce, and Jim Danger was as good a stunt man as there was in merica. On the better roads, however, the heavier, higher owered machines made the Clegg motor nearly shake itself to ieces in order to hold its own.

Jim Danger was the only pilot who could possibly drag the legg into the money. He had skill plus luck. Whenever he lled over in a Clegg it always seemed to light on its four wheels ıd headed in the right direction. The weak plank in the bridge ıat was waiting to trap a traveler always held up until Jim got :ross and gave way under the next car. The mechanician who ıde with Jim was sure of getting a few more thrills than anyone se in a similar capacity in the race, but he usually escaped with s life.

The roads were too good between Santa Fé and Albuquerque. xcept for the precipice at La Bojada and a few minor climbs ıd descents it was fairly level and, for New Mexico, improved. he last twenty miles into Albuquerque were cement.

The car behind pulled in abreast of the Clegg at the checking ation in front of the Hotel Alvarado. Jim's mechanician exıanged grins with the oil pumper on the Crossland Six. There ould be something doing during the next hundred miles or so.

Jim crowded out ahead on the road to Los Lunas and gave ıe Crossland driver a taste of his dust at close range. The tter hung on stubbornly, though, just about as far behind as he were being towed, and on the stretch from Los Lunas to d Laguna it was all Jim could do to keep his lead. The first considerable stretch of good road would turn the advantage against him.

Then it began to rain and Jim Danger's spirits increased immediately. It looked like a direct intervention of Providence. For Jim was a mud horse and rain on those dusty New Mexican trails meant deep mud in a very short time, deep, slimy and likewise greasy.

The highways of New Mexico are seldom muddy but when they have the slightest opportunity they do go in for it wholeheartedly and with enthusiasm long deferred. Lately the highway department has been crowning the roads, piling the dirt up high in the middle and sloping the sides so that when it is wet and you once begin to slip you may as well say "Hello" to the ditch right away because there's no hope of escaping it.

"Chains?" yelled the mechanician suggestively.

Jim shook his head. "Not yet."

He was thinking that they had a better chance than the Crossland had without chains and that if they stopped to put them on the crew in back of them would have time to do likewise and thus equipped would be on more equal terms. No, their best chance lay in crowding their luck.

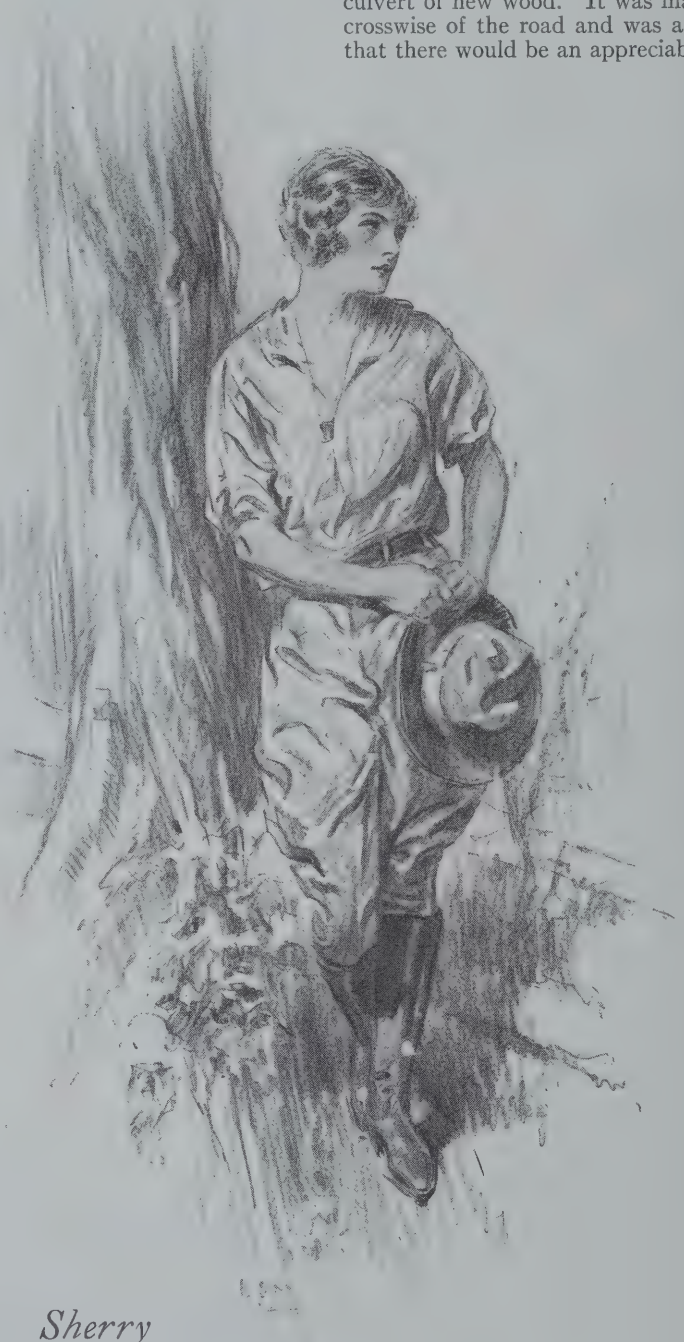
So they continued their sloshing way, ripping tons of the diluted landscape up and depositing it in new places, bumping into unsuspected water-filled holes, sliding giddily from side to side on the crown of the road like a clawing cat on a waxed incline, but somehow keeping right side up and straddling perilously the ridge of the road. Let both rear wheels get on the same slope once and no one could hold the car out of the ditch. Jim knew that and a thousand times he escaped skidding into a hopeless position across the road merely by a fraction of an inch.

There was only one real satisfaction in the entire situation: so long as the Clegg car stayed on the road no one could pass it, not until they arrived at some village with a wide, improved street. Gallup was the only place it could be done and Jim Danger took a horrible chance of getting gasoline and oil at Lupton, near the Arizona State line, and drove right through Gallup without stopping for scheduled supplies. That put him out on the narrow mud road again, ahead of competitors and in a position to block any car that might attempt to pass.



And still he had no tire chains on. To offset that he had perhaps five minutes' start on the Crossland, which had stopped to apply those safeguards.

Five minutes' start is not very much in a transcontinental race, especially in mud, and the Crossland was soon roaring along behind again like the vicious tail of a comet. Jim Danger thanked his lucky stars that he was blocking the mudway in his floundering chariot and he imagined with a grin of evil satisfaction the sulphurous fumings of his bottled up rival.

Then came an unexpected stretch of well drained and rock-bedded road. It was, perhaps, some former impassable spot which had been repaired simply because of absolute necessity. Anyway it opened up before Jim Danger and George Corbin, the pilot of the Crossland, like Main Street in Heaven. Both of them knew instinctively that right then and there would probably be settled who was to be the winner of the free-for-all map-eating contest inaugurated by the New York Post-Inquirer with a grand prize of fifty thousand dollars and a lot of gratuities, publicity and other valuable trimmings to be awarded to the successful driver.

Jim Danger hit the hardpan first and let her out as far as she would go the second his rear wheels stopped slithering in slime. Mud flew from the revolving wheels like sparks from a pin wheel.

Corbin climbed on to firm ground about one second behind him. His exhaust spoke for him and grew louder and louder in Jim's ears like the snarl of an angry, pursuing beast.

Sherry

About three or four hundred yards ahead was the end of the improved road. There began again the narrow, boggy prairie trail full of bumps, holes, deep ruts and ooze. If Jim got there first he could easily hold his lead by blocking off the other car.

So he had to beat Corbin on the open ground.

That was hard to do because the Clegg Four was a little tired by this time and had shaken loose some of its almost essential parts back in New Mexico somewhere and was not snorting exactly like a mount fresh from the meadow and stable.

But Jim was the kind of a driver who makes determination, luck and close judgment take the place of superior machinery; he jerked the Clegg over that ground as if by her boot straps and with the end of the good road in sight he still held his lead against his clanking, cursing adversary with one chain and all of his temper loose.

Still, there was one thing that neither Jim nor his mechanician had seen or could have foreseen. At the end of the stretch and just after the mud began again was a narrow, temporary culvert of new wood. It was made of six-foot lengths of plank crosswise of the road and was a little higher than the track so that there would be an appreciable bump upon hitting it.

Well, a bump was all in the day's work and didn't matter. The springs were lashed flat anyway so that they wouldn't break. What did matter was that the ruts, which Jim had to follow because he had no chains on and couldn't get out of them, led in a dizzy skidding zigzag right to the side edge of the culvert. Whether the last car over had slipped off or gone across was difficult for Jim to tell as he raced toward it.

There was no chance to stop. Even if there had been Jim would not have taken it. The best thing to do under the circumstances was to "shotgun" the culvert, to depend upon the momentum of increased speed to carry them across whether the wheels were sticking to anything or not.

Jim's decisions were made automatically and in the split second while he was approaching the treacherous spot.

The front wheels hit the slime-covered wood and bounced up in the air. But they came down still on the wood. The spinning rear tires started to climb the plank. And then they began not to climb. Instead they slipped sickeningly sideways. A jab at the accelerator did no good. The Clegg Four reeled, the left wheel dropped over the edge. The differential housing held the car for a second, but then it slid sideways with the inertia of the skid, balanced a second and slipped over too.

The Clegg Four turned turtle into the muddy water below the culvert.

The race was entirely over so far as Jim Danger and his mechanician were concerned.

George Corbin, in the Crossland, peered down at them through his Martian goggles as he passed safely over the treacherous culvert, but that was all. One glance was as much as he could spare from the exigencies of keeping his own car right side up. There were records to be broken, advertising preeminence to be gained for the car he was driving. His sympathies had to be put in cold storage until the race was over. Then, if Jim Danger had been killed, he would have time to be sorry.

Jim: "Would you have been angry if I had kissed you?" Sherry held up her locket in reply.

II

Jim Danger was not dead. Not yet. But he had a fair chance of joining the innumerable caravan if someone did not remove the chassis of the Clegg Four from his chest, which it was slowly crushing. Even "one of the lightest cars in America" weighs too much to be worn comfortably as a breastpin.

There was no chance of assistance from "Chicken" Doyle, his helper. Chicken had been thrown ten or fifteen feet to one side and was lying just where he had lighted. Whether he was dead or not, Jim, with his very limited field of vision, could not determine. Anyway he was out.

Jim rather wished he was, too. There was not much pleasure in contemplating death by suffocating pressure or by drowning in mud. There was a terrible pain in his side, too. Probably a splintered rib.

There was very little probability of help passing for hours, either. Some of the racing cars might come along any time, but casual traffic had practically ceased altogether. The native car owners knew what rain did to the road and "holed up" automatically, while the few foolhardy tourists who had dared to start out were doubtless resting comfortably in ditches of their own devising by this time.

No, Jim's chances seemed exceedingly slim. He wished now that he had been bumped off by that shell which had destroyed his next rank man at Moulin de Longforte. At least that would have been a more glorious end than this. Jim closed his eyes.

"Hello, down there! Is anybody alive?"

Jim was tempted not to answer. He had very little strength left and to tax that little might be the finish. Besides that, the voice was a woman's and Jim suspected that it was a delusion of approaching delirium. There was no sense in supposing that a woman would be abroad near that God-forsaken hole in the hydrated landscape.

But it was a woman, an actual bona fide physical woman of positive and executive character, not a materialized voice. The character was proven almost immediately by the fact that she slithered down the embankment into the somewhat deeper mud at the bottom and floundered over to the inverted car.

There, by looking into each other's eyes, she and Jim discovered that they were both alive.

She had thirty year old eyes, gray with questions in them. The rest of her face showed fewer signs of wear and tear and would perhaps look better under some other kind of a hat. A man's sombrero doesn't bring out all the charm of a feminine physiognomy. Even as it was you could discount the parenthesis around her mouth and the etched sun wrinkles at the corners of her eyes and discover that she was pleasant.

Clothes: Corduroy pants—not breeches, pants—tucked into boots, a flannel shirt and one of those oiled cloth raincoats, unlovely and stiff but serviceable.

"The first thing is to get the weight off your chest," she decided out loud.

Jim smiled. "I'm afraid that will be impossible," he pointed out. "Even if there were something solid to stand on it would take two or three men to budge it."

"Or one horse," amended the girl. "I've got the horse. We keep a few specimens of that nearly extinct species around just to show tourists along with the Indians. You wait here." She started away.

"I promise," Jim told her superfluously.

In a moment or so she was back with an efficient looking "rope," the noose of which she adjusted scientifically to the channel iron frame of the chassis near the center of gravity of the car but on the side away from the road.

"It's going to hurt when we lift this thing," she advised as she worked, "but it's the only way. Are you ready?"

Jim nodded. No use to let her discover how desperately ready he was. Two or three minutes more and he knew that he would have to give up the struggle.

She was floundering away as she spoke. "Here we go," she told him from a distance, "just as soon as I can tighten my cinch so the saddle won't slip."

He heard her speak to her horse, felt the car quiver above him, then slowly lift with an agonizing relief so overwhelming that

Chicken Doyle had told Patsy May the whole story. "I seem to have arrived just in time," she said.

ıe promptly let go of his hold on consciousness and went to oin Chicken Doyle in a painless oblivion.

III

THE doctor was making his second visit when Jim Danger ɔegan to realize which were the places that hurt the worst.

He had come back to life in an adobe house with a surprising nterior. It had hardwood floors, plumbing and all the abso-utely necessary luxuries.

The doctor was apologizing for the mud on his boots. "I'm orry to track this stuff around on your rug, Sherry, but I couldn't crape it all off."

"That's all right, Doctor Dan, everybody who has to be out n this weather gets plastered from head to foot. I had to andpaper your patient in order to get him clean enough to ecognize."

So her name was Sherry.

"You're a wonderful nurse, Sherry, and you certainly saved his young man's life twice, once by pulling the car off from him ɔefore it crushed him and the second time by the way you held ıim together all last night when that hemorrhage started. My hat is off to you, girl. You're more capable than most men."

Additional information for Jim. She was a capable person and had saved his life twice. Well, she had looked capable in her boots and pants and slicker. Women who live in the out of the way Western places doubtless have to be capable or perish.

Jim opened his eyes to take a look at the two people who were discussing him so impersonally.

The doctor was in his range of immediate vision. Three days' growth of whiskers hid a Pickwickian face. He was not tidy in other respects as one has rather grown to expect medical men to be. As a concession to the dressiness of his profession he wore a black suit and a shirt about eighty-five percent white. Around the frayed cuffs was the evidence that it had not been donned for the first time that morning. There were spots on his clothes some of which could probably be brushed out and others of which most certainly could not.

He was big but not tall—and about forty-five.

And there was only one other outstanding fact about him; he was in love with the person he was talking to. The expression with which he was regarding the girl, whose back was turned to Jim, was so incongruously tender on a countenance full of whiskers that it interpreted itself even to a casual masculine observer such as his patient.

Sherry's back was very erect, well proportioned and covered just then by a fresh wash dress of white with wide crossbars of deep pink. Her hair was dark and there was lots of it, piled high. She was nearly as tall as the doctor but only one-third as wide.

She turned. Hers was a sweet face, patient and kind, not beautiful. She smiled. It was beautiful. Can you see her? The nicest girl you know is like that.

"Doctor Dan," she said, "you've brought him back to this earth again." Her voice was soft, not like silk but like fine wool, rich, warm, with just a little throaty quality in it—a voice to be caressed by.

"Nonsense, you did it yourself. His case was beyond mere medicine and surgery. You're the best nurse in Arizona."

"I ought to be, with you for an instructor." To Jim: "Excuse this exchange of compliments. Mr. Danger, this is Doctor Dan. I am Sherry MacNeil. You must not talk much but you may ask for anything you want."

"Is my mechanic dead?"

Sherry laughed pleasantly. "Far from it. He was not even very badly hurt—just stunned. He's out back of the corral now tinkering with your car. He says you can drive it in to Los Angeles tomorrow. Doctor Dan and I say you can't for several weeks."

(Continued on page 130)

A New Novel of American Life

The Hope of

Illustrations by

Leila

A Résumé of Part One:

THE story takes place in an Ohio city and deals with the lives of:

BRUCE STORRS, a young architect who has recently received a confession from his mother just before her death: that he is not the son of John Storrs, her husband, but of one Franklin Mills, with whom she had had a brief but tense love affair two years after her marriage. The confession is a blow that brings Bruce's world tumbling about his ears; and when his supposed father dies, he takes a long walking trip to readjust his views. His love for his mother remains unchanged; he knows that this was the one lapse of a really fine character, and that she was faithful in all other obligations to her husband.

Mrs. Storrs had begged Bruce to work near his real father and help him if necessary. Bruce obeys this dying wish and, keeping his secret to himself, goes to find a position in the Ohio city where his father, of whom he knows nothing, lives. The first person he runs into there is

BUD HENDERSON, an old college friend, erratic, charming and generous. Bud, it appears, is advantageously married, runs an automobile sales agency and knows everyone worth while in the city. He breezily assures Bruce of an immediate job with

BILL FREEMAN, the city's best man in domestic architecture. Indeed, Bud gets himself and Bruce invited out at once to the Freemans' house by DALE FREEMAN, Bill's wife, a charming woman whose home is something of a rendezvous for an intelligent and companionable social set. Freeman is glad enough to take Bruce as his assistant.

Meantime, by way of Henderson's gossip regarding the city's celebrities, Bruce has learned to his relief that his father is a very prominent man, successful, conservative, reticent and something of a puzzle to his fellow citizens; and that evening Bruce meets at Dale's

SHEPHERD MILLS, his own half-brother, who is a pleasant, diffident young fellow, keenly interested in social reform and head of a storage battery plant given him by his father. Shepherd at once takes a liking to Bruce, as does also his wife

CONSTANCE MILLS, a girl of restless aspirations who, following her nature, immediately begins a mild flirtation with Bruce.

Bruce is destined to meet still another of his father's children when next evening he goes for a walk along the river and finds stalled in the middle of it

LEILA MILLS, whose motorboat he tows ashore. Leila, he observes, is young, vivacious, inclined to be wild and on this occasion rather more than mildly tipsy. With her is her friend

MILLICENT HARDEN, who attracts Bruce considerably and who, he later learns from Henderson, is the artistically gifted daughter of a wealthy patent medicine manufacturer living next door to Franklin Mills. Socially Millicent is rather out of it because of her father's occupation; but Bruce subsequently meets her at a dance, is more deeply impressed by her singular charm, and is introduced by her to

FRANKLIN MILLS, his father, whom he studies guardedly as they engage in casual conversation. Bruce, of course, does not show the depth to which the meeting has affected him.

Part Two: CHAPTER IV

BRUCE STORRS. The name of the young man he had met at the Country Club lingered disturbingly in Franklin Mills's memory. He had heard someone ask that night where Storrs came from and Bud Henderson, his sponsor, had been ready with the answer, "Laconia, Ohio." Mills had been afraid to ask questions himself. He computed the number of years that had passed since, in his young manhood, he had spent a summer in the pleasant little town, sent there by his father to act as auditor of a manufacturing concern in which Franklin Mills III for a time owned an interest. Long closed doors swung open slowly along the dim corridor of memory and

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON

Happiness

Author of "Broken Barriers"

Pruett Carter

Franklin Mills

phantom shapes emerged —among them a figure Franklin Mills recognized as himself . . . Had he ever been like that? He was young then; the spirit of adventure and the passions of youth had not yet been brought under the stern control he had since exercised over them . . . Marian Storrs had been as passionately young as he. She was a lovely young being—vivacious, daring, already indifferent to the man to whom she had been married for two years . . .

He had been a beast to take advantage of her, to accept all that she had yielded to him with a completeness that touched him poignantly now as she lived again in his memory. He did not question that the boy was hers; but was he John Storrs's son or his own? There was that question, hateful, hideous, that would not down. Nothing was so precious to Franklin Mills as his peace of mind, and here was a problem that might forever menace his peace. And if this young man was in reality his son would not Marian Storrs have told him . . . given him at least some hint? But there was little comfort in this, or in the hope that the young man himself might know nothing . . .

Mills stood by one of the broad windows in his private office gazing across the smoky industrial district of his native city. With his hands thrust into his trousers' pockets, he was a picture of negligent ease. His face was singularly free of the markings of time. His thick, neatly trimmed hair with its even intermixture of white added to his look of distinction. His business suit of dark blue with an obscure green stripe was evidently a recent creation of his tailor and a white wing collar with a bow tie that matched the suit contributed further to the impression he gave of a man who had a care for his appearance.

The respect of his fellow man, one could see, meant much to him; but he would not be likely to inconvenience himself to win approval. He was Franklin Mills, the fourth of the name in succession in the Mid-western city, enjoying an unassailable social position and able to command more cash at a given moment than any other man in the community. Nearly every piece of property in the city's original mile square had at some time belonged to a Mills. The earlier men of the name had been prominent in public affairs, but Franklin Mills had never been interested in politics, except to give his individual support, as unostentatiously as possible, to candidates who promised to safeguard the business interests of the country.

Mills never served on those bothersome committees that promote noble causes and pursue the public with subscription papers. When he gave he gave liberally but he preferred to make his contributions unsolicited. As for boosting the town, the matter didn't interest him a particle; he was mistrustful of all attempts to stimulate growth by artificial means. Mills never sold anything in a hurry. Voluble, hustling promoters of apartment house and office building schemes were unable to stampede him into making leases of coveted sites.

Some cynic said that the most human thing about Mills was his love of horses and dogs. He liked to ride and shoot, and a horse breeder or a dog fancier could always gain an audience with him. Like his father and grandfather he kept in touch with the soil, and his farm, fifteen miles from his office, was a show place, and his Jersey herd enjoyed a wide reputation. It pleased him to be represented at the State Fair with cattle and saddle horses from Deer Trail Farm. The farm was as perfectly managed as his house and office. Its carefully tended fields, his flocks and herds and the dignified Southern Colonial house were but another advertisement of his substantial character and the century-long identification of his name with the State.

Mills disliked any communication that couldn't be compressed on a single letter sheet. His private office was so furnished as to look as little as possible like a place for the transaction of business. There were easy lounging chairs, a long leathern couch, a bookcase, a taboret with cigars and cigarettes. The flat-top desk, placed between two windows, contained nothing but an immaculate blotter and a silver desk set that evidently enjoyed frequent burnishings. It was possible for Mills to come and go without crossing the other rooms of the suite. Visitors who passed the office boy's inspection and satisfied a stenographer that their errands were not frivolous, found themselves in communication with Arthur Carroll, Mills's secretary, a young man of thirty-five, trained as a lawyer, who spoke for his employer in all matters not demanding decisions of first importance. Carroll was not only Mills's confidential man of business, but when necessary he performed the duties of social secretary. He was tactful, socially in demand as an eligible bachelor and endowed with a genius for collecting information that might assist Mills in keeping in touch with the affairs of the community.

The gray eyes that looked out over the city narrowed occasionally as some object roused Mills's attention—a freight train crawling on the outskirts of the city, or some disturbance in the street below. Then he would resume his reverie as though enjoying his sense of immunity from the fret and jar of the world about him. Presently he glanced at his watch and turned to press a button in a plate on the corner of his desk. Carroll appeared immediately.

"You said Shepherd was coming?" Mills inquired.

"Yes; he was to be here at five but said he might be a little late."

Mills nodded, asked a question about the survey of some land adjoining Deer Trail Farm for which he was negotiating, and listened attentively while Carroll described a discrepancy in the boundary lines.

"Is that all that stands in the way?" Mills asked.

"Well," said Carroll, "Parsons shows signs of bucking. He's thought of reasons, sentimental ones, for not selling. He and his wife moved there when they were first married and their children were all born on the place."

"Well, of course we have nothing to do with that," remarked Mills, slipping an ivory paper knife slowly through his fingers. "The old man is a failure, and the whole place is badly run down. I really need it for pasture."

"Oh, he'll sell! We just have to be a little patient," said Carroll.

"All right, but don't close till the boundary's cleared up. I don't buy law suits. Come in, Shep."

Shepherd Mills had appeared at the door during this talk. His father had merely glanced at him, and Shepherd waited, hat in hand, his topcoat on his arm, till the discussion was ended.

"What's that you've got there?" his father asked, seating himself in a comfortable chair a little way from the desk.

In drawing some papers from the pocket of his overcoat, Shepherd dropped his hat, picked it up and laid it on the desk. He was trying to appear at ease and replied that it was a contract calling for a large order, which the storage battery company had just made.

"We worked a good while to get that," said the young man with a ring of enthusiasm in his voice. "I thought you'd like to know it's all settled."

Mills put on his glasses, scanned the document with a practiced eye and handed it back.

"That's good. You're running full capacity now?"

"Yes; we've got orders enough to keep us going full handed for several months."

The young man's tone was eager; he was clearly anxious for his father's approval. He had expected a little more praise for his success in getting the contract but was trying to adjust himself to his father's calm acceptance of the matter. He drummed the edge of the desk as he recited certain figures as to conditions at the plant. His father disconcertingly corrected one of his statements.

"Yes; you're right, father," Shepherd stammered. "I got the July figures mixed up with the June report."

Mills smiled indulgently; took a cigarette from a silver box on the taboret beside him and unhurriedly lighted it.

"You and Constance are coming over for dinner tonight?" he asked. "I think Leila said she'd asked you."

His senior's very calmness seemed to add to Shepherd's nervousness. He rose and laid his overcoat on the couch, drew out his handkerchief and wiped his forehead, remarking that it was warm for the season.

"I hadn't noticed it," his father remarked in the tone of one who is indifferent to changes of temperature.

"There's a little matter I've been wanting to speak to you about," Shepherd began. "I thought it would be better to mention it here—you never like talking business at the house. If it's going to be done it ought to be started now, before the bad weather sets in."

He paused, a little breathless, and Mills said, the least bit impatiently:

"Do you mean that new unit at the plant? I thought we'd settled that. I thought you were satisfied you could get along this winter with the plant as it is."

"Oh, no! It's not that!" Shepherd hastily corrected. "Of course that's all settled. This is quite a different matter. I only want to suggest it now so you can think it over. You see, our employees were all mightily pleased because you let them have the use of the Milton farm during the summer. There's quite a settlement there by the plant and the Milton land is so near they can walk to it. I kept tab in July and August and about a hundred of the men went there Saturday afternoons and Sundays; mostly married men who took their families. I could see it made a big difference in the morale of the shop."

He paused to watch the effect of his statements but Mills made no sign. He merely recrossed his legs, knocked the ash from his cigarette and nodded for his son to go on.

"I want you to know I appreciate your letting me use the property that way," Shepherd resumed. "I was out there a good deal myself and those people certainly enjoyed themselves. Now what's in my mind is this, father"—he paused an instant and bent forward with boyish eagerness—"I've heard you say you didn't mean to sell any lots in the Milton addition for several years—not until the street car line's extended—and I thought as the factory's so close to the farm we might build some kind of a clubhouse the people could use the year round. They can't get any amusements without coming into town, and we could build the house near the south gate of the property where our people could get to it easily. They could have dances and motion pictures and maybe a few lectures and some concerts during the winter. They'll attend to all that themselves. Please understand that I don't mean this as a permanent thing. The clubhouse needn't cost much, so when you get ready to divide the farm the loss wouldn't be great. It might even be used in some way. I just wanted to mention it; we can talk out the details after you've thought it over."

In his anxiety to make himself clear Shepherd had stammered repeatedly. He waited, his face flushed, his eyelids quivering, for some encouraging word from his father. Mills dropped his cigarette into the tray before he spoke.

"What would such a house cost, Shep?"

"It can be built for twenty thousand dollars. I got a young fellow in Freeman's office to make some sketches—Storrs—you met him at the country club; a mighty nice chap. If you'll just look at these——"

Mills took the two letter sheets his son extended, one showing a floor plan, the other a rough sketch of the proposed building, inspected them indifferently and gave them back.

"If you'd like to keep them——" Shepherd began.

"No; that isn't necessary. I think we can settle the matter now. It was all right for those people to use the farm as a playground during the summer, but this idea of building a house for them won't do. We've got to view these things practically, Shep. You're letting your sentimental feelings run away with you. If I let you go ahead with that scheme it would be unfair to all the other employers in town. If you stop to think you can see for yourself that for us to build such a clubhouse would cause dissatisfaction among other concerns that I'm interested in.

"And there's another thing. Your people did considerable damage last summer—breaking down shrubbery and young trees I'd planted where I'd laid out the roads. I hadn't spoken of this, for I knew how much fun you got out of it, but as for spending twenty thousand dollars for a clubhouse and turning the whole place over to those people, it can't be done!"

"Well, father, of course I can see your way of looking at it," Shepherd said with a crestfallen air. "I thought maybe, just for a few years——"

"That's another point," Mills interrupted. "You can't give it to them and then take it away. Such people are bound to be unreasonable. Give them an inch and they take a mile. You'll find as you grow older that they have precious little appreciation of such kindness. Your heart's been playing tricks with your head. I tell you, my dear boy, there's nothing in it; positively nothing!"

"It's too bad," Millicent was saying, "happiness can't be bought as you buy records to play in a machine and wind up and sit by and listen. You have to do a little work yourself."

Mills rose, struck his hands together smartly and laid them on his son's shoulders, looking down at him with smiling tolerance. Shepherd was gripping Storrs's sketches, and as his father stepped back he hastily thrust them into his pocket.

"You may be right, father," he said slowly, and with no trace of resentment.

"Storrs, you said?" Mills inquired as he opened a cabinet door and took out his hat and light overcoat. "Is he the young man Millicent introduced me to?"

"Yes; that tall, fine looking chap; a Tech man; just moved here—friend of Bud Henderson's."

"I wasn't quite sure of the name. He's an architect, is he?" asked Mills as he slowly buttoned his coat.

"Yes; I met him at the Freemans' and had him lunch with me at the club. Freeman is keen about him."

"He's rather an impressive looking fellow," Mills replied. "Expects to live here, does he?"

"Yes. He has no relatives here; just thought the town offered a good opening. His home was somewhere in Ohio, I think."

"Yes; I believe I heard that," Mills replied carelessly. "You have your car with you?"

"Yes; the runabout. I'll skip home and dress and drive over with Connie. We're going to the Claytons' later."

When they reached the street Shepherd ordered up his father's limousine and saw him into it and waved his hand as a parting salutation. As he turned away to seek his own car the smile faded from his face. He was deeply hurt. It was not merely that his father had refused to permit the building of the clubhouse, but that the matter had been brushed aside quite as a parent rejects some absurd proposal of an unreasoning child. He strode along with the quick steps compelled by his short stature, smarting under what he believed to be an injustice, and ashamed of himself for not having combated the objections his father had raised. The loss of shrubs or trees was nothing when weighed against the happiness of the people who had enjoyed the use of the farm. He thought now of many things that he might have said in defence of his proposition; but he had never been able to hold his own in debate with his father. His face burned with humiliation. He regretted that within an hour he was to see his father again.

Connie's father-in-law regarded her quizzically. "You're quite perfectly turned out, I should say," he remarked.

II

THE interior of Franklin Mills's house was not so forbidding as Henderson had hinted in his talk with Bruce. It was really a very handsomely furnished, comfortable establishment that bore the marks of a sound if rather austere taste. The house had been built in the last years of Mrs. Mills's life, and if a distinctly feminine note was lacking in its appointments this was due to changes made by Mills in keeping with the later tendency in interior decoration toward the elimination of nonessentials. He had a highly developed sense of order and disliked having things about him that were likely to get out of place.

It was only a polite pretense that Leila kept house for her father. Her inclinations were decidedly not domestic and Mills employed and directed the servants, ordered the meals, kept track of expenditures and household bills, and paid them through his office. He liked formality and chose well trained servants capable of conforming to his wishes in this respect. On the second floor there was a large sitting room, its walls lined with books indicative of the cultivated and catholic taste of the owner, and throughout the house there were pictures, chiefly representative work of contemporary French and American artists. When Mills got tired of a picture or saw a chance to buy a better one by the same painter, he sold or gave away the discard. He knew the contents of his house from cellar to garret—roved over it a good deal in his many lonely hours.

He came downstairs a few minutes before seven and from force of habit strolled through the rooms on a tour of inspection. In keeping with his sense of personal dignity he always put on his dinner coat in the evening even when he was alone. He rang and asked the smartly capped and aproned maid who responded whether his daughter was at home.

"Miss Leila went to the Country Club this afternoon, sir, and hasn't come in yet. She said she was dining here."

"Thank you," he replied colorlessly, and turned to glance over some new books neatly arranged on a table at the side of the living room. A clock struck seven and on the last stroke the remote titter of an electric bell sent the maid to the door.

"Mr. and Mrs. Shepherd Mills," the girl announced in compliance with an established rule, which was not suspended even hen Mills's son and daughter-in-law were the guests.

"Shep fairly dragged me!" Mrs. Mills exclaimed as she greeted er father-in-law. "He's in such terror of being late to one of our feasts! I know I'm a fright." She lifted her hand to her air with needless solicitude; it was perfectly arranged. She ore an evening gown of blue velvet, with a sweeping train; n effective garment, she knew that it was effective. Seeing that e was eyeing it critically she demanded to know what he thought f it.

"You're so fastidious, you know! Shep never pays any attenon to my clothes. It's a silly idea that women dress only for each other; it's for captious men like you that we take so much trouble."

"You're quite perfectly turned out, I should say," Mills remarked. "That's a handsome gown. I don't believe I've seen it before."

Her father-in-law was regarding her quizzically, an ambiguous smile playing about his lips. She was conscious that he never gave her his whole approval and she was piqued by her failure to evoke any expressions of cordiality from him. Men usually liked her, or at least found her amusing, and she had never been satisfied that Franklin Mills either liked her or thought her clever. It was still a source of bitterness that Mills had objected strongly to Shepherd's marrying her. His objections she attributed to snobbery; for her family was in nowise distinguished, and Constance, an only child, had made her own way socially chiefly through acquaintances and friendships formed in the Misses Palmers' school, a local institution which conferred a certain social dignity upon its patrons.

After meeting his gaze, Bruce noted that Mills would lift his eyes and look intently at something on the wall over the bookcases. Whatever it was brought a fleeting look of perplexity to his face.

She had never been able to break down Mills's reserves, and the familiar tone which she had adopted in her intercourse with him had been arrived at after a series of experiments in the first year of her marriage. He suffered this a little stolidly. There was a point of discretion beyond which she never dared venture. She had once tried teasing him about a young widow, a visitor from the South for whom he had shown some partiality, and he hadn't liked it though he had taken the same sort of chaff from others in her presence with perfect good nature.

She was buoyed by a hope that some day she would penetrate his armor. Shepherd, she realized perfectly, was a disappointment to his father. Countless points of failure in the relationship of father and son were manifest to her, things of which Shepherd himself was unconscious. It was Mills's family pride that had prompted him to make Shepherd president of the storage battery company, and the same vanity was responsible for the house he had given Shepherd on his marriage—a much bigger house than the young couple needed. He expected her to bear children that the continuity of the name might be unbroken, but the bearing of children was repugnant to her. Still, the birth of an heir, to take the name of Franklin Mills, would undoubtedly heighten his respect for her—diminish the veiled hostility which she felt she aroused in him.

"Where's Leila?" asked Shepherd as dinner was announced and they moved toward the dining room.

"She'll be along presently," Mills replied easily.

"Dear Leila!" exclaimed Constance. "You never disciplined her as you did Shep. Shep would go to the stake before he'd turn up late."

"Leila," said Mills a little acidly, "is a law unto herself."

"That's why we all love the dear child!" said Constance quickly. "Not for worlds would I change her."

To nothing was Mills so sensitive as to criticisms of Leila, a fact which she should have remembered.

As they took their places Mills asked her, in the impersonal tone she hated, what the prospects were for a gay winter. She was on the committee of the Assembly, whose entertainments were a noteworthy feature of every season. There, too, was the Dramatic Club, equally exclusive in its membership, and Constance was on the play committee. Mills listened with interest, or with the pretense of interest, as she gave him the benefit of her knowledge as to the winter's social program.

They were half through the dinner when Leila arrived. With a cheerful "hello, everybody" she flung off her wrap and without removing her hat sank into the chair Shepherd drew out for her.

"Sorry, dada, but Millie and I played eighteen holes this afternoon; got a late start and were perfectly starved when we finished and just had to have tea. And some people came along and we got to talking and it was dark before we knew it."

"How's your game coming on?" her father asked.

"Not so bad, dada. Millie's one of these lazy players; she doesn't care whether she wins or loses. I guess I'm too temperamental to be a good golfer."

"I thought Millie was pretty strong on temperament herself," remarked Shepherd.

"Well, Millie is and she isn't. She's not the sort that flies all to pieces when anything goes wrong."

"Millie's a pretty fine girl," declared Shepherd.

"Millicent really has charm," remarked Constance, though without enthusiasm.

"Millie's a perfect darling!" said Leila. "She's so lovely to her father and mother! They're really very nice. Everybody knocks Doc Harden but he's not a bad sort. It's a shame the way people treat them. Mrs. Harden's a dear, sweet thing; plain and sensible and doesn't look pained when I cuss a little." She gave her father a sly look but he feigned inattention. "Dada, how do you explain Millie?"

"Well, I don't," replied Mills with a broad smile at the abruptness of the question. "It's just as well that everything and everybody on this planet can't be explained and don't have to be. I've come to a time of life when I'm a little fed up on the things that can be reduced to figures. I want to be mystified!"

Leila pointed her finger at him across the table.

"I'll say you like mystery! If there was ever a human being who just had to have the facts, you're it! I know because I've tried hiding milliners' bills from you."

"Well, I usually pay them," Mills replied good-humoredly. "Now that you've spoken of bills I'd like to ask you——"

"Don't!" Leila ejaculated, placing her hands over her ears with simulated horror. "I know what you're going to say. You're going to ask why I bought that new squirrel coat! Dada, it was to keep me from freezing to death."

"Well, the house is well heated," Mills replied dryly. "The answer is for you to spend a little time at home."

Leila was a spoiled child and lived her own life with little paternal interference. After Mills had failed utterly to keep her in school, or rather to find a school in which she would stay, he had tried tutors with no better results. He had finally placed her for a year in New York with a woman who made a business of giving the finishing touches to the daughters of the provincial rich. Here there were no lessons to learn which these daughters didn't want to learn, but Leila had heard operas and concerts to a point where she really knew something of music, and she had acquired a talent that greatly amused her father for talking convincingly of things she really knew nothing about. He found much less delight in her appalling habit of blurting out things better left unsaid, and presumably foreign to the minds of well bred young women.

Her features were a feminized version of her father's, and she was dark like him and with the same gray eyes; but here the resemblance ended. She was alert, restless, quick of speech and action. The strenuous life of her long days was expressing itself in little nervous twitchings of her hands and head. Her father, under his benignant gaze, was noting these things now.

"I hope you're staying in tonight, Leila?" he said. "It seems to me you're not sleeping enough."

"Well, no, dada; I was going to the Claytons'. I told Fred Thomas he might come for me at nine."

"Thomas?" Mills questioned. "I don't know that I'd choose him for an escort."

"Oh, Fred's all right!" Leila replied easily. "He's always asking me to go places with him and I'd turned him down until I was ashamed to refuse any more." (Continued on page 154)

PHOTOGRAPHS BY J. H. SUSSMAN

Playing—Now That I'm

YOU will see little groups of men—men who have been shoved by Father Time over the fifty year line with no chance of Referee Fate giving them any years for offside play—you will see these groups, lounging in the windows of clubs, in the corners of resort verandas, or solemnly surrounding the green baize in the card room.

Do you suppose they like it?

They do not.

Take that on the testimony of this fifty year old. They do not. Do four cripples in a hospital ward love to congregate with one another; and thus to be reminded of their own plight?

No, but fellow cripples are the only people there to associate with. So they make the best of it.

So do we oldsters.

Don't you know there is no especial joy in unmitigated association with the old? Of course you do. That is why you are shyly or stiffly civil to the old; and hideously ill at ease with them; and that is why you escape as soon as possible to the companionship of younger folk.

Well, do you suppose the old care to be with one another, all the time, any more than you care to be with them? They don't. But they have to. It is the only companionship in which they can be sure of any sort of a glad welcome.

(Once more let me remind you that when I speak of the Old I don't mean the Aged. I am talking of us who are still only fifty or thereabouts. Seasoned, not decayed.)

Yes, yes, I know—there are lots of people in the fifties whom you youngsters like and respect and who are ever so interesting and all that. "As interesting as anyone in the twenties."

But the fact remains that your pals of both sexes are of your own age or thereabouts. And with such pals you are far more at home than ever you are with us who are fifty.

You could learn much from us, though. Yes, and we could relearn much from you. I say "re-learn," because once we knew the same wonderful things and spoke the same language that you do. Only, the passage of the years has blurred our memory of it.

I'll tell you why it has blurred our memory. One brain can hold only just so much; even as one room can hold only so much. As the added years keep piling into our brain-room vast heaps of experience and new happenings and new viewpoints and the knowledge of new duties and new phases of life—something must be crowded out to make place for them.

So—unconsciously, because we'd lack the courage or the desire to do it willingly—we shove out of the window, bit by bit, the nonessential luggage stacked there in our youth.

Out go the golden freshness, the faculty of regarding everything as either glorious or tragic, the cryptic small talk, the gift of laughing uproariously at less than nothing. Out go these and a myriad other beautiful things. Out into the scrap heap.

Then when you youngsters come along, years afterward, holding out your glittering wares, we search our memory storeroom in vain to match them. And, failing, we snarl and scowl at you for having what we have lost; and we call you Young Fools.

It is we who are the fools. We have thrown away what we can't get back. And we sneer at you for still having it all, or else we listen stupidly to a language which no longer we can understand.

To only one man, so far as I know, is it given to remember his youth and to imprison its memories in cold type. He is Booth Tarkington. But for "Seventeen," a lost language would never have been recorded.

Yes, we could relearn from you if we'd have the humility to do it; and if you'd have the patience to teach us. You could learn a lot from us, too. But you won't. We bore you. I don't wonder.

Two mighty well bred lads in the dawn of the twenties wasted half an hour not long ago trying to be polite to me. And, forgetting that neither Youth nor Age can ever learn secondhand, I expanded under their flattering questions about old days.

Fifty—by ALBERT PAYSON TERHUNE

I told them of the insane Southern night in 1891 when a stripling named Corbett knocked out the unknockoutable John L. Sullivan. I told them of the first night when John Drew cast off the Daly shackles and appeared as a Frohman star, with a wisp of a kid named Maude Adams as his leading woman.

I told them of the days when I crossed the Syrian wilderness on horseback and swam the Jordan in flood, because trains and Jordan bridges were then unknown in Palestine.

I told them of Marie Tempest's heartbreaking prowess on her first visit here, back in 1890, in "The Red Hussar"; of Fay Templeton and Agnes Huntington in the age when burlesque was still burlesque; and of the roaring jollity at Tony Pastor's, with Kelly, the Rolling Mill Man and Maggie Cline and the rest; and with David Mannes scratching away at the fiddle for the Pastor clog kings to dance by.

I spoke, first-hand, of Heffelfinger and Riggs and McClung, of Buck Ewing and Johnny Ward.

I even waxed highbrow and told them of the first performance of "Siegfried" here, and how all opera traditions were smashed by its absence of a chorus; and how, as a lad, I slept throughout the sword-forging scene.

I told them, too, of Theodore Thomas and of grand Pat Gilmore and of Patti in her late bloom.

I put on the soft pedal in telling how I thrilled at Booth's Hamlet and Iago; and of my pride when I was actually introduced to both Booth and Barrett, as a fifteen year old.

Oh, I told them a million things; and I waxed reminiscently excited over it all!

Finally I said that as a child I had been taken to New York's City Hall to see General Grant "lying in state."

One of my hearers interrupted me at that point by almost choking to death in an effort to masticate and swallow a yawn. The other sought to soothe my feelings at the ungodly gargling sound by asking me respectfully:

"Did you ever know Abraham Lincoln, sir? I mean, did you know him personally?"

"No, son," I groaned, in keen misery. "The only President of the United States I ever had the honor of shaking hands with was Thomas Jefferson."

And then I let them escape.

But it was I who learned from them, not they from me. Do I blame them? I do not.

In my own early twenties I met dear old Doctor Conant, then in extreme age. He was most courteous to me. I recall his starting to tell me of a hot quarrel he once witnessed on the street, in Washington, between Henry Clay and Daniel Webster.

I never heard the whole story, for at its climax I caught sight of a girl I knew—this was on a hotel porch—and I made excuse to sneak away and join her.

Yes, we oldsters herd together. It is either that or herd in solitude. Some few of us—and these are descendants of the Gaderene swine—seek to win for ourselves a welcome among young chaps by regaling them with raw stories and still more raw reminiscences. We mistake their fascinated disgust for flattering interest.

The more hopelessly insane of us try ponderously to flirt with flappers or with youthful matrons—poor old fools that we are!

The old must play with the old. Because the old are the only willing playmates of the old. Who, under our own age, wants to play with us? Surely no normal young man. Assuredly no non-golddigger young woman—and the golddigger only if we have the wealth to install her as an Old Man's Darling.

No, we of Fifty must be content to flock with our own kind; and mighty dull flocking it is sometimes. But at that it is flamingly interesting, compared to what we inflict on Youth by trying to be young with it or by trying to make it old with us.

I wonder what men of seventy-five find to talk about, when they are together and at their ease. I shan't find out for another quarter century. For I don't speak their silly language—yet!

DISCIPLINE

Illustrations by C. D. Williams

"'Your men did this, Sultan,' says Johnny, 'and I want the murderers within one hour.'"

MY FRIEND, First Sergeant John Ryan, United States Army, retired, is, as the reader has doubtless already suspected, of direct Celtic ancestry, but without even the ghost of a hyphen.

Thirty years of soldiering, from private to first sergeant, in the infantry and cavalry before the war with Germany, two years as a captain of field artillery during the war, and then "blooeyed" back to first sergeant after the armistice, is this veteran's record; a third of a century of service under the Stars and Stripes has obliterated all other interests save that of his adopted country, and of the multitudinous problems which confront the United States the sergeant is interested in but one.

That is his first, last and only love—the army. Upon the occasion when he told me this story he prefaced it with the remark, apropos of something he had read in a newspaper, that the service was going to the dogs entirely.

"Thank God," he added piously, "'twas given to me to have my service in a day when the army, though small, was commanded be officers and gentlemin, and composed of enlisted men to whom the service was as dear as a monastery to a monk.

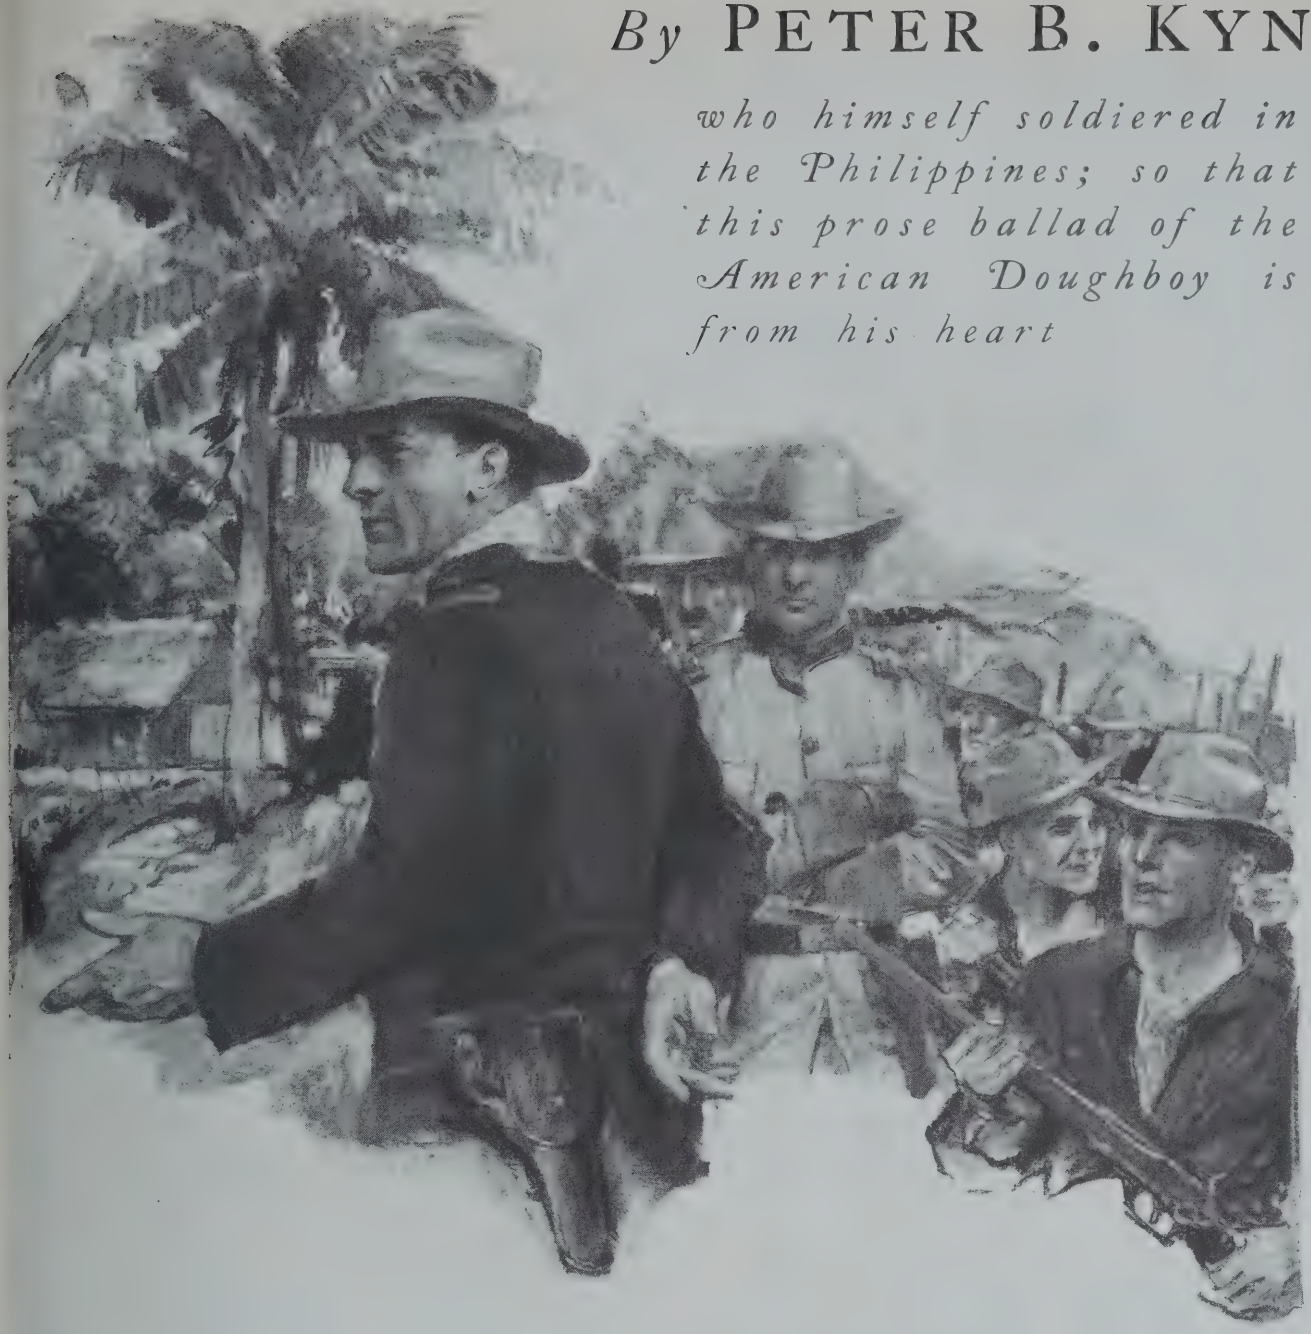
"Now the poor pay is drivin' the good men out of the service, the pluckin' board an' the Class B rating is completin' the ruin of the army morale, whilst the tinderness toward enlisted men that has resulted from the adoption of newfangled methods of discipline advocated by civilian doctrinaires an' mollycoddles is drivin' the ould non-coms out of their happy homes that was into the could, could wor'rld known as civil life. Sure, the army's gone to Hell completely. There's no discipline at all, at all."

"Opinions differ as to what constitutes discipline," I ventured.

"That's because few men know what discipline is," he retorted, "and fewer still are to be entrusted wit' the job of instillin' it into enlisted men.

"No man can succeed as a disciplinarian who has not learned to conthrol himself; if he tries to swank before enlisted men an' prate of pride of service and djooty to the counthry an' loyalty to the command, his men will know him for a hypocrite before the week is out an' despise him accordingly. They will take small pleasure in makin' his job an aisy one."

"But there are various grades of discipline and various methods of administering it," I suggested. "For instance, the methods of discipline practiced so successfully in the German army would result in mutiny if foisted upon our troops."



The old soldier smiled reminiscently.

"Yes," he agreed, "the Teuton's military training robs him of initiative and makes him docile, submissive and automatically obedient.

"There can be no drivin' of our throops into action, however. They must be led, and when properly led they'll go far an' fast

By PETER B. KYNE

who himself soldiered in the Philippines; so that this prose ballad of the American Doughboy is from his heart an' the Divil fly away wit' discipline, so called. They obey, not through fear an' not that they give two hoots in Hell for the Regulations but because of a little thing called esprit de corps.

"The seed of it is love an' respect for the leader, his qualities as a man and his ability as a sojer. It sprouts quickly and shows itself in the firm belief in the heart of each an' every enlisted man in that command that he is the best private in the best squad in the best section of the best platoon of the best company of the best battalion of the best regimint of the best brigade of the best division of the best corps in the only army on earth that can't be defeated.

"Esprit de corps, thin, is pride of service, which is founded in decency an' patriotism an' confidence in the leader, an' out of esprit de corps is born that something that has won all the battles that have ever been won—an' that same is the winnin' spirit."

The old soldier settled himself more comfortably in his chair, loaded his pipe and prepared to resume his thesis.

"Men in the mass," he announced presently, "are so aisy to mold, so aisy to handle, so childishly eager to be good bhoys and earn the approbation of their leader that sure 'tis not a knowledge of discipline, rules and regulations an' the wieldin' of power that one requires to get the best results out of them, but a bit of commonsinse, shtrict justice, manly dignity, a sinse of humor an' a bit of sympathy an' undhershtandin' for them beneath you."

"I suppose ye've hear'rd the ould regular sojer's recipe for a happy enlistment, have ye not? 'Give me a martinet of a captain, a plain red Divil for a first sergeant, an' lieutenants I can borrow money from,' says he, 'an', faith, I'll be a happy member of a happy family!'

"Whin I was the summary court officer of my late regimint, an' the gods o' war sint wan o' these laddy bucks before me, sure I knew how to handle him. Wit' a wave of me hand I'd cut short his palaverin'.

"'That'll do ye, me bhoy,' says I, 'I know all about it. Sure I was too long an enlisted man meself not to. Now, thin, ye plead not guilty. Hum-m-m-m! Well, I'm not callin' ye a liar, although privately I have me own fir'rm convictions regardin' the triflin' manner in which ye dally wit' facts, so on gineral principles I find ye guilty.

"'I know what I know—an' why shouldn't I?—me that has been lookin' the rascals of the service in the eye since before you were born? I know what I know an' that's that there's no virtue in ye; ye'd do this thing if ye got the chance, I know ye got it an' if ye didn't we'll save time an' argumint by assumin' ye did.

"'Ordinarily I'd give ye a fine of two-thir'rds of two months' pay, confinement to the limits of the camp for thirty days, an' at the ind of that time I'd suggest to yer commandin' officer the propriety, for the sake of the service, of givin' a three day furlough wit' the hint that ye might utilize that three days gettin' a good shtart goin' over the hill.

"'As matthers shtand, ye're a disgrace to a decent line outfit, so I shall make it me business to dispose of yer case in a manner all me own. The divisional personnel officer sojered three enlistmints wit' me an' he'll do what I ask him. I'll see to it, young man, that ye're transferred to a bakin' company or the sanitary corps. In two days yer comrades will know ye no more. Also, for the sake of appearances, I'll fine ye five dollars. Sinthry, take the prisoner to his company commandher an' report him for djooty!' "

"And what," I ventured, "would be the result of that unusual sentence?"

"Nine times out of ten the lad would report blubberin' like a child to his captain. Here he would confess error an' contrition an' promise reform. He was a sojer—not a very good sojer, to be sure, but shtill a sojer, an' God knows his heart would break to be a baker or grave digger. An' wouldn't the captain forgive an' forget an' inthercede for him wit' the summary court officer to save him this disgrace?

"Afther long pleadin', reluctantly the captain would consint, only to be refused. Returnin' to the culprit wit' this dishearthenin' intelligence, he'd confide to the accused that no less a person than the colonel himself could save him an' wit' that he'd give the poor divil permission to intherview the colonel.

"Sure, 'tis well known that the older a man grows the kindlier an' more forbearin' he grows, an' 'tis so wit' colonels. Likewise they're all puffed up wit' pride in their regimints, an' since regimints consist practically of enlisted min, sure he's a poor colonel entirely who hasn't a warm spot in his heart for a private an' in particular for a private who's repentant an' shows he loves the colonel's regimint so fervintly his poor heart is breakin' at the prospect of lavin' it!

"At wanst the colonel'd sind his ordherly to me wit' his complimints an' desire that I should report to him immedjiately. I do an' am confronted be the accused an' thin an' there the colonel asks me, as a personal complimint to him, to give over my plan of seein' to it that this man is plucked out of the regimint. This I decline to do, on the grounds that what I plan to do is for the good of the regimint, but I wink at the colonel as I say it, an' wit' that he exthracts from the culprit a solemn promise to refrain from disgracin' the regimint if Captain Ryan agrees to lay off on the proposed plan. I agree to it wit' grace.

"Now, what's the result of all this? To begin wit', I have acquired a reputation as a bad lad to go up ag'in on charges. The man's company commandher is voted a dacint man wit' a heart in his chist. As for the colonel, sure isn't he the ould darlint entirely? An' who could he blackguard enough to go back on him an' the captain?

"Within a month ninety-five percent of the enlisted men of the command are guardin' their comrade's morals an' guidin' them in the back way and puttin' them to bed whin they come in a bit tight. An' that's the beginnings of discipline or esprit de corps.

"Which brings to me mind the case of ould Johnny Packard—the Lord 'a' mercy on his soul—he was kilt at Soissons.

"It happened twinty-odd years ago, whin the army was what it is not now and will never be ag'in—God help us in our hour o' need! I was a roysterin' young corp'ral in B Throop of the —th Cavalry thin, an' the regimint was on active service in Mindanao, roundin' up Moros. 'Twas in Datto Ali's time, an' we were fairly busy an' enjoyin' the campaign, for the fightin' was plentiful, the casualites slight an' the counthry interestin' an' diversified. In fact, there was but one bug in our amber, an' that was our throop commandher, a Captain Massie.

"I was a young man in his time, an' like all young men given to snap judgmints. I'd had three years of active service all over the Islands, in both infantry and cavalry, and I'd sojered under enough officers to know an officer, a gintlemin an' a sojer whin I saw one. I didn't think then, nor do I think now, that Captain Massie was either. He was a square peg in a round hole. God a'mighty intended him for the presidency of a mortgage loan company.

"To begin, he had not a military bearin'. He was short an' squat, wit' unlovely legs an' his head sunk bechune his two shouldhers an' his chin outthrust in a manner that would anger a sheep. His eyes were mean an' deep-set an' he had a habit of lookin' at an enlisted man as if that man was dir'rt. Also, he could give wan an unwinkin', unblinkin' stare. His voice was high an' thin, an' he had a poor command, in consequence of which, in case of mounted throops, he got a poor dhrill. For this he laid upon us a bitther tongue, an' seein' be the dark looks an' the sullen faces he was unloved, he retaliated by dhrivin' us from mornin' till night.

"B Throop was operatin' more or less indepindintly at the time an' Captain Massie actually had the poor taste to dhrill us in the field. Afther a hard day in the saddle, he'd have us out for a mos critical inspebtion, pickin' here an' complainin' there. He had the bad taste to rawhide his non-coms in the presence of privates an' in order to enforce the regulations ag'in gamblin' he snooped an' spied upon us both day an' night. He was savin' wit' the throop rations, an' though we fed afield on government shtraight, the captain never encouraged our cooks to disguise the ration and make it more palatable or plentiful.

"Of course, such a man quickly had a throop to match him. The men retaliated by neglectin' to jump to attintion whin the captain appeared in the throop shtreet; not a man Jack of thim, seein' him first, would call 'Attenshun!' for the benefit of those who still had him to see.

"Whin he shpoke to thim they pretinded not to hear him an' thin apologized for their carelessness; they lost his personal baggage or dhropped it in mud holes an' rivers; there wasn't a man in the throop low enough to be his shtriker, an' the stable sergeant was forever swearin' he'd do this an' that to the captain's horse, but never quite havin' the heart to make good, owin' to the respect he had for the horse.

"Whin at attintion the men coughed an' sneezed unnecessarily an' whin rawhided pleaded they couldn't help it; they were forever slyly gaffin' their mounts in the shouldher wit' the spur an' causin' thim to go crazy an' disrupt the formation, just to harass the throop commandher. If he ordhered the bugler to sound 'Boots and Saddles' the stupid lad would blow 'Commince Firin'!' pretindin' he was mixed in his music. Thin he'd have the captain whistle the call for him to set him right.

"Now, I'll say this for Captain Massie. He was not a coward, yet he was a poor sojer in this, that he had not a bould, offensive spirit. He was contint to put the enimy on the run but not wishful to follow hard an' change a rethreat into a rout. By an' large, I think he was a bit touched in the head, for I remember that once when battle, starvation, hard work, an' disease had kilt off all our mounts, Captain Massie wan day undhertook to dhrill us in the proper way to groom a horse. Down to the vacant picket line he led us.

" 'Now, thin,' says he, 'imagine you see tied to this picket line a lot of horses badly in need of groomin', an' proceed to groom thim. Ye will shtart in at the head, with a light brush an' gintly, bein' careful not to frighten the horse by brisk work bechune his ears, for that will inculcate in the animal the habit of rearin' or tossin' his head or holdin' back on the halter-shank. Wit' the currycomb in the right hand an' the brush in the left go gintly but forcibly over him from the neck backward an' down, an' never attimpt to use the currycomb below the knees. Now, thin, fall in an' let me see ye do some dacint, groomin'.'

"Well, sir, there was nothin' to do but go through the motions of groomin' horses that were not there, and faith 'twas a solemn business until a private named Flannigan of a sudden let out a whoop of agony, clapped his two hands to his belly an' rolled in the dir'rt at Captain Massie's feet.

" 'What's the matther wit' you, Flannigan?' says the captain.

" 'Ochone, captain dear,' says the blackguard Flannigan, 'that big mad brute of a horse I was groomin' has kicked me!'

"That was the cue for the rest of thim an' in a minute the air was filled wit' cries of 'Whoa, there!' 'Shtand shtill, I tell ye, or I'll put a twitch on yer nose!' 'Captain Massie, sir, I have to report me horse down wit' the glanders.' 'Sir, that big bay do have the heaves!' 'Beggin' the throop commandher's pardon, but wan of those imaginary horses has bit me!' And so on, till the picket line was a riot an' the throop completely out of hand, an' the only thing the captain could do to save the shreds of his dignity was to dismiss the throop. Be the same token, that was the last we had of him, for that same day he was made a major an' thransferred to the Q. M. where he belonged.

"Three weeks later our new throop commandher come down from Manila an' took us over about half-past ten of a mornin' when we was restin' quietly in a barrio we'd took be force of arms, to wait for remounts to be sint up from Zamboanga. At tin forty-five he issued his fir'rst order, to the effect that be virtue of paragraph this of departmental order that, he thereby took command of B Throop. Signed, John H. Packard, Captain, —th U. S. Cavalry.

"At a quarter of twelve he drifted down to the kitchen and hailed the cook with a pleasant smile and this announcement:

" 'Cook, I am Captain Packard, the new throop commandher. I'll have a look at the rations ye are about to feed to me brave lads.'

"The cook lifted the lid off a pan and disclosed a mess of corned beef hash.

" 'It has an agreeable odor,' says the captain. 'I believe I'll taste it.' He did. 'Very good hash,' he complimented the cook,

"'Gwan, ye divil,' says I, and give him first the contints and then the bucket I was squatted beside."

whose hard face lighted up like the jungle surrounding a burning barrio, for 'twas a year since any human bein' had done aught but curse him for his best efforts. 'However,' the captain added, 'if I may offer a suggestion, I'd say that there's just a trifle too much salt in it, although I dare say that's due to the salty corned beef we're furnished. I think, too, that the average man might relish just a few more onions in his hash. Onions are a good, sound, reliable vegetable, splendid for the digestion. Hello, these soda biscuits aren't half bad. Light enough and very white, but don't you think you skimped a little bit on the soda, cook?'

"The cook didn't think so, for he was a hard-headed man with a good opinion of himself, but something in the new skipper's aisy manner, an' the pleasant, friendly, human smile of him, moved the blackguard of a cook to lie an' say the biscuits were shy on soda. Meanwhile Captain Packard had helped himself to a dipper an' was samplin' the coffee. 'Twas bitther, black coffee, an' faith, as he sipped it the cook noticed a bitther, black look come over the new captain's face. He tur'rned on the cook like a savage ould dog.

"'Are ye in the habit, me man,' says he, 'of savin' the coffee left over from breakfast, addin' fresh coffee to it at noon, b'ilin' hell out of it all ag'in an' servin' it to the men?'

"'Yes sir,' says the cook.

"'Be whose orders?'

"'The quartermaster sergeant's, sir.'

"'Tell that quartermaster sergeant to report to me immediately.'

"The quartermaster sergeant reported, and due to somethin' the cook tould him, he reported double time, snapped to attintion at six feet, gave the new captain a salute that should have earned him a cheer an' says:

"'Sir, Quartermaster Sergeant Miller reports to the captain.'

"'Miller,' says the captain, 'what do you mean by feedin' my boys this damnable concentrated extract of caffein? Why, this infernal coffee is pure poison. It's so strong a pewter soup ladle will stand to attintion in it.'

"'"'Twas quite dark,' the Rat told Johnny, 'and I had but six shots left, or else I'd have evened the score.'"

"'Why, the men seem to like it strong, sir, and I was saving on the coffee in order to buy somethin' more tasty to serve as a dessert, sir.'

"To any other man Miller would have told the truth, which was that Captain Massie's ordhers were to serve the sort of coffee that was bein' served. He was an ould sojer, was Miller, and he could recognize an officer an' a gintleman an' a sojer the minute he clapped eye on one. Well, he knew this new man would not like him if he tossed the blame where it belonged—on the shoulders of Captain Massie—for no man loves a snitch.

"'That's dacint of you, Sergeant Miller,' says Captain Packard, 'in view of the fact that Captain Massie is not presint to contradict you if you had seen fit to tell the truth. Did Captain Massie feed with the line?'

"'Yes, sir.'

"'Did he dhrink the throop coffee?'

"'Yes, sir.'

"'You're a charming and lovable liar, Miller The second cook informs me that he did not. How long have you been in the service?'

"'Two years and a butt on my third enlistment, sir,' says Miller, reaching for the tongs. He clamped them in the handle of the hot coffee boiler and with a flip of his arm he spilled the mess on the ground. One glare of his hard eye at the cook's police and they were grindin' fresh coffee.

"'I'm not a difficult man for a quartermaster sergeant to get along with, Sergeant Miller,' says the new captain. 'While I'm a bit of a crank in the matther of food and dhrink for me command, I try not to be unreasonable. By the way, I'll feed with the line. I undershtand my lieutenants feed with it also.'

"This was his polite way of informing Miller that a violent change was necessary in that kitchen at once and that he would be on hand three times a day to check up on him.

"Well, sir, that episode in the kitchen marked the dawn of a betther day in B Throop. There was mucho hablar—lots of talk—that afthernoon, an' whin fir'rst call for retreat wint, 'twas obser'rved that Captain Packard was shtandin' in front of the nipa shack he occupied, an' him wit' a watch in his hand.

"'Fall in!' roars ould man Melody, the top sergeant, in a voice like a Nubian lion roarin' for fresh meat, an' the way that the throop formed, right dressed wit'out command an' snapped into it was proof that the esprit de corps had already shtarted to ferment in B Throop. Faith, we made it snappy! An' for why? Because we wanted to do for the new captain the only little favor we could do for him, as acknowledgmint of what he'd done for us, for what every man Jack of us knew he'd do for us in the days to come. We wanted to give him the only kind of obedience that's ever worth a damn, an' that is affectionate obedience.

"As the top barked 'Front! Attintion to roll call!' Captain Packard snapped his watch closed and nodded a bit to himself as if to say: 'Well, they're fast, but shtill 'tis no more than I expected of thim. Thank God I'm not disappointed!' As the names were called each carbine came down to an order with the three hearty, distinct snaps a captain likes to hear, and not a butt plate hit the ground with the thump that denotes the rookie. Whin roll call was completed ould Melody did an about face an' a rifle salute that seemed to say to the new captain: 'Here I am, an' be the great gun of Athlone, I'm hard-boiled an' I know my business. If you an' me, sir, can't run this throop bechune us, begorra I'd like to see the photographs of the two that can!' What Melody did say was: 'Sir, B Throop is presint an' accounted for.'

"'Where is Sergeant McMurdo?' says the new captain. 'You called his name, Sergeant Melody, but if his carbine came down I didn't see it.'

"'Sergeant McMurdo is sick in quarthers, sir.'

"'Ah! Thin you forgot to take his name off the djooty list. Very well, sergeant. I wasn't criticisin' you or hintin' that you were hidin' somewan on me, undhershtan.'

"'Sergeant McMurdo is marked djoody, sir, an' for that I called his name,' says ould Melody. He was an obstinate little Irishman—a Far-Down, wit' more Gaelic nor Celt in him, or Scotch, if ye'll have it that way.

"'Thin why isn't he doin' djooty?'

" 'Because he cannot, sir. He's down wit' dysentery in that shack yonder, sir.'

" 'The hell he is!' says Captain Packard, an' the voice of him had a cuttin' edge on it. 'Thin why is he not in hospital where he belongs?'

" 'Whin Sergeant McMurdo fir'rst wint on sick report, sir, 'twas just before a bit of a row. 'Twas a spalpeen of a conthract surgeon that looked him over an' diagnosed McMurdo's case as could feet.' "All you need, me man," says this conthract surgeon, "is a pair of Arctic socks. Steward, give this man a dose of ipecac to relieve him."

" 'And what did Sergeant McMurdo say to that?' says Captain Packard quietly.

" 'Not a word, sir. Sergeant McMurdo is a sojer, sir. He houlds a certificate of merit for gallanthry in action an' he was the runner-up for the championship of the army in the last rifle shoot at Fort Riley.'

"The captain nodded an' we held rethreat. As the captain about faced ag'in an' the top saluted Captain Packard says to him:

" 'Sergeant, have the bugler sound Boots and Saddles. We'll have to escort the bearers carryin' McMurdo down to the coast to hospital. Have ye any idea at all where one might find that conthract surgeon?'

" 'I have, sir. Whin we get to hospital I'll p'int him out to the captain.'

"We were at that hospital be noon next day an' ould Melody made good on his promise. An' oh, the glorious sight the meetin' of Captain Packard an' that brute of a conthract surgeon was! In a quiet manner the skipper tould that poultice walloper what he'd been guilty of, an' the M. D. did not deny it. 'Whin ye're onger in the service,' says the captain, 'ye'll lear'rn that no officer or gintleman ever insults an enlisted man. 'Tis crool an' orutal, because he cannot resent the insult. However, Sergeant McMurdo belongs to me, body, bones an' belt buckle. His joys are mine an' likewise his sorrows. Take off your blouse, sir. I'm goin' to clout you until your carcass rings like a Chinese gong!'

" 'Twas a beautiful battle. Faith, the docthor could fight, an' be the same token he did! Our C. O. was thirteen minutes, be the watch, layin' him out, an' whin the job was done our poor Johnny—the men were callin' him be his fir'rst name behind his back be now—looked like he'd been fed through a concrete mixer. 'Twas the terrible sight it was entirely as he shtaggered over to his horse. Both eyes were closed an' he fiddled a bit wit' his foot tryin' to find the stirrup.

" 'Fall in the throop,' says he to Melody, 'an' we'll go back to our legitimate job o' chasin' Moros. Give me complimints to the fir'rst lieutenant an' tell him to take command; then do you ride boot to boot wit' me for a bit an' see that I shtay in me saddle. Faith, if that sawbones had held out another minute yer captain would have disgraced ye, Sergeant Melody.'

"We rode back into the bush in silence an' each enlisted man was thinkin': 'The captain is for us! You bet he is! He is for us! He won't let anybody on earth hand us anything that isn't comin' to us, an' if we've got it comin' he'll give it to us himself and right between the eyes. McMurdo represents the throop an' Johnny took a hell of a beatin' for the throop, for its glory an' honor and because he loves us. We must buck up. We must be good sojers, shtayin' moderately sober around pay day an' behavin' ourselves to the ind that we'll not annoy him or make him ashamed of us. Begorra, Johnny's all right.'

"Before we'd gone a mile the captain knew. Little Rat Hosmer, who'd been a 'prentice bhoy on a windjammer in his Godless youth, waited until we were at route step an' then set up a song. 'Twas an ould sailor chantey called 'Whisky for My Johnny,' an' faith, for all that it hurt his split lip, Johnny grinned like the head of an ould fiddle. Sure he knew we were for him. Of course he did. Sure how could he help it, with the whole throop roarin' the chorus, like bulls of Bashan?

"An' whin the original chantey had been sung, one private, Felix McSheehy, who was be way o' bein' a spring poet in civil life, changed the refrain from 'Whisky for My Johnny' to 'Whisky for Our Johnny,' and with a quiet aise that branded him a betther poet than soldier Felix invinted new wor'rds for the ould music. Sure, 'tis an ancient habit of the Irish to perpetuate the glorious deeds of their heroes in song, an' Felix was a bor'rn minstrel an' the wag o' the throop. What wit' the men rollin' in their saddles, laughin' at the villain as he described the battle in verse, wit' a dash of profanity here an' there to season it, five horses of B Throop had galled backs before we reached camp. Johnny give the throopers three-ply hell for it, an' put their names in his doomsday book, but sure nobody give a damn. We were a happy family at long last an' such we stayed for seven hard, wet, dir'rty, dangerous months before an unexpected bit of bad luck ripped the silver linin' out of our cloud of contintmint.

"Like everything that happens in the Moro country, the fir'rst hint we had of it was a killin'. We were at peace at the time. All the local datos had followed the Sultan for that district into Zamboanga for an undhershtandin' wit' the commandin' officer, an' 'twas agreed that a'l war was a mistake an' in the future we'd cut it out. So (Continued on page 184)

© Pirie MacDonald

P. G. WODEHOUSE

Laugh-maker of London

P. G. WODEHOUSE

introduces to you

MR.

Stanley

Featherstonehaugh

Ukridge

who will take the place formerly occupied by Bertie & Jeeves

Ukridge's Dog College

Illustrations by T. D. Skidmore

"LADDIE," said Stanley Featherstonehaugh Ukridge, that much enduring man, helping himself to my tobacco and slipping the pouch absently into his pocket, "listen to me, you son of Belial."

"What?" I said, retrieving the pouch.

"Do you want to make an enormous fortune?"

"I do."

"Then write my biography. Bung it down on paper, and we'll split the proceeds. I've been making a pretty close study of your stuff lately, old horse, and it's all wrong. The trouble with you is that you don't plumb the wellsprings of human nature and all that. You just think up some rotten yarn about some damn thing or other and shove it down. Now if you tackled my life, you'd have something worth writing about. Pots of money in it, my boy . . . English serial rights and American serial rights and book rights and dramatic rights and movie rights . . . well, you can take it from me that at a conservative estimate we should clean up at least fifty thousand pounds apiece."

"As much as that?"

"Fully that. And listen, laddie, I'll tell you what. You're a good chap and we've been pals for years, so I'll let you have my share of the English serial rights for a hundred pounds down."

"What makes you think I've got a hundred pounds?"

"Well, then, I'll make it my share of the English and American serial rights for fifty."

"Your collar's come off its stud."

"How about my complete share of the whole dashed outfit for twenty-five?"

"Not for me, thanks."

"Then I'll tell you what, old horse," said Ukridge, inspired. "Just lend me half-a-crown to be going on with."

If the leading incidents of S. F. Ukridge's disreputable career are to be given to the public—and not, as some might suggest, decently hushed up—I suppose I am the man to write them. Ukridge and I have been intimate since the days of school. Together we sported on the green, and when he was expelled no one missed him more than I.

An unfortunate business, this expulsion. Ukridge's generous spirit, ever ill attuned to school rules, caused him eventually to break the solemnest of them all by sneaking out at night to try his skill at the cocoanut shies of the local village fair; and his foresight in putting on scarlet whiskers and a false nose for the expedition was completely neutralized by the fact that he absent-mindedly wore his school cap throughout the entire proceedings. He left the next morning, regretted by all.

After this there was a hiatus of some years in our friendship. I was at Cambridge, absorbing culture, and Ukridge, so far as I could gather from his rare letters and the reports of mutual acquaintances, flitting about the world like a snipe. Somebody met him in New York, just off a cattle ship. Somebody else saw him in Buenos Aires. Somebody again spoke sadly of having been pounced on by him at Monte Carlo and touched for a fiver.

It was not until I settled down in London that he came back into my life. We met in Piccadilly one day and resumed our relations where they had been broken off. Old associations are strong, and the fact that he was about my build and so could wear my socks and shirts drew us very close together.

Then he disappeared again, and it was a month or more before I got news of him.

It was George Tupper who brought the news. George was head of the school in my last year, and he has fulfilled exactly the impeccable promise of those early days. He is in the Foreign Office, doing well and much respected. He has an earnest, pulpy heart and takes other people's troubles very seriously. Often he had mourned to me like a father over Ukridge's erratic progress through life, and now, as he spoke, he seemed to be filled with a solemn joy, as over a reformed prodigal.

"Have you heard about Ukridge?" said George Tupper. "He has settled down at last. Gone to live with an aunt of his who owns one of those big houses on Wimbledon Common. A very rich woman. I am delighted. It will be the making of the old chap."

I suppose he was right in a way, but to me this tame subsidence into companionship with a rich aunt in Wimbledon seemed somehow an indecent, almost a tragic end to a colorful career like that of S. F. Ukridge. And when I met the man a week later my heart grew heavier still.

It was in Oxford Street at the hour when women come up from the suburbs to shop; and he was standing among the dogs and commissionaires outside Selfridge's. His arms were full of parcels, his face was set in a mask of wan discomfort, and he was so beautifully dressed that for an instant I did not recognize him. Everything which the Correct Man wears was assembled on his person, from the silk hat to the patent leather boots; and, as he confided to me in the first minute, he was suffering the tortures of the damned. The boots pinched him, the hat hurt his forehead and the collar was worse than the hat and boots combined.

"She makes me wear them," he said moodily, jerking his head towards the interior of the store and uttering a sharp howl as the movement caused the collar to gouge his neck.

"Still," I said, trying to turn his mind to happier things, "you must be having a great time. George Tupper tells me that your aunt is rich. I suppose you're living off the fat of the land."

"The browsing and sluicing are good," admitted Ukridge. "But it's a wearing life, laddie. A wearing life, old horse."

"Why don't you come and see me sometimes?"

"I'm not allowed out at night."

"Well, shall I come and see you?"

A look of poignant alarm shot out from under the silk hat.

"Don't dream of it, laddie," said Ukridge earnestly. "Don't dream of it. You're a good chap—my best pal and all that sort of thing—but the fact is, my standing in the home's none too solid even now, and one sight of you would knock my prestige into hash. Aunt Julia would think you worldly."

"I'm not worldly."

"Well, you look worldly. You wear a squash hat and a soft collar. If you don't mind my suggesting it, old horse, I think, if I were you, I'd pop off now before she comes out. Good by, laddie."

"Ichabod!" I murmured sadly to myself as I passed on down Oxford Street. "Ichabod!"

Ukridge's sad case seemed to move George deeply. "We ought to do something practical for him," he remarked.

I should have had more faith. I should have known my Ukridge better. I should have realized that a London suburb could no more imprison that great man permanently than did Elba Napoleon.

One afternoon, as I let myself into the house in Ebury Street of which I rented at that time the bedroom and sitting room on the first floor, I came upon Bowles, my landlord, standing in listening attitude at the foot of the stairs.

"Good afternoon, sir," said Bowles. "A gentleman is waiting to see you. I fancy I heard him calling me a moment ago."

"Who is he?"

"A Mr. Ukridge, sir. He ——"

A vast voice boomed out from above.

"Bowles, old horse!"

Bowles, like all other proprietors of furnished apartments in the southwestern district of London, was an ex-butler; and about him, as about all ex-butlers, there clung like a garment an aura of dignified superiority which had never failed to crush my spirit. He was a man of portly aspect with a bald head and prominent eyes of a lightish green—eyes that seemed to weigh me dispassionately and find me wanting. "H'm!" they seemed to say. "Young, very young. And not at all what I have been accustomed to in the best places." To hear this dignitary addressed—and in a shout at that—as "old horse" affected me with much the same sense of imminent chaos as would afflict a devout young curate if he saw his bishop slapped on the back. The shock, therefore, when he responded not merely mildly but with what almost amounted to camaraderie was numbing.

"Sir?" cooed Bowles.

"Bring me six bones and a corkscrew."

"Very good, sir."

Bowles retired, and I bounded upstairs and flung open the door of my sitting room.

"Great Scott!" I said blankly.

The place was a sea of Pekingese dogs. Later investigation reduced their numbers to six, but in that first moment there seemed to be hundreds. Goggling eyes met mine wherever I looked. The room was a forest of waving tails. With his back against the mantelpiece, smoking placidly, stood Ukridge.

"Hullo, laddie," he said, with a genial wave of the hand as if to make me free of the place, "you're just in time. I've got to dash off and catch a train in a quarter of an hour. Stop it, you mutts," he bellowed; and the six Pekingese, who had been barking steadily since my arrival, stopped in mid-yap and were still.

Ukridge's personality seemed to exercise a magnetism over the animal kingdom, from ex-butlers to Pekes, which bordered on the uncanny. "I'm off to Sheep's Cray in Kent. Taken a cottage there."

"Are you going to live there?"

"Yes."

"But what about your aunt?"

"Oh, I've left her! Life is stern and life is earnest, and if I mean to make a fortune I've got to bustle about and not stay cooped up in a place like Wimbledon."

"Something in that."

"Besides which, she told me the very sight of me made her sick and she never wanted to see me again."

I might have guessed, directly I saw him, that some upheaval had taken place. The sumptuous raiment which had made him such a treat to the eye at our last meeting was gone, and he was back in his pre-Wimbledon costume, which was, as the advertisements say, distinctively individual.

Over gray flannel trousers, a golf coat and a brown sweater he wore like a royal robe a bright yellow mackintosh. His collar had broken free from its stud and showed a couple of inches of bare neck. His hair was disordered, and his masterful nose was topped by a pair of steel rimmed pince-nez cunningly attached to his flapping ears with ginger beer wire. His whole appearance spelled revolt.

Bowles manifested himself with a plateful of bones.

"That's right. Chuck 'em down on the floor."

"Very good, sir."

"I like that fellow," said Ukridge as the door closed. "We had a dashed interesting talk before you came in. Did you know he had a cousin in the music halls?"

"He hasn't confided in me much."

"He's promised me an introduction to him later on. May be useful to be in touch with a man who knows the ropes. You see, laddie, I've hit on the most amazing scheme." He swept his arm round dramatically, overturning a plaster cast of the Infant Samuel at Prayer. "All right, all right, you can mend it with glue or something, and anyway you're probably better without it. Yessir, I've hit on a great scheme. The idea of a thousand years."

"What's that?"

"I'm going to train dogs."

"Train dogs?"

"For the music hall stage. Dog acts, you know. Performing dogs. Pots of money in it. I start in a modest way with these six. When I've taught 'em a few tricks, I sell them to a fellow in the profession for a large sum and buy twelve more. I train those, sell 'em for a large sum, and with the money buy twenty-four more. I train those——"

"Here, wait a minute." My head was beginning to swim. I had a vision of England paved with Pekingese dogs, all doing tricks. "How do you know you'll be able to sell them?"

"Of course I shall. The demand's enormous. Supply can't cope with it. At a conservative estimate I should think I ought to scoop in four or five thousand pounds the first year. That, of course, is before the business really starts to expand."

"I see."

"When I get going properly, with a dozen assistants under me and an organized establishment, I shall begin to touch the big money. What I'm aiming at is a sort of dogs' college out in the country somewhere. Big place with a lot of ground. Regular classes and a set curriculum. Large staff, each member of it with so many dogs under his care, me looking on and superintending."

"Why, once the thing starts moving it'll run itself, and all I shall have to do will be to sit back and endorse the checks. It isn't as if I would have to confine my operations to England. The demand for performing dogs is universal throughout the civilized world. America wants performing dogs. Australia wants performing dogs. Africa could do with a few, I've no doubt. My aim, laddie, is gradually to get a monopoly of the trade. I want everybody who needs a performing dog of any description to come automatically to me. And I'll tell you what, laddie. If you like to put up a bit of capital, I'll let you in on the ground floor."

"No, thanks."

"All right. Have it your own way. Only don't forget that there was a fellow who put nine hundred dollars into the Ford car business when it was starting and he collected a cool forty million . . . I say, is that clock right? Great Scott, I'll be missing my train. Help me mobilize these dashed animals."

Five minutes later, accompanied by the six Pekingese and bearing about him a pound of my tobacco, three pairs of my socks and the remains of a bottle of whisky, Ukridge departed in a taxicab for Charing Cross station to begin his life work.

Perhaps six weeks passed, six quiet Ukridgeless weeks, and then one morning I received an agitated telegram. Indeed, it was not so much a telegram as a cry of anguish. In every word of it there breathed the tortured spirit of a great man who has battled in vain against overwhelming odds. It was the sort of telegram which Job might have sent off after a lengthy session with Bildad the Shuhite.

"My Aunt?" mumbled Ukridge, swaying on the door handle.

COME HERE IMMEDIATELY LADDIE LIFE AND DEATH MATTER OLD HORSE DESPERATE SITUATION DON'T FAIL ME

It stirred me like a bugle. I caught the next train.

The White Cottage, Sheep's Cray—destined, presumably, to become in future years a historic spot and a Mecca for dog-loving pilgrims—was a small and battered building standing near the main road to London at some distance from the village. I found it without difficulty, for Ukridge seemed to have achieved a certain celebrity in the neighborhood; but to effect an entry was a harder task. I rapped for a full minute without result, then shouted; and I was about to conclude that Ukridge was not at home when the door suddenly opened. As I was just giving a final bang at the moment, I entered the house in a manner reminiscent of one of the Ballet Russe practising a new and difficult step.

"Sorry, old horse," said Ukridge. "Wouldn't have kept you waiting if I'd known who it was. Thought you were Gooch the grocer—goods supplied to the value of six pounds three and a penny."

"I see."

"He keeps hounding me for his beastly money," said Ukridge bitterly as he led the way into the sitting room. "It's a little hard. Upon my Sam, it's a little hard. I come down here to inaugurate a vast business and do the natives a bit of good by establishing a growing industry in their midst, and the first thing you know they turn round and bite the hand that was going to feed them. I've been hampered and rattled by these blood-suckers ever since I got here. A little trust, a little sympathy, a little of the good old give-and-take spirit—that was all I asked.

"Great run while it lasted, laddie," remarked Ukridge, "cat and I doing a steady fifty-five."

"And what happened? They wanted a bit on account! Kept bothering me for a bit on account, I'll trouble you, just when I needed all my thoughts and all my energy and every ounce of concentration at my command for my extraordinarily difficult and delicate work. I couldn't give them a bit on account. Later on, if they had only exercised reasonable patience, I would no doubt have been in a position to settle their infernal bills fifty times over. But the time was not ripe.

"I reasoned with the men. I said: 'Here am I, a busy man, trying hard to educate six Pekingese dogs for the music hall stage, and you come distracting my attention and impairing my efficiency by babbling about a bit on account. It isn't the pull-together spirit,' I said. 'It isn't the spirit that wins to wealth. These narrow, petty cash ideas can never make for success.' But no, they couldn't see it. They started calling here at all hours and waylaying me in the public highways till life became an absolute curse. And now what do you think has happened?"

"What?"

"The dogs."

"Got distemper?"

"No. Worse. My landlord's pinched them as security for his infernal rent! Sneaked the stock. Tied up the assets. Crippled the business at the very outset. Have you ever in your life heard of anything so dastardly? I know I agreed to pay the damned rent weekly and I'm about six weeks behind, but my gosh! surely a man with a huge enterprise on his hands isn't supposed to have to worry about these trifles when he's occupied with the most delicate . . . Well, I put all that to old Nickerson, but a fat lot of good it did . . . So then I wired to you."

"Ah!" I said, and there was a brief and pregnant pause.

"I thought," said Ukridge meditatively, "that you might be able to suggest somebody I could touch."

He spoke in a detached and almost casual way, but his eye was gleaming at me significantly, and I avoided it with a sense of guilt. My finances at the moment were in their customary unsettled condition—rather more so, in fact, than usual, owing to unsatisfactory speculations at Kempton Park on the previous Saturday; and it seemed to me that, if ever there was a time for passing the buck, this was it. I mused tensely. It was an occasion for quick thinking.

"George Tupper!" I cried on the crest of a brain-wave.

"George Tupper!" echoed Ukridge radiantly, his gloom melting like fog before the sun. "The very man, by gad! It's a most amazing thing but I never thought of him. George Tupper, of course! Big-hearted George, the old school chum. He'll do it like a shot and won't miss the money. These Foreign Office blokes have always got a spare tenner or two tucked away in the old sock. They pinch it out of the public funds. Rush back to town, laddie, with all speed, get hold of Tuppy, lush him up, and bite his ear for twenty quid. Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party."

I got hold of George, took him out to dinner, and on the way home sketched out what was expected of him. I had been convinced that George Tupper would not fail us, nor did he. He parted without a murmur—even with enthusiasm. The consignment was one that might have been made to order for him.

As a boy, George used to write sentimental poetry for the school magazine, and now he is the sort of man who is always starting subscription lists and getting up memorials and presentations. He listened to my story with the serious, official air which these Foreign Office fellows put on when they are deciding whether to declare war on Switzerland or send a firm note to San Marino, and was reaching for his check book before I had been speaking two minutes. Ukridge's sad case seemed to move him deeply.

"Too bad," said George, as we walked back from luncheon. "So he is training dogs, is he? Well, it seems very unfair that, if he has at last settled down to real work, he should be hampered by financial difficulties at the outset. We ought to do something practical for him. After all, a loan of twenty pounds cannot relieve the situation permanently."

"I think you're a bit optimistic if you're looking on it as a loan."

"What Ukridge needs is capital."

"He thinks that, too. So does Gooch the grocer."

"Capital," repeated George Tupper firmly, as if he were reasoning with the plenipotentiary of some great power. "Every venture requires capital at first." He frowned thoughtfully. "Where can we obtain capital for Ukridge?"

"Rob a bank."

George Tupper's face cleared.

"I have it," he said. "I will go straight over to Wimbledon tonight and approach his aunt."

"Aren't you forgetting that Ukridge is about as popular with her as a cold Welsh rabbit?"

"There may be a temporary estrangement, but if I tell her the facts and impress upon her that Ukridge is really making a genuine effort to earn a living . . . "

"Well, try it if you like. But she will probably sick the parrot on to you."

"It will have to be done diplomatically, of course. It might be as well if you did not tell Ukridge what I propose to do. I do not wish to arouse hopes which may not be fulfilled."

A blaze of yellow on the platform of Sheep's Cray station next morning informed me that Ukridge had come to meet my train. The sun poured down from a cloudless sky, but it took more than sunshine to make Stanley Featherstonehaugh Ukridge discard his mackintosh. He looked like an animated blob of mustard.

When the train rolled in he was standing in solitary grandeur trying to light his pipe, but as I got out I perceived that he had been joined by a sad looking man who, from the rapid and earnest manner in which he talked and the vehemence of his gesticulations, appeared to be ventilating some theme on which he felt deeply. Ukridge was looking warm and harassed, and as I approached I could hear his voice booming in reply.

"My dear sir, my dear old horse, do be reasonable, do try to cultivate the big, broad, flexible outlook . . . "

He saw me and broke away—not unwillingly; and, gripping my arm, drew me off along the platform. The sad looking man followed irresolutely.

"Have you got the stuff, laddie?" inquired Ukridge in a tense whisper. "Have you got it?"

"Yes, here it is."

"Put it back, put it back!" moaned Ukridge in agony as I felt in my pocket. "Do you know who that was I was talking to? Gooch the grocer!"

"Goods supplied to the value of six pounds three and a penny?"

"Absolutely!"

"Well, now's your chance. Fling him a purse of gold. That'll make him look silly."

"My dear old horse, I can't afford to go about the place squandering my cash simply in order to make grocers look silly. That money is ear-marked for Nickerson, my landlord."

"Oh? . . . I say, I think the six pounds three and a penny bird is following us."

"Then for goodness sake, laddie, let's get a move on. If that man knew we had twenty quid on us, our lives wouldn't be safe. He'd make one spring."

He hurried me out of the station and led the way up a shady lane that wound off through the fields, slinking furtively "Like one that on a lonesome road Doth walk in fear and dread, And having once looked back walks on And turns no more his head, Because he knows a frightful fiend Doth close behind him tread." As a matter of fact, the frightful fiend had given up the pursuit after the first few steps, and a moment later I drew this fact to Ukridge's attention, for it was not the sort of day on which to break walking records.

He halted, relieved, and mopped his spacious brow with a handkerchief which I recognized as having once been my property.

"Thank goodness we've shaken him off," he said. "Not a bad chap in his way, I believe—a good husband and father, I'm told, and sings in the church choir. But no vision. That's what he lacks, old horse—vision. He can't understand that all vast industrial enterprises have been built up on a system of liberal and cheerful credit. Won't realize that credit is the lifeblood of commerce. Without credit commerce has no elasticity. And if commerce has no elasticity, what damn good is it?"

"I don't know."

"Nor does anybody else. Well, now that he's gone, you can give me that money. Did old Tuppy cough up cheerfully?"

"Blithely."

"I knew it," said Ukridge, deeply moved, "I knew it. A good fellow. One of the best. I've always liked Tuppy. A man you can rely on. Some day, when I get going on a big scale, he shall have this back a thousandfold. I'm glad you brought small notes."

"Why?"

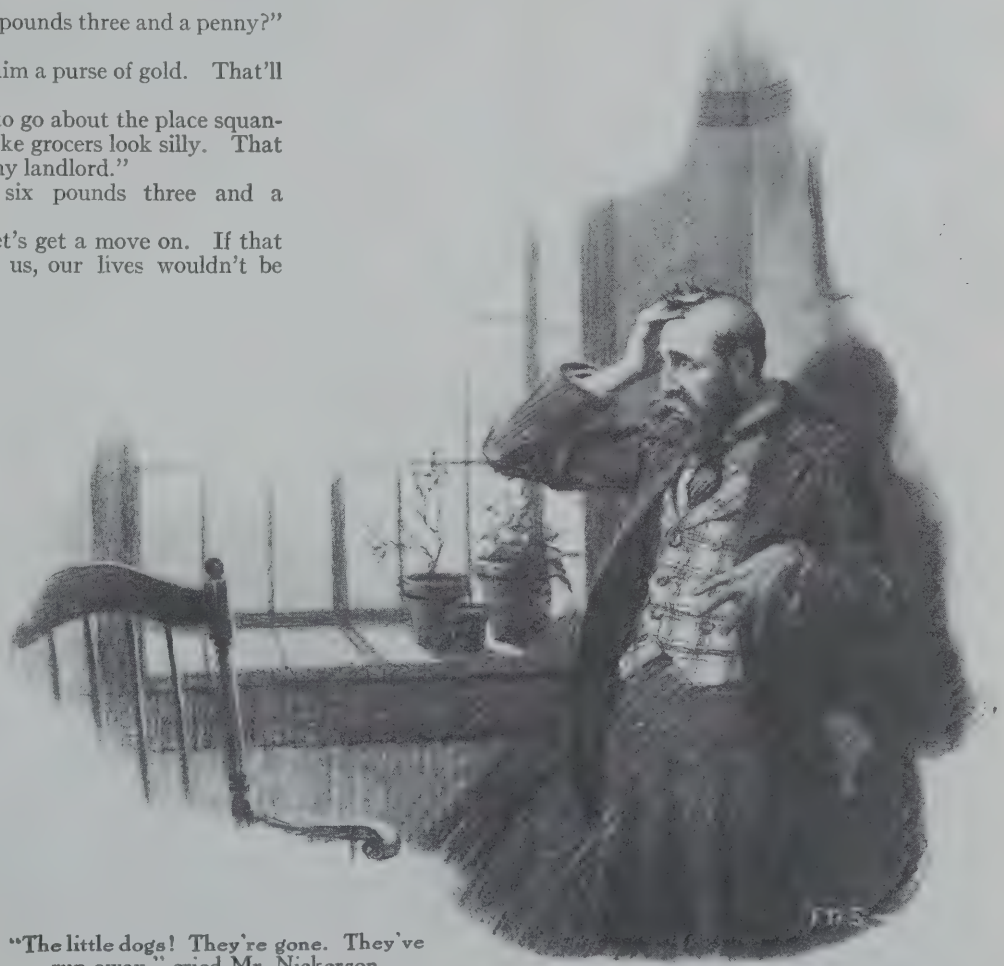
"I want to scatter 'em about on the table in front of this Nickerson blighter."

"Is this where he lives?"

We had come to a red-roofed house, set back from the road amidst trees. Ukridge wielded the knocker forcefully.

"Tell Mr. Nickerson," he said to the maid, "that Mr. Ukridge has called and would like a word."

About the demeanor of the man who presently entered the room into which we had been shown there was that subtle but well marked something which stamps your creditor all the world over.



Mr. Nickerson was a man of medium height almost completely surrounded by whiskers, and through the shrubbery he gazed at Ukridge with frozen eyes, shooting out waves of deleterious animal magnetism. You could see at a glance that he was not fond of Ukridge. Take him for all in all, Mr. Nickerson looked like one of the less amiable prophets of the Old Testament about to interview the captive monarch of the Amalekites.

"Well?" he said, and I have never heard the word spoken in a more forbidding manner.

"I've come about the rent."

"Ah?" said Mr. Nickerson guardedly.

"To pay it," said Ukridge.

"The little dogs! They're gone. They've run away," cried Mr. Nickerson.

"To pay it!" ejaculated Mr. Nickerson incredulously.

"Here!" said Ukridge, and with a superb gesture flung money on the table.

I understood now why the massive-minded man had wanted small notes. They made a brave display. There was a light breeze blowing in through the open window, and so musical a rustling did it set up as it played about the heaped up wealth that Mr. Nickerson's austerity seemed to vanish like a breath off a razor blade. For a moment a dazed look came into his eyes and he swayed slightly; then, as he started to gather up the money, he took on the benevolent air of a bishop blessing pilgrims. So far as Mr. Nickerson was concerned, the sun was up.

"Why, thank you, Mr. Ukridge, I'm sure," he said. "Thank you very much. No hard feelings, I trust?"

"Not on my side, old horse," responded Ukridge affably. "Business is business."

"Exactly."

"Well, I may as well take those dogs now," said Ukridge, helping himself to a cigar from a box which he had just discovered on the mantelpiece and putting a couple more in his pocket in the friendliest way. "The sooner they're back with me, the better. They've lost a day's education as it is."

"Why certainly, Mr. Ukridge, certainly. They are in the shed at the bottom of the garden. I will get them for you at once."

He retreated through the door, babbling ingratiatingly.

"Amazing how fond these blokes are of money," sighed Ukridge. "It's a thing I don't like to see. Sordid, I call it. That blighter's eyes were gleaming, positively gleaming, laddie, as he scooped up the stuff. Good cigars, these," he added, pocketing three more.

There was a faltering footstep outside, and Mr. Nickerson reentered the room. The man appeared to have something on his mind. A glassy look was in his whisker-bordered eyes, and his mouth, though it was not easy to see it through the jungle, seemed to me to be sagging mournfully. He resembled a minor prophet who has been hit behind the ear with a stuffed eelskin.

"Mr. Ukridge!"

"Hullo?"

"The—the little dogs!"

"Well?"

"The little dogs!"

"What about them?"

"They have gone!"

"Gone?"

"Run away!"

"Run away? How the devil could they run away?"

"There seems to have been a loose board at the back of the shed. The little dogs must have wriggled through. There is no trace of them to be found."

Ukridge flung up his arms despairingly. He swelled like a captive balloon. His pince-nez rocked on his nose, his mackintosh flapped menacingly and his collar sprang off its stud. He brought his fist down with a crash on the table.

"Upon my Sam!"

"I am extremely sorry . . ."

"Upon my Sam!" cried Ukridge. "It's hard. It's pretty hard. I come down here to inaugurate a great business which would eventually have brought trade and prosperity to the whole neighborhood, and I have hardly had time to turn round and attend to the preliminary details of the enterprise when this man comes and sneaks my dogs. And now he tells me with a light laugh——"

"Mr. Ukridge, I assure you——"

"Tells me with a light laugh that they've gone. Gone! Gone where? Why, dash it, they may be all over the country. A fat chance I've got of ever seeing them again. Six valuable Pekingese, already educated practically to the stage where they could have been sold at an enormous profit . . ."

Mr. Nickerson was fumbling guiltily, and now he produced from his pocket a crumpled wad of notes, which he thrust agitatedly upon Ukridge, who waved them away with loathing.

"This gentleman," boomed Ukridge, indicating me with a sweeping gesture, "happens to be a lawyer. It is extremely lucky that he chanced to come down today to pay me a visit. Have you followed the proceedings closely?"

I said I had followed them very closely.

"Is it your opinion that an action will lie?"

I said it seemed highly probable, and this expert ruling appeared to put the final touch on Mr. Nickerson's collapse. Almost tearfully he urged the notes on Ukridge.

"What's this?" said Ukridge loftily.

"I—I thought, Mr. Ukridge, that if it were agreeable to you you might consent to take your money back and—and consider the episode closed."

Ukridge turned to me. "Ha!" he cried. "Ha ha!"

"Ha ha!" I chorused dutifully.

"He thinks that he can close the episode by giving me my money back. Isn't that rich?"

"Fruity!" I agreed.

"Those dogs were worth hundreds of pounds, and he thinks he can square me with a rotten twenty. Would you have believed it if you hadn't heard it with your own ears, old horse?"

"Never!"

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said Ukridge after thought. "I'll take this money." Mr. Nickerson thanked him. "And there are one or two trifling accounts which want settling with some of the local tradesmen. You will square those——"

"Certainly, Mr. Ukridge, certainly."

"And after that—well, I'll have to think it over. If I decide to institute proceedings my lawyer will communicate with you in due course."

And we left the wretched man cowering despicably behind his whiskers.

It seemed to me as we passed down the tree-shaded lane and out into the white glare of the road, that Ukridge was bearing himself in his hour of disaster with a rather admirable fortitude. His stock in trade, the lifeblood of his enterprise, was scattered all over Kent, probably never to return, and all that he had to show on the other side of the balance sheet was the canceling of a few weeks' back rent and the paying off of Gooch the grocer and his friends. It was a situation which might well have crushed the spirit of an ordinary man, but Ukridge seemed by no means dejected. Jaunty, rather. His eyes shone behind their pince-nez and he whistled a rollicking air. When presently he began to sing, I felt that it was time to create a diversion.

"What are you going to do?" I asked.

"Who, me?" said Ukridge buoyantly. "Oh, I'm coming back to town on the next train! You don't mind hoofing it to the next station, do you? It's only five miles. It might be a trifle risky to start from Sheep's Cray."

"Why risky?"

"Because of the dogs, of course."

"Dogs?"

Ukridge hummed a gay strain.

"Oh yes, I forgot to tell you about that! I've got 'em."

"What!"

"Yes, I went out late last night and pinched them out of the shed." He chuckled amusedly. "Perfectly simple. Only needed a clear, level head. I borrowed a cat and tied a string to it, legged it to old Nickerson's garden after dark, dug a board out of the back of the shed and shoved my head down and chirruped. The dogs came trickling out and I hared off, towing old Colonel Cat on his string. Great run while it lasted, laddie. Hounds picked up the scent right away and started off in a bunch at fifty miles an hour. Cat and I doing a steady fifty-five. Thought every minute old Nickerson would hear and start blazing away with a gun, but nothing happened. I led the pack across country for a run of twenty minutes without a check, parked the dogs in my sitting room, unleashed Cuthbert the cat, and so to bed. Took it out of me, by gosh! Not so young as I was."

I was silent for a moment, conscious of a feeling almost of reverence. This man was undoubtedly spacious. There had always been something about Ukridge that dulled the moral sense.

"Well," I said at length, "you've certainly got vision."

"Yes?" said Ukridge, gratified.

"And the big, broad, flexible outlook."

"Got to, laddie, nowadays. The foundation of a successful business career."

"And what's the next move?"

We were drawing near to the white cottage. It stood and broiled in the sunlight, and I hoped that there might be something cool to drink inside it. The window of the sitting room was open and through it came the yapping of Pekingese.

"Oh, I shall find another cottage somewhere else!" said Ukridge, eyeing his little home with a certain sentimentality. "That won't be hard. Lots of cottages all over the place. And then I shall buckle down to serious work. You'll be astounded at the progress I've made already. In a minute I'll show you what those dogs can do."

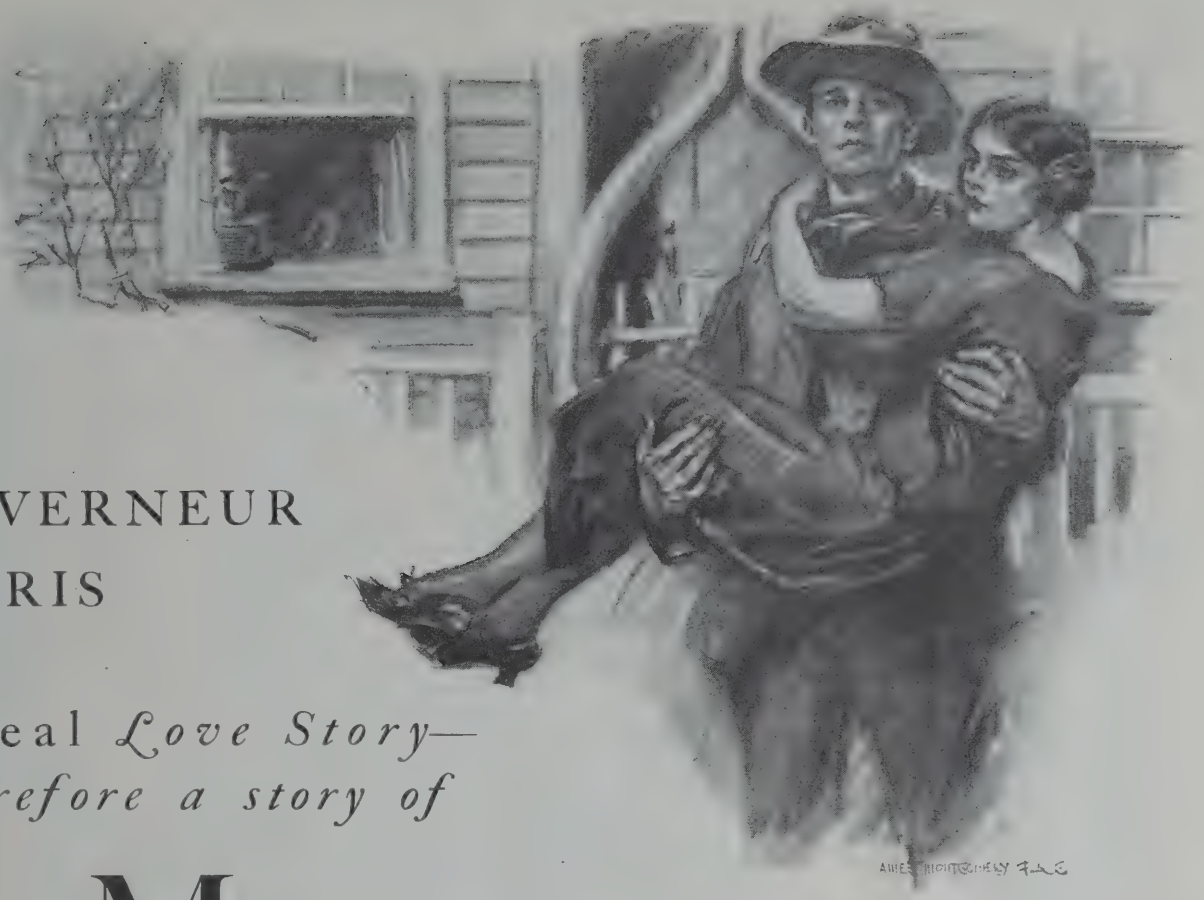
"They can bark all right."

"Yes. They seem excited about something. You know, laddie, I've had a great idea. When (Continued on page 143)

LIONEL BARRYMORE, with Alma Rubens, in the greatest part he has played in his screen career—Prince Lubimoff in Ibañez's famous "The Enemies of Women," produced by the Cosmopolitan Corporation.

JEANNE EAGELS, an actress since childhood, who with her vivid and eager beauty has created something of a sensation in "Rain," a play of American Samoa from a story by W. Somerset Maugham.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY



HELEN MENKEN, whose parents were deaf and dumb, who began acting at the age of five, and whose "Diane" in "Seventh Heaven" has been compared by able critics with the acting of Bernhardt and Duse.

ALFRED CHENEY JOHNSTON

LILLIAN-MAC KENZIE of the bewitching eyes, whose singing and dancing has charmed the audiences of such Broadway triumphs as "The Queen of Hearts," the Ziegfeld "Follies" and "Good Morning, Dearie."

PHOTOGRAPH BY APEDA

By GOUVERNEUR
MORRIS

A real Love Story—therefore a story of

MIRACLES

Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg

THE first thing that happened wasn't exactly a miracle. Just the same it was a wonderful happening.

Suppose that you were twenty-one years old and that all your life long you had desired (even beyond diamonds and pearls) an automobile (any kind of an automobile that would go) and a fruit ranch. Suppose then that being twenty-one years of age, and indeed upon the morning of your twenty-first birthday, a man of law came to the house in which you resided with your parents and informed you that your mother's brother, a crochety old fellow whom nobody had seen or heard of for years and years and years, had died and made you his heir and left you nearly a thousand dollars in lawful currency, and a little fruit ranch in that loveliest of valleys which suns itself the year round between the city of Salinas and the city of Monterey.

It would seem wonderful to you, I think. It seemed wonderful to Ruddy Copeland, for it was to him that the amazing thing happened, and his twenty-second year was no more than five days old before he had bought a very second-hand flivver—but it did have a very special roadster body, shaped like a half smoked cigar and painted a delicate baby blue—and set forth to view the more productive part of his inheritance.

The way led through the old mission city of San Juan. And here he ran plump into his first miracles. But I am afraid he scoffed at them at that time and was very skeptical as to the true miraculousness of them.

Upon the top of a hill just outside the city a miracle man and his disciples had pitched a tent. The miracle man wore a long white robe and a long white beard like a character out of the Bible, and from morning till late at night he talked in a sing-song voice about his ability to cure sick people by the simple act of laying his hands upon them and wishing them well. His disciples, a stout man and stout women with gold-rimmed spectacles, went about saying that everything the miracle man said was true, and selling photographs at twenty-five cents apiece.

The hill upon which the miracle tent had been pitched was covered with people. They had flocked to see the miracle man from points more than a hundred miles distant. Some of them were very sick people who had to be carried by their friends. Every kind of crutch, cripple and ear trumpet was to be seen. There were hunched backs in the crowd, legs that had shriveled to the size of broomsticks and spines so twisted that they resembled pretzels. But most of the people who had come to see the miracle man, or like Ruddy Copeland had stopped off on their way to see something else, were only suffering from curiosity.

Once a panic broke out halfway up the hill and several people were knocked down and trampled on. It all came about because of a Mexican with a big white scar on his face. The scar gleamed like silver and suddenly somebody said to somebody else that the man was a leper. Then everybody tried to get away from the vicinity of the leper as quickly as possible.

Around the miracle tent itself and the space in front of it the crowd was for ten days. Ruddy never got near enough to the miracle man to see him, but he got near enough to hear him, and word of what the miracle man was doing was passed by the fortunate spectators in the front rows to those behind them.

Except for the endless singing boasting of the miracle man there would be silences. At the end of these silences there would be a clapping of hands. This applause might mean that the power of locomotion had been returned to a hopeless cripple, or sight to a blindman. Whenever the applause sounded the sick people on their way up the hill who had been waiting for hours and hours to get a chance at the miracle man would become half frenzied with excitement.

The sick believed that they would be cured. Their friends and relatives hoped against reason and knowledge. But people who had never been sick themselves or taken a vital interest in sick people had no faith at all. They thought that the miracle man was a fake.

That was what Ruddy Copeland thought.

The show sickened him. He believed in doctors and surgeons. He thought that miracle men with sing song voices, and disciples with gold-rimmed spectacles who sold photographs ought to be locked up and put where they couldn't impose on the ignorant and the half-witted.

He tried for a while to find someone or other who had personally been cured by the miracle man of something or other, but failed. Only the front rows on the top of the hill saw the cures made, and thereafter the cured persons never seemed to come out of the charmed circle where common persons could get at them and talk with them.

Ruddy Copeland gave up in disgust. Whatever doubts he had about cures, he had none about disease. There were Biblical diseases on view, running sores and the things that troubled Job. And there were undoubtedly diseases more serious and less evident that one might breathe in and develop inside oneself. Also there were little children, so lame and sick and miserable that they could never possibly grow up. And Ruddy, whose heart was unsophisticated and tender, could not bear to look at them.

So he climbed into his baby blue flivver and proceeded over the mountain pass to Salinas. Here he made inquiries as to the exact location of the little ranch which he had inherited, and how to find it.

Now the word ranch is an elastic word. It means anything from a half-acre of cabbages to a million acres of sage brush. The ranch to which Ruddy's directions led him, and of whose ranch house he had the keys in his pocket, was easily found.

The little white house stood on the top of a very little hill. The hill, perhaps forty feet high, had been neatly terraced for the accommodation of blackberry vines and their orderly trellises, and was entirely surrounded by twenty acres of well grown pear trees. Gentle hills dotted with live oaks in turn surrounded the orchard, and a half mile of winding dirt road separated it from the highway over which people travel between Salinas and Monterey.

The dwelling house contained a living room, a bedroom, a bathroom and a kitchen. Outside it looked like an old house, the kind that a child draws on a slate, but inside it looked new.

Ruddy's late uncle may have been crochety, but he had loved simplicity and white paint. Ruddy's new home may have been as simple and unpretentious as a monk's cell, but it was as clean and sweet as a rosebud.

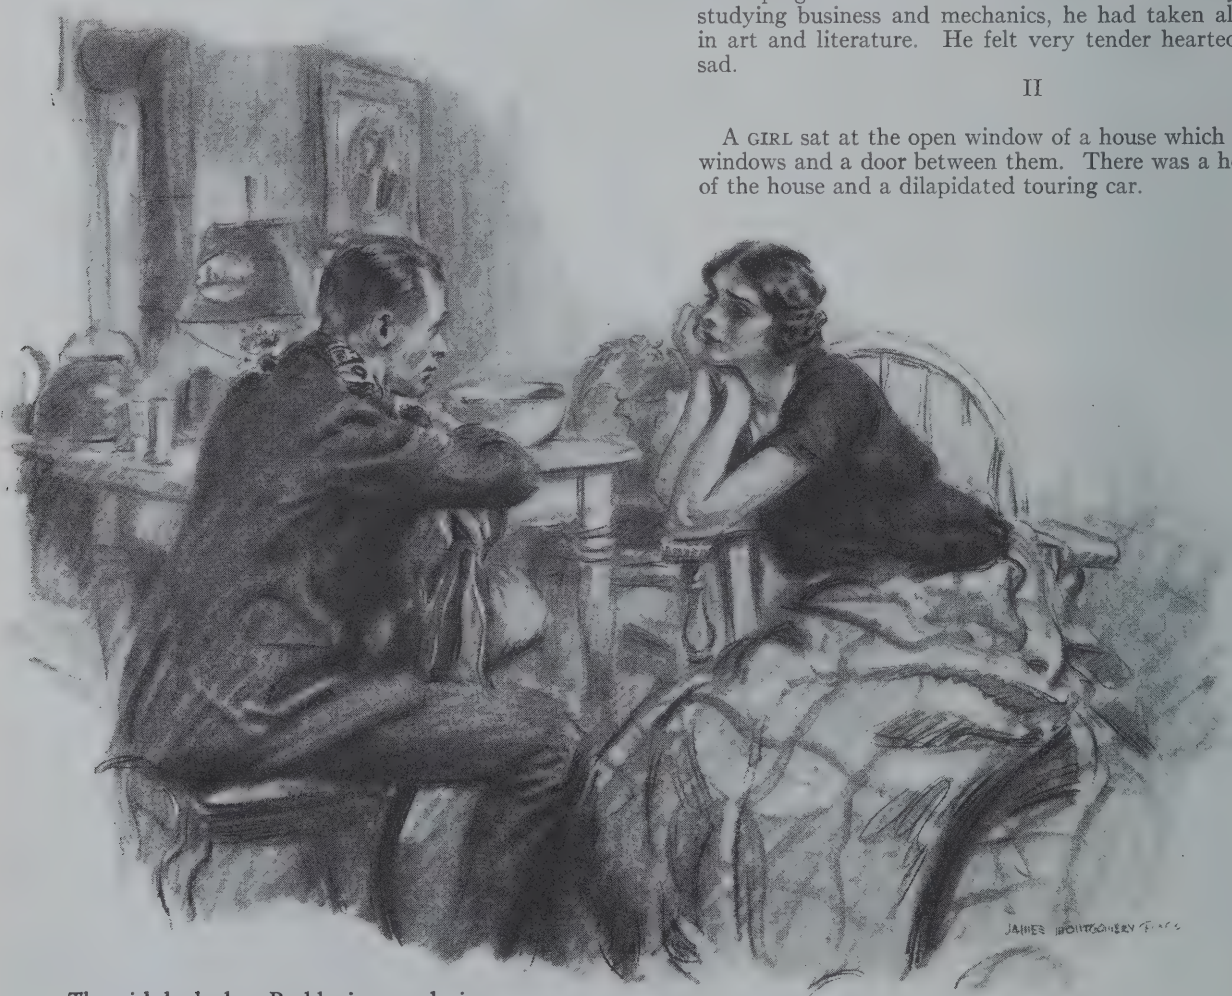
At the moment, however, considering the house together with Ruddy's youth and good health, the house had one grave drawback. It contained nothing to eat.

It was Ruddy's intention to eat in Monterey, to buy groceries and return to his ranch. But when he saw the Mission Church perched aloft, with the lagoon at its feet and the tiled roofs of the little city beyond and the surrounding hills softened with pines and oaks and the blue sparkling bay, something queer happened to his eyes, and for the first time in his young life he perceived that the world is not only to be considered in terms of utilitarian progress but in terms of beauty as well.

And that was Ruddy's first real miracle.

When he had eaten and bought groceries he did not at once return to his ranch. In the restaurant they spoke to him of a certain seventeen mile drive, of strange trees which grow nowhere else in the world, of an ocean-bound city called Pacific Grove, where sin is unknown, of Carmel, where artists and authors live in amity and speak well of one another, and of the old Carmel Mission and the wonderful Highlands beyond.

And he determined to see all these wonders before returning to his ranch and taking up his life's work at the beginning.



A first acquaintance with the Monterey Peninsula has made persons even less sensitive and accustomed to beauty than Ruddy Copeland absolutely groggy. Neither the Bay of Naples nor the Riviera nor the Isles of Greece where Sappho sang —and ought to have been arrested—can hold a candle to it.

After a day and a half of sight-seeing Ruddy drove slowly down the long hill which is the approach to Monterey from Carmel, a very different person from the twenty-one year old boy who so recently had inherited a fruit ranch and nearly a thousand dollars in cash.

His heroes had always been those persons who appear to make the world go round and who through personal initiative, energy and inventiveness have acquired large fortunes. And now he felt that a false rating of those persons had hurt his life instead of helping it. He wished that at the university, instead of studying business and mechanics, he had taken all the courses in art and literature. He felt very tender hearted and a little sad.

II

A GIRL sat at the open window of a house which had only two windows and a door between them. There was a hearse in front of the house and a dilapidated touring car.

The girl looked at Ruddy in an adoring, worshipful kind of way and said, "Oh please take me—please—please take me."

Ruddy was badly rattled. He gave a despairing look toward the door—and the look changed to wonder.

Some men were carrying a coffin through the gate in the house fence—this gate was made of a whale's jawbone—and presently they heaved up one end of it and slid it into the hearse. Two of them climbed into the front seat of the hearse, and the others, with two fat women with black veils who had been looking on, piled into the touring car.

Then one of the men jumped out of the touring car and ran back to the girl at the window, took her hand and patted it and said something or other to her. She gave two or three quick little nods and compressed her lips.

Ruddy just managed to avoid running into a car that was on its way up the hill. The tragic beauty of that sweet, grave face at the window had upset him dreadfully.

He could not get it out of his mind.

After a while he turned about and drove back up the hill. The hearse and the touring car had gone, but the girl was still sitting at the window, looking out, and as it seemed to Ruddy, seeing nothing. He had the feeling that something terrible had happened to her . . . He drove clear to the top of the hill, a mile and a half away, turned and drove slowly down.

A few blocks above the house of mourning he parked his car and continued the descent on foot. He did not know what he was going to do. He had no plan. And he could not have helped doing what he did.

He passed under the whale jaw and went straight to the window at which the girl sat. He asked for a drink of water. And that made her blush. She had to confess that she couldn't get it for him.

"I'm very lame," she said. "I've nearly always been lame. It's really worse than that. I can't walk at all."

This statement affected Ruddy just as a piece of bad news about somebody he had always known and liked would have done.

"But," he said, "suppose you wanted a drink of water or something for yourself? Are you all alone in the house?"

"I would have to wait," she said, "until somebody I knew came by . . . But you can come in and get yourself a drink of water."

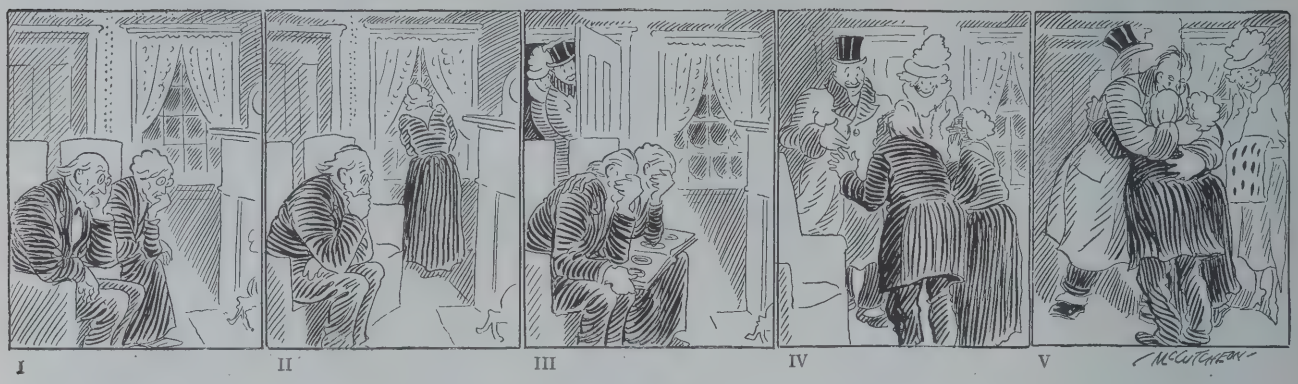
The house seemed to be divided into two halves. In one of them the girl sat with a blanket around her knees. The other was probably a bedroom. A ladder led to a loft. At the back was a lean-to kitchen.

Ruddy found a tumbler and a faucet. And though he was not thirsty he drank.

The house was very bare and unlovely. "They must be poor people," he thought. He wanted to stay and talk with the girl. Her beauty and her helplessness had touched his heart.

He had always heard that there was much good Castilian blood in Monterey, and that some of the girls were very beautiful. This girl had a Spanish look, and her beauty could not have been denied.

He paused with his hand on the door latch.



Her eyes were lifted squarely to his.

"Could you tell me the time?" she asked. He looked at his watch and told her.

"Oh dear!" she said. "Is that all?"

"Every minute of it," said Ruddy. (Continued on page 138)

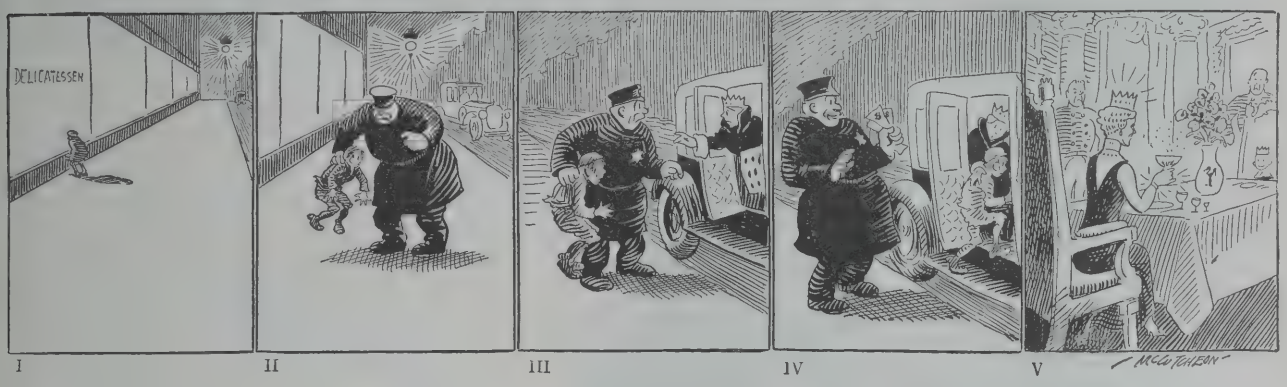
Happy Endings

MARMADUKE'S RETURN

I. It was Christmas eve, and a sorry one in the old homestead. Tomorrow the landlord is to sell the place. II. Ah, things look dark. Thirty years before had little Marmaduke run away from home and for years had been given up for lost. III. See, his picture in the album. Each Christmas eve his mother had hoped for his return. IV. "Don't you know me, father?" V. "Marmaduke! ! ! !" "Don't worry, mother, I've come back to buy the old homestead!"

LE CHEVALIER SANS-CULOTTE

I. "Oh, something besides that rent bill! An invitation to spend the week-end at the Scadworths'." II. "Only ten minutes to pack! I can think of nothing but Drusilla Scadworth." III. "Great heavens, I've packed everything but my trousers! I must feign a sudden illness." IV. "I will nurse you back to health. I took a course in nursing during the war." V. "Drusilla!" "David!"



SNAG TOOTH

I. In all the Hudson's Bay country it was said that old Snag Tooth, the beaver, would never be caught. His years were long and full of wisdom. He was wise to the snares of men. People called him bewitched. II. Pierre la Fourchet was the most dreaded man in the north country. What he wanted, he seized—all save Snag Tooth, who outwitted him, and pretty Marie La Pelle, who snapped her fingers at him. "Bring me the skin of Snag Tooth and I'll marry you," she challenged. III. Out into the great silence went Pierre. Months passed and the trading post was joyous in the thought that retribution had at last overtaken him. IV. For months the beady eyes of Pierre watched the beaver colony. Winter passed. Soon the old beavers would be on their annual migration. "By gar, I get heem then, and then that pretty Marie, he be mine!" He smiled as he lay down to sleep under the tamarack. V. As silent as the stars, creeping, creeping, old Snag Tooth edged slowly toward the tamarack beneath which Pierre lay sleeping. All through the night his teeth ate deeper and deeper into the heart of the tree. Just at daybreak it fell, true to the old beaver's plan . . . Months afterward a trapper passed that way. "Pierre's ax," he said, and gave the bones a kick . . . Thereafter there was great joy in the country and Marie La Pelle married a trapper from Bois Ste. Marie and had twelve children, six blondes and six brunettes, all of whom lived happy ever afterward.

WORDS AND PICTURES

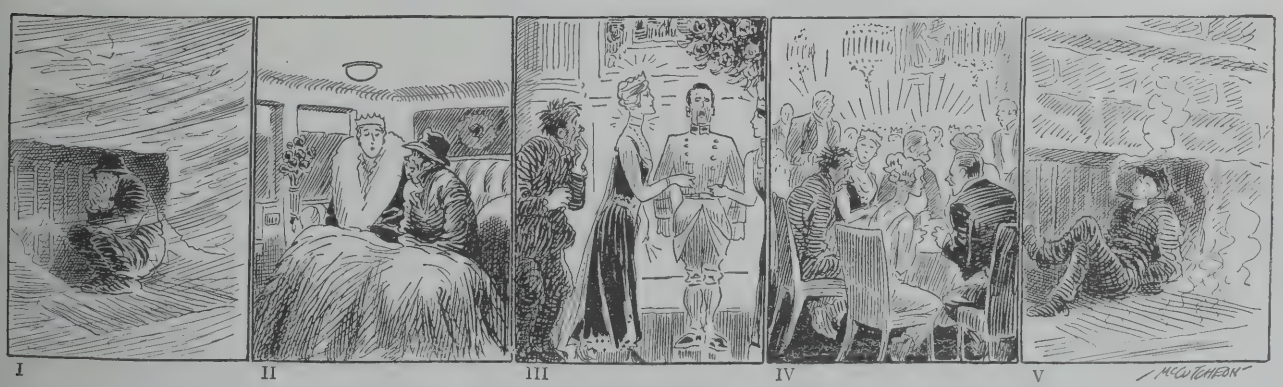
By JOHN T. McCUTCHEON

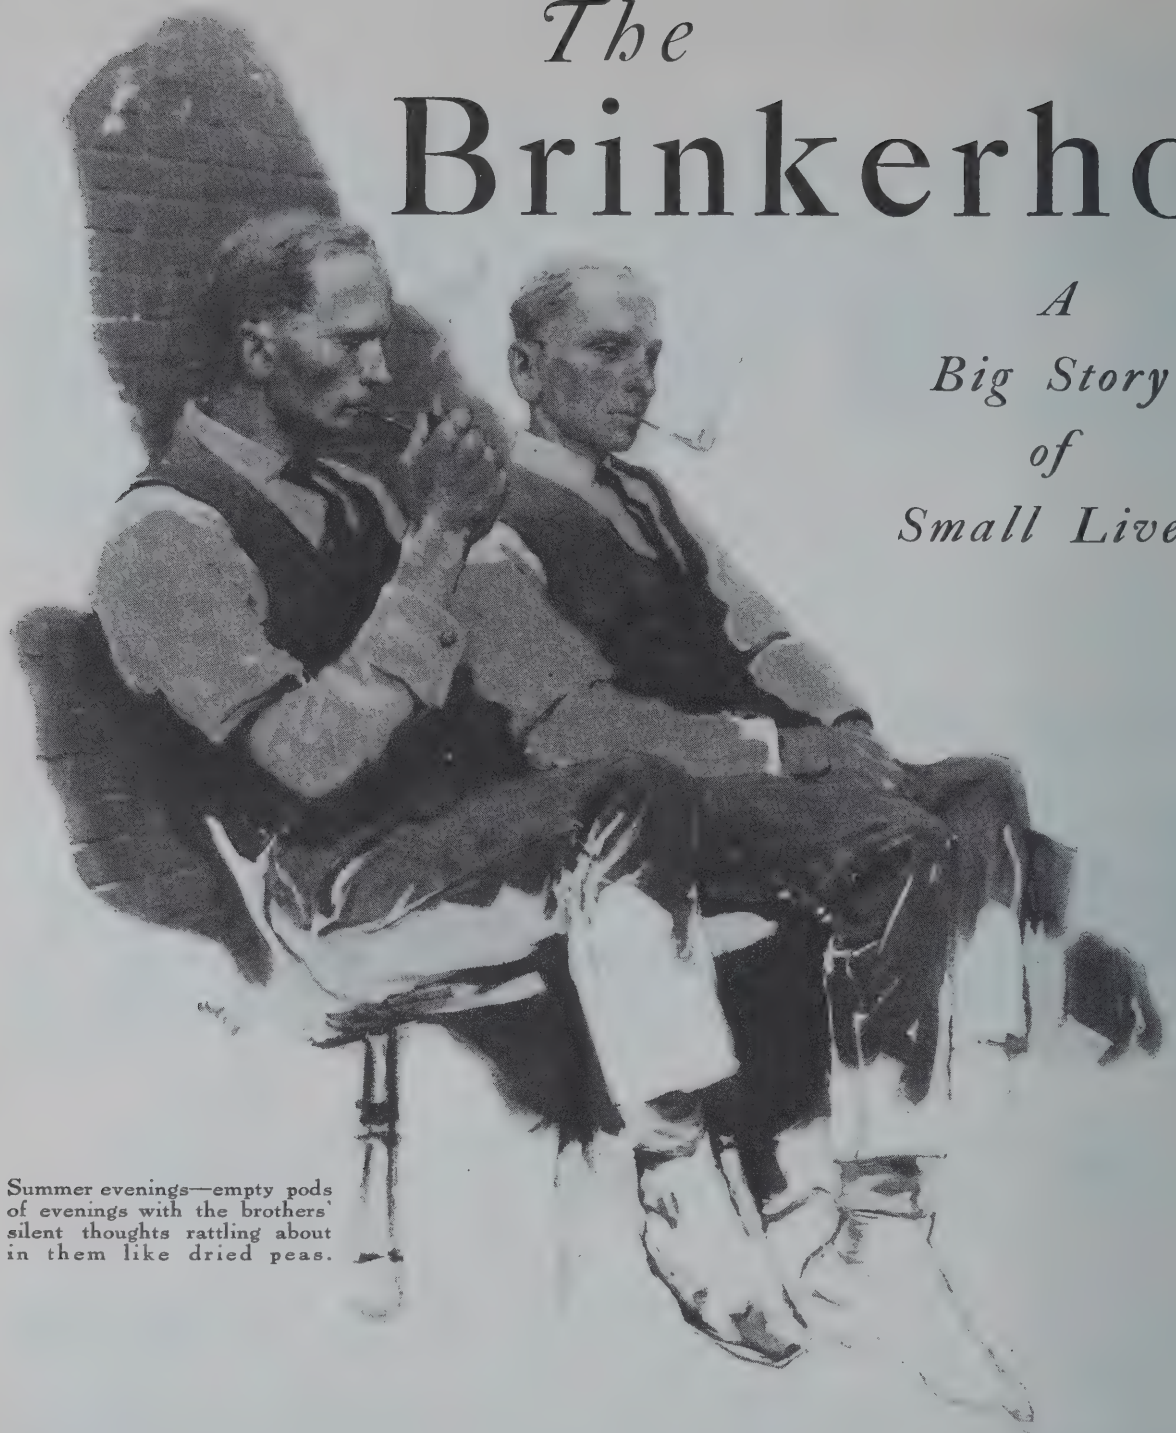


THE HEIR OF THE HOUSE OF POINDEXTER

I. A bitter night in February! II. "Here, kid, you mustn't be blockin' up the sidewalk." III. "Officer, bring that child here. Poor little fellow!' IV. "Why, child, how much you look like our little boy who was kidnaped four years ago." V. Hooray! It was the same.

CAPTAIN CHEVRON

I. From miles away came the shell that, bursting, left Captain Chevron bereft of memory. His past was a blank. II. Grinding brakes, a dizzy skid—too late! A crumpled figure collapsed against the curb. From the speeding car an anxious face looked out. III. "I remember the number!" exclaimed Chevron, when consciousness returned. And then burst upon him the dazzling realization that the fog had lifted. The crushing blow had restored his memory. Number 697,947,669 ran through his brain. IV. "Now to find the man who left me to die!" The search led to his own house. V. "My God, you alive!" "Yes," said Chevron. "And Gertrude?" "We thought you dead—she married me!" "When she thought you inherited my estate?" The other hung his head. Chevron laughed. "Keep her, and may you always be happier than you now look."



DISCONTENT

I. Ten below! On a grating crouched a derelict, fighting off the drowsiness that meant death—a wayfarer who had lost his way. Through the blizzard, rocking under the blasts, came a limousine in which a richly attired lady and gentleman sat, swathed in furs. "Lucky dog!" muttered the derelict. "I wisht I was in his place." II. A fairy, passing, heard the wish, and in an instant he was seated by the beautiful lady. "Gee, this is a swell car!" he said. The lady turned and looked long at him with emotionless eyes. He felt very uncomfortable. III. The car drew up at an imposing mansion, where the lady and the tramp were presently announced by a footman in livery. "Shall we dance?" asked the lady. "Gee, I can't dance," he answered, becoming more and more uncomfortable. "Would you prefer to sit it out?" "Sit what out?" She shrugged her shoulders. "Then you may take me in to supper." IV. At a snowy table they found places. The lady spoke to him, but he didn't know what to say, or what fork to use, or what to do with his hands. He had never been so miserable. "Gee, I wisht I was out o' this," he groaned. "My car will take you back," said the lady. "I own that building, and you may use the grating as long as you wish . . ." V. By this time the storm had abated and a pleasant warmth arose from the grating. "Gee, I feel more at home here," murmured the derelict, lighting one of the cigars he had brought from the mansion.

The Brinkerhoff

A Big Story of Small Lives

Summer evenings—empty pods of evenings with the brothers' silent thoughts rattling about in them like dried peas.

THE beat to the day by day of the brothers Brinkerhoff was rather like the tick-tock of one of those family clocks with a nosegay painted on the glass door. The kind that stands on the mantelpiece between the blue glass vases with the warts blown into them.

There was the odor of the room that contained that clock about the brothers Brinkerhoff. Horsehair. The carpet hassock that always felt damp. The hard coal stove when the soot was cold.

But it was nineteen years since the brothers had known that identical room in the house on Papin Street in South St. Louis. A father with a spade-shaped beard had died there one night in a high black walnut bedstead, his face as four-cornered in death as it had been in life.

A mother who had tended him and the two sons through the long lethal silences into which these men could sink at meals, had died two months later while redding the strip of brick walk that led up to the white scoured steps of the house on Papin Street.

The brothers had boarded the nineteen years since with a "private family" on Maffit Avenue on the North Side. It was nearer the St. Louis Coal and Ice Company.

There were about eighteen months between them but most people thought them twins. You never felt quite right about their names. Somehow, Oscar's should have been Ichabod. And Henry's, well—Ichabod too.

You remember the nymph of Crete who named all her little nymphs Ariel because they simply would not resemble any other name?

Poor little Mrs. Brinkerhoff, who bore her sons in the big black walnut bedstead the very first thing after she arrived from a cisalpine village and who in all her years of mothering her three silent men had not learned how not to call them Uscar, Hennery and Puppa; poor little Mrs. Brinkerhoff, she should have called them just Ichabods all.

Oscar was the younger. His head had slightly the look of being set on a pole. The pole of his body. And his arms were very long, so long that—but "Ichabod" says it all again. Before the swift descriptive potency of Ichabod, to further describe the brothers Brinkerhoff, their little doilies of thinning hair or the dry crackle of Henry's finger joints, were redundancy.

And now back to the tick and tock of their daily lives. It was just that. Tick for Monday. Tock for Tuesday. Tick. Tock. And the little spans of silence in between were the nights, when the brothers slept side by side in the second story back of the private family named Burby on Maffit Avenue.

It was a square room with one window which overlooked the Burbys' long, narrow back yard with a brick ash pit at the far end, and little Bettina Burby's rag doll and kiddie car usually kicked into the dry stubble of city grass. It contained a double

FANNIE HURST

Brothers

Illustrations by
Herbert M. Stoops

It all happened so suddenly. Trina—blonde and nervous and twenty-eight—and Oscar.

oak bed, chiffonier with two equidistant burnt collar and cuff boxes—the brothers wore detach- cuffs—and on the mantelpiece regarding each other little fretwork balconies, velvet framed photo- hs of the father whose jaw was grim with the bite false teeth; and the mother who always said Uscar Hennery and Puppa, her face full of the ravages of years of redding the bricks of Papin Street, and her cent, crocheted collar closed at the throat with a rooch photograph of her sons, aged four and a half and x, Oscar's left ear mashed softly against Henry's right.

Mrs. Burby kept a red velvet rocker from the parlor in the brothers' room because the springs rose up so when guests sat down on it, and up over the doorway, gazing down into the calm tick and tock of Brinkerhoff comings and goings, was a large crayon portrait of a deceased Burby, who looked like Brigham Young.

That picture exercised a slow and rather pleasant hypnosis over Henry. He liked, for instance, to start fastening his suspenders in one corner of the room and watch the eyes slide right after him over to the chiffonier for his sleeve garters. The brothers wore both suspenders and sleeve garters. They would. Well, standing, say, between the red velvet chair and the bed, these eyes above the transom could seem to press against Henry's own light blue ones like hot pennies, or sitting down on the bed edge to clump off his shoes, or shaving in the square of mirror over the washstand, he could feel their warm ball-like quality and even imagine they would give slightly if he pressed against them.

"By George, it's right human the way those photographers get those eyes to move. Just like they're human."

This was quite a speech for Henry who as a rule merely grunted while he did such things as dive into his shirt—yes, the brothers still wore them that way—or lift up a triangle of cheek to the razor.

More frequently the silence of their dressing was broken only by Bettina Burby shrilling in the back yard, the opening and shutting of a drawer, or Mrs. Burby sizzling their breakfast beefsteak in the kitchen which was directly beneath their room, or mostly just by Henry's grunts, which were nothing more than the leak of the vocal into his breathing.

There was something rather wonderful about the silences between these men. By the time they were around forty it had gathered in between them like a deep sunless pool beside which they could sit and smoke their pipes in an endless Pu Pu of utter passivism.

The Burbys, after years of these stilly men, came to regard them as "two of the family," and talk flew about their heads at the dinner table in a merry hailstorm that seemed literally to bounce off the slightly bald heads of the brothers.

Burby had a wall paper store on Easton Avenue, a street of small businesses that skirted the North Side. He was enormously stout and wheezed so that when he was at home it was exactly as if a small motor were at work in the house. Mrs. Burby, who was pretty in the jelled sort of way that the overweight can be pretty, wore her apron in a perpetual muff about her short dimpled arms. She had an eighteen year old son in the Navy and a three year old daughter, Bettina. The neighborhood regarded the interval as not quite nice.

The brothers she called Mr. O. and Mr. H. to their faces, but to the neighbors with whom she held endless back yard and telephone conferences, she could wax facetious.

"Don't faint, but the Brinkeys won't be home to supper tonight. Nineteenth meal they've missed in nineteen years. St. Louis Coal and Ice Company's annual bonus picnic." Or, "I don't own a clock that runs. But I should worry about a clock when my Brinkeys' comings and goings, are as much to the minute as the sun is."

And so it was. To the dot, at twenty minutes past seven, in their alpaca suits in summer and mixture sack suits in winter, the rather stern black string ties and the square-toed shoes, well blacked, the brothers Brinkerhoff breakfasted.

First, four drops in a glass of water out of a bottle of raspberry colored liquid that stood in the center of the table beside the vinegar cruet—the brothers were subject to acid stomach—then a piece of well pounded, well done beefsteak, hashed browned potatoes, coffee from a granite pot that stood on a raffia mat, and two slices of thick untoasted bread.

Since the advent of little Bettina, Oscar, always a little the spokesman for the two, invariably left two cone-shaped chocolate bonbons on the wooden bib of her empty high chair. They were fond of the goldy little girl after a Brinkerhoff fashion. Oscar said "boo" to her and Henry made noises in between his teeth and cheek that sounded like his tin-tired buggy turning a short corner.

The St. Louis Coal and Ice Company still used horses. Round-bellied, three-ton teams with splendid shaggy forelegs and veins that could bulge thick as a wrist under the drag, moved with the dignity of leisure through the motor maze of the city's traffic.

The company, for the brothers' lighter purposes of city collecting, supplied the Brinkerhoffs each with a chestnut filly and a two-seated storm buggy with a black apron which buttoned over the front against rain. Henry covered a portion of North St. Louis and Oscar what was known as the more or less fashionable West End. The St. Louis Coal and Ice Company did not mail its city and county bills.

The brothers Brinkerhoff were city collectors. Long, satisfactory, uninterrupted records. True, that one Aloysius Jones who had once shared a portion of the North St. Louis route with Oscar was now a vice-president of the firm, and whenever a death or a resignation moved certain employees a notch along in advancement, the eyes of the corporation seemed resolutely turned away from the brothers Brinkerhoff.

But in the twenty-one years there had been five advances in salary. It was forty dollars a week now, and often a bonus at Christmas.

They were content. Little fishes, little bones, as the saying goes. The brothers apparently wanted but little here below.

Summer evenings, with the Burbys buzzing on the square of front porch and the brick wall of the house next door for their vistas, they tilted their straight chairs against the side of the house, puffing their pipes, and the pool formed between them, the pool of silence, their bodies like tall cypresses bordering it.

"That Briggs account over on De Tonty Street don't look any too strong."

"So?"

"Seventeen ton bituminous."

"So?"

Pu. Pu. Pu.

Long, cool, purple intervals, tip-tilted there against the side of the house until ten o'clock and to bed. Empty pods of evenings with the brothers' silent thoughts rattling about in them like dried peas.

Bricks that breathed out like a feverish little child sleeping in the dark with its mouth open.

Often a radio machine in the house next door caught up a woman's singing voice from the air and flung it like a scarf across the darkness. A lovely, fluctuating scarf that had color to it. It was not difficult to squeeze sibilant colors out of the darkness. Squinting the eyes did it. Orange, for instance, had a soaring note to it that could mount and mount until it became just a gleaming point of melody, like a star. Trills were sort of the blue of running water. Colorature, that adorable watermelon pink of a woman's mouth when she yawns. These particular fancies could play the very devil with Oscar. No sooner conceived than they could confuse him violently. Color has melody. No—melody has color. Oh, nonsense—just nonsense!

"Sofia's got a stone bruise on her left hind leg, Henry, bothering her right much."

"So?"

"Yes."

"Freckert's Liniment."

"M-m-m."

There! That little note from the radio! A wounded mouse-colored note with a woman crying down in it. A Mrs. Snyder on Newstead Avenue, who opened the door for him the first of every month, had a throat that must hold a note like that. It throbbed a little when she talked like the bleating breast of a dove. He must turn in that claim. Otto B. Snyder. Three thousand pounds of ice—her lips. No, no. Not her lips. Any lovely lips. He could conjure a curved and scented pair into the darkness that poised like butterfly wings against the brick wall opposite. Lips. Even Mrs. Burby's, which dragged a bit and could be greasy from gnawing along a chop bone—even h… fluty—bah——

"Freckert's Liniment is too weak."

"Try iodine."

Oscar had never touched a woman's lips, except his mo… He had kissed them when they lay dead, they were so pit… him. But not—that way. The way of the lips in the darkn…

These imagings, modernly called suppressed desires… picked at random, might have been either Oscar's or Hen… Except that, of the two, Henry was perhaps the more asc… Curious that these two men could have slid through… so narrowly. Like slab-sided cats oozing between pore… Deep down in the secret places of Henry's pool, his o… merged water lilies of fancy could open too, under the… They were so naïvely free of desire, his fancies. Almost … because they belonged to Henry. He really had a lovely… lily pad. It was the color of Bettina. All goldy it c… and flaunt in an enormous rosette right before his eyes… where imprisoned in his spangled fancy was the innoce… herself. And so his darkness, all inchoate, could v… into just a gold-dust kind of haze with little girl laug… Henry, whose adolescence had been even more lan… Oscar's, dozed in this haze. The haze of the golden la… the little girl Bettina.

At ten o'clock then, by the thick disk of Oscar's wa… The thud of four shoes. The decent black string ties laid… beneath the mattress. Pipes cleaned and airing on the … sill. The brothers kept two pipes each going. For swe… Monday's pipe airing on Tuesday, and Tuesday's pipe… on Wednesday.

These were the Brinkerhoff brothers when Mrs. Burby… to her bed of sciatic rheumatism and Miss Trina Blankenme… a sister of Mrs. Burby's step-mother, came from Herculan… Missouri, to run the house.

It all happened so suddenly. Henry first detected it … laugh. An upward rush of it from Oscar one morning w… Trina handed him the coffee pot, as if a lot of unsuspec… emotions over which he had absolutely no control had sudde… clattered out over everything like a dropped tray of tin thing… It was horrible. Henry felt his pores begin to swell outwa… and then seem to prick open as if he were a nutmeg grater, an… Trina jumped back with the pot so that she splashed coffee u… her bare arm.

Oscar alone seemed innocent of his plight. The plight of… baring his long horsy teeth to laugh out loud and then reaching… over with a killing expression to fleck off with his napkin the… stain on Trina's arm.

Henry felt actually sick for him, and as if not another bite of beefsteak nor his Adam's apple would ever swallow down again.

For the first time in nineteen years and for highly different reasons, two portions of unfinished beefsteak went back to the kitchen that morning. When Mrs. Burby, from her bed of pain, heard about it she said, "Great heavens, it's the millennium!"

But then that sharply faceted thing, her woman's intuition, pounced and just lifted Trina up, so that she saw several different lights on her at once.

"Don't throw it away," she said, meaning the beefsteak of course. "You can grind it up for Burby's lunch."

But her eyes from their angle on the pillow followed Trina out of the room. The little swing to the uncorseted hips. The cling of the gingham skirt to their roundness.

Trina was blonde and nervous and twenty-eight. She wore such high-power glasses, the rimless kind with gold frames, that her eyes seemed to swim right up against the lenses like an enormous and terribly intent gaze that could remain open in water and stare through it.

When she removed the spectacles, they left a red welt across her nose and a sort of doused Trina as if someone had put out a light. She was so nervous she would jump if you spoke without first clearing your throat or indicating that you had intentions, as she did when Oscar's laugh spilled over the breakfast, and for the life of her she could not keep one particular strand of hair, which she crimped with an iron, from dangling.

The one gesture which describes her most clearly was the arc of her narrow arm going up to wind that strand behind her ear. Her indulgence of it was mammoth. It made you hot inside each time she wound it, as if a nerve of your very private own were suddenly going to throw up its hands and yell. It made Henry feel that way. Trina, passing him the hashed-browned potatoes with one hand and winding her hair with the other.

Already Henry was aching with the sense of his thirdness. And there was something terrible about Oscar.

But Oscar—suddenly and for the first unsuppressed time hat upward curve of a woman's arm, with the little white nest at the elbow, shot through him with the lancinating jab of a hypodermic.

All those darting elusive gadflies across the pool of the silence. The shimmer of submerged sensation. The golden flank of half an ecstasy that never rose to the surface. That shiny, slimy pool beside the cypress of himself, full of the forbidden thoughts of women's lips and sound that was like a colored scarf across his senses. All suddenly concrete in Trina, risen luminous out of this pool of scuttling desires. Trina, who must have floated downstream looking at him with her blue eyes magnified by water, here at his side now, passing him the kohl-rabi and the stewed rhubarb, and scalding her preciously real arm because he had startled her with the long-toothed laugh of his ecstasy.

She had come to him so suddenly, turning the long dull years of his feeble adolescence into a garden that led to her. Oscar was in love to the beating of shawms and cymbals in his brain.

To Henry, the three events that led to Oscar's marriage were every bit as decisive as the battles of Marathon and Arbela and Tours. The Tuesday evening that Oscar stopped Trina in the pantry and asked her to walk out with him after the dishes were washed. The Labor Day excursion ride down the Mississippi to Cahokia. The Sunday afternoon that Henry usurped his place and Oscar took Trina for a drive in the storm buggy to Chain of Rocks. This last, of course, was the precipitant event. Oscar and Trina came home engaged.

That evening, no sooner were the brothers in their room than Oscar suddenly faced Henry, two round spots of color on top of his cheeks as if they had been placed there with a rubber stamp. It is doubtful whose heart beat loudest, Oscar's or Henry's, whose Adam's apple wouldn't swallow down again.

"Henry," said Oscar, "that little, gold band from Mutter. You don't mind if I got use for it now? Trina . . ."

It was the first reference between them to Trina. Henry, who wanted to answer, only stood there sort of waving his eyelids, and so finally, when his throat would not unlock, he walked over to the chiffonier and drew out of a drawer the little pasteboard box of their joint relics. There were a pair of gold and black earrings shaped like urns. A gold and black bracelet to match. The ceramic of the two little boys with their ears touching, and the band ring set with a chip diamond, the gold cut out in little rays around it.

Handing it to Oscar, something that he would have burst his throat to avoid happened to Henry. He broke out crying. A long bruise of a sob, as if some fugitive terribly wounded were hiding in a marsh. The marsh of Henry's heart.

And on that moan from the innermost of Henry, Oscar, who felt as if he were drowning in his brother's tears, went down before the first sobs these men had ever known.

It was too awful. Henry, who kept his lips lashed against his teeth and his mouth working up and down like some poor old man with empty gums, and Oscar who flung one hand on his brother's shoulder and let his head sink down on his outstretched arm.

"Don't, brother, I can't stand it."

Not since their mother's funeral had they addressed one another as brother.

"I'm glad for you, brother."

"She's a goot girl, Henry."

"So?"

"A goot worker. A companion."

"We've been goot companions, too, Oscar."

"Yes, Henry. But—a woman. That's life."

"We've been well off by ourselves, Oscar. No heartache A quiet life is goot." Under stress they did that to their d's.

"I need a little heartache in my life, Henry. A happy hea ache—like I got from Trina."

Lower sank Henry's head.

"A woman is a woman. They make troubles."

"Without troubles, Henry, I have thought it out for myse a man has no contrast to know when he has happiness."

"Women, Oscar, I've seen it a hundred times. T best of them, the same. Shennanigans. Sickness. Doct bills. Bearing down pains like Mrs. Burby, and pink pills."

On a Sunday afternoon Oscar took Trina for a ride. This was the precipitant event.

"Not Trina. She's goot. And strong, Henry. Strong as Sofia. Her nerves are on top, but strong."

"We've been so well off alone, Oscar. Quiet."

"A woman, Henry. God made man to want her."

"Not every man. There have always been men like us in the world. It's been so goot together, so long—without."

"Not any more for me—since Trina."

Suddenly Henry knew it was no use. So he took Oscar's hand and pressed it, digging the gold trinkets up into it until they cut.

"Brother," he said.

"It will never be different with us, Henry. Trina is a grand girl. You will always have it goot with us—in our home."

Over the phrase "in our home" Oscar seemed to swell up in a way that was actually froggy. Little puffs came out over his eyebrows and on the spots where his ears lapped to his cheeks.

"Thank you, brother," said Henry, but in his heart the tears were still running. He knew. This was his last of Oscar.

Trina and Oscar were married four weeks later in the Cote Brilliante Avenue Church. Bettina Burby carried the bride's veil and spread it about her so that when she knelt down she was in the bower of her tulle. There were no other attendants, but Henry and the Burbys and the bride's sister from Herculaneum occupied half of the first front row. Mr. Burby wheezed, the organ played "Melody in F," and the rector's voice, intoning the service, seemed to mount to the double archings of the church, and the gargoyles to chew it into echoes and mouth it out again.

In the yellow light from a stained window there was something terrible in the sternness of Oscar. His face was so square with his will to respond in mighty "I do's." His long black coat so solemn. Hired, but giving him the odor of a park statue of a statesman.

And Trina. She dropped her bouquet of white narcissus and twice during the ceremony, in the agony of her nervousness, wound at the strand of hair. But her eyes were soft. Like bluebells under water, and they did not seem to protrude so against the lenses, and when she kissed her (Continued on page 144)

By H. C.

Whose humor

as Corn

Sherlock's

Illustrations by

YOU know, really, matrimony has ruined more companionships than anything else in the world. What I mean is, many a boy and girl which was the best of pals has busted up their lifelong friendship by getting wed—to each other. To your little girl friend Gladys, one of the finest things about getting married is that nobody has to.

Don't get the idea that I'm a grouchy old maid or an unhappy bride in a gilded cage or the equivalent. I'm not. Although I have often bumped into Cupid in hurrying along the boulevard of Life, I have yet to see a duplicate of Adam which made my heart go pitty-pat for more than briefly, though I've had as many matrimonial propositions filed with me as Solomon ever did. I suppose some day I'll get drunk with emotion and blushingly murmur "Yes!" to some other reckless gambler before I come to my senses. But after the experience I have just went through I wouldn't marry Gunga Din, and if you don't know what a good man he was then you have never heard nobody recite in your life!

Maybe what makes me view the noted male sex with the eye of a Second Avenue pawnbroker examining a pledge from a sailor, is that I'm in a better position to watch 'em do their stuff than most girls. As a switchboard operator at the Hotel St. Moe, a Broadway inn where they gnash their teeth when the guest departs with his right eye, I am really seeing the boys perform from a box seat. Being young, fairly nimble at cross-fire patter and a good window dresser when it comes to tastefully arranging such attractions as I have in stock, I get a heavy play daily from the sturdy men folk. It's always the height of the social season with me and invitations to everything from wine to wedlock fairly swamp me, really. But as I'm just a little telephone girl alone in wild New York, I am more exclusive than I understand they are in Buckingham Palace.

I got to be! I've found out that most of these boys can't eat dinner without you take the fact that this is the Land of Liberty too seriously. Believe me, when I sit at the board and tell 'em I got their number I mean it in more ways than one! Therefore, I treat these invitations to come out and play as if they were all mad dogs and in that way I get all of the laughs and none of the tears most women get out of all men.

However, all work and no play is how to get a nervous breakdown, so sometimes I do pastime a little with the yearner sex. Every once in a while I'll meet one that I just can't resist taking apart to see what makes him go. Like Julius De Haven, for instance. I took that young man out of the chorus of a Broadway musical comedy and made him a star and he showed his gratitude by offering me his heart and hand for a reward. Like all men, he considered that some gift!

Well, at the moment I couldn't use Julius as a spouse—though he was a nice kid—and after he was away on the road for either a couple of weeks or four months, I broke out with a yen for a mild flirtation to assassinate time till my boy friend comes back. I saw no harm in it, properly conducted, so I run my eye over the field in search of a likely victim. I found one in Mons Hurricane Sherlock, a full-blooded prize fighter and light-heavyweight champion of our popular planet. This was my first experience in toying with gentlemen who make their coffee and cakes through assault and battery and I'll tell both hemispheres it will be the last! What a shock this entry gave me—warm canine!

In round numbers, the way Hurricane Sherlock darkened my threshold was like thus:

Jerry Murphy is parked against the switchboard one morning, trying to do himself some good as usual. This master mind is the house detective at the St. Moe and a good scout, but he will never cause the world to forget Sherlock Holmes when it comes to gumshoe work. They could shoplift the lobby of this trap and it would be weeks before the news reached Jerry, and in the lobby is where he stands. However, I can't help bestowing a grain of womanly sympathy on this great big meaningless blah, because he really thinks I'm the clam's overshoes and I never give him a tumble. Anyways, he comes over this day and tells me to give room 1584 a bell. After a minute I pulled out the plug and informed Jerry there was no answer.

"Then I'll just bound up and give 'at baby's cave a frisk!" remarks Jerry. "His name's Bartlett—know him?"

"Bartlett?" I says. "No, I don't know him personally, but I've eaten a lot of his pears."

"What d'ye mean you have eat his pears?" asks Jerry, the picture of stupidity. "I don't make you."

"And you never will make me!" I says sweetly. "What has this Mr. Bartlett done which forces you to search his belongings?"

"Say!" says Jerry, snubbing my question while his face brightens up like a full moon, which is what it greatly resembles, "I got you now about this Bartlett and them pears. Ha, ha, ha 'at's one for the book! You have eat a lot of Bartlett's pears hey? I'll spring that nifty on the night clerk and——"

"And you'll get it all balled up and ask him does he know is as American on the Cob

WITWER

Home

J. W. McGurk

Mister Sickle," I interrupt. "I'm still waiting to hear what this pear manufacturer done."

"Oh!" says Jerry. "Why, he's got them bellhops run ragged gettin' him Scotch from the corner drug store and if I find over a case in his room I got orders to check him out. He's thirstier than them two Enforcement guys we had here. As Doc Cooey would say, every day in every way he's gettin' wetter and wetter!"

At this critical minute a husky voice rumbles over Jerry's shoulder.

"Kin a man make a phone call here when youse people gits done kiddin' each other?"

I straighten up haughtier than haughty itself, prepared to give this noisy newcomer frostbite with a single glance, and Jerry swings around with a growl. Then an odd thing happens. The manslaughter disappears from Jerry's eyes with comical and magical speed and is replaced by a look of awe. A nervous grin appears on his shaky lips and all of a sudden Jeremiah has no longer got a florid complexion. If I wasn't acquainted with Jerry I would think he was scared. As I am acquainted with him, I knew he was scared.

" 'At's—'at's Hurricane Sherlock, the light-heavyweight champ," he says to me in a hoarse whisper, bending over the switchboard. "I—I guess I'll go and see this guy Bartlett about them, now, lemons of his!" Exit Jerry.

"Who's that dizzy clown?" sneers the stranger and bends over himself for a good look at me.

I returned his glance with usurious interest and noted with pride that in two seconds flat he was attempting the difficult feat of swallowing his Adam's apple and his face was flushed a dull red. That shows me I have lost none of my potency as a pulse-quickener, and with that all settled I take stock of my opponent. I see a tall, nobbily dressed young fellow with shoulders like a set of walking beams and a whimsical quirk to his lip, à la Dick Barthelmess. Later, I found out that whimsical quirk was placed there by one Rough House Trainor, who used a right hook for the purpose. However, I have seen worse lookers than Hurricane Sherlock, though I've never hunted for any.

H. C. WITWER

Composer of Exercises for the muscles of Laughter

But prize fighters are about as thrilling to me as a lesson in swimming would be to a middle-aged goldfish, so I quickly snapped into it. I didn't care for the gentleman's approach and there is nobody going to push me around, whether they're light-heavyweight champion or dark-heavyweight champion!

"Did you wish a number?" I ask, as cold as a winter's night in dear old Siberia.

Mr. Hurricane Sherlock comes to earth with a start.

"Wam!" he says, half to himself and the other half to me. "What a disturbance you are! Where have I been all your life, good lookin'?"

"If you think that line will get you anything here, you're crazy!" I remark, and on each word is an iceberg so large it would be a menace to navigation. "What number do you want me to give you?"

"Well, let's start with your address," says Hurricane Sherlock, with the goofiest of grins.

"Be yourself, big boy!" I says, getting a bit steamed. "I'm busy. I have no time to play with you. If you don't behave yourself, I'll call the house detective and have you put out!"

"Lady," says my adversary, "you can't have me put out! I ain't never been put out in my life. I ain't never even been knocked off my feet!"

"Yes, yes—go on!" I says, merrily working my plugs. "And where are the jewels now?"

Hurricane Sherlock looks puzzled for a instant and then he grins.

"Say, you're quite a kidder, ain't you?" he says. "Well. I ain't no dumb Isaac either, get me? I'm Hurricane Sherlock—does that mean anything to you?"

"Not a thing!" I says deliberately. "I don't know whether you're a traffic cop or Vice-president of Chili. Do you wish to make a call or don't you?"

"I'll make that call in good time," says Hurricane, "and don't tell me you never heard of me. I'm light-heavyweight champ of the world!"

"That's your own fault," I says. "Sorry, but I can't use you."

Hurricane Sherlock stares at me like he thinks both his kind of cumbersome ears have commenced lying to him.

"You don't wish no part of me—the world's champeen?" he says in amazement. "Say, Cutey, don't be cheatin' yourself! D'ye know I clicked off a hundred thousand smackers in the ring last year?"

"The place to go with that information is the income tax collector," I says. "Why bother me with your business troubles? I have quite a collection of phone numbers here, can I sell you one?"

"Yeah, gimme a pink one," grins Hurricane Sherlock. "And listen, kid—me and you is goin' to see a lot of each other, so you might as well start right in gettin' used to me. I ain't a bad guy when they treat me right—when they don't treat me right, I'm poison. Now give Worth 86753 a bell and make it snappy!"

Honest, I'm so overcome with this fellow's nerve that I can't think of a comeback! I just nodded him to a booth and got him the number. He talked about five minutes to his manager. I know it was his manager because I passed up at least four much more spicier phone conversations to listen in on him. When he come out he tossed a dollar on the switchboard.

"Keep the change and buy yourself a railroad," he says. "I'll be back again tonight and we'll talk about this and that!"

If nerve was money, Hurricane Sherlock would of made Rockefeller look like a public charge, now wouldn't he?

From then on it was a case of try and keep the world's champion light-heavyweight away from my switchboard. I treated him with about the same courtesy a ferret shows to a mouse, but if you think that bothered Hurricane you're crazy. He was what you call insult-proof and sarcasm rolled off his good natured smile like rain off a mallard's back. He soon become as permanent as the East River and he was just about as exciting to me! Furthermore, he murdered all competition, because none of these lobby hounds which ordinarily moored at my board all day trying to promote themselves had any desire to get in a jam with a gentleman who made his living by being light-heavyweight champion of the world.

Well, as the days went by and Hurricane Sherlock continued to hang around me like a tent, I get a new angle on him. I see that while he may not mean anything in my young life, he's plenty important to others.

Prominent people such as heavy business men, high-powered actors, bankers, lawyers, osteopaths and bootleggers who stop at my switchboard to try and get phone calls, look on the light-heavyweight champion with open fascination. Some of them kind of timidly say "Good afternoon, Hurricane," and when he grudgingly returns a careless nod, why, honest, they almost swoon with joy. Aren't men funny?

But that isn't the half of it. The other girls on the board make no mystery of the fact that they would be more than willing to trade off their sweeties for my great big husky boy friend. A lot of good vamping was showered on Hurricane Sherlock—and wasted, because he had eyes and words for nobody but me. The bellhops, clerks, elevator boys, porters, in fact all the help at the St. Moe give Hurricane attention that would of flattered Julius Cæsar, and they tell me there was a fellow who liked applause. All my box fighting friend has got to do is crook a finger and he gets all the service there is on tap in our hostelry. The funny part of it is that Hurricane Sherlock isn't even stopping at the hotel—he's merely stopping at my switchboard.

And the questions they ask me when they get me away from him! "Did he say anything about his scuffle with Kid Fisher?" "Is he really going to give the Frenchman a chance at his title?" "Ask him is he going to fight Young McWagon?"

All this and many more, till they got me dizzy, no fooling! Even the hard-boiled Jerry Murphy, generally annoyingly jealous of every male who throws me a glance, treats Hurricane Sherlock with respectful admiration.

The smith offers the world's champion a job at twenty a week. Fawncy that!

When Hurricane grudgingly returns a nod, why, honest, they almost swoon with joy. Aren't men funny?

Then I begin to sit up and pay attention to myself. Julius De Haven, my most promising candidate for the exacting portfolio of fiancé, had been away a long time and was scheduled to be away a long time more. Well, no matter what you might of heard to the opposite, I am human. Also, I was lonely. This attention Hurricane Sherlock was getting from the mob commences to make an impression on me, in spite of my honest attempts to throw it off. I find myself reasoning that Hurricane Sherlock is not just a fighter, he's a world champion, and that's hard to dismiss with a laugh!

Likewise, Hurricane was far from difficult to gaze at, if you forget that his nose is the least bit out of true and one of his ears could do with a little overhauling.

Don't get the idea that I was beginning to stumble in love with this large fellow, because I wasn't, though I was the next thing to positive that he was double cuckoo over me. But I was getting tired of going to the movies by myself or just sitting home wishing every night I was off duty. So I finally gave in to Hurricane's pleadings and accepted his urgent invitation to see him fight another highbrow entitled "12-Punch" O'Bernstein.

Oo la la, I will recall that evening for quite a space! To start with, I had never acted as a witness to a prize fight before in all my young life and you can imagine that I looked forward to this one with plenty excitement. Just what to wear at this carnival of aggravated assault was a problem which gave me no little trouble. I didn't know whether an evening gown or sport clothes were in order and the suggestions made by the jealous ones on the switchboard with me were only comical and not useful. Just what I did wear I don't remember now, you'll have to ask someone who saw me. People who see me usually remember everything about me, if you know what I mean.

Hurricane made me a present of two seats in a ringside box.

"Who are you goin' to take with you, kid?" he asks.

"I don't know," I says thoughtfully, thinking how Jerry Murphy would like to see this fight with me. "Why—does it make any difference who my escort is?"

"No difference at all," says Hurricane grimly. "No difference at all—as long as it ain't a man. Because should you take a man with you, why, they will be a strange guy tryin' to kid his way past St. Peter the next mornin', that's all!"

So I took the hint and Hazel Killian, my girl friend.

Well, this brawl was lovely and brutal while it lasted, but then six minutes isn't very long. It took Hurricane Sherlock just two boisterous rounds to smite 12-Punch O'Bernstein "for a loop," as Hurricane put it, and a pleasant time was had by all—with the exception of Mons O'Bernstein and Hazel Killian. It was really a beastly evening for both of them! In the second round, Hurricane Sherlock broke his tête-à-tête's ankle with a punch on the jaw and Hazel fainted when Hurricane's nose persisted in bleeding all over everything as the net result of Mons O'Bernstein's earnest efforts before he was executed. Personally, I enjoyed my first prize fight thoroughly, which I hope isn't unladylike. But really, I got quite a thrill when Hurricane waved his glove to me as he left the ring amid the thundering cheers of the big crowd.

Anyhow, Hurricane Sherlock and I got much better acquainted after that evening and one day at lunch he told me the story of his life. I simply can't understand why every man I meet is unable to prevent himself from giving me his unsolicited biography about the third time we see each other, but nevertheless, they do. Honest, it makes me feel like a jury!

However, this day my usually cheerful cave man was all gloomed up. I asked him what was the matter, expecting a noncomittal reply, and then I was going to ask him something else. I never got a chance to ask him nothing else for the best part of an hour, as his answer to my first question took that long to pass a given point. I was the given point. Try and keep awake and I'll tell you what he told me.

It seems Hurricane had just returned from a voyage to his boyhood home, East Silo, N. Y., and the visit had practically ruined him. When he was a tot there he was the town joke and they all shoved him around till at the mellow age of sixteen he leaped a freight and left East Silo prostrate on its back. Hurricane's modest plans were to conquer the world and then come back and make East Silo like it.

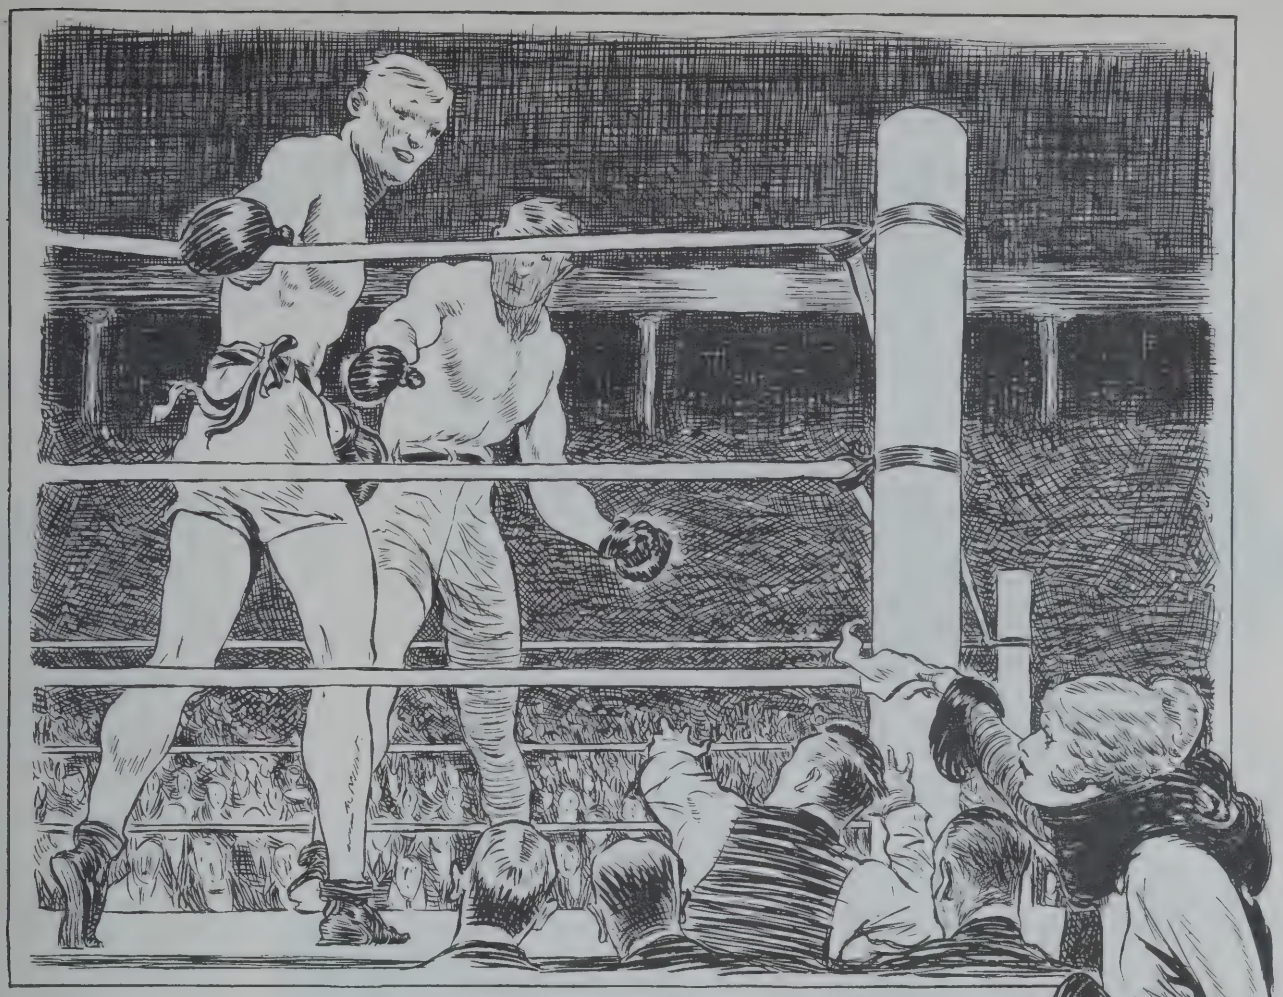
Well, Hurricane made good! After various ups and downs he renounced the frivolous pleasures of the world and entered the prize ring. He didn't get the nickname "Hurricane" because he was timid, and the first thing you know he had hauled off and won the world's light-heavyweight championship. Hardly a day slips over the horizon that his name isn't in the newspapers, he takes in around a hundred thousand milureis a year, he has offers to fight in London at the National Sporting Club—where the Prince of Wales will shake his hand after he bounces some English heavyweight—and thousands turn out to cheer him every time he fights. In a word, Hurricane Sherlock has done his stuff and he means something!

So back he goes to East Silo, the old home town, figuring that the brass band, the mayor and a welcoming committee of important citizens would joyfully greet him at the station. He expected, and he had a right to expect, that a holiday would be declared, Main Street would be a mass of flags and bunting and speeches would flow like water.

No such thing! Nobody turned a hair when Hurricane Sherlock blew into town. They didn't give him a rumble. Boxing and boxers mean nothing to the natives of East Silo and the older citizens who remembered him told him he ought to be ashamed of himself going around hitting people and why don't he go to work? The village blacksmith stood out from under the spreading chestnut tree long enough to offer the thoroughly enraged Hurricane a job at twenty dollars a week and found. And Hurricane Sherlock is world's light-heavyweight champion. As they say on Tenth Avenue, fawncy that!

What Hurricane wants to do, he explains as the waiter brings on the nourishment, is to pull off some stunt that will make the citizenry of East Silo realize just what he means in the world of art and science. He craves to do something to show 'em that a world's champion boxer is of more importance in civilized communities where they read the newspapers than arms are important to a jockey. In other words, what can Hurricane Sherlock do to knock East Silo for a row of Patagonian milk cans?

While I am mulling over the above apple sauce, Hurricane fully cuts off the best part of the steak for himself and sadly remarks that what he has told me is only about half of his woes. I says to save the other half for our next conclave, and thus encouraged Hurricane goes right on with his funeral dirge.



Hurricane murdered all competition.

It seems his own folks don't understand him either. When he first began to make important money, he tells me, delivering the last of the hash-browned potatoes to his own plate, he brought his people on to New York and set them up in a home in the Bronx which would make Nero's palace look like a deserted barn.

Hurricane dwells on this home as well as in it—he furnished me with the prices on everything connected with it from the furnace to the roofing. Considerable residence, as he describes it, and one a millionaire should be tickled to get his mail at, but still Hurricane's folks pick on him. Like the East Silo knockers, they think prize fighting is out of order and that Hurricane should go into business, now that he's got $4.75 for every wave in Tampa Bay. The way they look at it, he could buy a garage, or a chain of orangeade stands or start an opposition elevated railroad or something, but he most certainly should get out of the ring and become a solid businessman. Until he does, even his own folks are off him and he hasn't seen 'em for months, he wound up.

"Don't tell me any more, you'll have me crying my eyes out," I says, toying with a yawn. "Why unload all this on poor little me?"

Hurricane Sherlock gulps a couple of times and leans over the table.

Evidently I was who Hurricane was looking for. He turns to wave a careless glove to me.

"I'll tell you why I'm givin' you the lowdown on matters," he says, as serious as a fire in a powder mill. "I been catchin' your stuff at that telephone switchboard for weeks now, and believe me, kid, you're the buffalo's beard! The nifties you toss at them he-flappers which tries to make you, the wise cracks you pull day in and day out—well, all that sells me the idea that if anybody can help me, you're the baby. I'm just a big dumbbell which don't know nothin' at all except how to keep 'em from gettin' up off the canvas, but you pack more brains than they ever seen at Yale, get me? Won't you please be a pal and help me knock them yokels up in East Silo for a trip?"

Honest, I have to smile, he's so earnest. He seems to be hanging on my answer like it means life and liberty to him. My mind wanders back to Julius De Haven who asked me almost the same thing and who I boosted from the chorus to stardom. There's something pathetic about this big kid sitting opposite me now, who has money and fame and merely wants his home town to admit it. I'm no Miss Fix-it, but the idea of helping another member of the male sex solve a puzzle fascinates me. Maybe I'll hang out a sign after a while and go into the business of putting the boys over. But Hurricane's getting restless.

"Are you goin' to throw me down?" he asks anxiously, for all the world like an eight year old kid asking mamma for marble money.

"No," I says suddenly. "I'm not! I'll think this over and you drop into the St. Moe in a couple of days. I feel sure I'll have cooked up a scheme by that time which will make East Silo act like you're Harding the next time you enter the portals of the town!"

"You're immense!" says Hurricane. "Put me acrost in that slab and you can write your own ticket on what I'll do for you!"

So far Hurricane had kept in line whenever we were out together. What I mean is, he never even mentioned the preposition "love." That's a thing for which I was thankful. I sympathized with Hurricane and could take him as a friend—but that's all!

Well, when Hurricane Sherlock next appeared on the scene I was all set for him. I have given his case plenty of due consideration and I think I have the answer.

"Have they ever seen you fight in East Silo, Hurricane?" I ask him.

"No," says Hurricane. "Them hicks ain't saw a scuffle since the Civil War!"

"Great!" I says, and I'm really overjoyed, for now I know Hurricane's problem is childishly easy. In fact, it's no problem at all.

"Hurricane," I continue, "they have laughed you off in East Silo because they haven't got the proper angle on you. If they could only see you knock out an opponent and hear the frenzied cheers as you leave the ring, they'd go crazy over you and crazy over themselves for having turned out such a product as you in East Silo!"

Hurricane Sherlock looks pensive.

"That's a good thought, Cutey," he says finally. "But it's also a plain case of no can do. They don't allow boxin' in East Silo."

That slows me up for a minute—but only for a minute.

"Where do you fight next?" I ask him.

"Madison Square Garden, on the (Continued on page 128)

A New Mystery

The Lone Wolf

Illustrations by

Though Michael Lanyard is deeply in love with Eve, he tells her one evening that he can never ask her to marry him. He cannot ask her to share the precarious life of an ex-thief, whose reformation society will not take seriously, whom, indeed, society is only waiting to trap again in some real or fancied misdeed.

Eve impetuously denies this reasoning; and when Lanyard sees her home, she kisses him for the first time. Then he realizes that he must overcome all obstacles and make possible marriage with this woman he loves.

As he is walking home down Fifth Avenue, he unexpectedly comes upon Liane Delorme, whom he has not seen since his Paris thieving days. Liane, overjoyed, insists on his accompanying her to the Clique Club, a fast post-Prohibition drinking and gambling affair. She seems to know a mysterious lot about his new life and takes his reform lightly.

At the Club Lanyard is introduced to Morphew, Pagan, Mallison and the charming Mrs. McFee. He has seen Morphew often before, with instinctive foreboding; and this feeling is now justified when, left alone, Morphew bluntly proposes to Lanyard that the latter shall take to thieving again under his, Morphew's, protection.

Lanyard treats this proposal with contempt. Thereupon Morphew states that he will see to it that enough crimes are "planted" on Lanyard to send him to prison for life unless he comes to terms. As Lanyard in anger threatens to strike Morphew, the Club is raided by the police.

In the ensuing confusion and darkness (someone puts the lights out), Lanyard comes upon Folly, half hysterical, and promises to get her out. As they are going, suddenly appears Crane, New York detective and an old friend of Lanyard's. Crane pilots them through the police line and gets Lanyard's address.

Accompanying Folly home, Lanyard there warns her that Morphew's crowd is composed of bootleggers, blackmailers and thieves. As they talk, Liane and Pagan call.

Drinks are mixed by Pagan, who then launches into a long monologue, the gist of which is that he hears the Lone Wolf is in New York, at his old game; that he wonders whether this is not a case of ingrained habits of thievery subconsciously defeating

A Résumé of Parts One and Two:

THE action of the story takes place mainly in the New York of today and concerns:

MICHAEL LANYARD, THE LONE WOLF, once prince of European jewel thieves, now a member of the British Secret Service on leave of absence in America.

EVE DE MONTALAIS, whom he loves as he has never loved before—a woman of beauty, of charm, of wealth.

MORPHEW, powerful New York bootlegger and director of criminals.

PAGAN, a satellite of Morphew's.

MALLISON, gentleman crook and member of Morphew's crew.

LIANE DELORME, demi-mondaine and one-time underworld acquaintance of the Lone Wolf.

MRS. FOLLIOTT MCFEE, who is piquant and inordinately rich, whose nickname is FOLLY and who lives up to it.

Novel By LOUIS JOSEPH VANCE

Returns

W. D. Stevens

a desire for reform; that such cases are well known in medical science. Lanyard is deeply angered by this subtle attack upon himself.

As he walks home, the conversation fills his mind. He also becomes aware of a strange and growing mental confusion; imagines himself wading through a sea of Folly's jewels; thinks how easy it would be to relieve his present poverty by taking them; and has a vivid delusion that he is strangling Pagan. At home, he falls on his bed in a stupor, half undressed.

He is awakened next morning with a splitting headache by Crane. The two are at a loss to account for his condition except by attributing it to the single drink of bootleg liquor mixed by Pagan at Folly's. Crane then tells the reason for his early call: Folly's jewels have been stolen. The detective hastens to exonerate Lanyard by saying that he had already searched the latter's clothing as he slept and had found nothing.

But after Crane leaves, Lanyard finds his shoes covered with mud like that in the excavation behind Folly's house; and in the tail pocket of his dress coat, which Crane had evidently overlooked, he comes on a packet. Opening it, he stands staring down at the stolen jewels of Folly McFee.

The Woman:
"What! You ain't my husband! Where is he?"

Part Three: CHAPTER VII

IN SEQUEL the life of Michael Lanyard knew some of its busiest moments; his modest lodgings became the stage of a scene of rare activity whose solitary actor figured as the restless axis of a whirlwind of garments. Then the air, clearing, disclosed the man clad decently for the street and stowing away in a safe pocket his most unwelcome treasure-trove.

Thus far he had gone about doing what he had to do in a measure automatically, as one will in times of extremity, putting off against an hour more opportune, when he might bring a clearer head to bear upon the business, too, the deliberate study which his troubles needed. Enough now to know the longer he delayed where he was, the more immediate his peril of suffering a second domiciliary visit by the police; who on this new occasion, beyond reasonable doubt, would be represented by agents less kindly biased than Crane, more skeptical and thoroughgoing in the matter of searching for Folly McFee's emeralds. It remained for Lanyard to prove appreciation of this fleeting smile of fortune by turning to good account the slender chance it granted to work out his salvation in his own time and way.

One detail he dared not slight, though it cost minutes each more precious than the last: he left behind him shoes and trousers from which every lingering suspicion of mud had been erased.

Some two hours later, after a tedious tale of twists and turns in the labyrinth of New York's several transportation systems, he left a train at the Mount Vernon terminal of the elevated extension and addressed himself to the tramp back to New York.

The sky was bright, the Indian Summer sunlight kind, the air inspiriting. By the time Lanyard had stretched his legs over a mile or two of by-roads—chosen for the long and lonely perspectives which enabled him to make sure he traveled with no other shadow than his own—he began to feel once more competent to ponder his fix and plot a way out.

No easy task; the problem posed by the fact that he had somehow, at some time in the course of the preceding night, unwittingly come into possession of stolen property, seemed open to solution only on one of two hypotheses, antagonistic, and neither at a glance more likely than the other. Failing his ability to turn up proof that another hand had rifled Folly McFee's safe and secreted its loot in his coat while he slept, Lanyard would have to become reconciled to the belief that he himself had stolen the jewels while in a phase of submerged consciousness. Distasteful as was the bare suggestion, and human though the temptation was to adopt the more grateful theory and guide himself thereby, he still could not but falter; the other was all too possibly the true explanation.

One thing at least he might take for granted, that the drink Pagan had brought him was drugged. But here again the lane of likelihood developed a confounding fork—who could say whether the drug had been added to the drink by Pagan, or whether the whisky itself had been one of those deadly "synthetic" concoctions with which that bastard offspring of Prohibition, the bootlegging industry, had flooded the land?

If it were the whisky that Lanyard had to blame, Pagan, too, and Folly McFee and Liane Delorme must have suffered as severely, Liane even more, since she had made away with two drinks to Lanyard's one . . . A simple matter to find out the truth, given the woman's address. But she had neglected to say where she was stopping, and other than those whom under the circumstances he would hardly care to consult, Lanyard could think of nobody who would be likely to know . . .

And even though investigation might prove that nobody else had been so punished, and thus satisfy Lanyard that his drink alone had maliciously been doctored, such knowledge would not necessarily lead him nearer to the facts of the robbery. Comfortable though it was to impute to Pagan the mischief with the whisky, and assume that its object had been to throw Lanyard into coma and thus render it feasible to enter his rooms without his knowledge, smear yellow mud on his clothing and plant the plunder in his pocket, still it remained possible that the arch-intelligence which had decreed the administration of the drug, whether Morphew's or another's, had reckoned with even more diabolical cunning upon its breaking down those inhibitions which honor and faith and a good intent had imposed upon a nature perhaps—and for all Lanyard could assert to the contrary—irreclaimably a thief's.

Hashish was reputed to work like that, to act upon its victims precisely as an acid eats away lacquer, stripping off layer by layer the most stubborn crust of honor and habit ever indurated by conscience and civilized conventions, baring at last the primitive beast that lurks in every man.

No matter; though the identity of the thief must be a riddle still, to learn the truth about the whisky would resolve the primary doubts that were harassing Lanyard and leave him better advised concerning what further steps would be required to clear up the mystery altogether. The one thing now distinctly indicated was the need for action prompt, direct and drastic.

Lanyard had not forgotten that appointment for the following afternoon which he must be able to keep with a clear mind and a clean heart, unapprehensive of any sort of interference.

He began to foresee a program for the intervening night tolerably long and arduous. He had to hit upon some way to disembarrass himself of the emeralds that would clear him of all suspicion of ever having had anything to do with them. He had to acquit or convict Pagan of tampering with his drink—and in the event of the conviction which he anticipated with entire confidence, to invent and enforce some means of persuading Pagan and his lot that Michael Lanyard was a good man to let alone.

Now dusk was closing down upon the world in shade on shade of lilac, violet and blue, through which, moment by moment, the lights of the outlying city were blowing their blossoms of silver and gold. Directly ahead of Lanyard the electric sign of a roadhouse exploded its soundless salvo against the sky; and thus reminded that he needed food, who had so much to do ere dawn, he entered the place and dined with a frugality considerate of digestive powers sadly out of kilter.

Then in the dark of the young night he resumed his walk, and between nine and half-past might have been—only that he took precious good care not to be—seen at pause on the Lexington avenue corner of the block in which Folly McFee dwelt, quietly reconnoitering the approach to her residence.

The house stood on the north side of the street, nearer Lexington Avenue than Park, and, with windows diffusing a dim glow through discreet draperies, presented to the beholder the demure face that suited an establishment whose youthful chatelaine sported a sobriquet so apt and so alluring.

Observers less interested than Lanyard was then have been known to comment feelingly upon the impish trick houses frequently practice of keeping their own counsel. The shrewdest reader of façades would have gathered nothing informative from the aspect worn that night by the dwelling of Folly McFee, no clue as to whether its pretty resident were at home, or, if so, alone . . .

Lanyard hazarded a saunter past on the sidewalk opposite. Under more direct scrutiny the house remained as little communicative; the only profit he had of the maneuver was the assurance that nobody was skulking in any of the areaways over across from it, on the watch for the likes of himself. But then there was no conceivable reason why anybody should be; not even his most impassioned ill-wisher, much less an unimaginative police force, could have been expected to divine that any attraction could possibly draw this putative criminal back to haunt the scene of his alleged crime.

Nevertheless, Lanyard on gaining the Park Avenue corner merely crossed the street and continued his stroll through the next to the north, passing on the way the gaping foundation pit observed the night before from the windows of Folly's study, a survey of which from this new angle confirmed his belief that the thief need not have found it difficult to make his way into the back yard and swarm up to the roof of the extension. On the other hand, this aspect of the premises afforded Lanyard no least twinge of guilty reminiscence. Another circumstance that proved nothing; if his personal acquaintance with downright drunkenness was limited, he knew too well that it was quite possible for one to drink oneself into a state of alcoholic insanity and retain, on coming out of it, no memory of one's actions while in that condition.

Circumnavigation of the block having brought him again into the street upon which the McFee residence faced, but this time on its northern sidewalk, Lanyard's pace slackened; and idlest insouciance masked the surge of acute interest in him when, at twenty paces' distance, he saw the iron gate to its service entrance swing open and a maid emerge and make briskly off toward Park Avenue—a tidy figure in black dress, white apron and cap, taking letters to post at the corner letter box in time for the last collection.

Another freak of friendly fortune, or one of ill-favored fate? The thing was too confoundedly well timed, the invitation of that unguarded entrance too tempting. Indeed, when it occurred to Lanyard that his action might have been a thought precipitate, it was too late to turn back; he had already slipped into the service hallway and restored the door to the position, half on the latch, in which the woman had left it. To change his mind now and retreat would be to court her attention, who would already be on her way back from the corner . . .

The hallway was long, narrow, dimly lighted. At its far end a stairway led down to kitchen offices. Midway, a swing door communicated with the main body of the house. Through this Lanyard had no choice but to dart, reckless of what might await him on its far side; to linger where he was, meant immediate discovery . . . and the emeralds on his person!

The swing door gave upon a butler's pantry, at the moment empty. Another opened into the dining room, a third to the main hallway of the ground floor. Stacks of dishes in the pantry sink, no less than the clash of cheerful voices in the room adjoining, with Folly's rippling laughter clearly recognizable, told of a dinner party still in progress. The other living rooms, then, ought to be untenanted. The butler due to pop back from the dining room at any instant, Lanyard passed on to the entrance hall, and experienced a relief on finding it deserted that betrayed an old hand sorely out of practice; the day had been when he could have taken far more desperate chances without a tremor.

Even so, he wasted no gestures. To go the way he meant to go, he had the dining room door to pass, the risk to run of being seen. He edged to a point whence Folly's back was visible, with the door to the pantry beyond. Through this last the butler, a decent, plodding, British body, was taking his departure and an emptied decanter. Lanyard waited a minute, then coolly ran—or, rather, stumped—the gantlet of the open door, trusting to pass as the butler with some business in the front of the house. To the best of his observation his audacity served; the dinner party seemed to be finding itself much too amusing to have attention to spare for matters of domestic routine. But one swift glance askance noted that Folly was entertaining only Pagan, Liane Delorme and Mallison.

So much for Lanyard's solemn lecture on the dangers of questionable associations!

But could one fairly have expected anything better, when Folly had been given, subsequently, every reason to believe that she had entertained in that overnight moralist a felon unawares? This, presumably, was her way of consoling herself for having been so shamefully taken in: as gay a partie carrée as heart could wish, figuratively making merry on the very coffin lid of Folly's most recent bereavement . . .

Folly was fighting Mallison wildly but impotently. Neither one saw Lanyard.

Fragments were all Lanyard could garner of the talk, who had o time at all to spare, but what little he did overhear was ıstructive. Folly, he learned, was firmly declining to be down-earted; the police had given her every assurance that she ould be wearing her emeralds again within a few days at most. Ieantime she knew no lack of objects of bedizenment; the hief in his haste had overlooked a secret cache of treasure in the afe he had used so cavalierly, she had still the McFee pearls nd diamonds to don for protection against inclement elements; ı witness whereto, she was wearing them now. Challenged y Pagan to state what steps, if any, she had taken to safeguard hese against the chance that the marauder might return to cancel his oversight, Folly laughed the notion to scorn, but admitted that she meant to have the combination of the safe changed as soon as she could remember to phone its maker . . .

Communications all pitched in a key of the lightest banter. Folly, for example, was pleased to recount the antics of her maiden aunt when it dawned upon her that she had actually slept all through the visit of a burglar; the good woman had forthwith gone into hysterics and had come out of them only to pack herself off—at Folly's expense—to Atlantic City, professing the slender hope that a vacation from this theater of crime would mend a shattered nervous system. In view of which Folly was disposed to hold the loss of her emeralds a not unmixed affliction.

And when Pagan suggested that it might be good business for Folly to put a professional house breaker on her weekly payroll, Liane applauded his wit with a deep-chested laugh . . .

No more need to wonder how this last had fared after her two drinks of the liquor, a single dose of which had been enough to put Lanyard hors de combat. True, Liane might have been innocent of what was intended. But it wasn't easy to give her the benefit of the doubt.

As for Pagan, the penciled question mark against his name was replaced by a cross in indelible ink.

CHAPTER VIII

FROM a point close by the street door rose a flight of stairs which, taken in one swift and silent rush, introduced Lanyard to a floor by every indication devoted wholly to the most intimate uses of Folly. There were two major rooms, a bedchamber at the back of the house and a boudoir overlooking the street, linked by a short hall on which opened a bathroom and capacious clothespresses, all furnished with an extravagance that bespoke means ample to gratify the wildest whim of even a modern young woman. Folly's wardrobe alone would have given a dozen exacting women of fashion a choice of changes for every hour of the day and have left the first owner still ridiculously overstocked. And Lanyard, taking cursory yet comprehensive note of the endless detail of luxury which went to make up the Sybaritic ensemble of the rooms, told himself it would be unreasonable to expect their tenant not to fancy herself much more than merely a little.

His first survey, however, was an abbreviated one. He had gained little more than a bare grasp of the general arrangement when a light patter on the stairs drove him to cover in a retreat whose choice had been his first care—a clothespress stored with apparel for day wear exclusively, therefore the least likely to be used by night, and furthermore so situate that its door, left—as Lanyard found it—half an inch ajar, afforded a direct and wide-angled vista of the boudoir, and also, indirectly, by grace of a long mirror in the latter, a more fragmentary view of the bedchamber.

To his taste almost too cozily snuggled into a smother of garments whose subtle fragrance was most demoralizing, he lurked for many minutes, spying—as the mirror permitted—on the maid whom he had first seen in the street and whose present duty, it appeared, was to turn down the bedclothes and otherwise make the bedchamber ready to receive its mistress.

The quick, competent creature went about her work deftly and with a step so light that even ears trained to abnormal acuteness found it not entirely easy to keep track of her movements; so that, when she made an end and took herself off, the man in hiding wasted several minutes waiting to make sure that he had the floor all to himself again.

Emerging at length, however, he wasted no more, but turned directly to his objective of most immediate interest, that is to say to the safe which had provided the wits of last night's marauder with a test so trifling. And, Lanyard reflected, having inspected the thing, no wonder! When, he asked impatiently, would man learn anything from experience and cease to put his trust and his treasures in repositories of such pregnable construction? A pretty, dainty thing, neatly fitted into the base of a period secretary, its door masked by a hinged frame wrought to resemble a tier of drawers, its "combination lock"—God save the mark!—capable of offering about as much resistance to trained talents as that of a child's bank . . .

Lanyard was proving all this to his own satisfaction, and indeed had already solved the combination by bending an ear to the fall of its tumblers, when the telephone rang.

Mallison made a dash for the door and found himself helpless in the grasp of Crane and the policeman.

The sharp trill of the bell sounded in the study downstairs; the extension instrument on the little desk in the boudoir gave only a muffled click.

Lanyard used a silk handkerchief on the face of the safe to smudge out fingerprints, closed the false front and moved lightly out into the hall, arriving at the rail round the stairway at the moment when the vocational singsong of the butler broke upon the conversation of Folly and her friends.

"Beg pardon, but Mr. Mallison is being wanted on the telephone."

With neither delay nor compunction Lanyard turned back to the boudoir extension and had its receiver at his ear when Mallison arrived in the study and breathed a melodious "Hello?" to the waiting wire. But when a strange voice answered him, feminine at that, the eavesdropper was taken with a twinge of mixed chagrin and distaste, who had hoped for something worse than this and more illuminating, who had hastily set his heart on gaining instruction from Morphew's pompously measured rumble, and who, finally, knew no delight at all in the prospect of prying upon some trivial affair of sentiment such as was promised by the cloying affection of this strange woman's salutation: "Is that you, Mally darling?"

Only the striking ambiguity of the reply she got helped Lanyard to overcome an impulse to hang up forthwith.

"Yes," Mallison pronounced too clearly, too loudly, and in a manner of cold inquiry that carried no conviction whatever, "this is Mr. Mallison speaking. Who wants him?"

"Clever old sweetie!" the unknown applauded with a confidential laugh. "I do hope she can hear you; but I suppose she isn't in the same room if you have to shout like that. Better soft-pedal it a bit, dear, or the little lady may get leary."

To this Mallison replied, again remarkably as to sense, and in accents of unmistakably mortified amazement: "Oh, for heaven's sake! you don't mean to say it's tonight? I don't see how I could possibly have let anything so important slip my mind . . ."

No less remarkably the woman pursued: "It's all right, then, dearie? I mean, everything is all set for the big bust?"

"Why, of course!" Mallison intoned distinctly, with a dying echo of the emotion which had colored his preceding response. "Of course I'll be there. But I shall have to go down on my knees and beg Mrs. McFee to forgive me—and I really can't quite forgive myself for being so forgetful."

"Gosh!" the other breathed in awed admiration, "got to hand it to you, kid, you stall so pretty. Well, our friend—you know—is getting impatient, so it's up to you to shake a leg. How soon shall I say you'll be ready?"

"Oh, but really! I'm afraid I can hardly make it under half an hour."

"Sure that'll be long enough?" Surprising solicitude seemed to shade the strange voice. "You know, dearie, we wouldn't for worlds crash in too soon, I mean before you get a good chance to do your very best dirty work. 'Cause the blacker the looks of it, the better the pay—and the surer."

"Oh, quite!" Mallison cheerily agreed. "But half an hour will do me famously."

"Good enough." A sly chuckle accompanied this commendation. "You're one little fast worker, all right, darling; I only wanted you to take all the time you need to turn out an artistic job. All right, then; I'll set the alarm for thirty minutes from put every ounce of his weight and all his ill will to the other's jaw and Mallison crashed back across the table.

Lanyard

now—the zero hour! And mind you take good care of yourself, dearie. Ta-ta."

With elegance indisputable Mallison returned a musical "Au revoir."

Lanyard waited for the other receiver to refind its hook, then hung up in turn and took his seething mystification back to the head of the stairs, whence he could overhear the apologies Mallison was offering below.

"Do be charitable, Folly, and make allowances for my weak mind. I simply cannot understand how I could have been so great an idiot as to forget I'd promised Mary Ashe—Mrs. Stuyvesant Ashe, you know—I'd join a party she's made up for the Rendezvous tonight——"

"O Mally!" Mrs. McFee lamented. "How perfectly stupid!"

"I know—isn't it? But I promised over a week ago. And anyway, it's partly your fault, getting up this little dinner to celebrate your robbery and making me forget everything else I had on for tonight . . . Now please don't budge—and I don't need Soames to put me out, either. I know where I left my hat and coat and how to open and shut a front door all by myself."

"You can take my car, Mally, if you'll send it right back," Pagan put in generously. "Liane and I have got to hop along, too, in a brace of shakes. That is, you're welcome to it if you find it waiting. I told Ben to be back around ten."

"Thanks, old soul; but I'll have no trouble in picking up a taxi over on Park Avenue. Besides, it isn't nearly ten yet."

Pronouncing gracious but hurried good nights all round, Mallison was heard to pass through the entrance hall, in a more guarded and intimate tone, and a decidedly tender one, remonstrating with his hostess because she had insisted on accompanying him to the door.

"Consider the looks of it, Folly; Liane and Peter will think you've fallen for me at last."

"No fear," Folly returned with uncomplimentary composure. "They know better."

"Besides, anyone would think you didn't trust me . . ."

This rang a note so false as to cause the eyebrows of the secret audience to lift and knit in puzzlement. But Folly's frame of mind was too completely and openly petulant to permit of her being wary and discriminative as well.

"Trust you!" she mocked lightly. "I'd like to know why I should, the way you carry on with women . . . Oh! I'm not in the least taken in by this tale about Mrs. Stuyvesant Ashe, you know; I believe that's just bunk to cover up a heavy date with some other misguided female."

"How perfectly flattering!"

"You wouldn't think so if you knew my opinion of the kind of women that fall for you, Mally."

The two moved into Lanyard's field of vision and paused by the door, Mallison buttoning himself into his topcoat and leering down at Folly with a doggish air, the woman maintaining for his benefit a pout that was less than half put on.

"As if you'd care a snap if I really were deceiving you!"

"You couldn't." Folly tossed her head. "I'm not quite impleton enough to believe you mean anything you say to a voman, to any pretty woman, it doesn't matter who——"

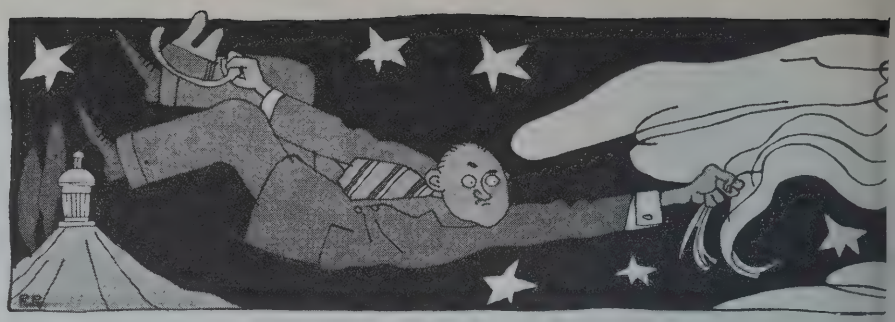
"Now you are flattering me and no mistake!" Mallison lapped on his topper, gave its crown an artful pat that djusted it at the most killing angle, and managed a still ıore maddening smirk of complacence. "Believe you do care," e drawled . . .

"I care about having my party spoiled this way. Now Peter nd Liane are going to run, too, and leave me all lonely and ɔrn."

Mallison laid hold of the knob and opened the door, but put is back to the edge of it and rested so, unaffectedly loath to ɔrego the flirtation at its piquant stage of the present. His smile grew momentarily more personal and meaning; but some of its assurance might have been make-believe, considering the nervousness he betrayed in Lanyard's sight—though not in Folly's since she couldn't see them—by keeping his hands behind him and fiddling with the door knob. An impudent nod designated the two who had been left in the dining room.

"I'll come back if you like . . . after they've blown . . ."

"Mally!" Folly drew back, flushing. "Don't be a silly fool, don't say things like that to make me angry. I oughtn't to overlook——"



Of a sudden Mallison stood away from the door, permitting it to shut itself gently, and caught the woman in his arms. "I mean it," he breathed ardently to Folly's hair, holding her fast in spite of a notable absence of effort to escape. "I'm mad about you, Folly, simply mad about you—and you know it, you wild, sweet witch!"

"I know you're mad now," the witch replied neither wildly nor sweetly. "I may have suspected it before, but this proves it. Please let me go."

"Not a chance!" Mallison laughed confidently. "I've got you now where I've been wanting you, God knows how long! Folly dear—I'm simply desperate with love of you. Only say the word—I'll tell Mrs. Ashe where she can go and be back here inside half an hour, or as soon as I'm sure Peter and Liane have left. Folly! be kind to me——"

"Mally!" The cry was keyed low yet tense with indignation. A sudden squirm broke his embrace. Folly stood back, fending the man off with a firm hand. "Don't do that again, I won't have it . . . How dare you say, or even suggest, such things to me. You know I don't care the (Continued on page 106)

By BERTON BRALEY

A Declaration

COMES now Mr. William J. Hicks to the bar;
A college-bred chap and a Regular Guy,
And one of those millions of people who are Not fitted with brows that are dizzily high
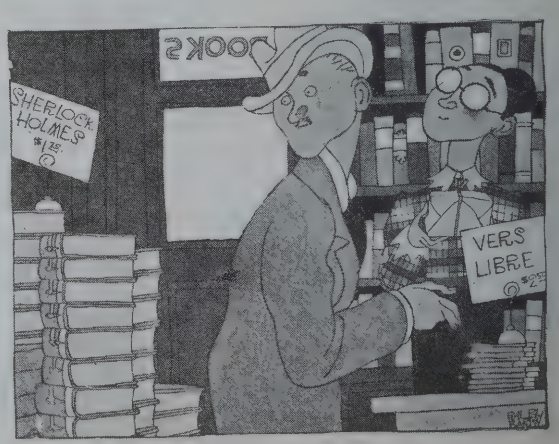
Nor painfully low; just the usual sort
Of normal American, given to sport,



To love of his family, zest in his health,
A pride in the business that gives him employment,
A hope of acquiring some moderate wealth,
A liking for books and a sense of enjoyment
In plays and in music. Thus briefly we fix
The cultural status of William J. Hicks.

Comes, then, Mr. William J. Hicks, as before,
And facing the dais of Public Opinion
Deposes and says:
For a decade or more
I've lived as a sadly highbrow-beaten minion.
I'm one of a throng
That has cringed, right along,
Before the stern council of critics Olympian,
Who told me whatever I fancied was wrong;
And being, perhaps, just a little bit skimpy in My classical knowledge
Since I was in college,
I've felt like a creature debased, ineffectual,
Who faces ukases of gods intellectual!
And so I have bowed
To dogmas avowed
By Mencken and Nathan and all of that crowd.
I've let Burton Rascoe convince me that I'm
A mental amœba still squirming in slime,
When I didn't fall for some novelist bird of Great fame in a country I never had heard of.

I've taken the Nation, the Freeman, the Dial,
I've let some superior, self-assured cub lick
My mind into thinking my taste must be vile
Which didn't agree with the gay New Republic.
When Wilson and Bishop with didactic air
Wrote Jovian dicta for Vanity Fair,
So clever and cynical
High on their pinnacle
They have appeared, that I've felt I would score on Test psychologic as scarcely a moron!

Whenever I went to a concert or play
I'd carefully read what the critics would say
Before I would venture
To praise or to censure;
And when their opinions and mine didn't jibe
I'd think, "They belong to an erudite tribe;
They know—and I don't—
And therefore I won't
Reveal to the world what an ignorant gink
I'm proving myself—so I'll say what they think!"

I'm fond of good pictures—or pictures that strike
My eyes with a touch or a color I like;
But always I learned
That what I called art
By critics was spurned
As "tricky," or "smart,"
Or "too photographic," or "too sentimental,"
Or "too oriental," or "too occidental";
Until I despaired
And humbly declared

Illustrations by Ralph Barton

of INDEPENDENCE

"Before I shall speak of a picture that pleases I'll see how it's treated by Royal Cortissoz."

And thus under fear of the critical lash,
I dared not confess that I favored such trash
As popular fiction or popular plays;
And, seeking "true culture," I spent many days
In ploughing through books that were Finnish, Roumanian, Czecho-Slovakian, Dutch and Ukrainian;
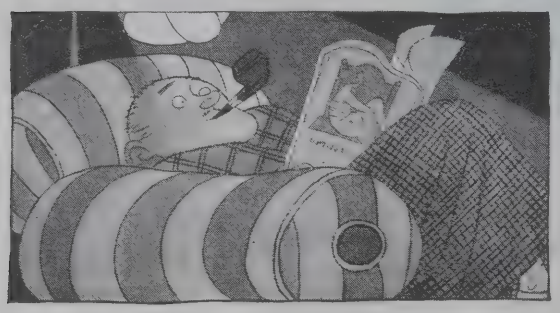
Fiction as gay as a Cancer Week circular,
Featuring heroines drab and tubercular.
Till, ere these cheerful romances I threw aside,
All of my dreams were of murder and suicide.

Then I tried poetry, only to find
What I enjoyed wasn't near the right kind;
Verse that had meter
And rhythm and swing,
Making life sweeter—
That wasn't the thing!
No, I must read Amy Lowell, and frown,
Figuring whether to read up or down.
Or I must scan
Verse on this plan:
"Kiftan of Bifftan! Boozy, fat, fat,
Who's this? The Hoozis! Blind, bulky bat,
Howl, owl and prowl!"
I am telling you, that
Poem, though utterly incomprehensible
Is, in all verity, simple and sensible
When it's compared to some modernist luny verse
Which, so the critics say, shakes the whole universe.

I couldn't get it or make the stuff out,
So I concluded I must be a lout,
A terrible lowbrow, an ivory knob,
A member, in brief, of the greatly scorned "mob."
That wasn't the worst of my cultural slavery;



The "small group of serious thinkers," I found,
Regarded all games as a species of knavery;
Their pleasure consisted in sitting around
To talk of the various Movements in art,
Or make multifarious
Efforts to chart

Trends astronomical Sociological,
Themes anatomical
Aims pedagogical,
Freudian theories deep and complex,
Einstein, Debussy, Jung, Bergson and Sex,
Egyptian tombs of the dynastic period,
And other such subjects and things by the myriad.
And if one grew weary and said "Let's play bridge!"
They'd make you feel small as a flea or a midge
By saying, as if you were guilty of shame,
"Er—no, I'm afraid I don't care for the game;
It seems like a crime
To waste so much time,
In bridge, pool or poker, for money or chalk,
When one could spend all of those moments in talk!"

And so they would chatter of "things of the mind,"
And if they discovered that you were inclined
To talk now and then about automobiles,
Or baseball or football or table d'hôte meals,
Or servants, or "sealing wax, shipping or soap,"
They'd say that your brain was quite narrow in scope,

That you were a bourgeois, a dullard, a Babbitt;
And maybe it's true—but they also inhabit
A world that is narrow, and there they abide,
Expressing contempt for whatever's outside!

II

AND when, on a sudden, I realized this,
I said, "Let the Intelligentsia hiss!
I've cringed at their scorn for a number of years
But now I've rebelled, and to me it appears
That one can like Brahms, and be tickled at jazz;
Be thrilled by a Rembrandt, yet chuckle at Tad;
Like Whitman and Yeats without giving the razz
To popular minstrels whose verses are glad;
Prefer native art to the art that's exotic,
Be—well, sentimental and quite patriotic;
In brief, own a healthy and normal psychology
Without any shame or the slightest apology."

And so I broke free of each cultural trammel;
I said to myself: I've been meek long enough,
A fig for these logothete pundits who damn all
My natural tastes as "impossible stuff":
I'm sick of these highbrows
With uplifted eyebrows
Who, lacking the taste and the liking for play,
Have made quite a virtue of being that way.
I'm fond of romances and plays that are blithe,
The scorn of the critics shall not make me writhe,
The novels that harrow
Me down to the marrow
I'll read if I want to, but not by compulsion—
From dicta of critics I've had a revulsion.
They sneer at George Lorimer's Saturday Post
And think it's a proof of their learning to boast
They never have read it.
That's not to their credit,
For the Post gives its readers (a number gigantic)
More literature than the ancient Atlantic.
Wells, Galsworthy, Bennett—say, where are they seen?
The Nation, the Dial? Go on, quitcher kiddin',
You find them appearing in Hearst's Magazine,
Such writers as these are don't want their stuff hidden
In small publications too fine for the mob
But built for the smart intellectual snob.
No longer I'll hide
My liking for stuff that the critics deride,
I'll cheerfully wager the cash in my wallet on Finding more art in McClure's, Cosmopolitan,
Collier's, Adventure, Pictorial Review,
Than shows in the magazines made "for the few,"
The organs designed for the self-chosen art set,
Who bow down to Mencken, tin god of the Smart Set.
Herewith I declare with a spirit unawed
That Art is a country both ample and broad,
With room for reality, room for romance,
For humor and satire; thus giving a chance
To Shaw and to Tarkington, Louis J. Vance, Ring Lardner, Bugs Baer, Henrik Ibsen,
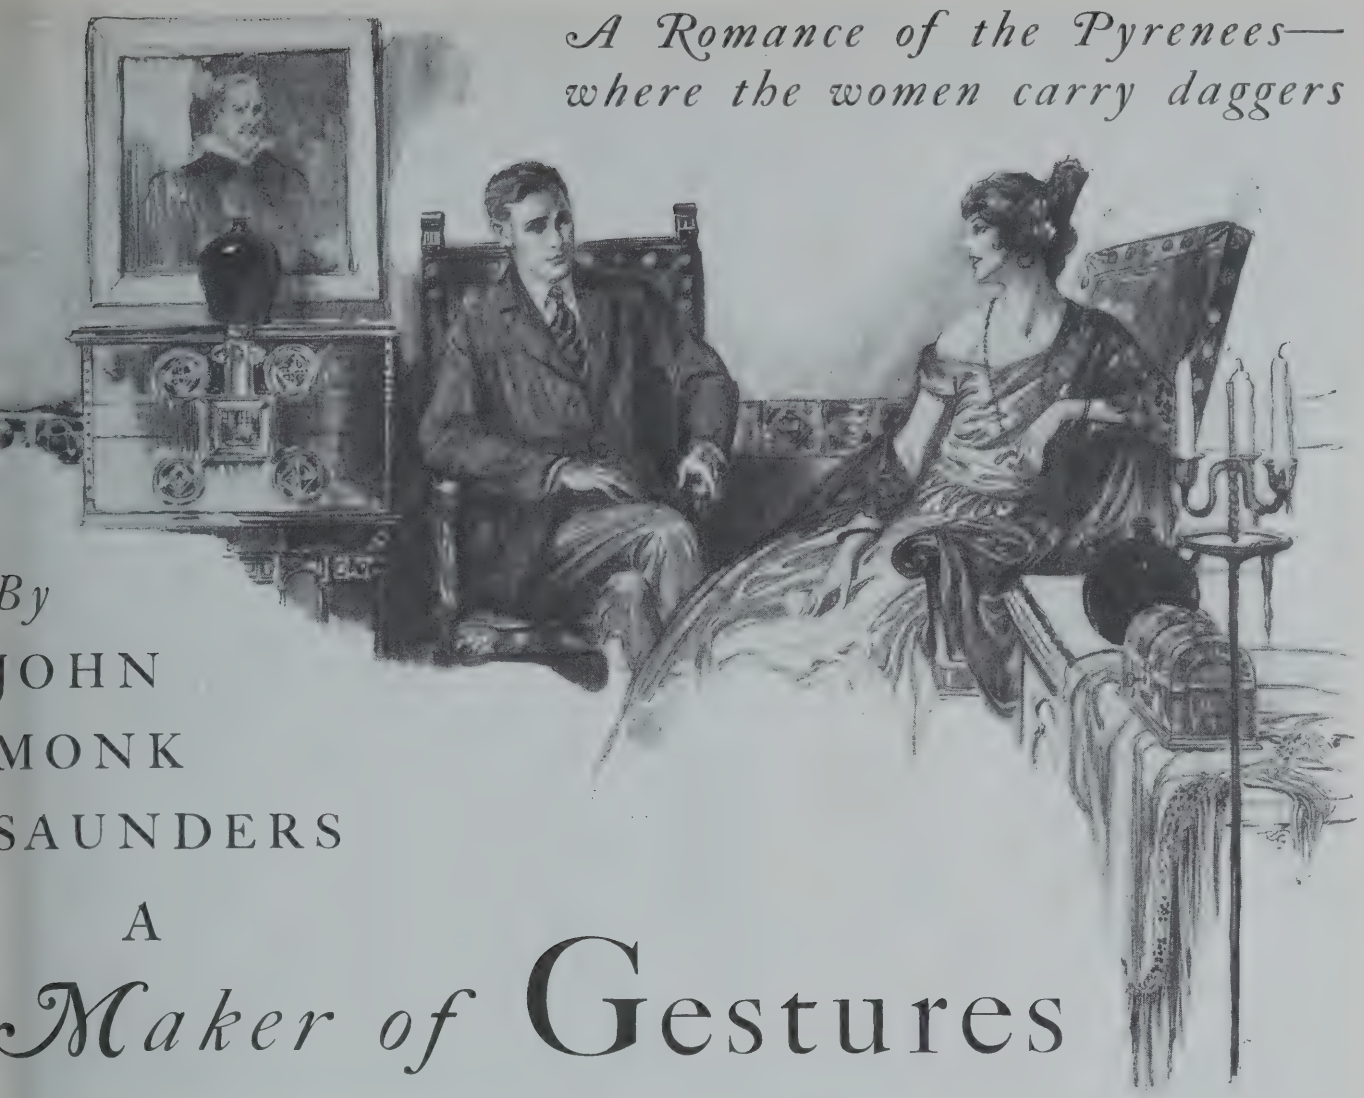
George Ade,
And all first class artists who work at their trade.



I also aver, say, asseverate, claim,
Announce and assert with no vestige of shame,
That one can conceivably like Julia Sanderson
Or Doctor Frank Crane and dislike Sherwood Anderson,
And still be entitled to stoutly defy a
Vicious indictment as social pariah.

I, William J. Hicks, being native and white,
Herewith do declare myself finally freed
From critical serfdom, which once put a blight
On most of my pleasures. Hereafter I'll read
Whatever I like and admit that I like it;
In pictures and music and things histrionic
I'll joy in what I think is art, when I strike it,
Nor ever be frightened by highly sardonic
And brilliant young Critics who sling a mean line—
Which doesn't prove their taste is better than mine.

I've laughed and I've loved and I've struggled and fought
I'm not wholly lacking the power of thought,
And, that being so,
If I get a glow
Of joy out of things that are highbrow or low,
I feel that I'm fully as sure to be right
As people who sneer with an air erudite
At minds that are "Puritan, crass, mid-Victorian!"
I'm getting so these are the terms that I glory in.
I'm one of the mob? Of the unthinking herd?
All right, so I am! But—one brief little word
Before I am done:
Life is short, Art is long,
And sooner or later the commonplace throng
Decides what shall perish in Art, what shall last,
When all supercilious critics have passed!

A Romance of the Pyrenees—where the women carry daggers

By JOHN MONK SAUNDERS

A Maker of Gestures

Illustrations by John Richard Flanagan

IT WAS Monday and market day when Trench Gaylord arrived at Tardets, a mountain town high on the slopes of the Pyrenees. He stepped from the train into a brilliant pattern of color and life, into a triangular square surrounded by arcaded, steep-roofed houses of buff and mauve, filled with tiny temporary shops under cream and white and red awnings. Pots and jugs, earthenware of chrome yellows and browns, were set about on spreads of green canvas. Yawning baskets of Spanish weave overflowed with oranges and lemons; figs and raisins and dates lay in heaps upon woven trays. Panniers held pyramids of eggs and goats' milk cheeses. Mules stood at their carts under the deep arcades, the carts ranged wheel to wheel.

Gaylord paused, enchanted, to study the crowd thronging the market place. Here were the Basque people. The young men were undeniably handsome, in an unconsciously arrogant way, with fine foreheads, long straight noses and well shaped heads. They were compact of body and clean of limb. The short black jackets which they wore, the velveteen trousers, the clean white cotton shirts open at the throat, the scarlet sashes folded tightly around the hips gave them an air of grace and dash. The women were dressed in black; some had handkerchiefs twisted about their hair, some wore gold chains and lace mantillas.

In his room at the Hôtel des Pyrenees later, Gaylord was looking out across the river and marveling—at himself, for he had changed the ways and scene of his existence with the suddenness of fancy. The quaint voice of his tutor speaking in precise accents a week ago at Oxford echoed across his mind.

"As a writer you are supremely gifted, you have a fine ear for rhythm and quantity, you have imagination and an instinct for the color word . . . and you will never write anything of genuine merit."

There had been a polite pause.

"As to your ability," the tutor had pursued, "there is little doubt; as to your indolence there is no doubt."

"Ho-hum," Gaylord had sighed.

"My advice is that you forsake your habits and your friends, take yourself off to some far retreat for the summer vacation and turn out a creditable piece of writing. Write a poem for the Newdigate Prize. I suggest the Basque Provinces in the Pyrenees."

Gaylord's mind traveled back to the scene which had followed. He was in his rooms announcing the proposed pilgrimage to his coterie of satellites, a devoted group to whom he was an idol and an enigma. They envied him his brilliance, admired him for his good looks, worshiped him for his diffidence and allowed his superiority. They all knew of his affairs, inevitable wherever he went. Fragments of the ensuing conversation recurred to Gaylord.

"The Basque women are strangely and vividly beautiful."

"They have black hair and gray eyes."

In Gaylord's eyes a phantom flame had awakened.

Gregory had seen it, and said, "That's the last place on earth for you to go, Gaylord. Beware the mountain maids when you romance! If you go off by yourself among the Basques you won't come back." And they had wagered on it.

It wasn't the challenge of his tutor or the fatalism in Gregory's voice, or the restive genius within him which brought Gaylord to a strange land and an inscrutable people—it was the fascination of beauty.

His tutor would conclude that he had at last decided to make an intellectual effort. The satellites knew it for another whirl at adventure. At any rate it was a gesture, this hegira. He would be back at Oxford in the fall, he told himself.

In the late afternoon he left the hotel, walked through the town and started off on one of the roads leading into the hills. He found himself standing in the roadway staring at a great house set between two pretty white cottages. It was three stories high and had five windows across the front, facing the roadway. The shutters, the balcony and the wide eaves of the roof were painted a hedge-sparrow blue. A vine trailed in vagrant pattern above the lower windows. The doorway was high and arched and was surmounted by a stone tablet upon which symbols were engraved. A gate led from the roadway through the wall into a grassed forecourt.

Gaylord walked rapidly back through the village to the hotel and got into conversation with the keeper. The great house up the roadway? Yes, he knew it well, everyone knew it. The home of old Hurja, a wealthy grower of grapes. Lived there with his wife and daughter; and the hotel keeper gave Gaylord a quizzical look, not unnoticed by Gaylord. Would it be possible to lodge there during the summer? The keeper couldn't say; no, house was not filled, only the three of them and an old servant. They all spoke French, too. The daughter was eighteen. Proud people.

In the early evening Gaylord sauntered down to the cabaret which the keeper had mentioned as the favorite rendezvous of the people on market days, and where, since the young men were in town, there was not a little liveliness and drinking.

It required a summoning of most of his moral courage to enter the lighted inn. It wasn't that he minded being the focal point of many curious pairs of eyes; he was not unused to that. In fact, he loved it, but under conditions or in situations with which he was familiar. There was much of the actor in Gaylord. He was able to stand apart from himself and watch his actions with an absorbed, detached interest.

He strode to the inn door, threw it open and swung inside, closing it noiselessly behind him as his eyes roved about the room. Clouds of smoke drifted hazily about; various groups of people filled the room, drinking, smoking, discussing, playing cards. There was a vacant seat well in the picture.

Eyes rose to him in sudden interest. They saw a tall youth, probably English, in a gray tweed suit, with knickerbockers, heavy stockings and stout oxfords, who carried a well shaped head gracefully erect, whose eyes, searching for a vacant place, suddenly arrested as they reached Hurja's daughter and straightway selected a seat from which a view of her was not hidden. They noted that he walked to it and sat down.

"Curious," thought Gaylord, "how one forgets one's act when one sees a pretty girl. She must be pure Basque. Black hair, straight black brows and lashes, dark skin, oval face—can never tell the age of these people, but she must be eighteen. Her arms and hands—what proportion, what strength, what modeling! Lord, the curve of her neck and shoulders! That must be her father with her—proud looking old gentleman; that is not her brother, though—lusty looking lad. Her lips are superb. Wonder if she's awake yet . . . surely . . . they mature quickly, these Latins. But she isn't Latin. Basque—well, she may not be awake but I'll wager . . ."

The oppressive weight of a dozen hostile glances roused him to the sudden realization that his concentrated study of this girl was flagrantly patent to everyone in the room. He saw the flicker of cold resentment in many eyes.

The youth at Yvonne's right was not her brother. He was Julio—and Julio had adored Yvonne during the years. The mine had been laid between moments. Gaylord had stared at Yvonne. Julio had seen that in Gaylord's eyes which stirred a fury within him. Gaylord looked into Julio's eyes and read hate. Both jaws tightened, both bodies tensed. Each sensed the danger in the other; each recognized a resolute enemy.

"We have hated each other for the same cause for seven thousand years," Gaylord was thinking. "He found my elementals in one glance. He must love that girl. So do I." Gaylord found that two wooden spindles in the back of his chair were cracking between his fingers.

Many thoughts in many minds:

"Is he mad, that Englishman, to stare so at Hurja's daughter?"

"Julio will slip a knife into his heart if he tries to approach her."

"There's trouble ahead now for those three."

"The stranger will never take her away from Julio—Julio will kill."

Gaylord thought: "They know me now; they anticipate every ruse, every excuse I would employ to speak to this girl. They are all watching me like hawks. I've created a critical situation for myself. The stage is all set for a grande geste."

Gaylord began ostensibly to sketch old Hurja's

Many eyes watched the stranger as he shifted his chair into a position to establish a direct view of Hurja's daughter, watched him as he boldly scrutinized her features. It was incredible. Julio was half rising out of his chair. It was inconceivable insolence. Gaylord held a straight forefinger professionally at different angles in front of his right eye as he appeared to study her. Hurja's daughter sat unperturbed as the atmosphere electrified about her.

Gaylord reached his left hand into his inner coat pocket and drew out a half-dozen lead pencils. From a voluminous side pocket he drew a large pad. Tilting his chair backward he placed the pad in his lap and began, ostensibly, to sketch Hurja's daughter.

Gaylord had at one stroke dissipated hostility and achieved standing. With the exception of Julio they all jumped to the same conclusion. "Artiste." Julio sank back into his seat, stalemated. But his instinct mistrusted. The galvanism in the air dispersed.

The amusing part of it all to Gaylord was that he, Gaylord, could not sketch.

However, every move was expert, every stroke skilled. No one could have given more the appearance of an artist sketching than did Gaylord.

Very shortly, he knew, the more curious ones would pass behind him on divers errands, to peer surreptitiously over his shoulders at the work of art. Gaylord held his pad in his lap, shielded from too inquisitive eyes.

Julio chafed and fretted. Gaylord went on coolly sketching. The design growing on the pad might have been a Kansas cyclone or a cubist nightmare. If old Hurja had any feeling he did not show it.

Having completed the sketch to his evident satisfaction, with a few final, decisive strokes, Gaylord dropped his chair back on daughter. No one could have given more the appearance of an artist. At one stroke he had dissipated hostility.

its four legs and returned the pad to his side pocket. No one had been able to see it. Julio's suspicions quickened, but he dared not test them openly. Gaylord beckoned the waiter, ordered white wine and, entirely at ease, sipped it slowly. When he again looked in the direction of the girl, she had gone, and with her Julio. The fine looking old gentleman was still there, in grave discussion with friends, watching oldish men playing cards.

The atmosphere in the room had changed, the younger men were becoming boisterous, the elders breaking up into smaller groups, some were leaving. Gaylord could move about unnoticed.

He made his way casually over to the table where Julio had sat, apparently interested in the card game. In time, using a stranger's prerogative, he asked the old gentleman, in French, a question about some play made, and receiving a courteous explanation pressed on into conversation. In which he discovered that the old gentleman was Hurja, who owned the great house, that the Beautiful One was his daughter, that his son had been killed at the Marne, early in the war. Gaylord was impressed with his dignity and his precision of speech. He found he could talk easily to him. He told Hurja who he was, whence he had come, what his plans and hopes were for the summer, his purpose to write, and finally in perfect frankness, his strange feeling about the great house and his desire to write there. Hurja was impressed. He liked the young Englishman.

His son's room on the third story across the front had been unoccupied now for a long time; he would speak to his wife and his daughter about it. Perhaps it could be arranged. The tariff? That could be settled later. He would let him know on the morrow. He was staying at the Hôtel des Pyrenees?

The next afternoon a note reached Gaylord at the hotel, written in French in a fine hand. It was from Hurja. Gaylord could come.

His entrance brought about his first meeting with the Beautiful One. He walked through the gate in the wall of the forecourt and was met at the door by Hurja, who led him into the great hall, a vast, empty place with a beamed ceiling and stone-paved floor. There was no furniture. Hurja was explaining. The various celebrations were held there, the harvest feasts, festivals of marriage and birth. He stopped. Two ladies entered, dressed in black; one was Hurja's wife, the other—Gaylord's heart jumped—Hurja's daughter. Hurja presented him. Gaylord bowed, took the hand of Madame Hurja and kissed it. Then he stepped forward and took Yvonne Hurja's hand. At the touch he felt his whole body tremble; he ceased breathing. He looked into level gray eyes.

He could never quite explain what happened then. Time stopped. A syncope of emotion arrested his thought processes. He had looked deeply, searchingly into Yvonne's eyes, and in a blinding flash he saw the awakening of recognition.

Each read in the other's eyes a perfect understanding. Yvonne Hurja, a Basque girl of the mountains, and Trench Gaylord, cultured and traveled—and wise—found that in each other's eyes which made them both tremble. Gaylord reeled. They knew each other for all time. He pressed his lips to her tiny hand and stepped away. Father and mother saw nothing. Old Hurja was speaking again but Gaylord heard him not. He could not look into the gray eyes again.

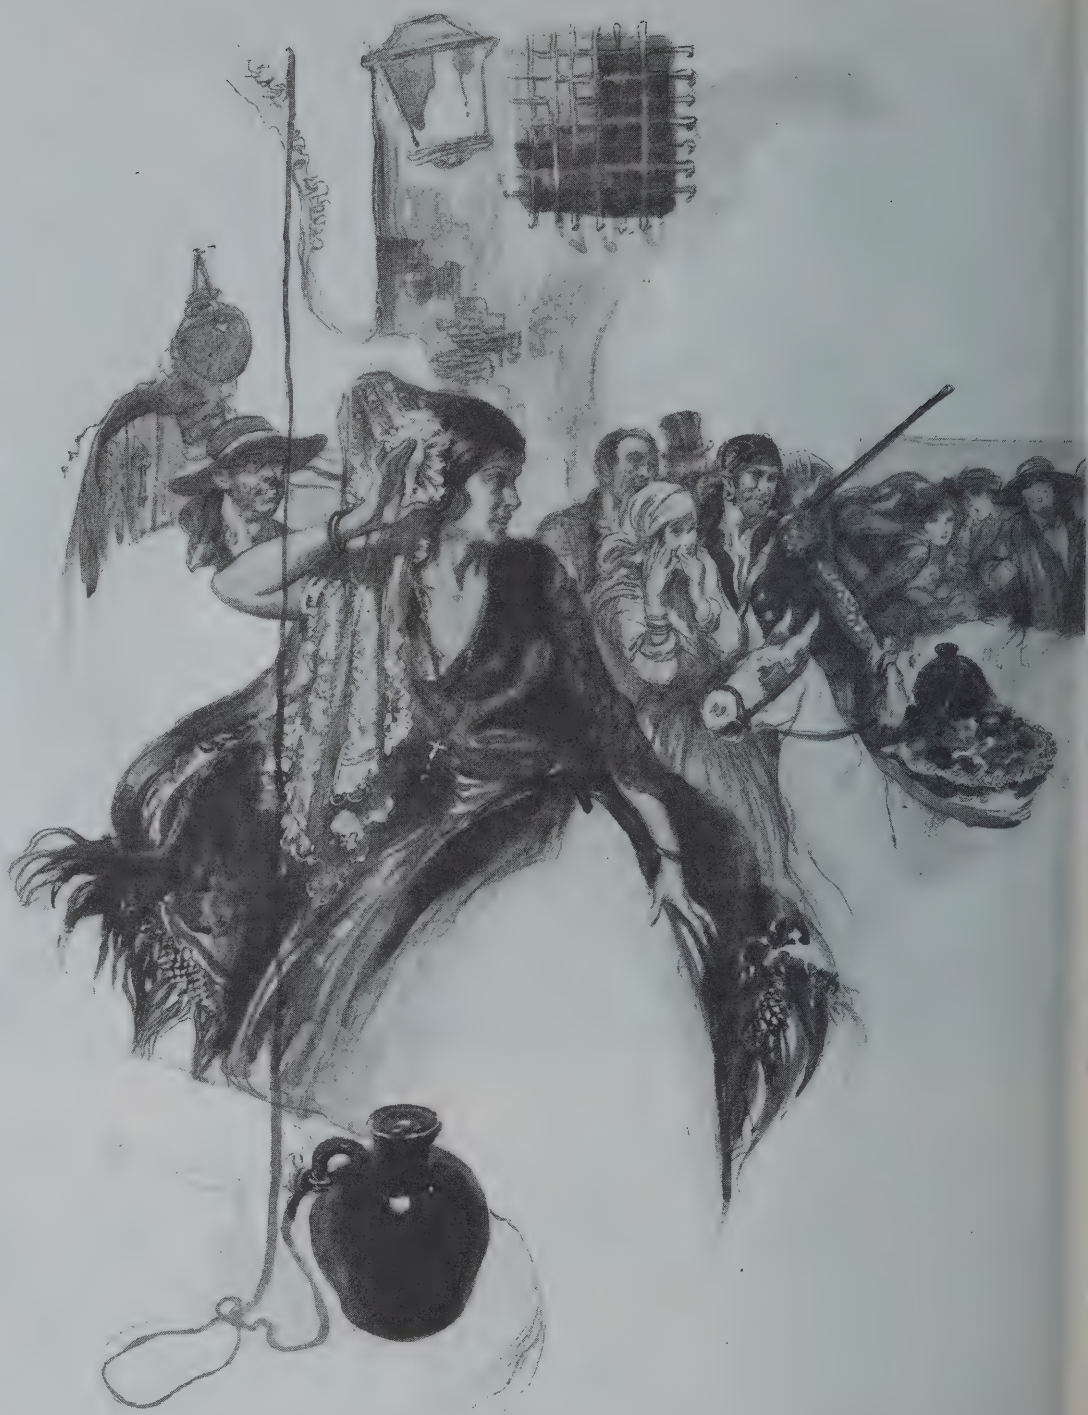
The bedroom which he was to have was spacious and exquisitely clean, with floors of polished oak, and was filled with massive old furniture.

"We are simple folk," Hurja was saying as he left Gaylord in his room. "We live simply, you may not find our customs agreeable, but I trust that you will be comfortable. We shall enjoy having you with us."

As the door closed behind him, Gaylord walked to the windows, threw them open and drew the air into his lungs in deep gulps.

He had seen the light. He had seen the light.

Below, Yvonne Hurja was crossing herself before the holy-water stoup, curiously bewildered.



In the days that followed, Gaylord settled down to the writing of his poem. He arranged his room to his liking, moved the polished heavy furniture in such a way that it variously reflected the morning sun and cast somber shadows in the evening. He wrote on a dark-topped table near the French windows; at night he placed his pages between two huge wax tapers which lighted the table but surrounded him in gloom.

The actual writing of the poem to Gaylord was a piece of calculated workmanship. His books had come on. He studied his subject from every source, selected his major and minor themes, collected and arranged his material, made innumerable jottings and preliminary drafts and began the fastidious work of fitting and matching. He knew the craft. There would be no flaws in technique, his poem would be foot and accent perfect; as to merit of thought and tone, those were qualities not measurable, by himself.

He thrilled with an odd exultation. Five hundred lines of rhythmic beauty truly pitched, crystal clear—that was the image.

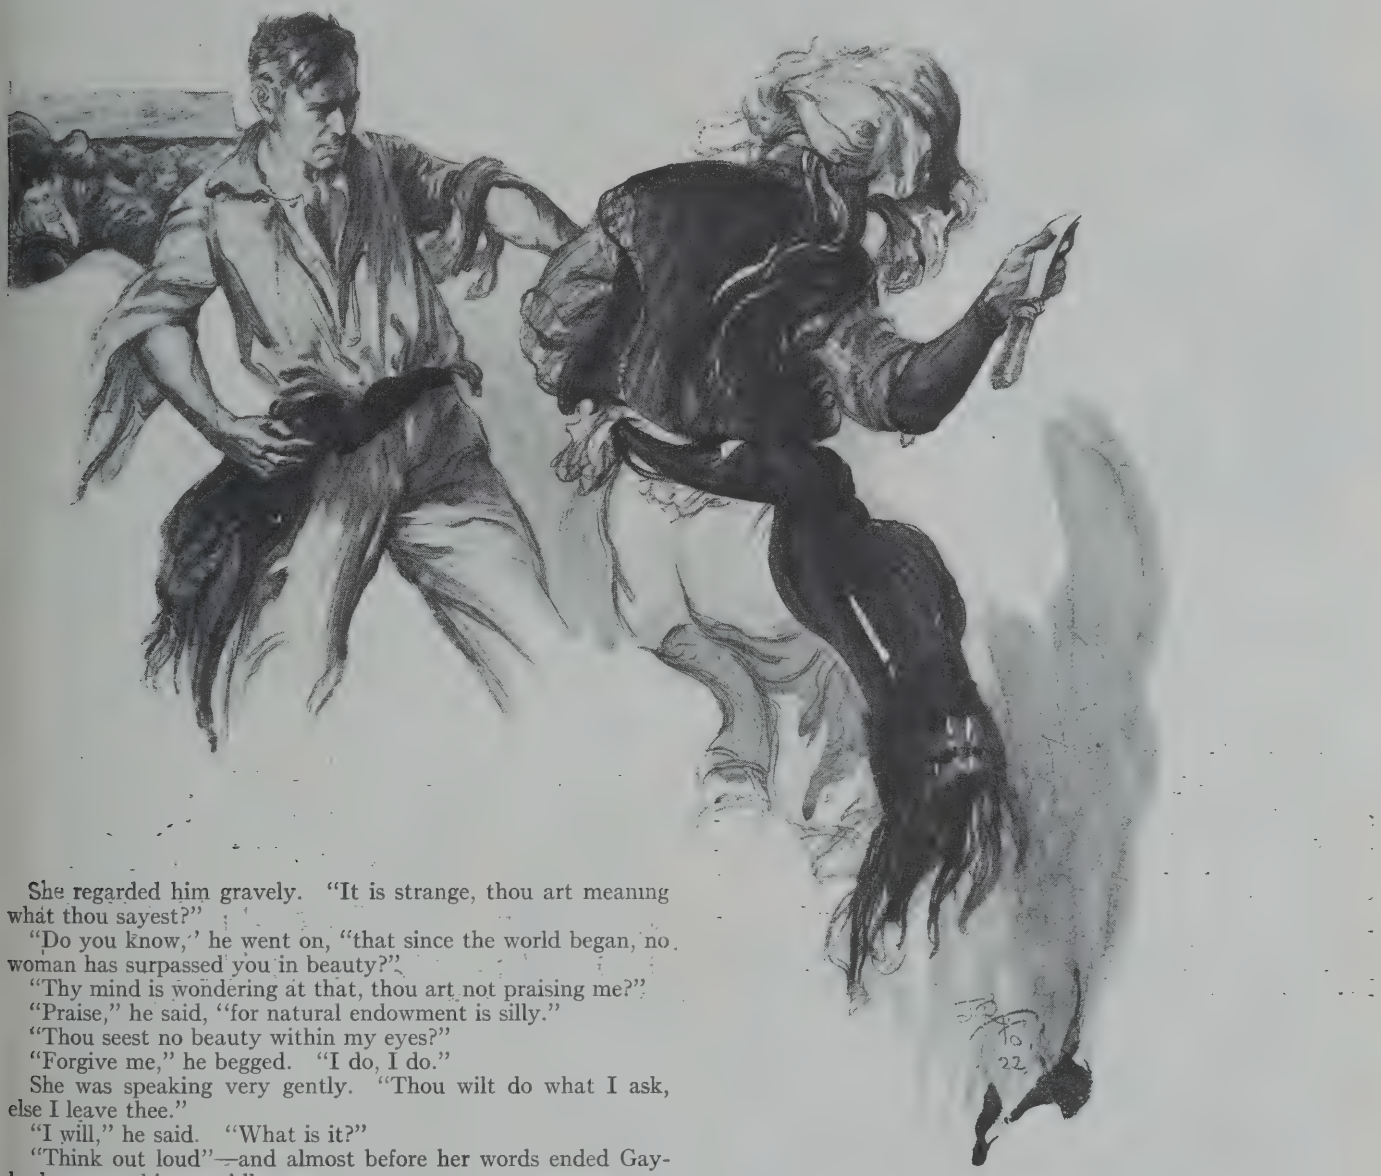
There began between Gaylord and Yvonne Hurja the strangest kind of relationship. Here in the same house were two people who held for each other a devastating love. Gaylord could not approach Yvonne without experiencing sensations which he had not known in his life. Yvonne told her story in her eyes, she knew and felt and understood. Gaylord made mad, tumultuous love to her with his eyes, and dared no further. He was at an impasse. Suppose he told her that he loved her. She knew that; what then? It was the beginning and the end. There was no way to turn, no road to travel. It was a light that blinded. Progress was impossible. Gaylord knew that there could be but one conclusion to such love, once they surrendered to it; but Gaylord read a deathless purity in Yvonne's eyes, and he knew that there would be no expediency, even if he attempted it. She would give him her life—for his life. He understood, and no word had passed between them. Yet marriage, to Gaylord, in the circumstances of his age and life, seemed futile folly.

There were times when he could scarce hold himself from taking her in his arms to tell her his love in words, but he dared not touch her.

Gaylord's hand dropped to his sash—and Yvonne knew what had to happen.

And the days went by and neither spoke of it. They trampe the hills together—he read to her, she told him old Basque fair tales and legends. From the first time she spoke to him i French she addressed him in the second person singula "tutoye'd" him. She spoke Basque, French and Spanish, bu knew no English. There was one amusing attempt to teac Gaylord Euskara, the Basque language.

"Magyar," he said, "is an atrocity. Finnish is a barbarity Any relation between those two languages is an absurdity." S she gave it up.



And so they journeyed down the days on a thread of gossame a slender thread that threatened to break and plunge them int the gulf below, whence there was no returning.

There was the day that Yvonne found the yellow drawing pa with the queer lines upon it—and recalled instantly a vision Gaylord tilted back in his chair sketching her while the roo looked on. So this was the sketch! Yvonne laughed, with better understanding of Gaylord.

There was the day when she saw the soft pine board with the deep knife blade gashes in its face, against the wall in his room, and knew that Gaylord practiced throwing the knife. She remembered Julio and the menace in his eyes.

There was a wondrous day when they two sat on a bank on the mountain side which rose in a long sweep behind them. Tardets lay below them, a city of mist and pale gold; snow sprays of wild cherry, blue spikes of monkshood, the rose of wild apple, caught the sun and bathed in fragrant radiance.

Gaylord could not still the tumult in his blood—and he walked on the edge of the precipice. "Do you know," he murmured, "that there is no one more beautiful than you?"

She regarded him gravely. "It is strange, thou art meaning what thou sayest?"

"Do you know," he went on, "that since the world began, no woman has surpassed you in beauty?"

"Thy mind is wondering at that, thou art not praising me?"

"Praise," he said, "for natural endowment is silly."

"Thou seest no beauty within my eyes?"

"Forgive me," he begged. "I do, I do."

She was speaking very gently. "Thou wilt do what I ask, else I leave thee."

"I will," he said. "What is it?"

"Think out loud"—and almost before her words ended Gaylord was speaking rapidly:

"One's nature does not change; she will be what she is now wherever she goes in whatever company she moves. She will not fit into any society to which I belong. If I take her away from her people into my world, she will be my lifelong problem—is it all worth it? I cannot live here. I do not quite belong; I think, I am not sure, but I think that I would grow to hate the mountains and the sun and the sky; I do not find charm in everyday living; I am avid of adventure and I cannot endure limitations; my impulses would torment me to madness within these hills. I cannot stay here, I dare not take her away with me. Quoi donc?"

Yvonne was breaking in gently: "Think out loud no more. Thy thoughts have sped past thy tongue—I know thy thoughts—I wanted to find if thou wert honest with thyself."

Gaylord's desperate reluctance held him in check and he said no more.

Now the village of Tardets was cognizant of Gaylord's frequent appearance with Yvonne, and Tardets was no more charitable in its conclusions than other villages. There came a night when Gaylord was brought to a consciousness of his position.

He had started writing early in the evening. It was midnight when he again looked at his watch. The white sheets of foolscap blurred before his eyes, the sentences trailed away uncertainly; the words uneven. The candles guttered in their sockets.

Gaylord rose and went to the windows, throwing them wide open, and stepped out upon the tiny balcony. A chiaroscuro of rare beauty lay before him. The moonlight streamed over the roofs of the village, throwing the church steeple into dark intaglio and the street below into a valley of shadow. The village itself seemed to be sleeping the tranquil sleep of a tired child.

Was that a shadow moving in the street below? Surely—no. Darn the candles, a flickering light is bad to write by. He closed his eyes for a moment, rubbed them and looked again, straining to penetrate the darkness. He would have sworn that there was a movement in the street below.

A wild medley of noise splintered the stillness of the night into a thousand quivering fragments. For once Gaylord was profoundly startled. Catcalls, shrill and insolent, whistles, trumpets, bells, crashed together with a furious cacophony of sound. Gaylord could distinguish cries, cries of derision followed by high pitched mocking laughter. Whistles screamed and slithered, horns blared and snarled and tore at the night air. Pans and drums clashed in maddening monotones.

He could see now that the street below in front of the houses was filled with people, people who were making the night hideous with appalling discord. His astonishment was giving way to hot anger. Were they all drunk—what was the reason for this? He stood leaning slightly over the (Continued on page 120)

Stories That Have Made Me

LAUGH

IT WAS Harry Graham who wrote the famous couplet describing the interior decoration of Skibo Castle, Scotland, as:

A style which Ruskin much enjoyed,
And christened Early German Lloyd.

He has also written a number of amusing books of verse and fiction, including "Ruthless Rhymes for Heartless Homes," "Lord Bellinger" and seventeen or eighteen other published volumes of which the latest is "Biffin and His Circle." One of the characters in Biffin is a geographical song writer called Minter, who having made a hit with "I Want to Go to Wyoming," quickly follows it up with "Take My Ticket for Tacoma!" "How I Long to Be Way Back in Borneo!" "I Wish I Were in Washington." It seems reasonable, therefore, that Harry Graham is responsible for the following story. At any rate, an English friend of mine says he is.

Queen Mary and several members of the Royal Household were enjoying a concert by the band of the Coldstream Guards in the grounds of Windsor Castle. Always the first to encourage any originality in the arts of which military band music is reckoned one or at least .0031416, the Queen was particularly attracted toward a composition played with much dash and spirit and received with corresponding applause by the members of the Royal Household. Accordingly, she dispatched an equerry to inquire of the bandmaster the name of the unfamiliar composition.

During the absence of the equerry, there was much speculation as to the nationality of the composer. The Master of the Royal Buck Hounds was of the opinion that it was by Debussy. On the other hand, the Master of the Royal Stag Hounds professed to see in it some of the characteristics of Max Reger with just a dash of Arnold Schoenberg. Six Masters of Assorted Hounds declared for the Italian composer Zandonai, but Queen Mary herself secretly hoped that so interesting a composition had been written by the Englishman Delius or Goossens so that it might be placed permanently in the repertoire of the Royal Band Concerts. When the equerry returned, however, he bore the disappointing information that the composition was that of an American musician. It was entitled:

"I Wish I Could Shimmy Like My Sister Can"

STORIES about men who have lost their voices are usually easier to tell than to write. Here is one, however, about an old farmer in Georgia who could hardly speak above a whisper. He was leaning on a fence by the side of a country road watching a dozen or so razorback hogs in a patch of woodland. They were behaving in a most extraordinary manner, for every few minutes they would burst out of a gap in the fence, run across the road to another patch of woodland, and almost immediately afterward dash madly back again.

"What's the matter with them hogs anyway?" a passing stranger asked.

"They ain't nothing the matter with them much," the old farmer whispered hoarsely. "Them hogs belongs to me and before I lost my voice, I used to call them to their feed. After I lost my voice, when it came feeding time, I used to knock on this here fence rail with my stick."

He paused and shook his head solemnly.

"And now them cussed woodpeckers up in them trees has got them poor hogs plumb crazy," he concluded.

BANKING is a profession which calls for the exercise of a nice discretion unaffected by sympathy. A banker who would grant a loan out of sheer pity is no more to be trusted with the depositors' money than a surgeon could be trusted to perform an operation if he were habitually shaken with sobs of compassion every time he started to make an incision.

Fortunately for depositors and patients, neither bankers nor surgeons allow their feelings to run away with them when it comes to a professional job. Bankers are particularly and quite properly hard-hearted, especially Mr. Edward Gandy, President of the Farmers' and Merchants' National Bank of New Rochelle, N. Y.—don't look it up in the directory. It isn't there.

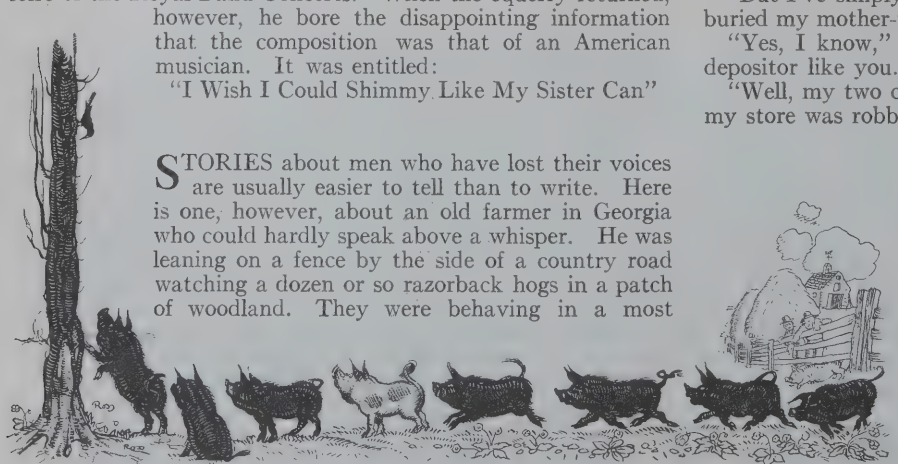
In addition to a hard heart, however, Mr. Gandy had a glass eye. It was made to order in Europe and Mr. Gandy was mighty proud of it, for it exactly matched Mr. Gandy's real eye, and in fact if it had not been that he could not forbear boasting about how much he had paid for it and how natural it looked, not more than the entire population of New Rochelle would have known that his glass eye was glass.

People who wear wigs are deluded in that way, too. As the barber said, sadly, "There are plenty of hairdressers who profess to make a wig, but when you've got it on, it looks nothing like a wig at all!"

However, not to digress from Mr. Gandy, he was approached one day by a depositor who desired a loan of a thousand dollars.

"Well, now, Mr. Briggs," Gandy said, "you keep a very small average daily balance—less than a hundred dollars—and you're not entitled to any loan."

"But I've simply got to have it," Briggs declared. "I've just buried my mother-in-law. My wife has been sick for months."



"Yes, I know," Gandy said, "but I can't make a loan to a depositor like you."

"Well, my two children have had their tonsils taken out, and my store was robbed last week," Briggs continued.

"That may well be," Gandy replied. "But you can't get a loan here."

"Now, listen to me, Mr. Gandy," Briggs went on to say, "if I don't get some money somewhere, it means ruin for me. I'll commit suicide, that's all!"

Mr. Gandy felt that he was slipping. If he permitted Mr. Briggs to continue the conversation, it looked as though he might make the loan. He thought of a scheme to let Briggs down easy. He had never boasted to Briggs about the glass eye and he felt confident that Briggs knew nothing about it; accordingly he proceeded to entrap Briggs.

By MONTAGUE GLASS

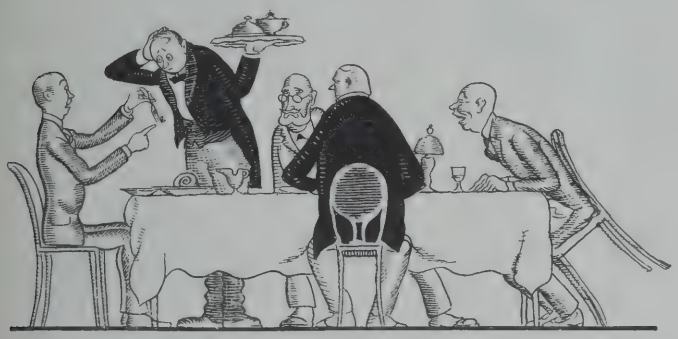
Illustrations by Gordon Ross

"Now, look here, Briggs," he began. "I'm sorry to see a man like you in such straits and I don't want to shut down on you absolutely, so I'll give you an even break. Did you ever know that I have a glass eye?"

Briggs simulated surprise, not to say astonishment.

"No, I didn't," he said, looking carefully at Mr. Gandy's natural eye. "Which one is it?"

"Ah!" Mr. Gandy replied. "That's for you to guess. And if you guess it correctly, I'll make the loan."



"It's the right eye," Briggs replied promptly.

"You're correct this time," Gandy said and forthwith instructed the cashier to place a thousand dollars to Briggs's credit after taking Briggs's note for the amount.

"Now, tell me, Briggs," Mr. Gandy said, after the transaction was concluded, "how did you find out that my right eye was the glass eye?"

"Because," Briggs replied, "compared with your left eye, it looked so kind and sympathetic."

NOWHERE can entomology be studied more successfully than in cheap Italian and French restaurants. Year after year Mr. Will C. Beebe goes to British Guiana and penetrates the well-nigh impenetrable jungle in search of strange insects which can be found right in the village limits of Greenwich Village nestling among the leaves of a Romaine salad in the Ristorante Aurelio Saffi or masquerading in death as tea leaves at the bottom of a cup in any one of the hundreds of tea rooms conducted in New York by decayed gentlewomen.

Mr. J. F. Sayre, of San Francisco, says that some of the Italian resorts of his own fair city are particularly rich in specimens of the family Muscidæ and the order Diptera, of the sub-order Brachycera and of the subdivision Dichætæ. All these jaw-breaking names refer to but one animal—the housefly—and Mr. Sayre says that he knew of an instance where no less than three of them were served up in one omelette. It was at a luncheon for four and the host was not unnaturally annoyed.

"Look here, waiter," he said, "there are three flies in this omelette. Now I must insist that the next time I order an omelette for four here, you have either four flies in it or none at all. It's a damned hard matter to divide three flies equally among four people."

MY FRIEND MacLaren was rambling along the other evening something in this style:

The Scot, he observed, is a natural born linguist. There is hardly a language that he cannot pick up almost by ear, you might say, and speak it as well as a native.

For instance, the Scot has been speaking English for only a relatively short time—say five hundred years or so—and yet the purest English is spoken just as the purest Scotch is drunk right on the banks of the Clyde. Chinese has no terrors for a Scotsman. The English have great difficulty in mastering it, but not so the Scotch. For instance, there were two members of a Highland regiment taking part in the capture of Weihaiwei or Wei-Hai-Wei, during the Boxer Rebellion. Almost immediately they began to speak in Chinese, or at any rate the Chinese recognized it as such. The conversation was as follows:

SANDY: Weel! We hae Wei-Hai-Wei!

JOCK: Hae we?

SANDY: Ay! We hae!

PIDGIN English has nearly, if not entirely disappeared from the Pacific Coast. Nowadays the classic English of Berkeley and Palo Alto is none too good for the Chinese and Japanese of California. James J. Montague says that even twenty-five years ago pidgin English was on the wane in California. He was standing one day on a wharf in San Francisco watching the approach of a tramp steamer. The weather was foggy and Montague was therefore unable to make out what flag the steamer was flying. Beside him stood a Chinaman in native costume and wearing a pigtail.

"John," Montague said, "you catchee what piecee flag him fly?"

"I cahn't exactly make out from here," "John" replied, "but I rahther imagine it must be the house flag of that particular line. Certainly it doesn't appear to be any national flag with which I am acquainted, at least."

THIS story seems to render highly improbable the story about the Governor of Hong-Kong, the late Sir Henry Pottinger, his aide and the King of Siam. The King had arrived at Hong-Kong and was lodging with his suite at the best hotel there, and notwithstanding that it was at that time the best hotel in Hong-Kong, its office staff spoke and understood only pidgin English.

Sir Henry called to make his formal visit of welcome the morning after the King's arrival. He wore the gorgeous dress uniform of a Governor of Hong-Kong. The Governor's aide wore the equally spectacular uniform of a Colonel in the Household Guards.

"Inquire if His Majesty has risen," the Governor said to his aide.

"Very good, Your Excellency," the aide replied and walked across the lobby to the clerk's desk making no more noise in his progress than a regiment of United States cavalry.

His manner toward the clerk, however, was much less formal.

"One piecee king have got?" he inquired.

"One piecee king no have got," the clerk replied.

The aide returned to the Governor's carriage and saluted ceremoniously.

"I have inquired of the management whether or not His Majesty is at home, Your Excellency," the aide announced, "and I regret to say they inform me that His Majesty has gone out."

The Eminent Dr. Deeves

(Continued from page 36)

automobile could cover it in an hour or less. And Dougherty lived in a small city on the opposite bank of the river not ten miles north of where the refugee—if he succeeded in getting away from his warders—would cross on the ferry which plied between the shores. With a fair share of luck, one more main difficulty would be ironed out to smoothness.

The escape was simplicity itself; nothing delayed it and no alarm followed it. On the appointed day, just after luncheon had been eaten, young Shire came forth from the dining hall of the building in which he was lodged. On the lawn, as if by chance, he met the girl. Casually they walked diagonally through the grounds to where an elderly man named James Eggers sat on duty in his regular post alongside the main gates which opened in the east wall.

At a word from Miss Deeves, Eggers, touching his cap in salute, let them pass through. At least a third of the patients, including nearly all held to be harmless and known ordinarily to be well behaved, were allowed, under suitable escort, to leave the enclosure for cross-country strolls; a few even were permitted to accompany the attendants to the town. Their absence for hours, even for a whole forenoon or a whole afternoon, would not be regarded with concern. Shire, these last few months, had been listed in this favored group. True, by the regulations a nurse or a male keeper should now be with him. But in Eggers's eyes the daughter of his employer was, in effect, a qualified member of the administrative staff. If she elected to stand sponsor for this young fellow the responsibility would be hers.

Suspecting nothing, the gatekeeper watched them until they passed from his sight along the graveled drive that skirted the wall. He had not taken notice that Miss Deeves was very white and that she was trembling. His one glance of official scrutiny had been for the patient and about the latter the gatekeeper had seen nothing which was calculated to make him look a second time. He settled back in his chair and lighted his pipe. The warm soft air invited him to loaf and forget his private worries—if he had any such. He need not think again of the pair until toward evening.

An eighth of a mile away, under the rear wall of the compound, the girl's car, with oil cups and gas tank newly filled, stood where she had left it half an hour before. No one saw them mount to its seat; no one who knew either of the pair saw them driving southward along a back road to where it joined the turnpike running to the west. Westward then they traveled, going rapidly. In the run to the river they stopped only once; that was at a small railroad station, where Shire handed a rush message, which had been written beforehand, and a coin in payment, to a listless person serving there as train dispatcher and telegraph agent.

They drove on then, with speed, until they came to the edge of a slope where the shelving bank went down to meet the mile-wide river. The ferryboat, a clumsy, double-ended craft, was in midstream, headed their way but making slow work of it against the strong current. They would have at least twenty minutes to wait, and perhaps half an hour, before the boat landed and put ashore what freight she had brought and began her return trip.

Of pursuit before dark there was now little danger. Looking back frequently as they sped along, young Shire had seen behind him no signs to suggest a chase. By heavy odds of probability he was quite safe—certainly as safe as he could hope to be until he touched the soil of the adjoining state. Nevertheless, it was at his suggestion that the car was turned off the road into the thick fringing of hazel bushes and stunted haws that ran along the brow of the low ridge above the landing. Here in this shielded place they were out of sight of any save an especially keen-eyed passer-by. In part, this move was dictated by his instincts of prudence, in part by another purpose which he had in mind.

In due time the ferryboat came to bank, discharged her cargo, took on another and headed away again for the opposite shore. No automobile went aboard her, though, but only a couple of farm wagons and a dusty buggy. Nor was there a young man or a young girl among the foot-passengers. Three countrymen and an old woman and a small boy made up the list of passengers.

In his own automobile on the far shore waited Colonel Dougherty. He had received a telegram half an hour before; he had come swiftly to the crossing place to meet his friend. He waited and waited until nightfall, then drove homeward, alone and perplexed by apprehensions.

Along towards four o'clock of this same May afternoon Doctor Deeves sat in his library, which was a room opening off the reception hall of his cottage. Since luncheon he had been there, making final revision of the proofs of his book—the book that would live long after he was gone, bearing his knowledge down to enrich the learning of men in generations yet to come. Subconsciously he heard the front door open and close. Then his own door was flung open and there before him stood one of his charges, this young man, Stephen Shire. The famous specialist laid down his pen and reared back in his swivel chair; he was mildly startled by the intrusion. His patients did not have the run of his private residence, naturally. Even so, Doctor Deeves retained the unruffled magisterial air which he used in his intercourse with the inmates of his asylum.

"Well," he said, "what does this mean?"

"It means I've come back," said the younger man. He was breathing hard as though under great stress, and now Doctor Deeves saw that the intruder's face was streaked with dust and his clothing, too.

"You've come back, eh?" he said soothingly. He was accustomed to vagaries and hallucinations; he flattered himself he knew how to deal with them. Doctor Deeves was forever flattering himself on one count or another. "And where have you been?"

"Twenty miles away—and twenty miles back. I ran away from here—two hours and a half ago. Hold on!" He spoke out sharply as Doctor Deeves's hand reached toward a push button set in the wall just behind him. "You needn't ring that bell. Nobody at the sanitarium knows I got away, I think. I haven't been missed yet. Nobody need know. I came back of my own free will. And I brought her back with me."

"Her?" Doctor Deeves half lifted from his chair. He knew now he was confronted by realities, not by delusional fancies; a quick suspicion was rising in his mind. "Her? Who do you mean?"

"Your daughter, Hazel Deeves. It was in her car that I got away. I drove it—but she went with me. Wait—I didn't steal her—I didn't abduct her. She helped me get away. But we've both come back—God help us—yes, and God help you, too!"

"Why that? Where is she? What has happened, man?" Doctor Deeves was scarcely aware—and yet somehow was definitely aware—that he spoke now as one rational man to another rational man. He had shed his professional manner as a runner might shed a garment, hindering him. He was all the concerned father—the imperturbable scientist, with his pose of infallibility, had vanished utterly.

"She's upstairs in her own room—safe enough—she hasn't been hurt in any way. Sit down! Don't go to her yet. Wait until you hear what I have to tell you."

It was as though Shire gave his orders with due authority to give them. Mechanically the older man obeyed. All at once now the young ex-soldier dominated the room. He thrust his head forward, fairly flinging his words in the other's face. His intensity armed him with a sort of straightforward eloquence:

"Doctor Deeves, listen: I'm a sane man—you've got to believe that. And here's another thing you've got to believe because in another minute or two I'll be proving it to you—I love your daughter. And she loves me. If you'd been able to see anything except the things you're interested in, you'd have seen it months ago. But you—you couldn't see—you were blind. Oh, my God, how blind you've been!

"She loves me—she loved me well enough to plot with me to get away from this place today. We made for the river. I've got friends on the other side who'd have helped me prove my case—friends standing ready to provide me with funds until I could get back what rightfully belongs to me. Never mind that now. She loved me well enough to be willing to come back here after I'd gotten beyond your reach—to come back alone and face you and your anger.

"But I had a different plan in my mind. I didn't tell it to her, though, until we were within sight of the crossing. Then I told her—then I began to plead with her to go on with me to the other side and when we were on that other side, to marry me. That was what I begged her to do—at the first, until——

"But wait, I'll go back a little so you'll understand more clearly; I've been going ahead too fast in what I'm telling you.

"As we were making for the river I felt confident and overjoyed and not a bit worried over the final outcome. I was

The rich purée of tiny, sweetest peas

Smooth, wholesome, inviting pea soup! What a delightful and refreshing dish it is! It's a soup that everybody likes both for its delicious flavor and its generous, satisfying nourishment. The very name "pea soup" is a promise to your appetite. Do not disappoint it. Campbell's delights the taste on edge for pea soup that has the real flavor and richness. The puree is richer still for the fine butter which is blended in. The delicate seasoning gives just the right appetizing touch. Once taste it, and you will serve Campbell's every time you have pea soup!

Cream of Pea

If you wish a Cream of Pea that will be your pride, just follow the simple directions on the label for making it with Campbell's.

21 kinds 12 cents a can

Campbells' Soups

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

beating you at your own game; I was sure I could keep on beating you. The human being I loved best in all this world was with me, helping me. But somehow she seemed very much frightened. She kept trembling. She was as white as death. Suddenly I realized how frail she was and how wasted and thin. Like a little weak shadow! She kept looking about her on every side as though she expected enemies would be hiding behind every tree and every bush. I tried to soothe her.

"And then, when we'd got to the river and the ferry was in sight, coming toward us, I started to tell her the rest of my purpose; the biggest part of it. I told her I was no such coward as to induce her to help me get away and then let her come back alone to face the consequences. I told her how deeply I loved her and how sure I felt of my sanity and how certain I was of my ability to care for her. I begged her to go on across that river with me.

"She told me she couldn't. Not that she didn't care for me. I knew, without her telling me, that she cared for me. She said she couldn't go because she was afraid. I asked her what she was afraid of—was it me she feared? She said, no. She said—oh, listen, man, while I tell you what she said!—she said she must get back inside these walls here. She said this was the only place she felt safe. She said that away from here she was in danger. Still, I thought she was only overwrought, that the excitement had been too much for her. I asked her what danger there could possibly be.

"And she said—pointing with her poor shaking finger this way and that—she said: 'Stephen, they're squatting here in these bushes all about us. I can't see them but I can hear them and I know how they look. I didn't tell you of them before but now I must tell you. They have black masks on their faces and they've long, shiny blowpipes in their hands. They're waiting to blow their poisonous vapors at me. They'll destroy me when you're gone unless I go back and get inside the wall. They won't dare follow me in there. But out in the world, even with you, I'll never be safe, Stephen. There's only one place where I ever will be safe from them.'

"That's what your daughter, Hazel Deeves, said to me, Doctor Deeves!

"So I turned around and I brought her back—brought her back to the only fit place for her to be. And I came back because I love her, because I couldn't desert her now, because I want to be near her when she's cured.

"Oh, man, man, man, don't you see what you've done? You kept her here all her life with mad people about her. You didn't think that contact with them could hurt her—I heard her say months ago that that was your belief. And you—all so blind and besotted in your own egotism—you didn't see that her loss of flesh and her loss of spirits meant anything. You didn't see what was beginning to prey on her, didn't see that a strain or a shock might carry her across the dividing line. You, who are supposed to know so much of mental diseases, and she, your own flesh and blood, your own daughter—and still you couldn't see it—could you?

"But now, by God, you've got to see it! She's mad, Doctor Deeves, she's mad, I tell you. Go up yonder to her room—go speak with her and see for yourself. That's all. You'll find me here when you come back."

And Doctor Deeves went. He went running.

All the fire and force seemed to go out of the young ex-lieutenant in a puff. He fell down on his knees upon the floor, his arms on the littered desk-top and his face in his arms. He was still there fifteen minutes later when stumbling, fumbling footsteps sounded on the stairs outside the door. He lifted his head as the uncertain footfalls came into the room where he was, and seeing before him then a figure of a shrunken broken man, stripped of all arrogance, physically twisted by an anguish that racked and wrenched his frame and made years older in a breath of time, the young man for all his own grief could not but feel a pang of pity for the other.

You'd hardly have known this man, so marred and altered as he was, for the eminent Doctor Deeves.

There is another treat in store for you—Irvin Cobb's big story in the next COSMOPOLITAN. It is one of those mystery stories that couldn't be written by anyone but Irvin Cobb.

The Lone Wolf Returns

(Continued from page 93)

least in the world for you. And even if I did . . . But I don't want to be unfair. You've had too much to drink tonight. Do go now, please, go right away and don't come back till you're ready to beg my pardon."

"Oh!" The iced sincerity of the rebuff wiped away the self-confident smirk and set in its place a scowl dark with affronted self-esteem. "That's your style, is it, my lady? Virtue on a pedestal! And after the way you've led me on."

Folly held him briefly in a stare of incredulous disdain; her rush of color slowly ebbing. A slight gesture sketched inability to understand the man; in a voice of reproach and regret she said quietly, "Oh, Mally! how can you be so contemptible?"

The countenance of the dancing man grew darker still, his too full lips took on an ugly contour beneath their closely trimmed mustache of the mode. He seemed to contemplate, even with difficulty to refrain from uttering, some embittered and withering retort. Instead, he turned in dumb fury and flung out of the house. Thanks less to his temper and intention than to its automatic air check the door closed without noise other than the click of its latch. And hearing this sound, Folly gave herself a little shake of impatience and reasserted the wonted spirit of her countenance as she ran back to rejoin Pagan and Liane Delorme.

Their three voices were once more busy when Lanyard made his way back to the boudoir telephone and took a long chance with it, communicating to the central operator the number which Crane had left with him. But the turn of his luck was such that, though the connection was established all but instantaneously, the masculine voice that answered was not Crane's.

No, Mr. Crane wasn't in, and there was no telling when he would be in; maybe in ten minutes, maybe in ten days. But the voice was perfunctorily prepared to take any message that Lanyard might care to leave and see that it got into Crane's hands as soon as he did return, if ever.

"Tell him, please, Mr. Duchemin called him up." It was necessary to spell out that old alias which Crane would hardly have forgotten. "Say my business is urgent—Mr. Crane will understand."

"Want him to call y'up? What's yuh number?"

Without the least hesitation, in a single phrase Lanyard abolished the telephone installation at Folly McFee's: "Say there is no telephone. But give him, if you will be so good, this address." Lanyard detailed the number of the house and street and hung up. He had no fear that Crane would fail to draw an intelligent inference and guide himself by the light thereof. Nevertheless he would have been grateful for some assurance that Crane would get the message in good time . . .

Back at the head of the stairs he felt warranted in assuming that his daring with the telephone had not betrayed him. The hum of talk that rose from the diminished dinner party was constant, or punctuated only by laughter. For all that, Lanyard escaped discovery by the narrowest of squeaks; for he stepped out into the hallway only to find that Mallison had let himself into the house again and was slinking furtively up the stairs—was even then, indeed, halfway up.

Driven back to the refuge of the clothes-press, Lanyard pulled its door into position in the same instant that saw Mallison skulk into the boudoir.

It appeared from this, then, that one had not erred in mistrusting the "nervous" hands of the dancing man as they had played with the knob—and, one might no longer doubt, with the safety catch as well—what time Mallison had delayed, posing with his back to the door and philanderin' with Folly . . .

CHAPTER IX

NEITHER might he who unsuspected spied, through the crack of a closet door all but closed, on Mr. Mallison with many a gesture of quiet authority making himself at home in Folly's rooms, seriously question the presence of a practician adept in the grammar of second story work. Mallison's footfalls would not have ruffled the repose of an insomniac, the play of his hands was certain yet light as the flutter of butterfly wings; and what he had to do by way of making ready for what he purposed doing, he did with right professional economy of effort.

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

Real Naptha! You can tell by the smell

Healthier homes with the sanitary housecleaner

©1923, Fels & Co. Philadelphia

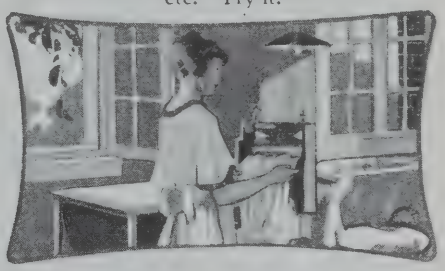
Begin your Spring housecleaning this year by buying a 10-bar carton of Fels-Naptha Soap at your grocer's. Your house will be cleaner; your work, easier; and your health, and that of your family, safeguarded.

Sanitary! Fels-Naptha Soap discourages germ life by completely removing grease-spots and other dirt-patches where germs camp and multiply. Fresh air, sunshine, Fels-Naptha Soap—three great purifiers.

Fels-Naptha does all housecleaning and laundry work more quickly, safely and thoroughly because it is really two cleaners in one: a soap-and-water cleaner, and a naptha cleaner. To get Fels-Naptha benefits, you must use the original and genuine naptha soap—Fels-Naptha!

It is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners. Order Fels-Naptha Soap today.

TEST Fels-Naptha's wonderful efficiency. Send 2c in stamps for sample bar. Address Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia.

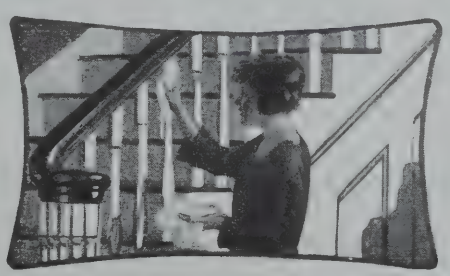


Makes dishes really clean

Fels-Naptha makes short work of a boresome job. Won't harm the most delicate pattern. Leaves no greasy streaks.

Removes spots from rugs

The real naptha in Fels-Naptha dissolves grease—cleans and freshens rugs, carpets, draperies, etc. Try it.



Fine for washing-machine

Fels-Naptha, in the washing-machine, loosens the dirt before you start to use the electricity. Chip it in and dissolve, or make a soap-paste.

The 10-Bar Carton

The convenient way to buy Fels-Naptha is in the carton shown above. Ten full-size bars, neatly packed. Directions inside each red-and-green wrapper.

Renews painted woodwork

Like a fresh coat of enamel, Fels-Naptha restores to woodwork the "smile" that dirt has masked.

To begin with, he did nothing at all more than stand still in the middle of the boudoir and study with glances keen, direct and comprehensive what one guessed were surroundings not wholly strange to him. And seeing him thus with his guard down, naked of all his petty social airs and graces and that shining garment of conceit which clothed the man like a woven armor when he was self-conscious, the hidden watcher began to suspect that he might have erred in his first rating, that the Mallison now revealed was worthier to be reckoned with than he had guessed. The Mallison of this minute was nobody's fool, knew what he was about, and—or Lanyard read every surface sign awry—was dangerously capable of proving at need a disconcerting knowledge of how to take care of himself.

With a muted grunt of gratification in the sum of his survey, the man passed through to the bedchamber, wherein his maneuvers were less readily followed, since the mirror in the boudoir revealed to Lanyard only a narrow segment of the adjoining room. This comprehended, however, the head of Folly's bed, and the small table beside it from whose drawer Mallison removed a pretty trinket of a silver-plated, pearl-handled pistol, extracting its shells, thoughtfully putting them away in one of his waistcoat pockets, and finally replacing the weapon with nice precision where he had found it.

Content, it seemed, thus to have done his bit for preparedness, Mallison sauntered back to the boudoir, stripped off his topcoat, folded it with meticulous care and hid it, together with his hat, on the floor behind a capacious lounge chair.

Then consulting his watch and with a yawn politely shielded registering time to kill, he strolled over to the secretary and stooped to inspect, with a flickering, sly smile, the safe built into its base. The tip of a fingernail discreetly pried open the blind front, leaving no treacherous trace, but after a show of hesitation the man seemingly decided not to disturb the safe itself, and restored the front to its former position. Private papers, with which the pigeonholes of the secretary were well stocked, next drew his interest, and he was betraying a mean disposition to tamper with them when the chance discovery of a hand mirror resting face up on Folly's blotting book diverted Mallison with a temptation which he didn't even attempt to resist. And he had finished disciplining an imperceptibly unruly eyebrow and had begun to practice a devastating smile, an artful variation of the infallible gleam-of-teeth suite, when a bell grumbled vigorously in the bowels of the house and was interpreted as a signal for strict attention to business thenceforward.

Mallison went at once to the door to listen, an occupation in which he had the man in the clothespress at a good disadvantage. The latter none the less contrived to infer from noises in the entrance hall that Pagan's car had duly reported and that its owner and Liane were saying good night. Then, as the rumor of their voices failed, Mallison recrossed the boudoir with swift but silent tread and passed once more from Lanyard's range of vision. The latter, however, recalled having noticed a handsome painted screen in that corner, and entertained no doubt but that Mallison was making himself small behind it.

To prove this guess well grounded, Folly herself entered in another moment and gave every evidence of being unaware of any alien presence as she faltered through the boudoir, casting discontented glances round as if in aimless search for something in the nature of an occupation for her thoughts. Unmistakably disappointed, and thereby the more frankly fretted, she drifted on to her bedchamber, from whose unseen recesses her voice and her maid's were presently to be heard.

What they said was of no moment—their bedtime dialogue of every day, varied only by Folly's decision to stay up awhile longer; she wasn't sleepy and had letters to write. So saying, she dismissed the maid and sulkily trailed back into the boudoir, bringing a sizable case of tooled leather which held, one surmised, the jewelry she had worn at dinner, and which she proceeded to put away in the safe that deserved its name so little, but only as a matter of habit, demonstrating that all faith in the contraption was dead by not troubling to shut its door and set the lock. In the pause that ensued, with a sigh of boredom Folly settled down in the chair before her secretary, and Lanyard ventured to widen the crack of the door a fraction.

The woman sat toying with a pen and more than half turned away from this observer, charmingly posed with all the unconscious grace that was native to the sweetly fashioned body which her negligee, a sheer web of lace threaded with ribbon, made so bare a pretense of covering. A lamp on the top of the secretary focused upon her head rays whose fairy gold turned the dusky tangle of her hair into a living nimbus and edged tenderly a neck and shoulders kissable in the sight of any man. Indeed, Mallison was hardly to be blamed . . .

He stole up behind the woman lost in thought without making a sound; the fire of his lips on her flesh was the first that she knew of his presence. Crying out in alarm and anger, she started up to find herself in his arms.

"Hush, dear—please!" Mallison entreated, trying to insure her silence by resting fingers lightly upon her lips. "The servants might hear——"

"Might!" Folly stormed, jerking her head away. "They shall!"

If Mallison had counted on such toleration as she had shown him by the street door half an hour earlier, his lamentable error was made manifest to him without an instant's grace. Folly fought him like a miniature fury, and to such effect that she was free while her defiance was still an echo in the room—free and swelling her throat with a scream when he plumped upon his knees before her and threw wide arms of subjugation.

"Please, please!" he begged, "don't call for help. I'll do anything you say, promise to be good and go quietly when you choose to send me away—only don't call your servants. Think what they'd think!"

"What's that to me?" Folly demanded. "What do I care what they think of you?"

"It's you I'm considering," the man protested. "It's what they'd think of you I'm worrying about. You can't imagine that they'd give you the benefit of the doubt . . ."

"Benefit of what doubt?"

"Do you suppose they'd believe I ever found my way up here without your invitation?"

"Is a woman always suspected of enticing the man who breaks into her house like a thief? I'll risk that!"

"No—for God's sake, wait, listen to me, Folly! I don't deserve to be thrown out, you owe me fairer treatment——"

"I owe you—what?"

"You're a woman, not a schoolgirl—you know what you've been doing to me these last few weeks, you know you've driven me half out of my head flirting with me."

"Oh?" Folly's sense of humor reasserted itself in a little laugh. "Why half?"

"Entirely, then," Mallison conceded sullenly. He got upon his feet again, but his attitude remained conciliatory, suppliant, though he persisted in seeking to defend himself at her expense. "If it's insanity to love you, then I'm mad enough—but God's my witness, I'm not altogether to blame. And you know that's true."

"And I'm to understand you stole back here tonight to tell me that?"

"No—but to beg your forgiveness for having acted as I did awhile ago. I couldn't leave things as they were between us overnight, I couldn't think of anything but how unfair you were when I lost control of myself for just one little minute and made you see how madly I love you. I had to come back and have it out, explain—arrive at some sort of an understanding."

"And you want me to believe you considered these your best overtures?" Folly uttered a cluck of contempt. "Before you go," she pursued, instinctively dragging across her bosom the inadequate protection of the negligee, "you might be good enough to explain how you did manage to sneak up here."

But Mallison merely uttered a sibilant "Hush!" and lifted a hand of warning.

Below, the grumble of the doorbell resounded with an accent imperative.

"What do you suppose that means?" the dancing man demanded in a whisper of apprehension.

"Somebody at the front door . . . How should I know?" The noise was repeated. A glint of distrust kindled in the woman's eyes. "What's the matter, Mally? Expecting somebody?"

"Nonsense. What a question! Who should I be expecting?"

"How do I know?"

"I was only startled . . ."

"Yes," Folly affirmed with tightened lips, "I noticed that."

A sudden confusion arose in the lower hallway, several people giving tongue all at once; evidently whoever it was that had answered the door had been instantly made the target of a storm of questions.

Folly's face showed a stamp of deepened misgivings and suspicion. "What on earth ——" she murmured.

Upon these words Mallison closed in on her again and made her captive in a tight embrace.

"What does it matter?" he insisted. "Stupid people bothering Soames; what do they matter to you and me? Folly, I love you, I'm mad——"

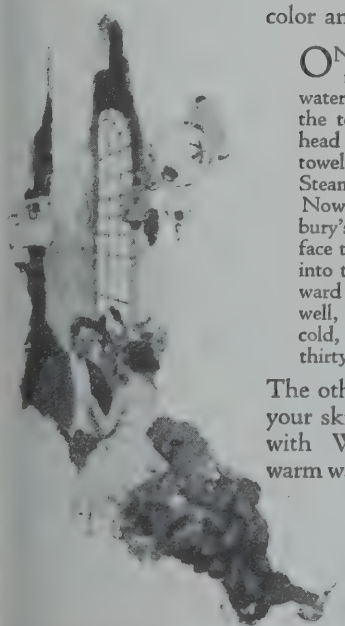
She was fighting wildly but impotently now, kicking, pommeling with fists that did no hurt, biting at the hand that closed her mouth. Downstairs the clamor rose to a pitch of angry disputation. Boldly Lanyard stepped out of concealment.

You, too, can have the charm of "A Skin You Love to Touch"

Is your skin pale and sallow?

—How you can rouse it

SLEEP, fresh air, the right food—all these contribute to a healthy condition of your skin.



But your skin itself must be given special care, if you wish it to have the brilliant loveliness of which it is capable.

Your skin is a separate organ of your body. Neglect of its special needs may result in an unattractive complexion, even though your general health is good.

If your skin is pale and sallow, use the following treatment to give it color and life:

ONCE or twice a week, just before retiring, fill your basin full of hot water—almost boiling hot. Bend over the top of the basin and cover your head and the bowl with a heavy bath towel, so that no steam can escape. Steam your face for thirty seconds. Now lather a hot cloth with Woodbury's Facial Soap. With this wash your face thoroughly, rubbing the lather well into the skin with an upward and outward motion. Then rinse the skin well, first with warm water, then with cold, and finish by rubbing it for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

The other nights of the week cleanse your skin thoroughly in the usual way with Woodbury's Facial Soap and warm water, ending with a dash of cold.

You will be surprised at the difference even two or three of these treatments will make in your complexion.

In the booklet around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap special treatments are given for each type of skin and its needs. Get a cake of Woodbury's today and begin tonight the right treatment for your skin.

A 25-cent cake of Woodbury's lasts a month or six weeks for regular toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments. The same qualities that give Woodbury's its beneficial effect in overcoming common skin troubles, make it ideal for regular use.

Send 25 cents for these special Woodbury skin preparations

For 25 cents we will send you a miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations, containing samples of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Cream, Cold Cream, and Facial Powder, with the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

Send for this set today. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 1604 Spring Grove Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio. If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 1604 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario. English agents: H. C. Quelch & Co., 4 Ludgate Square, London, E. C. 4.

Copyright, 1923, by The Andrew Jergens Co.

Neither Folly nor Mallison saw him until he caught the dancing man from behind, with calculated brutality broke the clasp of his arms round the woman's body, and sent him spinning and stumbling across the room to bring up against the farther wall with a crash that started his eyes in their orbits.

The disturbance below by this time had attained the proportions of a small riot. There were sounds of scuffling feet upon the stairs. Nearer at hand Folly was screaming. To this Mallison added the snarl with which, recovering, he took the offensive in turn, launching himself at his assailant's throat in murderous fury. Unhappily enough for him, Lanyard had wanted nothing better. They closed, grappled, for a breath swayed as one. Then Mallison felt one of his arms being irresistibly wrenched out of its socket, and to such exquisite torture yielded, perforce turning his back to Lanyard, who held him so another instant, then without warning released him.

With the racket of argument, physical and vocal, now loud upon the very landing outside, Lanyard dared not be merciful or give Mallison any fighting chance. As the man whirled round to launch a new onslaught, Lanyard's fist carried every ounce of his weight and all his ill will to the other's jaw. Lifted bodily by that terrific blow, Mallison crashed back across an occasional table, sweeping off and extinguishing a lamp, and collapsed, upon the floor.

Simultaneously the door flung open and four people broke into the boudoir, a struggling knot that instantly resolved itself into its elements; the McFee butler, with coat half torn from his back, with two strange men, one of rough-and-ready appearance, the other a type slightly more genteel, and a woman, a garish blonde of the synthetic school with hat over one ear.

The shaded light on the secretary alone remained to lend the several actors in this scene visibility. Lanyard stood squarely in front of it, his figure, to eyes new from the stronger illumination of the hall, hardly better than a silhouette. Folly, well out of harm's way on his one hand, was less kindly shadowed, in view of the extreme candor of her dishabille. Mallison, on the other, was screened from the invaders by the drop leaf of the table behind which he had gone down.

Thus chance set the stage and lighted it for a twist in the action of the piece unforeseen even by its first player and collaborating dramatist. For the bottle-made blonde with hat askew needed only a glimpse of that tall, slender and well poised shape, bulking black against the glow, to hurl herself across the room, fall weeping upon Lanyard's bosom and strain him passionately to the agitated abundance of her own.

"My husband!" she cried. "My husband! O Harry! how could you?"

And Lanyard suffered her.

CHAPTER X

HE WAS in no hurry; the truth would all too soon be her bitter medicine; if meantime to rest on him the burthen of her wrongs were any comfort to the lady, she was welcome. Still, he inclined to think it lamentable that he didn't know her well enough to reason with her in a friendly way about her taste in the question of scent for the hair. Chivalry he reckoned a fine gesture but a bit dear at the cost of asphyxiation . . .

For all that, the longer this unhappy creature continued blind to her blunder the better for Folly—for Michael Lanyard, too. He was far from enjoying any sort of confidence that the next dark turn of events would prosper his meddlesome hand; he was constrained by circumstance to count more heavily than he relished on the resilience of Folly's wits and their readiness to read his heart in respect of herself and play up to the cues which he must somehow manage to give her.

An anxious sidelong glance caught Folly thunderstruck and gaping, with eyes astart doubting their own dependability. The last man she had ever thought to see again, with his consent, and particularly beneath that roof, the alleged larcener of her emeralds last night, tonight figuring spontaneously in the dual rôle of knight-errant and spouse recreant!

He saw her so, and knew very well it could hardly tend but to make her bewilderment the thicker, yet an irrepressible devil of ribaldry in Lanyard prompted him to wag his head at Folly and make a comic mouth over the fair false limpet that had fastened upon his bosom. Not a little to his surprise, more to his encouragement, a gleam of lively appreciation broke through the clouds of Folly's confusion. But the limpet chose the selfsame moment to prove her protean versatility by shifting all at once into the guise of a shrew, thus rendering infeasible any further attempt to impart his mind to Folly through the medium of the speaking eye.

Abruptly and with a clever effect of casting Lanyard off by main strength, the strange creature struck a florid pose with arm leveled and eyes ablaze.

"There!" she rasped—and Lanyard wondered could this possibly be the voice that had so lately cooed endearments by telephone—"there he is, gentlemen! There stands my husband, the dirty hound that leaves me to cry my heart out at home while he steps out with fast society dames, like that shameless, half naked hussy there!"

The quivering index of denunciation picked out the shrinking shape of Folly in her informal attire, and the self-appointed censor paused to let this characterization bite deep. But when she offered to resume she half choked instead because an unpresaged glare of ceiling lights, thoughtfully switched on by Soames, revealed to her not the hang-dog mask of Mallison but an utterly strange countenance whose urbanity was shaded by an ambiguous smile.

A brief seizure of speechlessness was shared by the woman's companions and utilized by Lanyard to note the more salient features of the others, individually, against the chance of future need. There was no foretelling when some flash of temper might not precipitate a free-for-all of outcome highly problematical; it might be useful to be able to identify these precious impostors should ill luck throw one in with them another time. Commonplace scamps he accounted them, every one. Contempt for Morphew mounted; a scoundrel of really respectable caliber would have known better than to employ such cheap tools for even a simple job of villainy.

The woman was, or had been, a comely wench; but the strong light wasn't kind to her complexion, to such of it as she hadn't scrubbed off on Lanyard's waistcoat. Her skin roughed up through its thick wash of whiting and smears of carmine, skilfully painted contours failed to amend the viciousness of thin lips that dragged in their corners, more than belladonna and mascaro would be needed to restore the pristine charm of eyes grown hard with looking too long upon life stripped of all its loveliness.

And the men seemed her well suited associates: one, a thickset body whose eyes of a pig went forbiddingly with an undershot jaw, the other a figure of saturnine cast and seedy gentility set off by a cutaway coat and a standing collar slightly soiled.

Recognizing in neither of these a personality to call for the waste of two consecutive thoughts, Lanyard returned his attention to the woman, who recoiled a step instinctively as if afraid he meant to lay hold of her. "What!" she squawked in throaty disgust. "You ain't my husband!"

"Madame!"—Lanyard did her a grave bow—"the misfortune is mutual."

"But where is he? Where's my husband?"

"Madame has mislaid one?"

The mock told; with a slack jaw and clouded eyes the woman fell back another pace. "I guess," she stammered, "there's some mistake . . ."

"The conjecture does madame's intelligence much credit."

"It's Mr. Mallison she's after, sir." The butler Soames, schooled to view without any amazement the vagaries of a mad world of masters, and sensibly putting aside the immomentous issue of his inability to account for Lanyard, addressed himself to this last as to his one intellectual peer of the time being. "They would 'ave it 'e was upstairs 'ere with Mrs. McFee sir, and forced their way up in spite of all I could do."

"I quite understand, Soames—Mrs McFee, too, I am sure. You do understand don't you, Mrs. McFee, this is no fault of Soames's?"

Folly shook herself together and nodded vigorously; but Lanyard coolly forestalled whatever words they were that troubled her lips.

"Mr. Mallison is no doubt madame's husband?" he challenged the blonde female. "She had some reason to think she would find him here?"

"Just a minute, Grace." The rusty genteel half of her supporting company, now that he pushed himself forward, proved to possess a rather formidable manner, at once truculent and crafty. "Let me speak for you——"

"You have that right?" Lanyard inquired with pointed civility.

"I have been retained by Mrs. Mallison . . ." The fellow fished a passé professional card from a pocket and thrust it under Lanyard's nose. "I represent her in this case."

"Interesting—but perhaps irrelevant—if true. I mean to say"—Lanyard brushed the card aside, but not before his eye had caught the name Hobart G. Howlin in engraved script followed by the designation Attorney-at-Law; and all at once he became as ugly as he had theretofore been bland—"what of it?"

"We were led to believe Mr. Mallison was here——"

"You call yourself a lawyer and preten-

Use the cold cream that is made with a specially light oil—You will love the way it leaves your skin feeling fresh and supple

Cleanse with this specially light cream

Feel the difference in your skin—instantly

HAVE you the fresh smooth skin you would like to have, or is your complexion dull, lifeless? Just the care you give it makes all the difference. Unless you keep it always fresh and pliant, it grows duller and coarser every year.

For real freshness and brilliancy in these days of city soot and dirt, you must give your skin much more than the ordinary washing. Pond's Cold Cream was specially developed to meet this need for a thorough yet soft cleansing. It contains exactly the right amount and kind of oil to penetrate the pores and bring out every dulling dirt particle that has worked itself in.

If your skin is too dry it will absorb just the amount of oil it needs—become soft and smooth as you like to have it. And the superfluous fat of excessively oily skins is removed with the dirt by this fine oil. Your face will be fresh, stimulated. It will have a delightful smoothness.

This thorough cleansing never leaves your skin rough or heavy with cream. It is the special light consistency of Pond's Cold Cream that makes you definitely prefer it to the heavier creams. Smooth on this cream every night. Let it stay a minute, then wipe it off on a soft cloth. The difference in the feel of your skin will charm you.

* * *

Of course, to keep your complexion perfectly smooth and brilliant another cream is absolutely necessary for daytime use, a cream without a drop of oil. Even when you are most fatigued Pond's Vanishing Cream will freshen your skin instantly, take away the tired drawnness, leaving it soft and velvety. Your powder, too, will cling for hours to its smooth surface. At the same time this wonderful cream protects you from the ageing effects of repeated exposure to sun, cold, wind.

Both creams are so finely proportioned they cannot clog the pores. Neither will promote the growth of hair. The Pond's Extract Company, New York.

GENEROUS TUBES—MAIL COUPON TODAY

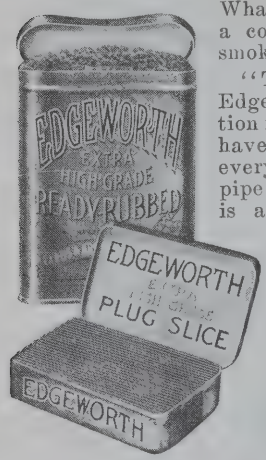
The Pond's Extract Co.,
154-M Hudson St., New York

Ten cents (10c) is enclosed for your special introductory tubes of the two creams every normal skin needs—enough of each cream for two weeks' ordinary toilet uses.

Name_____

Street_____

City _____ State_____



How about the corncob?

The old family meerschaum stirs no thrills in this smoker

"Dear Sirs and so forth," begins a letter we recently received from H. T. Spenser, Madison, Wisconsin, "I am cupping my hands in the shape of a megaphone and shouting a loud echo of approval to your correspondent who smokes a meerschaum pipe fifty years old.

"But I don't want him or any other smoker to get away with the idea that a meerschaum is the only pipe where Edgeworth is concerned.

"For, you see, I am a corncob smoker. What's more, I am a corncob-Edgeworth smoker!

"The corncob Edgeworth combination is hard to beat. I have tried almost every combination of pipe and tobacco there is and have yet to find one that can approach it for year-in-and-year-out pipe smoking.

"So if you're starting a Corncob - Edgeworth Clan, don't forget to put me down as a charter member."

We are continually being surprised by smokers who discover things about Edgeworth that we don't know ourselves. For instance, we never suspected that Edgeworth smokes any better in a corncob than it does in a briar. Frankly, we don't believe that it does. At any rate, we have any number of friends who claim that Edgeworth is the only tobacco to use in briars, in calabashes, in meerschaums, or in clays.

In smoking, we believe, it is every man to his own taste.

That's one of the reasons why we don't try to make all of the tobacco that is smoked in pipes. We know there are men who have perfectly sound reasons for not liking Edgeworth.

At the same time we know there are any number of men who would like it if they only had a chance to try it once. That's why we are always glad to send free samples.

If you have never tried Edgeworth, send us your name and address on a postcard. We will forward to you immediately free samples of Edgeworth Plug Slice and Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed. If you also include the name and address of your tobacco dealer, we will make it easier for you to get Edgeworth if you should like it.

For the free samples, address Larus & Brother Company, 61 South 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your jobber cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size Edgeworth Plug Slice or Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber.

that gave you any right to violate the privacy of this household?"

"It sometimes becomes necessary for a wronged wife to take the law into her own hands."

"Mrs. Mallison has been wronged, then? How sad."

"Mrs. Mallison," her counsel persisted, but with shaken bravado, "happens to know her husband has been spending too much of his time of late in the society of Mrs. McFee——"

"In brief—you have had the effrontery to force your way into a private residence in the hope of securing evidence for divorce proceedings?"

"You've got the idea."

"Oh insolent!" Folly flamed.

It was now again necessary for Lanyard firmly to put down interference with his diplomacy, lest it fail. "By your leave, Folly—permit me to deal with these gentry. Their account of themselves is much too ingenious to lose. If we let them rattle on—who knows?—we may learn something to their disadvantage."

At this the rogue of ruder mien concluded that he, for one, had had enough. "Come on," he mumbled, plucking at Howlin's sleeve, "le's get out o' this."

"Not so fast. You entered here by force: you will leave in the good pleasure of Mrs. McFee. And then Mr. Mallison will go with you."

"What's that?" the lawyer demanded. "Mallison's here?"

"We have no desire to deceive you."

"But where?" the slighted wife objected shrilly. "I don't see him . . ."

"How little married folk ever know one another! The dear lad's so shy, when he heard you on the stairs he made himself small. Half a minute . . ." Lanyard stepped behind the table to find Mallison in the first throes of coming to. An unceremonious hand twisted in his collar helped him find his feet. He swayed on them, glaring groggily around that ring of faces whose lips framed confounded murmurs, while Lanyard nodded politely to the self-confessed wife: "Permit me, Mrs. Mallison—your husband." More brusquely he added: "Now Soames—if you think you can find a policeman . . ."

The butler saluted this suggestion with unbegrudged respect, but the man who had lately been so anxious to go now moved in haste to intercept him at the door.

"Here," he growled in an effort, not too happy, to assert authority, "wait a minute, wait—a—minute, you! What's the grand idea?"

"What is your objection?" Lanyard countered.

"If you got any use for a cop, you don't have to look no farther. I'm a city detective."

"Splendid. You shall enjoy every opportunity to exercise the powers of your office. Nevertheless, Soames will proceed to fetch a policeman."

In a bluster of panic the self-styled detective elbowed the butler away from the door. "Wait, now! This is my job; if any pinchin's goin' to be done here tonight, I'll do it."

"To the contrary . . ." A hand slipped deftly beneath the skirts of Mallison's dinner jacket brought to light an automatic pistol of whose whereabouts Lanyard had become aware in the course of their struggle. "To the contrary, you will be good enough to stand back and let Soames do my bidding. Do you hear? And all of you"—a push sent Mallison reeling drunkenly into the ranks of his confederates—"all four of you will be well advised to raise your hands to the level of your ears."

A flourish of the weapon earned this good counsel prompt and unanimous respect, even Mallison proving himself sufficiently recovered to heed.

"Cut along now, Soames; and you might tell the policeman he will need assistance, with four prisoners to handle."

"Look here!" Mallison found his tongue in a splutter of spite and fear. "You're going too far, Lanyard, carrying things with too high a hand——"

"I know but one way to deal with blackmailers."

"And what about yourself—you damn burglar?" A new voice introduced itself to the dialogue. "Blackmailers?" it drawled. "Burglar? Fightin' words, folks, fightin' words!"

Soames, moving to execute Lanyard's instructions, had opened the door to find it blocked by a long, loose-jointed body. Now, hands in pockets, hat well back on his head, chewing the unlighted cigar of his custom, the detective, Crane, lounged in, with keen, ironic glances reviewing the several countenances so variously colored with emotion, until he perceived the presence of Mrs. McFee. Then he was quick to uncover his head and disembarrass his teeth.

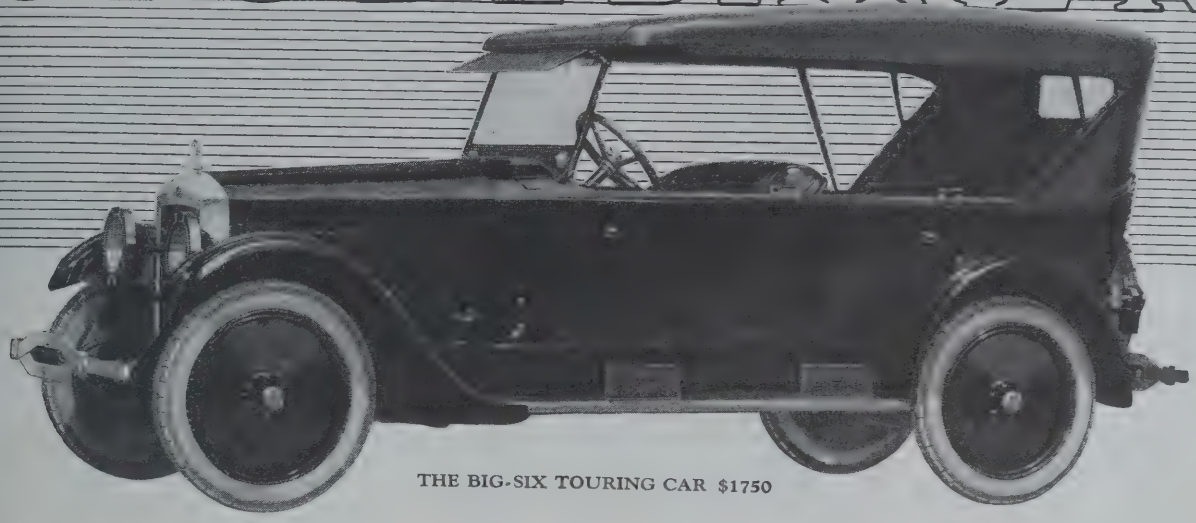
"Your servant, ma'am. Hope you'll excuse the informality, but we found your front door standing wide open and figured maybe something might be going wrong. H'are you, Lanyard—business as usual, I see." A nod and wrinkling grin designated the pistol. "I'll tell anybody that don't know, you're the little guy that stages the quick comebacks." Over his shoulder, Crane called: "Come on in, Hoffmeyer—looks like we'd found us a regular job."

A brisk policeman in uniform stepped in from the hallway. And sensible of sharp relief in the easing of the tension Lanyard put down the pistol. "My friend," he told Crane, "never in your life were you more welcome."

"That's easy to believe; going on appearances we've happened along at one of these psychological moments, all right. No thanks to me, of course, Lanyard; I just naturally hiked right up here as soon as I got your phone message."

"You telephoned for Mr. Crane?" Folly demanded, eyeing Lanyard intently.

"He sure did," Crane affirmed.



"At what time?"

"Half an hour or so ago, wasn't it, Lanyard?"

"Approximately. But I can fix the hour precisely; Mrs. McFee will undoubtedly remember when Mallison was called from the table to answer the telephone." Folly nodded, her eyes growing rounder. Lanyard laughed, with a wave of a debonair hand introduced the other woman. "You here behold the lady who was then, according to Mallison, Mrs. Stuyvesant Ashe. Now she accuses herself of being his wife. One or both of them would seem to be mistaken. No matter; after listening in on their conversation I felt warranted in calling up Mr. Crane without waiting to secure your approval."

"You called him up from here?"

STUDEBAKER

THE BIG-SIX TOURING CAR $1750

STUDEBAKER has again demonstrated, in the 1923 series Big-Six Touring Car, that it is not necessary to pay a fancy price for a motor car of highest quality.

Fundamentally the same splendid automobile that 50,000 owners have found so satisfactory, this fine car incorporates all the new year's betterments and improvements.

Its performance is as exceptional as its beauty. It is unvarying in its dependability, comfortable for any journey, and is completely equipped with every feature for convenience and utility—even to the extra disc wheel with cord tire and tire cover and handsome nickel-plated bumpers.

The limited production of most of the better cars increases overhead expense and raises the cost of every manufacturing operation. This necessitates a high selling price and decreases intrinsic values.

The fact that Studebaker builds nothing but sixes, in large volume, and manufactures all vital parts in its own factories, enables it to reduce costs, eliminate parts-makers' profits and give more for the money.

Studebaker plant facilities are adequate for the most economical manufacture. Raw materials are bought at the lowest possible prices, labor is specialized and efficient, and overhead per car is reduced to a minimum.

These savings are reflected in the price of the Big-Six Touring Car.

Studebaker maintains quality standards that are second to none. Materials and craftsmanship are unexcelled.

The name Studebaker stands for highest quality and honest value.

THE STUDEBAKER CORPORATION OF AMERICA

South Bend, Indiana

1923 MODELS AND PRICES—f. o. b. factories

LIGHT-SIX 5-Pass., 112" W. B., 40 H. P.		SPECIAL-SIX 5-Pass., 119" W. B., 50 H. P.		BIG-SIX 7-Pass., 126" W. B., 60 H. P.
Touring	$975	Touring	$1275	Touring	$1750
Roadster (3-Pass.)	975	Roadster (2-Pass.)	1250	Speedster (5-Pass.)	1835
Coupe-Roadster (2-Pass.)	1225	Coupe (4-Pass.)	1875	Coupe (4-Pass.)	2400
Sedan	1550	Sedan	2050	Coupe (5-Pass.)	2550
				Sedan	2750

Studebaker

THIS IS A STUDEBAKER YEAR

Every ScotTissue Towel contains millions of soft Thirsty Fibres, which absorb four times their weight in water. They make ScotTissue the quickest-drying, most satisfactory towels made.

Thirsty Fibre is found only in ScotTissue Towels

An exclusive advantage no other towels can have.

Millions of thirsty tentacles of fibre are interlaced in every ScotTissue Towel. When you grasp a ScotTissue Towel with moist hands, these fibres leap to their task of drinking dry every drop of moisture—making your skin instantly, thoroughly, safely dry.

Just dry your hands once on a ScotTissue Towel. Notice the whiteness, freshness, quick absorbency—the comfort it creates. You'll say it is different—superior to any others you have ever used.

It is so easy to have clean hands with ScotTissue Towels. Buy a carton of 150 towels (40c in U. S., 50c in Canada and even less by the case of 3750 towels). Your stationer, druggist or department store can supply you. Or, we will send, prepaid, the towels or $5 outfit, upon receipt of price. Try the Handy Pack of 25 towels for 10c.

Own Your Own Towel Outfit

Plate-glass mirror
Nickeled Towel-rack
150 ScotTissue Towels

All for $5
($6.50 in Canada)
See it at your dealer's

Don't confuse ScotTissue Towels with harsh non-absorbent paper towels. Remember, it isn't Thirsty-Fibre unless it bears the name ScotTissue.

SCOTT PAPER CO., Chester, Pa.
New York Philadelphia Chicago San Francisco

ScotTissue Towels
for "Clean Hands in Business"

©1923, S. P. Co.

"But what would you?" With spacious show of naïveté Lanyard chos to misconstrue that almost purely rhe torical query of astonishment. "Admit tha I had hardly time to run out and hur up a sound-proof booth, madame, admi that I had no choice other than to remai here if I were to keep faith with you—an more especially when the telephone ha just told me enough to prove that this fin gentleman intended blackmail, whether o not we were justified in crediting him wit a graver offense against your hospitality."

The earnest eyes that held Folly's sa them fog with the confused play of though excited by these cunningly sown hints an implications. And not until she ha heard him out with a comprehending no for all comment, and the lips that ha been parted in breathless interest close without uttering a word to refute hi impudent assertion of an understandin which made Folly a party to his presenc in the house, did Lanyard again find i easy to breathe. But that nod, couple with her silence, testified to appreciatio of the fact that in tacit confirmation o his claim lay the one sure way to save he good repute, that to gainsay him woul be to lend color to the calumny implici in the intrusion of Mallison's "wife" an her accomplices.

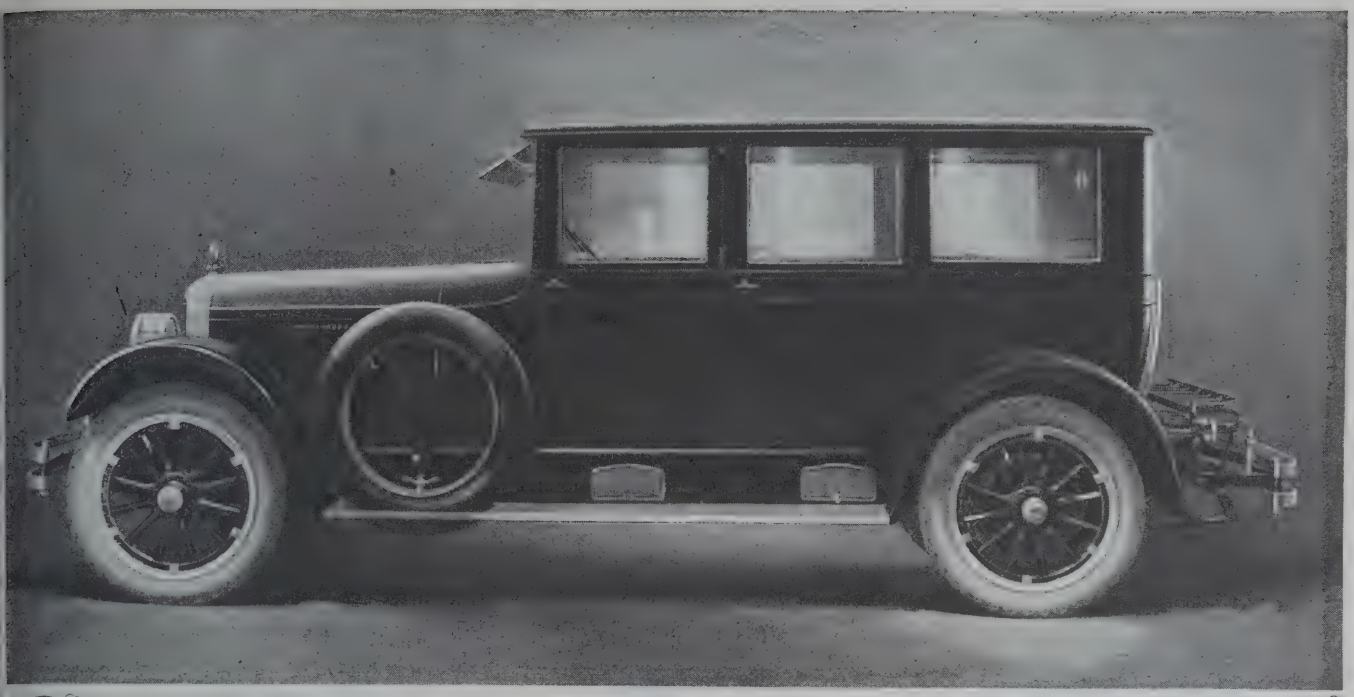
If Folly wanted proof of this, she had i in another breath, when the seedy con spirator instituted a sharp counter-of fensive.

"Just a minute, gentlemen!" he insisted pushing in his sallow, excited face betwee Lanyard and Crane. "You go too fas We deny all these ridiculous allegations but particularly we deny that my clien is here in any sort of collusion with he husband. That malicious innuendo w flatly contradict and brand a lie out o whole cloth!"

"'We'?" Crane echoed, inquisitive bu otherwise indifferently impressed. "You 'client'?"

"I am counsel for Mrs. Mallison——

"You don't say? Bet anything sh deserves you, too." Crane showed Lan yard arched brows of dubiety. "Shyster?



"Calls himself Howlin," Lanyard as sented impatiently. "If you like he' show you a card almost as shady as th business which engages his talents her tonight."

"I can afford to ignore slurs upon m professional standing which come fro such a source," Howlin retorted loftily "But my business tonight being th entirely legitimate one of looking afte the interests of a client, I can hardly b expected to stand by and enter no ob jections when I hear her slandered."

"I'll say you can't," Crane agree cruelly looking the lady up and down wit a glance so discerning that it caused a du flush to burn beneath her warpaint.

But now again Howlin considered th source and concluded he could afford t ignore constructive sarcasm.

"Mr. Regan here," he said, introducin the man who had styled himself a "cit detective," "has under my direction bee shadowing my client's husband for severa weeks. His report shows at least questionable degree of intimacy existin between Mallison and Mrs. McFe When, therefore, Mallison was seen t night letting himself into this house, usin a latchkey and without the knowledg

Our Ideal Paige of Enclosed Type

IT means much to us—and should to you—when we present this Paige Five-Passenger Sedan as our Ideal Paige of enclosed type. For our ideals date back to 1909, since when this close-knit organization of officers, directors and engineers has remained unchanged.

Our cherished ideals of beautiful enclosed bodies have before only partly found expression. Now the success of our Jewett increases our volume and reduces our overhead so that we can fully realize our finest ambitions at a reasonable price. And as such we present our Ideal Paige.

The Touring Sedan is lower than any man's size enclosed car we have seen. Yet while sitting low, body positions remain comfortable and dignified. There is generous width in the seats which the smart body lines fashionably conceal. Room, too, to stretch out.

Seat cushions are deep and of enduring softness, covered with rich fabrics. Silvered fittings; a walnut dash with instruments under one glass; walnut steering wheel adjustable to driver's convenience. Surely we may fairly call such perfection our Ideal Paige of enclosed type.

In this new type 6-70 Paige chassis we have also achieved long cherished ideals. It is obviously strong and sturdy. The closest practical workmanship is employed throughout. Thousands of motor and chassis dimensions are held to a thousandth of an inch accuracy. Everything which Europe or America knows of engineering has been employed to make our Ideal Paige superbly sound and efficient, long-enduring and care-free.

A new device provides automatic take-up of silent motor driving chains. It makes remote the possibility of any attention to the front end of the motor. Paige-Timken axles with ball-bearing steering spindles give touch guidance. A new type transmission gives finger-touch gear shifting with a bare 3-inch movement. No car yet built has ever handled like our Ideal Paige.

In this new Paige six cylinder engineering—the standard on the world's costliest cars—has reached its practicable limits of perfection. Balanced smoothness, flexibility, long life, care-free simplicity can today be carried no further. Please try our Ideal Paige.

PAIGE

(284)

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL CAR IN AMERICA

*HYDE PARK, LONDON

Hon. Freddy—"Haven't the foggiest idea, old chap—Ridley, do we use tyres?"
Ridley (waxing warm)—"Kelly-Springfields, sir—American, nothing to touch 'em—never blow or skid—a bit of orl right, sir, if you ask me!"

THE qualities which a motorist seeks in tires a the same practically all over the world. Thes qualities are long mileage, freedom from troubl safety from skidding, and low cost. Since Kell combine all these qualities to a marked degree, it not surprising that they have become international famous. It costs no more to buy a Kelly.

*Drawing and dialogue by Laurence Fellows, London.

of the servants, we had every excuse for assuming that an unexpected visit would produce certain results. Now, however, since we would seem to have been misled, we can only offer Mrs. McFee the assurance that my client stands ready to give her every satisfaction the law may hold her entitled to. I think that's all . . . " He turned confidently toward the door. "Now, Mrs. Mallison, if you're ready . . . Come, Regan . . ."

"What's your hurry?" Crane wanted to know genially, but quickly enough to anticipate the storm of words promised by Folly's gesture of violent protest. "You admit your liability for unlawful trespass, I take it?"

"If Mrs. McFee thinks she can induce any court in the land to call it that," Howlin stipulated.

"Outside of that, however, you've got nothing to fear?"

Mr. Howlin achieved a shrug which utterly abolished a suggestion so absurd.

"Then be good sports—why don't you?—and stick around awhile. Maybe you might be able to help us out in dealing with Mr. Mallison. Going on all you tell me, Mrs. Mallison don't owe him any good will; I judge she ought to be happy to see him come up with. How about it, ma'am?"

The person appealed to in a touching twitter looked to Howlin for guidance, and got from him a subtle sign which she may have misinterpreted; not without excuse, seeing that the situation was one of the extremest delicacy for all of them, and that the sacrifice of one to the salvation of the majority is a time-honored expedient with her kind.

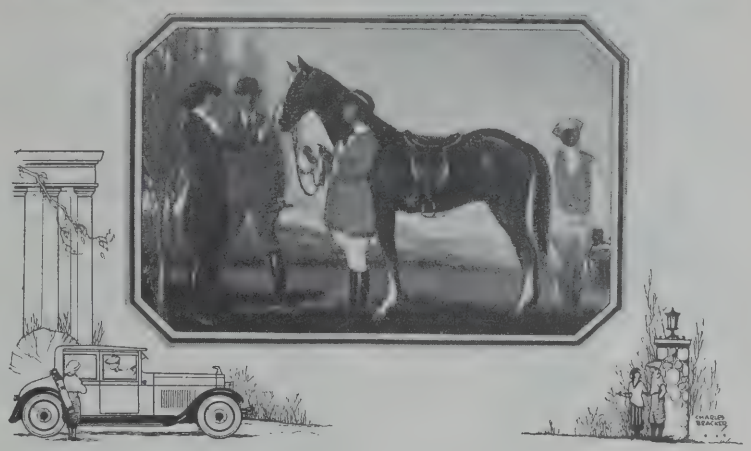
"Ask me anything you want," she volunteered, waggling an indignant head and giving Mallison a poisonous look . . . "after the way he's treated me, the low cur!"

"That's handsome of you ma'am." Crane beamed benignantly upon the lady, and with little less warmth upon the unhappy dancing man. "I won't forget it, either. But first I'd like to ask Mr. Lanyard here a few questions, to sort of clear the ground."

"I object!" Mallison stuttered in rage and dismay. "I refuse to submit to these star-chamber proceedings——"

"Do you, now?" Crane commented with much interest. "Well, if you ask me, 'star-chamber proceedings' is a mighty nifalutin' name for what's going to happen to you right here and now, my lad; it's going to be a whole lot more like the third degree, if you know what I mean."

Mallison knew only too well; fear lent those ingratiating eyes, always so gentle beneath their long and silky lashes, the wickedness of a cornered rat's. "I protest!" he snarled. "I deny your right—"



"You better hush. Hoffmeyer here don't like your looks nohow, he'll admire to improve 'em if you don't quit speaking out of your turn."

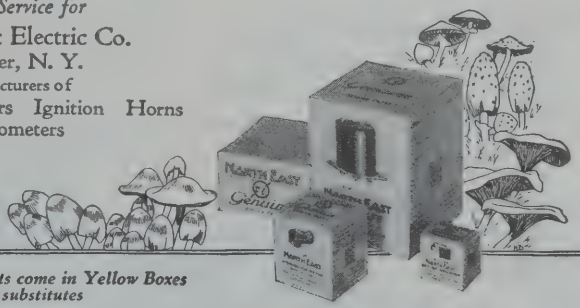
Mallison got a minatory grin from the patrolman and subsided at discretion, while Crane cocked a meaning eye at Lanyard.

"Now, Mr. Lanyard, if you'll just tell us what you know about how this man Mallison comes to be here . . ."

"Gladly." Lanyard had his story pat, it fell from a glib tongue. "I presume everybody present knows Mrs. McFee's emeralds were stolen last night from the

NORTH EAST

DO YOU GIVE YOUR AUTOMOBILE the same consideration you would a fine horse?



If you do, you won't abuse it by letting any repair parts be put in that are not the genuine product of the original car or equipment manufacturers.

Fortunately you can be sure of genuine parts for the electrical system — if you own a Dodge Brothers, Reo, Franklin, or other North East equipped car—by always going to an Authorized Service Station or any other place where you find the Yellow Boxes that distinguish GENUINE North East Service Parts from Toadstool substitutes.

NORTH EAST SERVICE INC.

Atlanta Chicago Detroit Kansas City New York — Rochester San Francisco Windsor London Paris

Official Service for North East Electric Co.
Rochester, N. Y.
Manufacturers of Starters Generators Ignition Horns
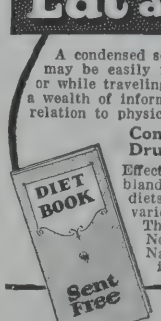
Speedometers

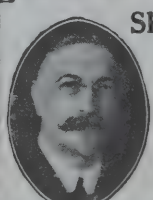
Genuine North East Service Parts come in Yellow Boxes
Avoid Toadstool substitutes



Eat and Be Well!

A condensed set of health rules—many of which may be easily followed right in your own home, or while traveling. You will find in this little book a wealth of information about food elements and their relation to physical welfare.

Control Your Weight Without Drugs or Tiresome Exercises



Effective weight control diets, acid and bland diets, laxative and blood-building diets, and diets used in the correction of various chronic maladies.

The book is for FREE circulation. Not a mail order advertisement. Name and address on card will bring it without cost or obligation.

HEALTH EXTENSION BUREAU
224 Good Health Bldg., Battle Creek, Mich.

Short-Story Writing

DR ESENWEIN

A practical forty-lesson course in the writing and marketing of the Short Story, taught by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, famous critic and teacher; Editor of The Writer's Monthly.

One pupil has earned over $5,000 writing in his spare time—hundreds are selling constantly to the leading publishers.

150 page catalog free. Please address
The Home Correspondence School
Established 1897
Dept. 84 Springfield, Mass.

*fresh from the factory

Time—and time alone—ages, cures and mellows the tobacco used in Tuxedo. Nothing can hurry it.

*But after it is blended and packed for smoking, the sooner you smoke it, the better it is.

Tuxedo is now delivered to your dealer in small lots—one dozen tins. The cartons are dated, showing the last day it can be sold.

This insures your getting Tuxedo FRESH From the Factory.

Buy a tin today—try a pipeful—and see how good fresh tobacco can be.

Now 15¢

FRESH Tuxedo TOBACCO

©The American Tobacco Co. Guaranteed by INCORPORATED safe in that secretary over there, under circumstances which caused a certain person to be suspected——"

"Why so modest?" Mallison interrupted vindictively. "Why so mealy-mouthed? 'Suspected' is hardly the word."

"I am desolated to disappoint monsieur; unhappily or not, as you may care to take it, Mr. Crane was able to establish my innocence this morning."

"Like hell he was!"

"Just one more nasty crack out of you, Mallison," Crane advised, "and I'll let Hoffmeyer do your wife a swell favor."

"Strangely enough," Lanyard pursued serenely, "Mrs. McFee and I, thinking the case over independently, arrived at the same conclusion: that Mallison probably knew as much as anybody about the theft. Mrs. McFee accordingly laid a trap—invited him to a little dinner party this evening, in the course of which she quietly let it become known that the thief had overlooked a valuable lot of jewelry which she meant to leave unprotected tonight other than by the safe which had once already been attacked with success. This made a second visit quite probable, if there were grounds for our suspicions.

"I on my part arranged to occupy that clothespress which you see with its door open; by leaving the door just off the latch, it was easy to keep direct watch on the safe. Toward the end of dinner Mallison received the telephone call which has been mentioned and made it a pretext for leaving before the other guests. He said good night to Mrs. McFee at the front door, but as soon as she returned to the dining room let himself into the house again and stole upstairs. He was hiding behind the screen in the corner when Mrs. McFee came up, but when she had put her remaining jewels in the safe and turned to go to her bedchamber, he blundered—made his presence known in a way she couldn't overlook. Then he tried to overpower her, to prevent her giving the alarm. I was obliged to interfere and had just succeeded in discouraging him when these people broke in . . ."

"Straight enough story, far as it goes," Crane approved.

But Mallison dissented wildly: "A pack of lies from beginning to end!" he termed it. To which Lanyard replied, with nonchalance quite unfeigned, that if they doubted his word they might ask Mrs. McFee. Neither was his confidence misplaced; quietly the young woman affirmed the substantial truthfulness of the tissue of misrepresentation which he had woven so brazenly under her very eyes and for her benefit as much as for his own.

"But one thing I want settled," she declared. "These people assert that Mallison used a latchkey. I say he didn't—unless he had one he had stolen. If they're right, I want that key. If they're wrong, I want that proved for my own sake."

"Reasonable enough request," Crane agreed. "How about it, Mallison? Got a little key to give up?" The dancing man shook his head, mumbling a negative. "You can save yourself a heap of trouble by forking it over, you know."

"I tell you I haven't got any key!" Mallison insisted with what seemed extravagant violence. Lanyard eyed him in deepening perplexity; some secret fear, inexplicable, unwarranted by known circumstances, seemed to be at work in the man, desperation was glimpsing in his haunted eyes. "Mrs. McFee knows I haven't," he stammered. "I won't be sacrificed to save her——"

"How's that?"

"Mrs. McFee," Mallison affirmed defiantly, "knows damn well I haven't got a key and never had one; she knows damn well she left the door fixed for me so that I could reopen it by simply turning the knob from the outside——"

"Oh!" Folly gasped, infuriated. "What a contemptible lie! Search him, Mr. Crane—I demand that this beast be searched and proved a liar. He must have had a key, he couldn't possibly have got in any other way."

Even while she was speaking events got in motion, not consecutively but all at once. Mallison, stung to frenzy by his fears, whirled on a heel and made a mad dash for the passage leading to the bedchamber. A sinewy hand at the end of one of Crane's long arms shot out with surprising readiness to clamp upon his shoulder and drag him back. He turned and fought wildly. The policeman, Hoffmeyer, cheerfully waded in to lend Crane needed assistance. Mrs. Mallison and Messrs. Howlin and Regan thought to profit by the general preoccupation, but were painfully surprised to discover that Lanyard, an instant since a dozen feet away, was now planted firmly in front of the hall door and smiling a bland smile over the sinister grin of Mallison's pistol.

They stopped. Simultaneously Mallison found himself helpless in an embrace which Hoffmeyer had fastened upon him from behind.

"Cut it out!" the patrolman growled. "You kick my shins again and I'll shake every tooth out of your fool head!"

Panting and twitching like a whipped animal, Mallison gave in and with eyes of blank hopelessness followed the clever work of Crane's hands as they turned out the contents of his pockets, one by one, and neatly arranged their plunder on the top of the occasional table; bringing to light, in addition to every man's horde of minor personal effects, a flat leather case which fitted neatly a lining pocket in Mallison's dress waistcoat and which held a light jointed jimmy of the toughest procurable steel with an assortment of skeleton keys designed to make the most modern of door locks tamely yield up its secret.

Mallison's countenance gave open confession of abandonment to despair when this damning find was made; yet Crane was not half finished with him. The next plunge of his fingers fished a tissue paper packet from a lower waistcoat pocket, which, being unfolded, disclosed the purloined emeralds of Folly McFee.

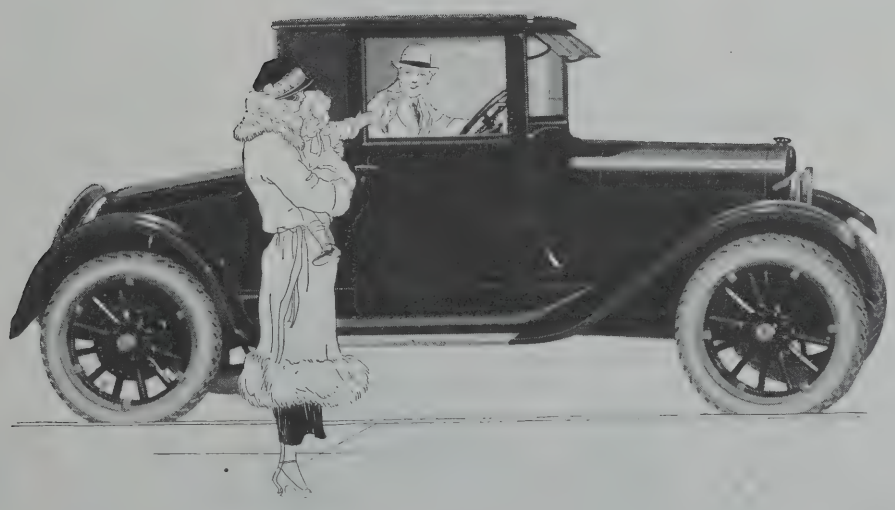
Crane clucked in astonishment, Folly gave an incredulous squeal of joy, Lanyard a graphic start and stare. The others present reacted variously, each according to his idiosyncrasy. Only Mallison made neither sound nor stir. But the eyes he turned toward Lanyard were a murderer's . . .

Next month—you will watch Morphew's most cunning trap apparently close on Eve and the Lone Wolf.

DO YOU KNOW WHY
THE GEAR-SHIFT IS DIFFERENT?

The design of Dodge Brothers gear-shift takes into consideration the natural inclinations of the driver.

To start, you throw the lever forward. To reverse, you pull the lever backward. And when the car is running in high gear—which is about ninety per cent of the time—the lever is in a forward position, out of the way, where it does not interfere with passengers, robes, or luggage.



Moreover, the transmission, developed and patented by Dodge Brothers, is so designed that the countershaft —used in intermediate speeds and in reverse—is disconnected when the car is in high. There are no gears in mesh. Power is transmitted directly from clutch to rear axle.

This exclusive feature prevents the loss of power through friction, reduces gear-box noises and eliminates a vast amount of wear.

That is why the gear-shift of Dodge Brothers Motor Car is different.

DODGE BROTHERS

The price of the Business Coupe is $980 f. o. b. Detroit

Why they stick

On the ground floor of the telephone building a man worked at the test board. It was night; flood had come upon the city; death and disaster threatened the inhabitants. Outside the telephone building people had long since sought refuge; the water mounted higher and higher; fire broke out in nearby buildings. But still the man at the test board stuck to his post; keeping up the lines of communication; forgetful of self; thinking only of the needs of the emergency.

On a higher floor of the same building a corps of telephone operators worked all through the night, knowing that buildings around them were being washed from their foundations, that fire drew near, that there might be no escape.

It was the spirit of service that kept them at their work—a spirit beyond thought of advancement or reward—the spirit that animates men and women everywhere who know that others depend upon them. By the nature of telephone service this is the every-day spirit of the Bell System.

The world hears of it only in times of emergency and disaster, but it is present all the time behind the scenes. It has its most picturesque expression in those who serve at the switchboard, but it animates every man and woman in the service.

Some work in quiet laboratories or at desks; others out on the "highways of speech." Some grapple with problems of management or science; some with maintenance of lines and equipment; others with office details. But all know, better than any one else, how the safe and orderly life of the people depends on the System—and all know that the System depends on them.

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

Step into a BIG PAY HOTEL JOB!

Don't Wait—
The opening is ready—

Start now and equip yourself for a splendid position in America's Fourth Largest Industry. Hotels, Clubs, Restaurants, Tea Rooms offer big pay, fine living, quick advancement to ambitious men and women. You can qualify—past experience unnecessary. Write for Free Book, "YOUR BIG OPPORTUNITY."

Lewis Hotel Training Schools
Founded 1916
The Only Original Hotel Training School.
Room 238 Washington, D. C.

TYPEWRITER Prices Smashed!

ONLY $2.00 DOWN and its yours!

10 DAYS FREE TRIAL

Your choice of the World's best typewriters—Underwood, Remington, Oliver—full size, late model, completely rebuilt and refinished brand new. Prices smashed to almost half. Just send your name and address and we will mail you our complete FREE CATALOG prepaid, fully describing and showing actual photographs of each machine in full colors. We also send every detail of our direct-to-you small-payments plan. Write NOW to save at least one-half. No obligation on your part whatever. ACT QUICK.
INTERNATIONAL TYPEWRITER EXCHANGE
177 N. State Street Dept. 4-37 Chicago, Illinois

A Maker of Gestures

(Continued from page 101)

balcony, his hands gripping the rails; the blood surged to his head. He became aware of a pressure against his arm, and he turned to see a white hand on his sleeve. Yvonne was standing just inside the room, in her nightdress, a silken shawl thrown over her shoulders. The candles were out. She drew him into the darkness of the room.

"In God's name, what goes on?" he cried in her ear.

Yvonne reached her hand to his mouth and laid her fingers gently on his lips. She was extremely agitated.

"It is but a custom—it is but a custom," she was saying over and over.

"But what does it mean, why do they do it?"

"Pay no attention," she pleaded. "It is but an old custom."

"Pay no attention! They are driving me out of my senses. Tell me! What does it mean, tell me!" Gaylord was thoroughly exasperated. The tumult outside was in crescendo. He grasped her by both arms and shook her. Her white face gleamed cameo-like from her tumbled hair. The shawl slipped from her shoulders.

"Thou wilt not be angry—thou wilt do nothing?" she was whispering in desperation.

"Have you gone mad, too?"

Yvonne was striving to make him understand. She slipped her arms around his neck. "When they think there is something"—she faltered—"evil—in a house, something—not proper, they do that."

"And they think there is something evil in this house!" he cried in amazement.

Yvonne nodded. A flash of understanding came to Gaylord. "It is you and I."

He had known that eyes were upon him always. They did not understand him, with the inevitable consequence that they became suspicious of him, of his motives, of his purpose. It was only natural, Gaylord well knew, but that in itself was innocuous. This expression of the suspicion was vicious. Eyes had followed on his walks with Yvonne, doubtless had penetrated his room from the windows across the street and seen Yvonne there. Suspicion had hardened into screaming conclusion, and this was its voice.

Gaylord struggled with himself, trying to hold back his anger with petty reasonings. The noise after all was harmless, and it was customary. Be wise and ignore it.

A catcall, shrill and poisonous, sank into his consciousness like a barbed arrow. His fury rose. If Julio led this attack! Gaylord's chest rose and fell, his breath came sibilantly. The muscles in his arms swelled and his fingers worked. Yvonne, the fine, the sensitive, was being crucified by a mob of poltroons under cover of night. Old Hurja was probably biting through his lip with shame. He could hear Yvonne's voice in earnest appeal:

"Mind it not—it is their way—they do not approve."

"The cowards!" came through his teeth. "The rotten cowards!"

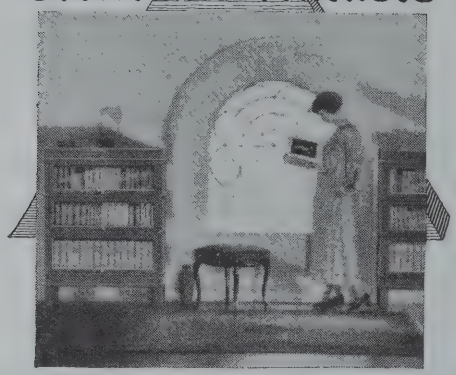
She tore herself from him.

"Do not say that! They are my people, my people, dost thou hear? Do not judge

Announcing

A low-swung, smooth-powered Willys-Knight Seven-Passenger Sedan, spaced for generous comfort, and fully appointed.

Auxiliary seats fold into rear of front seats. Refinements include heater in floor, windshield visor and wiper, step light, and clock. Upholstery is richly done in broadcloth.



The Willys-Knight sleeve-valve motor actually improves with use. Owners report 50,000 miles and more without a single motor adjustment. To own a Willys-Knight is to realize every motoring expectation.

WILLYS-OVERLAND, INC., TOLEDO, OHIO
WILLYS-OVERLAND LIMITED, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLYS-KNIGHT

SEVEN PASSENGER

Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcases

THE ART-MISSION—ARTISTICALLY GROUPED

AND the beauty of it is that popular prices adorn these bookcases . . . They always express good taste. Their glass doors completely protect books from dust and dampness. And in any room in the house they are decorative . . . For your spring "pick-up," see Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcases now. They grow with your books, a real advantage . . . Popularly priced, everywhere!

LET US HELP—we will gladly send our booklet of Unusual Decorative Effects for Bookcases. Address: Dept. B8-4 at Cincinnati.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati

New York . Chicago . Boston . Detroit . Cleveland
Philadelphia . Washington . New Orleans . St. Louis

Juniorlite
Handsome Graceful

A unique and convenient clamp pulls out from base and holds lamp firmly in any position on any object. Shade tilts to any angle. Sold in 5 beautiful finishes. A highly efficient lamp, ideal for bed, piano, sewing machine, table, shaving, etc.

Same Lamp Standing

Made in the same plant with the GREIST and WALLACE Lamps. At your dealer's, or order from us.

$5 In Brushed Brass

The Greist Mfg. Co., Dept. C., New Haven, Conn.

GREIST Products

them like that; it is the custom here for hundreds of years."

Gaylord gasped. She was defending them, defending the people who were shaming her.

"If thou wert brave thou wouldst ignore them. They are not to blame."

The whistles sneered at him, taunted him. Goaded him. The trumpets spat at him. Gaylord turned and ran to the balcony; they were grouped below. He could barely make out the outlines. He turned back, throwing off his coat, making for the door.

Yvonne stood in his way; he thought he merely pushed her to one side but she went spinning against the wall. His body charged with a heavy voltage of passion. Once in a public house along the river front at Oxford, a drunken waterman, taking offense at his appearance perhaps, had unaccountably slapped him in the face, and Gaylord had picked him up and hurled him across the room, carrying a wreckage of broken chairs and tables in his wake.

In a flash he was out of the room—and out of the side door. He was at the end of the street. Forty yards away he could make out the outlines of the group, bunched in the shadow.

He shot down the street as a runner off the mark, gathering the speed that had swept him down the Rugby fields; well into his stride, his pace was astonishing. Within five yards he lowered his head and catapulted into them, a driving force of one hundred and eighty pounds of compact bone and muscle. The impact was terrific. Men went down before him like ninepins at the smash of a mahogany ball; cannoned and collided with each other. Gaylord's body was taut as a bow cord. The serenaders were loose, relaxed. The wind was jolted out of those who were hit, leaving them gasping and sick. Gaylord's impetus carried him nearly through the group before he finally brought up, fighting. Every body was his mark and he knew how to hit. Not wild swinging blows, but straight driving smashes, all his weight behind, his fists smashing and smashing. Wherever he struck a man went down. Gaylord whirled and spun like a shadow boxer.

Had they known he was but one they could not have hit or held him; as it was, they thought they had been assailed by a dozen madmen. Some struck out and hit others who fought back and they milled together in a churning scramble. The noise changed to frightened cries and yells. Those who had gone down were getting to their knees and crawling away into the darkness. The group was melting off into the shadows. Pain, the dark, fear, took them each by the heart and they broke. They slunk and ran and crept away, bruised and bleeding.

Gaylord found himself suddenly alone, in a deserted street, standing in a wreck of drums and pans and twisted horns. The fever was dying out of his blood, the fury from his heart.

The noise and its authors were gone back into the night whence they came. A wave of hot regret hit him, that they should have done the thing they did, that he had retaliated in such a way.

Then it was over, and the only word he could find was "ridiculous." "After all," he was thinking, "I have played the clown. It is a matter of custom. I've be admitted to court and then turned my ba on the king." He walked slowly back the end of the street, let himself in the si door and mounted the stairs. He enter his rooms. The candles had been relighte The room was empty. Yvonne was go

Amongst the lads of the village t following day there were manifold explan tory accounts as to the origin of certa discolorations.

The midnight serenade with its curio conclusion was lost in the excitement ov the approach of an event of supre significance. Yvonne explained to Ga lord that the neighboring town w organizing a magnificent mascarade to given in Tardets. "It would be a festival she told him. Then he would hear mus and see dancing and costumes! In all t world there was no such carnival as t mascarade in Tardets. He was to wait a see! Gaylord was delighted with Yvonn fresh enthusiasm.

"And Zamalzain," Yvonne said, with strange look, "is to be——"

"Julio!" cried Gaylord and stopp laughing.

Julio had scarce been mentioned betwe them, but in both minds dwelt a knowled of the ever present danger. The villa knew of Julio's long, long suit and th hoped for him. Gaylord was an interlop Everyone knew that there but needed t hour which would bring the three togeth and—they shrugged shoulders expr sively—something would happen.

Zamalzain, as Gaylord learned, was t master dancer of the occasion. Juli grace and skill was celebrated through the valley; there could be no doubt as the justice of the selection.

"Hurja's daughter will make up her mi when she sees Julio dancing in costu that day," the villagers agreed.

The day arrived.

Gaylord was at his table writing in t early afternoon when the shouts and mus outside told him that the masquerade were approaching. He threw the windo open and stepped out on to the balcony the sunlight.

At the head of the procession, boundi and flying, came Julio. He wore on h head a turban of gauze crowned with pea and paste jewels, ornamented with ribbo which fell over his back. He danced Basque shoes, small and light; he had white stockings with red garters, whi breeches and a red coat, and he was astri a little wicker horse with a black head a arched neck. The horse had a sadd cloth of red fringed silk, had a bridle wi a silver bell and was without legs. T horse was winged. Upon this magic ste Julio was executing marvelous evolution

The dancing, gamboling, brilliant co tège followed by two's and three Blacksmiths in red coats and capes, whi trousers and yellow aprons, who carri nails and hammers to shoe Zamalzain horse. There was a character in fro coat and top hat with a sword and car there were peasants; there were tw Hungarians in velvet coats and breech top boots and bright cravats; knife grinde in great leather aprons; a gypsy gentlem carrying a gun and looking a despera robber leading a gypsy band; coppersmit with their donkeys loaded with pots a pans; doctors, apothecaries and beggars rags. The procession advanced into t

Beauty at Your Finger Tips

TODAY, as the possibilities of intelligent care of the skin are becoming more generally realized, it is literally true that thousands upon thousands of women are growing younger in looks, and likewise in spirits.

The secret of restoring and retaining a youthful complexion lies chiefly in the faithful and well-directed use of the proper sorts of face creams. The constant employment of creams by actresses in removing make-up is largely responsible for the clearness and smoothness of their skins.

First, the beautiful skin must be clean, with a cleanliness more thorough than is attainable by mere soap-and-water washing. The pores must be cleansed to the same depth that they absorb. This is one of the functions of Pompeian Night Cream. It penetrates sufficiently to reach the embedded dust. Its consistency causes it to mingle with the natural oil of the pores, and so to bring out all foreign matter easily and without irritation to the tissues.

The beautiful skin must be soft, with plastic muscles and good blood-circulation beneath. A dry, tight skin cannot have the coveted peachblow appearance; set muscles make furrows; poor circulation causes paleness and sallowness.

Pompeian Night Cream provides the necessary skin-softening medium to skins that lack the normal degree of oil saturation. Gentle massaging with it flexes the facial muscles, stimulates the blood circulation and tones up all the facial tissues.

Upon retiring, first use Pompeian Night Cream as a cleanser; apply with the fingers and then wipe off with a soft cloth, freeing the pores of all the day's accumulated dust and dirt. Afterward apply the cream to nourish the skin, leaving it on over night.

The faithful following of this simple treatment works wonders in the skin—removing roughness, redness, and blackheads, and warding off wrinkles, flabbiness and sallowness. It is the most approved treatment for restoring and retaining a youthful complexion.

Pompeian Night Cream	50c per jar
Pompeian Day Cream (vanishing)	60c per jar
Pompeian Beauty Powder	60c per box
Pompeian Bloom (the rouge)	60c per box

Mary Pickford Panel and Samples

Send coupon with ten cents for beautiful new 1923 Pompeian Art Panel of Mary Pickford. With this panel we send samples of Pompeian Night Cream, Day Cream, Beauty Powder and Bloom.

POMPEIAN LABORATORIES, 2036 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio
Also Made in Canada

© 1923, The Pompeian Co.

Pompeian Night Cream

Cleansing and Skin-Nourishing

What a Little Care of the Skin Will Do

By Mme. Jeannette

Once I asked a friend why she bought so many hats. I couldn't help it, for each time I saw her she wore a new one.

"Because I am tired of my face," she said, "and since I can't change it, I can at least wear something above it that is pretty, and cheers me up to look at."

No wonder she was tired of her face, it looked so uncared for and unwholesome.

"How much time do you spend in a month, buying hats?" I asked. She could not say exactly, but admitted she was constantly shopping for them.

"And how much time do you give to the care of your skin?"

She shook her head in an annoyed way, and said, "Why bother with a face like mine?"

"If you would spend just a tiny fraction of the time you give to buying hats, on caring for your complexion," I told her, "you would save a lot of money, and be a far happier woman."

I told her to bathe her face with warm water (not hot) and then to cover it with Pompeian Night Cream, patting ingently with the tips of the fingers. Then with absorbent cotton softly remove the cream. All dust particles that may have collected during the day will be taken away and the pores allowed to breathe freely through the night.

Yesterday I saw her again—and what a change! The lines were noticeably fewer and fainter, all the dark patches had disappeared, and best of all I saw a happy smiling light in her lovely eyes!

"Well," I said, "I think I've seen that hat before. Haven't you bought a new one lately?" "I haven't bought a new hat this month," she laughed. "I've done just what you told me to do with Pompeian Night Cream, and I'm so interested in my improved looks now that I've forgotten all about new hats."

--:--

Pompeian Day Cream, a vanishing cream, gives a perfect foundation for powder and protects the skin from dust, wind and sun.

Jeannette

Specialiste de Beauté

TEAR OFF, SIGN AND SEND

POMPEIAN LABORATORIES
2036 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Gentlemen: I enclose 10c (a dime preferred) for 1923 Pompeian Art Panel of Mary Pickford and the four samples named in the offer.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

Flesh shade powder sent unless you write another below.

town, to the market square to eat, to drink and to dance the ballet.

Gaylord ran back into his room to change his clothes, putting on white flannels and low white shoes. He slipped on a white cotton shirt and left the collar open at the throat, and finally in place of a belt he tied a red sash about his waist.

"Hell!" laughed Gaylord to himself, "I'm in the picture."

He started out of the room bareheaded, on his way to the square. At the door he hesitated, he saw Julio's eyes before him; he turned to the bureau and took out of a drawer the slim Spanish dirk his wrist had come to know well. He slipped it down between the waistband of his trousers and his shirt, beneath his sash, where he felt it lie flat against his body.

The market square was a phantasmagoria of shifting figure and color. The sides were banked with the villagers in their showiest holiday attire, applauding, clapping, encouraging the dance in the center where Julio was doing a succession of intricate steps. Gaylord caught sight of Yvonne and her beauty on this day staggered him. She was dressed in gleaming black, the sheer texture of her dress disclosing the smooth outlines of her slim body. A dazzling white mantilla gave a blue-black intensity to her hair. Her beauty, animated as it was now, made Gaylord gasp; the vivid redness of her mouth, her lips moving in quick Basque syllables, revealing flashes of her even teeth, the dark lashes half veiling the gray eyes, gave her an impossible beauty.

It became obvious to Gaylord that Julio knew where Yvonne stood, for he danced as if in the presence of a queen. He danced the goblet dance as no youth had danced it in the history of the village, and Gaylord knew, and Yvonne knew, and the village knew, whence came his inspiration. The crowd, as he concluded, applauded and applauded his triumph in burst after burst of enthusiasm. Julio walked to a place near Yvonne, among his cheering admirers.

The farandole was to follow, where the young girls would be asked by the masqueraders to dance in the square.

The dancers were forming in the square as the young men chose their ladies, the music started up and they began to wind, hand in hand, through the simple steps. But Yvonne stood at the side, and Julio had not broken away from his admirers. No one of the youths dared choose Yvonne —they knew Julio; and still Julio dallied, and the dance was beginning. For Julio, intoxicated with his success, the idol of the moment, was paying back to Yvonne the humiliation he felt she had brought him as a hopeless suitor.

"See," wagged the village tongues, "Julio ignores her—but he will ask her to dance in a minute."

Gaylord caught it all, saw Yvonne bite her lip and toss her head. The steps of the dance were simple, he saw that he could do them. He looked once more at Julio, stepped out of the crowd, walked to Yvonne, bowed and asked her to join in the dance with him.

Yvonne looked at him in amazement. The villagers gasped:

"The Englishman has asked Hurja's daughter to dance the farandole!"

Julio turned and saw. Yvonne reached up and took Gaylord's arm and they turned to enter the dance—and faced Julio.

"May I request thee to dance with me?"

"I am sorry," said Yvonne calmly.

Gaylord started to step past. Julio's temper broke into flame—it was the final insult. He flew at Gaylord's throat, the fury of his spring carrying Gaylord back into the crowd, which scattered instantly.

And then they fought, those two, such a fight as is still related about the firesides in Tardets. Julio held on like a madman and Gaylord fought and tore but could not wrench him loose. They rolled over and over on the cobblestones of the street, Julio in his gay costume with his fingers in Gaylord's throat. The music stopped, the dance broke up in confusion. Gaylord twisted and turned, tore and battered, but the steel fingers dug into his throat. The veins in his head were bursting when he finally got his knee against Julio's chin and forced him off. Once free, Gaylord whipped blows in Julio's face, left and right. Julio rushed in again and Gaylord beat him off. Gaylord met every rush with stinging blows, his shirt was torn into rags, his flesh scored with Julio's clawing fingers.

Julio came on again. Gaylord stepped back and lashed out with a blow that sent him whirling against the wall. Julio turned and his eyes burned with an evil flame. No one saw the movement or saw from what part of his clothes it came, but they all saw now that Julio's right hand clasped a knife.

Gaylord laughed madly, leaped away, his hand dropping to his sash. Yvonne caught the motion—saw again the smooth pine board with the deep gashes in Gaylord's room—and knew what had to happen.

The motley crowd of masqueraders was drawn back on both sides, in breathless intensity, watching the drama enacted before their eyes. The two men faced each other. They saw Gaylord's hand come out with a knife. The villagers saw Yvonne Hurja run between the two men and throw herself upon Julio, her body between Julio and Gaylord as if to protect him.

Gaylord was stunned. She was trying to save Julio's life, not his own. She was trying to save Julio's life! So, in the final test, it was Julio! She was crying in fierce warning to him in Basque, which Gaylord could not understand. Gaylord's heart, misunderstanding, cried out: "She loves Julio! She loves Julio! After all it is people to people, kind to kind."

It was true that Yvonne was trying to save Julio—but not because she loved him. She was afraid for him, for she alone knew his danger. She had not the slightest fear for Gaylord. To her Gaylord was—Gaylord. He would make no mistakes.

"You fool! You fool! He will kill you!" she cried.

And Julio threw her off. Gaylord swerved slightly and Julio's knife hurtled past. The crowd shrank away. Julio crouched back against the wall.

But the light had died in Gaylord's eyes. The figure against the wall had no meaning.

On the wall of the building at Julio's right hung a wooden sign on which was painted the red image of a goat. Gaylord drew back his arm, Yvonne closed her eyes. When she looked again she saw the knife sticking in the body of the goat on the wooden sign. Gaylord was walking rapidly out of the square. At Oxford they would have pronounced it "the Gaylo touch."

That evening he told Hurja he w leaving. He set about methodically arrange his books and papers and pack h clothes. He sat at his table between t two wax tapers till far into the night.

Yvonne came as usual with the flowe for Gaylord's room the next mornin She saw the traveling bags drawn out the closets.

Gaylord spoke to her indifferently, n looking. He strolled to the windows a turned slightly.

"And so," he continued easily, "I sh go back tomorrow. It has been so deligh ful this summer, the best I've ever had knowing you has alone made it wor while."

She looked at him through straight gr eyes. He stood at the tiny, half open French windows; the morning sunlig streamed slantwise over his head a shoulders, making an aura around his cri blond hair. She noticed again the poise his head, the straight lines of his nose, t curve of his nostrils, the graceful sweep his jaw. Behind his casual sentences s felt the stark surface of determinatio He was going back. The gray eyes gaz at him steadily with a cold level light. H was not going back—not yet!

"Thou must not leave me, Gaylor'."

"I am desolated, but I cannot stay."

"Thou canst not leave me, Gaylor'."

He turned his head slowly to face her lifted his hand in single, final gesture.

"I have no choice—it is finished, n work. I cannot remain longer. I lea you—life is like that."

Velvet words softly insistent. "Gaylo but decide for thyself now—else I do it stay!"

"I cannot."

He remembered it all so clearly afte wards, what happened there. She ha done it perfectly. Perhaps she had pra ticed it a thousand times. Perhaps it ha been born of the moment. It was beaut fully done. His astonishment was lost admiration. There had been no hesitatio no suddenness, no startling move, and happened just as the click of finality of h last word "cannot!"

Gaylord was looking at the handle, th polished black handle of a dagger, and stood straight out from his thigh. Th blade of that dagger, he knew, was buri a good six inches in his thigh muscles, th flat metal hilt pressed the weave of h trousers hard against the flesh.

He did not stir. He raised his cigaret to his lips and inhaled. The smoke traile lazily through his nostrils.

Yes, it was as swift as light. A brow hand shooting down to the edge of a skir a fleeting vision of a slim black-stockinge leg, a thin-bladed dagger twisted in a da red garter, the lightning flick of a slend wrist——

His eyes rose to look into gray on which said no word, but he heard, soft insistent:

"Thou wilt not leave me, Gaylor'; th wound will be dangerous for many day thou canst not ride nor walk; thou wilt lame. Thou wilt remain here."

Curious, thought Gaylord, it hadn hurt, just a sharp blow; it wasn't bleedin it wouldn't bleed till he pulled it ou Wonder if a muscle were cut. He look

Building to an Ideal

AS the stone is shaped to man's enduring use by the master builder, so, in the Firestone Cord, has material been fashioned to contribute to that vital need in human progress—transportation.

And just as Wren, the great architect, toiled over his plans, rejecting even royal opinion if it did not meet his own high standard, so has Firestone maintained quality in the face of all obstacles.

The Firestone ideal of Most Miles per Dollar preceded the actual building of the tire and this vision of what a good tire should be reached its highest fulfillment in the Firestone Cord.

Its acceptance by so great a number of car-owners has come because the name it bears is synonymous with quality. But in the last analysis, results are the determining factor in any success and the performance of this tire has already made it a dominating influence in the automotive field.

To Firestone builders a tire is much more than a product of rubber and cord—it is an essential in modern social and commercial life, a factor in present-day progress because it facilitates swift, economical transportation.

Most Miles per Dollar

Firestone

again; no, the blade lay parallel to and not across the muscle threads. Wonder if she had thought of that. He wouldn't be lame long, anyway.

His leg would stiffen, it would be sore, and if the wound became septic—well, it was the part of wisdom to stay. It was a long trip out. Clever of her to choose his thigh. If it had been his side or his shoulder now——

Words again: "Thou wilt stay here and I will take care of thee, beloved, and there will be many days till thou shalt walk again."

"This is one of the things that doesn't happen," he murmured. He was still gazing in fascination at the black handle.

Clever of her to wound him like that. Come to think of it, how else could she have held him longer? He must go eventually, she must realize that—or did she? Did she only want a few more weeks to try to win him? And if not—what? Would she wound him again?

What courage, to hurt the man she loved! Nietszche had said something about that—takes greater courage to cause suffering than to endure suffering—she was probably strangling from the well of pity that was gushing from her heart. God! these Basques, the riddles of the earth. Her slim, black-stockinged leg, evanescent again; that lithe, round wrist. The picture was imprinted on his brain for all time. Black hair, gray eyes—what was the secret of her ancestry?

She carried a dagger twisted in her garter—and she used it on him, in hate, no—in fear, no—in love, yes.

What a rush of thoughts—had anyone else ever done that? After all, what an idea in an extremity. How utterly stupid otherwise. How had girls tried to hold men? Tears, good God! Wails, red eyes, twisted lips, shrill iterations. There she stood watching him intently, cool and gray-eyed.

He came back to himself with an abrupt start. Why didn't it burn, the knife? Why didn't he pull it out, why didn't he move, do something, say something? Couldn't spoil the picture! Gray-eyed One with the ivory black hair standing watching him with intense concentration—watching him who stood at the half opened window with her dagger in his thigh, while the morning sun splashed over him.

An Aubrey Beardsley print—that was it—he was standing in an Aubrey Beardsley print. It would vanish when he moved.

There was a great clattering on the stairs, a knocking on the door. Neither turned or spoke. The door opened. Gaylord's hand dropped instantly over the dagger handle. Yvonne's mother was in the room, chattering Basque. She saw the young Englishman standing at the window, one hand resting carelessly on his hip. She saw Yvonne motionless in the center of the room, regarding him. She chattered—why was she standing there? What was she doing? Must she spend the morning gazing upon him? Yvonne's eyes never wavered. Well, well, had she lost her senses, was she quite mad? Was it not time to go to market? They must be off at once. Silence.

Gaylord shifted his weight ever so slightly. The movement of his muscles carried the tip of the blade across the leg bone. Cold sweat beaded quickly on his forehead. The muscles of his jaw sprang into sharp relief under the drawn skin. The mother was saying in explosives that she was going downstairs to wait but for another minute. Would Yvonne come instantly—must she fall into a dream forever? Her mother turned and left, mystified.

As for Gaylord, he felt that his thoughts were lagging, surely. Was the sunlight fading? What was happening to the pit of his stomach? Why didn't he say something? Why didn't he move? Oh, yes, spoil the picture! The sunlight, the Gray-eyed One, himself, the black handle of a dagger, a black stockinged leg and a red garter.

He shifted his weight again and the point of the blade scraped——

Yvonne moved softly forward and took him gently in her arms as he slipped slowly to the floor.

The wound was kind. Within two weeks of its healing, Gaylord learned many things about Yvonne and about himself. He came to an understanding of the greatness of Yvonne's love for him, and the gentility of her character. There would not exist again for Gaylord such a love as Yvonne held for him.

What Gaylord did not know, and what Yvonne saw, was the gradual refining of Gaylord's spirit. Before the time was up she had found what she had long searched for in Gaylord's eyes, and it made her unutterably happy. She had won. Gaylord no longer looked at her calculatingly. He was direct and unreserved. What there was of the lotus-eater in him had disappeared. And when Gaylord still clung to his determination to go she cared not a whit. He must come back to her. She would let him go so that he might find in himself that which she saw in him.

Gaylord was surprised that she only nodded in acquiescence and smiled when he told her that he was going. She asked no question, said no word. She calmly accepted his statement that he was going back to Oxford. That was all.

Gaylord did not start directly back to Oxford. He went to Biarritz. Three months in the mountains; he'd have a little fling, just to find his legs again, watch the old wheel spin and see the ivory ball jump and look at the new smart gowns and all that sort of thing; might meet a few friends, even, though it was the slack of the season. Might do a bit of drinking, just to get into form again. Oh yes! an evening or two at Biarritz was the thing after a summer in the mountains. The bucolic poet would have his fling.

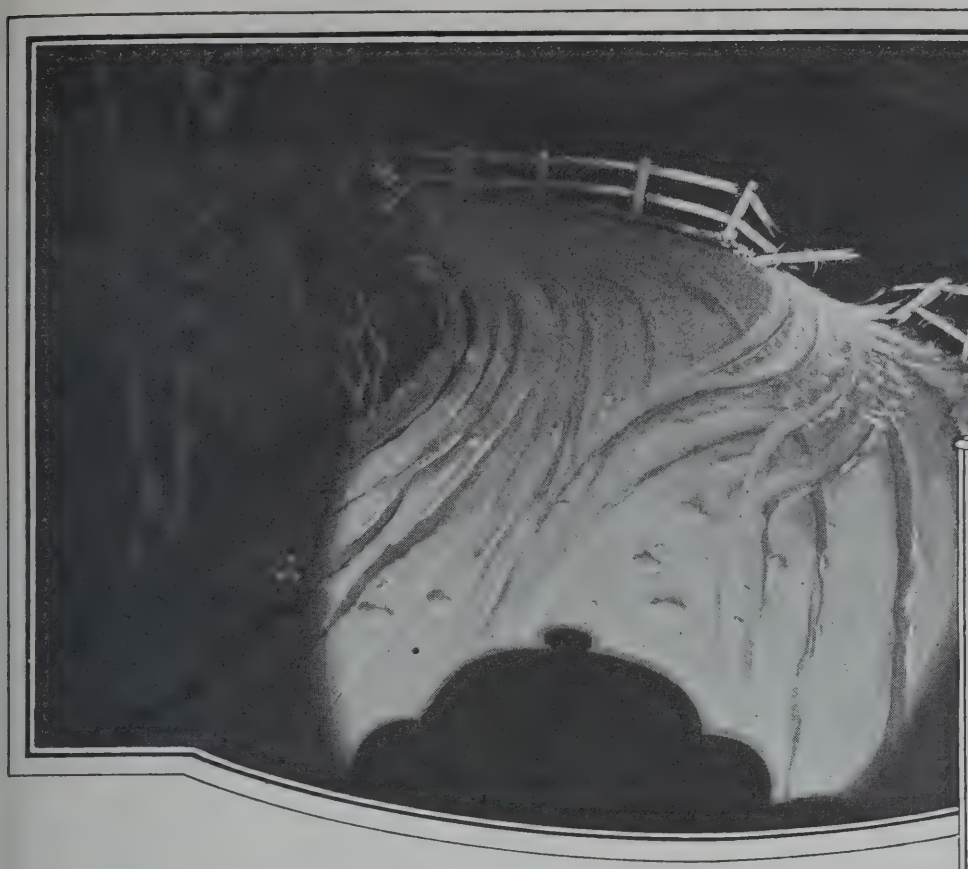
At the Hôtel du Palais in Biarritz he had a valet unpack and press his evening clothes. When he climbed out of his bath he stood before the pier glass and thoughtfully examined the cicatrix on his thigh. There was a symbol he would carry forever.

He went down to dinner and thought that he was once more himself, the gay, irresponsible spirit. He made a great business of ordering his dinner, chatting gaily to his waiter, but failed to awaken an interest. He tried to unloose his spirit and detach himself from himself with champagne, with indifferent results. There was no one with whom to share enthusiasm.

He made straight for the Casino after dinner and lost himself in the fashionable throng. Here was a milieu he could move about in! He was telling himself how exquisite the gowns were, how smart the women looked. He thought he was thirsting for his own language again but when he heard a heavy voice drawl: "My deah fellow, imagine black buttons on a white waistcoat. One cawn't possibly go that, y'know, 'strawdin'ry bad taste!"—it sounded trivial and unimportant. Either he, Gaylord, had lost his critical eye, or there was in the Casino that night a peculiarly ill-favored assortment of women. Search as he would, he could find no face that pleased or attracted him. He looked into faces that were dull and spiritless, he looked into eyes that were flat and toneless. He caught no response. He did not know that it was himself who was unresponsive, for always Yvonne's vivid beauty swam before him and made pallid and lifeless whatever of color there was in that pleasure seeking posse.

He found a place at the wheel and hazarded a few times on black and red, but whether he won or lost there came no answering emotion. All that he did was pointless, was unrelated, had no significance. He was gesturing to the sky, making signs at the sea. He wandered about and finally sat down in a lounge chair, puzzled with himself. The joy of being free, of being on his way again—where was it?

A village of mist and pale gold floated before his eyes, a sweeping mountain side of pink heather, a river of aquamarine running down to the sea. He saw a great house and a spacious room and a dark-topped table where he had come to feel his strength and know his power. He saw a procession of hours, trailing after each other—one by one—hours filled with the rapture of toil. He saw a succession of lines, lines of music and rhythm to which he had given permanent life.



And a pair of gray eyes appeared before him, eyes that he could neither avoid nor deceive, and Gaylord bowed his head in acknowledgment. He knew. He knew for all time.

And one afternoon when the slanting rays of the sun were tinging the columbine a deeper purple, Gaylord returned to Tardets. By the paneled windows in the spacious room in the great house he found the Gray-eyed One, and he took her in his arms.

Later, there were articles in the London papers by the critics of the day, remarking upon the singular brilliance of the Oxford Prize Poem, which was, they agreed, "as fine in perfection of detail as it was in sustained magnificence of conception." A young writer of rare promise had appeared upon the literary horizon.

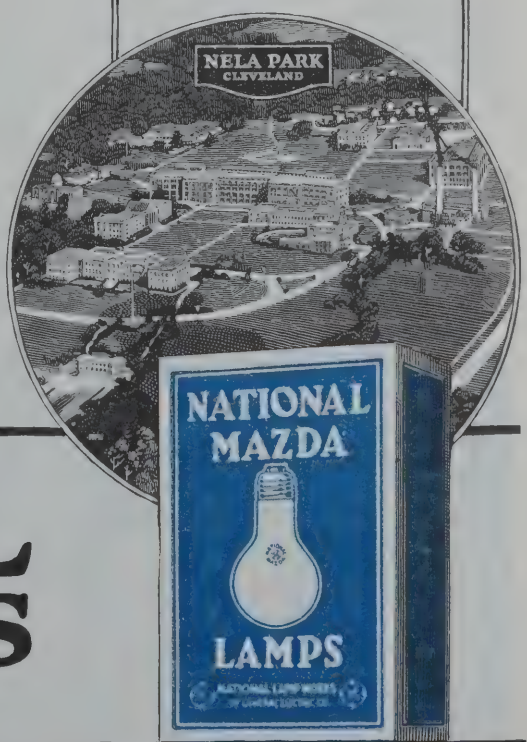
A volatile youth had deserted the ways of indifference.

If you want to go on an armchair journey to exotic Zanzibar, land of spices and perfumes, beautiful women and strange romance, get the May COSMOPOLITAN and read the story by William Ashley Anderson

A partial list of gasoline passenger cars on which National MAZDA automobile lamps are installed as initial equipment:

Ace	Frontenac	Pilot
Adria	Gardner	Porter
Allen	Grant	Premier
American	H. C. S.	Premocar
Anderson	Handley-Knight	R & V Knight
Apperson	Haynes	Reo
Beggs	Holmes	ReVere
Biddle	Hudson	Romer
Buick	Huffman	Saxon
Bush	Jackson	Sayers
Cadillac	Kelsey	Seneca
Case	Kline Kar	Stearns-Knight
Chalmers	Kurtz	Stevens
Champion	LaFayette	Sterling
Chandler	Lincoln	Studebaker
Cleveland	Lorraine	Stutz
Climber	Maibohm	Templar
Cole	Marmon	Tulsa
Columbia	Maxwell	Velie
Comet	Meteor	Vogue
Crawford	Metz	Washington
Daniels	Mitchell	Wasp
Davis	Moon	Westcott
Dixie Flyer	Nash	Wills Sainte Claire
Dorris	National	Willys-Knight
Dort	Norwalk	Winton
Earl	Ogren	Yellow Cab
Elgin	Oldsmobile
Elkhart	Overland
Ferris	Packard
Franklin	Paige

It Might Have Been You!



A car-length gap in the splintered fence! Somebody went through! But your lamps point out the danger and carry you safely on. Unexpected hazards of night driving make safe, accurate lamps imperative.

You can entrust your safety to National MAZDA Auto lamps because they are accurate. Untiring research — dimensions to the thousandth part of an inch — weights down to the minute fraction of an ounce — these guarantee safety. They are as dependable as the large National MAZDA lamps you buy for the home.

When you need new lamps go to the National MAZDA lamp dealer. He sells the same lamps that are standard original equipment for 90% of all cars. There is a particular lamp for each socket. Look for the name. Verify the number on the base.

Each of these labels represents a Sales Division equipped to give a complete lighting service.

NATIONAL MAZDA LAMPS

for Automobiles

"I Knew You'd Make Good"

"I ALWAYS felt you had it in you to get ahead. But for a time I was afraid your natural ability would be wasted because you had never trained yourself to do any one thing well.

"But the minute you decided to study in your spare time I knew you'd make good. You seemed more ambitious—more cheerful—more confident of the future. I knew your employers couldn't help but notice the difference in your work.

"Think what this last promotion means! More money—more comforts—more of everything worth while. Tom, those hours you spent on that I. C. S. course were the best investment you ever made."

HOW about you? Are you always going to work for a small salary? Are you going to waste your natural ability all your life? Or are you going to get ahead in a big way? It all depends on what you do with your spare time.

Opportunity knocks—this time in the form of that familiar I. C. S. coupon. It may seem like a little thing, but it has been the means of bringing better jobs and bigger salaries to thousands of men.

Mark and mail it today and without cost or obligation, learn what the I. C. S. can do for you.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 2515-B, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation on my part, please tell me how I can qualify for the position or in the subject before which I have marked an X:

BUSINESS TRAINING DEPARTMENT

☐ Business Management
☐ Industrial Management ☐ Personnel Organization
☐ Traffic Management
☐ Business Law
☐ Banking and Banking Law
☐ Accountancy (including C.P.A.)
☐ Nicholson Cost Accounting
☐ Bookkeeping
☐ Private Secretary
☐ Business Spanish ☐ French
☐ Salesmanship
☐ Advertising
☐ Better Letters
☐ Foreign Trade
☐ Stenography and Typing ☐ Business English
☐ Civil Service
☐ Railway Mail Clerk
☐ Common School Subjects
☐ High School Subjects
☐ Illustrating

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL DEPARTMENT

☐ Electrical Engineering
☐ Electric Lighting
☐ Mechanical Engineer
☐ Mechanical Draftsman ☐ Machine Shop Practice
☐ Railroad Positions
☐ Gas Engine Operating ☐ Civil Engineer
☐ Surveying and Mapping
☐ Metallurgy
☐ Steam Engineering ☐ Radio ☐ Architect
☐ Blue Print Reading
☐ Contractor and Builder
☐ Architectural Draftsman
☐ Concrete Builder
☐ Structural Engineer
☐ Chemistry ☐ Pharmacy
☐ Automobile Work
☐ Airplane Engines
☐ Agriculture and Poultry ☐ Mathematics

Name.....
6-26-22
Street Address.....
City..... State.....
Occupation.....

Persons residing in Canada should send this coupon to the International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Limited, Montreal, Canada.

BROWN'S Bronchial TROCHES
COUGH AND VOICE LOZENGES

For Sore Throat, Hoarseness

Coughing, and all throat troubles from asthmatic and catarrhal conditions. Harmless—safe for children. Not candy but a cough remedy. At druggists.

JOHN I. BROWN & SON, Boston, Mass.

General Sales Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc. New York London Toronto

Sherlock's Home

(Continued from page 85)

fifteenth," says Hurricane. "I'm supposed to step fifteen frames with a boloney by the name of Ignorant Eddie Biff. I'll smack him dead in a round!"

"Good!" I says. "Now, what you want to do is to make up a party of, say, twenty-five of the most influential citizens of East Silo. Get the mayor, the big banker, the political boss and people like that. Pay all their expenses to New York and back and get them ringside boxes at the fight. When they see you knock out this Mr. Biff and hear that crowd go wild over you, they'll realize that maybe Napoleon was a great man in his day, but you are the man for the ages now!"

I wound up as enthusiastic as a three-headed cat in a creamery, but Hurricane shakes his head doubtfully.

"They may be somethin' to that layout of yours, kid," he says, "but what you are losin' track of is the fact that it would set me back about a grand to bring them jobbies down from East Silo to see me step with this Ignorant Eddie Biff. I wouldn't spend a thousand bucks on them babies if it was a felony not to do it!"

"Very well," I says scornfully. "Then I hereby officially wash my hands of you and your troubles. Figure things out in your own way, I'm through! You poor fish, you should be willing to spend a million dollars if it will set you right in your home town. What's a mere thousand to you?"

"My right eye!" says Hurricane.

But he interrupts before I get a chance to bear down on him.

"If you actually think that bringin' them saps down to see me work will do me some good, I'll bring 'em down," he says. "Anything you say is kayo with me, kid, unless you tell me good by!"

Which is as near as Hurricane had yet come to making love to me.

Well, the large night finally arrives when Hurricane Sherlock is to massacre Ignorant Eddie Biff for the edification of his former townsmen of East Silo, N. Y. Among those present was me, of course, at Hurricane's urgent invitation. He had scrupulously attended to the details of my plan to make him a big fellow in his home town. I instructed him to have twenty-five representative citizens of East Silo at the ringside—Hurricane had fifty! I looked 'em over with interest, having no trouble in picking 'em out. They couldn't of made me believe they had come from anywheres else but East Silo if they swore different on a stack of—phone books.

The noisy crowd, the glare of the lights, the gory preliminary bouts and the general atmosphere of suppressed excitement—all brand new to the delegation from Hurricane's home town—gets under their skins a bit. But they're still openly skeptical of the importance of Hurricane Sherlock. Sitting behind 'em, I get that from snatches of their conversation, none of which is complimentary to the light-heavyweight champion of the world.

Promptly at ten P. M. Hurricane Sherlock climbs through the ropes to change all that.

A wild burst of applause greets my boy friend and I gaze at the jury from East Silo, prepared to see them clapping their hands off and beaming with civic pride. Instead of that, their hands are idle at their sides and there's a sneer on each and every face. While Ignorant Eddie Biff is hopping through the ropes to the accompaniment of a dead silence, I remember that it must of cost Hurricane a thousand dollars to bring these ten-minute eggs down from East Silo to see him ruin Eddie, but I figure that it will be a bargain if it puts him over in his home town. Then I sit back to enjoy the fracas.

The bell rang for the first round and amid a hush of expectancy Hurricane Sherlock danced lightly out from his corner with a contemptuous sneer for his plainly nervous vis-à-vis. Hurricane then peered through the tobacco smoke drifting over the ropes like he's looking for somebody. Finally, his gaze rested on my excited face and he brightened up. Evidently I was who he was looking for. I fluttered my handkerchief encouragingly at him, and with his old cheerful grin Hurricane turns his head and waves back a careless glove to me. As his head turned Ignorant Eddie Biff darted forward with the spring of a panther, smashed his right glove against Hurricane's chin, and—the fight was over!

Hurricane Sherlock, light-heavyweight champion of the world, has been knocked out with a single punch! Not only that, but he has spent a thousand dollars to bring his enemies down from East Silo to see it!

O sole mia!

Well, for a minute the big crowd just sat there dazed. They couldn't seem to put any faith in what their bulging eyes showed them—Hurricane Sherlock prostrate on the floor as cold as a winter breeze, five seconds after the bell for the first round. Whoever in that vast audience blinked an eye didn't see the fight at all!

Then with a roar like Niagara Mr. Pandemonium took charge and the panic was on. The cash customers who paid to see a long hard battle are fit to be tied and they yell their heads off with rage. Hundreds who had bet on Hurricane Sherlock become maniacs. They had nothing on me! Look at the terrible thing I have done to the now ex-light-heavyweight champion. By waving my handkerchief at him I got him knocked out, and by trying to help him I have brought his worst enemies there to see it!

Assisted by a couple of cops I managed to fight my way out a side exit to a taxi and I'm whisked home to spend a horrible sleepless night. All I can think of is what plans Hurricane Sherlock will make with regard to my disposal when he recovers from the sleeping sickness on that canvas. I certainly have gummed things up for your life and I don't mind telling you that I'm scared stiff!

I spent a lot of time the next morning arguing with myself as to whether or not I'd better stay away from the Hotel St. Moe till Hurricane Sherlock forgot what I had innocently did to him. But then I thought if I stayed away till he forgot that I'd have to stay away 200 years, so I decided I might as well go in, face him and be done with it. So that's what I did.

That morning was a fearful one for me,

See the Children Safely to School for Economical Transportation

CHEVROLET

Why worry about the safety of your little ones on the highways or crossing city streets on the way to school?

The low price and small upkeep of a Chevrolet is cheap insurance against such risks.

Then too, driving the children to and from school gives mother or big sister pleasing relief from household duties, and shopping can be done at the same time.

Chevrolet 5-passenger Sedan is the ideal all-year family car, combining the comforts and atmosphere of home with high grade body construction, mechanical reliability, ease of handling and low purchase and operating costs. Every home garage should house a Chevrolet regardless of whether or not another car is owned.

Chevrolet Motor Co., Detroit, Mich.
Division of General Motors Corporation

There are now more than 10,000 Chevrolet dealers and service stations throughout the world

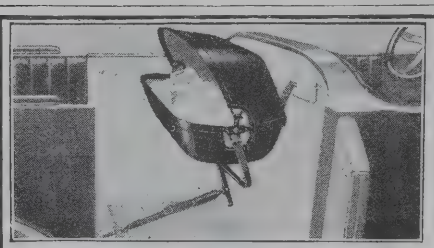
Prices f. o. b. Flint, Mich.

2-Pass. Roadster	$510
5-Pass. Touring	525
2-Pass. Utility Coupe	680
4-Pass. Sedanette	850
5-Pass. Sedan	860
Light Delivery	510

BAILEY BANKS & BIDDLE CO.
JEWELERS SILVERSMITHS STATIONERS
Philadelphia

PEARL NECKLACES

Oriental Pearls selected by the experts of this Establishment for those who want and appreciate perfection



DIAMOND RINGS
DIAMOND BAR PINS
DIAMOND BRACELETS

Quality considered, extremely moderately priced
Correspondence Invited

WEDDING INVITATIONS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS of the best quality and styles as demanded by the Leaders of Society

ANNIVERSARY RECEPTION DINNER DANCE BRIDGE AND DÉBUT INVITATIONS TEA AND DANCE CARDS
Samples mailed - Kindly mention which of the above is wanted

THE GIFT SUGGESTION BOOK mailed upon request illustrating and pricing the Newest Productions and Importations of this Establishment

Have Baby Comfy
In a Gordon Motor Crib. More pleasure for you when motoring with baby tucked snugly in this convenient crib. "The safest way the doctors say." Crib easily strapped in any touring car. Spring arrangement absorbs all shock over roughest roads. Hood when raised protects against weather. Fold crib flat or detach when not in use. Sold everywhere or sent parcel post prepaid.
Send for illustrated booklet and dealer's name
GORDON MOTOR CRIB CO.
1519 Wabash Ave. Dept. 17 CHICAGO

The Final Touch
"She had the prettiest complexion"
So can you, my lady, have a complexion—dainty, perfectly lovely—and always admired if you use
Carmen Powder
the choice of a million women noted for their beautiful complexions.
CARMEN COMPACT
A cake of Carmen in a pretty metal box with Mirror and Powder Puff.
White, Flesh, Brunette and the new L'Autumn shade.
50¢
At your dealer's or mailed prepaid
Stafford-Miller Company, St. Louis, Mo.

honest it was! Every time I'd look up I'd expect to see Hurricane Sherlock towering over the board with first degree murder in each eye. The phone service at the St. Moe is at no time nothing to boast of, no more than it is in any other hotel, but that morning even my warmest admirers meowed about the way I treated their innocent requests for numbers. It was really a case of try and get a sensible answer from me, that's all!

Well, up till noon my unfortunate knight had not put in an appearance and I'm commencing to breathe normally again. As I'm going out to lunch I'm thinking is it possible that poor Hurricane is still slumbering on the floor of that ring from that horrible blow Ignorant Eddie Biff presented him with.

At that moment my heart stops beating for one terrible second. I have bumped square into Hurricane Sherlock in the lobby of the hotel!

Honest, I'm almost hysterical with pure fright and I gazed wildly around for assistance. I'm really afraid Hurricane may do me bodily harm. But to my dumbfounded astonishment, he's smiling and looks happier than happy itself. I feel I must say something or I'll scream, so I begin to stammer condolences. Still smiling happily, Hurricane cuts me off.

"That kayo was the best thing could of happened to me, kid," he says cheerily. "I would of got it sooner or later anyways—they all do. I don't care nothin' no more about what them yokels from East Silo thinks about me, either. What does them sapolios know? Say—up in that slab they think alligator pears will bite you!"

"I—I'm afraid I'll have to hurry on," I says, crazy to get away. "I am going to lunch and I must be back in——"

"That punch last night knocked me out of the ring into a swell taxi business and now I'm all jake with my folks," goes on Hurricane calmly. "You're goin' to eat, hey? Well, come on up to my home and chow with us. My folks will be crazy to see you—I told 'em plenty about you, kid!"

I tried to duck this invitation, but no chance. So to avoid attracting undue attention by an argument in the crowded lobby, I got into a taxi with Hurricane Sherlock, bound for his home. In view of what had just happened, I felt I owed him something!

All the way up in the cab Hurricane raved about what a swell family he has, but to tell you the truth I scarcely heard him. I had just about decided that Mr. Hurricane Sherlock has lost his attraction for me, now that he's no longer a champion—which had really been the only thing thrilling about him to me. What's bothering me is how to break the sad news to him. I am picturing in my mind the scene which is going to take place in his home. He's taking me up to meet his folks, undoubtedly wanting his dear old father and mother to see the lady of his choice and get their O. K. before he asks me will I quit the telephone switchboard to accept a position as his bride.

Honest, I felt awfully sorry for him. I know it's going to be terribly tragic. He might even break down and cry like a baby when he sees all his plans go to smash. But I can't help it—Hurricane Sherlock is out as far as I'm concerned. Why, I wouldn't dream of marrying him!

Well, we arrive at Sherlock's home. Hurricane asks me to wait in the parlor till he brings in his folks. The coming ordeal has got me so nervous that I've just about bitten my nails away. While he's in the next room I rehearse to myself the way I'll break the news to him. "I'm very sorry, Mister Sherlock," I'm going to say, kindly, "but I never thought of you in that way. I can't marry you, but——"

Just then Hurricane bounces into the room, half dragging a kind of plain-faced young lady who has two very dirty-faced kids hanging to her apron.

"Meet the wife!" grins Hurricane to me. "And the rest of my folks. Hey, Joey and Goldie, say hello to the lady!"

Curtain!

A story by H. C. Witwer is a sure prescription for the blues in any form. His next one will appear in an early issue of COSMOPOLITAN.

The Map Eaters

(Continued from page 41)

"Who won the race? Have you heard?"

"Indeed I have. Chicken Doyle has talked of nothing much else. It was George Corbin in the Crossland."

Jim closed his eyes. He wasn't sure whether it was a contraction of physical pain or merely mental anguish that made the world seem so suddenly black. There was physical pain all right and in a great many places, but the news that Corbin was the winner, even though he had expected to hear it, was a sickening blow to his newly awakened faculties.

Because Corbin and Jim were rivals for more things than the mere transcontinental automobile record. Perhaps the most important thing they contested for, though it was not nominated in the bond, was the favor of one Patsy May Keller, whom you may have seen last evening on the screen of your local theater. Patsy May isn't a star yet but she will be some day, and as it is she plays leads for some of the most expensive members of the male constellation. She had become acquainted with Jim and Corbin during the filming of a race play in which they had worked as "stunt" men. That was the year before and they were both still hanging on. There had even been considerable good natured teasing in the newspapers about their three cornered affair, which they had all accepted without resentment as so much free publicity. The best story of all was the one run from coast to coast in every daily paper with a sporting section just before the race. It was to the effect that Patsy was going to be waiting at the checking-in station in Los Angeles with a laurel wreath and other valuable consideration to be awarded to the victor.

It was probably all press agent "bunk"

OLDSMOBILE

The New Brougham Combines Quality and Complete Equipment—No Extras to be Bought Later

You have a right to expect these three essentials in any closed car you buy: A high grade chassis, a strong, handsome all-metal-covered body, and adequate equipment for safe and comfortable driving

The new Oldsmobile Brougham gives you all these things, and at a price which is a direct challenge to every car in the same price class. How this is done will be explained in a moment—first, see just what the Brougham offers you.

The Chassis: Famous for its 40 horse power Four motor which has won numerous economy and endurance tests. Its 115" wheelbase is in marked contrast with the 110" wheelbase average of all competitive fours. (Write for official reports on the Four's record.)

The Body: Standard closed car construction—a sturdy frame of seasoned hard woods sheathed with panels of steel from top to bottom. To appreciate this construction, compare the Brougham body with those employing composition materials which are subject to rapid deterioration. The interior of this excellent body is roomy and comfortable for five grown-up people.

The Equipment: Read the items of equipment listed at the right. They are just the things you would choose if you were building the car yourself. Because Oldsmobile buys and makes them in immense quantities, these refinements do not add materially to the manufacturing cost. You, however, would find them very expensive if you bought them singly, at retail.

What advantages does Oldsmobile enjoy which make possible this wonderful Brougham at $1375? First, the advantage of twenty-five years' experience in fine car manufacture. Second, the benefit of the great General Motors Corporation facilities in engineering, research and purchasing.

Choose the Oldsmobile Brougham on the basis of its quality—and at the same time remember that it is the lowest priced fully-equipped car of this type on the market.

The rear compartment is large enough for a bag and several parcels In the hinged cover is a tray of tools

The Brougham Equipment: Drumhead lamps which require no special lens or visor to comply with anti-glare legislation, high grade upholstery, satin silvered hardware, heater, door locks, cowl ventilator, sun visor, windshield wiper, cowl lamps, nickeled radiator, one-piece crowned fenders, dome light, door and window regulators, window shades, walnut steering wheel, good carpet, walnut-finish instrument board with instruments symmetrically arranged and separately removable for service

Price Range: Fours—$955 to $1595; Eights—$1375 to $2025 f. o. b. Lansing

OLDS MOTOR WORKS, LANSING, MICHIGAN
Division of General Motors Corporation

Oldsmobile

A PRODUCT OF GENERAL MOTORS

The front seats are deep non-folding Pullman-type chairs which move forward to give unusual entrance space. The doors are twenty-nine inches wide but both Jim and George had made arrangements with their managers to be the drivers on the last trick of the race, and Jim at least had gone to the trouble and expense of purchasing a rather nice white stone set in a platinum circlet which he carried with him and planned to exchange for the aforementioned wreath of laurel, which he had been firmly convinced would be awarded to himself.

Well, that was out. He had a good ring and no place to put it. The thought of Patsy May as someone else's bride was very painful. She was sweet and vivacious. Charm and vividness were hers in a superlative degree. Even women liked her, which proves how nice she was.

And Jim Danger had never loved anyone else. In a life devoted to college athletics, warfare, automobile manufacturing and design and the racing of same, there had been only the one considerable emotional experience. Jim was shy with women, mistrusted himself and usually them.

Doctor Dan sat down by Jim's bed for a few minutes and talked cheerfully about his other patients in the neighborhood, mostly Indians, Mexicans and a few white babies.

"The doctoring business ain't so good nowadays since the men quit toting guns. I forgot to mention I'm the coroner, too, so I used to get paid after every scrap whether they were good shots or not."

Later in the day Sherry brought Chicken Doyle in, conventionally smudged with graphite. He expressed halting pleasure at Jim's recovery and mentioned in passing what a wonderful nurse Sherry had been. "She certainly knows how to make a man comfortable."

And he looked, when he said it, just the way Doctor Dan had when he was talking to her.

Jim sniffed cynically to himself; men were a bunch of mushheads, the way they would fall for the nearest girl. The doctor was perhaps excusable—he probably didn't see many good looking ones—but Chicken Doyle was city broke and had gazed on the world's finest, even on Patsy May herself.

"She's had a lot of experience, I guess in the nursing line," Chicken Doyle went on to explain, "on account of taking care of her brother. It's because of him they live out here, have ever since the war. He got something like a touch of tuberculosis and the government advised him to inhabit this climate if he wanted to live at all. She just gave up every darn thing and came out here to keep house for him, and he's nearly well now and can do anything that anybody else can so long as he stays in this climate. He's up Santa Fé way on business just now for a couple of weeks. This is his room you've got. Yep, she's a regular girl, I'm going to tell the world."

Jim Danger was perfectly willing to concede that she had many estimable traits of character. But you couldn't expect a man with a heart sore from recent defeat and a body wracked with aches and pains to get up and wave a flag about some perfectly strange young woman even if he did owe his life to her.

The jury was not yet all in, either. The foreman of a near-by ranch came to call that evening and was introduced to Jim. He was crazy about Sherry, too. You could tell it by the look he wore like a badge. He was all dressed up in store clothes which fitted him too tightly about the thighs, more muscular than ordinary from riding, and smelling very distinctly of a thirty-five cent grade of perfume which almost killed the odor of horse.

If ever a girl was given a bad start by press agents, Sherry was that girl. No man of any originality of character likes to be a part of a mass meeting.

That accounts for Jim's ungraciousness towards Sherry; that and the fact that he owed her a great deal. Anybody just naturally resents being under an obligation which he has no hope of repaying. Jim wished that he had been found by a man or at least by a married woman, preferably elderly, to whom there could be no question of payment in devotion. It was the devil of an awkward situation.

Jim felt that he was in a very false position. And yet to explain would only be more boorish than to keep still.

For Jim was in love—not successfully, he feared, but nevertheless "in"—and with another girl. The fact that he had probably lost her forever did not enhance the brightness of his outlook upon the world.

And then, all at once, part of his troubles cleared up.

The first news reached Jim by wire.

"Coming to see you—love, Patsy," it said, and then the Los Angeles paper which Chicken brought him surreptitiously from town the next day furnished the rest of the details.

> Patsy May Keller [the item read], film favorite and candidate for stardom in the near future, has decided that affairs of the heart cannot be settled like bets on the races. For a long time two famous automobile drivers, George Corbin and Jim Danger, have been rivals for Miss Keller's favor. Among their friends it was pretty generally understood that the recent Post-Inquirer contest was to have settled much more than the supremacy of one of these two drivers in tearing across the map of these United States.
>
> Whether it was really understood or not that the winner was to marry the fair film actress does not matter now. Miss Keller is apparently not going to wed Mr. Corbin, who actually won the race. He is returning to New York tomorrow and both parties deny the engagement which has been rumored.
>
> And on top of that comes the announcement that Miss Keller is going out to the little desert town where Jim Danger met with his accident and where he now lies at the point of death. She says she is going to nurse him back to health again.
>
> All Hollywood is excited over the unconventional and romantic behavior of one of its most popular members.

Jim clipped the item, which he put in his pocket, and destroyed the rest of the newspaper. He wasn't exactly sure why he did it. What he said to himself was that there was no point in advertising his private affairs to everybody. He was not egotistical ass enough to think that Sherry would care if she knew.

And yet——

IV

Neither the paper nor the telegram said just when Patsy May expected to arrive, but it seemed reasonable to conclude that it would be soon.

"If you feel up to a little longer ride than usual today we'll have lunch up Cañon Tintoro way. There's a group of pines on the brink that I'd like to show you."

Sherry, when she said that, did not know that it would probably be his last chance to go gypsying with her, but Jim thought that probably it would be and assented gladly to the plan for the proposed picnic. Now that he was about to be rid of the awkward situation into which he had skidded he had to admit that Sherry was lots of fun and he would miss her ingenuous companionship. Lately she had been taking him on short curative horseback jaunts through the near-by country which were pleasurable adventures in contentment. She had found an old broad backed slow-poke of a mare that would not run away from a dynamite explosion which she considered safe enough for her patient to ride. It was really absurd to coddle Jim so and he protested that he was almost well and as strong as ever, but it pleased Sherry to mother him and she finally overruled him.

"Look at that, now, Monsieur Danger." She pointed to the long stretch of tufted valley floor that lay between them and the haze-painted mesas. "Did you ever see a more gorgeous playground for fairies and giants and us?"

Jim's mare, an affectionate old thing, was rubbing her nose on the neck of Sherry's mount. This brought Jim behind Sherry but quite close.

"Aren't you thrilled?" she asked.

"Yes," he answered, but he wasn't sure by what. He wasn't looking at the view. Perhaps it was the mellow warmth in the air, or the thundering silence of the motionless world, or, perhaps, the slim strength of Sherry's shoulders, or the way she sat on a horse. Saying a mental farewell to her as he found himself doing constantly he discovered more and more the heart-pulling glories of this girl. There was something compellingly vital about Sherry even if her voice did sound like a wonderful bronze bell with a clanking flaw in it.

"See that little trail which looks as if a carpenter had laid a white plumb line from that mountain to us? That's the way we are going. Some Indian with a super-accurate eye must have been the first to make this trip and everyone else has followed in his tracks."

The little mountain was a long way off and they were not in any hurry so Jim and Sherry did not stick so very close to the "crow-flies" course of that prehistoric red man whose sweetheart doubtless had lived at the end of the trail.

It was well past noon when they parked in Cañon Tintoro. There was a little brook bed at the bottom of it, usually entirely dried up but now boasting quite a respectable flow owing to the recent rains. The painted sides of the cañon, mostly soft red, were nearly straight up and down. There was a little slope at the bottom where decomposed granite from the cliffs had settled down and the floor of the cañon was littered with débris, some pieces as large as dwelling houses that had split away from the rock rim and hurled themselves down. The process of erosion was plainly visible at the palisades' edge right now. A series of granite pieces in a row like a train of box cars had been partly carved out of the face of the cliff and appeared to

The secret of having beautiful hair

How famous movie stars keep their hair soft and silky, bright, fresh-looking and luxuriant

NO one can be really attractive, without beautiful well-kept hair.

Study the pictures of these beautiful women. Just see how much their hair has to do with their appearance.

Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

You, too, can have beautiful hair, if you care for it properly.

In caring for the hair, proper shampooing is the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out all the real life and lustre, the natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why leading motion picture stars and discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

When oily, dry or dull

If your hair is too oily, or too dry; if it is dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy; if the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, or if it is full of dandruff, it is all due to improper shampooing.

You will be delighted to see how easy it is to keep your hair looking beautiful, when you use Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo.

The quick, easy way

Two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water is sufficient to cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly.

Simply pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out quickly and easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil — the chief causes of all hair troubles.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it really is. It keeps the scalp soft and healthy, the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet-goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Splendid for Children— Fine for Men

Mulsified

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Cocoanut Oil Shampoo

Nature's Own Color

The soft, rich, green color of Palmolive Soap is the natural color of the rich oils from which it is blended.

Nature put the color in these oils, just as she does in grass and foliage.

It might as well be said that flowers, trees and grass are artificially colored as to say it of the green of Palmolive.

Palm and olive oils not only impart their color to Palmolive Soap—they also give it their own soothing mildness. The rich, creamy Palmolive lather is lotion-like in its effect on the skin. It is ideal facial soap.

The Springtime of Life

—How to keep that youthful bloom throughout the years

THE joyous time—the time of youth and blooming, when every young girl should charm the world with her flower-like freshness.

This greatest of all attractions is girlhood's rightful heritage as well as the most admired beauty of later years. The pretty girl will mature into the beautiful woman if she keeps that schoolgirl complexion.

Don't let it fade

All too often this alluring school-girl complexion is allowed to vanish with schoolgirl days. Yet simple treatment following school-days will retain it as the greatest attraction of mature years.

Be careful how you cleanse your skin—don't let harsh methods rob it of its natural delicate texture. Or, just as dangerous to complexion health, don't omit the daily washing with soap and water for fear that its action is too harsh.

Instead, choose the facial soap which you know is so mild and soothing that it keeps the most sensitive skin smooth and soft.

This soap is Palmolive, as millions of women already know. It is blended from Palm and Olive oils, known since the days of ancient Egypt as nature's beautifying cleansers.

These two rare oriental oils, by whose aid Cleopatra kept her youth, impart their mildness to the smooth, creamy lather of Palmolive. It cleanses thoroughly, removing every trace of the oil, dirt and perspiration which otherwise clogs the skin pores. It leaves your skin soft and glowing with a delightful sensation of freshness.

Used regularly, every day, Palmolive keeps your complexion fine of texture and free from blackheads and blotches. Yet it never robs the skin of its own beautifying oil provided by nature to keep it smooth.

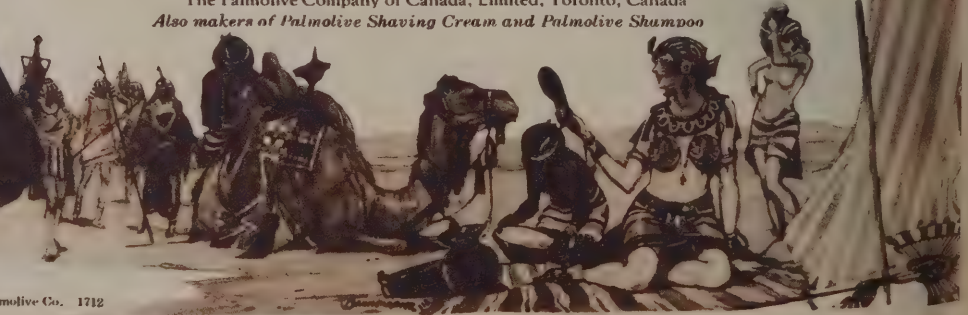
Apply a touch of cold cream after gently drying your face with a soft, fine towel. Normally oily skins won't need it except possibly when the weather is very cold.

A low-priced luxury

If you imagine that Palmolive, because of its superfine qualities, must be very expensive, you are wrong. While in Cleopatra's days Palm and Olive oil was the luxury of the rich, modern manufacturing methods, combined with world-wide popularity, makes Palmolive a low-priced soap.

We import these rare oils in enormous quantities and the Palmolive factories work day and night to supply the demand. Palmolive is only 10c a cake—a price which puts it within the reach of all for general toilet use.

Palm and Olive Oils—nothing else—give nature's green color to Palmolive Soap.



Volume and efficiency produce 25c quality for only

10c

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY, Milwaukee, U. S. A.

The Palmolive Company of Canada, Limited, Toronto, Canada

Also makers of Palmolive Shaving Cream and Palmolive Shampoo

Copyright 1923—The Palmolive Co. 1712

be balanced insecurely on a too narrow shelf.

"They have hung like that for hundreds of years," Sherry told him. "I've been up there exploring and I found inscriptions written on them by the Spanish conquistadores who came up from Mexico in the sixteenth century to introduce among the Indians the civilizing ceremony of the gilded brick. Having been there that long we're safe in assuming they'll give us an hour for lunch. We'll have it here on this baby rock that looks a lot like a table if you have plenty of imagination."

It was a mighty good lunch. Sherry had put it up herself and she seemed to comprehend the masculine appetite like an open book. It was a gay lunch, too. Jim felt that being with her was almost a forbidden pleasure under the circumstances and he was enjoying it all the more just on that account. As for Sherry, she was nearly always cheerful.

Afterwards they sat and fed the remnants of the repast to mountain squirrels who came exploring, bold gray fellows with large tufted ears which made them look as if there were a strain of lynx in their ancestry.

Once while they were both offering something to the same squirrel their hands met and Jim caught and held hers. She made no protest, no effort to withdraw when the first fluttering attempt met with resistance.

Her acquiescence puzzled him. It would have been more familiar ground if she had insisted upon withdrawing—the first time. It seemed rather as if she considered that a struggle wasn't worth while.

Why?

As if it were easier to consent than to argue.

Jim had never met with anyone who did not skirmish. It left him holding something he did not know what to do with.

In a situation of that sort one has to go forward or back. Jim leaned towards her—his lips approached hers. But she was talking, talking impersonally as if she had not noticed his presumption.

"The shadows are filling up the cañon. It will be cold here soon when the sun gets lower. Listen! You can hear little crackles in the heated rocks as they cool off."

Jim didn't know that she was afraid, afraid that he would, afraid that he wouldn't, and was merely speaking to keep her fear from showing. So he listened.

Sure enough, you could hear something. It was a little like the distant, muffled "typewriter" fire of machine guns.

Jim looked around as if he expected to see smoke puffs.

Sherry laughed. "You can't see anything but it is uncanny, isn't it?"

Crack!

Jim happened to be looking in the right direction or neither of them would ever have known what made that sound.

He saw one of the box-car shaped pieces of rock on the narrow shelf above them begin to move.

It seemed like an hallucination, a part of a nightmare. One doesn't expect to see a part of the eternal hills let go and topple before one's eyes. Yet it was really happening.

They were directly in its path. It would hit the slope at the bottom of the cliff and roll its crushing tons across the spot where they stood. It was too wide to be escaped laterally. Several seconds would be necessary for even a good sprinter to run clear and only a part of a second was left.

As an automobile driver Jim was accustomed to thinking in terms of split seconds.

He had been a football man. Also he had seen the effect of exploding shells.

He struck Sherry in the chest with his shoulder as he dived for her and rolled with his arms around her body alongside the deeply bedded granite fragment which they had used as a table.

There was a rush of air, a whistling sound, a rumble the rock in the lee of which they were resting jumped suddenly downwards as if it were headed for China, and then——

That was all.

V

SHERRY was knocked out, unconscious, but only from the blow that Jim had himself delivered in throwing her to a place of safety.

He held her in his arms for a moment studying her face.

"Now, Sherry MacNeil," he said finally, "we're even at last. I've saved your life and squared accounts. After this I don't have to fall in love with you unless I want to."

He started to draw her close enough to kiss her unconscious lips, held her a moment just so, and then let her sink back again.

"It wouldn't be fair," he decided out loud.

A little water sprinkled on her face would do no harm, he concluded. To make her comfortable while he was gone to the stream to bring it back he took off his coat and rolled it up into a pillow to place under her head.

As soon as he was gone Sherry opened her eyes and bolstered herself up on one elbow, not so very dazed. In fact there was rather a happy look in her eyes.

She caught sight of a piece of paper that lay by the edge of her skirt, a bit of newspaper cut out neatly along the column, evidently a clipping that had fallen from Jim's pocket when he had rolled up his coat.

Sherry picked it up idly. Jim Danger's name in it caught her eye. She read the item through hastily and then, with a sigh, placed it in the inside pocket of the coat, which she rolled up again just as it had been.

Jim returned to find her staring wide-eyed at the blue sky above her. He threw away the now useless water which he had brought in his cap.

"That was a narrow escape for both of us," declared Sherry.

"You know it. One-tenth of a second more and we would have been killed."

"That wasn't what I meant. I was referring to what happened afterwards—before you went for the water."

Jim colored.

"Were you conscious?"

Sherry smiled. "Not quite. I was making up my mind whether to come to or not."

Jim: "Would you have been sorry if I had kissed you?"

He threw aside all pretense of not understanding her meaning.

Sherry: "It would not have been right."

"Why not?" Bluntly.

For reply she fished out of her bosom by a chain which she wore around her neck a rather old-fashioned gold locket which she opened and held toward him for inspection.

It contained a small photograph of a young man in the once familiar uniform of the A. E. F.

"Your sweetheart?" he questioned.

"The man I love," she replied.

"Dead?"

"Missing. But I know he will come back to me."

There seemed nothing further to say. Jim felt that already he had intruded too far on a private grief. Constancy such as Sherry's was rare in this day and age. He could do no less than respect it even if he could not share her optimism about the return of her missing loved one. It had been nearly five years since the war was over, too long for an ordinary hope to continue to exist.

He was glad that he hadn't kissed her. The whole thing was straightened out now. He was square with her, he had traded life for life and could go on about his own affairs.

It was the best way.

Only he wished he didn't feel a sort of an indefinable regret.

Regret for what?

VI

PATSY MAY KELLER was at the ranch house when they returned. She was being entertained by Chicken Doyle, who had apparently given her a very complete account of the adventure from beginning to end.

"I seem to have arrived just in time," she said upon meeting Sherry.

"Oh, Jim is completely out of danger!" Sherry assured the film beauty.

"He is now that I'm here," Patsy May concurred maliciously. "Jim, how soon can I take you back to civilization?"

"Right away," Jim decided.

It took no thought on his part to realize that it would be a hopeless situation to have Patsy May around pretending to be jealous even if there was no cause for it.

Besides, he didn't want to stay there any longer himself under the circumstances.

Chicken volunteered to drive the car the rest of the way to L. A. so there was no reason why Jim couldn't go with Patsy on the train as she wanted him to.

Doctor Dan agreed that it was all right for Jim to travel and even offered to take them over to town to the train in his moth-eaten flivver.

Patsy May was a lot more cheerful as soon as they got away from the MacNeil place. Her light was dampened considerably at the ranch. Sherry's presence cramped her style.

Patsy was an artist at love making and she used her smoothest wiles on Jim on the way to town. He couldn't help contrasting them, though, with the tantalizing, cool indifference of the girl he had left behind waving farewell from the doorway of an adobe house, the girl who had said after "Good by":

"I'm almost sorry you lost your nerve while I was unconscious."

LUCKY STRIKE CIGARETTE

It's toasted

This one extra process gives a delightful quality that cannot be duplicated

Guaranteed by
The American Tobacco Co.
INCORPORATED

Sherry certainly had a way of leaving an itching spot in a man's memory.

What would her lips have been like?

VII

AT THE railroad station a young man got off from the very Pullman they were about to board.

"Wait a minute, folks," requested Doctor Dan, who was right there to see the last of them. "Here's someone you ought to know. Miss Keller and Mr. Danger, shake hands with Mr. MacNeil, Sherry's brother, who has been up to Santa Fé ever since you've been here."

Jim shook hands dazedly with the now robust young man. He was still trying to figure things out after he was on board the train moving west.

The young man he had just met was the original of the portrait he had seen in Sherry's locket.

Her brother!

Why had she let him believe it was the picture of a sweetheart?

VIII

THERE was a letter waiting for Jim at the Los Angeles Clegg Agency. It was from J. P. Clegg himself and he wanted to know if Jim cared to be one of two drivers to try, in a Clegg Four, to break the world's transcontinental record, just established by the Crossland.

It wasn't to be a race—merely a contest against time. Evidently the Crossland people were getting under the old man's skin a trifle and he just had to have something in the nature of a comeback for their jibes.

Jim, all enthusiasm, sprung the letter on Patsy May.

"You wouldn't do it?" she exclaimed.

"Why not? Automobile driving is my business."

"But, Jim, you can't be away that long. I want you here."

"I'm not a lap dog," growled Jim.

"No, but you're going to marry a—ahem—a famous woman who is going to need all of your attention."

"You don't expect me to sit back and do nothing for the rest of my life?"

"I don't see why you can't get a nice job in an office where I can call you up and tell you where and when to meet me for luncheon."

Part of what Patsy said was kidding because Patsy had a sense of humor, but there was just enough serious purpose back of it so that when Jim wouldn't give up the idea she made an issue of it.

When Jim went to New York to confer with J. P. Clegg his near-engagement was at an end.

No one's heart was broken, though.

Patsy May had her art.

And Jim had ideas.

Nebulous, teasing ideas.

IX

JIM left the post office in New York City at midnight with a mail pouch containing one lone, solitary letter for the Mayor of Los Angeles. Traffic had slowed down by that time. It was essential not to get arrested or to cause an accident in getting out of the big city.

Once across the river and out of Newark, zip! they went through New Jersey like lightning. Pennsylvania slipped under the wheels, too, that same night. King Tenny, the alternate driver, took her through Baltimore and across the Cumberlands. The roads were still good. Ohio came and went. Indiana too. Illinois. Concrete road. Seventy-eight miles an hour. St. Louis. Dirt roads through Missouri but not such slow traveling when dry. Hello, Kansas, and good by. A snatch of Colorado, scarcely noticeable under the wheels.

Raton, New Mexico, and the hard part of the test is begun. Slower pace through Santa Fé, Albuquerque, Gallup, slower but still breakneck and five times as fast as any tourist drives the old Santa Fé Trail.

The Clegg Four is forty minutes ahead of schedule. If she can hold the pace she can clear the Crossland record by a nice margin.

The Arizona State line. The driver of the racing car increases the speed. Then he slows down. He is looking for something.

He finds it.

It is on a horse standing by the roadside and it has a flag to wave to him as he goes by.

But he doesn't go by. He pulls up near the horse and lifts the goggles from his dirty face, revealing two white spots around the eyes. He is a terrible looking creature.

But the girl on horseback apparently recognizes him because she smiles a slow, cool, tantalizing smile and greets him in a throaty voice, a bronze bell with a clank in it.

"Hello, Jim."

"I hoped you'd be down to watch me go through."

"You knew I'd be here."

"I met your brother." Apropos of nothing.

She colored.

"He told me."

"Are you ever going to lie to me again?"

"I didn't lie—exactly. I merely let you draw a wrong conclusion—for your own good."

"Are you ever going to do even that again?"

"No—not unless it's necessary—for your own good."

"Anything to do this afternoon?"

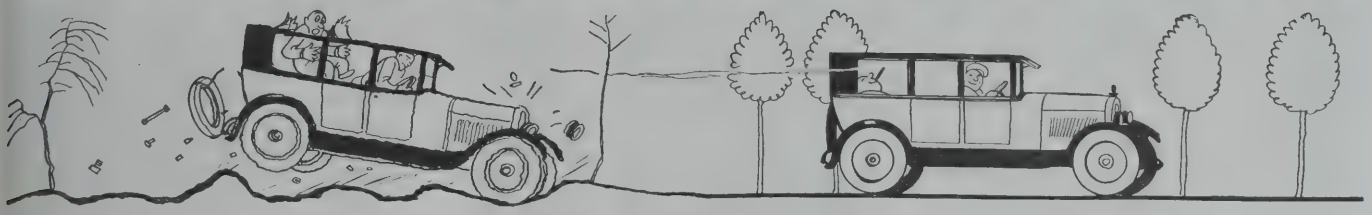
"Nothing special. Why?"

"Chicken, give the lady your seat and take her horse back to the stable."

Chicken was out obeying orders almost before Jim ceased speaking.

Sherry demurred.

"Can't wait. Pile in! Argue afterward," Jim ordered. "Got to break a record this afternoon."



And they did.

Their first kiss was exchanged going forty-three miles an hour.

Which is very fast for that part of the country.

You will find the full humor and flavor of Frank R. Adams in his next story, plus an unconventional situation that will reach you right where your heart lies. See COSMOPOLITAN for May, on sale at all news stands April tenth.

Turn Bad Roads Into Good Roads!

DO YOU jolt your way over the streets and roads in your city and vicinity — cursing the commissioners at every bump?

Or is your motoring path made pleasant by well built, well kept highways?

Poor highways are not only a constant trial to every motorist, but they are a bad advertisement for the community itself.

Responsibility for the turning of bad roads into good largely rests with the motorists.

They are, in most cases, the leading citizens of every community. Their influence counts heavily, both as individuals, and in organizations such as local motor clubs.

Poor roads mean more to them than to people who don't own cars. It may be a selfish viewpoint, but the fact that bad roads mean a higher maintenance cost for their automobiles is, or should be, a consideration.

So, if you are a car owner, resolve that in 1923 you will do your share toward bettering road conditions.

Join in any movement that will bring the right sort of pressure on the highway commissioners.

If it is your privilege to vote for the office of commissioner, be sure to cast your ballot for the most progressive, the most honest candidate, regardless of party.

And last, but not least, don't protest against the extra taxes. You'll benefit from this taxation in the long run.

No other national magazine offers the motorist so much in the way of service as does Cosmopolitan. The motoring service department will give you all kinds of general advice in the maintenance and operation of your car. Write for:

Technical Information.
Advice on the Purchase of a New Car.
The Resale Value of Your Old Car.

Be sure to send a self addressed stamped envelope for your reply. Every inquiry receives personal attention.

A two cent stamp will bring you catalogs and instruction books of any standard make of cars.

You Need These New Motoring Booklets

There are many new features in Cosmopolitan Motoring Library for 1923. There are some new booklets; some of the old ones have been completely rewritten, and there are many revisions in all of them.

Write today for your complete set—or check the numbers of those you want on the coupon. Four cents each postpaid.

No. 1—Better Winter Driving.
No. 2—Selection and Care of Tires and Tubes.
No. 3—The Car's Electrical Equipment.
No. 4—Engine Carbonization.
No. 5—Motoring As A Cure For Nervous Disorders.
No. 6—Your Storage Battery.
No. 7—Brakes and Brake Relining.
No. 8—Chassis Lubrication. Tables giving oil capacities of transmission and rear axle.
No. 9—Advice On The Purchase of A New Or Used Car. Includes new prices on all models.
No. 10—Oil Pumping—How To Cure It.
No. 11—Spark Plugs. With complete table of spark plugs sizes used in 1923 cars.
No. 12—How To Become A Good Driver.
No. 13—What Makes The Engine Overheat.
No. 14—Getting The Most Power From Your Engine.
No. 15—Things The Tourist Should Know.
No. 16—Curing Engine Misfiring.
No. 17—The Vacuum System—How It Works.
No. 18—How To Stop Clutch Slipping.
No. 19—Lighting and Lighting Troubles. New Table.
No. 20—Motor Car Insurance.
No. 21—Better Service For Less Money.

4 cents each postpaid.

Cosmopolitan's Motoring Service

COSMOPOLITAN'S MOTORING SERVICE
19 West 40th Street, New York City

Enclosed is.....in stamps for which send me Booklets Nos.....
.....
.....
My car is.....
Name .....
Address .....

I would like to know the approximate resale value of my car.

Make..... Model.....
Year..... Miles Driven.....

ALCOHOL
as intended by law

WHEN our legislators prohibited alcohol for beverage purposes, the very important and beneficial external use of alcohol was wisely provided for.

As a matter of fact MIFFLIN Alkohol, the external tonic, is one of the most useful health and toilet articles to be found in any household.

Not only is it the most invigorating and refreshing of body massages (eminent physicians and osteopaths prescribe it for this) but cooling, comforting MIFFLIN Alkohol brings external relief to any number of ills.

MIFFLIN is alcohol at its best. It is actually improved for external purposes by the same process that unfits it for internal use.

A wonderful lotion that cools tender, burning skin and warms chilled, congested areas. Soothing, odorless, colorless — free from oily stickiness. Like talcum — you need MIFFLIN Alkohol every day.

Special Offer

At last alcohol has found its rightful place. To prove this to you, to show you the amazing number of comforts corked in this almost magic bottle, we suggest that you secure the 25c introductory size from your druggist.

MIFFLIN CHEMICAL CORPORATION
Philadelphia, Pa.

MIFFLIN ALKOHOL
(MASSAGE)
the external tonic

Colleen Moore, Goldwyn Star, famous for her expressive eyes.

The Girl with the Wonderful Eyes

ARE you that girl—the charming person who fascinates by a mere glance? You could be, if you had long dark lashes to emphasize the depth of your eyes.

Use WINX, the Liquid Lashlux. It will bead your lashes and make them appear darker and heavier. Easily applied with the glass rod attached to the stopper, it lasts all day, unaffected even by swimming or weeping at the theatre. Absolutely harmless.

WINX, the Liquid Lashlux (black or brown) 75c. To nourish the lashes and promote their growth, apply Cream Lashlux at night. Cream Lashlux (black, brown or colorless) 50c. At drug or department stores, or by mail.

Send a dime for a sample of WINX, the Liquid Lashlux. And for another dime we will mail you a sample of Pert, the waterproof rouge.

ROSS COMPANY
74 Grand Street New York

WINX
The Liquid Lashlux

Miracles

(Continued from page 71)

"My watch keeps splendid time. But why? Is there anything I can do? Please ask me. I haven't a thing to do. I'm a stranger in Monterey. And I've just been seeing the sights. It's so beautiful here. I'd no idea. I wish you'd tell me if there's anything I can do."

"My uncle," said the girl, "who took care of me died day before yesterday. They've taken him to Castroville to bury him. When they come back we're going to decide what is to become of me . . . I can't work and there isn't any money. I don't even own this house."

Ruddy pulled a chair close to hers and sat down.

"Are they—the people I saw here awhile ago—relatives?"

She shook her head.

"Just neighbors. We didn't even know them well. We hadn't lived here very long. They are kind hearted people; but they are poor people and they don't want to be bothered with me."

"Haven't you any idea what you'll do?" Ruddy asked.

And he wished that he was at once a magician and a millionaire.

"I suppose," she said, and it took a lot of courage to say it calmly and sweetly, "that I'll have to go to some institution."

Ruddy groaned inwardly.

"Why can't you walk?" he asked. "What's wrong?"

"Nobody seems to know exactly," she said. "I just can't. I had scarlet fever and then I couldn't walk . . . We had some money then; but my uncle gave it all to doctors. He was a good man. He did his very best . . ."

Ruddy was rapidly finding himself face to face with his first really strong temptation. It was the kind of temptation which older and wiser men than Ruddy sometimes yield to. There had been brought to his notice a fellow creature, young, charming, beautiful, helpless and penniless. And the temptation was upon him to play Providence.

"Don't worry," he wanted to say. "Everything will be all right. You shan't go to an institution. I'll take care of you."

If he had felt perfect confidence in his ability to take care of her and to keep her from being sent to an institution he would have made the promise. But he had neither the means nor the experience which promotes confidence. At the same time he had to say something—do something. He couldn't go out of her life with a "Well, it's too bad, but don't worry, probably everything will come out all right. Good by." He couldn't. He felt that he had to make her some offer of personal service and sacrifice—even if it wasn't very much.

It was at this moment that he first began to wonder if the miracle man at San Juan was only a faker or if once in a while he actually did effect a cure, as all the applause and excitement had indicated. Now the wish to believe is the father and mother of belief, and Ruddy began to wish that the girl could see the miracle man and be touched by him and commanded to walk.

Then he told her about the miracle man.

"I couldn't get very close," he said, "but he people in the front rows who actually saw the cures—they believed. And all he sick people who were trying to get to he miracle man believed. I don't know what you think about such things, but hey sure did happen in Bible times and suppose there's no reason why they houldn't happen now . . . In one place here was a big pile of crutches—people who'd been lame all their lives had thrown hem away—no more use for them."

He did not wish to arouse false hopes n her breast. He gave a sincere and honest account of his own impressions and his own skepticism. But the girl's eyes began to gleam with excitement. In the telling American of it, Ruddy had "sold" her the miracle man.

He perceived this and said: "Don't count too much on him. Maybe he can't cure everybody . . . But—it's only an hour and a half run in my car . . . There's no harm in trying . . . It's too late today—but if you say so I'll come around first thing tomorrow morning and I bet I'll get you to him no matter how thick the crowd is . . . I played halfback on my college team and somehow or other we'll get through . . . Will you go?"

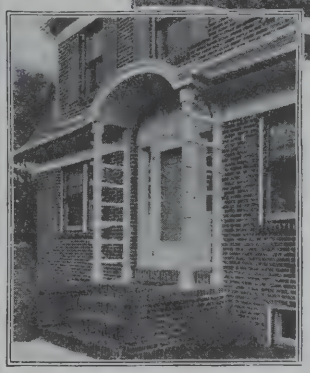
She did not say "Yes. I will go." She looked at him in an adoring, worshipful kind of way and said:

"Oh please take me—please—please take me!"

III

If the young people had taken the trouble to read a copy of the Monterey Herald or the Cypress they would have saved themselves the long run to San Juan and return. They would have learned that the miracle man and the apostles with the gold-rimmed spectacles had been arrested and locked up on a number of charges such as vagrancy and conspiracy to defraud. They would have learned that the miracle man himself was suffering from a frightful cold in the head and a loosening of the vocal cords, accompanied by an almost total loss of his singsong voice, and that of this condition he found it quite impossible to cure himself.

But the young people would not willingly have been spared that long run in the bright fresh weather.



Ruddy had lifted the girl bodily out of her chair and carried her out to the car. All the way to San Juan and return he looked forward to lifting her once more, and having her thus for a little while in his arms.

All night she had been either in his conscious or in his subconscious mind. The feeling grew and grew in him that he had discovered an exquisite jewel, which because nobody claimed it belonged to him and was his to cherish and take care of.

When they reached San Juan and learned about the miracle man the girl was bitterly disappointed. Two very big tears came slowly out of her eyes and ran down her cheeks. But Ruddy bought sandwiches and hot coffee and brought them to her in the car, and comforted her.

"Suppose," he said, "that there was always going to be a car to ride in and somebody to lift you in and out of it? You should worry!"

A. F. B. A. House No. 628
at Park Ridge, Illinois
This is one of the ninety-six attractive designs shown in "Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans"

A·F·B·A USE FACE BRICK
—it Pays

Basic Values in Home-Building

OTHER materials have their merits and make their appeal, but looking at the home-building problem on all sides, no other material approaches Face Brick in the structural and artistic values it offers—permanence, comfort, safety from fire, economy, and beauty. Every home-builder will find it worth while to investigate Face Brick before he builds. The facts are given in "The Story of Brick." For your copy, address, American Face Brick Association, 1744 Peoples Life Building, Chicago, Illinois.

Send for these booklets:

"The Story of Brick" is an attractive booklet with beautiful illustrations of modern homes, and discusses such matters as Comparative Costs, Basic Requirements in Building, The Extravagance of Cheapness, and kindred subjects. Sent free.

"Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" embrace 96 designs of Face Brick bungalows and small houses. These houses are unusual and distinctive in design, economical to build, and convenient in floor plan. "Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" are issued in four booklets, showing 3 to 4-room houses, 5-room houses, 6-room houses and 7 to 8-room houses. The entire set for one dollar; any one of the books, 25 cents. We can supply complete working drawings at nominal prices.

"The Home of Beauty" contains fifty designs of Face Brick houses, mostly two stories, representing a wide variety of architectural styles and interior arrangements. The houses were selected from 350 designs submitted in a nation-wide Architectural Competition. Sent for 50 cents. We also distribute complete working drawings for these houses at nominal cost.

"Orienting the House" is an illustrated booklet, with a sun dial chart and explanation for placing the house with reference to light and shade. Sent for 10 cents.

LOFTIS BROS. & CO. EST'D 1858

We import Diamonds direct from European markets and sell direct to you by mail. Our immense BUYING POWER is a great saving to you.

DIAMONDS WATCHES CASH or CREDIT

"Charlotte" Diamond Ring
Five radiant, blue white, perfect cut Diamonds. The ring is platinum.
$150
Others at $200 and $250

SEND FOR CATALOG
Bargains in Diamond-set Jewelry, Watches, Wrist Watches, Pearls, Mesh Bags, Silverware, etc. Sent prepaid for your Examination. Easy Credit Terms. Catalog explains everything.

Wrist Watch
Rectangular Shape
18-K Solid White Gold, 17 Jewels, $39
14-K Solid White Gold, 15 Jewels, $32
MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

Credit Terms on all articles; One-fifth down, balance divided into equal payments within eight months. Your credit is good with LOFTIS

LOFTIS BROS & CO. EST'D 1858
THE NATIONAL JEWELERS
Dept. M-892 108 N. State St.
CHICAGO, ILL.
Stores in Leading Cities

$3 DOWN Brings you a genuine

UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER

Latest model—Shipman-Ward rebuilt like new. Shipped anywhere on ten days' free trial—only $3 down. If you can tell it from a brand new machine in looks, action or quality of work we'll refund every cent paid by you. Below factory price. Guaranteed five years. Unbeatable easy payment proposition.

Send for Our Free Book
A postal will bring you our big typewriter book in colors and gold—FREE. Every step in famous rebuilding process illustrated and explained. Let us show you how you can save real money. Write now—no obligation.

Shipman-Ward Mfg. Co.
Typewriter Emporium
2074 Shipman Bldg.
Montrose and Ravenswood Avenues,
Chicago

57

Heinz Baked Beans

taste different. They are different. Different from the first careful selection of choice, hand-picked beans down to the last step of oven baking and blending with Tomato Sauce and Pork. A perfect meal. Make them the staple dish in your home eating. Just heat and serve.

HEINZ oven Baked Beans

The temptation to play Providence overcame him. Caution and commonsense fled. He wiped away her tears with his own handkerchief and when he had finished his hand was trembling.

"I'm going to take care of you," he said, "always." And he went on: "I knew it was up to me the minute I saw you and learned you had nobody. But I was scared to say so. I was scared that you'd never get to like me enough and that you'd rather go to some old institution. But you wouldn't—would you? . . . I've got a little ranch, lots of tiptop pear trees, and the cutest little house. But that's not enough for one man to take care of . . ."

"You're just sorry for me," the girl broke in, "and—and you're stuck with me and you feel that you've got to do something." She shook her head and loosened two more tears, and she said, "I won't do it."

"Well," said Ruddy, "just let me return those dishes and we'll talk it over."

In a few moments he came back, cranked the car and climbed in. And as they pulled out of San Juan he said:

"Now we'll talk it over," and as the girl made no response he added, "I'll talk it over." And he did.

"You," he said, "have nothing to say about the matter. I'm sorry you can't jump and run and all that, but you can't, and that's why you can't even argue. I never liked any girl but you. I never thought any other girl was cute and pretty. I never wanted to be with any other girl. And now I've got you. You're in my power. If I choose to take you to my ranch and leave you there while I get a license, you can't help yourself. I suppose you could refuse to get married, as far as that goes, but I could keep you prisoner until you changed your mind. And you'd change your mind because I'd be so good to you you couldn't help it . . . The only trouble that I can see is that I like you and you don't like me . . ."

"I do!" she said suddenly.

"Yes—a lot! You like me so much that sooner than do exactly what I say you'd let them send you to an institution."

"The more I liked a man," said the girl, "the more I'd want to be fair to him—even if it hurt me."

The grade between San Juan and Salinas is very heavy, and the pace of the baby-blue flivver invited calm and reflection. For nearly half a mile of solid wild flowers Ruddy nursed his machinery, reflected and did not speak. Then the top of the pass being reached, he turned his car over to the one mechanism which never misses fire and whose clutch never slips—gravity—tested his brakes to see that all was well with them, leaned a little toward the girl and said:

"Suppose I take you at your word! Suppose I take you back to your house and carry you in and put you back in your chair and say good by and go away—and you know that I've gone away for good and all—what are you going to think, how are you going to feel? With no one to take care of you and no place to go?"

She started at once to answer him, but he cut her off short.

"You can't answer a question like that offhand," he said. "You've got to do some thinking and imagining. You've got to picture yourself back in that chair with the one person in the world who wanted to take care of you and work for you gone, and gone for good. You think hard."

Whether she thought hard or not is unknown. Probably she didn't, because usually people don't when they are told to; but she kept quiet and looked straight ahead of her for such a long time that Ruddy became worried. He was afraid that he had offended her. But he hadn't. For she said finally:

"This is honest truth. I've always dreamed that somebody like you would come along, and—and like me a lot, and take me away and be good to me. And in the dream I got well and was a wonderful help to him and we were always happier than other people . . . If you take me back to my house and go away and leave me I'll just die . . . But it isn't right for you to do anything else, and I won't let you."

He could not shake her determination. Her life was bound to be a mess anyway and she wasn't going to let him make a mess of his. She was stubborn, Ruddy thought, and unreasonable. By the time they had passed through Salinas and crossed the river and were well along the winding valley road to Monterey he believed that nothing would ever change her. And he was very unhappy.

He had begun the day with certain misgivings. He had not been sure of his own motives or sentiments. He had wondered if it was any feeling stronger than pity which had drawn him toward her. He was sure enough now. Pity was the least of his emotions.

He had found the one girl in the world for him. She was young, she was beautiful, she was good. He loved her immeasurably. He would always love her. And now that he had found her he was going to lose her.

He slowed the car and turned into a narrow dirt road.

"Mind if I have a squint at the ranch?" he asked. "It won't take long."

The first stretch of the dirt road was visible from the highway, then it passed between two rocky hills and became lost behind them.

They passed through the shade of some buckeyes, and in the sunshine beyond, blocking their progress, was coiled a large and probably a very amiable gopher snake. Ruddy, who hated the idea of hurting anything, stopped the car, dismounted and chased the snake into the bushes.

Then he climbed back into the car, but instead of putting it in gear he shut off the motor. The snake had given him a happy thought.

Nevertheless, though the thought was happy his young face looked rather white and stern.

He took the girl suddenly in his arms and held her tight and kissed her lovely face all over. At first she struggled quite desperately and almost frightened him into behaving himself. But just when fright was getting the better of him she stopped struggling and all her muscles relaxed.

If the struggling had frightened Ruddy rather badly, the next thing that happened frightened him much more. He felt her lips flutter against his. She had shut her eyes and kissed him back.

His arms loosened then, and he stopped kissing her. His voice when he spoke

They need not fade or yellow—washed this way your pretty blouses keep their color

They were the very last word in chic—your jacket blouse of demure printed crepe, that breezy slip-on model that went with you round the golf course, to say nothing of your costume blouse so rich in color!

And then—they had their very first laundering. Out they came a sorry, bedraggled sight. Colors streaked and faded, yellowed beyond all hope of salvaging.

Just one careless laundering can make any blouse lose its nice new look.

Don't let your pretty new blouses turn into old ones. Wash them with Lux. Follow the directions on this page—directions recommended by the maker of more than a million blouses.

Cut out this page and keep it. You will find you want to refer to it all the time.

No color too brilliant—no weave too frail

Colors that used to seem too difficult to launder, brilliant all-over patterns, even these are safe in Lux suds.

Lovely weaves—not to be resisted—come from these feathery suds with never a fragile thread fuzzed up or broken.

Not once but any number of times you can wash your pretty blouses with Lux without fear of harm to their freshness and color. Lux won't fade or streak them; it won't destroy the luster of beautiful silken fabrics or harm the soft finish of fine cottons. If your blouse is safe in water alone it is just as safe in Lux.

How to keep blouses from fading

Make sure that pure water alone will not harm your blouse.

Whisk a tablespoonful of Lux into a thick lather in half a washbowl of very hot water. Add cold water till lukewarm. Press suds repeatedly through garment. Use fresh suds for each color. Wash very quickly. Rinse in 3 lukewarm waters. Squeeze water out—do not wring. Roll in towel. When nearly dry, press with a warm iron—never a hot one. Be careful to press satins with the nap.

For their own protection—they recommend Lux

Belding Bros. & Co. Silks
Mallinson Silks
Roessel Silks
Skinner Satins
Forsythe Blouses
Vanity Fair Silk Underwear
Dove Under-garments
Model Brassieres
McCallum Hosiery
"Onyx" Hosiery
McCutcheon Linens
D. & J. Anderson Ginghams
Betty Wales Dresses
Mildred Louise Dresses
Pacific Mills Printed Cottons
North Star Blankets
Ascher's Knit Goods
Carter's Knit Underwear
Jaeger Woolens
The Fleisher Yarns
Orinoka Guaranteed Sunfast Draperies
Puritan Mills Draperies

Send today for free booklet of expert laundering advice, "How to Launder Silks, Woolens, Fine Cottons and Linens." Lever Bros. Co., Dept. 79, Cambridge, Mass.

The new way to wash dishes

Won't roughen hands

Lux for washing dishes! At last you can wash them without coarsening your hands. Even though they are in the dishpan an hour and a half every day, Lux won't harm them. It is as easy on your hands as fine toilet soap.

Just one teaspoonful to a pan is all you need! A single package does at least 54 dishwashings. Try it.

COOKS THREE THINGS AT ONCE

The most enjoyable kind of entertaining

YOU can prepare an informal supper on the Armstrong Table Stove right at the living-room table—crisp waffles, creamed oysters on toast, club sandwiches, or any tempting hot dish!

This remarkable stove cooks three things all at the same time. The heating unit is in two parts. You cook above, between and beneath—boil, broil, steam, fry, toast, and bake wonderful waffles! And the Armstrong Table Stove, with its distinctive square shape and snowy white enamel which heat does not tarnish, harmonizes with your nicest silver and china.

Ask to see an Armstrong Table Stove at your electrical or hardware dealer's. Price $12.50 with aluminum toaster, deep broiling pan, griddle, four egg cups and rack; and sparkless tilting plug which controls heat by lifting off—no tugging or pulling. Write for our folder, "A Week of Menus"—breakfast, lunch, afternoon tea, dinner and late supper for seven days.

THE ARMSTRONG MFG. CO.
Formerly The Standard Stamping Company
194 Seventh Avenue Huntington, W. Va.

WAFFLE IRON
A cast aluminum waffle iron which needs no greasing may be purchased separately for $4.00. It fits into the toaster compartment and makes beautiful, crisp waffles, browned on both sides at once.

ARMSTRONG
TABLE STOVE
Cooks 3 things at once

sounded quite rough and masterful, even in his own ears.

"You will be bad to me, will you?" he said. "And send me away! When I love you for keeps! And always will . . ."

His breath failed him.

He held her thereafter very snugly in his left arm and with his right hand he pressed her head against his breast and caressed it.

Another miracle had been accomplished and nothing more was said about institutions.

When Ruddy's mother and father heard that Ruddy had married a beggar maiden who couldn't walk they were terribly upset and angry. But when they had seen her drifting about Ruddy's little house in a wheel chair, and keeping house better than thousands of women who have nothing the matter with them except laziness, selfishness and stupidity, and when they had eaten the dinner she cooked for them, and heard her singing while she was cooking it, they changed their minds and their hearts toward her, and when they went back to their home town they boasted about her to all their friends.

The pear trees did splendidly that year. And there wasn't going to be any trouble about money.

There is just one more miracle to relate. And that miracle isn't the baby. The baby wasn't a miracle. He was just a natural, normal, rambunctious, powerful and somewhat self-willed and self-centered baby who reached this world of tears in a perfectly normal and natural way. But the chances are that he worked the miracle.

He was so young at the time that his happy little mother had not yet left her bed for her wheel chair, and he was in the next room being attended to by his father. Either Ruddy was clumsy or the baby believed the moment to be well chosen for self-assertion. Whatever the reason may have been, it is a fact that the baby suddenly began filling his healthy lungs with blasts of air and letting the same out in ear-splitting screeches.

Ruddy was badly rattled and badly in need of help. He gave one despairing look toward the door of the girl's room, and the look of despair changed to a look of wonder.

For the door had opened and the girl had opened it and was standing in the doorway. Standing!

She took two more steps—wobbly, drunken steps. And then Ruddy caught her in his arms and carried her back to her bed. They were both wildly excited, and the baby, left to his own devices, had stopped screeching.

"The moment he began to cry like that," she said, "I knew that I could get to him."

She was all out of breath and so was Ruddy.

"Isn't love too wonderful?" she said.

And Ruddy agreed that it was and he added something equally trite of his own.

"It's the only real miracle there is," he said.

Each of Gouverneur Morris's stories is new and surprising—as you will find the next one in an early COSMOPOLITAN

DREER'S
GARDEN BOOK 1923

TAKE the guesswork out of gardening. You can count on success with Vegetables and Flowers if you follow the directions in DREER'S 1923 GARDEN BOOK.

The most complete catalogue of Seeds and Plants published—an invaluable guide to both amateur and professional gardeners. A large book of 224 pages with 8 color plates and hundreds of photo-engravings of the latest novelties and standard varieties. Filled with cultural information compiled from DREER'S 85 years' experience and advice from famous experts.

It offers the best Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Lawn Grass and Agricultural Seeds, Garden Tools and Implements, Fertilizers, Insecticides, etc. Also Plants of all kinds, including the newest and best Roses, Dahlias, Hardy Perennials, Garden and Greenhouse Plants, Bulbs, Hardy Climbers, Hardy Shrubs, Water Lilies and Aquatics, Small Fruits, etc.

HENRY A. DREER
714-716 Chestnut Street
Philadelphia, Pa.

Write today for a copy, which will be mailed free if you mention this publication.

CASH'S WOVEN NAMES
Save Laundry Losses
3 doz. $1.50 6 doz. $2
9 doz. $2.50 12 doz. $3
Write for styles
Branch Factories: Los Angeles, Cal. Brantford, Ont.
J. & J. CASH, Inc. Ninth Street South Norwalk, Conn.

Moore Push-Pins
Glass Heads—Steel Points
Moore Push-less Hangers
To hang up things
Ask your dealer to show them
Sold Everywhere 10¢ per packet
Moore Push-Pin Co.
Wayne Junction Philadelphia

$14 in two hours!
That's what D. R. Kinport made — just taking orders for our Guaranteed Hosiery and Underwear—the most complete line in America. Write today for Sample Outfit and Sure Sales Plan.
Malloch Knitting Mills, 634 Hastings St., Grand Rapids, Mich.

Amazing Offer
Genuine
DIAMOND
PLATINUM RING

Send No Money!
This exquisite Solid Platinum Ring, set with a superior blue-white perfect cut Diamond, sent for examination and approval. If entirely satisfied, upon arrival pay only $10 — balance only $5.00 a month.

Blue-White perfect-cut diamond. SOLID PLATINUM mounting carved and pierced. SWEET'S Special, Price $65.

FREE Diamond Book. Thousands of other wonderful values in Diamonds, Watches and Jewelry shown in our newest 98-page diamond book. Send for a copy to Dept. 83-J.

THE HOUSE OF QUALITY
CAPITAL $1,000,000
L·W·SWEET INC.
1650-1660 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

Ukridge's Dog College

(Continued from page 64

saw you at your rooms my scheme was o specialize in performing dogs for he music halls—what you might call rofessional dogs. But I've been hinking it over and now I don't see why shouldn't go in for developing amateur alent as well.

"Say you have a dog—Fido, the house- old pet—and you think it would brighten he home if he could do a few tricks from ime to time. Well, you're a busy man, ou haven't the time to give up to teach- ng him. So you just tie a label to his ollar and ship him off for a month to the Jkridge Dog College, and back he comes, horoughly educated. No trouble, no orry, easy terms.

"Upon my Sam, I'm not sure there sn't more money in the amateur branch han in the professional. I don't see why ventually dog owners shouldn't send heir dogs to me as a regular thing, just s they send their sons to Eton and Vinchester.

"My golly, this idea's beginning to levelop. I'll tell you what—how would be to issue special collars to all dogs hich have graduated from my college? omething distinctive which everybody ould recognize? See what I mean? ort of badge of honor. Fellow with a og entitled to wear the Ukridge collar ould be in a position to look down on the loke whose dog hadn't got one. Gradually would get so that anybody in a decent ocial position would be ashamed to be een out with a non-Ukridge dog. The ning would become a landslide. Dogs ould pour in from all corners of the ountry. More work than I could handle. lave to start branches. The scheme's olossal. Millions in it, my boy! Mil- ons!"

He paused with his fingers on the handle f the front door.

"Of course," he went on, "just at present 's no good blinking the fact that I'm ampered and handicapped by lack of nds and can only approach the thing on small scale. What it amounts to, ddie, is that somehow or other I've got get capital."

It seemed the moment to spring the ad news.

"I promised him I wouldn't mention ," I said, "for fear it might lead to dis- ppointment, but as a matter of fact eorge Tupper is trying to raise some apital for you. I left him last night arting out to get it."

"George Tupper!" Ukridge's eyes immed with a not unmanly emotion. George Tupper! By gad, that fellow is ne salt of the earth. Good, loyal fellow! true friend. A man you can rely on. pon my Sam, if there were more fellows out like old Tuppy there wouldn't be l this modern pessimism and unrest. id he seem to have any idea where he uld raise a bit of capital for me?"

"Yes. He went round to tell your aunt out your coming down here to train ose Pekes and—— Why, what's the atter?"

A fearful change had come over

The Price

Of pretty teeth—Just film removed

Millions have found a delightful way to beautify the teeth. You see the results now wherever you look—in teeth you envy, maybe.

Perhaps no other creation ever did so much to enhance women's beauty. Or to bring about a better dental era. You owe yourself the test we offer here.

That dingy film

You can feel your teeth now coated with a viscous film. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Food stains, etc., discolor it. Then it forms dingy coats. Tartar is based on film.

Most teeth had film-coats under old methods, for old tooth pastes do not effectively fight film. Tooth troubles were constantly increasing, for film is their major cause.

Film holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Very few people, under old methods, escaped those film-caused troubles.

New methods found

To meet that situation dental science searched for ways to fight film. Two ways were finally discovered. One acts to curdle film, one to remove it, and without any harmful scouring.

Able authorities proved these methods effective. Then a new-type tooth paste was created, based on modern research. These two great film combatants were embodied in it.

The name of that tooth paste is Pepsodent. Now careful people of some fifty nations employ it, largely by dental advice.

Found other needs

Modern research also found two other things essential. So Pepsodent multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids, the cause of tooth decay.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise ferment and form acids.

Thus every use gives manifold power to these great natural tooth-protecting agents.

A delightful test

You will find a test delightful. And it will probably lead to life-long benefits, both for you and yours.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear. The results will amaze and delight you. Cut out the coupon now.

PAT. OFF.
Pepsodent
REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific film combatant, which whitens, cleans and protects the teeth without the use of harmful grit. Now advised by leading dentists the world over.

10-Day Tube Free 1086

THE PEPSODENT COMPANY,
Dept. 745, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Mail 10-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

.....

.....

Only one tube to a family

Deltah Pearls recreate all the Beauty of the true Orientals

Necklace SEVILLE

Illustrated above, splendidly exemplifies Deltah superiority. A new and super elegant quality of indestructible pearls. Safety clasp of white gold set with genuine diamond and genuine onyx—the very latest combination.

24 Inch $35

Other Deltah Necklaces

Carmen 24 inch $21
Elvira 24 inch $31
Martha 24 inch $51

Deltah PEARLS
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Hope Sapphires

Deltah Pearls are made by the producers of the Heller Hope Sapphires and Hope Rubies. These are true precious stones, identical with the fine, natural sapphires and rubies in every respect excepting origin and price. The reasonable cost of Hope stones places the everlasting beauty of the sapphire and the ruby within the reach of everyone. Your dealer will gladly show you jewelry mounted with Heller Hope Sapphires and Heller Hope Rubies.

L. HELLER & SONS, Inc.
358 Fifth Ave., New York
Paris—40, Rue Laffitte

Ukridge's jubilant front. His eyes bulged, his jaw sagged. With the addition of a few feet of gray whiskers he would have looked exactly like the recent Mr. Nickerson.

"My aunt?" he mumbled, swaying on the door handle.

"Yes. What's the matter? He thought if he told her all about it she might relent and rally round."

The sigh of a gallant fighter at the end of his strength forced its way up from Ukridge's mackintosh-covered bosom.

"Of all the dashed, infernal, officious, meddling, muddling, fat-headed, interfering asses," he said wanly, "George Tupper is the worst."

"What do you mean?"

"The man oughtn't to be at large. He's a public menace."

"But——"

"Those dogs belong to my aunt. I pinched them when she chucked me out!"

Inside the cottage the Pekingese were still yapping industriously.

"Upon my Sam," said Ukridge, "it's a little hard."

I think he would have said more, but at this point a voice spoke with a sudden and awful abruptness from the interio of the cottage.

It was a woman's voice, a quiet, steel voice, a voice, it seemed to me, that sug gested cold eyes, a beaky nose and hair lik gun metal.

"Stanley!"

That was all it said, but it was enough Ukridge's eye met mine in a wild surmis He seemed to shrink into his mackintos like a snail surprised while eating lettuce.

"Stanley!"

"Yes, Aunt Julia?" quavered Ukridg

"Come here. I wish to speak to you.

"Yes, Aunt Julia."

I sidled out into the road. Inside th cottage the yapping of the Pekingese ha become quite hysterical. I found myse trotting, and then—though it was a war day—running quite rapidly.

I could have stayed if I had wanted t but somehow I did not want to. Som thing seemed to tell me that on th holy domestic scene I should be an i truder.

What it was that gave me that impre sion I do not know—probably vision, the big, broad, flexible outlook.

As naturally as a spring bubbles water, the pen of P. G. Wodehouse bubbles cool, crisp humor. His next COSMOPOLITAN story is pure mental refreshment.

The Brinkerhoff Brothers

(Continued from page 79)

sister from Herculaneum, they dissolved into big fluffy tears. And there was great ado of removing the spectacles, which had become entangled in the veiling, and Oscar, who stood by, kept reaching out his hand and drawing it back.

She was his now. More than anything else he wanted to untangle Trina's spectacles from her wedding veil and fit them back on the dear little red welt on the bridge of her nose. That little red welt was his now. His hand kept moving backward and forward like a shuttle.

And already Henry, standing by, was hurting with the sense of his thirdness.

The Oscars went to housekeeping in a four room flat on Kennerly Avenue. There had been talk of a room for Henry. Trina, in fact, had marched up to his door one evening while Oscar stood at the foot of the stairs waiting, and knocked. Henry with his entire going to bed at loose ends since Oscar was remaining out on the porch so late, a-wooing, had already removed one shoe and was staring at the wall. The knock startled him and he limped to the door, opening it an inch.

"It's me, Henry. Trina."

He was horribly embarrassed and linked his foot in the white balbriggan sock up behind his knee.

"Oh!" he said. "Trina! Joost a minute. I'm in bed almost," and closed the door its half-inch.

"Never mind, Henry. I can say it from here." And then Trina began to recite, Oscar's eyes down at the foot of the stairs burning up against her back.

"Henry, we want you to come and live with us. We've got to know because we're going hunting tomorrow for a flat with the extra room."

It was a peculiar thing about Trina voice. Just say "Herculaneum" as if yo vocal chords were strung along your front bone and you have it. The rise to the antep nultimate syllable of Trina's home town co tained the full range of her vocal inflectio Poor Henry. Listening to her voi now, every shade of it started him tre bling. It was like tearing something close as his right side off of him, leavi him bleeding, that Oscar should go. wanted that room in Oscar's home. Wai ed it with a sob in his throat.

"Why, Trina," he said, "that's goot. abbreciate it. But young married coupl, it's an old saying, they got it best themselves."

"Now Henry, there's a room waiting you say the word."

If he said the word! He wanted to, it it stuck in his throat and the little grunts his breathing tumbled over themselv. He wanted more than anything he had ev wanted in his life, that room in the home his sharer of eloquent silences. But te plating on Trina's voice was so pitifu thin, and well, Henry knew, deep down his heart where he kept the little adder ca thought resolutely tucked away, that Os r and Trina should have found the flat wh his room in it first, and then swept, rat r than interrogated, him.

And so he stood rubbing his wh stockinged foot against the back of his g, wanting to say yes. Wanting to, ad instead only repeating what he hoped e would not accept from him.

"If I thought I wasn't in the way—"

"We've got to know, Henry. There a four room flat over on Kennerly just s s fine. But it's no trouble to look for a e room flat."

"O Trina, Trina," sighed poor Henry's heart.

"No trouble at all, Henry."

"I know that young married couples they like it best sometimes alone. I wouldn't be in the way, I could promise you that, only I'm afraid it's not right——"

And then for the first time Trina's voice lost its pie-pan shallowness and came out with heartiness.

"Well, Henry, I don't want to insist, you're so used to it here, but remember, that extra plate and knife and fork are always waiting for you on our table in our home. 'Always welcome' is our motto."

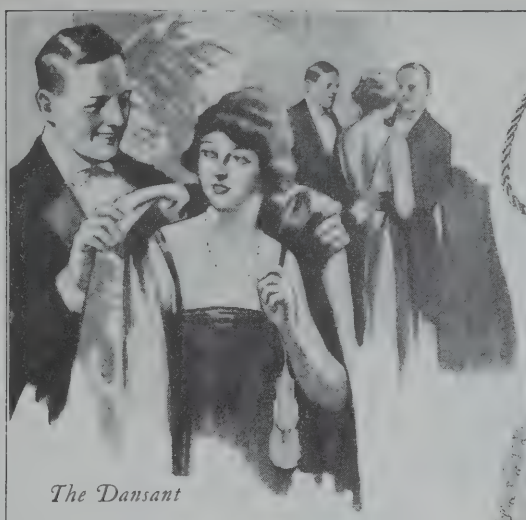
And Oscar at the bottom of the stairs, drunk on the phrases "our table," "our home," "our motto," had his little adder of discomfort too, but which he would not so much as let lift its head.

After all, both Trina and he had done their best. Henry's ways were set. But well the little adder down in Oscar knew—it knew.

Gaunt, lank, unlaughing Oscar. Life had been the color of horsehair and the smell of damp hassocks for him. He wanted his Trina in their flat where he could have her nearness for his very own.

And so the next day the four room flat in the two family house on Kennerly Avenue was rented and announced at the supper table to many a "Now aren't you sorry you turned us down," and "See now, Mr. Hoity Toity, what you're missing," flung merrily to Henry, who grunted and grunted as if he really believed the indictment.

And how Trina, who for almost the twenty-eight years of her life had lived with the married sister in Herculaneum, worn her cast-off clothing and cooked for a family of five and three farm hands, did blossom.



It was a pleasure to see her thin, nervous face pinken up, and because she had never in all her experience known the intoxication of handling money, she spent lavishly on the furnishings of the flat. A little too lavishly. There was a hundred and thirty-five dollar phonograph with a balcony front mahogany case for the parlor, and the dining room set, Mission finished oak with colored glass in the buffet doors, cost two hundred and seventy-five. And Trina could not resist a life size plaster negro boy, in such true to life ragged trousers you could almost want to mend the rents, and holding half a watermelon in the form of a card receiver, to stand between the folding doors.

But there was the five hundred dollar wedding present, half of his savings, from Henry's and Oscar's own nest egg which from the years of natural penury was nicely around a thousand, that could easily stand the strain.

And so they were married and Henry moved up to the third floor, in what Mrs. Burby called her "single gent room," and except that there was one collar and cuff box on the chiffonier now and the velvet framed photographs of the dead and buried Brinkerhoffs reposed on the Kennerly Avenue mantelpiece, there was not much change in the daily scheme of things for Henry Brinkerhoff.

Even the deceased Burby, who looked like Brigham Young, had followed him upstairs, and the red velvet rocker that bulged with old springs.

It was as natural that every act of

The Dansant

"Gifts That Last"

The Latest Whim of Paris

Paris originated and bestowed the favor of fashion upon the twin mesh bag, which Whiting and Davis now introduce to fashionable America in "The Dansant." A combination of smart daintiness—the little bag designed for the things one just never can find, and another a bit larger, joined by a silver cord. Entirely fascinating!

WHITING & DAVIS COMPANY
Plainville, Norfolk County, Massachusetts

Whiting & Davis MESH BAGS

In the Better Grades. Made of the Famous "Whiting" Soldered Mesh

"Now my skin's as smooth as satin"

"No more pimples, blackheads or boils. I've taken three bottles of Yeast Foam Tablets and for the first time in months my skin now is smooth as satin." Yeast Foam Tablets correct these skin ailments in the natural way—by reaching the root of the trouble and supplying the system with an element necessary to a correct diet and good health.

Made of whole, selected yeast. Easy to take; they keep and they don't cause gas. Unexcelled for appetite and digestion troubles. For adults and children, too. Sold by all druggists.

Made by the makers of Yeast Foam and Magic Yeast

Yeast Foam Tablets
A Tonic Food

Send for large free sample—Yeast Foam Tablets

*Your name*_____

*Address*_____

Mail coupon to Northwestern Yeast Company
1750 North Ashland Avenue, Chicago C-4

Alive!
Mademoiselle

Perfume?—hein. But living flowers, a living odeur! That, one must admit, is a rapier of another edge!

It is to live, Mademoiselle. And to let others know one lives.

From Lournay it comes, this miracle in perfume making.

A live odeur—the pulsating, tantalizing fragrance of living flowers for the first time imprisoned in articles de toilette!

VIVANTE

As different as life from existence—as the laughing vintages of France from the sombreness of the Italian! Vivante!—living flowers to contrast the artificiality of perfume.

Lournay

PARIS
7 Rue de l'Isly

NEW YORK
366 Fifth Avenue

You may obtain a small vial of Lournay Vivante by sending 15 cents to our American address.

1765

Henry's should fall into routine as it was that his Monday, Wednesday and Friday pipe should alternate with the remaining days of the week. It happened that his first dinner at the home of the Oscars was on a Friday evening, and thereafter, ticktock, Friday evenings it continued to be.

With this exception of the one evening a week, the old after-dinner intervals were his, pretty much as they had always been, tilted up against the house on his straight-back chair in summer and in the winter reading his Home Edition beside the gas lamp in the Burby reception hall.

He was quiet, and more than ever Henry had come to love the swoon-like depths of his silence.

Almost from the beginning things did not go so well with the Oscars.

In the first place, Oscar sprained a ligament in his leg the second month, reaching from a ladder to hang an oval picture with a convex glass to it, of Queen Louise on the stairs. Trina had bought it from a man at the door.

For the first time in twenty-one years Oscar missed a day on his route, but after that he hobbled with a cane and managed pretty well.

Then didn't the new hat rack in the hall do the top-heavy act of toppling over on a boy who was delivering some curtain rods from a neighborhood hardware store, breaking his collar bone and banging him up pretty badly. There was some talk of a law suit but Oscar settled finally for fifty dollars and almost an equal amount in doctor bills.

Well, that blew over, and when Henry came on his Fridays it was to find a state of beatitude that gave him the same hottish feeling he had experienced when Oscar had laughed that first morning and had shown his long, seldom exposed teeth. Positively, it was embarrassing to see Oscar's hand linger too long on Trina's if she so much as passed him the syrup jug.

Once he walked in on them playing clip-clap-clop with the palms of their hands, and another time at the supper table, when the electric current gave out and came on so suddenly that it revealed Oscar and Trina breaking apart from having taken advantage of the darkness to embrace, he was so embarrassed that he could scarcely look up again during the meal. Not so much for himself as for Oscar. Dark, narrow Oscar in this ridiculous plight. It was kinder somehow not to look.

And he didn't. As the months wore on, for every time that Oscar's hand lingered too long over the syrup jug, Henry would be assiduously looking out of the window, and when Trina stumbled once over a rug and landed plump in Oscar's lap, and, knowing Henry, to his supreme embarrassment, could not get up for laughing, Henry rose hastily from his chair to pretend to search for something among the uncut pages of Lives of Famous Men which Trina had bought at the door, on "monthlies."

It was after the first year that things turned not so good in earnest. Trina, true to Henry's unwitting prophecy, developed "bearing down pains." It was pitiful to see her newly acquired pinkiness recede and the circles and a little crop of water bubbles come out under her eyes. At first Harrison Fisher Is Working for You!

At an insignificant cost, you can make your walls beautiful with the latest and finest pictures from Harrison Fisher's magic brush.

"JANET"

No. K318

"TO HAVE and TO HOLD"

No. K312

Anybody who sees his wonderful Cosmopolitan covers from month to month must realize that he is at his best today! And Fisher's "best" is perfection.

"JEWELS"

No. K315

Send $2.50 today for selection of 12 pictures like these or 25c each—in their original brilliant colors—11x14 inches in size—printed on fine pebbled paper and ready for mounting. New catalogue, just out, containing a hundred little reproductions of pictures by Harrison Fisher, Maxfield Parrish, etc., for 10 cents.

Cosmopolitan Print Department
119 West 40th Street New York

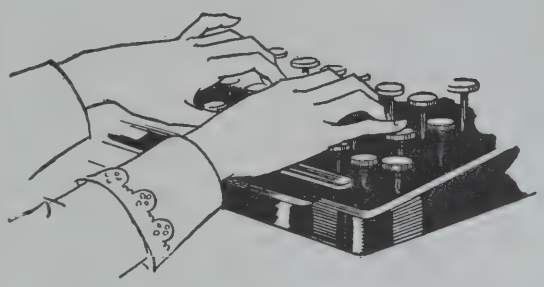
ıe tried the sample remedies thrown round at front doors by old men carrying anvas bags like sowers. It was no unsual thing for Oscar to come home and nd her with the potatoes peeled but not ying, sitting on the edge of the kitchen able poring over booklet testimonials om beneficiaries of this or that pill.

Pills. Trina was a great believer in their fficacy. But when these minor remedies iled, and Trina would pause in the midst f her sweeping to clutch at the small of er back, for all the world like the "before aking" pictures on the pamphlet, Oscar ook to bringing home drug store remedies. nce Mrs. Sydney on Newstead Avenue, ho had had an operation, recommended home brew of herbs and some sort of itters, giving Oscar the first herbs from er own store of them, and for a while it eemed that the mixture would do the ork; but one morning Trina just could ot get up until, as she put it, she had laid ome of the backache out of her—so Oscar repared his breakfast and hers and carried in to her and came off his route at eleven o see how she felt.

After that Trina no longer got up for reakfast and Oscar became quite adept t puttering over the stove, even taking a and at the evening meal while Trina was o poorly. Once while frying himself a iece of his invariable breakfast beefsteak, ıe gas stove exploded up into his face ith quite a report, but there was no damge and the stove was repaired. He learned ıe trick of corn bread too, tying one of rina's aprons about his waist and stirring or dear life.

Poor Trina. That first year or two she ied. Valiantly. Nailing up lace shelf aper with her face screwed with her comlaint. Surprising Oscar with the oilcloth n the stairs laid when he came home one vening. Gilding the imitation gas logs ı the imitation gas grate and running up o greet him that night all smelling, as scar put it when he kissed her between ıe smears of gilt, "just like a little anana."



And Trina loved being a little banana nd she loved her home and her sovereignty ver it. With a stack of unwashed dishes the sink and the bedroom pretty undy, she liked to putter in the parlor, ecure against the whanging voice of her ster, or the dirty little yanking fingers her nieces and nephews.

And how that parlor seemed to become naller and smaller as Trina jammed it ller and fuller. It came to have somehat the look of a small boy fairly ammed with bonbons and about to be ry uncomfortable.

Trina could no more withstand the ont door canvasser than she could o many of the cone-shaped chocolates hich Oscar brought her now, as he ed to bring them to Bettina. At r front door by the easy signing of a ip and fifty cents down, she negotiated r a dozen cabinet size photographs of rself with colored enlargement. "Little t" carpet sweeper came that way, and course the Queen Louise and the Lives Great Men. Also a brown pottery rdinière which contained her rubber tree, glossy leaved beauty which she tended e a baby, washing the leaves in milk to ake them shine.

Then the sick headaches set in. "Sikdicks" as Henry came horridly to know

Ball-Bearings Throughout

Ten thousand times a day the sensitive nerves at your finger tips get that jolting shock. No wonder typists welcome a lighter touch, an easier action.

That's what makes the SMITH eat up the day's correspondence

The L. C. Smith Typewriter is ball-bearing throughout. Its carriage runs on balls; each of its type-bars have fifteen glass-hard ball-bearings; its shift is ball-bearing; every point ordinarily subject to friction in a typewriter has had that friction reduced to almost nothing in an L. C. Smith.

WHAT time does that "Five o'Clock Feeling" reach you? Is it one, two, three hours before its time? Ten to one it's the fault of the typewriter you are using. Those ten thousand jolting shocks, one each time a key was struck, have been getting in their work.

It is toward the end of the day that you'll best appreciate all that the L. C. Smith means to efficiency and nerves. The ball-bearing mechanism gives an almost human naturalness to the fingering. Smooth, light-running, it eats up your day's work. Swifter, silenter and sturdier, it makes the day easier.

A booklet, "The Greyhound of the Office," explains in detail. Just write for a free copy.

L.C.Smith

Swifter ~ Silenter ~ STURDIER

L. C. SMITH & BROS. TYPEWRITER CO., Dept. C, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

5-Room House $538

You can buy all the materials for a complete home direct from the manufacturer and save four profits on the lumber, millwork, hardware and labor.

7 ROOM HOUSE $1068

Prices quoted include all lumber cut to fit, windows, doors, woodwork, glass, paints, hardware, nails, lath and roofing. Complete drawings and instructions. Many styles to choose from.

Highest grade lumber for all interior woodwork siding and outside finish. Send today for money-saving Aladdin Catalog No. 788.

The ALADDIN Co., BAY CITY, MICHIGAN

Also Mills and Offices at Wilmington, North Carolina; Portland, Oregon; and Toronto, Ontario

Elinor Glyn says-

"Thousands who don't dream they can write really can. YOU have ideas for stories and photoplays—why don't you turn them into cash? There are just as many stories of human interest right in your own vicinity as there are in Greenwich Village or the South Sea Islands. And editors will welcome a story or photoplay from you just as quickly as from any well-known writer if your story is good enough. They will pay you well for your ideas, too—a good deal bigger money than is paid in salaries. You can accept my advice because millions of copies of my stories have been sold. My book, Three Weeks,' has been printed in every tongue, except Spanish. My photoplays are known to millions. I do not say this to boast, but merely to prove that you can be successful without being a 'genius.' I believe thousands of people can make money in this absorbing profession. I believe this so firmly that I am going to show YOU how easy it is when you know how. Simply write to my publishers, The Authors' Press. They will send you a handsome little book called 'The Short-Cut to Successful Writing.' This book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge—no obligation. Write for it NOW." Just address Elinor Glyn's publishers:

THE AUTHORS' PRESS, Dept. 82, Auburn, N.Y.

AGENTS WANTED—to handle a high-grade tourists' auto camping outfit. Easily carried on running board; shelters 5 people. This is a proposition for only the highest type of agents, who can really SELL our product. Address

DRI-KAMP CO.
Dept. B. 218 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago.

Deaf Can Hear Says Science

New Inventions Aid Thousands

Here's good news for all who suffer from deafness. The Dictograph Products Corporation announces the perfection of a remarkable device which has enabled thousands of deaf persons to hear as well as ever. The makers of this wonderful device say it is too much to expect you to believe this so they are going to give you a chance to try it at home. They offer to send it by prepaid parcel post on a ten-day free trial. They do not send it C. O. D.—they require no deposit—there is no obligation.

They send it entirely at their own expense and risk. They are making this extraordinary offer well knowing that the magic of this little instrument will so amaze and delight the user that the chances of its being returned are very slight. Thousands have already accepted this offer and report most gratifying results. There's no longer any need that you should endure the mental and physical strain which comes from a constant effort to hear. Now you can mingle with your friends without that feeling of sensitiveness from which all deaf persons suffer. Now you can take your place in the social and business world to which your talents entitle you and from which your affliction has, in a measure, excluded you. Just send your name and address to them from Trina's pronunciation. The surest barometer of Trina's state of head came to be the fold of flesh between Oscar's eyes.

The Dictograph Products Corporation, 1305 Candler Building, New York,
for descriptive literature and request blank.

When the brothers met, as they did each morning at the livery stable for their horses and runabouts, Henry could tell at a glance by that worried furrow if the cloud of one of Trina's all too frequent sikkedicks hung over the land.

"Not so goot with Trina today," was about Oscar's summing up of it, or, if it happened to be Friday: "You should stop by at Finney's for the bread tonight, Henry. I'll bring some smelts from the community market. Trina's got sikkedick."

And off they drove in opposite directions, the long narrow buggies somber as deacons and in a way distinctly resembling the brothers themselves. Oscar with the worried dent between his eyes. Henry settling down low in his seat lulled with the sedative order of his life. More and more as the sense of his brother's eruptive little home, with the sink of unwashed dishes and Trina often with her hair in a pug and her shoes slattern, began to grow on him, Henry clung to the simple geometry of his scheme of things. The long identical evenings. Seven-thirty breakfasts with never an ado. The little room with the burnt wood collar box and the alternate pipe airing on the window sill. Nobody's headache.

Henry, whose loyalty to his brother was like a non-drip candle that burned a perfect cone-shaped flame, long and unwavering and white, came to castigate himself soundly for his many invading states of mind toward Trina.

For instance, he wanted honestly and whole-heartedly to sympathize with her "sikkedicks" although he had never experienced one and could not remember that his little mother had ever sallowed under the complaint; it was evidently a malady that could wrack the victim and cast him aside like a rag doll. But for the life of him Henry could not help a major sensation of disgust when he arrived at the flat to find Trina with her eyes looking spilled and the lids just far enough over the pupils to rob them of any expression whatsoever. Sort of like a baby's who sleeps with his eyes not quite closed.

How that "sikkedick" predominated the house! Henry could feel it when he set foot on the lowermost step. The smell of camphor or witch-hazel or whatever it was that Trina daubed up her brow with. Oscar, tiptoeing clumsily over boards that creaked under rugs, and looking outlandish in the gingham apron about his middle as he puttered away at supper. Trina in the unæsthetic headcloth, pinned over with a safety pin in back and forever holding on to the small of her back as if she were broken and in danger of falling in two parts.

Deep dyed disgust of her filled Henry. There was something not nice about her "heddicks." Something almost not—clean. People with decent reticences didn't have them, or at least if they did never dragged them about in public that way. There was something that offended Henry horribly about her sick eyes and the way she would grab up Oscar's hand suddenly and press it to her brow. Oscar sitting meanwhile stiff and embarrassed and going on with his other hand at whatever he was the one best glycerine soap

Since 1860

THE bath room or wash room which contain a cake of No. 4711 White Rose Glycerine Soa is made luxurious by that one touch alone! Suc a delightful sensation of mildness in its us Such a faint, agreeable perfume and richness creamy, purifying lather! Take a cake hom to-day,—or a box. Your favorite shop has it.

No. 4711 White Rose Glycerine Soap

Enjoy Also!

No. 4711 Eau de Cologne—the genuine ol fashioned Cologne water, made the same sin 1792—and

No. 4711 Bath Salts—which come in seven e quisite perfumes. Nothing like these Salts f softening the water and exhilarating the bathe

MULHENS & KROPFF, Inc.
25 W. 45th St. New Yo
Made in U. S. A.

Teach Your Child at Home by Our Novel Plan

and give him practically the same educational advantages he would have were he in attendance at the best private day school. Write, Calvert School, 4 Chase St., Baltimore, Md.

PATENTS. INVENTORS should write Free Guide Books and RECO OF INVENTION BLANK before disclosing inv tion. Send model or sketch of your invention for Free opinion of its patentable nature.

VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
753 Ninth St. Washington, D.

His mind is kee his eyes alert

He is always ready to tackle any job. He finishes it quickly, and without complaint. He rates as a "go-getter" because he keeps himself fit. He sees to it that constipation never slows him up. Are you as careful of your health as he? You will find that Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets are a matchless corrective. Made of pure vegetable ingredients mixed with olive oil, you will know them by their olive color. They are a safe substitute for dangerous calomel and form no harmful habit. Price 15 and 30 cents, at all druggists.

Dr. Edwards'
OLIVE Tablets

I Guarantee You Results Worth $1000.00 in One Year

Money talks! No matter what business you're in, or how much you are earning, I absolutely GUARANTEE you at least $1000 value within one year—or it won't cost you a cent! If you want the proof—entirely free—simply mail the coupon below.

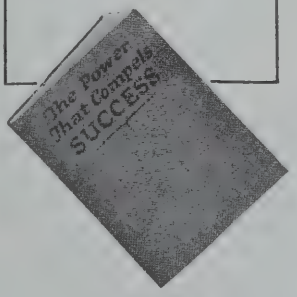
By A. L. Pelton

"The Man Who Helps People Succeed"

WITHOUT wasting a single word I'll come straight to the point! I've discovered a method that is performing wonders for those who follow it. It isn't a secret! Thousands of the world's greatest men have used it and are using this method to bring them wealth—fame—happiness! But now, for the first time, it's been put down in black and white—so that anybody who has learned to read and write can use it to bring him almost anything he wants.

No longer need you be content with an ordinary job at an ordinary salary! Here's a new, easy, positive way to achieve the kind of success you have always wanted! I'll show you how to acquire the remarkable power to do the work you like and earn more money than perhaps you ever dreamed of, and I absolutely guarantee that it will bring at least $1,000 value the first year—or it won't cost you a cent!

Let me repeat—it isn't a secret. It's been used thousands of times. Only now it's put down on paper, in plain every-day English so anybody with ordinary intelligence can follow it and make a great deal of money! If you want to know how this method works let's take some actual examples.



A Few Actual Examples

John Watson was born "helpless in body," and has never been able to walk a step. His parents were poor. He had very little schooling. Yet, despite his handicaps, Watson—that's not his real name, although every word here is true—has become a very rich man. He owns a huge factory in Louisville, Kentucky, and is consulting engineer for many concerns at $100 an hour! Only recently he turned down a $40,000 a year job. He's a wonderful artist, an orator, an inventor and a lawyer. He had only a brain to start with, yet he has won great wealth, fame and happiness!

You may think Watson was a genius. Then how about Wrigley, the chewing gum king? He started as a poor newsboy in Chicago and now makes many times more money in a day than thousands of people earn in a year! How about Douglas, the millionaire shoeman who was a shoemaker's helper. I could mention thousands of others. Read your history and you'll find that the very men you know best—Napoleon, Grant, Lincoln, and countless others—became famous by using this simple method. Yet you, too, possess the magic that made millions for Rockefeller, Vanderlip, Sabin, Schwab and Edison! The ease with which you'll climb in business and in private life will seem almost miraculous once you learn to use it.

Read This Amazing FREE Booklet If you Want to Know

- How to attract success.
- How to banish sensitiveness.
- How to analyze yourself.
- How to acquire nerve force.
- How to make people like you.
- How to create money-making ideas.
- How to influence men in business.
- How to get a powerful memory.
- How to conquer fear and worry.
- How to develop a lion's courage.

Anyone Can Use It

You don't need to have a college education to use this method to great advantage. If you can only read and write you have the proper qualifications to make this marvelous discovery unlock the doors to the world's greatest treasures! You can learn it in a surprisingly short time. And the minute you learn it, you become more forceful, persuasive, confident. You think better, clearer, quicker. Your success becomes rapid—sure—easy. You'll astonish your friends and yourself as well!

Today thousands of men and women are using this method to bring them wealth, power, happiness. Results are astounding! Clerks are becoming executives almost over night. Salesmen are doubling and tripling their commissions. It's a definite—sure way. Adding twenty, thirty, or forty, even a hundred dollars a week to a man's salary is not at all unusual. This new method for success cannot fail if carefully followed. That's why I absolutely guarantee you $1,000 value the very first year!

Will you let me show you the easiest way in the world to get the things you want? I don't care what you want—whether it be money, health, power, fame, happiness! I'll show you how to get it. You won't guess—you'll know. In plain every day language you'll be led step by step over all the obstacles that have held you back. You will be brought into a new land—where success is positive! You'll feel like a blind man who has just regained his eyesight! You lose your fears—worries—timidity. You acquire a lion's courage. Nothing daunts you—nothing stops you. The door opens—you enter and help yourself!

How It Works

The method is simple, too. One of the greatest psychologists the world has ever known, Prof. Frank Channing Haddock, has discovered, after years of patient research and study, certain things about success. He found that out of thousands of successful men and women, practically every one possessed certain fundamental characteristics or qualities which were directly responsible for their success. He found that once a person acquired such qualities as foresight, imagination, will-power, confidence, fearlessness, and thinking ability—his success in life was absolutely certain.

But even more important than this discovery was the astonishing discovery of how any man or woman could easily and quickly and positively develop these characteristics. His whole method is embodied in his great new course "Mastery of Self," which already has performed thousands upon thousands of seeming miracles in bringing the people the success they have always longed for.

Free Book Tells How

I wish I had space enough to tell you all the wonderful things "Mastery of Self" has done for thousands of people. But of course it is impossible, so we have written a new booklet—"The Power That Compels Success"—which is chock-full of all the things you want to know. This book will be a revelation to you. It will show you how to double your power of accomplishment—how to double your ability to think—how to banish your fears, self-consciousness, worries, timidity; how to acquire the courage to do seemingly impossible things—how to think straight—clearly—accurately. It contains some of the most fascinating and marvelous information you ever expected to read. This remarkable book is absolutely free. Send for it now. It may mean the turning point in your life. It will show you the new easy way to greater health—wealth—and happiness! Mail the coupon today. And remember my guarantee of at least $1,000 value the very first year.

RESULTS

$897.00 Profit First Week

"My first week's benefit in dollars is $897." (Figure what his yearly profit would be)—F. W. Heistand, 916 Tribune Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Made $500 in Five Days

"In five days' time, your method made me $500."—G. C. Bennington, Centerton, O.

Worth $15,000 and More

"Worth more than $15,000 to me."—Oscar B. Sheppard.

Salary Jumped from $150 to $800

"Since I acquired the power, my salary has jumped from $150 to $800 a month."—J. F. Gibson, San Diego, Cal.

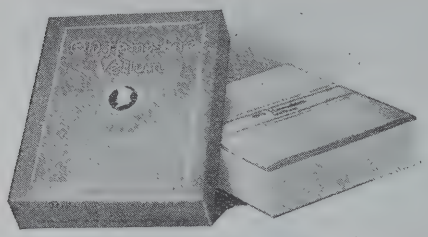
Would Be Worth $100,000

"If I had only had it when I was 20 years old, would be worth $100,000 today."—S. W. Taylor, The Santa Fe Ry., Milano, Tex.

PELTON PUBLISHING CO.,
15-H Wilcox Block, Meriden, Conn.

FREE Book Coupon

PELTON PUBLISHING CO.
15-H Wilcox Block, MERIDEN, CONN.



Without obligation please send me at once a FREE copy of your booklet, "The Power That Compels Success."

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

Ask your stationer for it

Old Hampshire Vellum

"A Stationery of Distinction"

A substantial, aristocratic paper. In quire boxes (24 sheets and 24 envelopes); also, quarter reams (125 sheets) and ⅛ M envelopes (125 envelopes) in a variety of styles and sizes. Priced at $1 the box and upward.

Sold wherever fine stationery is found. If your stationer cannot supply you, write for samples, select the stationery you desire, and we shall be glad to oblige you on receipt of remittance.

A usable packet of Specimen Sheets and Envelopes will be sent on receipt of 10c.

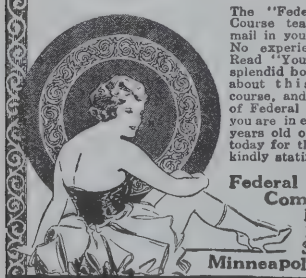
Old Hampshire Stationery

Its popularity proves its worth

HAMPSHIRE PAPER COMPANY
Fine Stationery Department
South Hadley Falls, Mass.

EARN MONEY AT HOME

YOU can make $15 to $60 weekly in your spare time writing show cards. No canvassing or soliciting. We instruct you by our new simple Directograph system, send you orders and pay you cash each week. Write for full particulars and free booklet.
WEST-ANGUS SHOW CARD SERVICE
81 Colborne Building Toronto, Can.



You Can Easily Get a
BIG PAYING HOTEL JOB

HOTELS need hundreds of men and women with training—positions waiting. We train you by mail for high-salaried position. No previous experience necessary. Big pay, fine living, interesting work, quick advancement, free meals and apartment. Free book explains all. Send for it today! LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOLS. Room 207 Washington, D.C.

$100 a Week
FOR DRAWING

How would you like a fine position at $100 a week? If you like to draw, develop your talent in a practical way. Good commercial artists earn this much, and more. Well-trained beginners soon command $50 a week.

Learn Quickly at Home

The "Federal" Master Course teaches you by mail in your spare time. No experience needed. Read "Your Future," a splendid book telling all about this remarkable course, and the success of Federal Students. If you are in earnest and 16 years old or more, write today for this free book, kindly stating your age.

Federal School of Commercial Designing
252 Federal Schools Bldg.
Minneapolis, Minn.

doing, as if nothing had happened. Only up against her brow Trina could feel the little tremor of sympathy from him which he so shamefacedly concealed from his brother, who upon such occasions and many similar ones immediately sought retreat among the uncut pages of the Lives of Great Men.

And then she could be testy with Oscar. That almost killed Henry. One evening, when he tried to make her lie down instead of standing, sick and staggering over the pungency of frying smelts, she cried out to him: "Oh, go to the devil! I can't call my hired girl in to fix supper, can I? Somebody has to do it."

And another time, ministering to the crick in her back he spilled liniment down it and she cried out in pain, "Great big boob, you!" And then a few minutes later when Oscar came into the parlor, that looped up smile on his face, smeared over the hurt, as it were, it was all Henry could do to keep the tears from splashing down on volume four, the Lives of Great Men.

On the other hand, Trina on her good days was the loving and honoring and obeying wife whom Oscar had so solemnly taken at the altar. Babying him, smoothing his widening bald spot and serving him in a hundred nervous little solicitous ways. Neither was she without a very definite kind of affection for her brother-in-law, calling him Grunty, and on her well Fridays she invariably had kale boiled with ham-end, a dish of which he was inordinately fond.

Sitting alone in his side yard evening after evening tilted against the brick wall, pipe in its slow journeys from his knee to his lips, Henry was tireless at his cogitations about Oscar, pondering for hours upon these new and secret places in his brother's life. Places no longer of the pool. Places that Oscar never by word or act revealed to him. To what extent was Oscar realizing the nervous unæsthetic woman who was his? Trina bit her finger nails. Trina let her corsets and tired looking bits of clothing droop over chairs from day's end to day's end. She was fast losing what looks she had, too. Her arms were so bony now, from their incessant darting to and fro, no doubt, and the water bubbles beneath her eyes pulled at her expression.

More than once when Oscar walked to the corner with Henry as he did on Friday nights, Oscar's eyes, as they parted with just "Goot night," had ridden through the darkness with Henry into the waiting quiet of Mrs. Burby's room as if they too had wanted to come.

Was Oscar envying Henry?

One October morning, when the brothers met at the livery stable, Oscar's face, which if one thought about it at all was usually the color of strong burlap, presented this day the peculiar ashen of rope instead. Dry. Fibrous. Without the suggestion of blood running through it.

"Oscar?" cried Henry, putting startled interrogation into the word.

"Trina had the doctor last night. Next Saturday morning. St. Anthony's Hospital. Operation."

That was all. The brothers rode their ways that morning with the whips in their sockets unflecked. It was misting and above the storm curtains their faces looked out squarely. For all the world like gaunt Abraham Lincolns.

Trina came through splendidly. In fact, her first two months out of the hospital she gained flesh so rapidly that Oscar spanked her one evening as she passed him to water the rubber plant and called her "Fatty." All her skirt bands had to be let out and gussets set into her waists. The "sikkedicks" persisted, but not so frequently, and except that it remained impossible for Trina to feel well enough to get up to prepare Oscar's breakfasts, conditions in the little flat improved.

Indeed, Trina, who came to love afternoon "movies," could return home quite flushed and pretty looking often barely in time to throw together the evening meal and as she put it, "redd up the place a bit."

Oscar indulged her love of entertainment, often providing the ticket for Mrs. Burby too, but there was a little pinch in the household. Trina's operation and doctor bills had mounted to over six hundred dollars, and then on top of it, with the mechanical gesture of a firm which has turned into a corporation, Henry's salary was raised to fifty dollars.

Not Oscar's. He had been falling off, you see. Irregularities. Trina's operation and expenses had taken him off the route daily for weeks. Oscar's collections were not up to mark.

And the first thing Henry knew, Oscar, white with the ignominy of it, was at him for a loan. Four hundred dollars, which he gave over, cheerfully.

The first hundred was paid back within the six months, but Trina, still lavish with the élan of one unaccustomed to handling money, had her heart set on one of those newfangled washing machines which had appeared at the door, and Oscar, with Henry's wide indulgence, let the payment of the second hundred lapse a month.

But before that month had rounded out an event stalked in that fairly knocked Oscar over the head with a slapstick.

Trina was with child. For three months, with a reticence not at all typical of her, she had carried this secret from Oscar, finally sobbing it out to him one evening because she could not eat her dinner.

He sat stunned, with his hand on her humped little shoulders as she told him, and he kissed her and Trina cried and cried and wanted it and didn't want it and cried and cried some more.

But it was almost two more months before Oscar could bring himself to tell Henry, and then only because Trina was developing a querulousness that needed justification and because Oscar could not see the second payment on that four hundred clearly ahead.

Oscar told him on the corner one Friday evening as they parted.

"That's goot," was all Henry could find to say over and over again as they wrung hands and parted. "That's very fine. That's goot."

But all the way home in a wild kind of pain for his brother, Henry kept asking himself over and over again, was it so goot? Was it?

It wasn't, because Trina's baby was born in such agony of travail that Oscar, standing waiting through the black aisle of the night, finally laid his head down on the parlor table and sobbed in long audible tearing sounds like corn husks rasping off the ear. Sobs that cut him in two—and Henry.

At high noon of the next day, in the midst of Trina's cries and entreaties and callings upon God, her son was born. It was Sunday, and straight through the chime-lit morning the brothers had waited side by side on two stiff-backed chairs in the parlor.

When the nurse placed his son in Oscar's arms, he began to laugh sillily again and in the manner that had so frightfully embarrassed Henry that time at breakfast. So sillily and so full of hysteria that Henry, without so much as glancing at the little living bundle of his nephew, hurried over to the shelf that bore the Lives of Great Men.

It was two months before Trina set foot out of bed. Three before the nurse could be dismissed, and then for another month Mrs. Burby did all the cooking, sending it over by Henry or Bettina in buckets covered with paper napkins.

There was not much left of the spick-and-span newness of the little flat of three years before. The furniture had dulled and the carpets. The rubber plant had one lone leaf, and Trina's erstwhile pride, the black plaster boy, had a crack in his face that bisected it on the diagonal.

They were bitter days, those first few months of the life of Oscar's son. Trina, poor girl, shattered in health and nerves. Oscar at his wits' end and deeper in debt to Henry than ever.

And the baby. Well, Oscar's son was the kind of child over whom people bend pitying heads and say: "Poor little fellow, he may outgrow it. They often do, you know." His head was too large. So large that it drooped tiredly like an enormous mushroom on a slender stalk, the little chin resting against the chest. A sweet unfretful baby with a little harassed face that said, "Why?"

And how fiercely and with a famished love that blazed color into her thin cheeks, Trina tended and nursed and suffered of the cruel steel braces they put under his chin.

And Henry and Oscar de-daddling that child! It was to laugh, the solemn two of them, grimacing, trying to awaken that mysterious star of light that meant recognition in the poor little eyes that were set on top, almost like a frog's. Doing "this little piggy went to market, this little piggy stayed at home," the only nursery rhyme they knew, to each and every finger and each and every toe.

But Oscar's son regarded them blandly, almost as the mushroom a little too heavy on its stem might have.

"He knows me," cried Oscar, knowing it not to be true.

"The little fellow smiled at me," cried Henry, knowing that he hadn't smiled at all.

"He's muvver's darling darlingest," cried Trina, her eyes beautiful with the stardust of being a mother.

And so the months wore on and Trina's strength came back slowly, if at all, and the boy Buster's big head lolled on its puny stalk and expenses kept just a little bit ahead of Oscar.

And there the flat stood, dirty and cluttered from one week's end to the next except when Mrs. Burby came over and lent a hand, or Oscar and Henry tidied a bit on Friday evenings, or Trina with her old bearing down pains again dragged herself around in her nightgown

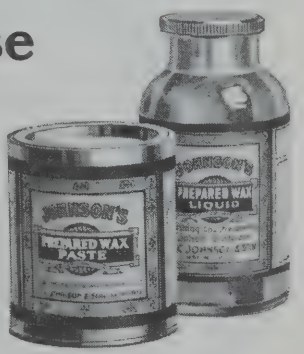
Brighten Up Your Home

Ideal Polish for Furniture

Johnson's Liquid Wax is the perfect furniture polish. It imparts a hard, dry, oil-less polish which will not finger print or collect dust and lint. It takes all drudgery from dusting.

A Preserver of Linoleum

Johnson's Polishing Wax prevents cracking and blistering—brings out the pattern and color—protects linoleum from wear and makes cleaning easy.



Rejuvenates Floors & Trim

You can easily keep your floors and woodwork in perfect condition by polishing occasionally with Johnson's Wax. The Wax cleans and forms a thin protecting finish coat.

JOHNSON'S
Paste - Liquid - Powdered
POLISHING WAX

EVERY room needs the brightening touch of Johnson's Polishing Wax. It will rejuvenate your furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum, and give your home that fine air of immaculate cleanliness. It imparts a beautiful, lustrous polish which will not gather dust and lint—or show finger marks. Johnson's Prepared Wax cleans, polishes, preserves and protects—all in one operation.

A Form for Every Use

Johnson's Polishing Wax is conveniently put up in three forms—Paste, Liquid and Powdered.

Use the Paste Wax for polishing floors of all kinds—wood, tile, marble, composition, linoleum, etc.

Use Johnson's Liquid Wax for polishing your furniture, woodwork, linoleum, leather, shoes and automobile.

Johnson's Powdered Wax makes perfect dancing floors.

Insist on Johnson's Polishing Wax—For Sale at all Good Stores.
Our Book Tells 100 Ways to Brighten Up Your Home. Use the coupon below.

Book on Home Beautifying FREE

S. C. JOHNSON & SON, Dept. K.S.4, RACINE, WIS.
(Canadian Factory–Brantford)
"The Wood Finishing Authorities"

Please send me free and postpaid your book telling how to make my home artistic, cheery and inviting. I understand that it explains just what materials to use and how to apply them—includes color card—gives covering capacities, etc.

My Dealer is.....

My Name.....

My Address.....

City and State.....

and slip-slopping slippers, dusting and trying when she could to have a decent snack of supper for Oscar when he came home tired.

But at least little Buster seldom cried and through the long days would lie almost meditatively in the tender cove of his mother's arm, and with every visit of the doctor a trail of good cheer like a slant of sunshine was left over the house.

"Don't you worry over that youngster. I've seen them a whole lot more backward than he is develop into bust-roarers."

And Trina's eyes would fill with gratitude and Oscar clear his throat and offer a cigar.

"And you too, Mrs. Brinkerhoff. You're going to gradually get back your strength and be three times the woman you were before the birth of this young rascal."

"Oh doctor—dear doctor!"

And yet the weeks dragged on so, and one day because Oscar could endure no more—she had acquired the habit of whining at him from the bed to do this and not for God's sake to do that—a flash of anger smote him in his eyes and he slammed blindly out of the house. At least slammed for him. Running down the front steps and closing the lower door on a burst of ejaculation that sounded to Trina as she lay there appalled, terrifyingly like damn.

That afternoon at about five-thirty it happened.

Trina, jerked strangely enough into awareness, not anger, had pulled herself together and with little Buster under one arm was frying a mess of flounder for supper. Oscar liked flounder. She had cleaned the front room, too. Tied a ribbon bow around the crack in the jardinière that contained the rubber plant, and for the first time, at least since Buster was born, her blonde hair was crimped and held in place with her rhinestone combs and she wore a dimity dress with a sash made of the same material.

Oscar had frightened Trina. Tears of self-pity spurted more than once as she probed into the fish with her fork, but she squeezed them back. All her intuition told her somehow that this was not the time for self-pity. Therefore the rhinestone combs and the dimity dress. Trina was not all fool. So she tasted back her tears and poked at the flounder and leaned to raise the gas flame . . .

It happened in a smear and a bang, a roar and a spurt of flame, the very gas burner that had once popped into Oscar's face flew out with a great stain of fire over Trina as she stood there clutching her baby under one arm, her dimity sash standing out like a butterfly doused into nothing by the very first flame.

"Baby—Oscar—oh God—oh——"

When Oscar came home the house was filled with neighbors and the stairs smelled cold and charred.

They were in the act of dressing Trina's arm, which was held in the air like a dreadful signal when Oscar entered the bedroom, and so Henry, coming in to Friday night supper some five minutes later, found his brother in a dead faint on the floor, a neighbor trying to force water down him, but which ran off instead into a long mandarin mustache down his collar.

By ten o'clock Trina had not regained sufficient consciousness to feel her pain and the baby too lay in a torpor that was merciful to it.

But once more the doctor was optimistic.

"There's a good fighting chance for both of them. No flame swallowed and eyes safe."

Inferentially, when the bang came Trina had displayed sufficient presence of mind to toss the baby well out of the flare and in some way her own dodge had saved her eyes and throat. So far so good. At this early hour there was no foretelling further developments, but there were too many people about. The doctor and the nurse shooed them all out like flies, Henry included.

He walked home through a September evening that was whitish with starlight. The Burbys were on their square of front porch. Gabble-gabble as usual. He cut across to the lawn for his chair, which was tilted and waiting against the side wall of the house.

He felt as a man must after he has lost a great deal of blood. Rather as if life had a circular motion to it; and the cushions of his fingers were shirred as if they had been long in water.

There stood his silence, waiting for him. Deep and cool as a well. It was almost as if he could lave it refreshingly to his face the way he did with water in his morning wash. And upstairs waited his room, with the burnt wood collar box exactly as it had stood since Oscar's marriage, and his Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday and Sunday pipe airing on the window sill.

He lighted his Monday, Wednesday and Friday's.

Pu—pu—pu—pu——

Poor Oscar's pipe scheme was all awry. Sometimes he borrowed a few puffs off of Henry's, for the sweetness.

Oscar, who had fallen out of the order and quiet as a child might fall headlong out of a window. A great wave of bitterness made Henry's face wry, as if he were tasting something horrid. Oscar, who might so easily be sitting there now beside him. Oscar, who loved the tick and tock. Oscar, whose neat, square-toed shoes were broken and grinning now. It stabbed Henry to see him in these. His brother's shoes had always been as firm toed and punctiliously blacked as his own. And now . . .

Suddenly a thought smote Henry. A gadfly of a thought that swam across the darkness and hung brilliantly and twenty times its natural size, right before Henry's eyes.

What if Trina should die?

Trina, who was a drain, and poor little Buster, whose head would probably always be too large for his body. A brilliant, persistent gadfly of a thought that was almost a hope, which try as he would Henry could not banish. Even when it receded and became smaller, it glittered so in the darkness! What if Trina should die? Oscar back once more in the well ordered quiet. The second story room again with the twin collar boxes—the deceased Burby's eyes—almost human—what if Trina should——

To throw off this thought which lighted and glittered, Henry began to walk again toward Kennerly Avenue. It was after eleven and the streets quiet so that his footsteps sort of followed him down the sidewalks.

There still was a light in the bedroom of the Oscar flat. He could see it from the side of the house as he approached. Was Trina better? Henry tried to buoy himself with this hope and ran up the porch steps insisting to himself, "I hope Trina's better. I hope Trina's better."

The screen door was unlatched and the parlor dark. But in the bedroom the center gas was burning full size into the stifling etheric atmosphere. Oscar was on the bed edge bending over, and Trina with her arms, bandages and all, locked about his neck so that her head, bandaged too, was lifted from the pillow, was talking in her highest and most nervous voice. The strand of hair, discolored with iodine, hung loose of the binding gauze.

Henry, who feared that she might be delirious, stood off in the darkened parlor to tremble and to wait.

"Am I going to die, Oscar? Is my baby going to die? I won't go alone."

"Why Trina, of course you are not going to die. You are a little burnt, that's all. You and baby. Joost a little burnt."

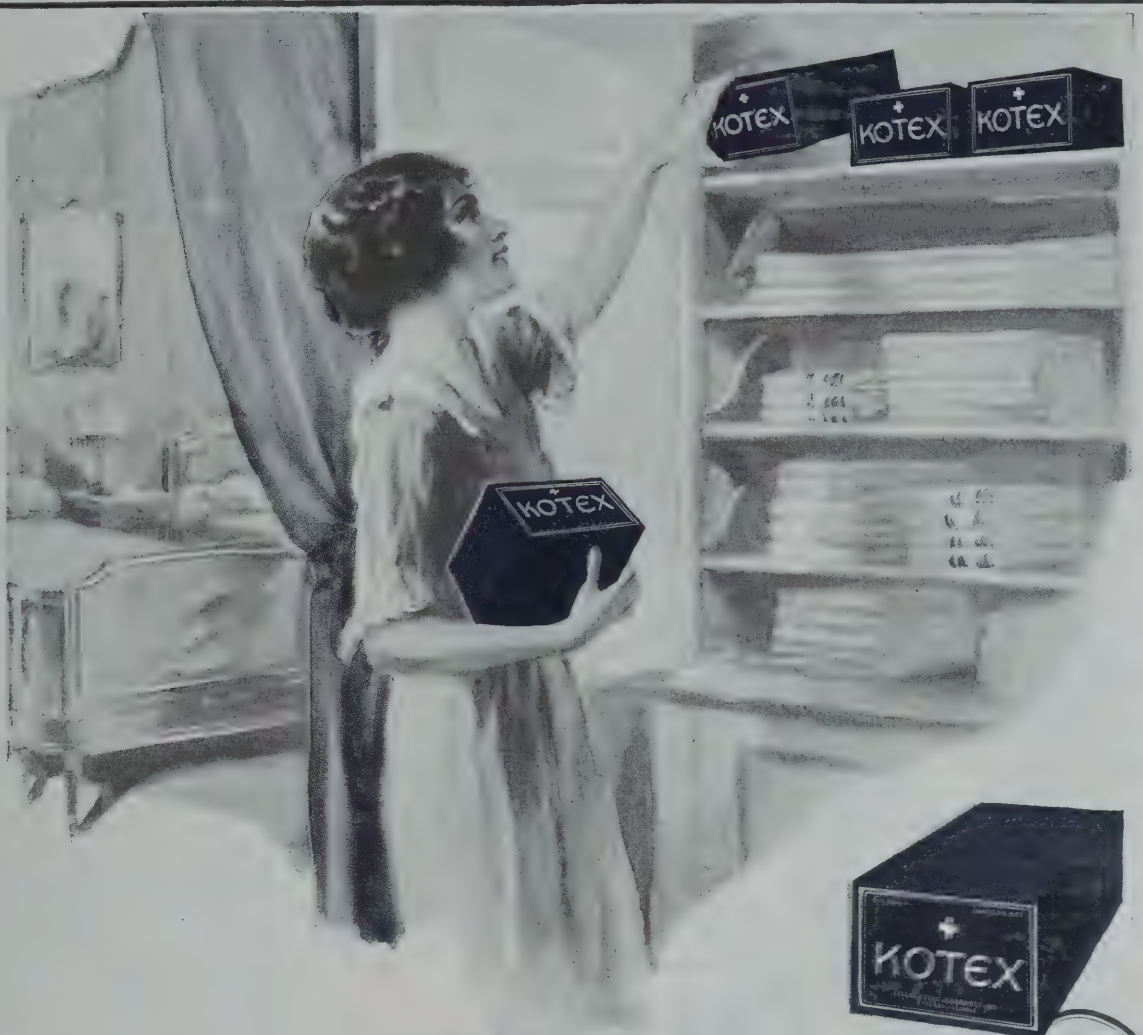
"I ought to die, Oscar. Me and baby. And relieve you. You've had so little out of it, Oscar, but worry—and drain—oh—oh—poor Oscar—poor Trina—I ought to die—but not without baby—I can't go alone—I know I ought to die—for you——"

"Don't say that Trina. Don't say that!" cried the Oscar whom Henry, standing out there trembling in the darkness, had never seen before. "Don't say that. Don't die. Live, Trina. You and baby, live for me! I couldn't go back to things without you. Live, Trina, you and baby. Live. Live."

And to Henry's horror, as he stood there with the goose flesh shuddering over him, Oscar pitched forward against Trina so that she had to hold him even with the bandaged part of her arm from crushing over on the sleeping little Buster, his words tumbling, crashing, slithering over each other like coals down a steel chute.

"Live, Trina, live! For me—couldn't—go back—to things without you. Live, Trina—you and baby—live."

And her voice, a banner of it, waving: "We'll live, Oscar. We'll live. We'll live."



Somehow Henry got down the stairs again, stealthily, and out into the whitish darkness. There were no pedestrians and by the time he reached home again church chimes were tilting out a solemn midnight.

Up in his room, seated there on the side of the bed, the eyes of the deceased Burby that were almost human focused upon him, clump went one of Henry's shoes. And then very much later, clump, the other. And still he sat round-backed and looking at the silence.

Henry, envying Oscar.

A new story by Kathleen Norris in April COSMOPOLITAN*—a story of home folks, told with all Mrs. Norris's skill in depicting those little, poignant things in daily life that all of us know and few of us really see.*

KOTEX

Inexpensive, and very convenient

KOTEX are easy to buy, as one asks for them by name. They are sold wherever drug, dry goods, and department stores serve women.

Kotex are far superior to other sanitary pads inasmuch as they are made from Cellucotton and fine gauze. Cellucotton is considered by science to be the most effective absorbent material. Kotex meet the most exacting needs, are also easy to dispose of by following the simple directions found in each package, and they are cheap enough to throw away.

A supply of Kotex on the shelf is always a great convenience. There are two sizes—regular and hospital. The latter has additional thickness, therefore greater absorbency. Many women keep a supply of each size.

Kotex come cleanly packed in boxes which bear no descriptive printing—only the name Kotex. Ask for them by name.

Regular size, 12 for 65c
Hospital size, 6 for 45c
(additional thickness)

Kotex cabinets are now being distributed in women's rest rooms everywhere—hotels, office buildings, restaurants, theatres, and other places—from which may be obtained one Kotex with two safety pins, in plain wrapper, for 10 cents.

Cellucotton Products Co., 166 W. Jackson Boul., Chicago
51 Chambers Street, New York Factories: Neenah, Wis.

Copyright 1923, C. P. C.

INEXPENSIVE, COMFORTABLE, HYGIENIC and SAFE — KOTEX

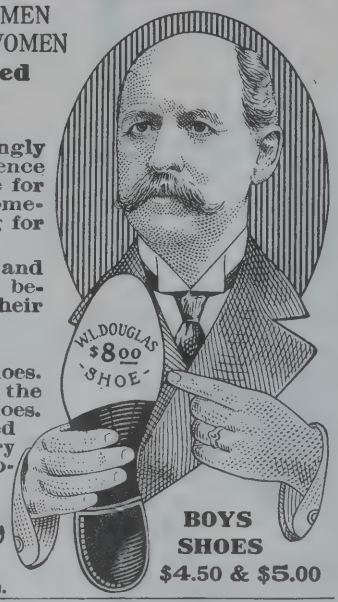
W. L. DOUGLAS

$5 $6 $7 $8 & $9 SHOES FOR MEN AND WOMEN

W. L. Douglas shoes are actually demanded year after year by more people than any other shoe in the world

BECAUSE W. L. Douglas has been making surpassingly good shoes for forty-six years. This experience of nearly half a century in making shoes suitable for Men and Women in all walks of life should mean something to you when you need shoes and are looking for the best shoe values for your money.

W. L. DOUGLAS shoes in style, quality, material and workmanship are better than ever before; only by examining them can you appreciate their superior qualities.



No Matter Where You Live

shoe dealers can supply you with W. L. Douglas shoes. If not convenient to call at one of our 110 stores in the large cities, ask your shoe dealer for W. L. Douglas shoes. Protection against unreasonable profits is guaranteed by the name and price stamped on the sole of every pair before the shoes leave the factory. Refuse substitutes. The prices are the same everywhere.

If not for sale in your vicinity, write for catalog.

TO MERCHANTS: If no dealer in your town handles W. L. Douglas shoes, write today for exclusive rights to handle this quick selling, quick turn-over line.

W. L. Douglas
President
W. L. Douglas Shoe Co.
146 Spark St. Brockton, Mass.

BOYS SHOES
$4.50 & $5.00

SALESMEN WANTED

To sell a unique line of advertising novelties on a liberal commission basis. Highest references required.
STANWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.
9 Tremont Row Boston, Mass.

BOATS Canoes, rowboats, hunting and fish boats, outboard-motor boats and motor boats 16 to 26 feet. CATALOG FREE—SAVE MONEY—ORDER BY MAIL. State kind of boat in which interested. Immediate shipment from stock.
THOMPSON BROS. BOAT MFG. CO., 183 Ellis Ave., Peshtigo, Wis.

Genuine BAYER ASPIRIN

SAY "BAYER" when you buy. Insist!

Unless you see the "Bayer Cross" on tablets, you are not getting the genuine Bayer product prescribed by physicians over 23 years and proved safe by millions for

Colds	Headache
Toothache	Rheumatism
Neuritis	Lumbago
Neuralgia	Pain, Pain

Accept only "Bayer" package which contains proper directions.
Handy "Bayer" boxes of 12 tablets—Also bottles of 24 and 100—Druggists.
Aspirin is the trade mark of Bayer Manufacture of Monoaceticacidester of Salicylicacid

The Hope of Happiness

(Continued from page 49)

"I think," said her father, "it might be as well to begin refusing again. What about him, Shep?"

"He's a good sort, I think," Shepherd replied after a hasty glance at his wife. "But of course——"

"Of course, he's divorced," interposed Constance, "and he hasn't been here long. But people I know in Chicago say he was well liked there. What is it he has gone into, Shep?"

"He came here to open a branch of a lumber company—a large concern, I think," Shepherd replied. "I believe he has been divorced, father, if that's what's troubling you."

"Oh, he told me all about the divorce!" interposed Leila imperturbably. "His wife got crazy about another man and—biff! Don't worry, dada; he isn't dangerous."

When they had gone upstairs to the library for coffee, Leila lighted a cigarette and proceeded to open some letters that had been placed on a small desk kept in the room for her benefit. She perched herself on the desk and read aloud, between whiffs of her cigarette, snatches of news from a letter from one of her girl friends. Shepherd handed her a cup and she stirred her coffee, the cigarette hanging from her lip. Constance feigned not to notice a shadow of annoyance on her father-in-law's face as Leila, her legs dangling, occasionally kicked the desk frame with her heels.

"By the way, Leila," said Constance, "the Nelsons want to sell their place at Harbor Hills. They haven't been there for several years, you know. It's one of the best locations anywhere in Michigan. It would solve the eternal summer problem for all of us—so accessible and a marvelous view—and you could have all the water sports you wanted. And they say the new clubhouse is a perfect dream."

Shepherd Mills's cup tottered with a sharp staccato in its saucer. He had warned his wife not to broach the matter of purchasing the northern Michigan cottage, which she had threatened to do for some time and had discussed with Leila in the hope of enlisting her as an ally for an effective assault upon Mills.

"It's a peach of a place, all right," Leila remarked. "I wonder if the yacht goes with the house. I believe I could use that yacht. Really, dada, we ought to have a regular summer place. I'm fed up on rented cottages. If we had a house like the Nelsons' we could all use it."

She had promised Constance to support the idea, but her sister-in-law had taken her off guard and she was aware that she hadn't met the situation with quite the enthusiasm it demanded. Mills was lighting a cigar in his usual unhurried fashion. He was aware that Constance was in the habit of using Leila as an advocate when she wanted him to do something extraordinary, and Leila, to his secret delight, usually betrayed the source of her inspiration.

"What do the Nelsons want for the property?" he asked, settling himself back in his chair.

"I suppose the yacht isn't included,"

Constance answered. "They're asking sixty thousand for the house and there's a lot of land, you know. The Nelsons live in Detroit and it would be easy to get the details."

"You said yourself it was a beautiful place when you were there last summer," Leila resumed, groping in her memory for the reasons with which Constance had fortified her for urging the purchase. "And the golf course up there is a wonder, and the whole place is very exclusive—only the nicest people."

"I thought you preferred the northeast coast," her father replied. "What's sent you back to fresh water?"

"Oh, dada, I just have to change my mind sometimes! If I kept the same idea in my bean very long it would bore me terribly."

Constance, irritated that Leila was proving so poor an ally, tried to signal for silence. But Leila, having undertaken to implant in her father's mind the desirability of acquiring the cottage at Harbor Hills, was unwilling to drop the subject.

"Poor old Shep never gets any vacation to amount to anything. If we had a place in Michigan he could go up every week-end and get a breath of air. We all of us could have a perfectly grand time."

"Who's all?" demanded her father. "You'd want to run a select boarding house, would you?"

"Well, not exactly. But Connie and I could open the place early and stay late and we'd hope you'd be with us all the time, and Shep, whenever he could get away."

"Shep, I think this is only a scheme to shake you and me for the summer. Connie and Leila are trying to put something over on us. And of course we can't stand for any such thing."

"Of course, father, the upkeep of such a place is considerable," Shepherd replied conciliatingly.

"Yes; quite as much as a town house, and you'd never use it more than two or three months a year. By the way, Connie, do you know those Cincinnati Marvins Leila and I met up there?"

She knew that her father-in-law had, with characteristic deftness, disposed of the Harbor Hills cottage as effectually as though he had roared a refusal. Shepherd, still smarting under the rejection of his plan for giving his workmen a clubhouse, marveled at the suavity with which his father eluded matters that did not impress him favorably. He wondered at times whether his father was not in some degree a superman who in his judgments and actions exercised a Jovian supremacy over the rest of mankind. Leila, finding herself bored by her father's talk with Constance about the Marvins, sprang from the table, stretched herself lazily and said she guessed she would go and dress.

When she reached the door she turned toward him with mischief in her eyes. "What are you up to tonight, dada? You might stroll over and see Millie! The Claytons didn't ask her to their party."

"Thanks for the hint, dear," Mills replied with a tinge of irony.

"I think I'll go with you," said Constance as Leila impudently kissed her fingers to her father and turned toward her room. "Whistle for me at eight-thirty, Shep."

HATCHWAY

BUTTONLESS!

Not a single button, front or back; not one unnecessary trouble-maker in its entire design; nothing but ease and comfort and freedom from annoyance—that's the

HATCHWAY NO BUTTON UNION SUIT

It's difficult to realize, until you actually see this new kind of underwear with your own eyes. See it now at any good store. It is designed to conform perfectly to the lines of your body. It has to be that way without a single button to pull and stretch it into shape.

See these garments at your favorite dealer's today. He can get them for you. It has been a big job to keep dealers stocked up this Spring, but if you have any difficulty in getting just what you want, we will be glad to see that you are supplied, delivery free anywhere in the United States. In ordering, please state size and enclose remittance to our mill at Albany. Send for free catalog illustrating complete line of Hatchway No Button Union Suits and Hatch One Button Union Suits photographed on live models.

Men's Nainsook Suits, $1, $1.50, $2, $3, $5. (The $5 garment is all silk.)

Boys' Nainsook Suits, $1, $1.25.

Men's Knitted Suits, $1.50, $2, $3, $3.50.

Boys' Knitted Suits, $1, $1.25.

DEALERS Write us for samples and swatches if you are interested in stocking Hatchway No-Button Union Suits, or ask to have our representative call. In certain localities exclusive agencies are open to the right kind of merchant.

FULD & HATCH KNITTING CO., ALBANY, NEW YORK

Woods Underwear Co., Toronto, Canada, Licensed Manufacturers of these lines for Canada

How to meet a domestic emergency

Perhaps you are preparing a simple lunch—and an unexpected guest arrives! You can make the meal quite festive if you serve hot STEERO bouillon. This will take only a moment. Drop a STEERO bouillon cube into a cup, add boiling water, and you are all ready.

STEERO
Reg U S Pat Off
BOUILLON CUBES
Patented Oct 31, 1911

Hot STEERO bouillon is an appetizing drink at any and all times. STEERO bouillon cubes add greatly to the flavoring of many other dishes. Send 10 cents for samples, and sixty-four-page cook book.

Schieffelin & Co.
287 William St., New York
Distributors for American Kitchen Products Co., New York

"A Cube Makes a Cup"

"Simply Add Boiling Water"

Bakertone

Removes All But The Music From Phonograph Records

Practically eliminates surface noises and metallic sounds. Stops "scratching" and "rasping". Purifies and clarifies every note; individualizes each tone. Makes your phonograph music soft, sweet and mellow without "muffling" or "killing" the tones. Attaches to any phonograph except those using diamond point. Beautifully finished in heavy gold plate, $5.00 each. For sale at music stores, or, sent direct on receipt of price and dealer's name. Money back if not satisfied after 10 days' use.

BAKERTONE CORPORATION
Dept. 104, 408-12 Peerl Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

Printed Stationery

200 Sheets 6x7. 100 envelopes to match. High Grade Bond, printed in Blue ink with name and address (4 lines or less). Postage prepaid east of the Mississippi—for points west and Canada add 10% Order direct or write for free samples. Satisfaction guaranteed. $1.00

M. C. HARP, Box 139C, North Troy, N.Y.

WE TEACH COMMERCIAL ART

Meyer Both Company, the largest Commercial Art Organization in the World. offers you an unusual opportunity for practical training. If you like to draw develop your talent. Study this practical course—taught by the nationally known Meyer Both Company, with twenty-two years success—who each year produces and sells to advertisers over 15,000 commercial drawings.
Our teachers give you the double advantage of being instructors of proven ability, as well as artists in this widely known organization. Meyer Both instruction is the difference between successful fact and experimental theory. Commercial Art is a highly paid, intensely interesting profession, equally open to men and women. Home study instruction.

Get Facts Before You Enroll in any School.
Ask the Advertising Manager of the leading newspapers in your city, anywhere in the United States, Canada, England or Australia about the Meyer Both Company—let them tell you about us. Write for our illustrated book "YOUR OPPORTUNITY"—for one-half the cost of mailing—four cents in stamps.

MEYER BOTH COMPANY
Department of Art Instruction
Michigan Ave. at 20th St., Dept. 22 CHICAGO, ILL.
NOTE—To Art and Engraving Firms: Secure practical artists among our graduates. Write us.

Both men rose as the young women left the room—Franklin Mills was punctilious in all the niceties of good manners—but before resuming his seat he closed the door. There was something ominous in this and Shepherd nervously lighted a cigarette.

He covertly glanced at his watch to fix in his mind the amount of time he must remain with his father before Constance returned. He loved and admired his wife—there was something almost filial in his attitude toward her—and he envied her the ease with which she ignored or surmounted difficulties.

Connie made mistakes in dealing with her father-in-law and Shepherd was aware of this, but his own errors in this respect only served to strengthen his reliance on the understanding and sympathy of his wife, who was an adept in concealing disappointment and discomfiture. When Shepherd was disposed to complain of his father, Connie was always consoling. She would say:

"You're altogether too sensitive, Shep. It's an old trick of fathers to treat their sons as though they were still boys. Your father can't realize that you're grown up. But he knows you stick to your job and that you're anxious to please him. I suppose he thought you'd grow up to be just like himself; but you're not, so it's up to him to take you as the pretty fine boy you are. You're the steadiest young man in town and you needn't think he doesn't appreciate that."

Shepherd, fortifying himself with a swift recollection of his wife's frequent reassurances of this sort, nevertheless wished very much that she had not run off to gossip with Leila. However, the interview with his father would be brief, and he played with his cigarette while he waited for his father to begin.

"There's something I've wanted to talk with you about, Shep. It will take only a minute."

"Yes, father."

"It's about Leila"—he hesitated—"a little bit about Constance too. I'm not altogether easy about Leila. I mean"—he paused again—"as to Connie's influence over your sister. Connie is enough older to realize that Leila needs a little curbing as to things I can't talk to her about as a woman could. Leila doesn't need to be encouraged in extravagance. And she likes running about well enough without being led into things she might better let alone. I'm not criticizing Connie's friends, but you do have at your house people I'd rather Leila didn't know—at least not to be intimate with them. As a concrete example, I don't care for this fellow Thomas. He's too old a man for Leila to become interested in. To be frank, I've made some inquiries about him and he's hardly the sort of person you'd care for your sister to run around with."

Shepherd, blinking under this succession of direct statements, felt that some comment was required.

"Of course, father, Connie wouldn't take up anyone she didn't think perfectly all right. And she'd never put any undesirable acquaintances in Leila's way. She's too fond of Leila and too deeply interested in her happiness for that."

"I wasn't intimating that Connie was consciously influencing Leila in a wrong way in that particular instance. But Leila is very impressionable. So far I've been able to eliminate young men I haven't cared to have her run around with. I'm merely asking your cooperation, and Connie's, in protecting her. She's very headstrong and rather disposed to take advantage of our position by running a little wild. Our friends no doubt make allowances, but people outside our circle may not be so tolerant."

"Yes; that's all perfectly true, father," Shepherd assented, relieved and not a little pleased that his father appeared to be criticizing him less than asking his assistance.

"For another thing," Mills went on. "Leila has somehow got in the habit of drinking. Several times I've seen her when she'd had too much. That sort of thing won't do!"

"Of course not! But I'm sure Connie hasn't been encouraging Leila to drink. She and I both have talked to her about that. I hoped she'd stop it before you found it out."

"Don't ever get the idea that I don't know what's going on!" Mills retorted tartly. "Another thing I want to speak of is Connie's way of getting Leila to back her schemes—things like that summer place, for example. We don't need a summer place. While your mother was living we had a place in Michigan and gave it up because you children got tired of it. The idea that you can't have a proper vacation is all rubbish. I urged you all last summer to take Connie East for a month."

"I know you did. It was my own fault I didn't go. Please don't think we're complaining; Connie and I got a lot of fun just motoring. I think, father, that sometimes you're not—not—quite just to Connie."

"Not just to her!" exclaimed Mills, with a lifting of the brows. "In what way have I been unjust to her?"

Shepherd knew that his remark was unfortunate before it was out of his mouth. He should have followed his habit of assenting to what his father said without broadening the field of discussion. He was taken aback by his father's question, uttered with what was, for Franklin Mills, an unusual display of asperity.

"I only meant," Shepherd replied hastily, "that you don't always"—he frowned—"you don't quite give Connie credit for her fine qualities."

"Quite the contrary," Mills replied. "My only concern as her father-in-law is that she shall continue to display those qualities. I realize that she's a popular young woman but in a way you pay for that, and I stand for it and make it possible for you to spend the money. Now don't jump to the conclusion that I'm intimating that you and Connie wouldn't have just as many friends if you spent a tenth of what you're spending now. Be it far from me, my boy, to discredit your value and Connie's as social factors!"

Mills laughed to relieve the remark of any suspicion of irony. There was nothing Shepherd dreaded so much as his father's ironies. The dread was the greater because there was always a disturbing uncertainty as to what they concealed.

"About those little matters I mentioned," Mills went on; "I count on you to help."

"Certainly, father, Connie and I both

Kodak as you go

All roads lead to pictures—the quiet lane just as surely as the busy highway.

With your Kodak tucked beside you, you have only to pick and choose—and press the button.

Autographic Kodaks $6.50
At your dealer's

Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y. The Kodak City

A GIFT from Us that you will never forget

THE PRIDE of PALOMAR

By PETER B. KYNE

WE want you to have this book because it will be a valuable addition to your library as well as a fund of present enjoyment for you. So we are offering it to you without charge.

CORNELIUS VANDERBILT, JR. says of "The Pride of Palomar:"—"I believe it to be a volume that will not improbably have a direct bearing on future legislation, as a few other great books have had on past legislation. Almost certainly it is one of the present-day books that future generations will read and love."

Any book by a writer so well-loved as Peter B. Kyne is bound to be a best seller. But in "THE PRIDE OF PALOMAR" Kyne has put so much of himself, so much of the native Californian's passionate love for his state, so much of sincerity in his expose of the Japanese question in California, that the book is more peculiarly his than anything he has ever done. If you have ever read a Kyne story, or have never read one, you won't want to miss "THE PRIDE OF PALOMAR."

THE pathos of Don Mike's return to his beloved ancestral home from the war, after he had been reported killed, only to find his father dead and the ranch in the hands of a man who is planning to colonize it with Japanese; the glory of the fight that he puts up to rid his home of the invaders; the sheer beauty of the pictures of the San Gregorio Valley, of which Don Mike said, "I love every rock and cactus and rattlesnake in it;" or the fine wholesomeness of the love of Don Mike and Kay Parker, daughter of the man who is to dispossess him—it is difficult to tell which of these themes of "THE PRIDE OF PALOMAR" has the most compelling interest. At any rate they all combine to make it a dramatic and stirring tale.

COSMOPOLITAN, Dept. 323
119 WEST 40TH STREET
NEW YORK CITY

Enclosed find $..... (insert amount of remittance) for which send Cosmopolitan for one year to the friend or friends whose names are on the attached list. Send me a copy (or copies) of

THE PRIDE OF PALOMAR

NAME.....

ADDRESS .....

CITY..... STATE.....

How to Get this Book

IF YOU will send us the subscription of a friend to COSMOPOLITAN we will send you a copy of this great book—or send two subscriptions and get two copies. The subscriptions must be other than your own. Just send us the names and addresses of the friends to whom you want the magazine sent, together with a remittance to cover the cost at $3.00 per subscription. Mail them with the attached coupon.

will do all we can. I'm glad you spoke to me about it."

"All right, Shep," and Mills opened the door to mark the end of the interview. . . . In Leila's room Constance had said, the moment they were alone:

"Well, you certainly gummed it!"

"Oh, shoot! Dada wouldn't buy that Nelson place if it only cost a nickel."

"Well, you didn't do much to advance the cause!"

"See here," said Leila, "one time's just as good as another with dada. I knew he'd never agree to it. I only spoke of it because you asked me to. You never seem to learn his curves."

"If you'd backed me up right we could have got him interested and won him over. Anybody could see that he was away off tonight—even more difficult than usual!"

"Oh, hell! You and Shep make me tired. You take father too seriously. All you've got to do with him is just to kid him along. Let's have a little drink to drown our troubles."

"Now, Leila——"

Leila had drawn a hat box from the inner recesses of a closet and extracted from it a quart bottle of whisky.

"I'm all shot to hell and need a spoonful of this stuff to pep me up! Hands off, old thing! Don't touch—Leila scream!" Constance had tried to seize the bottle.

"Leila, please don't drink! The Claytons are having everybody of any consequence at this party and if you go reeking of liquor all the old tabbies will babble!"

"Well, darling, let them talk! At least they will talk about both of us then!"

"Who's talking about me?" Constance demanded.

"Quiet yourself, dear! You certainly wore the guilty look then. Let's call it quits—I've got to dress!"

She poured herself a second drink and restored the bottle to its hiding place.

CHAPTER IV

BRUCE rang the Hardens' door bell on his first free evening after meeting Millicent at the Country Club, and as he waited glanced toward the Mills's house in the lot adjoining, vaguely wondering whether Franklin Mills was within its walls. In spite of himself he had been unable to efface his memory of the man; every word and gesture, even the tones of Mills's voice in the few minutes they had stood together with Millicent in the club lounge, had made an ineffaceable record. His curiosity as to the man was satisfied; he would not again put himself in Franklin Mills's way.

He had tried to analyze the emotions that had beset him that night when he had taken the hand of the man he believed to be his father. There was something cheap and vulgar in the idea that blood speaks to blood and that possibly Mills had recognized him by some sort of intuition. But Bruce rejected this as preposterous, a concession to the philosophy of ignorant old women muttering scandal before a dying fire. Very likely he had been wrong in fancying that Mills had taken any special note of him. And there was always his mother's assurance that Mills didn't know of his existence. Mills probably had a habit of eyeing

Cold baths—stiff flesh-brushes—their benefits—without discomfort

BEAUTIES famous for their satiny skins and rose-leaf complexions tell you of their cold plunges and the use of a stiff flesh-brush. You believe—and yet you cannot bring yourself to such heroic measures even to obtain the beauty you crave.

But discomfort is no longer necessary. For you (and for millions more like you) a great manufacturing organization (one of America's leaders) has developed a new, pleasant, inexpensive and simple treatment for the body skin—ALCORUB.

How gentle, pleasant stimulation of the skin brings back beauty

ALCORUB (used as here directed) stimulates the nerves and blood-vessels of the skin and corrects oiliness, sallow color, enlarged pores, excessive perspiration and blackheads. It accomplishes more than some severe, uncomfortable treatments. And yet ALCORUB is easy to use; pleasant in its effect; and requires no special leisure—no expensive appliances.

This is the new ALCORUB skin treatment

Take a hot bath every other night before going to bed. Dry the body as usual. Then pour a little ALCORUB into your hand and rub the entire surface of the body until you feel a gentle glow. After the ALCORUB is all rubbed in, dash a second application of ALCORUB quickly over the skin and let this evaporate—it takes only a few seconds. Do not rub in this last application of ALCORUB.

Amazing results—quickly

You will sleep, oh, so restfully. You will feel new vigor as the pores of your skin are cleansed and blood-vessels and nerves are gently stimulated You will be delighted with the results of a few weeks of faithful treatment with ALCORUB.

Try it tonight. Your druggist has ALCORUB or will get it for you. Do not be satisfied with any substitute.

U. S. INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL CO.
NEW YORK

ALCORUB

For the Beauty and Health of the Skin

"STEARNS' Day Dream Face Powder has a velvety smoothness that I've never found in another. And its odor is exquisite . . . deliciously tantalizing is, I believe, the best way to describe it."

Elsie Janis

Day Dream

The Day Dream Perfume that Miss Janis has described so well is only one of many charming Day Dream Boudoir Creations. Let us send you the new Day Dream "Acquaintance Box," which gives you an opportunity to enjoy the Perfume, Face Powder, Cold Cream, Poudre Creme and Soap. Sent promptly on receipt of a twenty-five cent piece.

Dept. R

STEARNS—PERFUMER

Creator of Sadira and l'Amusette

Established 1855

Detroit, Mich. Windsor, Ont.

people closely. He was a man of large affairs, with faculties trained to the quick inspection and appraisement of every stranger he met.

For the thousandth time Bruce renewed his determination to hold his ground. He liked the town; his heart warmed under the general friendliness and he was hardly likely to find another opening so promising as that offered by Freeman.

The middle-aged woman who opened the door was evidently a member of the household and he hastily thrust back into his pocket the card he had taken out, stated his name and asked if Miss Harden was at home.

"Yes, Millie's home. Just come in, Mr. Storrs, and I'll call her."

But Millicent came into the hall without waiting to be called.

"I'm so glad to see you, Mr. Storrs!" she said, and introduced him to her mother, a tall, heavily built woman with reddish hair turning gray and a friendly countenance.

"I was just saying to Doctor Harden that I guessed nobody was coming in tonight when you rang. You simply can't keep a servant in to answer the bell in the evening. You haven't met Doctor Harden? Millie, won't you call your papa?"

Millicent opened a door that revealed a small, cozy sitting room and summoned her father—a short, thick-set man with a close trimmed gray beard who came out clutching a newspaper.

"Shan't we all go into the library?" asked Millicent after the two men had been introduced and had expressed their approval of the prolonged fine weather.

"You young folks make yourselves comfortable in the library," said Mrs. Harden. "I told Millie it was too warm for a fire but she just has to have the fireplace going when there's any excuse, and this house does get chilly in the fall evenings even when it's warm outside."

Harden was already retreating toward the room from which he had been drawn to meet the caller, and his wife immediately followed.

Both repeated their expressions of pleasure at meeting Bruce; but evidently in the accepted fashion of American parents when their daughters entertain callers, they had no intention of appearing again.

Millicent snapped on lights that disclosed a long, high-ceilinged room finished in dark oak and fitted up as a library. A disintegrating log in the broad fireplace had thrown out a puff of smoke that gave the air a fleeting pungent scent of burning wood.

The flooring was of white and black tiles covered with oriental rugs in which the dominant dark red brought a warmth to the eye. In one corner stood a grand piano, and beyond it a spiral stair led to a small balcony on which the keyboard of an organ was visible. Back of this was a stained glass window depicting a knight in armor—a challenging, militant figure. Even as revealed only by the inner illumination its rich colors and vigorous draftsmanship were clearly suggested. And it was wholly appropriate, Bruce decided, and altogether consonant with the general scheme of the room. Noting his interest, Millicent turned a switch that lighted the window from a room beyond with the effect of vitalizing the knight's figure, making him seem indeed to be

Pert

The Waterproof Rouge

Orange-colored, lasts all day

BECAUSE PERT is a cream rouge it prevents enlarged pores. Its cream base acts as that protective film which should always intervene between the skin and anything applied to it. Contains no oil. PERT is wonderfully natural; it changes from orange to pink as it touches the skin. And it lasts all day or all evening, until removed with cold cream or soap and water. At drug or department stores, or by mail, 75c.

Send a dime for a sample of PERT Rouge. And for another dime you will receive a sample of WINX, the Liquid Lashlux, for darkening the lashes and making them appear heavier.

ROSS COMPANY

Makers of Winx,
The Liquid Lashlux

74 Grand St., New York

Become a Nurse

Earn $25 to $35 a Week

PREPARE at home by our training course. Entire tuition earned in a few weeks. Increases efficiency and earnings of practical nurses. Twenty years of success; 12,000 graduates. Two months' trial. Send for catalog.

THE CHAUTAUQUA SCHOOL OF NURSING

387 Main Street Jamestown, N. Y.

High School Course in 2 Years

You can complete this simplified High School Course at home inside of two years. Meets all requirements for entrance to college and the leading professions. This and thirty-six other practical courses are described in our Free Bulletin. Send for it TODAY.

AMERICAN SCHOOL

Dept. H., 414 Drexel Avenue and 58th Street Chicago

Crippled? Deformed?

COME TO US—WE CAN HELP YOU!

All Ages Treated Regardless of Condition

Hopelessly crippled. Now able to WALK!

Before Treatment

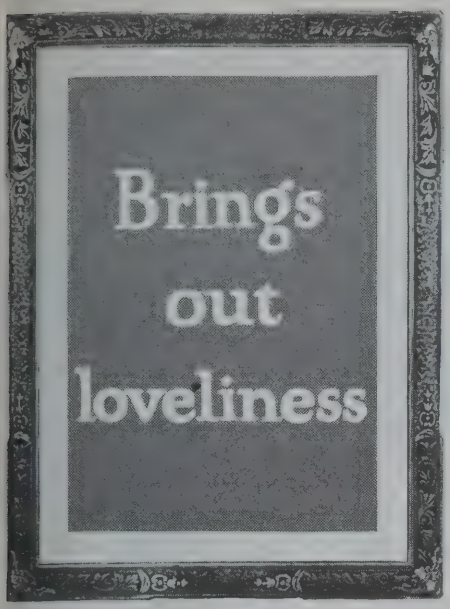
After Treatment

Amazing result of the methods used by the

ROTH ORTHOPEDIC INSTITUTE

"Endorsed By Its Patients"

A MORE CONVINCING TRIBUTE CANNOT POSSIBLY BE MADE.



For three generations devoted to the relief of the crippled and deformed, the ROTH INSTITUTE specializes in the treatment of—Infantile Paralysis; Spastic Paralysis—Curvature of the Spine; Potts Disease; Tuberculosis of the Hip, Knee or Ankle, Dislocation or Contraction of all Joints; Arthritis Deformans; Fractures, Acute or Non-United; Club Feet—and all similar conditions.

LET US CONVINCE YOU!
WE INVITE INVESTIGATION.

Descriptive Booklet will be sent upon request.

ROTH ORTHOPEDIC INSTITUTE

125 West 97th St., New York City.

IF YOU want to bring out all the loveliness that lies hidden in your hair, the shampoo that you use must do more than merely cleanse.

It must give your hair the food it needs—it must keep the scalp soft and healthy.

And that is exactly what fragrant Wildroot Taroleum Shampoo does.

Its creamy, abundant lather cleanses.

Its purified crude oil and tar feed the scalp.

Its antiseptic qualities keep hair healthy.

Sold everywhere

gravely riding, with lance in rest, along the wall.

"Do pardon me!" Bruce murmured, standing just inside the door and glancing about with frank enjoyment of the room's spaciousness.

The outer lines of the somewhat commonplace square brick house had not prepared him for this. The room presented a mingling of periods to both architecture and furnishing, but the blending had been admirably done.

"Forgive me for staring," he said as he sat down on a divan opposite her with the hearth between them. "I'm not sure even yet that I'm in the twentieth century."

"I suppose it is a queer jumble; but don't blame the architect! He, poor wretch, thought we were perfectly crazy when we started, but I think before he got through he really liked it."

"I envy him the fun he had doing it! But someone must have furnished the inspiration. I'm going to assume that it was mostly you."

"You may if you'll go ahead and criticize—tear it all to pieces."

"I'd as soon think of criticizing Chartres, Notre Dame, or the hand that rounded Peter's dome!" Bruce exclaimed. "Alas that our acquaintance is so brief! I want to ask you all manner of questions—how you came to do it—and all that."

"Well, first of all one must have an indulgent father and mother. I'm reminded occasionally that my little whims were expensive."

"I dare say they were! But it's something to have a daughter who can produce a room like this."

He rose and bowed to her, and then turning toward the knight in the window gravely saluted.

"I'm not so sure," he said as he sat down, "that the gentleman up there didn't have something to do with it."

"Please don't make too much of him! Everyone pays me the compliment of thinking him Galahad but I think of him as the naughty Launcelot. I read a book once on old French glass and I just had to have a window. And the organ made this room the logical place for it. Papa calls this my chapel and refuses to sit in it at all. He says it's too much like church!"

"Ah! But that's a tribute in itself! Your father realizes that this is a place for worship—without reference to the knight."

She laid her forefinger against her cheek, tilted her head slightly, mocking him with lips and eyes.

"Let me think! That was a pretty speech but of course you're referring to that bronze Buddha over there. Come to think of it papa does rather fancy him."

When she smilingly met his gaze he laughed and made a gesture of despair.

"That was a nice bit of side-stepping! I'm properly rebuked. I see my own worshiping must be done with caution. But the room is beautiful. I'm glad to know there's such a place in town."

"I did have a good time planning and arranging it. But there's nothing remarkable about it after all. It's merely what you might call a refuge from reality—if that means anything."

"It means a lot—too much for me to grasp all at once."

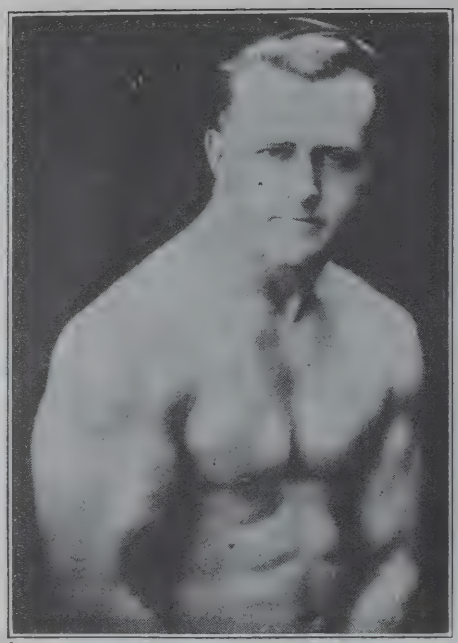
"You're making fun of me. All I meant was that I wanted a place to escape into where I can play at being something I really

How about your photograph?

WHEN she is being photographed, lovely hair means everything to a woman.

For your complexion may be perfect, your teeth pearly white, and your eyes deep blue. But the camera will not tell that.

If your hair is fluffy, wavy and attractively arranged, you will be proud of the finished picture—and your friends will be proud to have it.



Thousands of women have found that Wildroot Hair Tonic brings out the hidden charm that is the key to loveliness.

After your Wildroot shampoo, massage Wildroot Hair Tonic into the scalp. Then notice the immediate results. Wildroot Co., Inc., Buffalo, N.Y.

WILDROOT HAIR TONIC

Sold everywhere

EARLE E. LIEDERMAN
as he is today

If a Snake Had Brains—

He would still be a snake. With his present body he would be forced to continue crawling on his belly. So he would be no better off.

Of What Use Is Your Brain?

A snake is the lowest and meanest of animal life, while mankind is the highest. Do you make use of your advantages? Your brain is used to direct your body. If you don't keep the body in fit condition to do its work, you are doomed for failure. How are you using this wonderful structure? Do you neglect it or improve it?

Examine Yourself

A healthy body is a strong, robust one. Do you arise in the morning full of pep and ambition to get started on the day's work? Do you have the deep, full chest, the big, mighty arms and the broad back of a REAL HE MAN? Do you have the spring to your step and the bright flash to your eye that means you are bubbling over with vitality? If not you are slipping backward. You are not a real man and you cannot hope for the admiration or respect of others. Awake! Get hold of yourself and make yourself THE MAN YOU WERE MEANT TO BE.

90 Days

Will you turn your body over to me for just 90 days? That's all it takes—and I guarantee to give you a physique to be really proud of. Understand I don't promise this—I guarantee it. In 30 days I will increase your arm one full inch, and your chest two inches in the same length of time. And then, just watch 'em grow. From then on you will feel the pep in your old backbone. You will start doing things that you never thought possible. You will amaze yourself and friends as well. Do you crave this new life—these new joys—this abounding health and strength? If you do

Send for My New 64-page Book "MUSCULAR DEVELOPMENT" It Is FREE

It is chock full of photographs both of myself and my numerous pupils. Also contains a treatise on the human body and what can be done with it. This book is bound to interest you and thrill you. It will be an impetus—an inspiration to every red-blooded man. I could easily collect a big price for a book of this kind just as others are now doing, but I want every man and boy who is interested to just send the attached coupon and the book is his—absolutely free. All I ask is the price of wrapping and postage—10 cents. Remember, this does not obligate you in any way. I want you to have it. So it's yours to keep. Now don't delay one minute. This may be the turning point in your life. Tear off the coupon and mail at once while it is on your mind.

EARLE E. LIEDERMAN
Dept. 8004, 305 Broadway, New York City

EARLE E. LIEDERMAN
Dept. 8004, 305 Broadway, N. Y. City

Dear Sir:—I enclose herewith 10 cents for which you are to send me, without obligation on my part whatever, a copy of your latest book. "Muscular Development." (Please write or print plainly.)

Name .....

Address .....

City..... State.....

am not. We all need to do that. After all, it's just a room."

"Of course that's just what it isn't! It's superb. I've already decided to spend a lot of time here."

"You may, if you won't pick up little chance phrases I let fall and frighten me with them. I have a friend—an awful high-brow—and he bores me to death exclaiming over things I say and can't explain and then explaining them to me. But—why aren't you at the Claytons' party?"

"I wasn't asked," he said. "I don't know them."

"I know them, but I wasn't asked," she replied smilingly.

"Well, anyhow, it's nicer here, I think."

Bruce remembered what Henderson had said about the guarded social acceptance of the patent medicine manufacturer and his family; but Millicent evidently didn't resent her exclusion from the Claytons' party. Social differentiations, Bruce imagined, mattered little to this girl, who was capable of fashioning her own manner of life, even to the point of building a temple for herself in which to worship gods of her own choosing. When he expressed interest in her modeling she led the way to a door opening into an extension of the library beyond the knight's window, that served her as a studio. It was only a way of amusing herself, she said, when he admired a plaque of a child's profile she confessed to be her work.

The studio bore traces of recent use. Damp cloths covered several unfinished figures. There was a drawing board in one corner and scattered among the casts on the wall were crayon sketches, merely notes, she explained, tacked up to preserve her impressions of faces that interested her.

They went back to the fire and were soon running skimmingly through all the arts, lingering as they found ground of common interest. He was struck by her freedom from pretense; when he touched on something of which she was ignorant or about which she was indifferent, she did not scruple to say so. Her imaginative, poetical side expressed itself with healthy candor and frequent flashes of girlish enthusiasm. She was wholly natural, refreshingly spontaneous in speech, with no traces of pedantry or conceit even in discussing music, in which her training had gone beyond the usual amateur's bounds.

"You haven't been to see Leila yet? She asked you to, and if you don't go she'll think it's because of that little unpleasantness on the river. Leila's altogether worth while."

Bruce muttered something about having been very busy. He had determined never to enter Franklin Mills's house and he was embarrassed by Millicent's intimation that Leila might take it amiss that he didn't call.

"Leila's a real person," Millicent was saying. "Her great trouble is in trying to adjust herself to a way of life that doesn't suit her a little bit."

"You mean——" he began and paused because he didn't know at all what she meant.

"I mean that living in a big house and going to teas and upholding the dignity of a prominent and wealthy family bores her to distraction. Her chief trouble is her way of protesting against the kind of life she's born to. It's screamingly funny, but Leila just hates being rich, and she's terribly bored at having so much expected of her as her father's daughter."

"His standard then is so high?" Bruce ventured, curious as to what further she might say of her neighbor.

"Oh, Mr. Mills is an interesting man and he worships Leila; but she worries and puzzles him. It isn't just the difference between age and youth——" She paused conscious perhaps of the impropriety of discussing her neighbor with a comparative stranger, but Bruce's gravely attentive face prompted her to go on. "He's one of those people we meet sometimes who don't seem—how can one put it?—they don't seem quite at ease in the world."

"Yes," he said slowly, "but—where all the conditions of happiness are given—money, position, leisure to do as you please—what excuse has anyone for not finding happiness? You'd conclude that there was some fundamental defect——"

"And when you reach that conclusion you're not a bit better off!" she interrupted. "You're back where you started. Oh well!" she said, satisfied now that she had said quite enough about her neighbor and regretting that she had mentioned him at all, "it's too bad happiness can't be bought as you buy records to play in a machine and have nothing to do but wind it up and listen. You have to do a little work yourself."

"We've all got to play in the band—that's the idea!" he laughed, and they amused themselves by giving all manner of ludicrous turns to the illustration.

To escape from the thought of Mills Bruce asked her whether she ever played for an ignorant heathen like himself.

"You're probably a stern critic," she replied, "but I'll take a chance. If you don't mind I'll try the organ. Papa and mamma always like me to play some old pieces for them before they go to bed. Afterwards I'll do some other things."

In a moment she was in the balcony with the knight towering above her, but he faded into the shadows as she turned on the lights in the studio below. Bruce's eyes at once became attentive to her golden head and clearly limned profile defined by the lamp over the music rack. She seemed suddenly infinitely remote, caught away into a world of legendary and elusive things. The first reedy notes of the organ stole eerily through the room as though they too were evoked from an unseen world.

The first things she played were a concession to her parents' taste, but she threw into them all the sentiment they demanded—the familiar airs of "Annie Laurie," "Ben Bolt," and "Auld Lang Syne." She played them without flourishes, probably in deference to the preferences of the father and mother who were somewhere listening. To these she added old revival songs—"Beulah Land," and "Pull for the Shore"—these also presumably favorites of the unseen listeners. He watched her aureoled head, the graceful movement of her arms and shoulders as she gave herself to her task with complete absorption. She was kind to these parents of hers; possibly it was through her music that she really communicated with them, met them on ground of their simpler knowledge and aspirations.

He was conscious presently of the fact

This woman is seldom invited to go out; she is lonely all day long—

While this one has a calendar that is crowded with interesting, delightful engagements.

Which of these women has learned the secret of Fifteen Minutes a Day?

TWO WOMEN live in neighboring homes. They are the same age. Their husbands' income are about equal. They seem to have the same chance of social success and happiness.

And yet, one of these women is invited seldom to go out. She belongs to no set or club or society. She is lonely all day long.

The other women is always the center of a group of friends. Her calendar is full of engagements. She is sought after as a guest and admired as hostess.

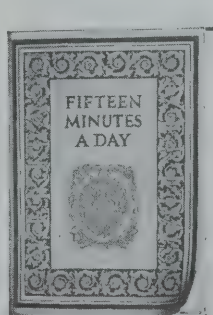
Make Her Secret Your Own

Her secret is very simple. She has learned how to attract people. She has read many things. Her mind is keen and alert, and people feel instinctively that she is worth knowing.

Any woman who knows something of literature and science, of travel and biography, will find herself becoming more and more attractive.

"I can understand that," you may say, "but I have no chance now to go to college. I cannot spend long hours in a library, nor afford to buy hundreds of books."

None of these things is necessary. It is possible to secure, all at once and at very small expense, the few great books that enable anyone to think clearly and talk well. You will understand how this is possible the moment you have read a wonderfully interesting book called "Fifteen Minutes a Day," which gives you the contents, plan and purpose of the most famous library in the world,



DR. ELIOT'S FIVE-FOOT SHELF OF BOOKS

The little book is free. It tells how Dr. Eliot put into his Five-FootShelf "the essentials of a liberal education"; and how he has so arranged it with reading courses and notes that even fifteen minutes a day are enough to give you the broad knowledge of life and literature, the cultivated viewpoint that every university strives to give.

If you bought them one by one, these great books would cost you hundreds of dollars; but they are now available, in a variety of beautiful bindings, at a cost so low and on terms so easy that the price need not be a factor in the mind of anyone.

Every reader of this page is invited to have a free copy of "Fifteen Minutes a Day." It will be sent by mail postpaid, and does not obligate you in any way. Merely tear off this coupon and mail it now

Send for free book that gives Dr. Eliot's own plan of reading

P. F. Collier & Son Company
416 West 13th St., New York City

By mail, free, send me the little guidebook to the most famous books in the world, describing Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books, and containing the plan of reading recommended by Dr. Eliot of Harvard.

Name .....
(Please write plainly)

Address .....

.....

790-HCS L

Say Ben-Gay for Aches and Pains

CHILDREN—those bangs and bumps and little aches and pains [and the headaches and sore throats] that make the children feel so cross and restless—all disappear with

BAUME BENGUE
(ANALGESIQUE)

Ask mother to rub it on the place that hurts—she knows how it soothes and comforts and drives away the pain. If she says Ben-Gay at any drug store she will get

BAUME BENGUÉ
The Original French Baume

A mother writes: "I have had the greatest comfort using Ben-Gay for the children's aches and pains"

FIRST AID for Aches and Pains

INVENTORS Desiring to secure patent should write for our book, "How To Get Your Patent." Send model or sketch of invention for opinion of patentable nature.
RANDOLPH & CO.
Dept. 33 ---------- Washington, D. C.

We Start You in Business, furnishing everything; men and women, opportunity lifetime to earn handsome income operating our "New System Specialty Candy Factories" anywhere. Booklet free.
HILLYER-RAGSDALE CO., East Orange, N. J.

LABLACHE
FACE POWDER

The clinging softness and subtle fragrance of Lablache awaken memories of Mother's caressing hands and good-night kiss. This pure—delicately perfumed powder is like a blessing to your skin. A proven favorite for fifty years. Refuse substitutes. They may be dangerous. Flesh, White, Pink or Cream.

50c a Box
of Druggists or by mail
Send 10c for a Sample Box
BEN. LEVY CO.
French Perfumers, Dept. 59
125 Kingston St. Boston, Mass.

DIAMONDS

FOR A FEW CENTS A DAY

Don't send a cent. Ten days' Trial. If you are not convinced it is the Greatest Bargain in America, send it back at our expense. Only if pleased do you send $1.50 as first payment. Then send $1.50 weekly—at the rate of a few cents a day. This Bargain Cluster Ring with 7 Blue-White Perfect Cut Diamonds can be yours. No Red Tape. No Risk.

MILLION DOLLAR BARGAIN BOOK FREE

Million Dollar Bargain Book of Bargains. FREE Send for it today. It pictures thousands Address Dept. 1204.

J.M.LYON & CO.
2-4 Maiden Lane N.Y.

ring of a bell followed by the murmur of voices in the hall. Someone entered the room and sat down quietly behind him. Millicent, who had paid no heed to him since mounting to the organ, was just beginning the Tannhäuser overture. She followed this with passages from Lohengrin and Parsifal and classical liturgical music touched with a haunting mystery . . .

She came down slowly into the room as though the spell of the music still held her.

"I shan't say anything—it might be the wrong word," he said as he went to meet her. "But it was beautiful—very beautiful!"

"You were a good listener; I felt that," she replied.

He had forgotten that there had been another listener until she smilingly waved her hand to someone behind him.

"So I had two victims—and didn't know it! Patient sufferers! Mr. Mills, you and Mr. Storrs have met—I needn't introduce you a second time."

It was Franklin Mills, then, exercising a neighbor's privilege, who had arrived midway of the recital and taken a seat by the door.

"Mr. Storrs is a perfect listener," Mills was saying as he shook hands with Bruce. "He didn't budge all the time you were playing."

Bruce resented Mills's coming, or more truly it was the manner of his entrance, pointing as it did to an intimate relationship with the house, that he resented. The man's easy, gracious manners, the intimacy implied in his chaffing tone as he complained that she played better when she didn't know he was in the house, irritated Bruce. He had been enjoying himself so keenly, the girl's talk had so interested him and he had been so thrilled and lifted by her music that Mills's appearance was like a profanation. It was not jealousy, he tried to assure himself, but indignation that the man who in years gone by had done a foul and hideous thing, should thrust himself upon the attention of so rare and lovely a being as Millicent Harden.

They were all seated now, and Millicent spoke of a book Mills had sent her which it happened Bruce had read, and she asked his opinion of it before expressing her own. Very likely Mills was in the habit of sending her books. She said that she hadn't cared greatly for the book—a novel that discussed the labor question. The author evidently had no solution of his own problem and left the reader in the air as to his purpose.

"Maybe he only meant to arouse interest—stir people up and leave the solution to others," Bruce suggested.

"That was the way I took it," said Mills. "The fact is nobody has any solution short of a complete tearing down of everything. And that," he added with a smile and a shrug, "would be very uncomfortable."

"For us—yes," Millicent replied quickly. "But a good many millions would probably welcome a chance to begin over again."

"What with," Mills demanded, with his quick laugh, "when everything had been smashed?"

"Oh, they'd be sure to save something out of the wreck!" said Millicent.

"Well," Mills remarked, "I'm hoping the smash won't come in my day. I'm too old to go out with a club to fight for food against the mob."

"You want us to say that you're not too old," laughed Millicent; "but we're not going to fall into that trap!"

"But—what is going to happen?" asked Bruce.

"Other civilizations!" Mills replied, regarding the young man with an intent look. "We've had a succession of them, and the world's about due to slip back into chaos and perhaps emerge again. It's only the barbarians who never change; they know they'll be on top again if they just wait."

"What an optimist you are!" cried Millicent. "But you don't really believe such things."

"Of course I do," Mills answered with a broad smile.

She made it necessary for Bruce to assist her in combating Mills's hopeless view of the future, though she bore the main burden of the opposition herself. Mills's manner toward the young people was one of good-natured indulgence; but Bruce was wondering whether there was not a deep vein of cynicism in the man. Mills was clever at fencing, and some of the things he said lightly no doubt expressed real convictions.

Bruce was about to take his leave when Mills with assumed petulance declared that the fire had been neglected and began poking the embers. Carefully putting the poker and tongs back in the rack he lounged toward the door, paused halfway and said good night formally, bowing first to one and then the other.

"Come in again sometime!" Millicent called after him.

"Is that impudence?" Mills replied, reappearing from the hall with his coat and hat. In a moment the door closed and they heard the sound of his stick on the walk outside.

"He's always like that," Millicent remarked after a moment of silence. "It's understood that he may come in when I'm playing and leave when he pleases. Sometimes when I'm at the organ he sits for an hour without my knowing he's here. It made me nervous at first—just remembering that he might be here; but I got over that when I found that he really enjoyed the playing. I'm sorry he didn't stay longer and really talk; he wasn't at his best tonight."

Bruce made the merest murmur of assent, but something in Mills's listlessness, his quizzical, mocking tone, the very manner of his departure, affected him disagreeably.

He realized that he was staying too long for a first call, but he lingered until they had regained the cheery note with which the evening began, and said good night.

II

When he reached the street Bruce decided to walk the mile that lay between the Hardens' and his apartment. His second meeting with Franklin Mills had left his mind in tumult. He was again beset by an impulse to flee from the place, but this he fought and slowly vanquished.

Happiness and peace were not to be won by flight. In his soldiering he had never feared bodily injury, and at times when he had speculated as to the existence of a soul he had decided that if he possessed

You, too, can retain your charm and health throughout the years

"Honestly, Mother, every time I come home and see you I make the same wish deep down in my heart—that I'll retain my health and charm through the years as you have done. Remember what Eleanor Palmer asked at my wedding, 'Which one of you is the bride?' It wasn't flattery, either. Tell me—what is your secret?"

"It isn't any secret, Dorothy. Well, yes, I suppose it must be in a way—otherwise there would not be so many women of middle age who are tired, listless, worried about their health.

"It's tragic to see them age so rapidly. And in most cases I believe it's so unnecessary. True, the cares of motherhood are wearing but mine have been as exacting as those of most women who have lost their charm and vigor.

"You know I have been careful about just a few things. Every day I rest and relax even if for only five minutes. I don't eat unwisely. I exercise regularly.

"Last but by no means least, I have always been exceedingly careful about one thing to which many women do not pay proper attention—feminine cleanliness that is antiseptically clean."

The importance of feminine hygiene

Women today understand hygienic laws better than they did yesterday. Intelligent observance of those laws is the surest recipe for growing old gracefully and happily. None of them is more important than feminine cleanliness—personal hygiene.

This requires more than "soap-and-water" cleanliness. It can be attained only by the same means that the doctor utilizes—the use of an antiseptic effective for personal hygiene.

"Lysol", originally prepared for use by the medical profession, is ideal for personal hygiene. In proper solution with water, it is not caustic and does not irritate. At all drug stores.

Use "Lysol" as an antiseptic solution
Teaspoonful to one quart water
For personal hygiene
When baby comes
For wounds
For the sickroom
For the bathroom

Use "Lysol" as a disinfecting solution
Two teaspoonfuls to one quart water
For the kitchen
In the toilet
For sweeping
For floors, cellars, dark corners

Manufactured only by LYSOL, INC., 635 Greenwich St., New York City
Sole Distributors: Lehn & Fink, Inc., New York
Canadian Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Limited, 10 McCaul St., Toronto

Complete directions for use are in every package. The genuine "Lysol" Disinfectant is put up only in brown glass bottles containing 3, 7 or 16 ounces; each bottle is packed in a yellow carton. Insist upon obtaining genuine "Lysol".

Lysol Disinfectant
Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

The ideal personal antiseptic

Your Spare Time is Worth Money

Try Mrs. Rankin's Method

Mrs. Frances H. Rankin, of Texas
A Successful Member of The Rainbow Club

We are heartily proud of Mrs. Rankin's work in The Rainbow Club. She has learned the wise use of her leisure time. By making every moment count, many extra dollars—and Club gifts, too—have come her way since winning her membership.

Why Not You, Too?

No matter what your occupation, there is bound to be some portion of your day when you are free or can arrange to have an hour, even a half-hour, to devote to other interests. Our plan is so adaptable that it offers an opportunity to every woman—from school-girl to grandmother.

Get Your Spring Wardrobe at Our Expense

With the Spring come new expenses to meet. But Springtime brings also the desire for greater activity—we are in a fever to be about something new, to buy new things, go to new places. We long to be out of door and to take up new work.

Let The Rainbow Club show you how you may doubly enjoy your outings in the Spring sunshiny days, by making them profitable as well.

Join The Rainbow Club

Membership in the Club brings with it such a feeling of security. You can plan for your needs and always know how you are going to get the extra dollars with which to satisfy them.

Wouldn't you like to know more about us? It costs you nothing to join. You need no experience and no previous training. Just fill in the coupon and mail it to me, or write me a letter telling me all about your needs. I am eager to show you the way to make more money to save or spend.

Helen Willard

Secretary The Rainbow Club.

HELEN WILLARD, Secretary The Rainbow Club
Good Housekeeping Magazine
119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

Without obligation to me please send me full information about your spare time money-making plan.

Name .....

Street .....

City..... State.....

RC-C4-23

such a thing he would not suffer it to play the coward. But this unexpected meeting at the Hardens', which was likely to be repeated if he continued his visits to the house, had shaken his nerve more than he liked to believe possible. Millicent evidently admired Mills, sympathized with him in his loneliness, was flattered perhaps by his visits to her home in search of solace and cheer or whatever it was Mills sought.

The sky was overcast and a keen wind whipped the overhanging maples as Bruce strode homeward with head bent, his hands thrust deep into the pockets of his overcoat. He hummed and whistled phrases of the Parsifal, with his thoughts playing about Millicent's head as she had sat at the organ with the knight keeping watch above her. After all, it was through beautiful things, man-made and God-made, as his mother had taught him, that life found its highest realizations. In this idea there was an infinite stimulus. Millicent had found for herself this clue to happiness and was a radiant proof of its efficacy. It had been a privilege to see her in her own house, to enjoy contact with her questioning, meditative mind, and to lose himself in her entrancing music.

The street was deserted and only a few of the houses he passed showed lights. Bruce experienced again, as often in his night tramps during the year of his exile, a happy sense of isolation. He was so completely absorbed in his thoughts that he was unaware of the propinquity of another pedestrian who was slowly approaching as though as unheedful as he of the driving wind and the first fitful patter of rain. They passed so close that their arms touched. Both turned, staring blankly in the light of the street lamps, and muttered confused apologies.

"Oh, Storrs!" Franklin Mills exclaimed, bending his head against the wind.

"Sorry to have bumped into you, sir," Bruce replied, and feeling that nothing more was required of him he was about to go on, but Mills said quickly:

"We're in for a hard rain. Come back to my house—it's only half a dozen blocks—and I'll send you home."

There was something of kindly peremptoriness in his tone, and Bruce, at a loss for words with which to refuse, followed, thinking that he would walk a block to meet the demands of courtesy and turn back. Mills, forging ahead rapidly, complained good naturedly of the weather.

"I frequently prowl around a little at night," he explained; "I sleep better afterwards."

"I like a night walk myself," Bruce replied.

"Not afraid of hold-ups? I was relieved to find it was you I ran into. My daughter says I'm bound to get sandbagged some night."

At the end of the first block both were obliged to battle against the wind which now drove the rain in furious gusts through the intersecting streets. In grasping his hat Mills dropped his stick and after picking it up Bruce took hold of his arm for greater ease in keeping together. It would, he decided, be an ungenerous desertion to leave him now, and so they arrived after much buffeting at Mills's door.

"That's a young hurricane," said Mills as he let himself in. "When you've dried out a bit I'll send you on in my car."

In response to his ring a manservant appeared and carried away their hats and overcoats to be dried. Mills led the way to the upstairs living room, where a fire had been kindled, probably against the master's return in the storm.

"Sit close and put your shoes to the blaze. I think a hot drink would be a help."

Hot water and Scotch were brought and Mills laughingly assured Bruce that he needn't be afraid of the liquor.

"I had it long before Prohibition, of course; everybody has to say that!"

In his wildest speculations as to possible meetings with his father Bruce had imagined nothing like this. He was not only in Franklin Mills's house, but the man was graciously ministering to his comfort. And Bruce with every desire to resist, to refuse these little courteous offices, was meekly submitting. Mills, talking easily with legs stretched to the fire, sipped his drink contentedly while the storm beat with mounting fury round the house.

"I think my son said you had been in the army; I should say that the experience hadn't done you any harm," Mills remarked in his pleasant voice.

"Quite the contrary, sir. The knocking about I got did me good."

"I envy you young fellows the experience; it was a ghastly business but it must mean a lot in a man's life to have gone through it."

In response to a direct question Bruce stated concisely the nature of his service. His colorless recital of the bare record brought a smile to Mills's face.

"You're like all the young fellows I've talked with—modest, even a little indifferent about it. I think if I'd been over there I should do some bragging!"

Still bewildered to find himself at Mills's fireside, Bruce was wondering how soon he could leave; but Mills talked on in leisurely fashion of the phenomenal growth of the town and the opportunities it offered to young men. Bruce was ashamed of himself for not being more responsive; but Mills seemed content to ramble on, though carefully attentive to the occasional remarks Bruce roused himself to make. Bruce, with ample opportunity, observed Mills's ways—little tricks of speech, the manner in which he smoked—lazily blowing rings at intervals and watching them waver and break—an occasional quick lifting of his well kept hand to his forehead.

It was after they had been together for half an hour that Bruce noted that Mills, after meeting his gaze, would lift his eyes and look intently at something on the wall over the bookcases—something immediately behind Bruce and out of the range of his vision. It seemed not to be the unseeing stare of inattention; but whatever it was, it brought a fleeting look of perplexity to Mills's face. Bruce began to find this upward glance disconcerting, and evidently aware that his visitor was conscious of it, Mills quickly shifted his position.

"I must run along," said Bruce presently. "The storm is letting up. I can easily foot it home."

"Not at all! After keeping you till midnight I'll certainly not send you out to get another wetting. There's still quite a splash on the windows."

What about the men?

AN intelligent young woman in Cleveland sat down to her typewriter during noon hour the other day, and wrote us the following:

"Gentlemen: Please hand this letter to the man who attends to your advertising.

"I have been a lot interested in reading what he has to say about Halitosis (unpleasant breath) because it all hits so close to where I live eight hours every day.

"It's the man I work for who is the offender, and I am simply hoping and hoping every day that he will see one of your advertisements and that it will do him some good! You see I don't dare mention it to him.

"I'd clip out one of your advertisements and hand it to him if I didn't need my present job as badly as I do.

"If you have any suggestion, I'd be glad to have it.

Yours truly, G. S."

* * *

So there you are, Miss G. S. If this advertisement helps you out, we'll all be happy.

The insidious thing about halitosis (the medical term for unpleasant breath) is that you, yourself, rarely know when you have it. And even your closest friends won't tell you.

Sometimes, of course, halitosis comes from some deep-seated organic disorder that requires professional advice. But usually—and fortunately—halitosis is only a local condition that yields to the regular use of Listerine as a mouth-wash and gargle.

She wrote this during her noon hour

This halts food fermentation in the mouth and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean. So the systematic use of Listerine this way puts you on the safe and polite side. You know your breath is right. Fastidious people everywhere are making it a regular part of their daily toilet routine.

Your druggist will supply you with Listerine. He sells lots of it. It has dozens of different uses as a safe antiseptic and has been trusted as such for half a century. Read the interesting booklet that comes with every bottle.—Lambert Pharmacal Co., Saint Louis, U. S. A.

For HALITOSIS use LISTERINE

Danger Lurks in the Hidden Trap

The hidden toilet trap, if unclean, is unhealthful. No brush can reach it. Sani-Flush does!

Sani-Flush cleans the trap! Purifies it. Destroys all foul odors.

Sani-Flush cleans the bowl. Sprinkle in a little Sani-Flush. Follow directions on the can. Flush! All stains, discolorations, incrustations disappear. The bowl shines. No scrubbing—no scouring—no harm to plumbing connections. Sani-Flush is alone in the work it does.

Always keep Sani-Flush handy in the bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. If you cannot get it at your regular store, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full-sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
Canton, Ohio

Foreign Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd.
Toronto, Canada
33 Farringdon Road, London, E. C. 1, England
China House, Sydney, Australia

Sani-Flush
Reg U S Pat Off.
Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

REDUCE Your Ankles

Beautiful, Slim, Appealing, Dainty Ankles Can Be Yours

All Cosmopolitan readers can now have slim, beautiful ankles at the small and insignificant cost of $2.95.

DELRAY ANKLE REDUCER Works While You Sleep

Put them on when you go to bed. Reduces and shapes the ankle and lower calf without the slightest pain. Nothing to rub in or massage. Applied and taken off as a glove. Used by society women and actresses everywhere, and endorsed by medical profession. Can be worn through the day with the heaviest silk stockings without detection. Order now at $2.95 but.

SEND NO MONEY

Simply send us size of ankle and calf, and we will send you in plain envelope a pair of Delray Ankle Reducers designed to shape your ankles to fairy slimness. Pay postman $2.95 plus a few cents postage on arrival and start reducing at once and painlessly. You will notice results immediately. Retain your shapely ankles while in bathing by wearing them.

ACT NOW

Money Refunded if Dissatisfied

DELRAY MFG. CO.
30 East 23rd St., Dept. 50
New York City

He rang for the car before going downstairs, and while he was waiting for the chauffeur to answer on the garage extension of the house telephone, Bruce, from the fireplace, saw that it must have been a portrait—one of a number ranged along the wall—that had invited Mills's gaze so frequently. It was the portrait of a young man, the work of a painstaking if not a brilliant artist. The clean-shaven face, the long, thick, curly brown hair, and the flowing scarf knotted under a high turnover collar combined in an effect of quaintness.

There was something oddly familiar in the young man's countenance. In the few seconds that Mills's back was turned Bruce found himself studying it, wondering what there was about it that teased his memory—what other brow and eyes he had ever seen were like those of the young man who was looking down at him from Franklin Mills's wall. And then it dawned upon him that the face was like his own—might indeed, with a different arrangement of the hair, a softening of certain lines, pass for a portrait of himself.

Mills, turning from the telephone, remarked that the car was on the way.

"Ah!" he added quickly, seeing Bruce's attention fixed on the portrait, "my father, at about thirty-five. There's nothing of me there; I take after my mother's side of the house. Father was taller than I and his features were cleaner cut. He died twenty years ago. I've always thought him a fine American type. Those other——"

Bruce lent polite attention to Mills's comments on the other portraits, one representing his maternal grandfather and another a great-uncle who had been killed in the Civil War. When they reached the lower floor Mills opened the door of a reception room and turned on the frame lights about a full length portrait of a lady in evening dress.

"That is Mrs. Mills," he said, "and an excellent likeness."

He spoke in sophisticated terms of American portraiture as they went to the hall where the servant was waiting with Bruce's hat and coat. A limousine was in the porte-cochère, and Mills stood on the steps until Bruce got in.

"I thank you very much, Mr. Mills," said Bruce, taking the hand Mills extended.

"Oh, I owe you the thanks! I hope to see you again very soon!"

Mills on his way to his room found himself clinging to the stair rail. When he had closed the door he drew his hand slowly across his eyes. He had spoken with Marian Storrs's son and the young man by an irony of nature had the countenance the high-bred air of Franklin Mills III. It was astounding, this skipping for a generation of a type! It seemed to Mills that after he had turned off the lights his father's eyes—the eyes of young Storrs—were still fixed upon him with a curious disconcerting gravity.

The further you read in "The Hope of Happiness" the more you will be gripped by the simple, straightforward power of the developing plot. You won't want to miss the next instalment.

The Garden of Peril

(Continued from page 27)

I could. But it's a rotten situation for Doria. She—she cares so much for that sort of thing," he sighed, adding quickly, "all women do, I expect."

There was a short silence before he continued moodily:

"The bettin' against me is pretty steep, but the old man's on his last legs too. He'd live forever if he could, to keep Doria out, but we have it on the authority of the family doctor that it's only a matter of months now, weeks even. So, if I can only hang on a bit"—his somber gaze ranged across the open veldt, glorious now with sunset hues—"long enough to let her be mistress of Scawnshane . . . even for a few months," he muttered.

To Peril it seemed terrible, this competition of two stricken men for length of days, but one thing was certain: this sick man at least had no selfish motive in his longing. A great pity for him surged in her.

"Of course you are going to get better," she said in a strong confident tone. "You don't know how wonderful Uncle Bruce is. But you must make up your mind, too, and try for your own sake."

The expression of mocking weariness on his face was a melancholy thing to witness.

"Fifty thousand a year's not much good to me, personally. It can't put back the clock and give me yesterday—nor retrieve the constitution I've ruined. Even if it could I should waste the lot, I expect, as I've done before."

He grinned cheerlessly.

"Punch and I, when we came of age each had eighty thousand pounds apiece. And a few years later I had a larger windfall. And where is it all now? 'Gone into the Ewigkeit' as the Boche says. And Punch is glad enough to get a policeman's job at six hundred a year, while I—Well, as you see I have to think twice about a couple of hundred pounds for a car to take the air in."

He laughed mirthlessly.

"We can't help it. It's in the Heseltine blood to waste money, to play pitch and toss with health and happiness. We're fatal men, Miss Kelly. Never have anything to do with us."

She smiled her serene and gentle smile at him, got out a pack of cards from the drawer of the tea table, and began to shuffle them.

A strangely fascinated look crept into Heseltine's eyes as he watched her hands. He loved the very sight of a pack of cards. They meant life to him—men, women, money flowing through the fingers, wine in the bowl, the sands of life flying through the glass—but glittering, sparkling, scintillating, as they flew! He laughed again.

"Punch can talk till all's blue about the charm of the veldt, but, like me, he always loved the lamp-posts. The Heseltine

Boncilla

Do Not Cover Up Facial Blemishes

Remove them with

Boncilla

Beautifier

The Clasmic Pack

Boncilla will give you that clear, fresh, glowing complexion, that firm, youthful skin texture, that irresistible NATURAL color which makes a woman seem eternally young.

Simply spread BONCILLA BEAUTIFIER on your face.

Feel its exhilarating action far below the surface, stimulating the circulation—rejuvenating the muscles and tissues.

After one treatment you can see and feel results. You will know that Boncilla beauty is deeper than skin deep.

Boncilla Beautifier Clasmic Packs

do these definite things for the face on a guarantee of satisfaction or your money will be refunded.

1. Clears the complexion and gives it color.
2. Closes enlarged pores, and eliminates excess oiliness.
3. Removes blackheads aud pimples.
4. Lifts out the lines.
5. Rebuilds drooping facial tissues.
6. Makes the skin soft and velvety.

Department Stores and Drug Stores can supply you with Boncilla preparations. Insist upon Boncilla, the original, genuine clasmic facial pack.

BONCILLA LABORATORIES,
Boncilla Building, Indianapolis, Indiana.

Please send me the introductory Boncilla Pack O' Beauty. I enclose 50 cents to cover cost.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Cos. 4-23

DeMiracle
Every Womans Depilatory

Hair Roots Cannot be Destroyed with Sealing Wax

WE will forfeit $10,000.00 if it can be proved that any sealing wax ever destroyed a single hair root.

Do not buy anything for removing hair unless you get a promise that your money will be refunded if you are dissatisfied after using it once. This is the guarantee under which DeMiracle is sold.

Pulling hair out with sealing wax is painful. It does not destroy hair roots but does enlarge the pores. A simple and inexpensive way to prove this is to try pulling hair out with a small piece of adhesive plaster.

Remember, DeMiracle is the only method that has ever been endorsed by eminent Physicians, Surgeons, Dermatologists, Medical Journals, and Prominent Magazines, for removing hair from face, neck, arms, underarms, limbs, etc. Write for free book, The Truth About Superfluous Hair.

Three Sizes: 60c, $1.00, $2.00

At all toilet counters or direct from us, in plain wrapper on receipt of price.

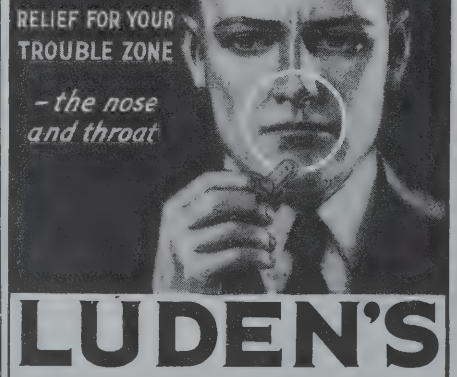
DeMiracle
Dept. T-11, Park Ave. and 129th St., New York

Shave, Bathe and Shampoo with one Soap.—Cuticura

Cuticura Soap is the favorite for safety razor shaving.

BE AN ARTIST

WE CAN TEACH YOU DRAWING in your own home during your spare time. Twenty-five years of successful teaching proves our ability. Artists receive large salaries.
Write to day for Art Year Book
SCHOOL of APPLIED ART
Room No. 1 BATTLE CREEK MICH.



PRINTING CHEAP
Cards, circulars, labels, book paper. Press $12. Larger $35. Job press $150. Save money. Print for others, big profit. All easy, rules sent. Write factory for press catalog, TYPE, cards, etc. THE PRESS CO., D-36, Meriden, Conn.

PATENTS
BOOKLET FREE BEST REFERENCES
PROMPTNESS ASSURED BEST RESULTS
Send drawing or model for examination and report as to patentability.
WATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer
624 F Street Washington, D. C.

DIAMONDS On Credit
Send No Money

BAER BROS. CO.
6 MAIDEN LANE - NEW YORK

LUDEN'S
MENTHOL COUGH DROPS give quick relief

taste runs to the delights of civilization—not to the dry bones and husks of the desert. Poor old Punch! It's hard on him not having enough to keep his end up. However, no Heseltine was ever a money-maker."

"Why didn't he have the same fortune as you?"

"The Law of Property stepped in. My father was the eldest, his the youngest son—and a parson at that. Parsons never have a bean to leave. The eighty thousand Punch got through so heftily came from a great-aunt, and once that was gone he hadn't a hope."

"But he has health and strength," said the girl softly.

Heseltine looked at her.

"You're right, that's something! And a darned good looking face thrown in. What do you say?"

"I have not met your cousin."

"Ah! You must though. He'll be back with Doria before long. It's a blessing she's taken to old Punch or she'd have been bored stiff up here. The villain of the veldt, she calls him, though he keeps telling her veldt is pronounced with an f, and that it's his business to 'run in' villains, not to be one. However——" He sighed. "I know why he's taken so whole heartedly to her."

Peril did not ask why. She seemed lost in thought. But the sick man, obsessed by his subject, rambled on:

"She means Europe to him—all that he can't have. Paris, Monte, Ascot, hunting with the Pytchley, steeplechasing, skiing in Norway. We're all great skiers in our family, I must tell you. My brother Dick is in the Engadine now, having the time of his young life."

"The excitement of sport must be wonderful," said Peril slowly. "And I suppose it is true that in the war these were the men who fought like heroes?"

"They were all heroes — especially Tommy, who gets precious little sport except a game of football on Saturday. But war is the greatest sport of all, and to a man like Punch it must have been meat and drink, even when he hated it most. I know he used to come back from France at the top of his form—and always with some fresh gadget—the M. C.; another bar to his D. S. O., or something or other from the French. Punch never yet went short on glory, I can tell you. It's only fortune that gives him the go-by. And now that fame's all over back he sits in exile on the veldt!"

He laughed, looking away at the horizon with his miserable derisive eyes. Scarlet and primrose splendor had faded now but from the hills long lavender colored shadows were stealing down, assembling like ghosts in the marshes, moving slowly on the town.

"Shall we play a game of piquet?" suggested Peril gently, at last.

"Yes—let's." His glance grew kinder, softer as it came back to her from the distance and rested on her with a man's affection for a sweet child.

"You're a soothing kid, Peril!" This was a new departure, and he hastened to add with an impish smile, "Can I call you Peril, please, because I am going to die soon?"

"Of course you can, but I shall tell Uncle Bruce if you say another word about dying—and apropos, I think we'd better go indoors now, because the mists are rising and he doesn't like those mists for his patients."

So it was in the drawing room that they settled to their game, and there later, in the half-light, the returning riders found them. Punch Heseltine entering from the veranda, behind Doria, got an unforgetable picture of his cousin's profile, brooding hawklike over the cards—those gay emblems of pleasure that had bankrupted more Heseltines than one—and beyond, etched against the shadows, the delicate outline of a girl.

His eyes still held the dazzle and allure of Doria Heseltine, the type of woman who meant to him all the things he couldn't have, but that did not prevent his mind from receiving an impression of something in the room, exquisitely composed of light and darkness, something clear and pure . . . like white flowers in the cool gloom of water.

"Don't let us have the lights," Doria's voice rose plaintively from the deep sofa into which she had sunk. "I feel unspeakably dusty and disheveled. But—Keable! Bring some drinks. You'd like a cocktail I know, Punch?"

"A sundowner would be grateful and refreshing." He wandered over to the card table. "How are you feeling now, old man?"

The game was finished and the girl had risen, crushing a big hat down on to the darkness of her hair. Pam Heseltine, with his sardonic chuckle, introduced them to each other.

"My cousin the Policeman—Miss Kelly, my nerve specialist."

Punch heard a soft laugh, but the girl's face remained seductively obscure under her wide hat.

Then Keable came in with decanters and a cocktail shaker on a silver tray, and the Policeman's task was to "fix a drink" for everybody—everybody, that is to say, except the girl, who, on being gayly rallied by Doria for not conforming to this excellent custom of her country of thirst-quenching at sundown, was heard to say, in a young, warm voice:

"But water is so lovely when one is thirsty."

In the spontaneously derisive but good-natured laughter that broke from all three, the Doctor entered, and began to scold because his patient was still up instead of being comfortably tucked into bed.

"I know, Doctor," murmured Doria sipping her cocktail indifferently. She did not really care about drinks, having far too much regard for her complexion. "But he is so naughty—never pays the slightest attention to what I say. I can do nothing with him, can I, Punch?"

To everyone's surprise Doctor Kelly startled them by raising his voice and saying roughly:

"I must have a nurse in this house." Adding almost brutally, "That is, if you want your husband to get well, Mrs. Heseltine."

"If I want my husband to get well!" cried Doria in the silence. Her glass clashed on the table and she stood up to her tall length. "If I want——" Heartbreak rang in her voice. "Oh, get a nurse! Get a nurse, now, at once, tonight!" She burst out crying.

There was instant hubbub. Her husband, greatly distressed muttering,

The Powder Base Perfection

Copyright 1923 A. S. HINDS CO.

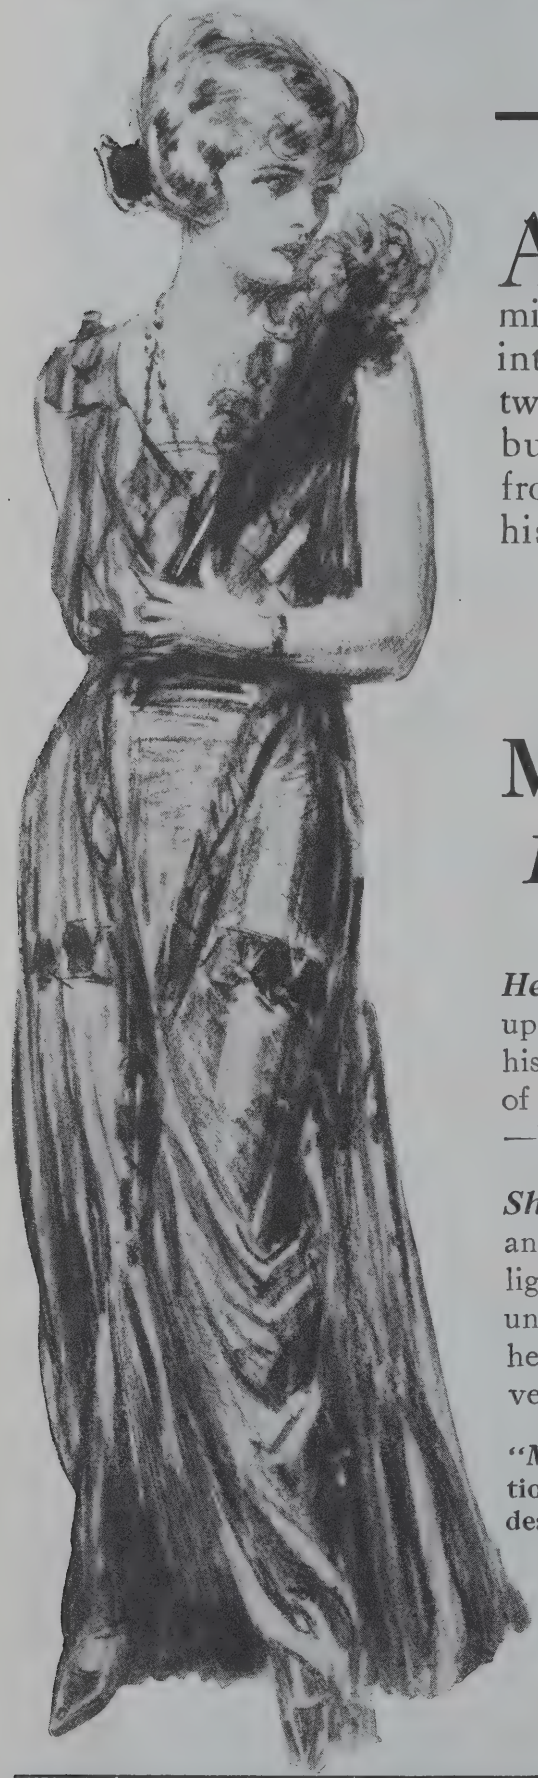
Fashion decrees that woman may wear
A touch of powder to make her fair,
To soften her color and add to the charms
Of her face, her neck, her hands and arms.

But powder to give real beauty and grace
Must be smoothly applied on a proper base;
To prevent detection the base supreme
Is our Hinds Honey and Almond Cream.

Hinds Cre-mis Face Powder next you choose
Delicate, fragrant and charming to use,
And you have the requisites, perfect quite
For a lovely effect by day or night.

True aids to beauty, each user finds
The products that bear the name of Hinds.

So many patrons of our Hinds Honey and Almond Cream are now using it as a base for face powder, and with such gratifying results that we are urging you to give it a trial. 'Twill cost you only a few cents for a trial bottle and the process is extremely simple.



Just moisten the skin with the cream and allow it to nearly dry, then dust on the powder. It will adhere wonderfully and remain in perfect condition longer than with any other base we know of. The cream and powder will prevent the skin from becoming rough or chapped.

HINDS Cre-mis FACE POWDER, impalpably fine and soft. Its delicate tints blend to produce the coveted effect and, with its subtle and distinctive fragrance, enhance the charm of every woman who uses it — white, flesh, pink, brunette. Large box 60 cents. Trial box, 15 cents. Sample, 2 cents.

All druggists and department stores sell Hinds Honey and Almond Cream. We will mail you a small sample for 2 cents or a trial bottle for 6 cents. A Try-out Box of 5 samples, assorted, 10 cents. Booklet Free.

A. S. HINDS CO., DEPT. 11, PORTLAND, MAINE

"Did I Marry a Man —or a Business?"

AS he stood before the altar with Fay Gilman, George Judson devoutly sought to realize the minister's words that God had made himself and Fay into one in that hour. ¶ But a man and woman are two individuals and when Fay's home and George's business came into conflict Fay was unable to keep from crying: "Did I marry George or did I marry his Business?"

The Very Soul of America Is in this Great Novel

MAN'S COUNTRY

By Peter Clark Macfarlane

Illustrated by Charles D. Mitchell

He Was a Self-made Man—George Judson was brought up in humble surroundings. At fourteen he was supporting his family; at twenty-six he was the great financial wizard of the automobile industry. Business was his inspiration —his god. It came first, always—

She Was a Cultured Woman—Fay Gilman had beauty and brains. As a sweetheart she had found Judson a delightful playfellow. But as a husband he did not seem to understand her needs. So on the day when he needed her comfort and sympathy—when his business was on the verge of failure—she was having tea at a Country Club.

"Man's Country" is a novel that is a challenge to every ambitious man and a challenge too, to every woman who holds home dear. It is YOUR story put into a novel. Read it today.

On Sale at Every Good Bookstore $2.00

Cosmopolitan Book Corporation

119 West Fortieth Street, New York

"Doria, old girl—Dorie!" Keable running in; the Doctor patting the weeping woman's shoulder; Punch Heseltine trying to make her drink her cocktail. Eventually she retired with her maid, Punch took Pam off to bed, and the Doctor busied himself telephoning to the hospital for a nurse.

In the general mêlée Peril disappeared without anyone's noticing. Later in the evening, when they were parting at The Hill gate, Punch Heseltine remarked casually to the Doctor:

"I hardly realized you had a daughter living here with you!"

"She's not my daughter," Bruce Kelly had returned to his usual vague and dreamy manner. "She's my pool of lilies."

A strange saying for Punch Heseltine to take back with him to camp and ponder. A pool of lilies! Yes, something like that he had thought of when he came out of the hot dusts and mists of the African evening into the quiet drawing room. Something white and fresh . . . and the cool gloom of water!

But he did not ponder the matter long, for he was already late for his engagement in the town, a "stag party" with poker to follow, that would probably last till dawn, and be far more to the point than cogitating like a fool upon things that were not for him and wouldn't satisfy him if they were. Nothing satisfied him in this hell of a world, nor would in the next, he doubted, as he slung his clothes in every direction and hurried into fresh ones, growling at the boys who stood about him with garments and things in their assiduous hands, while outside sounded the creak of the saddle being put on a fresh horse.

And as he cantered rapidly back through the darkness down the Umtété Road he deliberately pushed thoughts of women out of his mind. Or tried to. They were not for him.

Men were his portion—and a damned good portion too! Happy nights of cards and good fellowship, and no regrets afterwards! If prospects and purse went to rack and ruin, all right, and no one's business but his own. No reproaches from anyone, certainly not himself.

> Leonidas poured out the wine
> And shouted ere he drained the cup:
> "Ho! Comrades, let us gaily dine,
> Tonight with Plato we may sup!"

If that attitude of mind was good enough for him during four bloody years in France it ought to be good enough here in this dead-and-alive hole where there was little doing for a free-lance bar the cards, the cup, and flirtation with other men's wives.

From the last felicity it was indeed his habit to refrain. Not exactly for want of temptation—in Rhodesia that would be never lacking—but because his taste in women happened to be fastidious and distinctive.

They must be good-lookers of course—that went without saying, beauty being an essential in women. But he liked 'em to be either one thing or the other—good or bad.

He had no time for the half-sinner who strayed with her eyes and prayed with her lips, nor for those sprightlier

Common Sense Care for Your Skin

WHEN you stop to think that cleanliness is probably the greatest law of health, you naturally realize the importance of a clean skin. To be beautiful, a skin must be healthy. Granting, then, that a clean skin is usually a healthy one, it at once becomes important to discover the best method of keeping your skin clean. Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream is the best skin cleanser you can buy. Use it at night to cleanse your skin thoroughly of the day's grit. It clears out the pores and softens the skin. Above all, it keeps the skin absolutely clean.

As most people use make-up in moderation these days, a clean skin is really essential. A dirty skin will not take make-up well.

Get Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream today and try it. You will find it an indispensable aid to your toilet. On sale everywhere. In tubes, 10c, 25c and 50c. In jars, 35c, 50c, 85c and $1.50.

A FREE TRIAL—Write for a free tube of this perfect skin cleanser and complexion beautifier. Daggett & Ramsdell, Dept. 1135, D. & R. Building, N. Y.

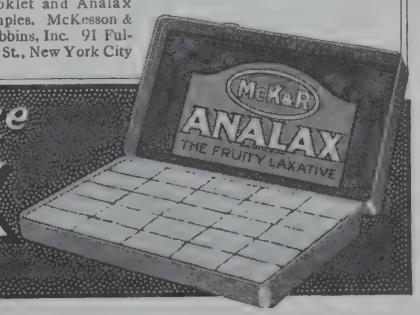
DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S
PERFECT COLD CREAM
"The Kind That Keeps"

$EARN MONEY$
AT HOME

We start you in business. Furnish everything. You make 1 to 2 dollars an hour at home in your spare time. No canvassing or soliciting. We teach you Show Card lettering by our New Simple Method no matter where you live.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Terms Free.
DETROIT SHOW CARD SCHOOL,
229 Dinan Bldg., Detroit, Mich.

Here's a Prescription
for Coughs

For quick relief try PISO'S—A most effective syrup different from all others. Safe and sane for young and old. Pleasant—no opiates—no upset stomach. 35c and 60c sizes obtainable everywhere.
PISO'S—For Coughs & Colds

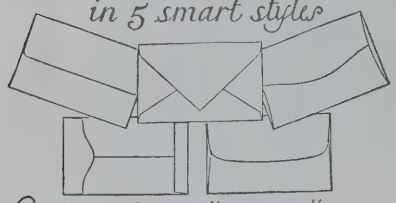


Why Punish Your Child?

The giving of disagreeable laxative remedies constitutes a punishment to children.

This is one reason why mothers now give their children Analax, the scientific Fruity Laxative.

Children like to take Analax—because of the delicious taste—like fresh, ripe raspberries.



FREE: Write for booklet and Analax samples. McKesson & Robbins, Inc. 91 Fulton St., New York City

Nothing Acts like
ANALAX

Style is a greater social asset than Beauty

EATON'S HIGHLAND LINEN
in 5 smart styles

Caroline DeLancey will answer all questions relating to correct social correspondence
Address her in care of
EATON, CRANE & PIKE CO.
225 Fifth Avenue New York

Reduce Your Flesh in Spots
Arms Legs Bust Double Chin
in fact the entire body or any part without dieting by wearing DR. WALTER'S Medicated Reducing
RUBBER GARMENTS

Bust Reducer, $6.00
Chin Reducer, $2.50
Anklets
for Reducing and Shaping the Ankles, $7.00 per pair. Extra high $9.00

Send ankle measurement when ordering
Send for illustrated Booklet
DR. JEANNE C. WALTER
353 5th Ave., New York

REMNANTS 79c A Yd.
Beautiful assortment of serges, Tricotines and silks at less than wholesale. Blues. Wine. Gray etc. Remnants of 4 or 5 yard lengths, sufficient to make suit or dress.
MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED.
Save money. Make your own clothes. These remnants will save you up to $1.50 yard. WRITE FOR INFORMATION.
TEXTILE MILLS, Dept. 231, Kansas City, Mo.

"I Make No Secret That Inecto Rapid Banished My Gray Hair In 15 Minutes"

INECTO RAPID is ethical and scientific. Discovered by Dr. Emile, of the University of Paris, is guaranteed to tint naturally gray, streaked or faded hair in any desired color, in 15 minutes, making it soft, luxurious and indistinguishable from natural.
INECTO RAPID is permanent, will not wash or come off, and permits waving. Different from dyes or restoratives—it does not merely coat the surface, but repigmentizes the hair's color shaft.
It is used exclusively by 97% of Europe's finest hairdressers and thousands of the best establishments in this country have adopted it. You can also apply INECTO RAPID in the privacy of your home.
SEND NO MONEY
Write for particulars and Beauty Analysis Chart Form No. Y-2.
INECTO, Inc. Salons and Laboratories
33-35 West 46th Street New York, N. Y.

ones who kept home unsullied and husband unsuspecting whilst still contriving to kindle hope in the philanderer's breast by an occasional kiss and a bright promise for the morrow. Not for him were such as these, in the shadowy ends of verandas and the dark "sitting out" corners of ballrooms. By no means because he was a Joseph trembling for the welfare of his coat, but merely and solely because he was so constituted that it took something rather wonderful, in both love and war, to make his pulses quicken by the hundredth part of a second; and he had, much to his regret, so far found no one in Rhodesia likely to perform this stimulating service for him.

No one . . . that was to say . . . well, no one for whom his pulse could legitimately be permitted to bestir itself to unwonted activity. He wasn't going to swear, of course, that Pam's wife . . .

This stage of his thoughts brought him to a part of the road where it divided, one way leading to Marshways, the other to the town. He gave a restless long look at the flickering lights of Minto Lodge before he turned his horse towards Umtété.

No—he wasn't going to swear that, by Jove! He could not honestly lay his hand on his heart and swear. But then she, was Pam's wife.

If she hadn't been—if she hadn't been—why then, he'd have had her out of the saddle this afternoon and into his arms. He'd have drawn from her lips the meaning of that look she had given him more than once, and especially in the moment of saying:

"There are men whom women recognize from the first . . . as master. Men to make the greatest sacrifice for with joy! Men to commit crime for, even."

What the devil did she mean by that? and the look in those eyes turned on him? Corking, wonderful eyes. God! It was no use pretending his pulses didn't stir in that moment. He had felt his own eyes darkening and throwing back the man's answer into hers; his hand had reached out for her bridle. The horses stood still; her lovely lips took the shape of a kiss; they were alone on the empty veldt . . . a fitting place to take a woman into your arms, and seal her to you with your mouth on hers!

Yet nothing had happened. He had remembered in time who she was. His cousin's wife! Poor old Pam, tied by the leg, dying perhaps. Pam! more like a brother than a cousin, and a pal always.

Yes—he had remembered, and flinging himself off his horse started tightening the girths or loosening them or something. By the time he'd finished and mounted again he was captain of his soul once more—such as it was!—and so was she of hers, apparently.

They had ridden on.

And after all she must have been fooling him! Trying him out, perhaps? Either that or he had misread her. Else what did that scene in the drawing room mean? That reproachful bitter cry of hers at the Doctor:

"If I want my husband to get better!"

That at least was not fooling. No acting about that. A real cry from the heart, if ever he'd heard one. She loved Pam.

Well, well! women were mysterious,

Have You Need of More Money?

Could You Use $10 to $25 Extra Each Week?

If you need extra money for any purpose — in the home, or for your personal necessities or the little extravagances you otherwise could not afford—let us show you the way to get the Money to Enjoy Life.

We need capable men and women, in every section, who have some spare time to represent our magazines.

It is a pleasant, healthful and interesting way of supplementing your income without interfering with your other duties.

Why waste your leisure hours when you can use them to bring you more golden dollars!

You need no experience and no capital. We start you and cooperate with you at all times.

Begin now to make your spare moments profitable. Just fill in and mail the coupon. It costs but two cents to learn all about it.

Dept. CP423, Subscription Sales
International Magazine Co.,
119 West 40th St., New York, N. Y.
Without obligation to me please send me your spare-time money-making plan.
Name .....
Street .....
City ..... State.....
Cos-P4-23

Prices Are Down
on new 1923 models. 44 Styles, colors and sizes famous Ranger Bicyles. Shipped Free on approval and 30 days free trial. Protect yourself at these rock bottom prices.
12 Months to Pay if desired. Many boys and girls easily earn the small monthly payments.
Tires wheels, lamps, and equipment at half usual prices. Write for remarkable factory prices and marvelous offers.
Mead Cycle Company Dept. T33 Chicago
Write us today for free catalog

Queen Anne's Lace Flower
Clusters of delicate Blue o Purple Flowers on a long Stem whose fine textures resemble Lace Handkerchief. Easil grown and Blooms continually
A Royal Flower and in olde times was known as Quee Anne's Lace Flower.
Rarely grown on account Scarcity and High Price of th seed. Our growers report a goo crop this year and we can offer yo this Rare Seed 1 packet for 10 3 for 25c, by mail, with catalo
The Rundle-Murphy Co.
Dept. B Westport, Conn

unfathomable. No man could expect to know what they were up to, perhaps, what they meant. Yet . . . he was not in the habit of making mistakes like that . . . not one of those fools who imagined every woman ready to tumble into his arms! No. There were certain signs and calls. Sophisticated men and women understood each other in these crises of the senses. Doria was not a child, any more than he was, to send out those unspoken messages from eyes and lips—by accident. Yet all the while she loved Pam!

Well, quite right, too. Pam being her husband, it was meet and fitting so to do. And what he, Punch Heseltine, had got to do was to keep the fact well in the foreground, and furthermore to put a tight rein on himself in future, keep out of the way, in fact.

For there was no doubt that Doria possessed a special lure for him. That kind of edition de luxe of woman always had and always would, especially when he came upon her out in the wilderness.

It was the fragrance, the atmosphere, the je ne sais quoi of Europe that did it—that old continent he never had the money to stay in long enough! For Europe without money was unthinkable. He could rough it anywhere in the wilds. He didn't mind working, fighting, struggling, starving even, at any old game in far lands. But Europe was his playground.

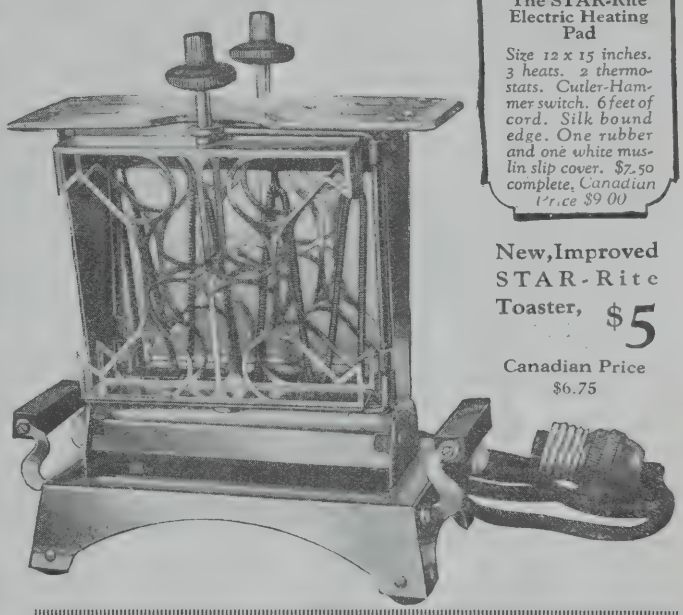
No doubt if he ever had money enough he'd get sick of it and pine to get back to the veldt, but he'd like to have the chance of that, by God! Another fortune to blow in! But as that was the last thing in the world likely to happen, would he ever get rid of this burn in his blood for it? . . . and for such women as Doria?

That question still remained unanswered when nine hours later at the jade and amber point-of-day he was back on the Umtété Road.

It had been a topnotch night, good play, excellent company, and his luck was in; they had drunk "till the gunpowder ran out of the heels of their boots" and the dawn stepped into the room, shaming the lights.

Yet as he rode past The Hill and looked up at the white walls of the house set there, silent, sleeping, among trees and green, scented things, he was conscious of a great emptiness in his life—an aching nothingness.

"A pool of lilies!" he muttered bitterly to himself.



One morning about a fortnight later, before the blaze of the noontide heats had begun, Peril in her blue linen laboratory smock visited a certain enclosed part of the garden where the herbal plants grew. It was kept locked and no one but she and the Doctor ever entered it. He called it his garden of peril, and with good reason, for it held sufficient magic to cure every diseased mind and body in Rhodesia, by the simple process of transporting them to the Elysian Fields.

But all that grew there was not poisonous. As you walked down the thickly clustered paths you brushed against rosemary, thyme, fennel, valerian, myrtle and rue, caught the clean healing odors of mint, camomile and tansy, and the aromatic sweetness of basil, balm, woodruff, "boy's-love," marjoram and bergamot. You could

STAR-Rite

Remember This Name!

Your favorite Drug, Department, Hardware or Electrical Store has this brand new STAR-Rite Electric Toaster. 9½ inches high; beautifully finished in sparkling nickel; has 2 black ebonized handles; 2 black ebonized turn knobs and 6 feet of cord. Makes the most delicious toast you ever tasted because it heats the bread exactly to your individual taste! New reversible-type way of turning the toast. Think of getting this super-toaster for $5 complete. Made only by the Fitzgerald Mfg. Company, Torrington, Conn. Canadian address, 95 King Street East, Toronto, Ont.

The STAR-Rite Electric Heating Pad

Size 12 x 15 inches. 3 heats. 2 thermostats. Cutler-Hammer switch. 6 feet of cord. Silk bound edge. One rubber and one white muslin slip cover. $7.50 complete. Canadian Price $9.00

New, Improved STAR-Rite Toaster, $5

Canadian Price $6.75

STAR-Rite

Electrical Necessities

Low Prices None Can Beat

Diamonds 60% of the Market

Free Bulletin lists diamonds as low as $60 per carat, also Gems of Finest Quality at highest per carat charges but proportionately Low Bargain Prices. This 1—1-8, 1-32 carat perfectly cut diamond a snappy blazing solitare at $88.00. This 75 year oldest largest Diamond Banking firm in all the world lends money on diamonds. Thousands of unpaid oans: other bargains. Must sell NOW.

Why Pay Full Prices

Costs NOTHING to See

Any Diamond sent for examination at our risk. No obligation. No cost to you. Latest Listings—Unpaid Loans. Describes Diamond Bargains in Detail, gives cash loan values guaranteed. Explains unlimited exchange privilege. Write today for your copy of Diamond Bargain List. Posta lcard will do.

JOS. DE ROY & SONS. 1097 De Roy Bldg.
Only Opposite Post Office. Pittsburgh, Pa.

EARN up to $400 per Mo.

Living Expenses Paid

WANTED

2 Asst. Mgrs.	$3,500-4,000 Yr.
1 Housekeeper	150 Mo.
2 Information Clerks	100 Mo.
2 Restaurant Cashiers	per Mo.

Partial list
Many with room and meals

Good Hotel Position for YOU

Genuine opportunity in America's fastest growing industry. High salaries—luxurious surroundings; field uncrowded. No previous experience necessary.

You Can Qualify Easily—Surely

by training at home in spare time. You can't help but succeed thru Hotel Operation and Management Course as taught by experts—endorsed by leading hotel men.

When you graduate, a position awaits you—then quick advancement.

STANDARD BUSINESS TRAINING INST.
Carlton Court Buffalo, N. Y.

Standard Business Training Inst.
Carlton Court, Buffalo, N. Y.
Send me free booklet, B-171, about Hotel Operation and Management Course,—also Employment Bulletin.
Name .....
Street .....
City .....

BUY DIAMONDS DIRECT

FROM JASON WEILER & SONS
of Boston, Mass., one of America's leading diamond importers

For over 45 years the house of Jason Weiler & Sons, of Boston, has been one of the leading diamond importing concerns in America selling to jewelers. However, a large business is done direct by mail with customers at importing prices! Here are several diamond offers—direct to you by mail—which clearly demonstrate our position to name prices on diamonds that should surely interest any present or prospective diamond purchaser. This one carat diamond is of fine brilliancy and perfectly cut. Mounted in Tiffany style 14K solid gold setting. Order this diamond, take it to any jeweler and if he says it can be duplicated for less than $200.00 send it back and your money will be returned at once without a quibble. Our price direct to you $145.00

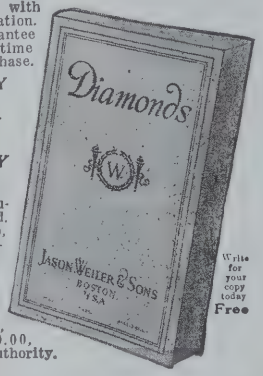
1 carat, $145.00

Ladies' White Gold Diamond Ring .. $75.00
Perfectly cut blue-white diamond of exceptional brilliancy with four smaller perfectly cut, blue-white diamonds on the sides. The ring is 18K solid white gold, beautifully pierced and carved.

Ladies' Platinum Diamond Ring .. $315.00
Perfectly cut blue-white diamond of exceptional brilliancy with twelve smaller perfectly blue-white diamonds securely embedded in highly artistic pierced domed top.



A few weights and prices of other diamond rings:

¼ carat ..$31.00	1½ carats $217.00
⅜ carat .. 50.00	2 carats .. 290.00
½ carat ...73.00	3 carats .. 435.00

Money refunded if these diamonds can be purchased elsewhere for less than one-third more.
If desired rings will be sent to any bank or any Express Co., with privilege of examination. Our diamond guarantee for full value for all time goes with every purchase.

WRITE TODAY FOR THE CATALOG FREE ON "HOW TO BUY DIAMONDS"

This book is beautifully illustrated. Tells how to judge, select and buy diamonds. Tells how they mine, cut and market diamonds. This book, showing weights, sizes, prices and qualities, $20.00 to $20,000.00, is considered an authority.

Write for your copy today Free

Jason Weiler & Sons
369 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
Diamond Importers since 1876
Foreign Agencies, Amsterdam and Paris

Europe—that trip you are planning can become a reality. See page 183.

Coughs-Colds

IT IS not what we say, but what our patrons say of Vapo-Cresolene that conveys the strongest evidence of its merits.

Vapo-Cresolene Est 1879 "Used while you sleep"

Our best advertising is from the unsolicited statements of those who have used Vapo-Cresolene. For coughs, colds, bronchitis, influenza, whooping cough, spasmodic croup, asthma and catarrh.

Send for our testimonial and descriptive booklet 11C.

Sold by Druggists

THE VAPO-CRESOLENE CO.
62 Cortlandt Street, New York or Leeming-Miles Building, Montreal, Canada not step without sending up a perfect anthem of fragrance.

The sinister plants stood apart, numbered like criminals with little tin discs. Many of them had come from Malayan swamps, forests of Bolivia, jungles of the Congo and Ceylon. Strange lustrous-leaved things, some. Others sluggish looking with blossoms that seemed to eye the quiet garden viciously. Some had an exquisite virgin air. Others held themselves royally, wearing their fruit like jewels.

Such was one of those Peril had come seeking—a proud plant with glossy leaves and berries like pendent rubies; the other crouched evilly over white, puffy berries. Yet the dull white berries were the antidote to those brilliant red ones.

It seemed to Peril, as she gathered them into separate baskets, a wonderful thing that nature should arrange for two plants from different ends of the earth to ripen at the same time, compounding together to produce a valuable tonic drug; even as arsenic and strychnine have tonic value when rightfully prescribed. These two plants were among the Doctor's most cherished possessions, and she knew that an extract of them was being used in the experimental injections on Pam Heseltine. For all Bruce Kelly's prescriptions were not to be found in the British Pharmacopœia, by any means, though he had contributed certain distinguished additions to that classic work.

Very preciously, then, she garnered her little harvest, testing each berry to see if it had reached the required maturity, for many were still green. But one at least had over-ripened, and bursting in her fingers, spread over them a bright magenta stain.

Instantly a voice behind her gave a gay delighted cry:

"What a heavenly color! I must have a tea gown of it. Do give me a spot on my handkerchief." Doria Heseltine, leaning over the gate, extended a wisp of muslin and lace. But Peril shook her head decisively, while she wiped her hands on a cloth.

"You mustn't touch that. It's poisonous."

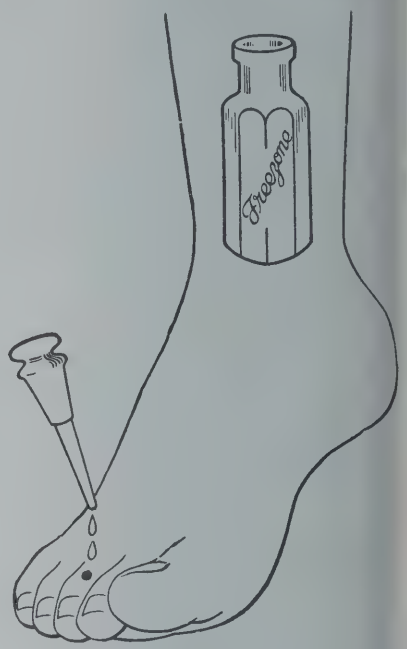
"Poisonous! But it's like Pam's famous injection stuff—only a much more gorgeous color."

"I dare say," said Peril guardedly. "Anyway Uncle Bruce has often warned me of this. He says it wouldn't kill me at once; I should just fade away a little bit every day, under his eyes."

"And couldn't he save you?" asked Doria, breathless and horrified.

"Oh yes, he could save me!" laughed Peril serenely, "if he knew what I'd been up to."

Doria laughed too, but she could not keep her eyes from the bright stain on the cloth.



"It's like sloe gin. I simply must have a garment of it. A sloe gin tea gown—with a band of sable across the breast, next to the skin."

Peril came out of the herb garden and locked the gate. She wondered what Mrs. Heseltine wanted. It was unusual for that lady to brave the hot morning sun.

As they sauntered down the sloping path towards the house Doria gave a deep sigh.

Corns

Lift Off with the Fingers

Doesn't hurt a bit! Drop a little "Freezone" on an aching corn, instantly that corn stops hurting, then shortly you lift it right off with fingers. Your druggist sells a tiny bottle of "Freezone" for a few cents, sufficient to remove every hard corn, soft corn, or corn between toes, and calluses, without pain, soreness

MAKE MONEY AT HOME

YOU CAN earn $1 to $2 an hour writing show cards at home in your spare time. Quickly and easily learned by our new simple "Instructograph" method. No canvassing or soliciting. We teach you how, guarantee you steady work at home, no matter where you live, and pay you cash each week. Full particulars and booklet free. Write to-day.
AMERICAN SHOW CARD SYSTEM LIMITED
Authorized and Fully Paid Capital, One Million Dollars
115 Adams Bldg. Toronto, Canada.

Can You Wear This Dress
Sheer indeed—yet that's the style. It's impossible unless you keep the underarm white and clean. Fashionable women use

DEL-A-TONE

This is a safe and sure preparation for the removal of hair from the neck, face or underarms.

It is easy to apply and leaves the skin clear, firm and perfectly smooth.

Druggists sell Delatone; or an original 1 oz. jar will be mailed to any address on receipt of $1.

SHEFFIELD PHARMACAL CO.
536 Lake Shore Drive, Chicago

Both Are Embarrassed—Yet Both Could Be At Ease

And now, at the table, both are embarrassed. Indeed, can there be any discomfort greater than that of not knowing what to do at the right time —of not being sure of one's manners? It is so easy for people to misjudge us.

THEY started out happily enough at the beginning of the evening. He was sure he had found ideal companionship at last. She was sure that she was going to impress him with her charm, her cultured personality.

But everything seemed to go wrong when they entered the restaurant after the performance at the theatre. Instead of allowing her to follow the head waiter to their places, he preceded—and when he realized his mistake he tried to make up for it by being extremely polite. But he made another humiliating blunder that made even the dignified waiter conceal a smile!

And now, at the table, both are embarrassed. He is wondering whether he is expected to order for both, or allow her to order for herself. She is wondering which fork is for the salad, which for the meat. Both are trying to create conversation, but somehow everything they say seems dull, uninteresting.

They will no doubt be uncomfortable and ill at ease throughout the evening, for it is only absolute knowledge of what is right and what is wrong that gives calm dignity and poise. And they do not know. She finds herself wondering vaguely what she will say to him when they leave each other at her door—whether she should invite him to call again or whether he should make the suggestion; whether she should invite him into the house or not; whether she should thank him or he should thank her for a pleasant evening. And similar questions, all very embarrassing, are bothering him.

The evening that could have been extremely happy, that could have been the beginning of a delightful friendship, is spoiled. He will probably breathe a sigh of relief when he leaves, and she will probably cry herself to sleep.

Shall she invite him into the house? Shall she ask him to call again? Shall she thank him for a pleasant evening? In rapid confusion these questions fly through her mind. How humiliating not to know exactly what to do and say at all times!

How Etiquette Gives Ease

Are you always at ease among strangers, are you always calm, dignified, well-poised no matter what happens, no matter where you chance to be? You can be—if you want to. And you should want to, for it will give you a new charm, a new power. You will be welcomed in every social circle, you will "mix" well at every gathering, you will develop a delightful personality.

By enabling you to know exactly what to do at the right time, what to say, write and wear under all circumstances, etiquette removes all element of doubt or uncertainty. You know what is right, and you do it. There is no hesitancy, no embarrassment, no humiliating blunders. People recognize in you a person of charm and polish, a person following correct forms and polite manners.

Every day in our contact with men and women little problems of conduct arise which the well-bred person knows how to solve. In the restaurant, at the hotel, on the train, at a dance—everywhere, every hour, little problems present themselves. Shall olives be taken with a fork or the fingers, what shall the porter be tipped, how shall the woman register at the hotel, how shall a gentleman ask for a dance—countless questions of good conduct that reveal good manners.

Do you know everything regarding dinner etiquette, dance etiquette, etiquette at the wedding, the tea, the theatre, the garden party? Do you know how to word an invitation, how to acknowledge a gift, how to write a letter to a titled person? Do you know what to wear to the opera, to the formal dinner, to the masquerade ball, to the luncheon?

The Book of Etiquette
Complete in Two Volumes

In the famous two-volume set of the Book of Etiquette the subject of correct form for every occasion is covered completely, authoritatively. It is recognized as the most thorough and reliable book on the subject available today. It is encyclopedic in scope, answering every problem of etiquette that may be puzzling you in a clear, definite interesting way. Nothing has been forgotten. Even the ancient origin of customs has been traced, and you are told exactly why rice is thrown after the bride, why black is the color of mourning, why a tea-cup is usually given to the engaged girl.

With the Book of Etiquette to refer to, you need never make embarrassing blunders. You can know exactly what to do, say, write and wear at all times. You will be able to astonish your friends with your knowledge of what is right under all circumstances.

A great deal of your happiness depends upon your ability to make people like you. Someone once said, "Good manners make good company," and this is very true. Etiquette will help you become a "good mixer"—will aid you in acquiring a charming personality that will attract people to you. Because you will rarely be embarrassed, people who associate with you will not feel embarrassed—your gentle poise and dignity will find in them an answering reflection and you should be admired and respected no matter where you are or in whose company you happen to be.

Sent Free for 5 Days' Examination

The Book of Etiquette will mean a great deal to you. It has already opened the doors of social success to many, has shown hundreds of men and women the way to obtain the poise and charm their personalities lacked.

Let us send you the famous two-volume set of the Book of Etiquette free for 5 days' examination. Read a few of the chapters—you will enjoy particularly the chapter on "Games and Sports" and the chapter called "When the Bachelor Entertains." If you are not delighted with the books you may return them within the 5-day period without the least obligation. If you are delighted—as everyone is who examines the books—just send us $3.50 in full payment and the books are yours.

Don't make the mistake of putting it off. Here is your opportunity to examine the Book of Etiquette without cost or obligation. Mail the coupon now. Nelson Doubleday, Inc., Dept. 624, Garden City, N. Y.

Nelson Doubleday, Inc., Dept. 624, Garden City, New York.

You may send me the two-volume set of the Book of Etiquette for 5 days' free examination. I will either return them within the 5-day period or send you only $3.50 in full payment. This does not obligate me in any way, and I need not keep the books if I am not delighted with them.

Name .....

Address .....

☐ Check this square if you want these books with the beautiful full-leather binding at $5.00, with 5 days' examination privilege.

(Orders outside of the U. S. are payable cash with order.)

Which is the Mother?

It is good health which keeps womanly beauty fresh. Cosmetics can only hide the traces of the years in a once pretty face.

Mothers who are still young at the age of forty can teach their daughters the value of a good aperient in keeping the blush of youth in their cheeks.

NR Tablets (a vegetable aperient) act pleasantly and naturally to clear the skin of blemishes and preserve a healthful, youthful appearance.

All Druggists Sell The Dainty 25c. Box of NR Tablets

Used for over 30 years

NR JUNIORS

Chips off the Old Block

NR JUNIORS —Little NRs

One-third of regular dose. Made of same ingredients, then candy coated. For children and adults. Have you tried them? Send a 2c. stamp for postage on liberal sample in the attractive blue and yellow box. A. H. LEWIS MEDICINE CO., Dept. C, St. Louis, Mo.

Viola Dana, Beautiful Photoplay Star, recommends Maybelline

"EYES THAT CHARM"

Maybelline

WILL BEAUTIFY YOUR EYES INSTANTLY

A touch of MAYBELLINE works beauty wonders. Scant eyebrows and lashes are made to appear naturally dark, long and luxurious. All the hidden loveliness of your eyes—their brilliance, depth and expression—is instantly revealed. The difference is remarkable. Girls and women everywhere, even the most beautiful actresses of the stage and screen, now realize that MAYBELLINE is the most important aid to beauty and use it regularly. MAYBELLINE is unlike other preparations, it is absolutely harmless, greaseless and delightful to use. Does not spread and smear on the face or stiffen the lashes. We guarantee that you will be perfectly delighted with results. Each dainty box contains mirror and brush. Two shades: Black and Brown, 75c AT YOUR DEALER'S or direct from us, postpaid. Accept only genuine MAYBELLINE and your satisfaction is assured. Tear out this ad NOW as a reminder.

Maybelline Co., 4750-76 Sheridan Road, Chicago

"Pam is being extraordinarily obstreperous. He says he is better and wants to go out for a ride. Do you think he ought?"

"For a ride!" Peril stared in astonishment, then said: "Sit down, won't you, while I put these things in the surgery and wash my hands. I won't be a minute."

When she got back Doria had settled herself comfortably in a basket lounge with a cigarette, and Valpy was arranging the eleven o'clock tea tray beside her elbow.

"I mustn't stay."

Mrs. Heseltine never took morning tea. This was one of her complexion rules and not always an acceptable one. She looked longingly now at the dainty tea pot and the crisp golden scones and her tone was petulant.

"I just want the Doctor to come and cope with Pam. You see, he really is doing marvelously, and I simply can't bear it if he goes and spoils everything, as he will if he rushes things. He'll undo all the good those wonderful injections are doing."

"He mustn't be allowed to do that," said Peril in her tranquil way.

"Allowed! I should think not!" Doria exclaimed. "If he isn't a fool, think of it! We may be starting for England again in a month or so."

The girl stared at her eager tone, but only for a moment. She remembered then what Pam had told her of all that his health meant to Doria—apart, of course, from a wife's natural solicitude for her husband.

"But he must go slow," she murmured.

"Oh, I know! That's what makes me so angry with him. As things are, you see, we may be called home at any time. Family reasons, you understand."

Yes, Peril understood. It was unnecessary for Mrs. Heseltine to continue with a bored little air:

"My husband is heir to a great name and estates, and the succession is pending. We heard this morning that it is only a matter of weeks before we may have to give up our carefree life and take over all sorts of tiresome responsibilities." She made a gesture of disdain. Peril made no remark, but she remembered very vividly Pam Heseltine's sardonic smile when he said, "Doria cares for these things—all women do, I expect."

"So you see," continued Mrs. Heseltine, "the doctor simply must come down and make Pam behave."

"But Uncle Bruce had to go into the country this morning. Didn't he send you a message? I know he meant to, as he cannot be back before five."

Doria looked blank.

"What am I to do? He simply takes no notice of me—or of nurse."

"Could I—do you think?" Peril suggested diffidently, but Doria laughed scoffingly.

"My dear! I tell you no one can manage him except the Doctor." She added thoughtfully: "Unless it's Punch. He could. But how am I to get hold of him? Our telephone has broken down. And then, he has neglected us so lately!"

Peril knew that. She had missed the beat of his horse's feet on the road, ever since one dawn a fortnight ago; and had realized that he must be taking a short cut to Umtété.

Shampooing

A task half done

Noted actresses all recognize the fact that hair to be beautiful needs more than just shampooing. They have no more choice in the color of their hair than you have. Their hair is more beautiful, because their profession — their very environment — soon teaches them how to make the best of what nature has given them.

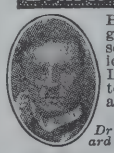
Practically every woman has reasonably good hair — satisfactory in quantity, texture and color. So-called dull hair is the result of improper care. Ordinary shampooing is not enough; just washing cannot sufficiently improve dull, drab hair. Only a shampoo that adds "that little something" dull hair lacks, can really improve it.

Golden Glint Shampoo was made particularly for medium brown hair—to make it look brighter and more beautiful. When your hair appears lifeless, all you need do is have a Golden Glint Shampoo. It does more and IS more than an ordinary shampoo. With it you can correct—correct, mind you—any little shortcomings your hair may have. It places your hair in your own hands, so to speak.

Have a Golden Glint Shampoo today and give your hair the special treatment which is all it needs to make it as beautiful as you desire it. 25c a package at toilet goods counters or postpaid direct. J. W. Kobi Co., 131 Spring St., Seattle, Wash.

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL

Sold Everywhere



AGENTS—Auto Given

We need special agents to travel by Automobile introducing our great line of Nationally-advertised Pure Food Products, Soaps and Household Necessities. Here is an opportunity to earn $6 to $12 a day, all or spare time and obtain an automobile besides. Write at once for full particulars. Address

AMERICAN PRODUCTS CO.
7431 American Bldg. Cincinnati, O.

Learn SHORT STORY Writing

Dr. Richard Burton

By mail, from Dr. Richard Burton, the greatest teacher and authority of all. He personally corrects the lessons. You may have ideas that would bring fame and fortune. Learn to write them and sell them. Write today for Free Booklet, Profit Sharing Plan, and proof of results by successful Students.

LAIRD EXTENSION INSTITUTE
87 Laird Bldg. Minneapolis, Minn.

AGENTS

FORD AUTO GIVEN

Besides Big Cash Profits

Not a contest or guessing scheme. A straight out business offer to men ambitious to make money and willing to work. We have men making as high as $1,000 in 60 days selling to garages, stores, hotels, factories, schools and homes. We train each man carefully, start him right, help him along, pay big commissions and offer a Ford auto to hustlers without cost. Write us today—a post card will do.

Super Fyr-Fyter

The Fyr-Fyter Co., 1520 Fyr-Fyter Bldg., Dayton, Ohio

"You could telephone from here," she said slowly.

"Of course! I never thought of that!" Doria dropped her cigarette and laid an impulsive hand upon Peril's arm. "You do it. I'm such a fool on the phone. Just say the Doctor's away and nurse needs help with Pam."

It was not easy to refuse so simple a service, but Peril felt a curious unwillingness as she went to the instrument in the hall. She got the camp without any difficulty and spoke in her calm unhurried fashion.

"Hello! Is Major Heseltine there? I am speaking from The Hill . . . Yes, Doctor Kelly's."

A moment later a strong careless voice spoke into her ear:

"That you, Doc?"

"No," her answer went back cool and clear, "Miss Kelly speaking. Mrs. Heseltine asked me to telephone. The Doctor is away, and they need help with Mr. Heseltine."

"Need help? Is he worse?"

"Oh no! much better I believe. But it seems he insists on going out for a ride, and they think you might be able to reason with him."

There was a short silence, then he said somewhat curtly:

"I'm rather hard pressed just now—unless they absolutely need me"—but before he had reached this point Peril had felt herself gently pushed away and the receiver taken from her hand.

"Of course we need you, Pam." Doria's voice was tender as a caress. "Do you think I would bother you otherwise? . . . I know you are frightfully busy—they've told me so every time I rang up . . . Three times this morning—in vain! Do you never mean to come again, Punch? And do you think it quite fair? . . . Only a week or so'? How can you say that? . . . It seems an eternity——"

Peril hastened out of hearing; but she could not help wondering whether the telephone at Minto Lodge had broken down whilst Mrs. Heseltine was in the act of ringing up the Camp three times, and—in vain"! At any rate, Doria sauntering now from the hall looked contented as a blue-eyed Persian kitten that has just had a saucerful of warm milk; and having unfurled a white umbrella about the size of a small marquee, she proceeded to tuck herself under it and bade her hostess a pleasant adieu.

Afterwards Peril continued to sit listlessly under the trees, stroking Evvie, her little bush-baby. Usually, after breakfasting with the dawn, she had an excellent eleven o'clock appetite; but this morning Valpy's buttermilk scones went unappreciated. Presently the ring of a horse's hoofs came out of the distance and beat smartly along towards Marshways. She sat very still until the last echo of them had ceased; then she pressed Evvie to her breast, as if it had been a real baby, and gave a deep sigh.

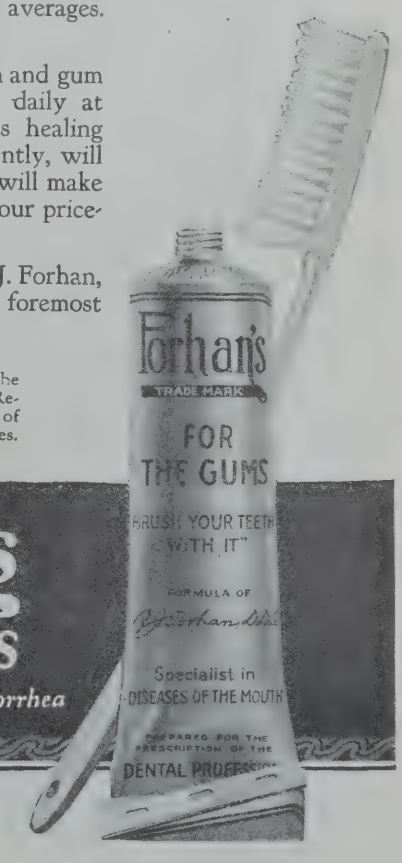
Doubtless Major Heseltine succeeded in restraining his cousin's obstreperous activity and making him see the unreasonableness of trying to ride before he could walk.

But the funny part of it was that Pam should declare to Peril some days later that the whole thing had been no

Only One in Five is Safe

Heed the danger sign—bleeding gums

Just before Pyorrhea strikes—to undermine the teeth and health—kindly, knowing Nature sends a warning: the gums are tender and bleed easily.



Take heed immediately, before it is too late, before the gums recede and the loosened teeth must be extracted, before the germ-laden pus-pockets form, before infection spreads throughout the system.

Better yet, play safe. Don't wait for Nature's warning. Four persons out of every five over forty years of age, and thousands younger, are afflicted with Pyorrhea. This is the immutable law of averages. Your dentist will tell you that.

Go to him regularly, systematically, for tooth and gum inspection. And brush your teeth, twice daily at least, with Forhan's For the Gums. This healing dentifrice, if used in time and used consistently, will prevent Pyorrhea or check its progress. It will make your mouth clean and healthful, preserve your priceless teeth, safeguard your precious health.

Forhan's For the Gums is the formula of R. J. Forhan, D.D.S. It is time-tested, efficient, safe. The foremost dentists recommend and use it.

Be on your guard. Buy a tube of Forhan's For the Gums today. Brush your teeth with it regularly. Remember, in your case, the odds are 4 to 1 in favor of Pyorrhea. At all druggists. 35c and 60c in tubes.

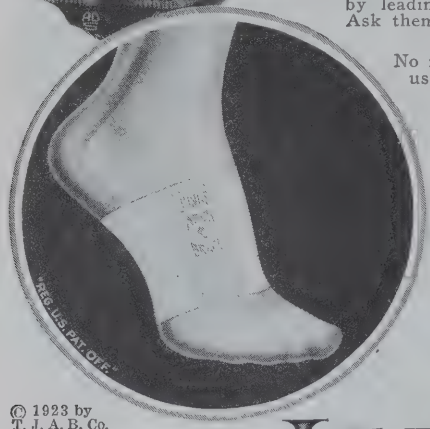
Forhan's

FOR THE GUMS

More than a tooth paste—it checks Pyorrhea

Formula of R. J. Forhan, D. D. S.
Forhan Company, New York
Forhan's, Limited, Montreal

"Save your feet"



"My foot troubles disappeared"

"Jung's Arch Braces gave me instant relief. My feet and ankles used to pain me when ever I danced or walked. Now I never miss a dance and my feet feel fine. Get a pair of Jung's for relief and comfort."

Jung's Arch Braces Assure Comfort

They relieve tired, aching and burning feet instantly by assisting and strengthening the weakened muscles. Pain in the heel, instep and ball of foot is a warning of fallen arches or weakened conditions of the feet—an indication that you need the help these comfortable braces will give. They overcome the extra strain caused by stylish shoes. May be worn with any kind of footwear. Recommended by leading doctors, osteopaths, chiropractors, chiropodists. Ask them.

Over Half a Million Satisfied Wearers

No matter what other supports or appliances you have used, you should try a pair of Jung's Arch Braces.

Entirely Different From Other Foot Appliances

Made of special Superlastik—light and porous, yet firm and durable. No ungainly humps or burdensome pads. No larger shoe necessary. No metal plates. Exact size for every foot. Price $1 per pair. (Canada $1.25.) Your money back if not satisfied. Jung's Miracle Arch Braces, extra wide, $1.50. (Canada $1.75.)

For Men, Women and Children. If your shoe dealer, druggist, or surgical dealer can't supply you, order direct

Write Today For Our Free Book

Contains valuable information about the feet. Illustrated with X-Ray views. Tells cause and relief of foot ills. Send for your copy today. Free—no obligation.

THE JUNG ARCH BRACE COMPANY
243 Jung Building Cincinnati, Ohio

Canadian Office—Kirkham & Roberts, Mgrs. 243 Hamilton Trust Bldg., Toronto, Ont.

© 1923 by T. J. A. B. Co.

Look for this Trade-Mark ↗ It protects you against imitations

JUNG'S The "Original" ARCH BRACES

Free Trial

Forget Gray Hair

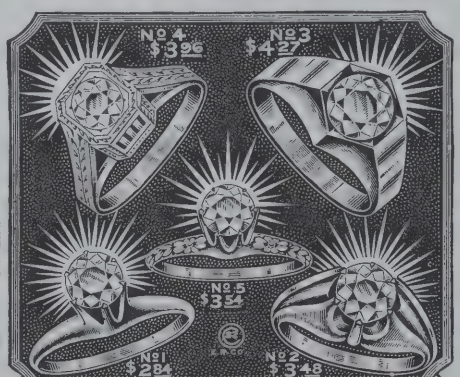
Mary T. Goldman's Hair Color Restorer is a clear, colorless liquid, clean as water. No greasy sediment to make your hair stringy or streaky, nothing to wash or rub off. Restored color even and perfectly natural in all lights, no danger of streaking or discoloration. Faded hair or hair discolored by unsatisfactory dyes restored just as safely and surely as naturally gray hair.

My Restorer is a time-tested preparation, which I perfected many years ago to bring back the original color to my own prematurely gray hair. I ask all who are gray haired to prove its worth by sending for my special patented Free Trial package.

Mail Coupon Today

Send today for the special patented Free Trial package which contains a trial bottle of my Restorer and full instructions for making the convincing test on one lock of hair. Indicate color of hair with X. Print name and address plainly. If possible, inclose a lock of your hair in your letter.

FREE TRIAL COUPON



Please print your name and address

Mary T. Goldman,
42D Goldman Bldg., St. Paul, Minn.

Please send your patented Free Trial Outfit. X shows color of hair. Black..... dark brown..... medium brown..... auburn (dark red)..... light brown..... light auburn (light red)..... blonde.....

Name .....

Street ..... City .....

GET THIS WONDERFUL RING

These Amazingly Beautiful CORODITE Diamonds are the nearest approach to Genuine Diamonds that the ingenuity of man, aided by years of Scientific and chemical research, can produce. They have the same blazing flash and dazzling play of living rainbow fire, Standing the terrific acid test of direct comparison. Even lifetime experts need all their experience to see any difference. Prove this yourself.

Wear a Corodite Diamond for 7 Days

Make this test. You risk nothing. Wear a genuine Corodite and a Diamond side by side on the same finger for seven days, if you or your friends can tell the difference, send it back. You won't be out a single penny. If you keep the ring, the price printed here is all you pay. No additional installments. Remember, Corodites have the same facet cutting as genuine stones.

No. 1—Ladies' Solitaire 14K Gold S. Ring $2.84
No. 2—Gents' Heavy Belcher 14K Gold S Ring $3.48
No. 3—Gents' Massive Hexagon Gypsy Ring $4.27
No. 4—Ladies' Hand-Carved Basket Setting, plat. finish $3.96
No. 5—Ladies' Tiffany Bridal Blossom Engraved $3.54

Carat size gems. Beautiful mountings of most modern design, choice of Gold or Latest White Platinum finish. Unqualified 20-year guarantee. Handsome Art Leather Case free with each ring.

SEND NO MONEY Keep your money right at home, just send name, address and number of ring wanted and size as shown by strip of paper fitting tightly end to end around finger joint. Your ring will come by return mail. When ring arrives, pay postman amount shown above. If you decide not to keep ring, send it back within 7 days and your money will be immediately returned. Send today.

E. RICHWINE CO.
333 S. Dearborn St., Dept 343 Chicago, Illinois
Sole Importers Genuine Corodite Diamonds

more than a lark, and that he had neve entertained the faintest idea of mountin a horse or that Doria took him seriously Moreover, it came out quite casually tha Doria herself had been the one to receiv the Doctor's message that he would b away all day. Perhaps she had forgotte this when she came seeking him, at Th Hill, an hour later! However, the onl person in a position to consider all thes pieces of the puzzle, and to wonder wh some of them did not quite fit, happene to be one whose habit was of tran quil reflection rather than constructiv criticism.

Enough for her—more than enoug perhaps—to note that the riding partie (of two) had recommenced. In the coo of the day, and again in the cinnamon colored dusk which should surely be th property only of lovers, Doria's silve chimes rang on the Umtété Road, minglin with the deeper notes of Punch Heseltine' voice.

That man did not laugh much. Whe he did, it was curtly, like one with secret source of irritation, or grimly, a if in self-mockery. And when he rod alone the set of his jaw was neither amuse nor felicitous. Peril and her little bush baby Evvie both knew this.

But how should Mrs. Heseltine's moo be other than that of the lark at Heaven gate singing, when every day and from a sides she was the recipient of congratula tions on her husband's wonderful retur to health? It was fitting surely that sh should glow with happiness, and that pe ple should exclaim more than ever at h beauty, and bow the head and bend th knee to her sweetness and light.

As for Pam, Umtété was proud of hin But prouder still of its own special geniu Bruce Kelly. Even he must have felt stir of pride, though he gave no sign, unle by looking a little more baldish, reddis stoutish and vaguish than ever.

Never was such a change seen in a ma as in Pam Heseltine. His cough had gon flesh, color, appetite increased daily; an cynical despair had been replaced by th light of hope and a touching gentlenes After all, when a man, grown used to th creak of the gates of death, is sudden reprieved and shown instead a vis of life and prosperity, he would be poor stuff if it didn't fill him wit gratitude. And Pam had never bee of poor stuff—only wild stuff, and ga stuff, and stuff that adventurers a made of. All the Heseltines were lik that. Their trouble was that the couldn't sit still. They would rath commit follies, blunders, extravagance and lose their all in the committin than do nothing. Perhaps Pam wou be like that again when completely r stored to himself, but meantime he w chastened, humble and like a child in h delight of returning strength to long limb and wasted muscles.

The régime, however, was drasti Bruce Kelly stood no nonsense. Drin were cut down to a minimum, strict di enforced. The magic injections we given twice a day, followed by three hou of prone repose.

Peril usually went down after the secon treatment, in the late afternoon, and s with the patient. This relieved the nur and also gave Keable a period of recreati which she generally utilized by going to s

Valpy, with whom she had struck up an intimacy. Doria of course would be away on her rides. Everyone would be away, in fact, and no sound in the quiet house save the soft monotony of Peril's voice reading Shelley and Adam Lindsay Gordon.

Pam had never been much addicted to verse, but he now declared to Peril that he loved it. Fortunately she did not hear his remark to Punch that he could stick even Bolshevik propaganda composed by Lenin and published in the Russian language, if it were read to him in a voice like spring water flowing over the strings of a harp.

Punch could not but be struck by this poetical simile coming from an unpoetical source. He thought it remarkable too that Pam's metaphor should symbolically resemble the Doctor's.

Spring water. Lily pool. Both cool, sweet, fresh things that a dark, fevered, weary man might seek! Then he laughed his curt, furious laugh. What had he to do with cool sweet waters? His taste was for wine.

And wine was his for the taking. Wine in an exquisite goblet offered itself, sparkling, leaping to the lips, daring him to drink. And he dared not drink. Something in him forbade that blood-treachery. Yet . . . he had ceased to absent himself from temptation. He looked into the cup daily. Daily his lips drew nearer.

It was strange that he should never have seen Peril nearer or clearer since that first evening in the shadows. Always she had just gone when they returned from riding. Only echoes of her remained—scents from bunches of sweet herbs she brought daily; her odd, charming name, spoken affectionately by nurse and patient; and again, Pam's allusions to spring water and the music of harps.

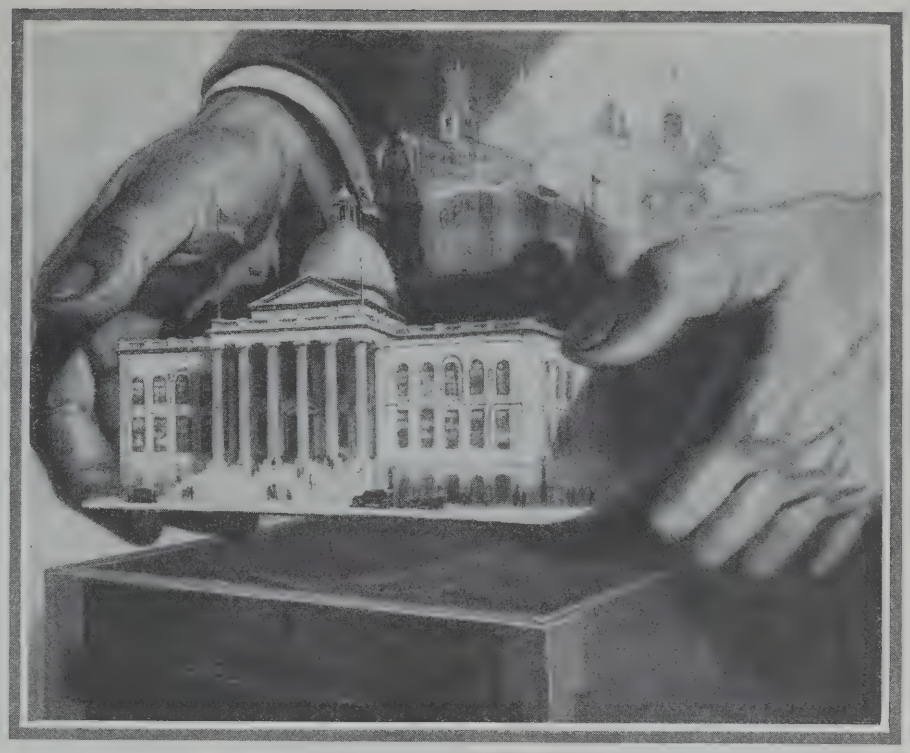
Punch Heseltine did not know why these things should disturb him, even interest him. But they did.

Then one evening something further happened.

Fate's little games with human pieces never stand still. They are progressive and must be played to the end. And the slightest, most unsuspected of incidents and things serve as gambits.

Doria and he had got back later than usual. It was practically dark when they dismounted at the gate, and as he swung her from the saddle an unexpected movement brought her into his arms, her lips almost to his.

But what might so easily have happened did not happen. For in the same moment someone in white, swift and wraithlike, came through the gate behind them, and sped down the road. Doria sprang away, the horses plunged, the grooms came running.



And when they got into the drawing room the first thing he saw was a big shady hat hanging by its veil to the back of a chair.

Pam, smoking a cigarette, with his nurse, indicated it cheerfully.

"My nerve specialist has forgotten her hat. A job for you, Punch, on your way home."

"Why should Punch bother?" Doria spoke with a fierce petulance. "She can get it tomorrow when she comes."

"And get sunstroke in coming," protested Pam.

A community's promise to pay

SO strong is the security of good Municipal and State Bonds that State laws approve them as suitable investments for Savings Banks.

Such bonds promise to pay you their face value after a definite term of years, and yield interest free from Federal income tax.

The National City Company has learned through years of analytical study the factors which make certain Government, State, Municipal, Railway, Public Utility and Industrial Bonds more desirable than others.

The results of the Company's latest studies will be found in a list of recommended Bonds—a copy of which will be mailed on request.

THE NATIONAL CITY COMPANY · NATIONAL CITY BANK BUILDING · NEW YORK

The National City Company

National City Bank Building, New York

Offices in more than 50 leading cities throughout the World

BONDS SHORT TERM NOTES ACCEPTANCES

Music Lessons

UNDER MASTER TEACHERS

At Home

A Complete Conservatory Course By Mail Wonderful home study music lessons under great American and European teachers. Endorsed by Paderewski. Master teachers guide and coach you. Lessons a marvel of simplicity and completeness.

Any Instrument Write telling us course you are interested in—Piano, Harmony, Voice, Public School Music, Violin, Cornet, Mandolin, Guitar, Banjo, or Reed Organ—and we will send our Free Catalog with details of course you want. Send now.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION CONSERVATORY
760 Siegel-Myers Bldg. Chicago, Illinois

Cultivate Your Musical Bump

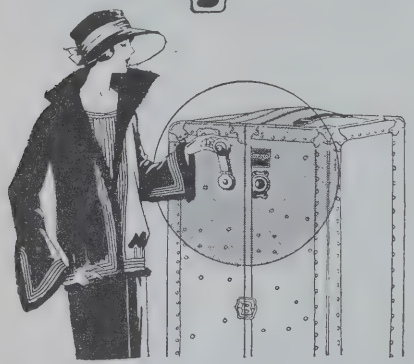
Conn instruments are easiest to play and highest quality, say the world's greatest artists. Write now for Free Book and details of FREE TRIAL; EASY PAYMENTS on any band instrument.

C. G. CONN LTD.
411 Conn Bldg.
Elkhart, Ind.

CONN
WORLD'S LARGEST MANUFACTURERS OF HIGH GRADE BAND AND ORCHESTRA INSTRUMENTS

Cosmopolitan TRAVEL SERVICE

Cosmopolitan accepts advertising only from resorts and travel concerns that we KNOW are reliable and truly serviceable to the traveling public.



Europe Tours
TRAVEL COOK'S SERVICE
$400 up

Complete Series of Spring and Summer Tours—Escorted or Independent.
Pension Tours—select itineraries, best leadership. Fares ranging from $400—32 days—and up.

COOK'S Annual Summer Cruise
Around the MEDITERRANEAN
by splendid, new, Cunard-Anchor Liner, TUSCANIA—Sailing June 30—63 days—Popular Fares.

THOS. COOK & SON
245 Broadway NEW YORK 561 Fifth Ave.

Clark's 20th Mediterranean Cruise
June 27, by specially chartered "Baltic", 23,884 tons; 61 days, $600 up including hotels, guides, drives, fees. Stop-overs in Europe.
SUMMER TOURS TO EUROPE.
F. C. CLARK, Times Building .....New York

IT is a genuine delight to own one of the handsome new Belber Safe-Lock Wardrobe Trunks. It brings you all the many attractive conveniences of the finest trunks, and, in addition, each one is equipped with the patented Belber Safe-Lock. This revolutionary improvement makes locking and unlocking decidedly easy and simple. One turn of the lock up or down unlocks or locks every catch. No stooping or breaking finger nails.

Our attractive booklet, "The Style in Wardrobe Trunks—and how to pack them," will give you full details on our smartest models. Write for it.

Belber
SAFE-LOCK WARDROBE TRUNK
Wonderful values—$37.50 and up
THE BELBER TRUNK & BAG CO., Philadelphia

But Punch had already taken hold of the hat, and he was one of those who do not easily relinquish what they have laid hands on. Doria's opposition only determined him the more upon the errand.

It had come to that between them—trial of strength. Gradually he had been discovering in her, behind that fragile, childlike air, an amazing quality of resolution; and in turn imposing upon her an iron quality of his own. Today, out on the veldt, things had come to a climax; an unspoken climax of course, as everything remained unspoken, even while the crimson and purple banners of desire flaunted back and forth between them. In those tumultuous silences, when only their eyes and pulses spoke, she had tried to break him to her wishes as she had broken men time and again.

All her life she had been engaged in this entrancing pastime of making men slaves to her beauty, just for the short mad pleasure of it while it was new. And here was one who resisted enslavement, even while she knew that he was mad for her! Refrained from the secret, luscious fruit she held to his thirsty lips!

What held him back? At first she did not know. It never occurred to her. Then, with a fuller knowledge of the man, she divined it.

Loyalty. But, loyalty to a man to be put before love of her! He must be punished for that. Yes, she would terribly punish him—later. After the first tense sweetness—when she had wearied of him as she always wearied.

Meanwhile she felt a thrill, an enthralment in the game, never before experienced, and all that was in her of witchery she exercised, all that she had of sweet ensnaring graces she used. Siren eyes mocked his backwardness, seducing lips smiled at his scruples. She scorched him with the fire that ate her, and felt in turn the heat of flame in him. She tempted and tormented him to breaking point, and—well, he simply didn't break, that was all.

True—there at the gate, just now, she had almost won! But the passing of that hateful girl . . .

And now she almost hated him—realizing that such a man could be loved. But love was not in her scheme and never had been. Pleasure, yes, sweet short draughts from the secret cup of passion; but no more. Always she had withdrawn unscathed from these hidden liaisons, a little bored perhaps, but only with the man—never with the pastime.

The things she loved were different. Power, place, position, riches. Those were things to love. And Pam's health she loved, because it meant those things—Scawnshane, and the Marquisate of Kenchester.

This was the kind of woman Doria Heseltine was. But at last she had met her Waterloo. For in the hour that Punch Heseltine, true to some fine thing in his nature that would not be betrayed, balked at blood-treason, he dominated his cousin's wife.

The knife she had aimed so often at men's hearts, relentlessly, successfully, and so happily in her own immunity, began to take a backward curve towards her own.

With the girl's hat in his hand Punch opened the gate and let himself into that dim dewy place of tall trees and gentle English scents.

The paths were outlined with whitewashed stones, but sometimes he stepped upon some mass of fragrance that had overflowed, and an aroma of silver thyme arose, cutting the air like the cry of a lute. The still night seemed yet full of sighs. Away up the hill were the lights of the house, but he did not hurry towards them. He liked this garden of purple darkness and whispering leaves.

But suddenly a different sound smote his ear, a soft moaning sigh, with something human in it. And it was quite close by.

He took a few more silent steps and found himself on a sort of terrace; faintly outlined objects looked like chairs; something swayed gently from the trees. A hammock—and a slim line of whiteness in it, from which issued those sobbing sounds of distress. A girl was lying there, deeply weeping.

He stood still, intensely embarrassed. What should he do? Go away as silently as he had come? But something kind in him did not agree to this. Something strong and tender in him desired to give comfort.

He put out an impulsive hand and it touched other hands pressed to a face—all drenched and drowned with tears, the floods of tears only youth can pour out in its sorrows.

She started wildly at his touch, and there was terror in her cry:

"Who is that?"

"Punch Heseltine," he answered gently, reassuringly, and sat beside her in one of the shadowy chairs. "I brought your hat."

After a moment's tense silence, to his surprise a soft sob fell out of the hammock, then another and another. She had resumed her weeping, as if she could not help it. Like a child she had to weep her sorrow out. But he could not bear it. His heart in turn was shaken by those long shuddering sobs.

"Don't—don't!" he implored. "What is it? Can't I help?"

"My little bush-baby is dead. A dog tore it to pieces while I was away." So brokenly and childishly she said it, and dissolved once more into her flooding tears.

His heart too seemed to dissolve. He wondered how anyone on earth could comfort children for their poignant sorrows—why anything so sweet as a child stayed in such a devil of a world at all.

"I'm so sorry—don't cry any more, dear."

He said it simply and naturally. She had turned him into a child too. Like two children sitting there in the darkness they were.

He took one of her wet, cold little hands and held it strongly in his warm one. For a moment it seemed to strive like a caught bird, and his heart stirred strangely to that movement; then it curled in his and was still.

They were both still. But a hurricane of sensation and emotion began presently to sweep and pierce him—shame for the base fires that had scorched his soul these past days, joy in his freedom from an unpardonable sin, thankfulness for loyalty and the love of cleanness . . .

All this from the feel of a girl's hand curled in his! And then a cooling peace,

Europe Within Your Reach

THAT trip to Europe is at last within your reach. Low rates for foreign exchange and reduced fares have made American dollars go further than ever before. If you are ever going, the time to go is now.

Have you got your passports? And your vise? Do you know where you're going to stay? What to see? How much to tip? What the Travel Bureaus can do for you abroad? What a "one-cabin boat" is? How to carry your money? Whether an American must always travel First Class on European railroads?

If you can't answer "yes!" instantly to all these questions and dozens more like them, you need to read our new booklet.

"That Trip to Europe"

It explains passports and vises, baggage and tips. Pictures Europe as is. Shows why this is a marvelous year to go across. It has a map giving principal distances.

Whether you know you're going, or hope to go, or dream of going, you should read this booklet. It is one of our Cosmopolitan series aimed to make travel and vacation planning easier for Cosmopolitan readers and richer in results. It is sent you for the cost of printing—ten cents.

After you have read it, if you have any further questions about routes, hotels, prices, shops, ask us. We'll answer fully and gladly, free of charge.

Send 10c for booklet No. 6 on Europe

In addition to the European booklet the following are available at 4c apiece:

No. 1. South America and Central America.

No. 2. Southern Europe and the Mediterranean.

No. 3. Pacific Coast and the Great Southwest.

No. 4. The Orient.

No. 5. Florida, Bermuda and the West Indies.

Cosmopolitan Travel Service

119 West 40th Street New York, N. Y.

Cosmopolitan Travel Service, 119 West 40th Street, New York City

Enclosed find.....cents in stamps. Please send me booklets Nos.....(if you care to give the following additional information it will help us to help you.) I plan to travel in (Names of countries or localities).....

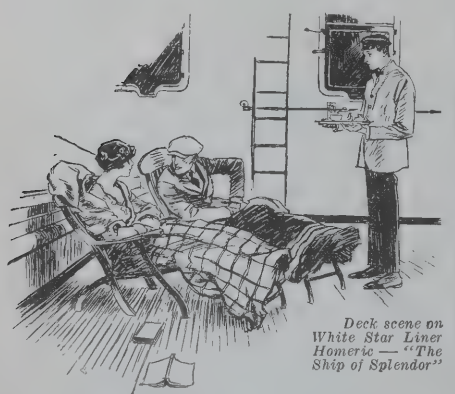
I will leave (Date).....

Name.....

Address.....

Majestic—World's largest ship

Plan Your European Trip



Now

Whatever Your Travel Requirements, we can meet them

Just what your individual tastes and means require for your European trip is certainly available among the complete ocean transportation facilities of our famous White Star—Red Star—American—White Star Dominion and Atlantic Transport Lines.

Our agents can provide what you want, whether a de luxe suite on the Olympic, Homeric, the world's largest ship Majestic (holder of the speed record to the continent), the new palatial Belgenland, or extremely moderate priced accommodations on one of our many comfortable cabin ships.

Our complete ocean services offer five sailings weekly to English ports, three to France, and one each to Ireland, Belgium and Germany.

Deck scene on White Star Liner Homeric — "The Ship of Splendor"

WHITE STAR LINE
AMERICAN LINE — RED STAR LINE
INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE COMPANY

No. 1 Broadway, New York

winging out of space and nesting in the fastnesses of his heart.

The mellow boom of a dinner gong echoing through the garden broke the spell. The girl slid to her feet, took the hat from his hand, thanking him shyly, and in a few moments he was riding home.

He neglected an engagement for dinner and cards that night and dined alone in camp, an uncommon proceeding for him. But he had things to think about—new things, fresh vistas to contemplate, a program of action to construct that would take him away for a while from Umtété—at least until his cousin had completed his cure and left for home.

It is always when men take upon themselves the onus of their own destiny, give signs of trying to fashion the future for themselves, that old Fate, at her most ironic, makes an idle but significant gesture, just to show that she is still there, with fateful gifts in her hands.

Just as Punch had finished his plans and calculations for that night at least and was on the point of retiring to bed, a constable entered with two delayed wires that had been brought in by a runner. One came from the C. C. of Police and dealt with a matter long impending—a tour of inspection in Northern Rhodesia, and for which he required Punch's company and immediate attendance in Buluwayo, with a view to an early start. That was that, then, and most definitely accounted for the next two months or so of Punch's existence, without regard to any plans formed by himself. But the second wire exhibited an even more imposing and dramatic gesture on the part of Fate. It proved to be a cablegram sent from London by the firm of solicitors that had served the Heseltine family for centuries:

"Regret to ask you break news to Mr. Pamfreville Heseltine that his brother Richard was killed yesterday on Cresta Run St. Moritz. Lord Kenchester shattered by blow desires us remind you of your position in case of non-survival of present heir."

Stunned and puzzled, Punch read and reread. At last he realized that the people at home did not know yet of the changed condition of Pamfreville Heseltine. They were expecting to hear of his early demise. And then, by reason of the tragic removal of poor young Dick, it would be his—Punch's—turn to step into the expectation of Scawnshane and the Kenchester title!

At that he could not help a smile.

"Not much of the 'non-survivor' about old Pam now," he thought. "He's a hot number, as they'll pretty soon discover."

When it comes to writing Romance, colored with mystery and tinged with the wistfulness of real men and women, Cynthia Stockley is a magician. The next instalment of "The Garden of Peril" proves it. See May COSMOPOLITAN.

Discipline

(Continued from page 57)

B Throop wint into permanent quarthers in a nice barrio on the shore of Lake Lanao an' we took up the humdrum life of garrison throops until one bright day a fanatical Moro declared for a new deal. He descinded upon our barrio almost as naked as the babe unborn, smeared from head to foot with coconut oil so that no man might hold him, an' carryin' a whoppin' big two-handed campilân.

"He arrived in the horse lines wit' a whoop and hurray, hamstrung two horses, cut a sojer in two halves from shoulder to belt, and shtarted chasin' the stable police, who were unarmed, in an' out among the horses an' the stables.

"I was in command of a squad groomin' at the far end of the picket line, when I heard the cry of 'Juaramentado!' which is a word, once hear'rd in Moro land, that is never forgotten. It is a sure sign of death, for once a Moro runs juaramentado nothin' but death will shtop him. The Mohammedan devil is out to kill all the unbelievers he can before rifle fire wafts him to his Moslem paradise.

"I was washin' me bridle with one eye on the squad at the time, an' I had the bridle apart and was scrubbin' it in a bucket of warm Castile soap suds, preparatory to saddle-soapin' it, which to my mind is the only way to treat a good bridle, when the scrimmage shtarted; an' before I could make a move that black-toothed fiend was coming shtraight at me in big India rubber jumps.

"'Gwan, ye divil,' says I, an' seizin' the fir'rst weapon ready to me hand, I hur'rled it at him. Be the same token 'twas the contints of the bucket I was squatted beside an' I gave him three gallons of shtrong soap suds full in the face an' lepped aside.

"Then I threw the bucket at him as he missed his fir'rst cut at me; as I shtarted to run, I saw that the lye in the suds had gotten into his eyes an' for the moment he couldn't see.

"So with that I changed me tactics. Shtraight at him I run an' swung a beautiful right to his colorado maduro jaw. That took the conceit out of him, an' whilst he was gropin' around, blinded be suds an' tears, I kicked him in the belly. That stretched him, an' he dhropped his campilân, which I picked up immediately and used for the purpose for which campilâns were fir'rst invinted. I split his pompadour as nately as a barber might an' as a sign to others of his ilk to observe the treaty of peace, Johnny had him buried with a pig and promoted me to sergeant.

"A week later a detail of seven throopers and a corporal, camped down at the landin' where the cascos from across the lake docked with supplies for our garrison, was set upon in the dead o' night. 'Twas a surprise attack and unprovoked. The man on guard was sneaked upon an' butchered quietly; then the rest of the detail with one exception were kilt in their beds, the outpost pillaged an' the carbines an' pistols of the murdered men taken, together with their belts and ammunition.

"Little Rat Hosmer was the one man who escaped. He'd gotten out of bed and gone down to the kitchen for a dhrink of water, an' if he'd lear'rned nothin' else in Mindanao he'd lear'rned that a wise man is he who never neglects to carry his pistol and dumdum his ammunition.

"The Rat shot his way through the mess and escaped in the dark, and at daylight he was back ag'in with Johnny and the throop.

"Johnny looked at his dead sojer bhoys and comminced to cry.

"'Look at this, sir, an' laugh,' says the Rat, and led him down to the kitchen where four dead Moros lay. 'Twas quite dark, sir, an' I had but six shots an' only four men to shoot at, else I'd have evened the score,' says the Rat apologetically. 'At that I didn't do a half bad job, for this snaggle-toothed son of Allah was not unknown to me in life,' says he, toeing one of the departed. 'He's a sub-dato of Sultan Saman, and Sultan Saman dwells in that big coto yonder across the lake, where the smoke is now. He is be way of livin' in a big mud fort.'

"'We will call on the Sultan Saman to return his henchmen and ask for an explanation,' says Johnny.

"So we gathered up our dead and buried them, tossed the Moros in a bull cart and started around the lake shore to call on Saman.

"We arrived in the cool of the morning an' Sultan Saman looked over the top of his mud fort and he was very polite to Johnny, but neglected entirely to invite him in.

"So Johnny climbed up on the mud wall, took the Sultan Saman be the arm in a most fraternal manner, an' waltzed him down among B Throop, for a look at what we'd brought him.

"'Sultan,' says Johnny through his interpreter, 'do you happen to know these dead men?'

"'I do not,' says Saman.

"'That is most unfortunate, Your Highness,' says Johnny, 'because it disappoints me greatly, and whin I'm disappointed nothin' will cure me but a dead Sultan. Saman, you're a liar. Your men did this, and I want the murdherers. I want them now.

"'Send word to your second in command to send out the men and the carbines and pistols they stole from me sojers after murdhering them. For this is murdher, Saman. Were my losses the fortune of war I should not complain, but there is peace between your people and mine; hence this thing is murdher.'

"Saman swore by the beard of the Prophet no men of his had done this thing. It had been the work of outlaws—of Pulajanes over whom he had no control.

"Johnny took out his watch and held it carelessly in his hand.

"'Those men and the stolen arms will be turned over to me within one hour, Saman', he said. At the end of that time I shall attack and nothing that lives in here shall continue to live, once me men get inside this fort.'

"In fifteen minutes we had our men. Not a rifle or pistol was missing, and the prisoners numbered twenty-eight. I have always felt that Saman played fair with us, for Johnny would have been satisfied with half that number.

"We rode away until we came to a dry

The ORIENT
on your next trip abroad

Ride in a two wheeled Japanese jinrikisha through pink cherry lanes in the springtime. See Fujiyama, sacred mountain, towering serenely over a nation which has the charm of antique world combined with the ingenuity of the new.

After cherry blossoms come great purple wistaria, gorgeous iris, lotus and peony. And in the autumn—chrysanthemums. A "Flowery Kingdom" indeed. With gold roofed temples among the blossoms.

And China. See the "Forbidden City" of Peking. See Canton, a teeming epitome of Chinese life and color. Seoul, in Korea, Mukden, in Manchuria, Shanghai, meeting place for cosmopolitans. Take a trip down the Yangste-Kiang, a Broadway of picturesque junks and houseboats.

Manila. The old walled city built by Spain. New suburbs laid out like parks. A fascinating mixture of old and new—America in the Orient.

Four Canadian Pacific Empresses—fastest steamers on the Pacific—sail fortnightly from Vancouver, B. C. With accommodations equal to the finest Trans-Atlantic liners. Everything Canadian Pacific standard—there is none better. Canadian Pacific representatives residing at each port will serve you ashore. Overland tours arranged to cover Japan, China; Korea. Consult the nearest Canadian Pacific Agent.

Canadian Pacific Agencies
Atlanta, 49 Forsyth St.
Boston, 405 Boylston St.
Buffalo, 160 Pearl St.
Chicago, 40 N. Dearborn St.
Cincinnati, 430 Walnut St.
Cleveland, 1040 Prospect Ave.
Detroit, 1239 Griswold St.
Duluth, Soo Line Depot
Kansas City, 1601 Railway Express Bldg.
Los Angeles, 605 S. Spring St.
Minneapolis, 611 Second Ave. S.
Montreal, 141 St. James St.
New York, Madison Ave. at 44th St.
Philadelphia, Locust and 15th St.
Pittsburgh, 340 Sixth Ave.
Portland, Ore., 55 Third St.
San Francisco, 675 Market St.
Seattle, 608 Second Ave.
St. Louis, 420 Locust St.
Tacoma, 1113 Pacific Ave.
Washington, D. C., 1419 New York Ave.

Canadian Pacific
It Spans the World

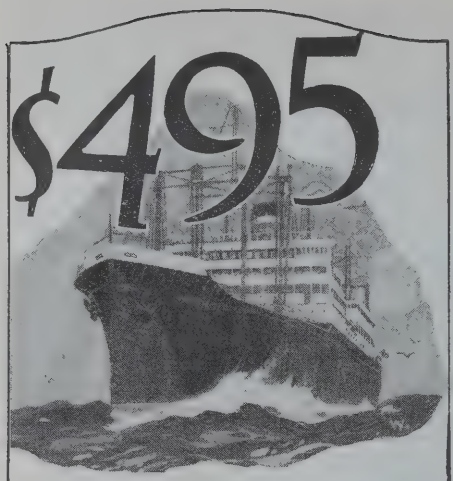
FURNESS BERMUDA LINE
"Nature's Fairyland"—2 Days from New York.
Sailings Twice-Weekly via Palatial Steamers
S. S. "FORT VICTORIA" and S. S. "FORT ST. GEORGE"
Easter Holiday Tours Mar: 24, 28, 31
For Booklets and Full Particulars write to
FURNESS BERMUDA LINE, 34 Whitehall St., N. Y.

The chance of a lifetime to see Europe. See page 183.

40,000 Opportunities in Hotels

Nation-wide demand for men and women—Hotels, Clubs, Tea Rooms, Restaurants. Past experience unnecessary. We train you by mail and help you get a position. Big pay—fine living—quick advancement—our methods endorsed by leading hotels everywhere. Write for free book—"Your Big Opportunity." LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOLS, Room 21 2, Washington, D.C.

GATES TOURS TO EUROPE



INCLUDING Paris, London and the Mediterranean,—30 days of delightful European travel for as little as $425. Longer tours up to $1100, ranging from 30 to 80 days. Sailings from May to September.

Comfort combined with economy

Gates Tours, founded in 1892, are planned with the idea of giving their patrons comfort, combined with economy.

Let us send you complete information about Gates Tours to Europe next summer. Write for Booklet F-2.

GATES TOURS—Founded 1892
"World Travel at Moderate Cost"
225 Fifth Avenue, New York
London - Paris - Rome

for a Six Weeks Trip to Europe

IF you are planning a trip to Europe, you can now have the vacation of your life for only $495. Send the information blank below for your Government's surprising new booklet, "Economy Trips to Europe," which gives suggested itineraries for tours costing but $495 and shows you how to get a maximum return for your time and money spent abroad. Don't fail to write for this invaluable guide.

Glorious Days on Government Ships

The low rates on the swift, comfortable "Cabin Ships" operated by the United States Lines make this six weeks trip practicable at $495. On these splendid vessels, a cabin passage to England is only $120—third-class $85.

Write Today

Mail the information blank today for the new booklet "Economy Trips to Europe," and also for the handsomely illustrated booklet, showing actual photographs of the Government ships that run to all parts of the world. No obligation. Send the information blank now!

INFORMATION BLANK
To U. S. Shipping Board
Infor. Sec. U. S. 1204 Washington, D.C.

Please send without obligation the U. S. Government literature described above. I am considering a trip to Europe ☐, to The Orient ☐, to South America ☐.

If I go date will be about.....

My Name.....

My Street No. or R.F.D......

Town..... State.....

For information in regard to sailings address:

United States Lines
45 Broadway New York City
Agencies in principal cities
Managing Operators for
UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD

rice field and there we halted. Ould man Melody rode up to the captain.

"'What shall I do with the prisoners, sir?' says he.

"'I'm afraid they're goin' to prove an embarrassment to us, sergeant,' says Johnny plaintively, 'unless we find some work for them to do. Prisoners should be made to work, sergeant. Here's a nice, open field, with not a bush in a hundred acres under which a jack rabbit might hide. Is Sergeant McMurdo there?'

"'He is, sir.'

"'Am I mistaken, or is McMurdo the man who was runner-up for the rifle championship of the army last year?'

"'The captain is not mistaken.'

"'Well, detail Sergeant McMurdo and ten men to take charge of these prisoners and put them to work cutting wood. We might be passing this way ag'in some day and need firewood. Out of compliment to McMurdo he has my permission to select the detail himself.'

"'Yes, sir,' says ould Melody an' attinded to the matther. The throop rode on, leavin' McMurdo and his ten men—of which, thanks to a rating as sharpshooter, I was one—to superintend the cutting of the wood.

"Fifteen minutes later we rejoined the throop, and I think Johnny must have been expecting us, for he'd halted the throop and was restin' with the men in the shade.

McMurdo rode up to him, dismounted, snapped into it and said:

"'Sir, those prisoners attempted to escape. They refused to halt when ordhered to do so, and I ordhered me detail to open fire on them, but only afther they had run at least two hundred yards, headed for the timber. I gave them every chance, sir, but they wouldn't stop, so twenty-eight new faces are now whining around the divil.'

"'Such unfortunate incidents are to be regretted, Sergeant McMurdo,' says Johnny. 'I sincerely hope, however, that what has happened this day will prove a lesson to every one of the twenty-eight. That will be all, sergeant.'

"Like Johnny, we all thought it would be. But it wasn't.

"Eight months later, down in Zamboanga, we hear'rd the echo. It arrived in the shape of a cablegram from the commanding general of the Department of the Philippines to the commanding officer at Zamboanga, instructing him to relieve Captain John H. Packard, B Throop, —th Cavalry, of his command and to place him under arrest in his quarthers forthwith, awaitin' the action of a general court-martial which would shortly be convened to try the said Captain John H. Packard for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gintleman in that the said Packard had been charged with having, on a certain date, and at a time when a state of war did not exist, wantonly put to death by rifle fire twenty-eight Moros in the vicinity of Lake Lanao, etc., etc.

"I happened to be in the ordherly room when the news broke on Johnny. He read the ordher aloud and his face went white enough as he read it.

"'I—I—never thought it would leak out,' he protested. 'I didn't care if it reached headquarters in Manila because the commanding general can be trusted to undershtand. The rules of war as promulgated at The Hague Conference were not meant to include Moro murderers, because the Sultan Saman wasn't represented at the historical conference. No, men, this thing comes shtraight from Washington, where they can never possibly undershtand the only method of handling a Malay.

"'Why how could I try those men? In the fir'rst place, I didn't have any authority to try them, and in the second place, I didn't have time. In the third place, they were guilty as hell, because their chief admitted it and sent them out to me with the shtolen arms, evidence of their guilt.

"'A trial by anybody would have been a mockery. They were charged when I got to the gate of that mud fort and served my verbal John Doe warrant on the Sultan, and they were tried and convicted the instant the Sultan gave them up.

"'What if the Sultan did explain that he was sorry, that these men were kinsmen of the juaramentado chap Ryan had killed a week before; that they merely sought reprisal? My job was to play the game as the Malay plays it—an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. To a Moro mercy means weakness and death is nothing at all.

"'They expected to be executed because they deserved it. They knew the code. The Sultan expected it and has even now doubtless forgotten the episode. But news of it has leaked to Washington to some civilian in Congress, and the Secretary of War, who also is a civilian, has cabled the ould man to make an example of me.

"'No, that means a bobtail out of the service and perhaps ten years in Leavenworth.

"'The politicians tried to get old Hell-Roaring Jake when he employed the water cure to get the guns. And he got the guns too! Got them in the only way anybody ever gets anything out of a Malay—by force. It didn't occur to the politicians, of course, that old Jake was saving a lot of American lives and that war is never a strawberry festival.

"'Later the politicians tried to get Pershing for that affair at the Volcano. Said he slaughtered Moros, women and children, and we all know the women and children were with their men in the crater and they wouldn't come out and the Moros opened fire. High explosive shell and shrapnel are no respecters of age or sex.

"'But now, at last, the politicians have got a human sacrifice for the altar of publicity! They'll get me as sure as death and taxes. I'm only a captain of cavalry!'

"And when he had said that, Johnny had to sit down.

"Ould Melody tossed his frigid blue eye at me and I fled, and in about an hour the top came into the squad room and called McMurdo outside. They had a talk, and then McMurdo came inside and called nine men and meself outside. Be the same token the eleven of us constituted the detail that had given those twenty-eight Moros a two-hundred yard running shtart for the timber.

"The news was all over the throop be now, of course, and McMurdo came to the point.

"'Which one of you blackguards blabbed?' says he. 'Somebody wrote home, describin' the affair in detail and using the names of all of us. The account appeared in a New York newspaper, a Senator read it and commenced throwing fits. He threw one in the office of the Secretary of War and half a dozen more on the floor of the Senate, and the Senate has demanded a showdown from the Secretary of War, who has demanded a showdown from the commanding general of the Department of the Philippines, who has demanded a showdown from Johnny. Now, then, who has ruined our Johnny? The story leaked from some wan of the eleven who did the job. Who was it?'

"There was silence for a bit, and then Felix McSheehy commenced to weep.

"'So 'twas you, Felix, you good for nothin' poet!' says McMurdo. 'I might have known it. Ye're the writin' man of this outfit. Hum-m-m-m! I recall now that you were a newspaper writer in civil life. You wrote a poem a day, so you told us—bad luck to you! Why in blue blazes didn't you stick to poetry? Your letter writin' it is that has bobtailed the finest officer and gintleman the army ever knew.'

"'It was a poem,' says poor Felix. 'Sure, 'twas a most shtirrin' an' dramatic episode an' me hear'rt thrilled to relate the tale of it in shtirrin' verse an' immortalize B Throop.'

"'You ass! You blitherin' ass!' says McMurdo. 'Who did you send your brain child to call upon?'

"'To me ould city editor,' says Felix. 'I didn't think—I didn't mean a bit of har'rm, sergeant, honest I didn't.'

"'Shut up!' says McMurdo. 'Not another peep out of you or I'll break the back of ye in two halves. Now, thin, you of the pale pink thoughts, where did you lear'rn to shoot? If you hadn't been an expert rifleman I'd never have picked you for that day's sport.'

"'I used to sojer in the New York National Guard,' says poor Felix.

"McMurdo groaned. 'Potting and poetry is his specialty, so it is,' says he. 'Now, thin, Felix, me brave lad, what would you give to save the throop commandher?'

"'I'd give me life,' says Felix. 'I'd throw it away like an ould sock to save Johnny. Poor divil! Did he ever do me a day o' harm? He did not. God forgive me, I must have been crazy!'

"'You were, Felix, and what's more, ye're crazy shtill. That much I'll admit on the witness shtand.'

"'So will I, sarge,' says poor Felix.

"'So say we all of us,' says I, chippin' in for the fir'rst time, for I saw the drift of McMurdo's mind. 'Felix, this poem of yours is not founded on fact but on a disordhered imagination due to a diet of canned salmon, prunes an' black coffee. Is it not a fact, Felix, that in all your bor'rn days ye never saw a dead Moro?'

"'I'll swear to that on a stack of Bibles seventeen hands high,' says Felix, like the good cavalryman he was.

"'Then go yer way and have done with these poetic ravin's of yours,' says McMurdo, an' give the rest of us a wink. 'Ould Melody an' Gus Schultz, who used to be a lawyer's clerk, are batin' the brains out of the throop typewriter now, makin' out an affidavit. Lave us go down into the town and have a couple of quarts

Not Like Any Summer

that you've ever spent

HERE is real difference, real change, real relaxation, new interest, new fun, new healthfulness, for the coming summer.

All in Southern California—a place that you, perhaps, have thought to be too warm for that season of the year. And yet summer is preferred by Californians to the winter months. Note the U. S. Weather Bureau's figures—a forty-four-year record—(average mean temperatures taken in a great central city in this section):

44 Junes, 66 degrees.
44 Julys, 70 degrees.
44 Augusts, 71 degrees.
44 Septembers, 69 degrees.

And summer is the rainless season. Mark that this makes each day available all day for all you want to do, and there are a thousand things in this strange land to do and see.

And all within a radius of two hundred miles from a great central city, with 4,000 miles of world-famous motor roads reaching out from it in all directions.

A desert like Sahara, turquoise lakes on mountain tops, stupendous views over rich valleys, rocky scenic grandeurs, the center of the moving picture industry, which came here because of the same variety that makes this country so interesting to travelers—great sea shore resorts, famous golf courses, old Spanish Missions, brilliant hotel dining rooms and dances, or quiet mountain retreats where one may merely rest, or go trout fishing—this is the unique section of your country that you should see.

Southern California is the new gateway to Hawaii.

It absorbs you, revitalizes, renews your interest and spirit, and rebuilds torn nerves in a remarkably short time. A great playground, it has the playground atmosphere in which troubles vanish over night.

Truly a summer here is unlike any that you've ever spent; for in varied possibilities in sports, sight-seeing, or in methods and kinds of pure rest that you can take, there is no other land within your United States that is similar in any way.

Change is the essence of a good vacation. Completely new environment is magic medicine. Golf is more fun, likewise tennis, swimming, and all other pastimes take on zest in the midst of such change.

Do the things here that you can do in other places and enjoy them more. And do a thousand things, if you have time, that you can't do anywhere but here. That is Southern California, and it's at its best in summer.

Plan the trip now. The railroad journey through the Great West is teeming with historic interest. You have the finest limited trains, the most comfortable travel in the world.

Any railroad ticket agent will gladly furnish further information. Or mail coupon below and get our "Southern California Book."

Let next summer be a different one—the best you've ever had.

All-Year Club of Southern California

All-Year Club of Southern California,
Dept. M-2104, Chamber of Commerce Bldg.,
Los Angeles, Calif.

Please send me full information about the summer and year around vacation possibilities in Southern California.

Name.....

Address.....

The Living Dead

They live in open graves—millions of them. They are the living dead.

SENSELESS to honor; feeble in mind; moral degenerates and physical outlaws, they are the victims of the human vermin that crawl the asphalts of Broadway and the cobbles of Main Street.

DOPE is a merciless master. Sin, crime, pain and shame are his associates; prisons, hospitals, and paupers' graves his resting places. He spares no race, no creed, no sex, no age. From his grasp there is but one escape—death.

"The Inside Story of Dope in this Country" now appearing in Hearst's INTERNATIONAL, reveals the terrible devastation caused by the drug evil. It takes you into millionaires' homes, into the brothels of the underworld, into wild revelries and prison cells.

THE vital questions of the day are discussed and analyzed in Hearst's INTERNATIONAL, such as "The New Threat of the Ku Klux Klan" and "Jews in the Colleges." There are also nine fiction stories and three novels by the world's best writers, and many beautiful color pages by artists of international fame.

THE April issue of this magazine, in addition, contains an eight page Spring Fashions supplement in rotogravure representing the finest creations by the Printz-Biederman Company of Cleveland, Ohio. It is an accurate forecast of what the fashionable women will wear, superbly illustrated with actual photographs of living models.

Hearst's International

A LIBERAL EDUCATION

Norman Hapgood, Editor

April Issue Out March 20 — 35 cents a copy

Tear Off Here

Hearst's INTERNATIONAL,
119 West 40th Street, New York

Special Offer

I accept your Special Offer and enclose $1.00 for a four months' subscription. (The regular price is $3.00 a year.)

Name_____

Address_____

CO-423

$2 Brings This Genuine DIAMOND RING

14 K

No Red Tape No Delay

SET IN PLATINUM

Think of it—seven brilliant genuine diamonds massed in a setting of solid platinum so closely together that only close inspection will distinguish it from a $750 solitaire.

10 DAYS' TRIAL

Simply send $2; if you can duplicate this diamond ring for less than $65, your deposit will be refunded. Guarantee bond accompanies each ring. After trial, pay balance $4.65 a month for ten months. Price only $48.50.

FREE ROYAL CATALOG

Illustrates thousands of special offers in Diamonds, Watches and Jewelry from our $2,000,000 stock. Write Dept. 726

ROYAL DIAMOND & WATCH CO

35-37-39 Maiden Lane - New York

Bring Out the Hidden Beauty

Beneath that soiled, discolored, faded or aged complexion is one fair to look upon

Mercolized Wax

gradually, gently absorbs the devitalized surface skin, revealing the young, fresh, beautiful skin underneath. Used by refined women who prefer complexion of true naturalness. Have you tried it?

Mercolized Wax (beautifier) . . 95c
Powdered Saxolite (for wrinkles) 75c
Phelactine (hair remover) . . $1
Powdered Tarkroot (face rester) $1

All Drug Stores and Toilet Counters

Dearborn Supply Co., 2358 Clybourn Ave., Chicago

of ice cold beer. Felix, the dhrinks a on you.'

"Whin we came back from our dhrinl there was a notice on the throop bulleti board ordherin' every man in the throc to report at the ordherly room.

"We reported an' whin we got there wh should be there but the summary court ofi cer of the regimint and him empowered t administer oaths and witness affidavit And one afther the other, crowdin' on eac other's heels, we signed that blessed afi davit an' swore to it, black lie that it wa an' whin we'd signed we were all feeli that virtuous we were fit to desert Throop an' take holy ordhers.

"Whin the precious document wa all signed an' sealed, McMurdo took over to Johnny's quarthers an' handed to him.

"Poor Johnny's hear'rt was broke a faith, at sight of him, McMurdo con minced to swear like a pirate an' in a mo outrageous manner. He forgot he was throoper an' that Johnny was an offic an' a gintleman. Sure the poor man mu have been quite beside himself, for wh does he do but grab Johnny be tl shoulder an' shake him like a terrier wou a rat.

" 'Come out o' that, Johnny boy!' sa he. 'Arrah, don't be puttin' dogs windows. Come Sunday, God'll sir Monday and ye'll always have someboc to take care of ye. The original of th document has gone to the commandi officer here, and Sergeant Melody has si a friendly Moro interpreter out to tl Sultan Saman with the information th if one wor'rd of this leaks out of his distri B Throop'll come out an' lay the cou thry waste. Sure, how can they convi ye without evidence? Here, here, la here's the evidence an' to blazes with legislators!'

"Three days later Johnny was facin' at rethreat ag'in an' afther the flag h come flutterin down an' the band h marched back to barracks, the lad shto lookin' at us, an' the chin of him worki an' up an' down an' sideways. Six fe in front of him ould man Melody shto at attintion, with his hand at the ri salute, waitin' for Johnny to return t salute before he'd let his hand dhrop. B Johnny's eyes was rovin' up an' down t throop front and he couldn't see that was embarrassin' the top. Afther a lo time, however, a little smile come over t face of him an' his glance met the top Up come his hand to the brim of h s ca paign hat.

" 'Sergeant Melody,' says he, 'dism this throop of damned vagabones a liars.' "

First Sergeant John Ryan glanced aga at the newspaper he had been holding through his recital.

"And I see here," he concluded, "th a judge refused to sind a pickpocket the county jail, provided the pickpock would agree to enlist in the Unit States Army. Mother of Moses! T army's not a reformatory! How a you going to inculcate esprit de cor in a pickpocket?"

In an early issue of COSMOPOLITAN you will find another gem of a story by Peter B. Kyne.

MARY NASH, Star of "Captain Applejack," says: "Of all the aids to beauty Mineralava is the most satisfying."

PRISCILLA DEAN, Star of "The Flame of Life," writes: "Mineralava is the enemy of all skin troubles."

PEGGY WOOD, Star of "The Clinging Vine," says: "I recommend Mineralava Beauty Clay without qualification."

IRENE BORDONI, Star of "The French Doll," says: "Mineralava is the one Beauty Clay that does all and more than is claimed for it."

JULIA SANDERSON, Star of "Tangerine," says: "I use Mineralava regularly and would not be without it."

MARION DAVIES, Star of "When Knighthood Was in Flower," says: "Mineralava surpasses other Beauty Clays so far that I use it and it only."

STARS OF STAGE AND SCREEN ENDORSE

Mineralava

BEAUTY CLAY

PARIS VIVAUDOU NEW YORK Distributor

MARJORIE RAMBEAU, Star of "The Goldfish," says: "Mineralava has brought back my natural complexion."

MAE MURRAY, Star of "Broadway Rose," says: "Nothing so refreshes the face and takes away the tired, strained look as Mineralava."

IRENE FRANKLIN, Star of "The Greenwich Village Follies," says: "I have found Mineralava unequalled in its gift of skin health."

KYRA, the Assyrian dancer, says: "Mineralava is the perfect product for retaining a beautiful contour and an unblemished skin."

BETTY BLYTHE, Star of "The Queen of Sheba," says: "An absolute safeguard for the beauty of the complexion is Mineralava."

"I don't see how you can do it"

"Greatest bargain of my life"

"Never received so much for the money"

"More wonderful than represented"

"These books have traveled thousands of miles with me"

HUNDREDS of pages of Cosmopolitan could be filled with expressions even more enthusiastic than the above, from purchasers of this beautiful set of Little Leather Library volumes. But there is a great "silent vote" even more impressive. Close to twenty million of the great masterpieces in this edition have already been purchased by booklovers in every walk of life. Every volume was sold subject to 30 days' approval, under a straightforward, money-back guarantee. Twenty million books that could have been returned for refund, but were not: no more convincing evidence could be presented as to the extraordinary value given here!

Is this offer too good to be true?

Think of purchasing 30 volumes, including the greatest masterpieces of literature, all for only $2.98. These include the finest works of such immortal authors as Shakespeare, Kipling, Stevenson, Emerson, Poe, Coleridge, Burns, Omar Khayyam, Macaulay, Lincoln, Washington, Oscar Wilde, Gilbert, Longfellow, Drummond, Conan Doyle, Edward Everett Hale, Thoreau, Tennyson, Browning, and others. Each volume is complete, and beautifully bound in a rich, embossed Croft which looks so much like leather that even experts are often confused. The entire set contains over 3,000 pages. Is it surprising that even our friends among publishers wonder how it can be done?

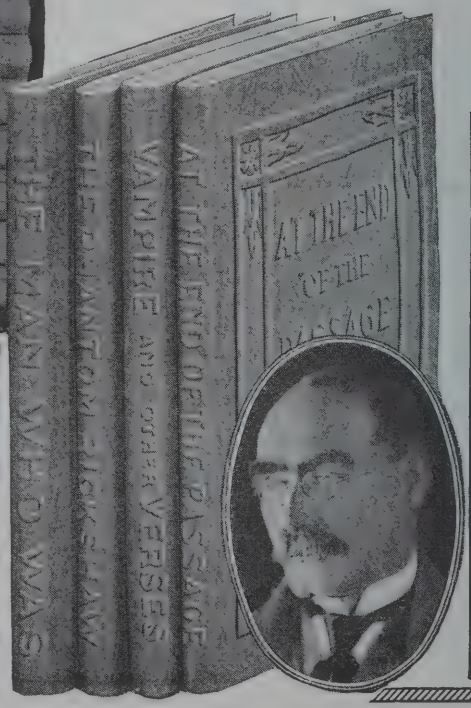
Sent On Approval

If you are the least bit doubtful, all we can do is send this set of 30 volumes to YOU on approval. Send no money now—just the coupon or a letter. Pay only $2.98 plus postage when the set arrives—then send it back if you are even slightly disappointed and we will not only refund your money, but postage both ways.

LITTLE LEATHER LIBRARY CORP.
Dept. 694 354 Fourth Avenue New York

LITTLE LEATHER LIBRARY CORPORATION
Dept. 694, 354 Fourth Avenue, New York City

Please send me on approval the 30 volumes of the De Luxe edition of the Little Leather Library (and the four volumes of Kipling free). I will pay the postman $2.98 plus the postage upon delivery. It is understood however, that this is not to be considered a purchase. If the books do not in every way come up to expectations, I reserve the right to return them any time within thirty days, and you agree to return my money. It is understood that $2.98 plus the postage is positively the only payment to be made on this set.



NOTE: We have had made a special set of Hand Hammered Copper Book Ends to fit this set. Regular $2 value. Our price only 49c. If desired place X in this square ☐

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

(Outside U. S. $3.50 cash with order.)

FREE! FOUR VOLUMES KIPLING

If you will order at once instead of waiting

TO those of us who have been forced to lead drab, workaday lives, Kipling opens up a new world — the vivid, colorful world of the East. The four free volumes include: The Vampire, and Other Verses; The Man Who Was; The Phantom Rickshaw; A Conference of the Powers; The Recrudescence of Imray; At the End of the Passage; The Mutiny of the Mavericks; My Own True Ghost Story.

VOL. LXXIV MAY, 1923 NO. 5

COSMOPOLITAN

America's Greatest Magazine

This Month

In Good Hands		by Harrison Fisher	Cover
What People Call Success		by S. E. Kiser	17
Bread Upon the Waters	[Illustrations by Gordon Ross]	by George Ade	18
Mercy—Part I	[Illustrations by Herbert M. Stoops]	by Peter Clark MacFarlane	20
The Dash After the Period	[Illustrations by Ralph Barton]	by Berton Braley	28
The Guests of Honor	[Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg]	by Kathleen Norris	31
Now That I'm Fifty		by Albert Payson Terhune	36
The Hunch-Player	[Illustrations by C. D. Williams]	by Irvin S. Cobb	38
The Garden of Peril—Part II	[Illustrations by Dean Cornwell]	by Cynthia Stockley	44
"Daylight"	[Illustrations by Charles D. Mitchell]	by Frank R. Adams	53
Camping Out	[Illustrated with Photographs]	by O. O. McIntyre	58
Isabel	[Illustrations by F. R. Gruger]	by Inez Haynes Irwin	60
The Stage Today	[Photographs in Artgravure]		65
Zanzibar	[Illustrations by John Richard Flanagan]	by William Ashley Anderson	69
"Yo-ho-ho and a Bottle of Rum"	[Illustrations by the Author]	by John T. McCutcheon	74
The Lone Wolf Returns—Part IV	[Illustrations by W. D. Stevens]	by Louis Joseph Vance	76
The Great God Four-Flush	[Illustrations by Wallace Morgan]	by Adela Rogers St. Johns	83
The Hope of Happiness—Part III	[Illustrations by Pruett Carter]	by Meredith Nicholson	88
Ukridge's Accident Syndicate	[Illustrations by T. D. Skidmore]	by P. G. Wodehouse	95
Stories That Have Made Me Laugh	[Illustrations by Rea Irvin]	by Montague Glass	100

Next Month

All those in whose homes

Ma Callahan

with her big heart, her homely wisdom, and her Irish wit, was an eagerly awaited guest every month, will be glad to know that has written a new series of Irish stories from life, the first of which will appear in

KATHLEEN NORRIS

COSMOPOLITAN for JUNE

Published monthly by the International Magazine Company at 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST, President; C. H. HATHAWAY, Vice-President; RAY LONG, Vice-President;
JOSEPH A. MOORE, Treasurer; C. E. FORSDICK, Secretary.

Copyright, 1923, by International Magazine Company (Cosmopolitan Magazine). All rights reserved under the terms of the Fourth American International Convention of Artistic and Literary Copyright. 35 cents a copy; subscription price, United States and possessions, $3.00 a year; Canada, $3.50; Foreign, $4.00. All subscriptions are payable in advance. We cannot begin subscriptions with back numbers. Unless otherwise directed we begin all subscriptions with the current issue. When sending in your renewal, please give us four weeks' notice. When changing an address, give the old address as well as the new and allow five weeks for the first copy to reach you. Entered as second-class matter, September 8, 1905, at the Post Office, New York, New York, under the act of March 3, 1879. Entered on July 1, 1918, at the Post Office, Atlanta, Georgia; Boston, Massachusetts; Chicago, Illinois; Los Angeles, California; San Francisco, California.

Photos © Mishkin, Matzene, Dupont, Elliott & Fry, Kubey Rembrant, Hall, Bain, Georg, Apeda, Kirkland, Underwood & Underwood, Townsend, Moffett, Horner, De Marchi, Davis & Sanford

Victrola No. 300
$250
Victrola No. 300, electric, $290
Mahogany, oak or walnut
Other styles $25 to $1500

The strongest endorsement ever given to any musical instrument

All these great artists and many others famous the world over have chosen the Victrola and Victor Records as the one medium to perpetuate their art. Play their Victor Records on the Victrola No. 300—illustrated above—and you will know the reasons for their choice. Ask the nearest dealer in Victor products to send a Victrola and a selection of Victor Records to your home.

Victrola

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Look for these trade-marks. Under the lid. On the label.
Victor Talking Machine Company, Camden, N.J.

VOL. LXXIV
No. 5
COSMOPOLITAN MAY 1923

What People Call Success

by S. E. KISER

DENY yourself the pleasures youth would claim,
Count every moment precious; never rest;
Let profit-getting be your only game;
Be sure to banish pity from your breast;
Choose eagerness for money as a goad
To drive you daily to new enterprise;
Don't pause to gather flowers beside the road,
Be quick to see where your advantage lies.

BREAK briskly through whatever bars your way;
If sentiment assails you, fling it back;
Be sure to be some richer every day,
Let greed be not among the things you lack;
If you can get refinement as you rush
It may not hurt your chance to be refined,
But never hesitate to crowd or crush;
Have one intention always in your mind.

LET love, if you must love, be notning more
Than incidental to the end in view,
Or use it as a key to Fortune's door,
Adjust it to the purpose you pursue;
Beware lest golden hours be vainly spent
In setting tender loveliness to rhyme;
See beauty only where a charm is lent
By wealth enough to make it seem sublime.

BE selfish when you must; be friendless, cold;
Let nothing keep you from the goal you seek,
Where boldness offers dividends, be bold,
And miss no chance to pounce upon the weak;
Become a driving power, a mighty force,
Be firm, be strong, be keen, be pitiless;
You'll miss the finer things of life, of course,
But you may win what people call success.

COPYRIGHT 1923, BY INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE COMPANY (COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE)

Cast Your Bread Upon the Waters and

By GEORGE ADE

GET a large kit bag for the money orders and be ready. Soon the melancholy pilgrims will be headed eastward.

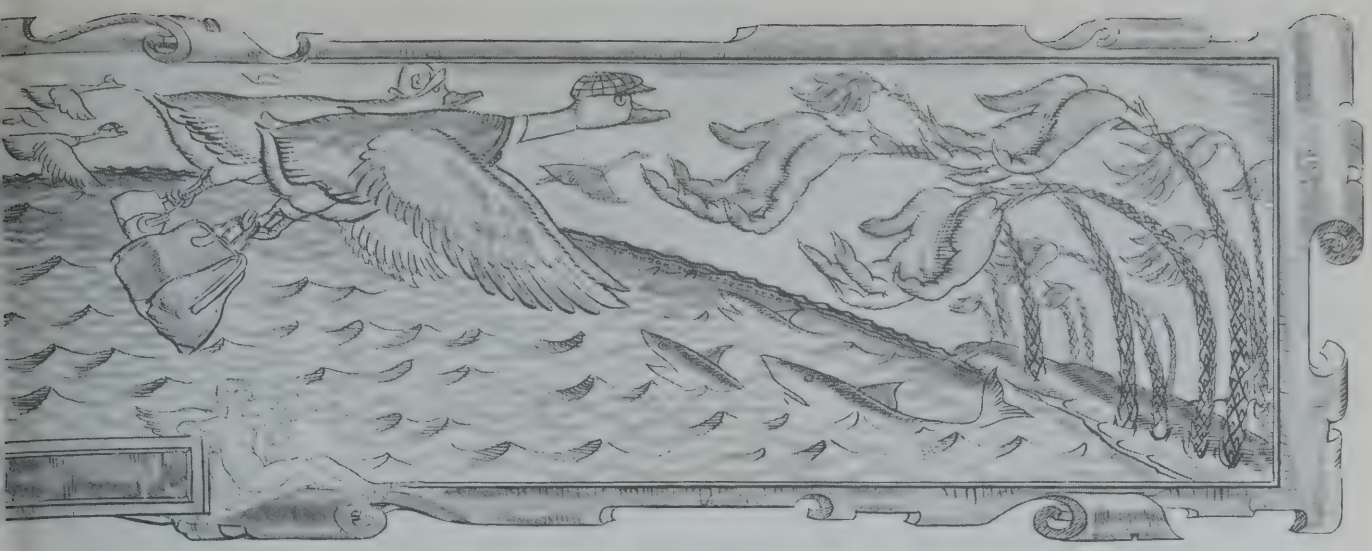
They will move in vast droves and over them will hang dull clouds of mistrust and apprehension.

Never, since the first migration across the parched foothills of Asia, has there been a movement in mass which seemed so faltering of purpose or so plainly headed for disillusionment.

Slaves of custom and tradition, they somehow feel that every prosperous American is under sentence to gather up a lot of real money and go to Europe and conduct a gift enterprise until the letter of credit is gnawed to the core.

As summer wanes into autumn they will come back to us, plucked down to the pin-feathers. The most numerous souvenirs of the benevolent invasion will be black-and-blue marks.

They will tell, in plaintive tremolo, that the old world is a dreary panorama of wrecked fortunes, groaning tax-payers, starving children and despairing statesmen. Dying men clawing at one another in dungeons.



Europe is nerve-racked and anæmic, retaining just enough energy to insist that the U.S.A. is to blame for everything. The Yankee tourist circulates timidly through an atmosphere of dislike and distrust, broadcasting his dollars even while he advertises his unworthiness.

Each returned traveler brings back a serial tale of woe involving demoralized service by common carriers, overcrowded trains, grand and petit larcenies at hotels and restaurants, greed ruling where once gaiety was supreme.

They say it is not the same Europe and they suggest that our countrymen are foolish to cross an important ocean and fight their way through new boundaries just to be annoyed and divided up.

Theoretically, Europe is about to kill the goose that lays the golden egg, but we happen to know that the goose is well named and a glutton for punishment.

Europe's attitude toward us is a puzzler. We put much into the recent fracas and took out nothing except a headache.

It Will Come Back as Ptomaine Poison

Illustrations by

Gordon Ross

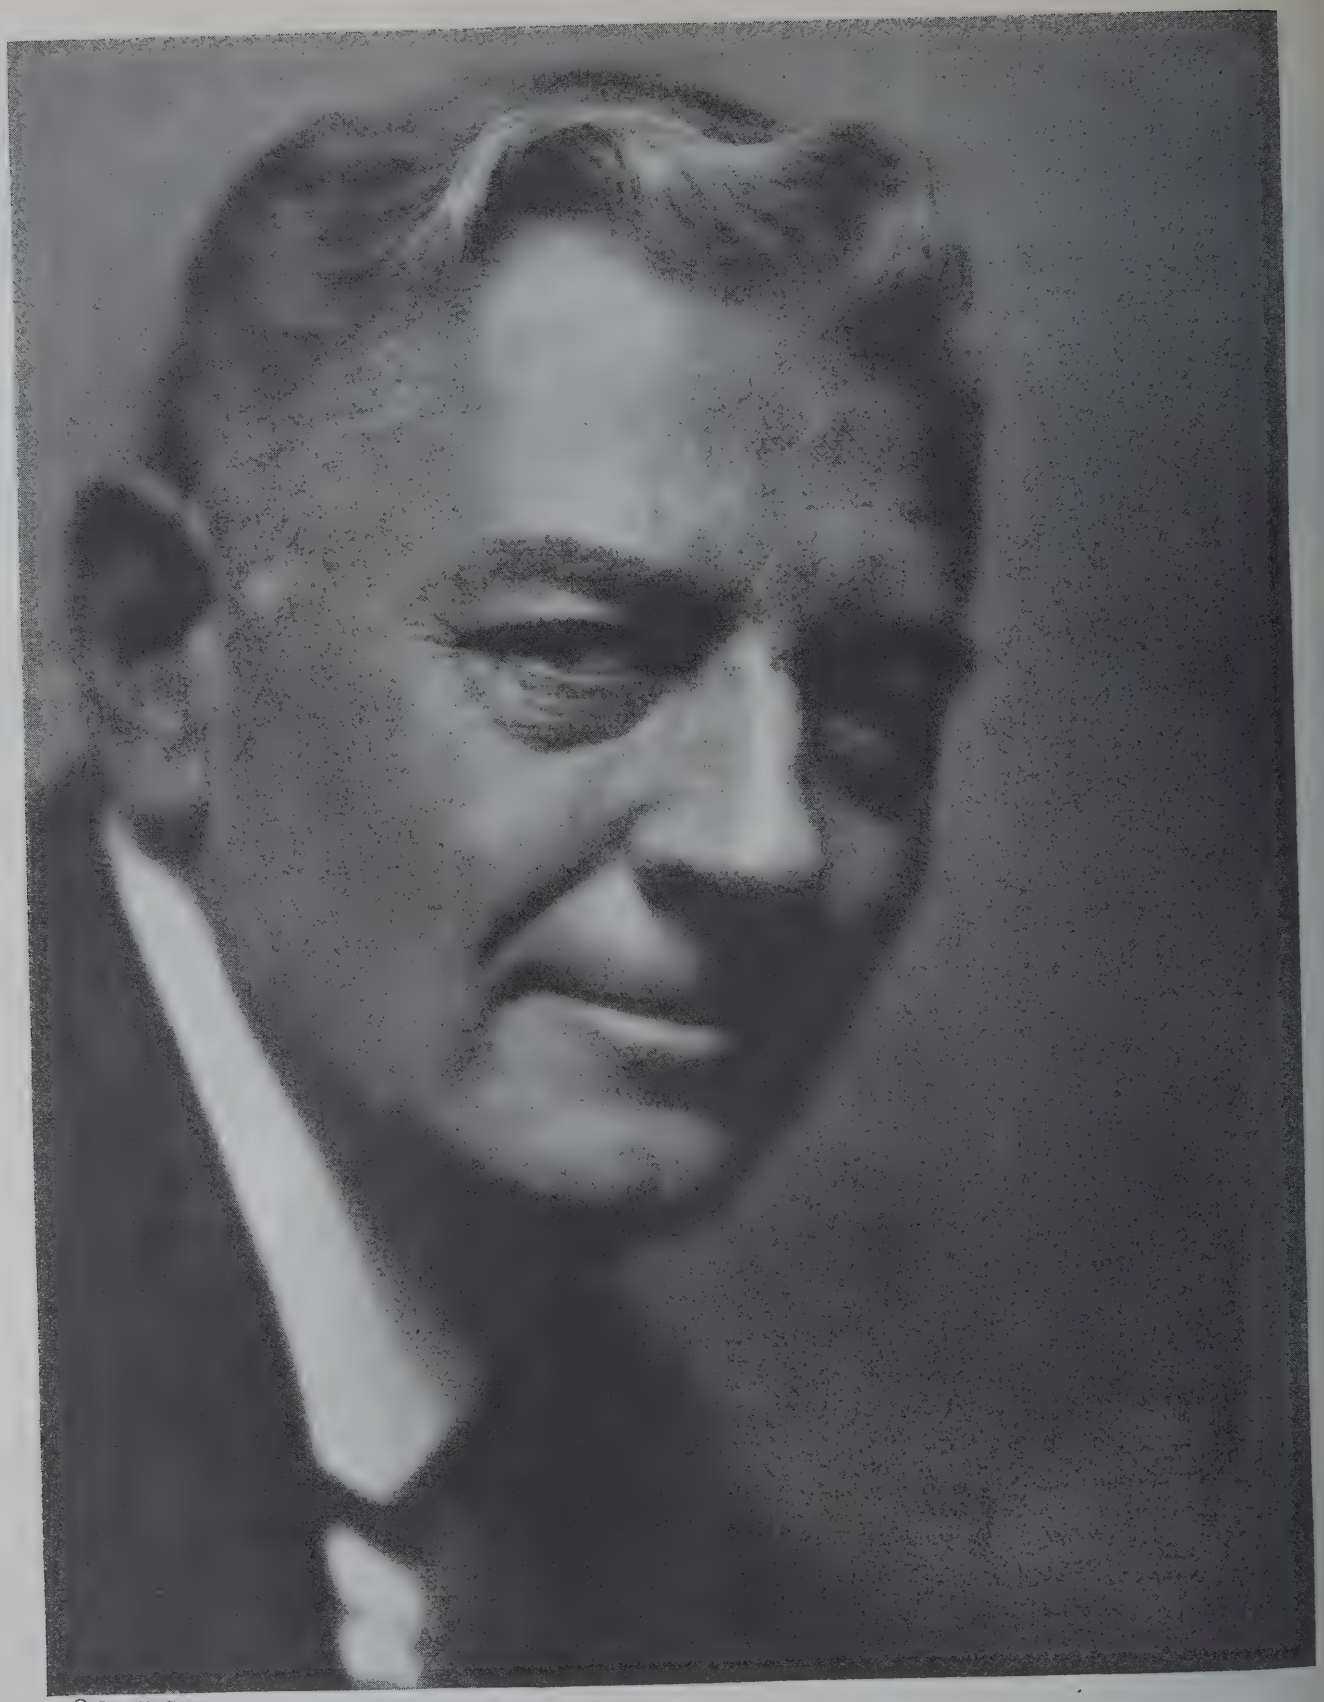
Our steady job has been to rush food to anyone, anywhere, who complained of hunger. And even as our generous tourists are sprinkling beautiful dollars through every destitute province, the beneficiaries continue to regard us as money-grubbers and Shylocks.

Europe needs the money but she should play fair with our helpless and gullible relatives.

The trouble is, the aggregated millions which pour into Europe every summer are not organized or safeguarded.

Therefore, let us organize a Society for the Protection of American Travelers. We will call it the S. P. A. T. and every member in good standing will be known as a "SPAT" and will carry a card, to be brandished, if occasion demands, at any bandit wearing a frock coat.

The membership fee will be nominal. New members will be recruited and instructed during the outbound voyage. They will be given addressed envelopes in which to enclose specific reports on extortion, misrepresentation and neglect.



The Society will investigate the complaints of 1923 and every member visiting Europe in 1924 will receive a confidential report as to localities, routes of travel, hotels, shops and restaurants. The tricky and dishonest ones will not be recommended.

If there is accumulated evidence that certain cities or certain hotels or any organized agencies catering to travelers have been brazenly unfair to Americans, the punishment may be made swift and certain. And the wails of penitence will be heard halfway across the Atlantic!

If the suave swindler who did you so neatly the last time you were over knows that you are going to report him to 100,000 of your countrymen, he will be palsied with fear and his methods will become, for the moment, approximately honest.

Just say: "Look out for me. I'm a SPAT!"

I know nothing will come of it, but isn't it a lovely day-dream? And, oh, how many lads with whiskers are hoping, over there, that the blamed thing never will be organized.

© Pirie MacDonald

PETER CLARK MacFARLANE

himself knew the man whose story, a true Human Document, he begins on the opposite page

A Story from LIFE that Surpasses FICTION

PETER CLARK MACFARLANE

Who Gathered the Facts and Wrote the Story Calls It

Mercy

Illustrations by Herbert M. Stoops

FOR some months the writer, under commission from COSMOPOLITAN, had been gathering material for a novel based on religion. This quest took him widely over the United States and in the course of it he came on a most astounding life story. The facts, briefly communicated, evoked the following telegram from the editor of COSMOPOLITAN.

Am intensely interested in that story of Robert N. Wills. Think it is great human document. There is opportunity to present situation which will be of great benefit to humanity in general because it is most impressive story of tolerance I have encountered. Ten years ago, or even five years ago, it would have been impossible for people to understand, but I believe that now with your presentation as fact story it will be fine thing to publish.

(Signed) Ray Long

The writer heartily agreed with Mr. Long that, instead of tionizing these facts, it was our duty to set them before the blic with all their naked force; provided full honor could be ne to the tragic central figure in this moving drama while at e same time protecting the privacy of those friends and loved es who had watched with him through his Gethsemane, who d trod with him to his Golgotha and who now rightfully revere memory as something at once sacred and inspiring. To ure this, all that proved necessary was to alter the names of lividuals and leave this remarkable series of incidents unplaced ographically.

With no more preliminary, I set down the first fact—that bert N. Wills was born somewhere in the United States, with inherent gift for friendship, and that he grew up with a passion preach. He struggled through a small university and into a ological seminary. Having married a country village maiden fore he went away to school, he acquired in the course of time o small sons and a diploma. Graduating from the seminary, he was called to his first pastorate, which was located in the hamlet of A——.

Physically Wills was of the "dark, interesting type," with coal-black hair and olive skin; he was above the medium height, symmetrical of figure, cordial in manner, magnetic in personality, very human—just a big, full veined, happy hearted, affectionate country boy through whose dark eyes the grace of God shone brightly; and all his endowments were dedicated to the ministry of the Word. His work prospered pleasantly and the little church was exceedingly proud of Robert N. Wills. It felt that in him it was enjoying the labors of a great man in the days of his obscurity and it basked pleasantly in the warm rays of its golden opportunity.

But one day a chilling shadow fell. While Mrs. Wills, with her two small sons, was away on a visit to her parents, the Reverend Robert N. Wills disappeared—and with him, the pretty, dark-eyed organist!

Shocked inexpressibly, the bereaved church went into mourning for its fallen idol, for his fair young victim and for the aching, stunned, desolate heart of the wife and mother who came back to a revelation of shameful betrayal that was at first unbelievable. The church marveled that flesh so fair could prove so false; that character so strong and bold could melt as wax in the hot flame of passion. It sighed heavily and took up sadly the burden of its grief, quite after the fashion of a simple country folk, and struggled forward once more as it had for half a century, but with the added burden which accrued from the memory of a young leader's perfidy.

Yet, strangely, there were some who could not call it that. Somehow there had been a warmth of affection, a glow of good intent in the eyes of Robert N. Wills that caused those who had known him most intimately and suffered most in his departure, to regard him more in brotherly sorrow than in outraged anger.

But hardly had the church in A—— done with its grieving for the lost leader when another small church, in the next state but one, got for itself a wonderful young pastor with a beautiful, somehow appealing little wife, who played the organ skilfully and whom everybody took to from the first sight of her. But besides rejoicing in its attractive young minister, this church in B—— prided itself on having discovered him—in the very worldly calling of a newspaper reporter. He had come first to the church one prayer meeting night, directed to gather news of a projected revival meeting.

He had proved a neighborly, interested young fellow who manifested a knowledge of revival meetings; and almost before the church knew, or he knew, he was on his feet and speaking to them—humbly, earnestly and enthusiastically, to the edification of all, so that the members felt their souls burn within them as he volunteered his own suggestions for the success of their campaign for souls. Oddly enough (if anybody here could have known about the little town of A——) this young reporter's first name and middle initial were the same as those of its defaulting pastor, Robert N.; but his last name was Walton—Robert N. Walton.

"You ought not to neglect the gift of exhortation that is within you, my young brother," counseled a gray-bearded elder, beaming placidly.

But young Walton had begun already to look flustered and a little provoked with himself.

"No, no!" he deprecated, swallowing hard. "I—I didn't mean to say anything"; and he shied away, out of the meeting and out of the church.

But the people could not forget. They dragged the young newspaperman back next Sunday, they dragged him into the Sunday school; they got him teaching a class; and once, in the absence of their minister, they actually got him into the pulpit. Frightened apparently, overcome by modesty, giving a most moving manifestation of humility, the young man's soul nevertheless flowed out in what seemed to these small town folk words of fire and power.

"You are a marked man, Brother Walton," declared the old elder, voice sepulchral in its solemn depth. "Marked of God!"

"H-how?" stammered the reporter, almost staggering. It was an unhappy phrase, that—marked of God. After its utterance he involuntarily looked behind him.

But the whole congregation was crowding up now to congratulate him upon his talk. Sermon, they called it. They admired him frankly and were peculiarly drawn to him—wonderingly sorry for him, too; for they had never seen a man so embarrassed by a compliment. He, indeed, was looking over their shoulders to where a young woman stood, straight and slim, pale and frightened as himself at all this pother over his little pulpit talk. As quickly as possible the young reporter got away from his new-made, embarrassingly vocable friends, and with the waiting girl hurried from his triumph as from something dire and appalling.

The church, all agog, immensely satisfied with itself for that day, heard with dismay upon the next that the reporter had left town, having obtained a position upon a larger paper in a considerable city; but they remembered him and his fiery pulpit power.

Being an ultra-Protestant denomination, highly congregational in its form of government, the little church's action had to conform only to its own judgment; and when their own minister resigned the old elder was appointed a committee of one to go in search of the newspaperman. He found him prospering unbelievably, city editor now and earning almost as much in a week as the little church could pay for a month. Yet the elder talked to him long and earnestly in the bare parlor of his rented home, a structure so modest as to make it apparent that these two could not be spending all his earnings upon themselves.

"The Lord has marked you with this rare endowment, Brother Walton," concluded the elder tenaciously; "and you owe your life to His service."

The dark face of the city editor grew a shade darker. In his eyes was a strange light that the elder took for conviction of duty; he saw that he had touched the man and he pressed his plea.

The half convinced one lifted his glance to where sat the woman—the woman!—twisting her hands, her face wistful behind the elder's hoary head. There passed between the man and the woman a freighted look. Love and passion had fused them at the first; love and passion and a sense of aloneness together bound them now, for they had defied the conventions of man and the laws of God; and yet they felt somehow close to God. They had been brought near by sorrow, for a child had come and it had been taken. Her beauty was paler now, yet finer, because of what motherhood and grief had etched into it; and because there was one thing he could not give her—yet; the man had been trying to give her all else that was.

"God is calling you, my brother!" urged the elder in that sepulchral but rather tender voice.

"I wonder if He is?" asked the dark eyes of the husband to the wistful eyes of his wife. "I wonder if there could be mercy like that in His heart for a sinner like me."

"Oh, yes, yes! He is. There . . . there must be," shouted the brown, liquid eyes of the woman.

Walton sat awhile thinking, thinking—of himself darkly, of this woman fondly, of another woman remorsefully, of two children who called her mother but had now none whom they could call father. He thought of it all and shuddered in the soul of him—a situation he had created and was powerless now to uncreate. Then he thought of what it was the old elder held out to him. To him—least among men—had been extended an opportunity to retrieve other men's lives though his own remained unretrieved.

There surged up in him once more the "call to preach"—a thing which the man who has not felt it can never quite understand and which the man who has can never quite explain. Once an old actor said to the writer, away back in his own barnstorming days, "Nobody should be on the stage who can make a living off of it." So perhaps no man ought to preach who can by any means escape it.

"If you've 'eard the East a-callin', you won't never 'eed naught else," sings Kipling; and when once you've joyed in the urge to stand up and exhort your fellows to better ways of living; when as a humble, quaking, doubting messenger of the Most High, you've gone where there was sickness or mourning or deep trouble, and there tried to speak the consoling word, to do the helpful thing; when you've read to dulling ears the message that is hungered for when all other messages have palled; when you've been amazed to find the broken-hearted gather strength from your weak, unworthy self and wring your hand in lasting gratitude as if you'd brought some supernatural help to them—it's a thing you'll want to keep on doing. You'll do it and you'll do it. You'll spend and be spent to the end of your life and get out of each day of it a compensation that you would not trade for all the wealth of the Rockefellers and the Fords combined.

That is the call to preach! This city editor felt it irresistibly, although to answer it was to place his peace in jeopardy—and how much more he could never have surmised. But he did answer it.

"I'll come, Elder!" he decided, and his lips clamped tightly.

A little cry escaped the woman, a cry that the elder thought was of joy; and it might have been. But the face of Robert N. Walton was graver when he had spoken and his shoulders bowed themselves as if beneath a load.

Yet apprehension seemed to have been unnecessary. For five whole years he was permitted to minister to those devoted people in the little town of B——, with his faithful companion playing the organ between mothering two baby boys, who came along in a perfectly natural rhythm. For just one example of young Walton's success then: five of the sanest, strongest young men of the town were induced by him to enter the ministry, and each of them occupies today a distinguished position in one of the great communions of America.

And yet this happy work was doomed—doomed to end abruptly and mysteriously, with Robert N. Walton disappearing from the town of B—— almost as Robert N. Wills had disappeared from the hamlet of A——.

Still, the mystery rather oozed out of the disappearance when it was learned that he had gone only two hundred miles to a charge in the flourishing city of C——, which claimed fifty thousand and boasted a metropolitan air; for the folks at B—— had always known they must lose their paragon some day. So now—even though his departure had been startlingly unconventional—they reconciled themselves with proud boastings that their late minister would make his mark, even in a city.

Not that Robert N. Walton promised to be a great pulpit orator. No. But he possessed pleasing gifts of impassioned utterance and this city of C—— speedily awoke to the fact that it had now a distinctly man's man in one of its pulpits—an excessively human person who never wore his clerical clothes or his clerical manner except where the occasion demanded it.

"You don't look like a minister," protested a businessman one day. "You look like a good fellow."

The reporter was speaking to them—earnestly and enthusiastically, so that the members felt their souls burn.

"A minister is a good fellow," suggested Walton, with a ght smile; "though he doesn't always know how to show it." It became speedily the general judgment that Walton was a od fellow; yet in all his contacts with men he lifted them. hen he sat with his coat off in his preferred spot in the bleachers, when he bared a muscled arm in his favorite bowling alley and)sed his slow smile on all around, all seemed somehow to ighten—conversations, manners, characters even. There was,), with all his modest affability, an essential dignity. Nobody -pped him on the back, and yet men liked to get close to him as there was tonic in his presence.

Most amazingly did they tell him the deep, dark secrets of their lives, the sins they had done, the sins they were doing and could not cease from doing; and Walton flung out his hands to them and hung on tightly. They got a feeling that he did not shun them because they were sinning or had sinned, but that he loved them, and they believed that if they clung tightly to him in return he might be able somehow to help them.

So for years Walton's influence percolated through this industrial city like human radium; and how far it had traveled, just what it had come to mean, was witnessed when one day there called at his study a tall, overdressed, full-chested man with small eyes, a large nose and a dreadnaught chin, whose ostentatious manner was modified by an attempt to be affable and ingratiating.

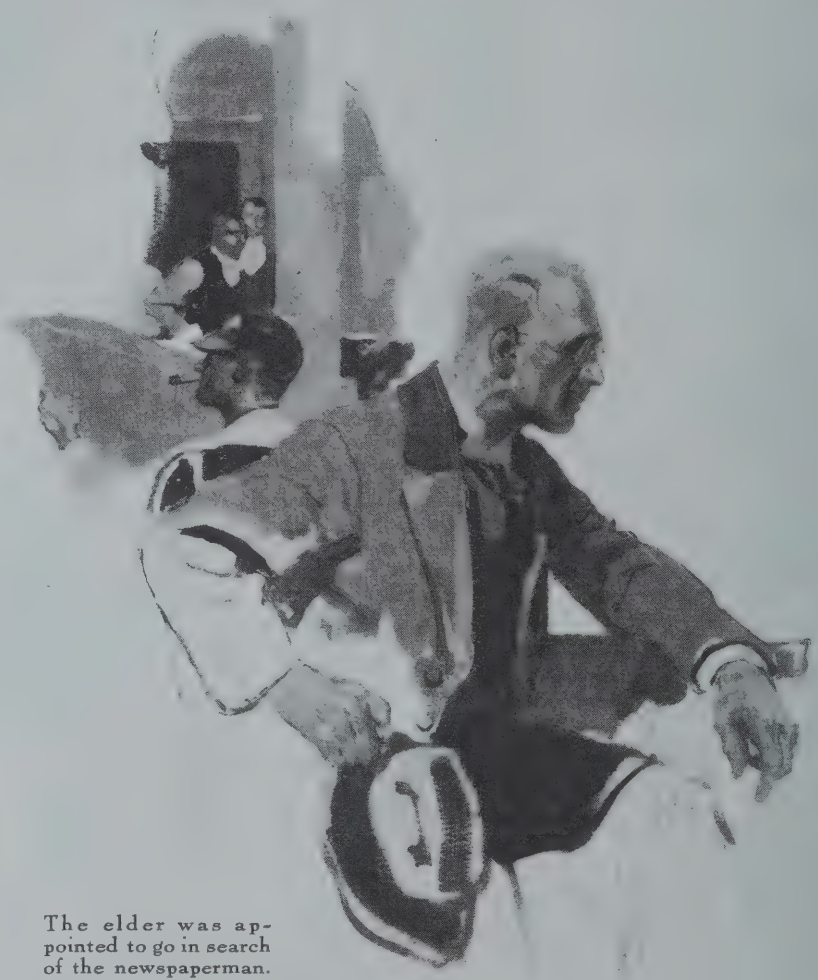
"Stall is my name," announced the caller.



"Yes, I know," said Walton. "You are in politics."

"Have a cigar," acknowledged Mr. Stall, with a bland bow and the proffer of his silver-bound morocco case.

Walton, among his other humanities, was fond of a good cigar. He selected one and passed it experimentally beneath his nose. "Evidently not a campaign smoke," he smiled.

"Well, in a way it is," admitted his visitor. "Yes, Doctor Walton"—and the tall gentleman who was in politics hitched his chair closer, while attempting still to appear casually at ease. "Some of the—some of the boys—ahem, have been urging me to run for mayor. But I thought—well, I thought I would just kind of like to have a talk with you about it, Doctor."

"You for mayor?" The smile had gone out of Walton's face; he lowered his brows somewhat and from under them shot one of those through-and-through glances of which he was at times unexpectedly capable.

The elder was appointed to go in search of the newspaperman.

Under this glance Mr. Stall squirmed, for by it, in it, he felt himself weighed and found utterly wanting. Yet by this time the eyes of the minister had softened and he was looking his visitor over with a sort of solicitude for that gentleman's personal welfare.

"I—I wouldn't think it would be worth your while—a man of your interests—to muddle himself up with a race for mayor—not in this town, no!" suggested the clergyman, as if his convictions on the subject strengthened the more he thought of it; yet as he finished speaking he manifested the supreme tact of looking, not at the political aspirant, but at the swift forming ash on his cigar. For at all times Walton manifested great knowledge of the ways and habits of men—whoever they were—great sympathy for and subtle understanding of the temptations and impulses of men. Especially did he avoid hurting their feelings—even those whom his duty compelled him to oppose. So now he wished to avoid hurting Mr. Stall.

"No?" ejaculated that gentleman, slightly surprised, considerably crestfallen; yet managing in a moment strategically to conceal the most of both. "Well, of course," he admitted in suspended tones, then reached for his hat, "I—I didn't want to make up my mind without consulting you, Doctor."

"Now that was mighty fine of you, Stall," assured Mr. Walton, with a level glance that without being a bit hard was most unalterably firm. "Drop in any time. Thank you for the cigar." And he shook hands just as if he really liked Mr. Stall; and neither is there any doubt that he did. As a matter of fact, that gentleman could hardly avoid liking him, even though as he went down the steps he was laying his cherished mayoralty dream away in moth balls until such time as it might please God to call the Reverend Robert N. Walton to service elsewhere. That was the way it had been done.

And this was what had come to the ex-newspaperman in a ten years' ministry in C——; a position of such prestige and power that no man would dare run for office in the city or the county without the stamp of his approval. Yet never once did he let himself go in a burst of honest pride over the standing he had achieved. On the contrary it seemed to frighten him; for his always painful modesty became more noticeable as whiter and whiter beamed the light that played upon his deeds. He was widely recognized as one of the most effective and successful ministers in a great denomination, and yet never once had his picture been allowed to appear in one of its weekly papers—neither in any daily newspaper, if one had taken time to think of it.

Never once had he appeared upon a district or state convention program of his denomination. Again and again his name was enrolled for such honor; again and again one reason or another, each seemingly legitimate, fortuitously prevented his appearance. These failures began to pique and disappoint his members; yet if Sister Brown was ill or Deacon Jones was passing through a business crisis, so that the pastor would leave neither the one nor the other, who could arraign that innocently devoted man who would rather fulfill the law of Christ than splurge in a convention address? Nobody—absolutely nobody!

Even when he stunned his people and shook the very city by his sudden resignation and almost overnight departure, there were those who could understand it. They said: "Why, Brother Walton always leaves that way. He's just so tender hearted he can't stand these long drawn out good byes."

Whatever the reason, the fact was clear that on one Lord's Day he was the accepted and revered shepherd of the flock in C——, and on the next he was preaching his inaugural discourse in D——.

But this time the pastorate was in a city of a million—sure testing place of pulpit quality. Moreover, this church in D——, while it had plenty of the humbler folk in it, yet was more or less of a rich man's church with the rich man's traditional way of doing things—by proxy, through the medium of a check book—hiring people to serve God for him, sending a substitute to the battle front in the war with sin and poverty.

"No more of that for you men," commanded Robert Walton boldly when he had called his chief pillars together. "No hired workers in this church but me. Calls on the sick, work among the poor, looking after the broken-down and discouraged, carrying the social gospel to the slums of this city—you men must do your personal share of that your personal selves—if you understand!"

This group of good men and strong blinked a little uncertainly, quite sure that they did not understand. There was a United States Senator in that group. He was also a capitalist. There were executives in some of the greatest industries in the world sitting in that church study.

"This church cares how its members and the neighbors of its members get along," Walton was expounding, fervidly. "It is your duty to manifest that care. Tomorrow afternoon, Senator Jones, instead of going to your club to chat and read the afternoon papers, or out to the links, I want you to take these names of people who work in your steel mills and go and call on them in their homes, find out why this boy was not in Bible school, why that girl was missing from Christian Endeavor, why that mother has not been at church for two Sundays, nor ner husband since I've been here."

For that was a part of Robert N.'s notion of church organization. His church lay on the dividing line between the residences of the well-to-do and a section of industrial homes; and he had his membership card-indexed and the follow-ups were in his hand.

"Some of the women from down there may be calling on Mrs. Jones, Senator," the minister explained, still serious, still innocently matter-of-fact, "to know why she has been absent for three Lord's Days. If they do, I want them received. They may even be as free in offering suggestions about how the Jones family life might be reorganized so its members can get to church as Mrs. Jones would be about suggestions to them. If so, I want them listened to."

Walton smiled on the Senator as he said this, but it was still a serious smile—over a perfectly astounding suggestion—yet not so unreasonable, once it was considered from a thoroughly Christian point of view; but—highly revolutionary nevertheless. Still, Senator Jones was a big enough man to be thinking very deeply about it, as about what had been proposed for him to do. He gaped slightly and studied his list, then lifted his eyes and studied his pastor.

Walton's words had been those of an autocrat. But he had not spoken like an autocrat. Above all, his expression, under the Senator's scrutiny, was not that of an autocrat. And here I must let the reader into a secret. Myself, I knew this Robert N. Walton in this period of his life, his day of his ministry of power. I knew him and honored him, no more suspecting than the people of his church that there might be a dark spot in his life.

But, accustomed to look rather deeply into the faces of men, had noted something. In his eyes were two areas of shadow, so elusive that it was impossible to determine whether they were projected from within or reflected from without—but there they were, imparting to his every glance a look of hastening and humbled pride that seemed to me highly appropriate and revealing in the eyes of a very consecrated minister. There was also about his lower lip a peculiarity. When Robert N. Walton looked at you very straight, very earnestly, his lower lip fell away from his teeth, not loosely but on an even line from corner to corner of his mouth, a little like the expression of an animal at bay; yet there was nothing displeasing in it. It was spiritual, rather, and I know now it was the reflection of a soul at bay. With that expression in his eyes and on his mouth, Robert N. Walton couldn't seem autocratic, but he could look the most powerful appeal into the soul of a fellow being that I have ever experienced.

So now, as he looked at this church board, composed in part of great business executives, and told them that for the good of their own souls they ought to get out and do personally some of the work they had been accustomed to hire thirty dollar a week men and women to do for them—told them, in effect, that ersatz Christianity was all wrong, wasn't Christianity at all—he made them feel this in their souls. The United States Senator, under that modest, convincing gaze, felt it and twisted in his chair, but felt also his inability to mend. With sorrowful eyes he confessed both his failure and his inability, by saying:

"Brother Walton, I would give anything in the world if some pastor had talked to me like that twenty years ago. Now it's too late."

Walton looked at the Senator with tears. "It's never too late, Brother Jones!" he said, the words tearing themselves out from somewhere inside with a sound as if it cost a heart's agony to utter them.

He found Walton city editor now and earning as much in a week as the little church could pay for a month.

And this new board, sensing but not understanding, felt themselves humbled as in the presence of one who served at greater cost than ever one of them had served—one who spared himself nothing; and they, in his pastorate, spared themselves less than they ever had before.

But—religious work in a great city moves slowly. It is preaching to a procession. A Gulf Stream of humanity flows by; and into that stream Robert N. Walton filtered himself. But always with that shadow in his eye and from year to year growing larger, the ominous thing it stood for more imminent, more threatening with each twelvemonth. For the edifice he was building towered steadily higher. He could no longer keep his picture out of the public prints.

To make matters worse an international convention of his denomination was coming in this very city of D——. Yet through all the work of getting ready to entertain that convention, Walton bore a wheel horse part; for he was that kind of man. His people, his fellow ministers, the community at large depended on him; and never yet had they depended in vain.

But when the work was done, when all was ready and delegates by thousands were pouring into the city, Robert N. Walton was quietly slipping out of it.

He had managed another of those sudden resignations of his. And so, while convention platforms thundered with the message of a militant gospel and vast pavilions rang with the refrains of the mighty hymns of his church, one of those who had worked humbly and earnestly and passionately for the success of that historic gathering was listening from afar, looking on from a distance, wistful yet fearful; for there can be no doubt that Robert N. Walton fled breathless from the convention city; that Peter, after he had denied his Lord, leaving his garment in the hand of the young man who plucked at it in the garden, and flying naked, was not more panic-stricken.

Restlessly, unhappily, the fugitive essayed two short, sterile pastorates; and then, with a great sigh of relief, fell into the arms of a warm hearted folk who could love him as he wanted to be loved, and who would let him love them as his heart must love. This new ministry in the city of E—— promised to be his crowning work—a ministry of maximums, with not a cloud upon the sky; for there was now a thousand miles and a quarter of a century between him and that—that from which he shrank! Here the dark shadows went out of his eyes and that look of a soul at bay began to be seen less frequently upon his lips.

But, ah, the intuitions of women! One Sunday morning, as the brown-eyed woman sat at church, in the sixth year of their residence in E——, there came over her a sudden inexplicable chill of apprehension; she gave one quick, startled glance around her, hoping to discern what eye had stabbed her, but could not. She shivered and breathed a prayer, then turned her great, shiny eyes hungrily up to Robert. He was preaching one of his most compelling sermons, warm with the compassion of a heart that had been bruised till it was tender, bruised by its own mad passions.

Robert, all undivining, finished this sermon and, after the benediction, went according to his habit to the lobby where, with a handkerchief about his wilted collar and perspiring throat, he began to give all of his vitality that was left in cordial hand clasps to friends and strangers alike—strangers preferred. Among these strangers today were two women, trembling under the excitement of a great discovery; at the same time they were steadying themselves with considerable resolution. One of them took the hand of Robert N. Walton, but instead of shaking it held it while she looked straight at him and announced in a low, firm voice:

"You are Robert N. Wills."

The minister stood taut from head to foot for an instant studying the face before him, perhaps for features that he might recognize, perhaps for signs of mercy.

"Yes," he answered decisively, but in a voice just as low; then shook the hand he held and dropped it.

But the first lady presented the second. "How do you do, Brother Wills?" the latter inquired; but her voice too had been low. "I enjoyed your sermon," she said; and the two passed on; but with the shadowy spots again in the eyes of Robert N. Walton and that expression of a soul at bay once more about his mouth.

However, the minister continued shaking hands. He manifested his usual concern for the welfare of each person who spoke to him; he thanked gratefully those who made kindly comments on his sermon; he saw his deacons taking the addresses of all strangers; he even manifested presence of mind enough to make sure that they got the addresses of two particular strangers.

The minister stood taut from head to foot, study

When the sexton came up to consult him about the placin extra chairs for the usual Sunday evening crowds, he answe him with conscientious detail—though suspecting that, for h there would be no evening service.

Even the Sunday dinner in the Walton home was carried quite as usual. If the man at the head of the table talked lit ate little, that was nothing uncommon; for he seldom did m of either immediately after preaching. Yet from time to t the woman at the other end of the table noted him narrow When the meal was over, when the sons had taken themse away to read and the inevitable Sunday guest or two had parted, she followed into the study, pretending to be wiping hands upon her apron. In reality she was wringing them.

"Has it . . . has it come?" she gasped.

Her husband's constricted lips could frame no word, bu nodded and sank into the Morris chair with a groan—the M chair the ladies' aid society had presented him that Christ past.

the face before him, perhaps for features that he might recognize, perhaps for signs of mercy.

"Oh! . . . Oh, Robert!" the woman cried. "Now? After all these years? It seems so . . . so unjust." Her face was white, her eyes avoided his.

"Unjust to you—yes," replied her husband, who by now had found his tongue. "But nothing can be unjust to me," he reproached himself bitterly, striking his breast.

Yet after that the two stared at each other dumbly, the same thought rising in both their minds. For a quarter of a century their sin had hunted them from place to place, threatening the work that providentially they had been permitted to do; and they had allowed themselves to be so driven—unprotesting, feeling that it was right that they should be hounded by their past; but now protest was beginning to be born. The man's heart was here too deeply attached to think of having its tentacles torn out by the roots once more. Something in him rebelled at being driven from his last and greatest field.

"Mama," he proposed desperately, "let's go and talk to those women."

"Yes—let's," she responded bravely; "right—right now."

They went; but at first the women received them doubtfully. Yet as Robert Walton pleaded—with the white, wistful face of his companion, wasted now with twenty-five years of mothering, seconding every word—as he pleaded, something in his air of deep sincerity touched them, some perception of the real hopelessness of retreat for him dawned upon them, and with it came a certain sense of awe at pulling down that wide structure of faith which had been built upon this erring nature of his—something of all this convinced the women of a duty quite unexpected.

"What good are you going to accomplish, exposing me?" the dejected minister argued in conclusion. "I would have exposed myself if I could have seen how it would do anything but harm."

"We won't expose you!" exclaimed one of the women impulsively. "We'll keep your secret, Brother . . . "

"Brother Walton!" joined in the other woman tactfully.

The minister and his wife arose and (Continued on page 153)

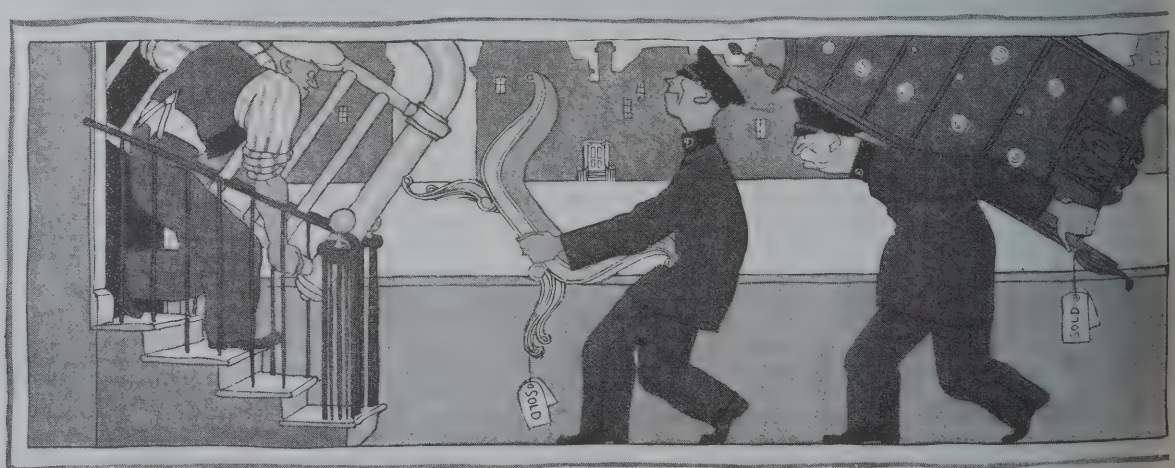
The Dash After

By BERTON

Illustrations by

MR. and Mrs. Montgomery Lloyd
Had money enough so they were not annoyed
By hearing the wolf at their domicile's door;
They simply were well-to-do folks, nothing more.
They had a nice house and a good looking car
And a maid, when she'd stay—but you know how they are!

The Lloyds were a couple not modish or snappy
But rather—well, bourgeois and humdrum and happy.
Their children were two,
Herb, fourteen; and Sue,
A ten year old maiden with eyes that were blue.
Whatever life brought them they made quite the best of it
And worried but little about all the rest of it.



Then one day a friend came to visit. Alas!
She posed as a friend, but a snake in the grass
Could scarce spread more hideous
Poison insidious
Than she, as she lingered for several weeks
And filled the Lloyds full of a yen for antiques!

"Oh Mabel," she sighed (were a serpent to hiss
It could not breathe toxins more deadly than this),
"Oh dear Mabel Lloyd,
I cannot avoid
Regretting that you, with your wonderful taste
Should let all your artistic sense go to waste;
I can't understand how you've failed to discern it, you're
Losing your soul 'mid this commonplace furniture.
This house of yours here
Has no 'atmosphere,'
It's furnished exactly like homes by the myriad,
There isn't a piece that belongs to a period.
Please let me lend you a book I have got,
Entitled, 'Antiques—Which is Which, What is What!' "

II

THUS nurtured, the virus
Spread quicky enough.
The Lloyds grew desirous
Of Period Stuff.
They haunted the auction rooms, searched up and down
The musty and fusty old shops of the town,
They motored to bucolic hamlets to seek
A possible bargain in something antique.
They pored over catalogues. Half of their mail
Was letters from dealers who offered for sale
Stuff that was guaranteed "Pure Renaissance,"
"Sheraton," "Louis Quatorze," "Louis Quinze";
They constantly babbled
Of "lintels," and gabbled
Of "highboys" and "lowboys" and "Seventeen fronts"
Of inlay, mosaic and other such stunts.
They talked of "patina," whatever that means,
Of "panels" and "stretchers" and lacquer and glaze,
While Monty Lloyd dug way down deep in his jeans,
For it is the husband who pays and who pays.
Meanwhile, to make space,
For the Antiques to grace,

The home of the Lloyds, week by week, day by day,
The secondhand dealer was carting away
Great overstuffed sofas and overstuffed chairs
And Mission style tables and oak chiffoniers,
And bedsteads of brass—very costly affairs—
And bright bird's-eye maple suites, cherished for years:
Montgomery Lloyd had once paid quite a lot for them
And—if you've known secondhand dealers — you'll guess

The PERIOD

BRALEY

alph Barton

How much, from those vultures, he finally got for them.
hatever you say, it was probably less!

owever, in time, all the house was refurnished
With valid antiques boasting various ages, hich, rubbed up, repaired, reupholstered and burnished
By artisans drawing imperial wages, esented a spectacle highly artistic hich made antiquarians wax eulogistic.

The pride of the Lloyds
Was quite beyond "woids," xcuse my Manhattanese, frequently I'm bit up against it when seeking a rhyme),

They beamed and they glowed
And constantly showed eir treasures to visitors, dwelling upon ie quests they had made and the lengths they had gone
To get this buhl cabinet, that secretaire,
This Chippendale chair and that Florentine chest,

This bombe front bureau of worm-eaten cherry,
This fauteuil, that rococo table. A guest
Was in for a heavy and long dissertation
On all that's pertaining to home decoration!

III

TIME passed. "It's a sort of a way that time has"
(As Artemus Ward said, a long time ago),
It fox-trots along as if stepping to jazz;
The Lloyds lost a bit of the glamour and glow
Which first had affected them
When they had trailed their antiques and collected them.
Somehow or other they presently found
That though all the pieces they'd gathered around
Would certainly please any true antiquarian
They were not exceedingly utilitarian.
For Herbert, their boy, was a natural kid
And when, with his gang, he'd go romping amid
This period stuff in his blithe boyish way
The Lloyds had some shocking repair bills to pay.
And sweet little Sue,
Though meaning to do
Of course, no particular damage or harm,
Would perch herself, oftentimes, up on the arm
Of a period chair,
Which cost fifty dollars or so to repair.

Montgomery Lloyd
Himself was annoyed
To find that, when weary from business in town,
There wasn't a couch in the house he could flop on,
There wasn't a chair he could suddenly drop on,
He had to use caution in sitting him down.

The key wouldn't open the Florentine chest,
You couldn't quite trust the refectory table,
The four-poster bed often broke up their rest
Collapsing with him and his slumbering Mabel.
The Chippendale chairs gave his spine many twinges,
The drawers of the highboys and lowboys all stuck,
The doors of the cabinets shrieked on their hinges,
The grandfather clock never properly struck.
Whenever a neighborly party assembled
Among their Antiques, both the Lloyds fairly trembled;
They just couldn't give their guests friendly attention
Because every move they made caused apprehension
That something they sat on or leaned on, perhaps,
Might suddenly fall in a state of collapse.

Thus woe and unhappiness crept on them clammily,
Spoiling the peace of this middle-class family.
Their nerves were unsettled, their tempers grew sharp,
They'd constantly bicker and quarrel and carp,
They seemed to be headed for nervous prostration,
When, luckily, there came a warm invitation
To visit old friends in a Middle West town.
"Let's go," remarked Monty, "I'm feeling run down.
Let's go and see Bill and his wife. It'll be A rest for yourself and the children and me."

IV

BILL QUINN and his wife
Were well fixed in life
In fact, like the Lloyds, they were nice, pleasant folk,
Midway between those who are wealthy—or broke.
Their dwelling was ample,
Well built and well placed,
A typical sample
Of middle-class taste,
And furnished, as well as the Quinns seemed to wish,
With sets and with suites made in Grand Rapids, Mich.
Is ample and sturdy and comfy and deep
And never collapses to wake them from sleep;
While Herbert and Sue
Romp all the house through
With Mary and Jimmy Quinn, jumping about
On furniture most undeniably stout.
Although, as the Lloyds aver, often enough
It hasn't the "aura" of Period Stuff.
Thus, ere they depart,
All their babble of Art
Has planted the lure of Antiques in the heart
Of the Quinns, who begin right away to aspire
To period pieces, and greatly desire
More knowledge of Heppelwhite, Adam, and such —And where they can buy it, and also How Much?

V

OH the black heart of Man! Oh the boundless ingratitude
Displayed by the Lloyds in their subsequent attitude!
For when they returned to their own domicile,
Soothed, calmed and refreshed in a wonderful style
By life in a home
Which, from cellar to dome,
Was furnished with comfort, whatever it lacked
In treasures antique—very easily cracked;
Yes, after returning
From joyous sojourning
Where chairs could be sat upon, beds could be slept upon Tables could even be heavily leapt upon,
Drawers didn't stick and the various hinges
Worked without any rheumatical twinges;
Yes, after that visit,
O Honor, where is it?
The Lloyds sent the Quinns that insidious book
"Antiques; Which is Which, What is What!" and they took Particular care that the Quinns shouldn't rest

Yet when, after greetings which follow such meetings,
The Lloyds were ensconced in the guest room's seclusion,
They sighed, "It is sad the Quinns' taste is so bad.
Such furniture! Strewn round in reckless profusion!
Those overstuffed sets, and those Mission iniquities!
We really must teach them to purchase antiquities."

The Lloyds then proceed in
Some two or three weeks
To bring to that Eden
A craze for Antiques,
While Monty Lloyd sprawls on the overstuffed chairs
In comfort and ease; and the bed his wife shares
Till they got the frenzy and went on the quest
For Antiques galore!
Oh I greatly deplore
The fact, but it's true, that the Quinns got the fever!
And then Monty Lloyd, the base, wicked deceiver,
Contrived, through a dealer, to sell his collection
With some indirection
To Quinn.
A serpent's reward for regard and affection!

And now, if you happen sometime to drop in
To visit the Lloyds, you will find that their home
Though lacking, perhaps, all the art you might wish
Is furnished with comfort, from cellar to dome,
With stuff manufactured in Grand Rapids, Mich!

By KATHLEEN NORRIS

A story of the Place called HOME

The Guests of Honor

Mary Ann was her father's favorite.

Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg

"IT COULD be done," said Juliana, "by simply turning the sit-drawing room into the dining room, and beginning late."

"Making the bedrooms the garage and the kitchen the foyer," Dan Rutherford said good-naturedly.

His wife shot him a dagger look.

"Oh, Dan!" she said, in a tone blended of patience, protest and contempt. "If that's the way you are going to look at it, we might as well give up the whole thing now!" she added, bitterly, yet with a watching eye.

"I can imagine changing the 'sit-drawing room,' as you call it——" Dan was beginning, taking his pipe out of his mouth, when his wife interrupted him.

"I called it the drawing room long before the Cruikshanks and the Lessings came to the Point," she asserted defensively.

"You called it the sitting room," stated Dan inflexibly.

"Well, I don't care what I called it," Juliana conceded hastily. "The thing is, are we going to entertain these people who have been so tremendously decent to us, or are we not?"

"In the strict sense of the word, any dinner you and I gave to the Cruikshanks, the Lees and the Lessings would entertain them, all right," Dan diverged. "It would entertain them enormously to see old Lizzie——"

"I'd have Kate helping Lizzie!" Juliana said quickly.

"I see. And what do we accomplish by having it begin late, as you said?"

"Begin at eight," Juliana elucidated, beginning to revive. "That means that we sit at the table at least two hours, talking and dawdling, and then it's ten, you see—not but what they could play bridge if they wanted to——" mused Juliana in an undertone.

"But you and I don't play bridge, Jule."

"No, I know. But they could!"

"Why not just talk?" suggested Dan.

"Oh, we can't—very well, with people like that! We don't know their friends, and they don't know ours. They're so much older than we are. They'd much rather play cards," Juliana decided.

"I don't see why the deuce we have to give them a dinner at all," said Dan, returning to his original position.

Juliana promptly returned to hers.

"Because they've been so wonderful to us, Dan, giving the children so many lifts, and sending you a card to the club even after we didn't join it, and having us to lunch that day——"

"Yes, but that wasn't in any way a formal invitation, dear. We were at the club and the Lessings simply included us in their group, everybody did his own ordering——"

"But they paid for us all, Dan!"

"Yes, I know. But——"

Dan's face, up to now merely the pleased, dreamy face of a man enjoying the leisure of pipe, basket chair and garden sweetness upon a spring afternoon, grew somewhat more sober, and he turned toward his wife in some seriousness.

"The thing is this, dear," he said. "You and I have been here ten years—there was nothing at the Point but a few old shanties when we came."

"Exactly—we're the old residents!" Juliana supplied triumphantly.

"Well, so is old Crooker, the oyster man, if you come to that," Dan reminded her with his maddening irrelevance. "Anyway," he resumed, "you and I bought two acres down here for eight hundred dollars, and the whole house cost only four thousand more. Now, two years ago, along come these rich and fashionable families, to 'discover' the Point, and they fence and they build, and their boathouses cost more than our whole home, and their clubhouse more than any other in the world, and—well, we try to keep step with them! I think it's a mistake. Why——"

"Keep step with them, Dan—why, that's just the one thing I don't do," Juliana said quickly and proudly. "They know that you are a writer—beginning to be a writer—and that we have no money, and only Lizzie to help me, and that you clean your own car and I make the girls' dresses. That's just why they—well, why they like me," finished Juliana, childishly shy over the self-praise, and flushing eagerly in self-defense.

She was so pretty, in her blue enveloping apron, with the dark curls of her soft hair framing her blue eyes, her wide expressive mouth and her pink cheeks, that Dan was distracted from the matter in hand. Juliana was a vital, slender, fiery sort of person, to whom things mattered tremendously. Dan, long and lanky, with tousled, bushy light hair and kind, short-sighted blue eyes, was eternally amazed at her vigor.

Dan had a little money, and his sketches and essays and scenarios and poems and articles and one-act plays earned him a little more. He loved writing them, he loved idling about the garden in the wake of one or more busy, flushed, important babies, he loved helping Juliana cook, and puttering with the car and the rabbits and the roses and the gate hinge. Dan liked faded bathing suits, and gipsy suppers on the sands, and second-hand bookstores, and long, dusty, rambling walks up and down unfamiliar lanes.

Left to himself, he would have been as unconscious of the Lessings and the Cruikshanks and the Lees and all the other smart folk who had so suddenly taken possession of the old Point as were the sea-gulls on the reef beyond it. They did not come until May, they were gone again in September, there were plenty of woods and beaches left for the Rutherfords to enjoy in peace.

But Juliana was acutely aware of their nearness. Juliana at first had laughed at them and told Dan who their ancestors had been and why they were upstarts, snobs, parvenus, and nouveaux riches. Juliana, sweet, joyous, unspoiled little Juliana, had been a Joy of Maryland, and the fact meant something to her. She was aristocrat to her finger tips, whether she was cranking the disobliging old car or putting up the crab apples.

And after a few months the millionaires of the Point found it out, and then Juliana stopped calling them names and they became tremendously important to her. Everything they did interested her, and she had her Grandmother Joy's old sampler framed, and got out two old swords, which she crossed above a tattered gray uniform, over the square piano. She began to give the children an early supper alone—the children, whose spilled bowls and tippy high chairs had been a feature of the Rutherford meals for many happy years!—and she and Dan dined also alone, in state, by candlelight, an hour later, and she began to read fashionable weeklies and to identify an occasional dog-showing or cob-riding woman in them with great excitement.

"For we really do belong to that class," she said once.

"Oh, no we don't, darling, we haven't any money!" Dan said, hungering for the old silly ways of wandering and basket dinners.

"Money, Dan! As if it was only money——"

"What else is it?"

Silence. Then Juliana said with a sort of quiet triumph, and in an undertone, as if to herself: "Then I'd like to know why they're so charming to me. I have no money!"

Now, to Dan's horror, she wanted to give a dinner to some of them. She cited the yellow tablecloth Betsy had brought her from Lyons, the white bowl with yellow marigolds in it and the Quimper candlesticks with yellow candles in them. She alluded to Lizzie's chicken curry, which was really Juliana's chicken curry, served by Lizzie.

There was no dining room in the Rutherfords' rambling little cottage, but there was a small square apartment, half porch, half pantry, where they had their meals when rain drove them from the real porch.

Juliana decided they must make this porch into a sort of sitting room and turn the pleasant old farmhouse parlor into a dining room just for the occasion of the dinner. She kept repeating to Dan the phrase "perfectly informal and simple," but as the days went by somehow the whole thing began to be more and more complicated.

She kept a list; it was always within reach. She conned it worriedly for days. On it she had written, "Mary for beaten biscuit, curtains, Tarcys, curry powder, earring mended, Chinese lanterns, coffee cups."

From time to time she added, in agitated penciling, "powder puffs, salted almonds, mend chair, telephone."

Dan, sympathetically if unintelligently aiding and abetting all her efforts, found the last detail interesting.

"I'm going to ask the operator not to put any calls on from eight o'clock to eleven," Juliana announced capably.

"But darling, nobody ever calls then!"

"Ah, but somebody might, and then we should have Barbe trailing down in her nighty! I declare," mused Juliana, in a mood of rare honesty, "I declare I despise myself for making a fuss like this! It does seem so—so utterly middle-class, somehow——"

"It'll get the house all cleaned up and shipshape anyway!" Dan assured her helpfully.

"It seems—middle-class," Juliana offered, using a word that to her represented everything undesirable.

"Mother always does this for company," Dan said, innocently pointing the dart, "washing the china, you know, and making coconut cake."

Juliana flushed, partly with shame and partly with resentment. Coconut cake, indeed! She was going to have real baba, drenched from a surviving and unregenerate bottle long hidden cellarward.

"I'll tell you a party I liked!" Dan remarked suddenly, from a moment of silence, as he rubbed the old temple candlesticks that he and Juliana had found upon a memorable day of browsing about the lower East Side. "Remember the day it rained so, and we had pans all over the place to catch drips, and we were going to have corn meal mush for lunch, and the Babcocks came in with half a ham and some cherry preserve, and you made the biscuits that puffed up exactly like popovers? Wasn't that an orgy?"

"I never will know what I put in those biscuits," Juliana murmured, momentarily distracted. "We did have fun that day," she conceded. "But there is no reason," persisted Juliana, answering perhaps some vague misgivings of her own, as well as Dan's frank distaste for the approaching party, "there is no reason why we shouldn't like the Cruikshanks, the Lees and the Lessings just as well as freaks like the Babcocks!"

"Don't you think money does make a sort of distinction—a sort of caste?" Dan suggested, wondering if there wasn't a good editorial in the idea.

"Not a bit!" Juliana said swiftly. "Look at my cousin Lily. Lily is Mrs. Rosecrans's secretary, she goes everywhere, she buys millions of dollars' worth of stuff and all the shops bow down before her, she speaks six languages and at Christmas they gave her a cottage—a house, if you please, at Westycove—that's what they think of Lily, and she hasn't a cent!"

"But they don't ask her to their dinners, Toots."

"Because she doesn't want to go! You know you hate rich people, Dan," said Juliana, tired and nervous, and with some little feeling, "and you're always different, with them. You're awkward and you're unnatural—you know you are!"

"I know it. They cramp my style!" Dan said humbly. "I think all this is such bunk," he added without venom. "Why can't we have a cold ham and a salad and sit in the garden, if it's a decent evening, and eat at half-past six as we always do, and hand 'em out napkins that don't match and the old Tom and Jerry cups——"

Juliana leaned her head on her hand and rested her elbows on the table where her small supply of silver was spread for polishing.

"My—heavens!" she breathed, patiently. But to Dan's somewhat clumsy apologies she paid no attention; Dan saw that the matter was beyond words.

While he raked and swept out-of-doors, hanging the new lanterns on the porch-sitting room, tying up unruly rose bushes and piling wood neatly, Juliana toiled within. She washed plates, rubbed silver, counted napkins. She cleaned the spare room, where the women guests would presumably lay wraps and prepared the dressing table for their beautification. She bundled the children's animals and paper dolls and boxes of precious rubbish into a terrible old hall closet that was already overcrowded by winter coats, rubbers, sleds, the sewing machine and the broken rocker, and crammed the sideboard drawer and the closet beneath with all sorts of small odds and ends that must be swept from view: the cribbage board and the playing cards and the children's school books and napkin rings, and the camera and films, her knitting, Dan's other pipe, the thermos bottle, the garden scissors, the gloves she used when weeding, the dominoes, the postal scales, the baby's place tray, an ornamented telephone list and other matters.

"We've simply outgrown this disgraceful place!" Juliana said violently as she toiled. She bought new playing cards, and had Dan mend the card table leg that always stuck, and she had an old Swiss come out from the village two miles away to start the clock that had not run for three years.

Lizzie caught the excitement, and burned one of the napkins and brought the cornice crashing upon her head when it came to hanging the clean curtains. And the children participated excitedly by respectively spilling a bottle of furniture polish right in the middle of the front porch, whence the oily stain would not be removed, and sitting down on the laundry bundle that contained Daddy's one good dress shirt.

"Dan, if you only——" began Juliana. "——were a gentleman!" she meant to end.

Mary Ann, the middle child, also chose this occasion to fall down and knock out a front first tooth. It wasn't serious, it would presently be replaced and the company wouldn't see the children anyway, but Juliana wept over the scare.

Mary Ann was a vague looking, forlorn little creature anyway, with straight fair hair and alarmed big eyes. She was perfectly well and she was an angel for disposition, but somehow, beside the glowing first-born, Barbe, and the bad, rosy, noisy, dark-curled baby, Mary Ann seemed somewhat colorless. She was, of course, the father's favorite child, if he had one, and Juliana sometimes told him that he broke the first commandment every time he looked at her.

Dan did his best, but Juliana told herself more than once, in moments of special irritation, that he was no more than a child himself. He could be so wonderful, so resourceful, when his interest was roused! He was like another woman with the children, or with herself, when she was ill. But he was no more than a fumble-fingered boy in such a case as this; he seemed to have no instinct for the finer forms of hospitality.

"These things are important, Danny," she said unsmilingly, when Lizzie, after listening to a long dissertation upon finger bowls, had mildly inquired if she was to pass the sugar with them, and Dan had made the house rock with his mirth. Dan could write brilliant editorials, and he was a darling, thought Juliana, but after all his father was a postmaster in a small town who called all women "ma'am" or "sister," and his father before him had run a hotel in the same town.

"The salt of the earth!" she would tell herself loyally at this point, but salt, after all, is an unornamental article, and generally unappreciated.

The responses to her prettily written invitations were disappointing, too. Mrs. Lee's secretary answered that Mrs. Lee was away at the moment but would be back in two days. Mrs. Lessing dashed off an illegible note to the effect that she would surely come, but that Mr. Lessing might be detained in town that night, she could not be sure. Mrs. Cruikshank came with her response in person.

She was on her way to the links, and stood, a brilliant young figure, at the gate, in the morning sunshine. Dan had on a corduroy jacket, baggy trousers and Chinese slippers, and was hosing the porch. Juliana was shampooing the glorious mop of Barbe, who was in sketchy underwear for the operation. The baby, in his old coach, had plastered his face irregularly with cracker paste and was now attempting to augment his mid-morning snack with the ear of a plush seal.

"My dear," said Mrs. Cruikshank to the flustered but gracious Juliana, "you're charming to ask me to dinner. But I think I'm a widow! The Storm King doesn't like me a bit any more, and he has gone up to Newport for the golf. I ought to go myself, but I've got mama here——" She paused.

"I wonder if your mother——" Juliana was beginning hospitably, but with a sinking heart, when Mrs. Cruikshank interrupted smoothly.

"No, there are limits. I refuse to play what mama calls bridge with her, and I won't inflict it on my friends. But she doesn't mind my leaving her—Ginger's home, you know," she said of her young daughter. "Only—you see I've got Mr. Noble—that's this old friend of mine from Hawaii, here——" she added doubtfully.

"Bring him by all means!" said Juliana, in another pause.

"Oh, may I? You're awfully nice to say that——"

"Shall I write him?" Juliana's tone did not slacken. But she remembered with a faint inward chill that there had been a rather insipid young man, who looked and danced like a professional dancer, in close attendance upon the beautiful Mrs. Cruikshank at the club last week, and that Mr. Cruikshank, being warmed with his meal, had expressed himself with more honesty than tact about him.

"She's giving that bird-brain a run!" had been his way of putting it, and Juliana remembered now that there was a hint of real resentment in his words.

Mary Cutter, coming down to the Point to show the resentful Lizzie how to make Maryland biscuit, added to her uneasiness.

"They say that Joe Cruikshank told her that if that man didn't get out of the house, he would," said Mary, perhaps slightly chilled because she and Roger were not to be included in this affair. "One of the society weeklies had an article about it, somebody told me. You know that daughter of hers, who lives with her mother, was by her first marriage, and it seems that this girl's father and Joe Cruikshank were old friends——"

"I never heard that," Juliana said more than once, uncomfortably.

"Well, you and Dan do live so out of things! I've always thought it was perfectly ideal," said Mary. Juliana felt a pang. It did all seem so silly, suddenly. "Don't forget cigarettes!"

"Oh, heavens, what kind do you suppose they smoke?"

"I haven't the faintest idea. You know Roger has regular cavemen theories about them! You haven't any of those cutey boxes and trays that they put down at every place, have you? Of course not. I can lend you some trays when I bring down the spoons and the chutney. You really ought to have the Indian chutney, full of ginger and raisins, but you can't get it now."

"Never again!" said Dan, from the armchair where he was luxuriously cradling Mary Ann and her grazed knee.

"You have to do something when people are so kind——" Juliana protested, for the hundredth time. But when the night before the dinner party came she said darkly and wearily, in her secret thoughts: "I wish I was dead. It's going to be awful, and I don't care! They'll see that we wanted to do something!"

And so came the heavenly morning of the day itself, a shining morning of sweetness and warmth, with a sun that was not hot and yet that brought out the fragrance of the lilacs and made the tremulous shade of young leaves delicious over the high green grass of the yard. Dan, over whose recumbent form three children in pajamas were rapturously climbing, commented enthusiastically upon the weather, from his bed.

"I wish it was tomorrow—and pouring!" Juliana said darkly, brushing her long hair. "It'll all be over by this time tomorrow anyway," she consoled herself as she went downstairs.

She was greeted by an unset table and breakfast preparations obviously late.

"I feel like death," said Lizzie, sitting heavily by the kitchen table. "You'd never believe the stren'th of the weakness that come over me like a sending——"

Juliana paid no attention. It was one of many prods that ruffled her soul as the morning wore on. For one thing, the telephone operator was very breezy when Juliana telephoned to the grocer, at twelve, incidentally to say that she had wanted cornstarch, not laundry starch.

"My little sweetheart!" Dan had her in his arms. Mary Ann sniffled, sighed, gulped and was content.

"I thought you didn't want any calls after eight o'clock today," said the operator capably.

"Tonight!" Juliana corrected, her heart sinking.

"Well, there was a party from the city trying to get you all morning," the operator said. "I thought you says——"

Juliana hung up, exasperated beyond utterance. The "party from the city" might easily be Mrs. Lee, saying that they positively would, or positively would not, come. The question of what Barbe called "biggening or smallening" the table was important.

Another prod was the arrival of the village real estate man, who had received, it seemed, one more good offer for the Rutherford place. There was a "party that was interested." it appeared.

This was always an annoyance to Dan and a source of real fear and misery to Juliana. It was not only that she had associations with the place, for Juliana, like most American women, could always strike new roots cheerfully and move on to the unknown with great interest, but she suspected that this "interested party" was one of her neighbors, was Dunham Lee or Ross Lessing, who both would have liked this particular strip for garage space or for a tennis court.

It was disheartening to have these apparently friendly persons trying to squeeze the Rutherfords from their foothold, yet both Dan and Juliana suspected that that was exactly what was going on. The whole homestead had cost them less than five thousand dollars; the "interested party" offered fifteen. Dan, who had for some time had his fond eye upon a bit of wooded headland in an obscure village some forty miles farther north, would long ago have accepted this Arabian Nights offer and gone upon his placid way, to reestablish the baby coach and the shabby books and the brass firedogs elsewhere. But the home was Juliana's, and Juliana never wavered. They shouldn't crowd her out, she would say. On the contrary, she would win them, one by one, and find herself snugly established here in their exclusive midst, one of themselves, although her house was not as big as their garages and her income not what many of them paid their secretaries.

But it was especially hard to have the agent reappear today. Today, when his supposed clients were actually to be the Rutherfords' guests at dinner. His offer this morning was of seventeen thousand five hundred dollars. The "party" was a rich city man, he said vaguely, his name was Wilson—that was it, Wilson.

"I don't see why he wants to buy it without ever seeing it!" Juliana, baffled, protested uneasily.

"Well, it's a very nice piece," said Mr. Tautphaus judicially.

"Yes, but he couldn't use the (Continued on page 112)

ALBERT PAYSON TERHUNE

writes on Joys and Dangers

Now That I'm FIFTY

LOOKING back over this series, I wonder if I have given the impression that being fifty years old is something like being in jail or on a desert island. If so, I've written clumsily.

There are glorious compensations for Fifty.

Let me try to explain one or two of the hundred advantages, now that I have whined about a few of the drawbacks.

At Fifty, I stand on a high hilltop. Ahead, it is true, are other and higher hills before I shall reach the jumping-off place—the summit whence the next step must be a flight.

But I am high enough to get a painfully clear view of the long road behind me; the road I have ascended, so painfully; the road that winds its rough and streaky way up from the start of the climb.

You youngsters would be amazed to see how different the road looks from this end. Why, it isn't the same road at all as it was when I used to look upward along it, instead of looking back!

If I had it to retravel I should make so much better and happier progress—if I didn't chance to stub my silly toe on some obstacle which I skirted by merest luck on the first climb!

The obstructions and the pits and the dragons which I faced and feared on the ascent turn out to have been laughably harmless. Look at a few of them:

There, for example, is the Black Hole of Eternal Disgrace; back near the milestone that is numbered 20. That was the gaping maw which was to swallow me forever if I did not study hard enough to get my degree of A. B. in college.

From childhood I had been made to think that I must either go triumphantly through college or be eternally shamed. It was a horror to me; as it is and has been and shall be to a million more.

Looking back, I see that that yawning Black Hole was a pin point. I couldn't have been plunged into it if I had wanted to. It wasn't big enough to engulf a gnat.

If I had failed in every examination in all my jolly college course—if I had been expelled for pulling the dean's wool-trust whiskers—I'd be not a penny the worse off today; or the less liked and respected by the folk who now are my companions and associates.

Life would have gone on just the same. I see that now. If I had had the wit to see it then I'd have saved myself many a sleepless night and many a half formed plan to run away and enlist in the army.

Why, I don't even know what has become of my longed for college diploma! Probably it has been lost in our various movings. Yet once I would have bartered both legs to acquire the worthless fetish.

Then, a bit farther on in the climb, stretches the Slough of Despair. I thought I should never emerge from that. Looking back, I see the fearsome thing is a six inch mud puddle.

I was hurled to its supposedly bottomless depths by a Girl. She swore she would love me forever; and that she'd wait a lifetime, if need be, for me to earn enough to marry on.

Then, very sensibly, she married for vast wealth an old, old man (he must have been nearly thirty-five) who was junior partner in a dry goods store in Brooklyn. And my heart was irremediably broken.

I was a blighted being. I remember I went so far as to commit to memory a Byron poem containing the line: "And thus the heart will break, yet brokenly live on." Always I hoped for a chance to recite it to her; with my arms folded and with a Guy Livingstone glower on my face. I never got the chance.

The only time I saw her again was on a train—some three years ago. And by then I had forgotten the poem. She must have weighed as much as I do, that last time I saw her; though once my two hands could span her waist.

She wore spectacles, perspired generously and whistled through her nose—three years ago. And when she recalled herself to my memory I got her mixed up with someone else. Yet in my early twenties my one ideal of a happy evening was to have her weep over my deathbed.

Then, there in my backward survey of the road, I see the Impassable Barrier that rose in front of me and hemmed me in. That Barrier was the loss of a job which appeared to have my whole future bound up with it. It meant an entire reshaping of my work-life; and a dull certainty that my one chance for success was forever gone.

The man who succeeded to my lost job is now drawing down the princely salary of seventy dollars a week; with every prospect of being laid off for old age in a few years. It was the loss of that job which first started me to working in earnest.

Yes, the Impassable Barrier, seen from the right perspective, was only a bit of tough climb which taught me to use my climbing muscles.

Then there was the man who sent me word he would "get" me. One evening as I was taking a walk a pistol bullet dug a nasty hole in a wooden doorpost, scarce a foot away from my silly head.

That was almost a quarter-century ago. Yet for fully a year thereafter I used to be pestered with a feeling that the man was hidden somewhere along my line of walk. I had not the sense to realize that threatened men live long; and that—once having missed me—the poor bungler was not likely to scrape up courage for a second shot. I was no longer in peril. As usual, my worry was wasted.

And so on through the rest of the myriad holes and ridges in the road—holes and ridges which spelled Tragedy; and which, at Fifty, I can smile at. But it is a kindly smile, with nothing of derision in it.

And there are innumerable other men and maids plodding dispiritedly or hopefully along that same deceptively easy road—men and maids to whom I yearn to shout:

"That dragon is only an angleworm. He can't devour you! That yawning chasm isn't six inches wide. Stop trembling and wringing your hands, and step across it! The Slough of Despond hasn't enough black mud in it to stain the soles of your shrinking feet."

But my voice will not carry. And each must tread the road, scared by the same harmless bugaboos that scared me.

I'm sorry for them all. But I am smugly glad for myself. That is one of the joys of Fifty.

Then I look ahead to the mountains yet above me—the hills I must climb before I can reach the Topmost Ledge.

When at last my tired feet shall press that Ledge, or spring joyously forth into space, shall I look back toward the fiftieth milestone and smile amusedly at sight of the dangers that now I dread? I wonder! Why doesn't some really old man—say, someone in the nineties—tell me?

Back along the road, from childhood to fifty, I watch and classify the obstacles that strew the route—the perils, the menaces. And this queer bit of memory comes to me:

Nine-tenths of those obstructions and dangers that I used to worry about never came my way at all. Lord, the worry I could have saved myself if I'd known that beforehand!

The air, here on the breezy uplands of Fifty, is bracing and pleasant to breathe. The sun shines caressingly, and with little of the intolerant fierce heat of earlier days. Here, too, is kindly and wise and gentle companionship. It is well to be here.

This is the true Indian Summer of life. Behind lies the tender and fickle Springtime. Behind lies the glowingly burning heat and throb of July and August.

Ahead, of course, are the chill rot and grayness of late November; and the awesome white chill of Winter.

But the Indian Summer of Fifty is glorious; if one has the sense to appreciate it and to revel in its loveliness.

Let's enjoy it, shan't we? And let's try to pity and not envy those behind us who are still scorching in the midsummer heat. It surely ought to be easy to pity and not envy them, since they set us the example.

How I Felt When This Picture Was Taken

I was twenty-one. I had raised a really successful beard, which made me look almost twenty-two. I was free from college, and across the globe. With a good little Syrian stallion under me and a leaky tent to sleep in, I was crossing the Syrian wilderness. In brief, I was discovering a new world.

Perhaps I shall feel as gloriously self-important and heroic again some day. But not until my fellow humans make me Dictator of the Universe, and Rockefeller and Rothschild turn over their fortunes to me. Even then I shall not be twenty-one; which was worth all the rest put together.

"There's a quick word," said Crisp, "a blow from behind——"

The Hunch-Player

YOU know what the fancy call a hunch-player? Well, that was what Crisp of the Star was. Through all the days of his life on a city desk consistently he played two chronic hunches. He believed in going after the seemingly impossible, and he believed that the little apples in the bottom of the barrel sometimes yield the juiciest bites.

Let me explain: There once upon a time was a man in this town of New York whose name was a household word between coast and coast. But his personality was a sealed book throughout this widened range. In banking he was a sky-raking figure; on the private side he was a cipher. He was a whole row of ciphers. Everybody knew what he did. Just nobody, outside his own immediate circle, knew what he was. He moved in a mysterious way his wonders to perform, and for all he cared the public might go and hang itself and its inquisitiveness from the same limb.

He had never made utterances for publication; he had never given out statements for print. He was reported to boast that so long as he lived he would never do either one. If the press chose to misrepresent him, let it. If it chose to quote him at secondhand he would not take the trouble to deny or affirm or qualify the accuracy of the words attributed to him. The fabled pioneer who lived so far back in the woods that the owls mated with his chickens was not so inaccessible, so aloof, as this man, with his town house on the Avenue and his office in Wall Street and his thumb in every desirable plum pie that the leading Jack Horners of the money markets could cook up. So accordingly Crisp detailed one of the best men he had to call every Friday morning at ten o'clock and ask, on behalf of the Star, for a special interview. This was kept up for two years.

"Never mind, Larry," Crisp would say when the reporter, returning to the city room, would confess another failure on the assignment. "Just make a note to drop in again next Friday at the regular hour and send your card in. You know that saying about the constant drop of water wearing away the hardest stone? All right, bear it in mind. Some of these days you're going to break down his powers of resistance. Or he'll develop a gnawing curiosity to see what such a persistent idiot as you must appear to him to be, really looks like. Or the day will come when he's ready to break silence, and then you'll be the one newspaperman he'll think of, because your name will be the one that's most familiar to him. Or something. And if the old Sphinx ever does uncork himself—I mean when he does, not if—he'll rock the Pyramids. And, Larry, oh my son, we'll be there when the rocking starts!"

It came to pass on a Friday morning in the beginning of the third year that the inscrutable one ceased to be inscrutable. He just naturally hauled off and unrolled himself like a scroll. What he said about finance and the science of finance and the politics of it and the domestic and international aspects of it, giving names and dates, book, chapter and verse, shook both hemispheres. Like the tail of the snake which doesn't die till the sun goes down, the last faint tremors begotten of that interview were still being felt in the farther corners of this earth long after the Star had ceased to halo itself for its epochal beat.

This, by illustration, was how Crisp played one of his favorite hunches. Here was how he played the other one: If ever you have seen a trained newspaperman running through a paper you know the way he does it even though you may not be able to imitate him. His eye goes hurrying down the sheet, column by column, picking up now a name or a word, there a phrase or a sentence, and when, in an amazingly short time, he has finished with that page and turned to the next one he has in his brain a pretty fair compilation of the outstanding facts—the details

Another Excellent Mystery Story By

Irvin S. Cobb

Illustrations by C. D. Williams

covered and the details not as yet fully covered and so deserving of further consideration.

It is quite a knack and one not come by without practice. Crisp had the performance of it well mastered but he went further than some news editors go. He gave a special heed to those small oddments and ends of news that were tucked down at the ends of the columns and shoved off at the sides in the out-of-the-way corners where the unclassified ads occurred.

About once in so often he would slow up and stop and back up to re-read some seemingly trivial paragraph which the make-up man had used as a footstone for a story of admitted importance. Probably, then, he would cut it out and call to him a reporter in whose abilities as a sapper and miner of buried news values he had confidence.

"Here, son," he would say, "scout out on this, will you? I may be wrong but it looks to me as though you might dig up a story out of this little thing. Just go to the address that's given here and ask this woman why, when the flat caught fire, she let her piano burn up and saved the stuffed parrot? I've got a sort of a notion in the back part of my head that maybe your time won't be entirely wasted."

Or, as in the well remembered instance of the Prospect Slope mystery, so called, there was Crisp, rolling in his fingers a clipping from his own paper and saying to Cullinan, his star reporter of that particular period:

"Cully, I'm not altogether satisfied with the way the cops over in Brooklyn and the newspapers on this side of the River are handling this Holloway story. I'm not so blamed well satisfied with the way we've handled it ourselves, in this shop. It begins to look to me as though we've all been overlooking a good bet."

"I think my story will stack up alongside any other evening paper in town's story," said Cullinan, so deeply stung in his professional quick that he trod heavily upon the rules of grammar —not that Cully cared for that. Being an average good reporter, he respected the rules of grammar not a bit in his speech and not any too much in his writings, but stamped them underfoot at will.

What Cullinan, the master hand, did care about was the implied suggestion that he might have shirked the job.

Crisp hastened to soothe him:

"Don't misunderstand me. I'm not complaining of your work. It's your frame of mind I'm thinking of. The mistake you've made—and the one that I've made, too, for that matter—is following the line of least resistance, the same as the detective force has been doing ever since the start. Well, it's only natural for people to think in a groove. There's a good deal of the sheep in the composition of most of us—it's instinct for us to trail along after a leader. But so far as the Star is concerned I've decided that we'd better be nosing out on a fresh track for a little while and see what it gets us.

"Here's what I want you to do this morning: Let Sheridan and Cope cover the main police ends and you get busy and find out exactly what this young fellow Holloway's salary was with the Kings Trust Company. Find out, if you can, whether he'd been living past his means—whether there's any chance of our showing that he might have been short in his accounts with those trust company people. Find out, some way or other, how much life insurance he carried, and, above all things, you learn whether he'd taken out any large policies on his life within the past year or the past two years."

"All right, sir, just as you say, but you've got me dizzy—I've got to own up to that. The way I look at it—the only way you can look at it—this thing is just a dead open-and-shut case of murder and you're beginning to talk as though——"

Crisp jumped at him with a question before he could finish: "What makes you so sure it's murder?"

"Why, boss, what else could it be? Here's young Holloway coming home late and finding his wife in bed. He's getting undressed to turn in when he says to her he thinks he hears curious noises downstairs. He takes his gun out of the bureau drawer where he keeps it, and without making any light goes slipping downstairs to investigate. He tells his wife to stay where she is—that probably there's nothing wrong but he only wants to make sure, that's all. Well, he goes on down, and in about a minute more she hears him call out from there and then she hears a shot, and with that she screams and faints away.

"But the neighbor next door, this Mr. J. P. Gatewood, happens to be awake and of course he hears the shot, too. And so he jumps up and pulls on a few clothes and runs across lots and he finds the front door of the Holloway house open and he bulges in and turns on the lights. And there's young Holloway dead on the dining room floor with a bullet in his heart—shot at close range—and his pet fox terrier that must have followed him downstairs from the bedroom, is standing over him, whimpering.

"Holloway's pistol, a thirty-eight caliber, is on the floor alongside him—it hasn't been fired. The gun that did kill him—an old-fashioned Colt's, forty-two caliber—is there, too, where the murderer must have dropped it as he whirled to run. And on the dining room table, all done up in a tablecloth, is most of the silverware, showing that Holloway must have slipped up on the robber and surprised him while he was tying up the swag. And on the carpet there are plenty of muddy tracks, and outside on the porch and still farther out on the lawn are more tracks that correspond with these—two sets of 'em—one set showing where somebody with a big number eleven shoe crept up to the house at a crawl almost and got in by the front door, and the other set, going away, with the prints farther apart, to show where the same party that wore those shoes beat it away from there as fast as he could travel.

"How are you going to get away from that strange pistol? Or from those strange footprints? What else could it be but a plain open-and-shut case of murder by a housebreaker—even if the police haven't been able to find the man that did it yet?"

"Cully," said Crisp, droning his words, "let's suppose a few things. Let's suppose that Holloway, on a salary of not exceeding six thousand a year—probably not more than five—was living at the rate of fifteen or twenty thousand a year. As a matter of fact, we don't have to suppose that part of it very hard—we know he lived in an expensive neighborhood in a rented house and kept four servants and belonged to two country clubs and ran with a fast set. Let's suppose that he's been spending money that wasn't his—trust company money. Let's suppose that he's desperate—that he makes up his mind to take a short cut out of the mess by the suicide route; that he's been thinking of doing it for some time past. But he wants to leave his wife provided for. So he insures his life—remember, I'm still supposing—insures his life for enough money to square up his accounts and still leave plenty for her to live on.

"But then he finds out the policies have the regular clauses in them—like most life insurance policies do—voiding the payments if the holder kills himself by deliberate intent inside of one year or two or three from the date of issue. So he rigs up a plant to throw dust in the eyes of his wife and the police and the insurance people and everybody.

"He stays out on a certain night until he knows she's in bed. Then he sneaks in, bringing with him an extra pistol and a pair of secondhand shoes big enough to slip 'em on over his own shoes. Working in the dark, he makes those sets of duplicate tracks, going and coming, and then hides that pair of number elevens where they won't be found. He rolls up the silver in a bundle—all a part of his plan to make the burglar theory seem more plausible. He puts the Colt's where he can find it without any trouble. He leaves the front door open. Then he goes upstairs, starts to take off his clothes, pretends to hear suspicious noises downstairs, tells his wife, who's sleepy, that he's going to investigate, takes his own gun in his hand, goes back down, shoots himself through the heart with the strange gun—and there you are. What do you think of that for a job of ground-and-lofty supposing?"

"Sounds like a good side slant to take if we want to smoke up the story and keep it on the front page a few days longer," said Cullinan, speaking, against his will, admiringly. "But, while we're supposing, let's suppose it turned out that taking that viewpoint was wrong. I don't know whether, under the laws of this State, you can libel a dead man, but it would be a rotten thing to do to a dead man's memory and to his widow, wouldn't it, boss—if they caught the murderer, say?"

"It certainly would," said Crisp dryly. "We'd have to have our deductions pretty well proved up before we sprung 'em. That's why I'm detailing you to look up Holloway's private business affairs today."

"Just as you say," said Cullinan, "but would you mind telling me, boss, who was it that started you off on this new slant?"

"You—you're the man."

"Me!"

It wasn't a question; it was an exclamation.

"Yes, you—in a line or two you had in your story on the first day. I came across it last night when I was checking up the Star's stories with the Courier's and the Evening Dispatch's to see how our work on it compared with theirs; that's a little habit of mine you didn't know I had, did you? What I don't understand is how I missed the point on the day we printed it. You remember that talk you had with Gatewood, the neighbor, the morning you got the assignment, don't you?"

"Of course."

"Remember what he said about Holloway's dog?"

"Holloway's dog?" echoed Cullinan blankly.

"Yes. Gatewood told you—or so you quoted him as saying—that the first he knew of the killing was when he heard the shot fired, although at the time he was wide awake."

"Yes, that's right," assented the puzzled reporter.

"And that when he got there the dog was standing over Holloway's body whining—he said that, too, didn't he?"

"Certainly he did, but what——"

"Cully," snapped Crisp, "do you own a dog, now?"

"No, sir."

"Did you ever own a dog?"

"As a boy—yes, sir."

"Was it a fox terrier?"

"It was part terrier, I think—and part cur. I called him Grip."

"Well, suppose you'd heard suspicious noises in your own house when you owned Grip and you'd gone downstairs to investigate, taking Grip with you? And suppose in the darkness you'd run into a prowler—a stranger? Wouldn't the cur part of Grip have started him growling as soon as he caught a whiff of that intruder and wouldn't the terrier part of Grip have set him to barking at the same time? Grip might have licked your hand and whimpered after you'd been shot, but before that happened—I leave it to you—wouldn't he have been yelping so's everybody on the block could hear him? People can dissemble and play tricks on one another but under any given set of imaginable circumstances you can't keep a dog from doing the dependable and the inevitable thing. Even associating with mankind doesn't keep a dog from being natural and honest—and that's saying a good deal for the dog. Think it over, Cully, my son, think it over—but first get busy on this lead I'm handing you."

"Boss," said Cully worshipfully, "by gosh, you might be right at that! I remember Grip's ways." He clutched for his hat and overcoat. "Anyhow, I'm on my way."

And, as it turned out, the boss was right, and when on the next day after this the Star clouted the rest of the Row between the eyes with a gorgeous exclusive, was a prophet not without honor in his own country.

It was startling—the number of times in the course of a year that the Star came through with a good human interest yarn—humorous or pathetic or dramatic—as a result of some such obscured beginning. The members of Crisp's staff, who idolized him professionally, and in their private capacities sometimes hated him, had an even stronger word for it. They said it was incredible. They said it was as though old Ben Alibi every now and then developed the gift of second sight. They likened his talent to the talent of a smart ratter that can smell out a hidden rat behind a wainscoting where dogs with only ordinarily keen noses catch no betraying scent. These may not have been exactly the words they used in describing the phenomenon, but this was their purport.

It would have astonished them in a fresh place if anybody had told them that this persistent phase of their chief's hunch-playing was based on a profound private superstition. For he neither looked nor deported himself after the fashion of one who believed in signs and portents; he seemed so absolutely materialistic. They would have marveled, I guess, to know that in a small flapped compartment of his pocket cardcase he carried a fetish. It was a raggedy and faded scrap of news print stock—a twelve line clipping from a newspaper that went out of business before the panic of 1907. From age and rubbing, the type lines were scarcely to be read. And if you did succeed in reading them, their meaning seemed inconsequential and incidental to the bygone event upon which they bore.

"I leave it to you—wouldn't that dog have been yelping so's everybody on the block could hear him?"

But Crisp treasured the frayed scrap as though it had been a jewel of price. It was to him a reminder of his first notable beat after he came in off the street to take the city desk of the newly established Daily Star. It was more than a reminder. It was a charm and a token. Proof and promise of the value of a hunch; that's what it was to him.

At the time—and that time is far back of the time of this present writing—the Trask case made a big stir in New York, what with the killing first and then the arrest and the confession and the trial and all. The story broke late one steamy August night, barely allowing for the morning papers to throw together short front page stories for their late city editions. Briefly, the outstanding facts were these:

John Q. A. Trask was a middle-aged person of independent means, one fairly conspicuous in certain gentlemanly activities suitable to a person of his station and leisure. He was an amateur yachtsman, an owner of race horses, a card player who didn't much care how large the stakes might be, a member of several clubs, a patron of the sports. Summing up in a short line, you might have classified him as a typical man-about-town; he came as near to filling the qualifications for that rather vague indexing as any man you might have named. He lived in the expensive and supposedly exclusive Lathrop Arms apartments on Twenty-eighth Street between Fifth and Madison Avenues. Twenty years ago Twenty-eighth Street was not so far uptown for general purposes, neither was it so far down for high-priced apartment hotels as it is today. It was very much in the middle of things, and this Mr. John Q. A. Trask was perhaps the most widely known of its bachelor tenants.

It was in the doorway of the Lathrop Arms that somebody brained him on that hot night of midsummer. It would seem that he last was seen alive when he left the Cosmos Club in Madison Square at or about eleven forty-five o'clock. The doorman at the Cosmos was able to fix the time fairly accurately. He remembered that he offered to call a cab for the departing member but Mr. Trask told him that he meant to walk home. He was alone then. Presumably, he still was alone when he came to where he lived; it must have been a very few minutes past midnight when he got there. It was at twelve o'clock that the hall attendant at the Lathrop Arms closed the elevator, set the night latch on the street door, extinguished all the lights in the first floor foyer, excepting one near the staircase, and went to his bed in the basement; all this in accord with the regular routine.

Outside in the gloom of the pillared entry Mr. Trask must have been in the act of slipping his pass-key in the keyhole when the assassin struck him down, probably from behind. Later the key was picked up from the tiled floor of the entryway where it had been dropped. Ten feet away on the sidewalk was found, at the same time, the weapon with which the man had been killed. It was a piece of gas pipe, common gas pipe, brutally heavy and yet most handy; it could be carried, hidden, under a coat or up a sleeve or down a trouser leg. With it the victim's head had been crushed in.

In all likelihood the first blow, crashing through his straw hat, was the blow that killed him. He must have gone down without crying out or any struggling, barring perhaps the spasmodic twitchings of a lusty creature suddenly stricken. But the assailant had not been content to deliver the one lethal stroke; no expert's aid was needed for the reconstruction of the scene. Bending over the felled shape, the murderer had continued to swing his gas pipe, striking again and again, making scrap of the victim's skull.

The finding of the key and the pipe-length and the piecing together of the action of the crime, belonged, though, among the subsequent developments; these were details uncovering in swift order following upon the discovery of the body. A private policeman brought the word of that to a regular policeman. The former, in his gray uniform, came running, all out of breath, to pant out the news to his blue-coated professional brother, Officer Oscar Lieber, when Lieber was walking his post in Madison Avenue just around the corner from the spot where the thing occurred. The men knew each other; their official duties brought them together nightly. They had met on their rounds and had chatted briefly and had parted at a point two blocks distant, less than an hour before. These two immediately became outstanding figures in the early phases of the investigation. Indeed, then and thereafter they were the only persons who might in any sense be called witnesses as regards the main event, and even in their case the term must be used in a qualified sense.

"The girl's brother is not the kind who forgives."

The private policeman, by name Jerome T. Sweeney, was in the employ of the Hoster Patrol and Watch Service, a responsible concern and one favorably known to the authorities and to housekeepers generally. His beat included the block where the Lathrop Arms stood. His story of the finding of the body was, substantially, as follows:

He was going along the north side of Twenty-eighth Street trying doors. The street was quiet and, except for him, apparently deserted. From the time he swung into it coming east out of Fifth Avenue he had seen no other pedestrian whatsoever. Reaching the Lathrop Arms he turned in off the sidewalk to make sure the street door properly was fastened. He stumbled over something. He pressed the button of his electric flash and by its light saw at his feet the sprawled figure of a well dressed man, the head terribly battered. He stooped and felt for signs of life and the touch of his hands confirmed what already his eyes had told him. So he ran around into Madison Avenue, seeking assistance there, and he found Lieber and brought Lieber back with him.

In handling the body both men got blood upon their hands; they had the wit about them, though, not to shift it materially from where it lay, twisted on its side. They did convince themselves that death had taken place within the past fifteen minutes. In so far as their first hurried examination tended to show, robbery had not been the motive behind the thing, for on the person of the dead man they found a gold watch and a bill folder containing a considerable amount of money; much loose silver and a gold piece or so were in one of his trouser pockets. In all of these minor points the two men, at the inquest, confirmed and corroborated each other; their statements under oath touching on the state of things matched and dovetailed.

After some difficulty they succeeded in awaking the hall attendant, who had fallen soundly asleep, although by his own account he had been in bed but a short while. The shocked attendant, a West Indian negro, identified the victim. About his behavior there was nothing suspicious but, putting himself on the safe side, Lieber detained him, as the police term is. When in doubt, arrest somebody; when in great doubt, arrest that somebody very promptly—this is a dependable axiom of the uniformed force, and always has been.

So, at breakfast time that day, the matter stood. So all day it continued to stand. The trouble with this story was that it didn't keep growing. There was no progress to it, no development, no cumulation; and any playwright will tell you that these are defects fatal to a dramatic piece.

Now, the newspaper game, on a larger scale merely is the playwriting game and subject to much the same rules, the main distinction being that in a print shop a new show must be put on each day with different scenery and its own special cast. No run lasts for longer than twenty-four hours and usually it doesn't last that long even. You must keep bringing in fresh scenes and fresh characters or the interest lags. It is all very well to lift your curtain with a tragedy, but it is altogether bad if the first act climax is the only climax you have to offer to your audience.

This last, exactly, was what ailed the Trask story. It began promisingly—this dilettante sportsman sauntering homeward from his club through the silent guarded streets, his white straw hat a pale blur in the half darkness, his dinner coat a black patch below it; his feet ringing briskly on the paving, his head up; seemingly a man at peace with a peaceful world, certainly a man without known bitter enemies—and then of a sudden attacked at the very threshold, bludgeoned out of all wholesome semblance and left on his own doorsteps a pitiably, sadly marred huddle of dead flesh. That you will allow, is a promising beginning for any news story. It calls for front page spreads; is a thing to be played up with picture layouts and garnished with the strong adjectives of modern journalese. But it stopped as it began—with abruptness.

The newspapers could ask questions but neither they nor the police were able to supply the answers. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that a footpad killed Trask, why did he fail to strip the body of its valuables? He had abundant time in which to hammer Trask's head out of shape. What then was the reason, presuming the slayer to be a common marauder, that he did not take the time to collect the loot which would be his reward? If jealousy, if some hidden grudge, if a quarrel for a woman's favor was the motive, it then became inconceivable to imagine any man of Trask's class adopting the methods of a highwayman. If a wandering maniac had assaulted the clubman, what had become of him? Why had no one seen him lurking about the neighborhood earlier in the evening? Why had no one seen him departing out of it after he finished his ghastly gas pipe job? Lacking facts, the newspapers for the most part ran the scales on the lunatic theory.

Along Park Row smart things were looked for from Crisp, the youngest city editor on it. The Star was a new paper then—Wendover recently had founded it and was putting scads of money in it to make it go—and Crisp only three weeks before had been brought over from the Intelligencer, at a big salary for those days, to run its city room. So, naturally, he was expected to rise to this opportunity, to give the Trask story some twist which sensationally would quicken it even though the effect might mean only talk on the street and added circulation through a few editions.

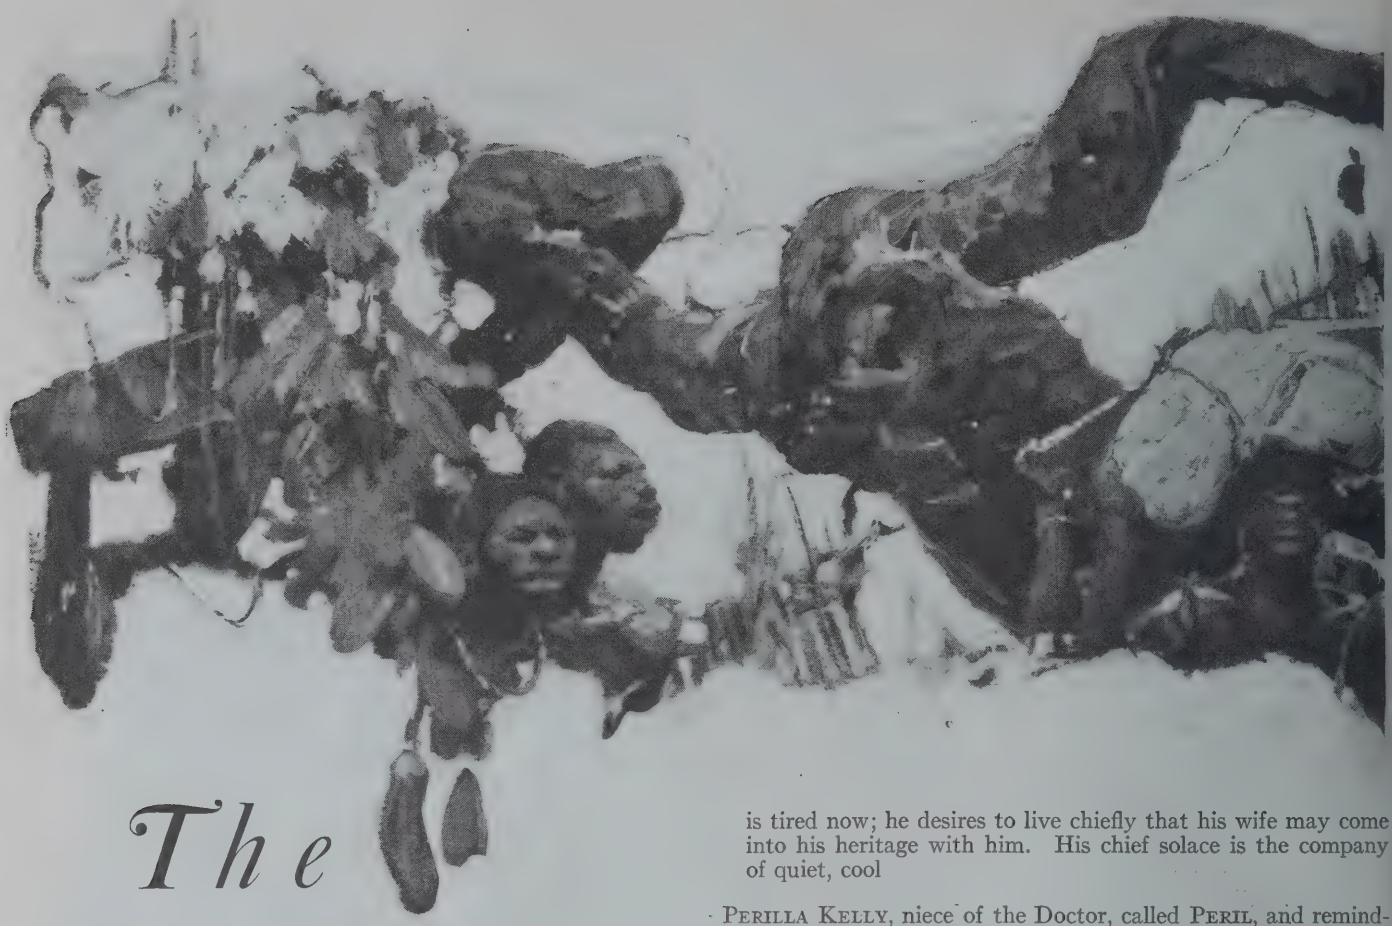
He did nothing of the sort. Wiseacres in certain rival shops, not to mention those in his own shop, said it was the old story—spoiling a cracking good reporter to make a commonplace city editor. Well, nearly always, didn't it turn out just that way? Somehow, when they quit using their legs they quit using their noodles, too; funny, wasn't it? And what was it Pulitzer had said once about every reporter being a hope and every editor a disappointment? So forth and so on.

If to Crisp's ears came any echo of this dismal litany from the official Jobs and Jeremiahs of the Row, where pessimism was a calling in life rather than a temperamental aspect, and where they pretended to be sorry for you when really they were glad you had failed, and where the art of envy rose to great heights and was a real and a finished art, he gave no sign that he knew what the anthem singers might be singing. He applied no artificial stimulant to the story; his journalistic pulmotor, which fancy would have painted a rich chrome yellow, apparently was out of order. He seemed content to let the yarn run its course in the conventional channels.

"Trask goes away from that town. Shame or fright causes him to leave."

True, he sent Sheridan, who was one of his best, up to the Massachusetts town where Trask had been born, presumably with orders to dig into Trask's earlier life, but whatever it may have been that Sheridan found out, Crisp saw fit not to print it. Also he detailed Olson, a first rate assignment man, to do a feature on the personalities of Lieber, the policeman, and Sweeney, the private patrolman. He went to unusual pains in this matter. Olson was instructed to get all possible facts touching on the professional and private records of these two—when Lieber had joined the force, for example, and when Sweeney had secured employment with the Hoster Patrol and Watch Service, and what, if any, the latter's prior experience had been as an officer, and where both men were born and what families they had and where they lived; an exhaustive inquiry, you would have said, considering that the pair appeared to be rather a commonplace and uninteresting pair. When Olson brought them down to the Star's office to pose for illustrations for the yarn, Crisp made a journey up to the staff photographers' department on the roof and met both the men and chatted with them.

But the effects hardly seemed to justify the efforts. The thing had been done before and, reading Olson's stuff in the galley proofs, the critics inside the Star shop told one another that also it had been better done. For that matter, unless he resorted to fiction, there really was nothing particularly exciting Olson might have said of his two subjects in hand. The critics agreed that the fault for the fall-down was not the reporter's. They voted unanimously to put the blame on the shoulders of the man who had set him to the task.



Moreover, having got the special into type, Crisp failed to run it; he margined it "Hold." Promptly on this the elder statesmen went into executive session again and took their knocking tools with them. Was it possible that so soon after his elevation to an executive post this bumptious young squirt of a Crisp was losing the sense of proportion which had marked him as a reporter? Wasting all this time and trouble on a feature spread that failed utterly to pan out? Well, anyhow, there you were; the thing spoke for itself. There was, they argued, no more to be said, meaning that there was a great deal more to be said. Cockburn, whom Crisp had succeeded on the city desk, led the anvil chorus, swinging a wicked sledge. Cockburn was on exchanges now and feeling low and miasmic in his mind.

As for Crisp, he suffered the Trask story to languish and shrink until its rehashed dimensions fitted inside a second page column and, jibing off on a fresh tack, he concentrated on the traction graft scandal, which was a dependable and popular hardy annual, giving to it the favored places in his make-ups. For a week he followed where this bent took him, and the other thing grew staler by the minute. Then one bright morning he experienced a change in judgment.

It would appear that all of a sudden his shifting fancy inclined him to re-oxygenize the now almost moribund Trask story. He sent Olson to ask Lieber and Sweeney, the two chief witnesses in that diminishing mystery, to call at the Star building in the afternoon at three; his message was that he desired their personal approval for what had been said about them in Olson's held over special. Seemingly a mania for accuraey in small things was besetting the young man.

They came in company, convoyed as (Continued on page 135)

By CYNTHIA STOCKLEY

The Garden of Peril

A Résumé of Part One:

DOCTOR BRUCE KELLY, of Umtété, a small town in Rhodesia, is something of a wizard as a physician—a baldish, stoutish, reddish, absent-minded man with flashes of piercing penetration.

He has a strange garden. In it he grows all sorts of plants, many of them deadly poisons, which he uses in his medical practice. The juice of one of these plants, colored like sloe gin, he uses as an injection in treating the illness of PAMFREVILLE [PAM] HESELTINE, heir to the Marquisate of Scawnshane and a hopeless invalid until Doctor Kelly tried his injections, under which he is slowly improving. Pam's illness is the penalty of a life lived too swiftly, too fully. He is tired now; he desires to live chiefly that his wife may come into his heritage with him. His chief solace is the company of quiet, cool

PERILLA KELLY, niece of the Doctor, called PERIL, and reminding those who know her of a pool of lilies. Peril is much in the Doctor's garden. She prepares his drugs, and also sits hour by hour watching the passers-by from behind a high hedge, and meditating about them. Once, on the boat to Africa, she had been thrown in with Pam's wife DORIA HESELTINE, and has judged the woman for what she is. Doria, indeed, lives chiefly for her own beautiful face and figure. Her amusement is breaking the hearts of men; her serious pursuit, power and riches. She does not love her husband in the least; but she too wants him to live—for the Marquisate. Meanwhile she is doing her utmost to lure Pam's cousin into making love to her.

One day, as part of a plan to inveigle him into calling, she goes to Peril's house to telephone. There she accidentally sees some of the sloe-like plant juice and learns from Peril that it is a deadly poison from which the victim could not be saved unless it were known that he had taken it. Doria seems strangely fascinated and insists that she must have a gown of that color.

Also, her ruse in telephoning from the Doctor's house instead of her own has been successful in luring again to her side

PUNCH HESELTINE, Pam's cousin, a debonair Rhodesian Mounted Policeman who, like Pam, has burned up a fortune and to whom so exquisitely finished a woman as Doria represents all he can no longer have. Yet Punch stubbornly fights the allure of Doria, intermittently breaks away from her; he is too loyal to Pam to take what he sees he might have. Lately, too, he has met Peril and finds a curious relief in her rare fineness contrasted with his hectic life.

One night he does very nearly take Doria in his arms at her gate; but Peril accidentally passes, he gets a new grip on himself, and Doria's triumphant moment, to her enraged chagrin, is gone.

On his way to camp, Punch calls on Peril to return her hat, which she had forgotten, and finds the girl weeping over the loss of a pet "bush-baby" killed by a dog. He comforts her, more deeply affected by her girlish genuineness than he cares to confess.

On arriving at camp that night, Punch finds two messages awaiting him. One is a telegram calling him to Northern

A New Novel of South Africa by the Author of "PONJOLA"

Illustrations by Dean Cornwell

Rhodesia on police business—a welcome excuse to escape Doria's influence. The other is a cablegram advising him that Pam's younger brother Richard has been killed skiing in Switzerland, and reminding him that in case of Pam's death he, Punch, is the next heir.

But Pam's health is growing daily better. "Not much of the non-survivor about old Pam now," Punch thinks, smiling. "He's a hot number, as they'll pretty soon discover."

Part Two:

IT WAS out of the question to take the news of Dick's death over to Minto Lodge that night. Not so much because of the lateness of the hour as because Punch Heseltine's nature revolted against burdening a sick man's night with sorrow. For that Pam would be heartbroken he knew. Dick was an only brother, the baby of the house, and the last hope of that branch of the family. Besides, he had been such a splendid youngster. One of those gay, brave, clean-hearted boys of whom it is afterwards recognized that there was something about them not of this world.

Most people have met at some time one or more of these bright brief sojourners and been left with a haunting memory of them. During the war, how often had not Punch encountered them! A sort of fatal radiance marked them that the bullet or wandering piece of shell could never miss.

The stamp of recall, Punch used to call it to himself—recall to the golden halls of a King who could no longer spare such gallant knights to earth. And now he remembered that he had seen the stamp clearly marked on young Dick . . . It is always remembered afterwards!

Glory, coupled with an early tomb!

Yet the boy had been spared through the last year of war—the only one he had been old enough to join in—to be killed amusing himself! Leaping from some slope above the Cresta Run, with youth and courage rushing hot in his veins, through the crystal-cold air into eternity! Well. A good death! A death that Pam would understand, anyhow, however much it broke him up. Thank God old Pam was a sportsman, and as such, even if he didn't read much poetry, knew the significance of those two lines:

> At the doors of life, by the gates of breath,
> There are worse things waiting for men than Death.

Something to be grateful for, too, that Pam was so much better that no bad consequences need be feared from the blow, once the sharpness of it was over.

However, it occurred to Punch that he ought to get Bruce Kelly's opinion before doing anything in the matter, and with this in his mind he stopped his horse at the gate of The Hill next morning and entered once more into that garden of the last night's sweet and subtle experience.

It still had a magic air, he thought as he mounted the winding path to the house, and caught again in his nostrils the sharp odors of herbs and scented things. A man might capture enchantment here, something to carry with him for refreshment through the dusty wastes of life, something to hide in his heart forever!

The Doctor stood on the veranda, just about to set off on his morning rounds, patting his pockets, looking at his watch and consulting his notebook, while Peril waited gravely beside him, holding his hat and a little leather case. Thus Punch saw her for the first time in the broad eye of day, under the scrutiny of Africa's morning sun, a piercing indagation that only youth can bear with equanimity—

> Rose-white youth,
> Passionate, pale . . .

And on Peril, in her smock of larkspur-blue, it enhanced a look of dawn and dew. He saw at last that her eyes were of a clear,

"What on earth! Doria!" cried Pam. It was as if the sound of his voice struck her like lightning.

warm honey color. Faint crescents of shadow beneath them were the sole trace of last night's wild storm, and they gave him an odd thrill. He immensely admired self-control and serenity in man or woman, but it thrilled him to remember that she could weep so wildly, that under that slumbering pool of lilies there were passionate fountains of emotion. The thought that he shared this secret with her was like a sudden precious gift put into his hand.

All the same he could see they were both wondering why he had come, and he made haste to explain that he wanted advice from the Doctor as to breaking some family bad news to Pam. At which the girl softly and swiftly disappeared in the garden.

"It is very distressing," Bruce Kelly decided with knitted brow. "But you would not be justified in keeping it back, and thank the Lord he is well enough to stand it now. A week or two ago I couldn't have answered for him."

They walked down to Minto Lodge together, and the Doctor elected to wait in the garden, on the off chance that he might be required, and also, he said, because he wanted to have a quiet chat with Nurse Gordon.

"Send her out here to me, and mind you have your cousin to yourself when you tell him. Keep Mrs. Heseltine and everyone else out of the room if possible."

With which instruction Punch found himself very much in accord. The Heseltine men were not much given to audiences when they were in grief. Nor to wearing their sorrows on their sleeves or anywhere else where they might be easily observed. The more astonishing then that Pam should instantly have divined from one glance at his cousin's mask-like face that something was wrong. Sickness seemed to have endowed him with a sense of second sight that he certainly did not possess in health.

"Out with it, Punch!"

"Bad news, old chap."

Pam Heseltine took the cigarette from his mouth and pressed it, red end down, on one of the breakfast plates still littering the table. A tightened, whitened look came about his lips. He knew it could not be the "old man." Punch would not make a song and dance about that piece of intelligence, for they were not hypocrites, and neither of them cared a tuppenny about the egotistical, unlovable, vindictive old Marquis. And it couldn't be Doria, for he had spoken to her through her door adjoining the dining room not ten minutes ago. And Punch, the next best, was here before him. Then?

"Not—not young Dick?" His voice broke and he knew the answer before it came.

"Yes," Punch answered gently, "young Dick. On the slopes above the Cresta."

Pam gave a low groan, like a man who has received a mortal thrust, and sat back closing his eyes. That old place! He saw it clearly as he had seen it many a time. Steep allures of whiteness and softness, untrodden, unspeakably inviting . . . the far ridges of pine prickling and darkling against a sky of dazzling blue . . . bright sunshine . . . rose-pink and hyacinthine shadows dancing under distant ice peaks. That old place! To go back on one of the Heseltines! And young Dick too!

"The best of the bunch!" he muttered.

"Yes—the best of us, Pam. Far better have been me."

Pam lifted his head and regarded his cousin with eyes grown desolate.

"Or better still me—for all the good I am in this blasted world. You will have children to carry on the old line. I never shall."

They did not know how long Doria had been with them before they noticed her, so softly had she opened the door from her room and remained standing like a lovely specter, in her jade-green wrapper, glimmering through her mysterious shroudings of tulle like a tinted pearl. At all events it was not necessary to repeat the tragic fact. She had gathered that at least, and when she spoke it was only to ask in subdued and mournful voice when it happened and how. But of course Punch could only repeat the bare event. The rest was surmise, until more news came in, but he and Pam, old skiers themselves, had already filled in details, just as they knew without telling that it could not have been the Cresta itself where the boy was killed, but those steep slopes above it, so treacherously liable to the avalanche that carries a man to swift and rushing death over the precipice. He had been careful not to bring the cable with him because of certain features in it unnecessary to obtrude upon his cousin's attention, and it was disconcerting to find Doria exhibiting an inconvenient curiosity.

"Where is the cablegram? How strange they should send it to you, Punch, instead of to us!"

"They knew Pam was ill, of course—or has been."

"Not strange at all," interrupted Pam harshly. "The old man looks upon me as as good as dead already—and you, my dear, don't come into it at all. Don't forget that. A different thing if we'd had children." His unhappy gaze fixed itself on her with a hostility that astonished Punch as much as the words. He had never known his cousin to speak to or look at his wife with anything but a cynical amusement tempered by tenderness. But what were these acrid mutterings that now fell from him? "If you'd chosen to have children!"—he gave her a bitter glance. "As it is you must remember that Punch comes next—Punch and his children." His head sagged wearily forward between his shoulders. "And a good thing, too!" he muttered.

This was miserably embarrassing to Punch. Unbearable indeed, and he got up hastily. The obligation of kinship that had brought him did not include listening to domestic recrimination, and he was astonished and annoyed at his cousin's attack even as he could not but admire Doria's mien under it. She stood there silent and proud, looking from one man to the other with a brooding reflectiveness.

"What really matters, old man"—Punch laid a hand on his cousin's shoulders in passing and spoke with a tenderness he could not withhold from that stricken man—"is that you should go on improving in health as you have done. And mind, I expect to see you as strong as I am myself when I get back in a month or two from Northern Rhodesia."

"Northern Rhodesia'!" Reflectiveness left Doria's gaze, giving place to a tense and quivering interest. The words leaped into the room like something alive. Even Pam, lost in his miserable thoughts, looked up inquiringly to his wife's face and seemed arrested by something he saw there. Meanwhile Punch was calmly propounding the matter of his sudden summons to Buluwayo and the unavoidability of an immediate departure.

"But Punch——"

Deliberately he ignored the pleading urgency of her eyes. They beckoned, they called, almost they wound arms about him. But keeping his careless air he held firm in his resolution.

Thus Punch saw her for the first time in the broad eye of day. And on Peril, Africa's morning sun enhanced a look of dawn and dew.

The Doctor examined the drink critically. "It seems to me," he said to Pam, "a good deal

"I'm afraid it can't be helped—I must asolutely say good by now. Much as I should like to look in again, it will be simply impossible—a hundred things to do before I go—got to catch the noon train or there'll be the dickens to pay."

"But Punch, I must speak to you before. Just wait until I get into a gown . . . I'll be out in the garden in a few minutes."

"By the way, the Doctor's in the garden waiting to come and see Pam. Must go, Doria—sorry, but I'm rushed to death this morning. Besides, I shall only be gone a couple of months at the outside . . . Now remember, Pam, my dear merchant, lighter in color than the stuff you had." "There, I knew it!" cried Doria in mock despair.

you're to be as fit as a fiddle when I return . . . Good by, Doria . . . So long, Pam."

By sheer dint of talking all the time and taking no note of anything said or looked at him, he got away at last. But he was breathing hard, like a man who has escaped a deep danger, when he rode off at a gallop down the road. And he managed the noon train without seeing anyone again.

Moreover he contrived to evade the telephone calls that pursued him throughout the morning whether in club or camp or town office, with a certain anonymous urgency. Someone was moving Heaven and earth to communicate with him, but that quality of iron in him resisted the demand. He intended to remain faithful to certain resolutions made the night before—resolutions that a man who considered himself a clean Englishman with a love of "the game" as played by "white men" had got to make, and keep. Fate had given a hand by calling him away from Umtété at this juncture. Also, there was something else . . . something had nestled in his hand and winged into the silent places of his heart. There was a girl with warm, honey-colored eyes. A pool of lilies!

Punch and Doctor Kelly walked together to Minto Lodge to tell Pam the news of young Dick's death

Pam Heseltine did not get over his brother's death as well as could have been hoped, considering the firm foundation his general health had regained. He brooded. And more than once in the first few weeks Doctor Kelly regretted that Punch should have been called away just then, for of all people that gay and amusing Policeman might have distracted the patient from his sorrow. Bruce Kelly, indeed, was astonished at the fund of grief revealed in the man. It seemed almost unnatural; as if the boy had been a son instead of a brother.

But that was just it. Dick had been more of a son than a brother, for when their mother died, in giving him birth, the elder boy, already of age, had expended all there was of generosity in him on the little motherless chap. Fathering him too, for their father died within a year and there was no one else but Pam to see young Dick through Eton scrapes and Oxford escapades. And always the younger son remained sweet and clean and gallant, and always the elder one in the worst moments of his extravagant career had been in the habit of thinking:

"Never mind. I'm a rotter, but there's Dick to carry on. Dick will make good. Dick's the boy!"

And now Dick's bright young flame had been blown out, and it seemed as if the world stood still for Pam Heseltine.

Not that he regretted or distrusted Punch in the position of heir, for after all Punch was his father's brother's son, blood of his blood, a true Heseltine. But somehow, no one—not even Punch himself—had ever thought of him as heir to the Marquisate. How, indeed, should they with three good lives between, and one of them a strong and hefty youngster in the flower of manhood?

Punch was all right, of course, but he didn't happen to be Dick. That was all. And when one is forty-five one is a bit late in acclimatizing oneself to new ideas and changed arrangements.

A bit late for everything in fact, thought Pam, except to brood over new griefs and old disappointments.

That old secret bitterness, for instance, of Doria's refusal to bear children. While Dick lived, the hurt of it had been kept from being too poignantly unbearable. But now . . . now, after all these years, he had upbraided her with it in the presence of Punch! Good Lord, it was unbelievable! What on earth could have come over him? And she had taken it like a saint!

and distract him. No longer did he need any other nurse.

And Doria could be a companion when she liked—the sort he had dreamed of in those sweet, halcyon days when he married her believing that life was going to be something more, at last, than a fevered round of pleasure. Yes, for a little while he had dreamed dreams, seen visions of a real life, with children about them . . . a son! . . . a son who would have saved him from himself! But Doria soon smashed up that dream; soon showed him that her views of life were only what his had been. Merely he had found another devotee of pleasure, one more avid for it even than himself. Except that her pleasures were different.

He didn't in fact know just what her pleasures were, for they had soon drifted apart and gone their different ways. But he knew that she enjoyed them, for always she had the air of one who ate and drank of pleasure. Her lips were red, her eyes intoxicated with it. She breathed and radiated love of it. That came at last to be the difference between them. Pleasure had brought him to the point of death, but Doria throve on it; perhaps because she never in all forgot those two essentials, her health and her beauty. Those always came first. Pam could even admire her for that. Nothing grudging about him. He could admire anything that was well done—even selfishness.

Never a word, then or after. Nor had she sulked. No, she had been a perfect angel ever since, as if she had been in the wrong, not he.

Yes, by degrees it became clear to him that from the day of Punch's bringing the bad news, Doria had become a changed woman. Freely and generously now she offered her companionship to him, feverishly she spent herself in efforts to entertain

But this new Doria—born on the day after Dick's death, and now nearly a month old—seemed to have no trace of selfishness in her. Rather was she a saint, a companion, a nurse; a mate such as he had dreamed of in those old days! And it was a strange and wonderful thing at last—she even seemed to be forgetting that passion for her own beauty which had always infuriated him even while he laughed at it. Her passion now—could it be true?—seemed to be for nothing but his society. The madness for her own beauty had passed. Sometimes even, when they were alone, she let him see her without shroudings and cloudings of veils, without scarlet paint on her lips or powder on her cheeks, looking a little worn perhaps, rather like a haggard angel bored with Heaven; but like that he found her ravishing.

And lately she had begun to make him promises. With her eyes and the touch of her lips on his she made him promises that beggared the richest moments he had known, bringing back the thrill of youth into his veins, making him wonder if he was mad to have thought it too late to find with her still those things he had dreamed of in the long ago.

After all, neither of them was really old. Certainly Doria was not. She could still look like a girl at times, even without her shroudings, especially at night, and she had kept every line and curve of her exquisite body. He was not old either—forty-five is not old. Not if a woman is learning to love you all over again—a beautiful woman like Doria.

If only he had not wasted and destroyed his health! But he would get it back again, he determined that at last, under her caresses and loving care. He would cast off this lethargy of grief for Dick, this depression of body and soul, and grow young again. He would do as Punch had bade him and become as "fit as a fiddle." These were the resolves that Pam Heseltine made within a month or so of his cousin's departure, filling his wife's eyes with tender, happy tears when he told her of them.

But deep in him he sometimes felt a dull foreboding that the decision came too late; that it did not lie in his own hands as it seemed to have done only a few weeks back. However, he said nothing to his wife of this, nor to his medical man. Pain and he had been fellow sojourners for so long that he had grown used to the companionship. And never had his been the rôle of whiner or quitter. Always without complaint he had taken the "medicine" so well earned by himself.

But lately he was often aware of a new and unknown element supplementing the old tortures, a different form of rack for his nervous system, a more subtle pair of pincers tearing his heart and brain, and though, privately, he considered it too much of a darned good thing, he did not complain. He just hoped it would pass. And after all, some parts of the day were free of it. The early morning hours were the worst, before anyone was about, and he suffered them alone, and said nothing. Gradually the misery passed, leaving a great weariness and exhaustion, but he pulled himself together and by afternoon felt considerably better; towards evening he had almost recovered. At dinner time he was at his best.

Afterwards, the night brought sleep instead of the old insomnia; but even in that something unusual and disconcerting obtruded itself. Heavy, dreamless sleep it was, a plunging into unconsciousness, like going deep into fathomless seas and feeling all the weight of them pressing him under, down, down. He would wake at last full of a nameless fear, a feeling as of some horrible fate escaped. Then, at about three in the morning, the pains would begin.

Naturally these things and the result of them were not lost upon one person's practiced eye. However silent and stoical the patient might be the Doctor knew well enough that the remarkable improvement of a month back was not being sustained, or renewed. Bruce Kelly watched Heseltine's newly-found color fade, his skin return to its parchmenty texture and his profile resume its hawklike sharpness; and it puzzled him considerably. The daily berry injections were being continued and always gave a good reaction. Yet each morning the Doctor detected something adverse, a slight change for the worse, a shade, a nuance, one that taken by itself would count for nothing. But when this happens daily—when shades and nuances accumulate—they can make a big shadow to sit upon a Doctor's mind and make him wear a worried look.

Yet for the moment there seemed nothing to be done to improve matters. He knew that the injections were the right thing, and had implicit faith in his own judgment. Moreover conditions generally were better now than when the treatment first started, and there seemed absolutely no reason why the patient should not at any time recommence his strides towards recovery. Cooler weather had set in, the sick man had become extraordinarily tractable, and it was plain to the dullest intelligence that domestic harmony reigned as it had never reigned before at Minto Lodge.

Even the Doctor's glance, vague for all things other than his work, could not but take in the transformation of the lovely Mrs. Heseltine into a devoted nurse and companion. And a wife utterly wrapped up in her husband's welfare, with no room in her mind for any other interest, is an edifying sight. She no longer went riding, though naturally there were plenty of aspirants to the position of escort left vacant by the absconded Policeman, including the Honorable John Camp, younger son of a war Peer, who sported the latest thing in spats and motors and was known briefly as On-Jon. But Doria persistently neglected all these and other social attractions that Umtété offered, so as to give herself more leisure at her husband's side.

In the end, Doctor Kelly had to remonstrate with her upon this very subject, for it became clear to him that she as well as the patient was losing weight. Indeed, Keable could have verified this observation, for the maid's massaging labors had lately become so light as to be practically negligible. Doria Heseltine kept thin nowadays without any extraneous assistance. The consuming fires of anxiety seemed to be doing the work which hitherto Keable's nimble fingers had so satisfactorily performed. At any rate Bruce Kelly did not at all approve of the look of strain she wore, and took it upon himself to insist that the daily hour she allowed herself out of doors and usually spent in the garden at The Hill should be extended to three, her place at Pam Heseltine's side to be taken meanwhile by Peril.

Doria withstood this at first, but the Doctor warned her that he did not intend to have another patient on his hands, and that if she failed to do as directed he should have to reinstate Nurse Gordon as a permanency, instead of only having her up from the hospital twice a day, which had for some time past been the arrangement.

At which threat Doria became docile in her turn, obediently fulfilled the condition of staying out a full three hours, and pleased the Doctor much by telling him that she had come to adore his garden as the loveliest spot in Rhodesia.

As for Peril, she found her "on duty" shifts with the patient strangely different from those of the past, either at the time when he expected to die and didn't give a hang anyway, or the later period when he had felt himself coming back to life and rejoiced in it like a child. The gay and cheerful Pam had disappeared as completely as the sardonic, obstreperous one, and though in a way this Pam seemed happier than either, it troubled her that he sat so still in his chair or lay so immobile on his sofa, never wanting to play cards now, nor appearing to take any pleasure in reading or conversation, but filled rather with an immense listlessness that yet seemed purely physical and in pathetic contrast to the fever of hope and longing in his eyes.

Almost as if he did not wish her to read that burning hope in them, he nearly always kept his eyes closed while Peril was with him, sometimes remaining silent for so long that the girl would feel a tremor of fear, and leave off reading, or make a slight noise for the sheer relief of seeing him lift his lids. But she could not help noticing that the return of Doria from her walk instantly cheered him up. The very sound of her step in the garden brightened his face. It was wonderful. Wonderful, too, the change in Doria, the care and consideration she now lavished on him, in place of the careless selfishness of the Doria Peril once had known.

After her return there would follow a jolly little interlude of talk and laughter, Pam would revive from his listlessness and Doria would mix him the sundowner he was once more permitted by Doctor Kelly to have, since a certain amount of stimulant and "bucking up" seemed to be generally indicated. Then Peril would leave them and go back by herself through the dusk, marveling a little, hoping much, fearing she knew not what, and thinking a great deal of one whose name she now scarcely ever heard. For so wrapped up in themselves were Doria and her husband that they had not a thought to spare between them, it seemed, for one who only a few weeks before stood daily on their doorstep, an ever welcome visitor. The name of Punch Heseltine never fell from their lips. It was as though he had ceased to exist, instead of being only a few hundred miles away somewhere in the same country, and due back at any time. Peril found it passing strange. Something in it, too, to resent. Yet surely she ought only to have been glad and happy to think of that happy pair she had just left together!

There was no ambiguity at all events about Pam Heseltine's contentment in being alone with his wife. This was the hour he had looked forward to all day, keeping quiet for it in the hope that all the sooner would pain fade. He could be fairly certain now of a few hours of temporary well being, and humble gratitude filled him that it should come at eventide, the time when he and Doria were usually alone.

What matter if he had to pay for it afterwards as he always did in bed, with the pangs of Hell, (Continued on page 148)

By FRANK R. ADAMS

Illustrations by Charles D. Mitchell

The Love Story of a Home Body

"Daylight"

DELIGHT BREWSTER'S father was one of those old time sentimental pessimists.

He frequently said: "I have nothing to live for. I would be much better off if I were dead."

Often he referred to Delight's mother—always in terms of his own grief, however. "When she passed on, the light of my existence went out. Nothing but eternal mourning was left for me." He was the sort of person who said "passed on" with a self-conscious sigh whenever he meant "died."

Naturally anyone as lugubrious as that was also subject to many bodily ailments. Say what you will about Doctor Coué, there is something in this idea of fooling the subconscious mind. Blaine Brewster rather welcomed physical debility—it gave him more grounds for his monologue to the effect that the universe did not wag so well as it had once, not for him anyway. So, noticing the "Welcome" on the mat, all the idle complaints in the world came in and sat down. He became a rendezvous for diseases, a club where they could meet and compare notes.

Thus he had "flu" regularly several times each winter, debilitating headaches almost daily, indigestion, heart attacks, rheumatism and nervous breakdown whenever he had time off from more engrossing sicknesses. Naturally such a succession of troubles left him "poorly" even in between spells.

He required a lot of attention and sympathy. If he didn't get it he threatened to be "gone some day when you come back from one of your pleasure jaunts."

You would scarcely believe that such a person existed nowadays except that you probably know one yourself. They're old-fashioned but not by any means extinct. Even irreverent "kidding" has failed to cheer them into the perhaps cynical but none the less comfortable modern attitude that "life is for the liver," and that while a Pollyanna is a pest a Blue Goop is vermiform superfluity.

The way Blaine Brewster sapped the best years of his daughter's young life would be a credit to any bat-vampire or succubus in legend or history. He was the albatross that, hanging around Delight's youthful neck, made her shunned by pleasure and pleasure seekers.

Quite naturally young men did not care to call just to listen to a diagnosis by an ubiquitous invalid smelling of eau de liniment; and to get Delight away from the house for a dance or even for a casual movie required so much plotting in advance, and was so apt to be frustrated by a sudden "attack" if her father suspected it, that finally even the most enterprising swains gave it up and sought entertainment with daughters who were less entangled.

Gradually Delight became a home body, almost a recluse, her sole dissipation being an occasional hour to herself in the garden of the Brewster place, or a romp with her dogs, of which there were several because she had two of assorted sexes to start with and could never bear to part with any that ensued.

Delight had a good view of old maidhood approaching in a galloping chariot. When she was twenty-four she could even hear the rhythm of the hoof beats.

Cupid had no chance of rescuing her in time except by a surprise attack.

One of the earliest recorded military stratagems had to do with a wooden horse which the Greeks left on the battlefield for the Trojans to drag inside their own walls.

It is still a good trick.

Not meaning exactly that there was anything wooden about Benjamin Van Vechten although he could look that way when he wanted to.

II

"Who is that girl and when do I meet her?"

"Which one?"

"She has gray eyes if I'm any judge at this distance, and her hosiery is impeccable and of a heather texture which is ordinarily very trying to ankles which are not drawn for the advertising pages of the ladies' magazines. Do I need to describe further or——"

"You mean Delight Brewster, I guess——"

"Correct. She looks as if that might be her name. Now when do I foregather with her to exchange opinions about palmistry, Freud and anything else we happen to know?"

"You don't," Van Vechten's host denied.

"Interesting even if untrue. You know my nature. It is not necessary to spur me on by throwing obstacles in my path. I'm sold on this proposition already."

"You don't understand," Ben's friend explained patiently. "Delight is a sweet girl and all that but it takes so much time and effort to get acquainted with her that from an efficiency standpoint it isn't a good investment."

"Elucidate, Ivan."

Ivan elucidated, putting before his guest all the facts which were set forth in the opening sentences of this narrative, and adding a few opinions of his own anent the character of Blaine Brewster, whom he characterized as "a he-hen with the pip."

Ben considered the case. "You are quite right in your supposition that the ordinary approach is worse than useless in this particular instance. But I'm sorry for the girl—much sorrier than I would be if she were homely—and I'd like to show her a good time."

"As she has not had much amusement for the last ten years I imagine that even you could do it," Ivan remarked encouragingly; "that is, if you got the chance."

"I'll get it."

"How?"

"It's so darn simple I'm afraid you might be able to do it yourself if I told you. I'll start tomorrow. All I ask of you is not to introduce me to anyone else in town until I get going. I'm here incognito from now on."

"See here, Ben," Ivan protested seriously, "I won't stand for having you trifle with Delight's affections. Neither would anybody else in this town. For, while none of the fellows go with her because her father is such a pill, still nearly every one of us has been in love with her at one time or another—from a distance, you understand—and we would gladly provide melted paving material and goose fur for any sheik who damages her heart."

"My dear friend, you have mistaken mere conversational levity for actual flippancy of purpose. I have never been any more serious even in a woodshed with my father in the days before I had discovered the prophylactic qualities of a geography in the seat of the trousers."

"You don't mean to say that you have already made up your mind that you want to marry her?"

"I can't say exactly but I'll let you know say a week from today after I've found out if her lips were made for kisses or only for conversation."

Ivan regarded his friend coldly. "Delight Brewster is not that kind of a girl."

"My dear boy, all girls are that kind of girls. It was God's idea to make 'em that way. Don't think because you may have failed yourself that a cosmopolitan fusser of wide experience like——"

"Humph!"

"Your tone implies doubt. One hundred dollars I can inside of a week."

"I don't want your money."

"You won't get it. I may have to marry her to win, but you have to admit that a girl who has been trained the way she has would make a wonderful wife for a selfish man like myself."

"Do you want me to take you there to call this evening?"

"I do not. An introduction from you would be a distinct handicap. No offense meant, of course."

"I can see that. Won't you cut yourself a piece of cake?"

"I would really prefer to go about this in my own way but I'll tell you what. If you'll meet me at Miss Brewster's house Wednesday evening I'll let you know how things are going."

"What do you mean 'meet at her house'? How will you get there?"

"Have no fear, I'll be there. All you have to do is to be there yourself with an open ear."

III

And on Wednesday evening Ivan Jones startled the world, also the Brewsters, by calling. They were not accustomed to having social visitors.

"Father is not very well," Delight explained doubtfully.

Ivan had known her too long to be dampened by that announcement. "I'm sorry. It must be very inconvenient for you."

"I wasn't thinking of myself."

"You never are, sweet child. That's why we all adore you—even if we are forced to do it distantly."

"Say some more, Ivan. I haven't listened to a good blarneyer for a long time and I believe it's just the tonic I need."

"Good. Then come with me and I'll take you on for a riotous evening at the Club Royale where they have an orchestra that is so wicked it ought to be arrested. Come with me and I'll breathe discreet sweet nothings in your ear all the evening. What say?"

Ivan had a double purpose in his invitation. One of them was a secret hope that he could get Delight out of the house before Ben Van Vechten arrived and thus ruin the latter's plans. Ivan did not approve of them anyway.

"I'd like to," Delight answered after a moment's hesitation, "but there is no one I could leave in charge of father."

"All the servants out?"

"All except Ben."

"Ben?" An echo of alarm crept into Ivan's voice in spite of himself, an inkling that something was not as it should be. "Ben who?"

"He hasn't told us his last name yet and as he doesn't understand any English I haven't been able to question him much."

"Oh, I see! You'll pardon my curiosity, sweet lady, but how, when and why did you hire this—this—er——"

"He came to the door yesterday asking for something to eat. The cook, who couldn't understand him, flatteringly sent for me. He didn't look like a professional tramp. He was neat and clean even if his clothes did not fit. I couldn't make out what he tried to say either but I guessed that he was hungry and gave him a handout.

"Later in the day the cook came to me and said he was still around working in the yard. I went out to tell him that he had done enough to pay for his dinner but he only grinned idiotically and kissed my hand—I guess he must be a peasant or something from some country where that sort of thing is the custom. Anyway I couldn't get rid of him and he looks as if he was going to be the best combined house and yard man we ever had, so I think I'll let him stay. Besides all that he is very wonderful with father. Seems to know just what dad wants without being told and is as gentle as a baby with him."

"I see. But Delight, child, don't you realize what fearful risks you are taking when you admit to domestic service, inside your house even, an oaf about whom you know nothing, a man who is doubtless one of the scum of Europe?"

"Oh, I'm sure no one could doubt Ben's character after looking at his face!"

"Well, I'm willing to submit myself to the test. May I see him?"

"Y-yes." Hesitantly. "He's with father now but I think it is early enough yet for father to welcome a caller. Will you come up to his room?"

Ivan did not want to but he went. Curiosity was one of the compelling causes.

The sick room smelled depressingly of stale medicines. An analytical nose could doubtless have sorted out the odors of half the stock of a modern pharmacy. There was only one light, one of those flexible arm standard floor lamps with a hooded bulb that threw the rays downward and left the upper part of the room in shadow.

Mr. Brewster was propped up in bed, a great hulk of a man a sort of puddle of decayed power. He had heavy jowls that made him look a little like a mastiff—they pulled on his lower eyelids and gave him a sad expression. Perhaps it was looking in a mirror which had first given Blaine the idea that he was an invalid.

Apparently Ben's cranium was filled with an exceptionally durable mixture of cement and gravel.

Beside the bed stood a younger man, also powerful but lithe. He was rubbing the invalid's forehead with something pungent.

"Father, Mr. Jones has come to call on you."

"How do you do, Mr. Jones. Sit down here beside my bed and tell me if you ever in your life heard of a case similar to the one I seem to be developing. The symptoms so far are like——"

"This pie-faced individual is Ben?" Ivan interrupted with a question.

"Yes, but don't be rude."

"You said he didn't understand English."

"He doesn't but I do and I will not have him maligned."

"I can't help expressing my honest opinion, can I? I'd be very wrong if I did not. I think this man is a villain. He has a hard face. Notice the square head on him, too, and the dents where the bumps of kindness and consideration ought to be. My advice to you is to get rid of him as soon as possible. Look at the fiendish expression on his countenance now."

"That's probably because he senses your antagonism. He never looks at me that way."

To prove it Ben dropped swiftly on one knee and pressed his lips to the girl's hand. In his eyes was a look of melting adoration, the expression a calf undergoing the preliminary stages of weaning.

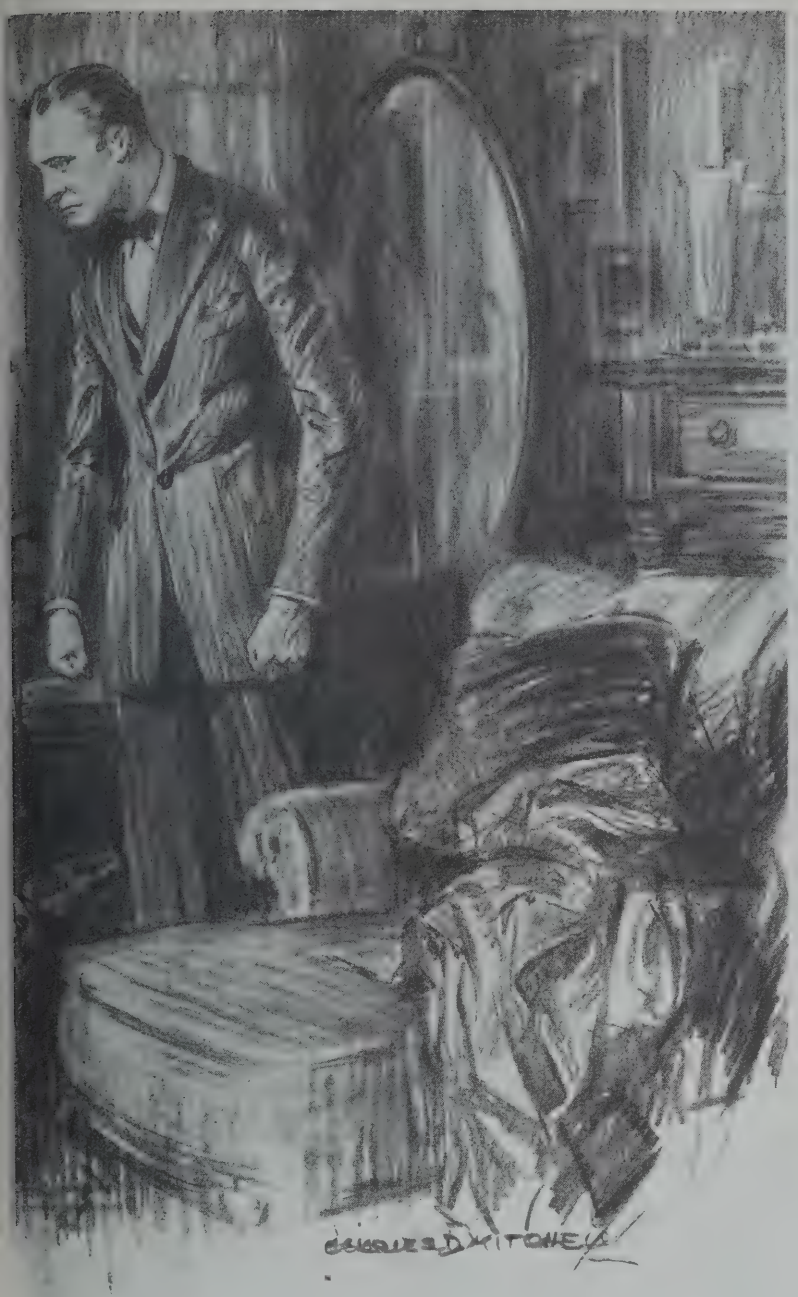
"Don't you strike him," Delight commanded as Ivan stepped threateningly forward. "It's only his quaint foreign way of expressing thanks. It doesn't mean anything."

"Mr. Brewster," Ivan appealed, "are you going to let this unrecommended, uneducated immigrant become an intimate of your household?"

All turned to the tyrannical old invalid, even Ben. After all the word of Paterfamilias Brewster was still law in that household.

"Well," declared Blaine as if weighing the proposition for the first time, "yesterday I would have agreed with you, Mr. Jones, and would have fired him out of the house even if I had been obliged to leave my couch of pain in order to do it. But today, after having had him rub my back and lift me around in bed like I was a feather, I wouldn't think of letting him go under any consideration. No man could be a villain who understands my illness the way he does. That's my decision. He stays as long as he wants to."

Ivan glanced at the uneducated immigrant, who slowly pulled down his left eyelid and made a swift gesture as of one who cuts himself a piece of cake.



IV

It was the next day that Ben sprung the nickname by which she was to be known to him forever after.

Before that he had always touched her on the sleeve when he wished to call her attention, but he had heard her father address her by name and out of a clear sky he came to her and said "Mees Daylight" and motioned to indicate that he wanted her to follow him out into the yard. She did not correct his pronunciation but she made a mental note to begin teaching him the elements of the English language.

The first lesson came that afternoon. She had a little time to herself while her father was taking a nap and she found Ben working on the tulip beds in the yard—he did know something about horticulture apparently.

Delight brought an atlas with her, the idea being to combine several sorts of knowledge in one dose.

"Don't you strike him," Delight commanded as Ivan Jones stepped threateningly forward.

"Ben," she said arrestingly, "come here." The motion she ade with her arm supplemented the speech and he understood rfectly. There were two words learned already, she thought. To test him out she moved away and said "Come here" again, thout the gesture.

Ben looked at her with a pathetic attempt at comprehension t made no move.

"Come here," she repeated. No reaction. "Come here!" ore emphasis and a stamping of the foot. "Come here!"

A light burst upon Ben's eager countenance. He smiled atifically and then gravely flopped down on the grass and lled over as he had seen the dogs do when Delight put them rough their one trick.

Delight kept from laughing in order not to hurt her slave's elings. It was hard to do because Ben stayed down, looking , much as the dogs did, for her permission to rise.

She finally remembered the signal and snapped her fingers. n scrambled to his feet with alacrity and stood poised with a in of self-congratulation on his face and an expression that ght be interpreted as willingness to do anything else she might ggest from retrieving a ball to going for a walk on a leash.

Taking no chances this time Delight guided him by hand to a stic garden bench, invited him by gesture to sit beside her and ened the atlas to a map showing the world in two hemispheres. On the theory that maps must be pretty much the same in languages she pointed out that portion of North America labeled "United States" and said "My country, my country, my country," over and over again. Then she pointed to him and inquired with a rising inflection "Your country?" She felt that it would help considerably in further lessons to know his nationality. She might even get a dictionary of his language as a working basis for a better understanding.

"Your country?" she repeated.

Ben nodded his head in proud comprehension. He had absorbed the idea and with finger poised he bent for a close inspection of the map, his lips working soundlessly as if he were trying to pronounce some of the unfamiliar names that were printed on the page. Finally he indicated that he had found what he wanted and triumphantly planted his index on a spot almost in the center of Africa.

"My country, my country, my country," he chanted in correct imitation of Delight's own announcement the moment before.

"No, no, no," Delight contradicted, shaking her head violently. "That's impossible. You're whiter than most men. Blonds do not come from the Congo."

But Ben insisted with much nodding of the head and vehement reiteration of the words "My country, Mees Daylight," until finally his preceptress gave up in despair without having secured a clue to his nationality.

Either Ben's cranium was filled with an exceptionally durable mixture of cement and gravel or else she was a veritable oil can as a teacher.

V

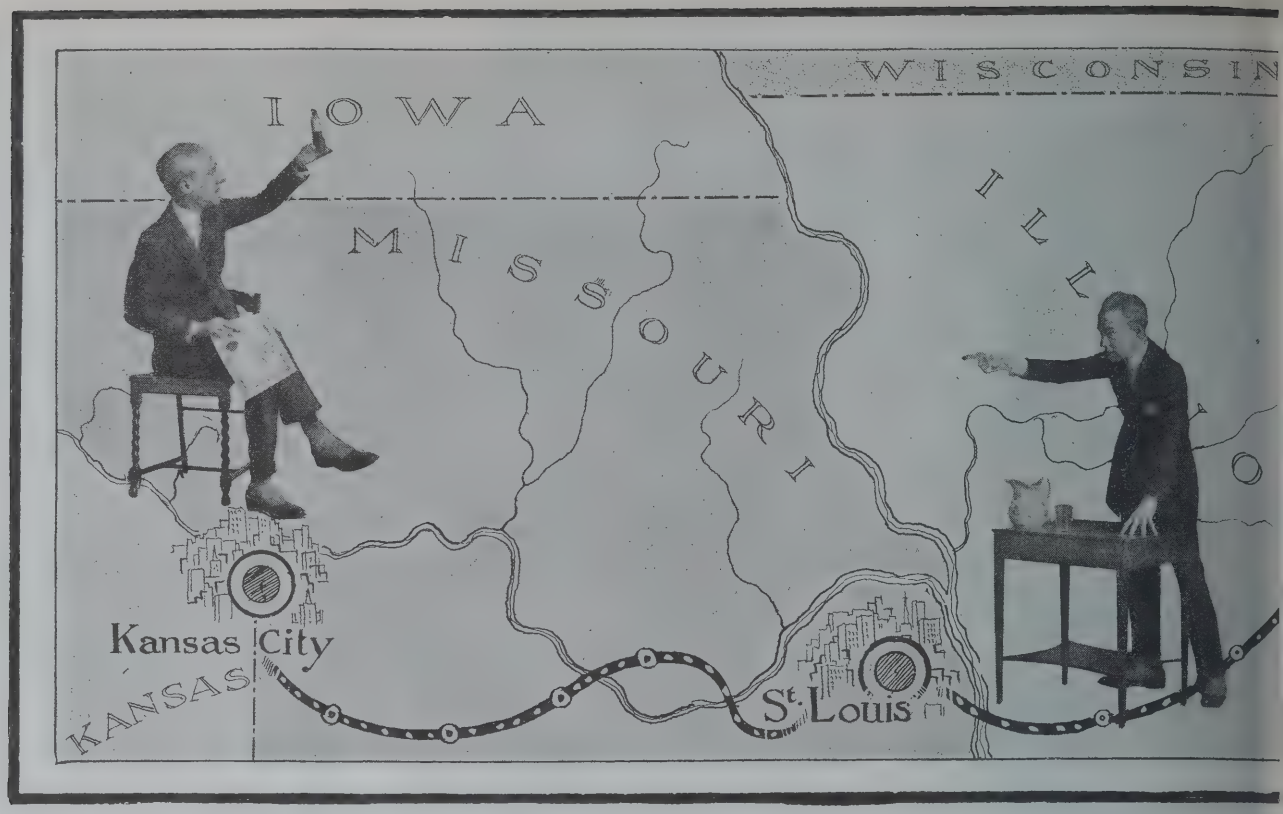
For one who showed no aptitude whatever for learning the spoken language Ben displayed a remarkable mastery of written English. Witness a letter to Ivan Jones composed one night in the privacy of Ben's room during an interlude when his services were not required by the tyrannical Mr. Brewster.

Dear Ivan (it ran):

I have your scurrilous note smuggled in by your servant who has the efficient furtiveness of a bootlegger. I am not the scoundrel you seem to imply. I might classify as all of the things you say I am were it not for the fact that I am up to my neck in love with "Daylight." God in his infinite artistry never created any other woman so adorable. You, who only know the front she puts on for outsiders, cannot possibly appreciate the wonder of her as I do from my dumb vantage point inside the family circle.

Knowing her convinces me that there is something after all in the old-fashioned and oriental idea of raising girls in seclusion. It has been successful in "Daylight's" case most certainly. She is mature physically and yet her growth in sophistication has been charmingly retarded. You've no idea how much not knowing things adds to the interest which she holds for her prospective—I hope and pray—husband.

Think of the fascination of a vibrant feminine young person with a wicked twinkle in her eye who doesn't know it is there and, if she did, would never guess that the God of Natural Selection put it there as bait.



Doesn't "Daylight" suit her perfectly as a name? Not the name by which she is to be known to the world but as the heart monniker of the man who is to love her for all time. Boy, I hate to annoy you by raving, but I might as well tell you there wouldn't be any more illumination as far as I'm concerned if "Daylight" should disappear out of my life. She's the vivid flame that has supplanted all other altar fires and, if she'll let me, I'm going to be kneeling before it the day that I die.

The reason I write this to you is, first of all, because I've got to tell somebody about the way my love-gizzard is acting or else I'll bust. I've got to stay bottled up around here, must be a dumb Isaac in the presence of my heart's desire. The other reason for this letter is to tell you that the bet I made you that I would kiss her inside of a week is——

Ben stopped abruptly in his writing and listened.

"Ting!—Ting!—Ting!"

Three taps on Blaine Brewster's bedside bell. In the Brewster household that signal had much the same significance as a 4-11 fire alarm in a great city. It meant (Continued on page 104)

CAMPING OUT

MY UNCLE—the one who made the round trip to Denver but withal is democratic and easy to meet—has been imploring me to see more of the world.

He bulges with quaint aphorisms and things. Such as "Don't get in a rut!" and "Travel broadens the mind."

So, heeding the avuncular admonition, I recently trekked out to what Broadway calls "the sticks."

The first stop was in Chicago. I was there last with Uncle during the World's Fair. While he was out buying the Masonic Temple I was hopping over hot air registers in the hotel lobby.

Of course, I was a callow youth then. Fate had not long before yanked me away from the business end of a Missouri plow. But years in New York had applied a coating of sophistry. Some folks even referred to me as a typical New Yorker. (A typical New Yorker is one who permits a Tarzan the Apes to snatch his hat in a café, calls Florenz Ziegfeld "Flo" and Delmonico's "Del's.")

I wore my russet-brown greatcoat, vulgarly termed the overcoat, my pearl-white London hat, and I carried with a certain Fifth Avenue swank an ivory-knobbed cane.

As the final "wow" I wore a zebra-striped collar. It was the one that caused a dowager at a theatrical first night to lift her lorgnette at me from a box and exclaim "Fawncy!" I'll say it is.

At the Chicago terminal—or whatever they are calling depots these days—I spurned vehicular conveyances to walk to my hotel. Going down a flight of steps my cane mixed up with my traveling bag and I snapped into a little Chaplin dance.

Some rough—at least he lacked everyday niceties—person shouted, "Don't let it throw you, cowboy." That was silly. I never rode the range in my life.

It was an auspicious moment that I turned into Michigan Boulevard. The famous thoroughfare was flooded with bright afternoon sunshine and lively with promenaders.

Inconsequential, but en passant—there's a neatly turned eight dollar phrase for you—I noticed a vivacious young thing eyeing me. I flicked a bit of imaginary fluff from my coat sleeve, trying not to appear self-conscious. Uncle always said adventure was just around the corner. That's Uncle—a quotation for everything. But no adventure this time. The young lady merely turned to her companion and inquired, "What's the advertising gag?" I didn't wince. Experts have kidded me.

At the Chicago hotel I felt a certain conspicuousness registering from New York. I did not want to appear uppity. I was once a clerk in a country hotel and if I do say so a competent one. I could harpoon the raw potato with the guest's pen every time. Zip! Like that! Indeed I have a clipping from the Plattsburg, Mo., Leader referring to me as "Our Popular Knight of the Quill." When a baking powder drummer registered from New York I immediately assigned him to No. 6—the one with the two chairs and the waxed doves in a glass case.

The Chicago clerk, after adjusting the scarf twice, giving a meticulous polish to the nails and discussing the bill at Keith's with the telephone girl, spun the register around, eyed my cane and coat and inquired, "Are you a professional?" I shook my head. He mumbled something about a minstrel show being in town.

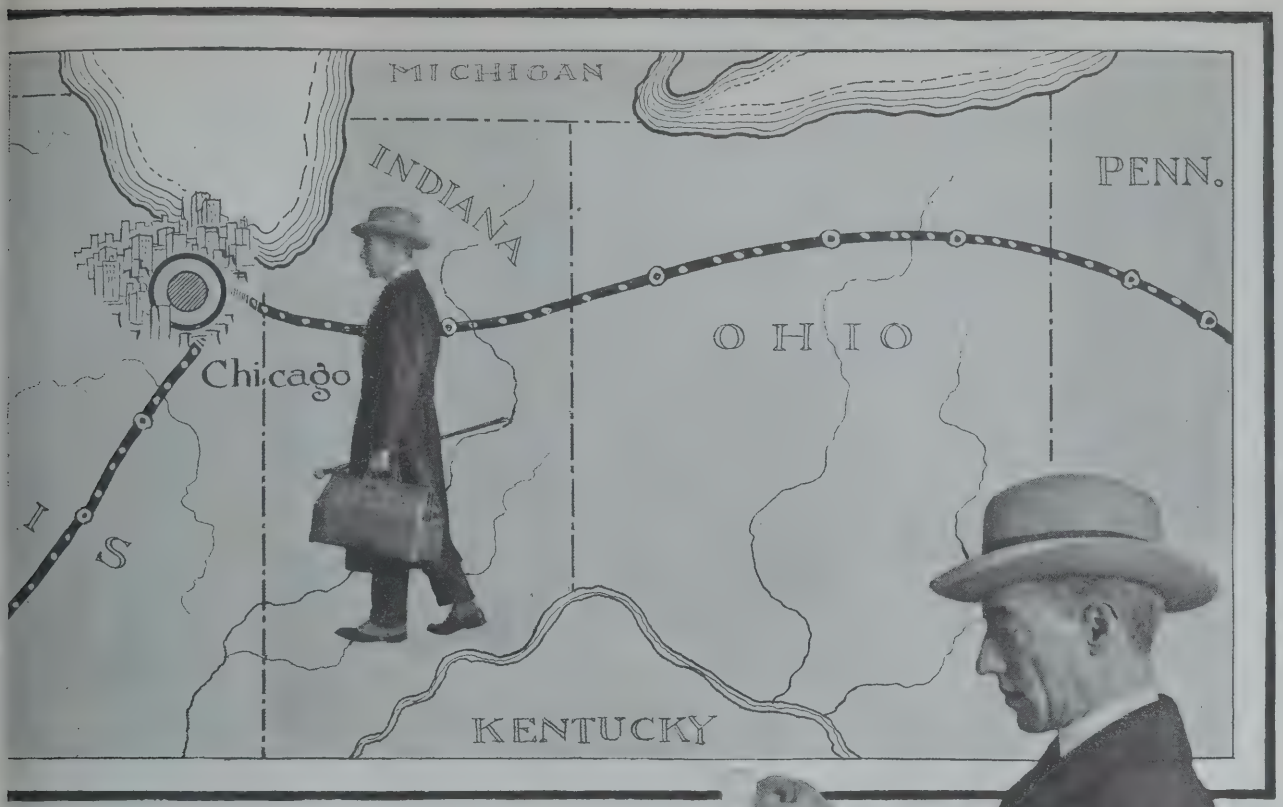
I was pleasantly surprised to find Chicago hotels have hot and cold running water in the rooms, French menus and electric lights. They are to pave the streets in the spring and may get the G. A. R. convention.

From Chicago I journeyed to Kansas City. I have been all over Europe and never climbed an Alp but when you reach Kansas City buy an alpenstock, put a feather in your hat learn a couple of yodeling songs and ha ha Switzerland.

Leaping deftly from crag to crag I reached mid-town without throwing a shoe or jostling my new bridge work.

A taxicab driver, after nearly running me down, asked me how I liked the city. There was a suspicion of jeer in his voice.

Kansas City has more than one hotel—perhaps several. There are street cars, stores, and while I was not out across the tracks I understood they are building a new creamery. I hope they paint it pink. It seems to me that pink creameries are always the prettiest.



It is a warm-hearted city. A prosperous oil well owner called at my hotel. He owns vast acres in Oklahoma. Two of his managers called him up while he was in my room with excellent news. He showed me samples of crude oil. That, you know, is the oil which is crudest when rubbed in the hair.

Without a hint of suggestion from me, he permitted me to become a small shareholder. They allot only a small amount to each subscriber to keep it out of the hands of "the interests."

Going through one of the street arcades—for which they only charged the nominal sum of twenty-five cents—I was impressed with the metropolitan air of the shops. Many of them deliver purchases just as they do in New York.

St. Louis next claimed my attention. It is the custom in the provinces to have a slogan for each municipality. St. Louis is considering this one:

First in shoes! First in booze! And last in both leagues.

By O. O. McINTYRE

Rodolph Valentino was there and he and I were the guests of honor at a dinner. But that was no reason why one of the guests should shake hands with me and say "Glad to meet you, Mr. Turpin!"

The Mayor of St. Louis also invited us out to the zoological gardens one day. As a mark of courtesy they had named a monkey after me. And while I was there I heard a lady say to the keeper, "What time does McIntyre swing by his tail?" The idea!

Later at the walrus pit a bull walrus did what vaudeville calls a sitting standing dive and deluged me with muddy water. I hope he gets the toothache.

In St. Louis also I was broadgabbed over the radio. It is like shouting through a knot hole but it gave me courage to make a speech later before an advertising club. I should have entertained with a ukulele solo. All they needed to do was to put one in my hands and I would have done the rest, without a rehearsal.

It wasn't much of a speech and I didn't mind a fellow calling "Louder," but I think the fellow in the back of the hall with a flock of double chins who shouted "Yes, and funnier" might have restrained himself. Such remarks do not come under the head of Sophisticated Crevice. Boston for wise crack.

In the morning a St. Louis paper ran my picture and a later mail brought a letter from a surgical institute saying, "We make over the face without danger."

I know a cheaper way. But why should I twit Jack Dempsey?

Reflection convinces me a typical New Yorker should stay on his own little island. He is not so conspicuous. I know men who can wear white spats without blushing right on the Avenue.

In a dining car passing through what Meredith Nicholson in picturesque slang terms the "corn belt" I reached across the table for something or other and the gentleman opposite looked at my wrist watch and gave vent to a contemptuous sniff. Tiny, but a sniff just the same.

I did not sniff once at the "rheumatism ring" he was wearing. Vive and let vive—as Uncle says.

Neither did I appear bored in the smoker later when the same gentleman cornered a congressman and demanded to know if he "was for or against free seeds."

Several public questions interest me more. I am of that tranquil temperament that can accept a seed or let it alone. I have struggled through an entire session of Congress without writing our congressman for a single seed.

It was not until I stepped foot in New York again that I really felt at home. I hurried to my favorite slot in the Automat and then, following a custom of years, trickled over to the Ritz foyer to mingle with the other "guests."

It was good to feel that no matter what they thought of me in "the sticks," here I was still "a typical New Yorker."

Isabel Hall was like thousands of girls today. Not bad; innocent, rather; overflowing with verve, keenly alive to romance, determined to get all the joy she could out of life. But going about it without any sympathy or guidance from wiser heads, until her path led her straight to the edge of a pitfall.

With its extraordinary understanding of a phase of modern youth, this story might be called a Parable of Today.

By INEZ
HAYNES IRWIN

The Story of

Isabel

Illustrations by F. R. Gruger

THE DAY was radiant; clear and hazy, warm and crisp at the same time—perfect weather for a party. Still the telephone call which she expected from Amy did not come. Shadow-eyed, wan, Isabel tried to make herself believe that she was not bitterly disappointed.

"Perhaps it's just as well that Amy couldn't arrange it," she made herself reflect. "I'll have to get some sleep soon or zowie, I'll blow up. And sometime, when we least expect it, we're going to get caught at this game." But underneath she knew that with every jangled nerve she longed for that party. She yearned to see Bid Carleton again. Bid was so brutal and so tender. He frightened her even when he fascinated her——

The telephone rang.

Prickling with an instant alertness, she leaped to her feet, gave a quick, furtive glance about. The way was clear. Della Eff's wordless vocal improvisations, modified by the closed doors to a high sibilant humming, came from the kitchen. Della could not hear. Aunt Mattie sat—in the full blaze of the October morning—outside in the sun parlor, newspaper in hand. Her whole flat face—so innocently benign—seemed to be drawing the news through her moon-spectacled eyes somewhat as the sun draws water through the air rifts in a clouded sky. She could not hear. Isabel slipped into the hall; took the receiver off the hook.

"'Lo," she called, with a soft suppressed eagerness, into the transmitter.

Amy Valentine's pretty voice—its chiseled quality a little exaggerated by an elaborate casualness—came in answer to her. "May I speak with Miss Isabel Hall?"

Amy's voice tore Isabel's fatigue away. Mirth bubbled to the surface of her mind. But she suppressed her impulse to laugh at the perfection of Amy's acting. She said, "This is Isabel Hall!"

"Oh, how stupid of me! This is Amy Valentine, Isabel."

"I thought it was your voice," Isabel declared. Out of the corner of her eye she saw that Aunt Mattie had dropped her paper; was awaiting with resignation her summons to the telephone.

"It isn't a wayward girl, Aunt Mattie," she called reassuringly, her lips at such an angle to the transmitter that Amy must get the comic effect of her words. "It's only Amy Valentine." Simultaneously with the explosion of airy mirth which came over the wire from Amy, sounded Aunt Mattie's murmured: "Oh, I was afraid it was the Rest Home saying Della'd have to leave! I'll be sorry to lose Della. She's so——"

"I'm telephoning from my room," Amy went on with what seemed like irrelevance. "I'm just getting up. I don't know why I didn't wait until breakfast but I was just wondering if you would come here to dinner and to spend the night. There are two men visiting us this week-end and——"

Isabel's heart gave a great leap. Was Bid one of them? The other was probably Jerry Kitchen. But she did not care who the other was if only Bid . . . Amy rattled on with her premeditated carelessness.

"It's so awkward having two on your hands at once. Father said I'd better invite somebody to be here with me as he's so busy."

Miss Hall had arisen, was heading with her slow, flat-footed amble towards the garden.

"Aunt Mattie," Isabel called after her. "Aunt Mattie!" And as her aunt paused, she threw out in a breath, "Amy Valentine wants to know if I can go over there for dinner and to spend the night."

Isabel fell easily into the attitudes and motions of awaiting her aunt's answer.

"Why ye-us! Ye-us!" it came. How Isabel hated that slow countrified, "Ye-us!" of Aunt Mattie's meditative moments. "Yes, certainly!" This yes was decisive enough. And indeed Isabel knew that her aunt was uncalculatingly glad to have her on visiting terms with a family so important as the Valentines. How surprised Aunt Mattie would be if she knew how seldom she entered the Valentine house! Isabel added in unnecessary

They passed what Isabel considered a wonderful evening. The Three Cities was a big road afterthought, "Amy'll come for me in the car." Then into the receiver, "Auntie says yes, Amy. What time?"

"Oh, I'm so glad, Isabel! Quarter to seven. By!"

"By!" Isabel hung up. Her gray eyes—they seemed to blacken instead of brighten as the tide of her mirth flowed into them—fixed on her aunt's retreating figure. Aunt Mattie, walking straight toward blue sky and blue sea, stopped at the dahlia bed. She was good for at least fifteen minutes there, examining the plushy geometric blossoms which were her pride; picking fresh bunches for the house. Isabel waited an interval to give Amy time to come downstairs from her room to her father's library.

In that moment she saw Della Eff's figure, passing noiselessly from the kitchen into the dining room, outlined a pink silhouette against the door of frosted glass which separated the front hall from the back hall. A point of light at the level of Della's mouth—the opaque glass turned it orange—suddenly flared to a rosy glow; diminished to a point again. Then a white hand blurred up, tweaked it away.

Isabel's augmenting mirth poured jet into her gray eyes. "Della thought she'd camouflaged that smoke perfectly!" she mused. "Wait till I tell Amy! It'll burn her up!"

She took off the receiver, called a number into the telephone.

"May I speak with Miss Amy Valentine?" she asked of the voice at the other end of the wire.

"I'll see, ma'am!" the voice answered. Sounded the tattoo of heavy steps bundling away from the telephone . . . light steps flying to it . . . then Amy's voice cool to the chilling point:

"Hullo! Hullo! This is Miss Valentine!"

"Oh, Amy!" Isabel said, her acting not quite so authentic, she felt, as Amy's, "how strange I did not recognize your voice! Amy, my aunt would like you to come here tonight for dinner and to spend the week-end with us."

"How sweet of her!" Amy replied in her most dulcet voice, her most charming accent. "I think it would be perfectly ducky. Of course I'll have to ask father. Wait a moment, please."

Her voice died away from the telephone. Isabel heard muffled: "Father, Miss Hall has invited me to spend the week-end at Little Finger. May I go?"

Pause. Silence. Amy's voice. "Hullo! Hullo! Isabel dear, father says I may go. What time?"

"Quarter to seven," Isabel answered with civil terseness. And at this her mirth rolled back too hard upon her. "Good by, house. The food was delicious, and expensive. The dancing crowd was a heterogeneous miscellany.

Amy," she broke off abruptly. She hung up; leaned her head on her arm; quivered and gurgled.

And then Della Eff—how in the world had she got there; she must have gone out the dining room door and circled the house—appeared at the front door. Of course the girl could not have heard anything . . . Just the same she was going to tell Amy that notwithstanding the fun they got out of their double game they simply must not telephone from their houses again. It was easy enough for Isabel with only Aunt Mattie and Della Eff. But at the Valentine house where there were telephone extensions and anybody could listen in . . .

Della was waiting in the doorway as if to say something. What a figure the girl had—an arrow for slimness and delicate erect curving. She wore her pink gingham bungalow apron as though it were a Paris model. And the wind-blown fleece of her bobbed hair was like spun honey.

"Oh, Miss Hall!" Della said, "I forgot to tell you at breakfast a feller of the name of Wood Vining phoned 'fore you was up. He wouldn't let me wake you but said he was goin' away for two days and he gimme a phone number—it's there on the pad. He said he'd like you should phone him, sometime tomorrow after—if you're gonna be home tomorrow night."

"Thanks, Della."

Woodie Vining! Why, it was three months since Isabel had seen him! What a long way she had traveled since then and how far she had left Woodie behind. Amy had done that for her. Woodie was so small-towny, so serious, so slow. Amy's words for those traits were provincial, bourgeois, middle-class.

Isabel dressed with care and precision that night. Her sage-green suit; the flesh-colored georgette blouse that was more than half filet lace; the sage-green beaver hat with the exquisite feather drooping at one broad-brimmed side; her soft gray fur. Not that it made any difference how she dressed; she could not compete, she could never even compare with Amy. Amy Valentine was, Isabel thought, the most beautiful girl she had ever known. Amy had, in Isabel's opinion, not only beauty but class. Amy had so much—it was one of Amy's own words—manner . . . her very beauty had manner . . .

Isabel leaned forward to the mirror and gazed into her own eyes. Of course she had looks of a kind. Indeed, she had thought herself, well, yes, beautiful, until Amy had come to offer the contrast of her physical exquisiteness, her trained personality. And as it was, she had her points. Eyes, for instance, her best feature, wide, gray, reed-lashed. But how much she preferred Amy's. Long, narrow, blue-green, Amy's eyes could turn in a flash from frozen turquoise pools to sun-kissed jade lakes.

But granted eyes, Isabel considered that her own looks ran in a diminishing scale of beauty through the spread-petal crimson of her mouth—how she admired the thinnish pinkness of Amy's fragilely curved lips—to the tragedy of her nose. Her nose had started all right. The line from brow to tip was as true as though planed; but from the instant of junction with the upper lip—how could it be so perverse—it tilted directly upward. Amy's nose was the perfection of straight regularity . . . transparent in the bridge.

Isabel morosely contemplated her hair; its turbulent abundance seemed to show even a silvery light when she compared it with the slim folds, melted from a golden metal touched with green, that were Amy's tractable tresses. Did her dimples help or hurt?—those shallow evanescences which floated to the surface of her face at such inopportune moments . . . Now certainly they seemed to accent the leaden wanness of her look. Perhaps Amy and she were going at too great a pace. Certainly sometimes they were both dead for sleep.

Isabel lightly filmed her cheek with rouge; dug deep along the firm outlines of her lips with a crimson stick; smoothed her brows with a black pencil. She came up under the make-up like a faded painting under the restorer. She touched her lashes . . .

"Say, girlie, you hadn't oughter use the pencil on your eyewinkers!" a voice interrupted. In the glass, Isabel saw that Della Eff was standing in the doorway. "Your aunt sent me up with these sheets," she interposed deft explanation before Isabel could speak. "What you wanta get is Maserine. It's liquid; but it don't make your eyes smart and it sticks. Comes in a litta bitta red bottle."

Isabel braced herself. Della was the first of a long succession of Aunt Mattie's wayward girls—how Isabel loathed having them in the house!—whom she had ever had to put in her place. Stupid they had been, some of them, ugly tempered, morose, sly, inquisitive and lying; but she had never had to deal with familiarity before. She must do it now. A picture flashed across her consciousness of Amy handling the situation. How contemptuous would be her chilling glance . . . how icy her few words . . .

"Della," she said crisply, "when I want your advice I'll ask for it. Otherwise I'll be infinitely obliged if you'll keep it to yourself."

Inwardly, the instant the words dropped, she was conscious of a little trepidant wonder as to how Della would take this. And her mind leaped back to a scene between Amy and Della. She had told Amy all she knew about the girl.

"She's one who never would tell who the man was," she explained briefly. "The child died."

Amy sparkled with the cut-silver sparkle which her mirth developed when it was disdainful. "Some sport!" she pronounced. "I want to meet her. Just the same, of course, she was an awful fool."

Isabel took Amy into the kitchen, performed the rite of introduction. The instant she opened her mouth she knew that Della guessed that she had told Amy. Inwardly she quailed. But Della had held her own perfectly; her hard, violently vivid blue eyes straight on Amy's the whole time. Amy's long eyes were not so languid as usual. They never left Della's either. The two glances crossed like wary swords. Somehow, Isabel felt, it was as though she herself were not in the room at all . . . As for Amy—Amy had surprised her. Amy had come into the kitchen clothed in the most superior aspect of her "manner." And then—suddenly—she was chatty with Della; confident of course but not at all condescending; gay even . . .

Now, as then, Della Eff's expression did not seem to change. She looked at Isabel squarely for an instant. In that instant something—was it a sardonic humor?—flared behind the hard blue façade that was the front of her eyes. Suddenly and quite noiselessly she disappeared from the doorway.

Isabel's thoughts beat on. What a wonderful thing it was that Amy with all her advantages—training at an exclusive boarding school; travel in many foreign lands; her beauty, her smartness and her class—should have chosen her, Isabel, for a friend. Amy's friendship was a godsend to Isabel; it had come in the nick of time.

Somehow for years she had been growing further and further away from the Little Finger girls. Was it, though, that she had dropped them or that they had dropped her? This was a problem which, to Isabel's great surprise, she found herself at the oddest possible moments still striving to solve.

The problem might have bothered her more if a year ago she had not fallen in with that Dabney Center gang. Zowie, they were live ones! Of course she had not been seeing any of them since she and Amy had become real friends. Amy did not like the Dabney Center crowd. Amy said they were too rough. In fact, Amy's use of the word vulgar in this connection had produced the first difference between her and Isabel . . . Yet after a while Isabel saw that Amy was right . . . Now she was very grateful to Amy for rescuing her from that Dabney Center bunch.

Of course, though, she had to admit it, Amy had a quality—well, Isabel reluctantly recognized it as snobbishness. Take her attitude towards Aunt Mattie, for instance. Everybody admired Mathilda Hall, and the genuineness of her philanthropic impulse. Sometimes the newspapers ran interviews with her. Once there had been a magazine article with her picture. And she was such a thoroughbred too! Not even the people of Little Finger knew that the girls in the kitchen were wayward girls.

Of course for two or three years now Isabel herself had lied consistently to Aunt Mattie. She smoked in private; drank whenever she got the chance, until she was pleasantly "jingled"; drove after midnight dances all over the countryside with couples she had picked up here and there. She had never done anything really "bad," of course. But there was much she preferred Aunt Mattie should not guess. Somehow, though, when she told about Aunt Mattie, Amy's immoderate peals of laughter had vaguely disturbed her. And "Your aunt's a riot, isn't she?" Amy had indulgently remarked after meeting Aunt Mattie . . . Well, of course Aunt Mattie would be amusing to Amy . . . And yet . . .

Isabel's friendship with Amy was so closely knit that nobody else—no other girl at least—could possibly come into it. When Amy had made her initial overtures, Isabel had thought, had rather hoped, that such an alliance would mean for her an intimacy also with the exclusive Belaize group, or the equally exclusive Fore Finger crowd; Isabel admired both these sets, not because they were exclusive but because they were themselves. But apparently Amy liked them as little as Isabel liked the Little Finger girls. After coming back from Paris, Amy had tried them out, she said, one after the other; but she had dropped them all. She often remarked: "I want you all to myself, Isabel. You're the only wild woman in this dead burg. Oh, if I'd only had you in Paris with me . . ."

That was another marvelous thing about Amy. Instead of being what it so bromidically was to Isabel—the Louvre . . . Notre Dame . . . Napoleon's Tomb—Paris was to Amy merely a series of restaurants in which she had enjoyed what she described as "wild parties." In fact, Amy had never even seen Napoleon's Tomb.

Once Amy said: "Father's awfully strong for the Belaize bunch. He thinks I play round with them all the time."

Isabel had a theory that it was to further this misunderstanding on General Valentine's part that Amy invited her so little to the house. She had been several times, of course, in that famous mansion—melancholy since the death of Amy's mother—but she was by no means an intimate there. But she suspected that its early-Victorian magnificence intrigued Amy as little as the mid-Victorian shabbiness of Aunt Mattie's house intrigued her. Indeed, Amy entertained her oftenest at the Belaize Country Club. But that in itself was an event for Isabel; she could never otherwise have entered its shaded, cultivated precincts. When Isabel and Amy met—Amy always came in her car—it was at some neutral point on the long country road between the two households. They met often, though; and always for some delightful revelry.

Men were continually motoring down from the city to see Amy. Many of them she had known in Paris. They seemed always to come in pairs; and Isabel made the necessary fourth in the square party which immediately evolved. The whole experience had been a dazzling one for Isabel. She had never known, never—but for Amy—could have known such men. Everything about them was different; and Isabel was always studying these points of difference. Their clothes had a quality; their shirts, shoes, studs; their very topcoats of so ample a volume, so heavy a cloth . . . Their voices—an enunciation precise with no appearance of precision. And "manner" too—the male counterpart of Amy's easy, authoritative superiority. Then one day Jerry Kitchen and Bid Carleton arrived together. And now those two came much oftener than anybody else. Half a dozen times their quartette had danced and driven all night.

Harmless excursions enough, the girls insisted to each other; only dancing and a little—a very little— (Continued on page 170)

LIONEL BARRYMORE (Prince Lubimoff) with Alma Rubens (the Duchess de Delille) in Cosmopolitan Corporation's film of Ibanez's "The Enemies of Women" — the beautiful setting being Joseph Urban's.

BILLIE BURKE, who as the clever and sprightly cabaret singer in Booth Tarkington's delightful new play, "Rose Briar," produced by Florenz Ziegfeld, has made one of the outstanding comedy hits of the New York season.

PHOTOGRAPH BY NICKOLAS MURAY

GLADYS DORE, who was the winsome and applauded "girl with the yellow fan" in the Tom Tom number of "Queen o' Hearts," has more recently made another big hit with her singing and dancing in "Wildflower."

PHOTOGRAPH BY APEDA

DIANA GORDON'S blithe smile, to be sure, appeared briefly in George White's "Scandals"; but she really made her Broadway debut (a merry one) this season in Oliver Morosco's dazzling musical comedy, "Lady Butterfly."

PHOTOGRAPH BY WHITE STUDIO

By WILLIAM ASHLEY ANDERSON

A Romance of the East

Zanzibar

Illustrations by John Richard Flanagan

THE first night after my arrival in Zanzibar I received a "chit" from Briggs, manager of the Afro-American Trading Company, inviting me to have dinner with him.

I found Briggs's place to be a huge rectangular Arab pile, rising in the moonlight as though chiseled out of salt above the western roadstead of Zanzibar. The narrow alleyway leading to it was black, dank and tortuous, and saturated with the pungent perfume of cloves and the moldy sweet smell of sacked copra heaped in the godowns along the waterfront. It was three lofty stories high, and fronted upon a glistening white coral beach where a couple of tall, slim betel palms rustled their dainty fronds. The entrance from the alleyway was under a sunken arch and through a massive black door studded with iron below and intricately carved above. The narrow dark stone stairway, worn by generations of shuffling sandals, ascended straight to the barasa of the third story.

Here I arrived at seven o'clock, ushered in by black, doddering, gentle old Mzee, an ancient Swahili retainer of the house.

Breathing that balmy spiced atmosphere, ascending those worn stairs surrounded by the whispering shadows awakened by Mzee's yellow lantern, and coming out at last breathless from the climb upon a broad barasa whose arches opened upon the roadstead of Zanzibar where the dim outlines of freighters were emphasized by points of red, yellow and green light, and where brown and tattered Arab dhows drifted by like shadows, the sheer romance of the place was bound to grip any man's heart.

It caught mine particularly, because I had just come from two years of life in Aden, that barren, God-forsaken, broiling promontory that juts out into the sea from southwestern Arabia, and smells of nothing but cinder dust, hides and sewage.

I stood for a moment, therefore, looking into the darkness towards the mainland of Africa, and listened to the faint strains of the Sultan's band playing "La Paloma." Briggs was not yet in, and I had nothing to do but wait. So I stood listening with half closed eyes, until my sentimental reverie was broken by a harsh affected cough farther along the barasa.

There was a young man there, half in the shadows, stretched upon a long Indian chair, surrounded by a pile of American magazines. He was looking at me uncertainly as though shaken out of an abstraction by my sudden appearance.

"Hodie!" said I. "Is Briggs around? I believe I'm expected here for dinner this evening."

"Yes. So Mr. Briggs said."

The young fellow rose to his feet, and I saw that he was a well formed specimen of collegian. With his chin slightly tilted and his deep-set blue eyes glowing with an expression of candor and almost of simplicity, he gave the appearance of a man who is honest but overbearing, good hearted but impatient, boyishly sardonic and equally gullible. He was obviously new to the country, as yet unspoiled, and, to judge by his magazines and secluded situation, very homesick.

"Are you his assistant?" I asked, shaking hands and taking a chair.

"Yes."

"Have you been in Zanzibar very long?"

"Three months."

"I suppose you like it. It's the finest place I've seen south of Suez. They call it the Paris of the East Coast, you know."

"Yes—oh—yes."

"Do you go out into the bazaar very much?"

"Not very much."

"Are you shipping many cloves this season?"

"A fair lot."

By this my emotion was getting the better of me. I couldn't tell whether the young fool was being intentionally rude or simply stupid. Smiling in the friendliest way possible, I said:

"You've got a beautiful place here. I hope I manage to get something like it. Restful, too, with the waves breaking all the time right under your walls—like music."

"One of the men here went crazy from that."

"Is that so?"

"Yes."

"How?"

"He listened to it so much he got so he couldn't hear anything else."

After a moment's silence I said deliberately, looking at him coldly: "It's a tall ship!"

He flushed slowly; then, without a word to the expectant Mzee, who, trained by a long roll of hosts, was waiting patiently in the shadows to be called, he walked into the dining room, got a tray, a bottle of whisky, a bottle of tepid soda and a single glass. This he brought out and presented to me.

"I don't know how Mr. Briggs handles these things," he apologized; "but maybe you can mix it yourself."

Then he suddenly realized that Mzee was waiting, and he called for a bottle of lemonade. I drank my whisky and soda with a grimace. It was flat and warm, and gave me a feeling of biliousness.

Shrill piercing voices broke out from the dark recesses of the jumbled confusion of nearby buildings. There was a muffled scream—and a crash. My young entertainer whirled about, listening, startled.

There was a hubbub at the lower doorway, a rush of feet, and Briggs appeared on the barasa, calm, unruffled, pert, his tip-tilted nose emphasizing the impudence of his gray eyes.

"Hello!" he said gaily, advancing with outstretched hand. "Cheerio! You're right on the minute. Boy! Bring some whisky and soda. And ice! B-r-h-h! Good Lord, Prescott, you haven't been offering him that warm dishwater, have you? Here, I want you to meet the Only Other American."

The O. O. A. was in a perspiration from trying to catch up with Briggs. He arrived at the top of the stairs, panting slightly, with a reproachful expression on his full genial countenance. He arrived with a protest, but upon seeing me turned it into a laugh and greeted me heartily.

"Briggs," he explained, "is one of those young devils whose idea of a joke is to upset the bazaar and then leave his friends behind to make explanations."

"Nonsense," said Briggs indignantly.

"Well——"

The O. O. A. was interrupted by the shrill voice of an angry woman shouting Briggs's name on the stairway. Briggs darted down. My previous entertainer was again introduced by the O. O. A., this time as Earl Prescott, the grandnephew of Abraham Prescott, original founder of the Afro-American Trading Company, and better known along the coast as Ibrahim Effendi.

"Did you ever hear of him?" asked the O. O. A.

"Vaguely," said I.

"Why, he is as famous in Zanzibar as Tippoo Tib! He was the man who fought the battle of Shangani. Ibrahim Effendi was one of those half piratical skippers who traded in anything from opium to black ivory. He made a fortune in the Orient and doubled it here in Zanzibar. You know how those old-time skippers were—lords of their own ships, they lorded it over everybody and everything. He always got what he wanted! Well, one day he saw a girl of the Sultan's harem coming from the bath. Whether she was actually one of his harem or just a member of his household, I don't know. And no one knows how he managed first to see her or get in communication with her. He must have spent thousands of rupees; and he had an interpreter he could depend on—old Ali Beder, one of the richest merchants in the bazaar today."

"I know of him," said I. "He has a branch in Aden."

The O. O. A. paused for an instant to listen to the sounds of an hysterical conversation going on on the stairway.

"That's so. Well, one night he tried to steal her away, and they very nearly caught him. He had two ships in harbor, and most of the sailors were ashore, all carrying the old-fashioned short cutlasses. They say they fought for three hours, roaring up and down the bazaar from here to Shangani, over the creek and back again into this very beyt. Downstairs, where Briggs is standing, old Ibrahim Effendi held the doorway himself until his sailors got down over the roof there and reached their boats. They dragged him into his gig, bleeding from a couple of bullet wounds and cuts from jambeers."

"I never heard of that!" said young Prescott indignantly.

"Well, that's what happened, anyway."

"He never brought any Arab woman back to Boston!"

"He never took her away from Zanzibar, either, so far as that goes. It was all he could do to take himself away. This building was looted completely. There was the devil of a time over it.

A yell went up: "Christians!" It seemed as if the entire frenzied bazaar were surging down upon us.

The American consul called for the assistance of a warship that was at Mombasa; then, after he investigated, he changed his mind and wanted Ibrahim Effendi captured and put under arrest. But they couldn't prove anything. Ibrahim cruised around the island for three weeks, until the consul sent him definite orders forbidding him to land in Zanzibar again; and he never came back."

"What became of the woman?"

"No one knows exactly. Some say she was killed in the fight. She did not return to the harem, anyway; and she didn't get away with Ibrahim Effendi. Prescott, do you mean to say you never heard that story about your granduncle?"

"No," said Prescott, picking his magazines from the floor and stacking them neatly upon a table. "I always understood that he was a sort of missionary-trader. The only thing he ever said to me about Zanzibar was just before I left New York, when my mother asked me to visit him and get some advice about living conditions out here."

"What does he look like?" asked the O. O. A. with interest.

"Why, of course he's a pretty old man now; he's bent over a little bit, and carries a heavy walking stick; but he was probably good looking when he was young. He has deep-set blue eyes under bushy eyebrows, and his face is weather-beaten and—and grim. He looks like—well, he's got a sort of passionate face, like a fanatic's. He said—well, he told me I wasn't the man for Zanzibar, but he'd like to see what I could do out here. He said the people of Zanzibar were a lot of immoral, treacherous cutthroats!"

"Ah," said I, "and you were disappointed."

"Not disappointed exactly, but awfully disgusted."

"You should have seen Aden!"

"I saw Aden. It's got character to it. It's like a hard fighting man, with a lot of scars on him. But this place is soft and insipid."

The O. O. A. and I exchanged glances. I realized at once that I had misjudged young Prescott.

"Have you seen very much of it?" I asked.

"Enough. The first night here Mr. Briggs took me to the movies — movies in a wet tent of rotting canvas—scratched films twelve years old—and a hot sweating crowd of niggers, Hindus and sailors. Well, that held me for a while. A couple of nights later I asked Mr. Briggs if there wasn't something more interesting we could see in the town. 'Oh,' he said, 'you want to see some life, don't you?' So he said he'd show me a 'Zanzibar dance of the finest.' I went with him down the worst tin pan alley I ever saw until we came to a dirty stucco building that was almost falling down. Inside it was black and stuffy. They put a lot of smoking kerosene lamps around for footlights, and some sweaty black wenches came out and danced the shimmy. Well, when it comes to nautch dances and that sort of thing I want something pretty—like the dances you see in the shows in New York. So that held me for a while."

At this point a repentant wail came up the stairway:

"But, Briggsey, I thought it was you broke the door. Some blighter barged in and out again so fast I couldn't see him—and he smashed my door—and I haven't got any money to mend my house—it's my house, too——"

A mysterious voice rose sonorously in the darkness above the housetops, repeating in impassioned accents:

"Ah, ma princesse! Ma princesse! Jet'adore! Ma princesse!"

"That," said young Prescott parenthetically, "is Briggs's rival—a man from Mauritius who sings away for hours every night—recites poetry—plays the guitar—to Briggs's Rose-Marie, a Seychelles girl; she's the one downstairs—while she gets Briggs half tight on whisky and sodas, and swears back at the coon. That's romance!"

"It all depends upon the point of view," I suggested.

"I know that," said Prescott. "The fellow from Mauritius looks up and sees Rose-Marie on a balcony, screened by palm trees, and her voice sounds soft in the distance; while Briggs goes up the back stairs, five steps at a time, and quarrels over whether the soda water ought to be kept on ice or the ice broken up and put in the glasses!"

"Cheerio," said Briggs, appearing once more on the barasa. "Mzee! Dinner! That Rose-Marie's getting to be an awful vixen. What are you looking so gloomy about, Prescott?"

Prescott grunted noncommittally.

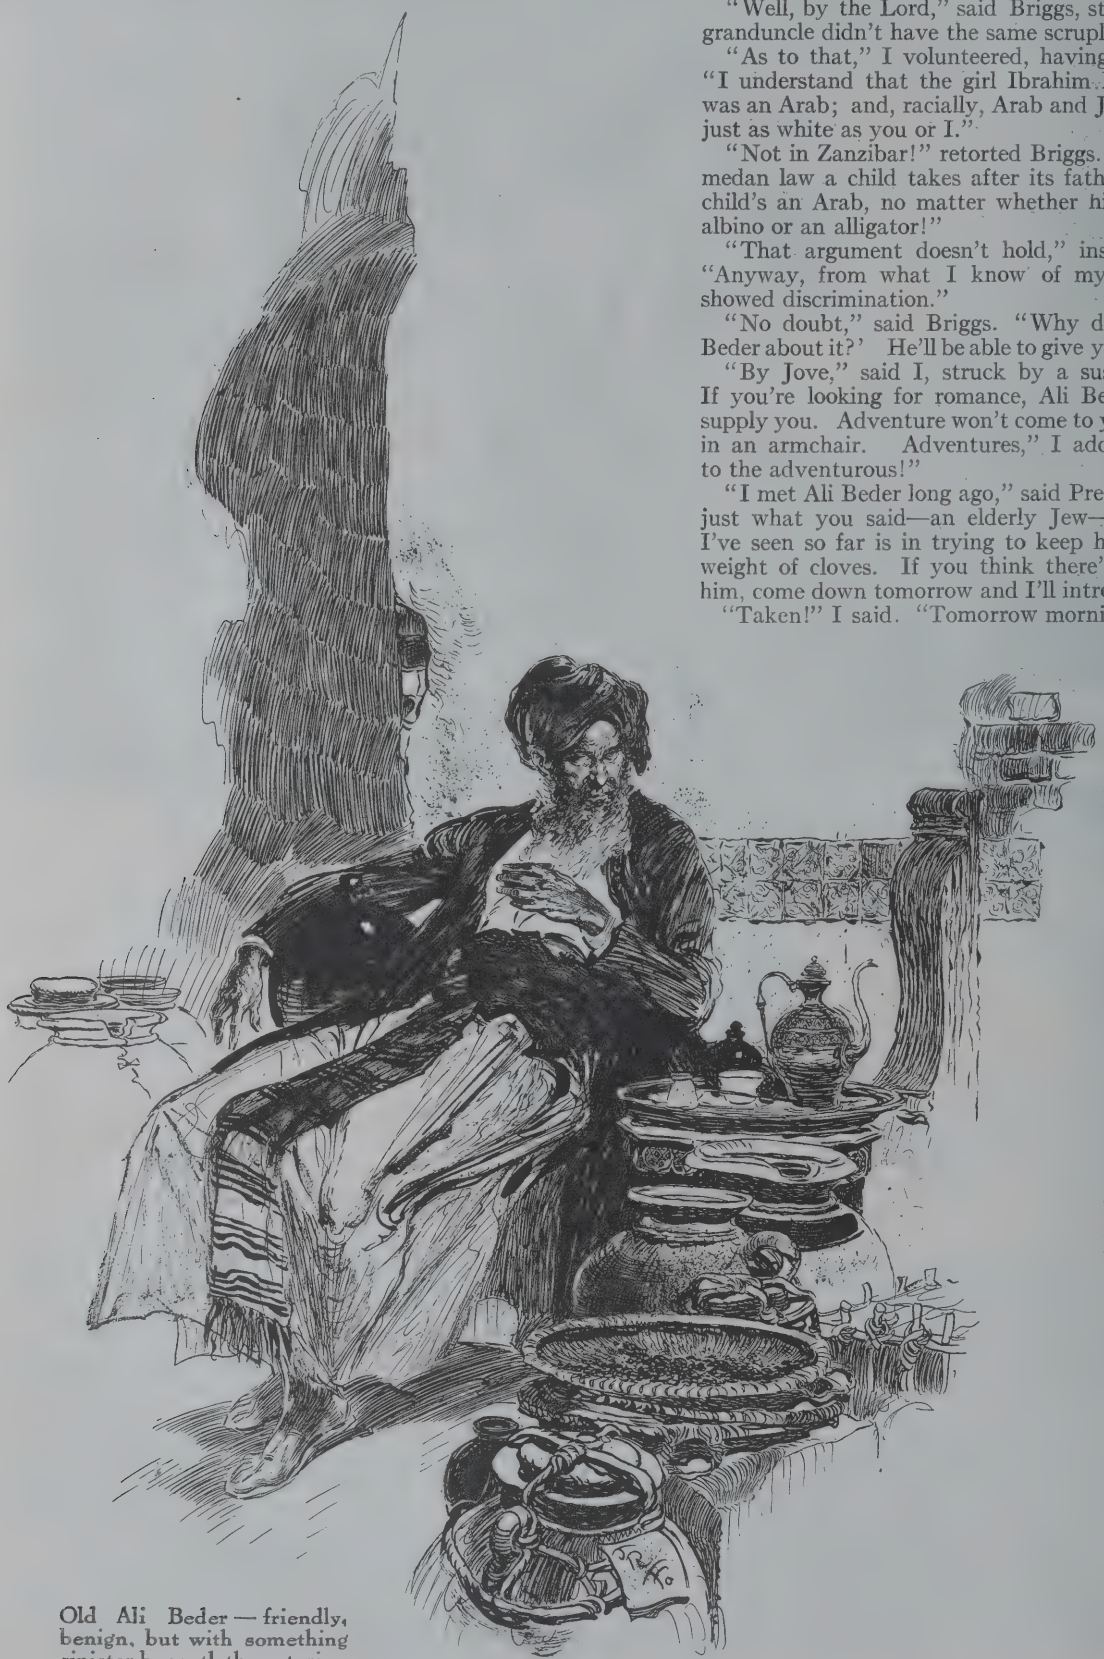
"Prescott," continued Briggs, "doesn't appreciate romantic Zanzibar."

"No," said Prescott deliberately. "I guess I don't. I'm a white man, and my idea of romance hasn't quite as much color in it as Briggs's!"

"Well, by the Lord," said Briggs, stung by the retort, "your granduncle didn't have the same scruples!"

"As to that," I volunteered, having just come from Arabia, "I understand that the girl Ibrahim Effendi was interested in was an Arab; and, racially, Arab and Jew are the same—that is, just as white as you or I."

"Not in Zanzibar!" retorted Briggs. "According to Mohammedan law a child takes after its father. If he's an Arab, the child's an Arab, no matter whether his mother is a Swede, an albino or an alligator!"



"That argument doesn't hold," insisted Prescott doggedly. "Anyway, from what I know of my granduncle, I'll bet he showed discrimination."

"No doubt," said Briggs. "Why don't you go and ask Ali Beder about it?' He'll be able to give you information we can't."

"By Jove," said I, struck by a suspicion, "that's an idea! If you're looking for romance, Ali Beder ought to be able to supply you. Adventure won't come to you while you're stretched in an armchair. Adventures," I added sententiously, "come to the adventurous!"

"I met Ali Beder long ago," said Prescott impatiently. "He's just what you said—an elderly Jew—and the only adventure I've seen so far is in trying to keep him from cheating on the weight of cloves. If you think there's anything interesting in him, come down tomorrow and I'll introduce you."

"Taken!" I said. "Tomorrow morning, then, at ten o'clock."

Old Ali Beder — friendly, benign, but with something sinister beneath the exterior.

"Cheerio!" cried Briggs, filling the glasses. "Bottoms up! We'll drink to old Ibrahim Effendi, the greatest adventurer on the East Coast—and his lost love. His spirit," he added ironically, waving his glass towards Prescott, "his spirit goes marching on!"

At ten o'clock the following morning, having arranged my affairs with the bank and fixed temporary headquarters at the Tippoo Tib Hotel, I met young Prescott and his Arab interpreter and broker, Abu Nawass, and together we went into the bazaar to see Ali Beder and inspect the cloves which Briggs had recently bought from him.

This Abu Nawass was an Arab from Oman, and a very remarkable person.

He was handsome, grave and courteous in his manner, with eyes that could flash fire or melt with laughter. He wore the conventional Arab costume of Zanzibar—a small drab turban; a long white cotton kanza with a short sleeveless jacket; and a sash from which protruded the hilt of an ornamental but dangerous jambeer. His feet were thrust into sandals and his sleeves were rolled up to the elbow, disclosing powerful hairy forearms. A small crisp mustache and small strong teeth that flashed when he smiled gave an impression of strength and virility. Since he spoke English well, and I spoke Arabic, we made congenial companions.

Slim and strong, ardent and young—the most exquisite creature I had seen in years.

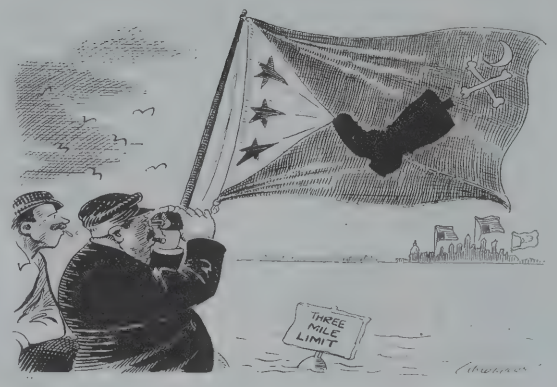
Abu Nawass and Earl Prescott afforded an interesting contrast.

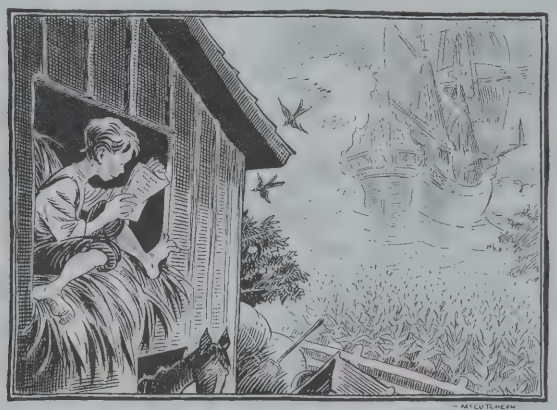
Judging from Prescott's own description, there was more than a suggestion of old Ibrahim Effendi about the young man's countenance, the lean strong body and the shock of sandy hair that was pushed back roughly from his forehead; but he gave the appearance of being still unsophisticated and untried.

The Arab, on the other hand, looked thoroughly sophisticated and untameable.



As we made our way down a narrow, tortuous, stone-paved alley, dark and humid, I breathed luxuriously the sickeningly sweet smell of copra and the spicy (Continued on page 120)

"Yo-Ho-Ho and A

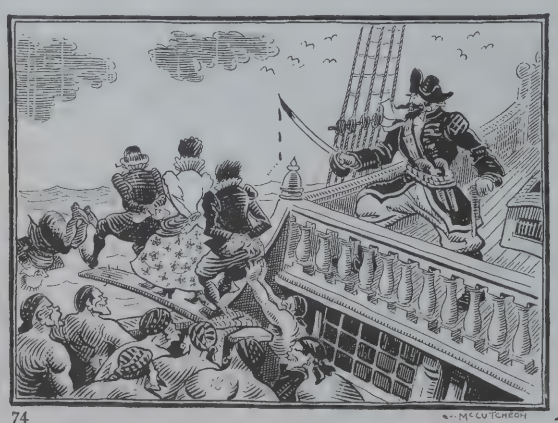


Words and Pictures by

THE time is the present. A man in white tropical clothes is seated in a long canvas chair which accommodates itself gratefully to the curves of his back.

In his lap lies an open book bound in time-worn leather. The title page proclaims it to be: "A general History of the Robberies and murders of the most notorious Pyrates and also their Policies, Discipline and Government from their first Rise and Settlement in the Island of Providence in 1717 to the present year 1724."

He has just been reading of the thrilling exploits of those doughty gentlemen who made these Bahaman waters their rendezvous—Captains Avery, Martel, Bonnet, Thatch, Vane, Rackam, England, Davis, Roberts, Worley, Lowther, Low and Evans—names that curdled the blood two centuries ago.



Two hundred years ago the Bahamas were a pirate stronghold. The sloops and galleys of the sea-rovers lay in these very waters, were careened on these beaches and set forth across yonder horizon, beyond which they ravaged the plate ships and galleons that lumbered up from the rich ports of the Spanish Main.

Time has woven a pleasant glamour about the sea-rovers of that distant day. Their shocking brutalities are screened by a friendly veil and they are invested with deathless heroism.

The country boy in the haymow reads with a thrill the story of the pirates. When he is not aspiring to be a clown in a circus, or the keeper of a candy store, he is quite likely to be thinking of piracy as a promising career.

Children edge forward in their seats, with eyes shining, as Hook and his pirate gang swagger and slash their way through the delightful scenes of "Peter Pan." The story "Treasure Island" has an appeal which few are too old or too young to feel. "Fifteen men on a dead man's chest, Yo-ho-ho and a bottle of rum" stirs many a mild and gentle soul to vain regrets on the peaceful life he has led.

Why this strange glamour about pirates? The man in the canvas chair looks off and wonders.

There's a gentle rustle of the palms as they wave in the trade wind. The long curve of creamy beach, the subdued murmur as the rollers crash on the reef, the sunlit sea and the big white clouds make a setting which invites day-dreaming.

They were not nice men, those old time pirates. Then why their fascination? One of them, possessed of an ambition to make himself renowned for being terrible, put the whole crew of a Spanish ship to death, performing himself the office of executioner by beheading ninety men. He caused the crews of four other vessels to be thrown into the sea, and "more than once, in his frenzies, he tore out the hearts of his victims and devoured them."

You would certainly not consider this gentleman a model for emulation, yet he is one of the central figures in pirate lore.

But when you read that one of them, a valiant cuss, put out with eight-and-twenty men in a longboat, boarded a great Spanish warship after scuttling his own boat that there might be no retreat, and succeeded in capturing the ship, you must confess to a certain sneaking admiration.

Another pirate leader, with a handful of men, ran boldly into the midst of a pearl fleet, attacked the vice-admiral under the guns of two men-of-war, and captured the ship.

Such exploits so dwarf the everyday orneryness of the pirate that we forget he was a villain who went around murdering and had dirty finger nails. Doubtless the gallant old pirate is a much pleasanter companion when embalmed in the pages of a book. Down the vista of two or three hundred years he may slash his way gloriously to fame, but if he lived in the next block you'd want him put under bonds.

The man in the white suit yawned and bewailed the death of romance.

Off across the island, through the stately columns of towering palm trees, a stretch of blue sea lay like a band of sapphire, with the hills of New Providence and the houses of Nassau beyond. Close under the lee of the island, the masts of a schooner appeared. Presently it came to anchor.

"Another bootlegger," thought the man. "That makes sixteen this week." Swinging his field glasses over his shoulder he walked two miles down the shore and seated himself under a palm tree to inspect the new arrival.

She was a trim craft, low and rakish, similar in type to several of the others. All were painted black, even the steamer and the big three-masted schooner. They lay in the snug anchorage where two hundred years before other craft had lain protected by the coral ridges of the island.

Once more the man in the white suit was stirred to imaginings. This was the cradle of the traffic which has led to diplomatic controversy between the premiers of two great nations. This was the fountainhead of the new industry of rum running which has grown to such gigantic proportions.

Bottle of RUM"

JOHN T. McCUTCHEON

"Who knows?" he mused. "Perhaps romance is not dead. Perhaps we need only the perspective of time to appreciate properly this new crop of seafaring men who live by devious ways. Already the rum running industry is building up its literature of daring deeds and sudden death. There are rakish craft, secret rendezvous, hidden coves, vast profits and corrupted officialdom. The same as in the days of the pirates."

He focused his glasses on the nearest schooner, three hundred yards away. She was long and black, her masts stepped back jauntily, her bow clean-cut.

A launch from Nassau appeared in the Narrows and chugged out to her. Presently a number of men were hoisting sacks of liquor on board, each sack containing six quart bottles. No liquor is sent to the United States coast in cases. In time the cargo would be embarked and stowed until her freeboard would grow less and less with the weight of the cargo. Then, in the darkness, she would silently steal away.

The clearance papers would consign the cargo to a port near Newfoundland, but at a certain point stress of weather would conveniently blow the craft up to the three mile limit near New York. She would be expected. All would be arranged and swift motor boats would come out for the contraband.

Perhaps there would be a battle with federal officers who still take their oath of office seriously—more likely the way would be greased with tribute judiciously placed in the hands of complacent local officials. There might be some killing.

Will the writers of the future find a heroic theme in this industry? Will little boys, snuggled in cozy haymows, read with shining eyes the epics of the bootleggers? Will those distant chroniclers tell of governors and other officials sharing the rich dividends of the traffic as we now read of the Governor of the Carolinas sharing the spoils of the pirate chieftains in return for protection and immunity?

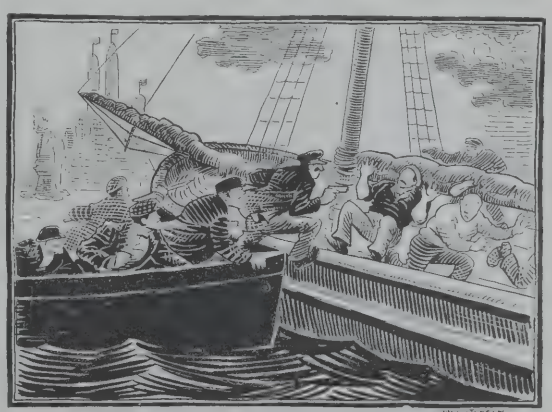
It is a fruitful field for speculation, and the man in white looked off across the swaying spars of the bootleg fleet to the distant city of Nassau, smiling in the sunshine of her matchless climate. Thrice has she flourished on waves of prosperity. Once when the pirates anchored their ships in her harbor and scattered their ill gotten spoils on the strand; again when the blockade runners of the Civil War made the harbor their rendezvous; and now when the fleet of fifty vessels in the rum running traffic has brought a flood of wealth to the community.

From a modest beginning in 1920, the import duties in spirits have leaped to half a million dollars a month—twenty-four shillings a case for every case that comes in, and the bootlegger must pay this before the government releases the liquor from bond. To a colony which has been poverty-stricken, this sudden accession of prosperity has been most welcome, even though the colony takes no pride in being the center of a questionable traffic.

The various prizes of Captain Henry Morgan—later Sir Henry Morgan—one of the most successful of the pirates, stand as follows: The sacking of Panama, $1,500,000; Porto Bello, $800,000; Puerto Príncipe, $700,000; Maracaibo and Gibraltar, $400,000; various piracies, $250,000; a grand total of $3,650,000 as the harvest of plunder.

In these days the bootleg traffic in the United States is rated at $3,000,000 a day. Those pirate profits seem mere chicken feed.



Far beyond the rum fleet, upon one of the hills of New Providence, stood the watch tower of the famous pirate Blackbeard, to whom murder was a mere appetizer in his daily life.

Old Blackbeard is gone but his soul goes marching on. Perhaps there may be one leading spirit among the rum runners of today who sometime in years to come will be invested with the glamour that now surrounds the pirate chief. Who knows? Perhaps there will come to be a bootleggers' flag, corresponding to the Jolly Roger. Perhaps a gallant standard showing a boot rampant—indicating something with a kick in it—on a field of red, the red signifying the predominating color of the product.

"Yo-ho-ho and a bottle of rum" could serve admirably as the anthem of the modern Brothers of the Coast. For a letterhead, why not a rakish schooner anchored under the Statue of Liberty, who is posed in the attitude of calling the waiter?

The man in white put up his glasses and strolled leisurely back, leaving to posterity the job of finding glamour in the exploits of "Ralph the Rum Runner" or "Three Star Dick, the King of the Bootleggers."

LOUIS JOSEPH VANCE'S

The Lone Wolf Returns

The Setting:

THE action of the story takes place mainly in the New York of today and concerns:

MICHAEL LANYARD, THE LONE WOLF, once prince of European jewel thieves, now a member of the British Secret Service on leave of absence in America.

EVE DE MONTALAIS, whom he loves as he has never loved before—a woman of beauty, of charm, of wealth.

MORPHEW, powerful New York bootlegger and director of criminals.

PAGAN, a satellite of Morphew's.

MALLISON, gentleman crook and member of Morphew's crew.

LIANE DELORME, demi-mondaine and one-time underworld acquaintance of the Lone Wolf.

MRS. FOLLIOTT MCFEE (FOLLY), a society woman, piquant, rich.

CRANE, New York detective, an old friend of Lanyard's.

A Résumé of Parts One to Three:

ALTHOUGH the Lone Wolf has given up thieving he knows himself still a marked man. Yet he is determined to make his life so blameless that he can marry Eve de Montalais. At the outset, fate seems to be against him.

For one night after he has left Eve and she has accorded him his first kiss, he accidentally meets Liane Delorme and, talking over old times, accompanies her to the fashionably disreputable Clique Club. She introduces him to Morphew and his crew, and to Folly McFee.

Morphew has been awaiting this chance. Alone, he proposes that Lanyard take up his old trade again, under his, Morphew's, powerful protection. Lanyard angrily refuses, whereupon Morphew threatens to "plant" crimes on him.

Lanyard is at this moment ready to do Morphew physical violence when the Clique Club, which the latter owns, is raided.

Helped by detective Crane, whom he has not seen in years, Lanyard manages to escape, along with Mrs. McFee.

Her he accompanies home, and is warning her of the nature of Morphew's gang when Liane and Pagan call. Pagan mixes highballs and gives one to Lanyard. Then by adroit conversation he manages to fix in Lanyard's mind the suggestion that he, Lanyard, may at any time go to thieving again through the subconscious power of old habits too strong for his control.

Going home that night, Lanyard is apparently under the spell of some powerful drug. He is hardly able to reach his bed. Next morning he is awakened with a terrific headache by none other than Crane, who informs him that during the night Folly's emeralds have been stolen. Crane has already searched Lanyard's clothing and exonerates him of the crime.

But after Crane leaves, Lanyard finds the jewels in the tail pocket of his own dress coat.

Drugged by Pagan, did he steal them unconsciously as Pagan had diabolically suggested he might? Or were they "planted" on him? He cannot tell.

At any rate, he decides on prompt reprisal. Going to Folly's house, he lets himself in unobserved, and hides in a clothespress upstairs. Folly is entertaining Liane, Pagan and Mallison at dinner. Mallison is called to the phone. Lanyard listens in on an extension, and is at once aware that a plot is afoot against Folly. He quietly phones for Crane.

Mallison then leaves under pretext of a forgotten engagement. Shortly he sneaks in again, comes upstairs and conceals himself in Folly's room.

There, when her other guests have gone, Folly, dressed in négligé, is suddenly seized and kissed by the man, who forthwith proceeds again to make violent love to her. She struggles and is about to scream for help when there is a commotion at the front door below. Lanyard steps out of concealment, seizes Mallison, and floors him with a tremendous blow.

Then there appears at the stair head a bepainted female, a "shyster" lawyer and a fake detective, who have forced their way in. The female brazenly announces herself as Mallison's wife—Folly has quite evidently been "framed" for blackmail.

Lanyard coolly calls their bluff. And as things are about to get lively and a struggle seems imminent, Crane appears with a policeman. Smoothly, and with Folly's silent if astonished concurrence, Lanyard fabricates a story to the effect that he and Folly had planned to trap Mallison as the stealer of her jewels. Mallison, who has meanwhile come to, protests violently and tries to escape; whereupon he is seized and frisked by Crane.

And in his pockets are found: first a burglar's kit; then the stolen emeralds of Folly. Lanyard gives a graphic start and stare. The eyes that Mallison turns toward him are a murderer's.

NEW MYSTERY NOVEL

Illustrations by

W. D. Stevens

"And now, before this witness," said Lanyard, "you add a threat against my life. It's more than I hoped for, Morphew."

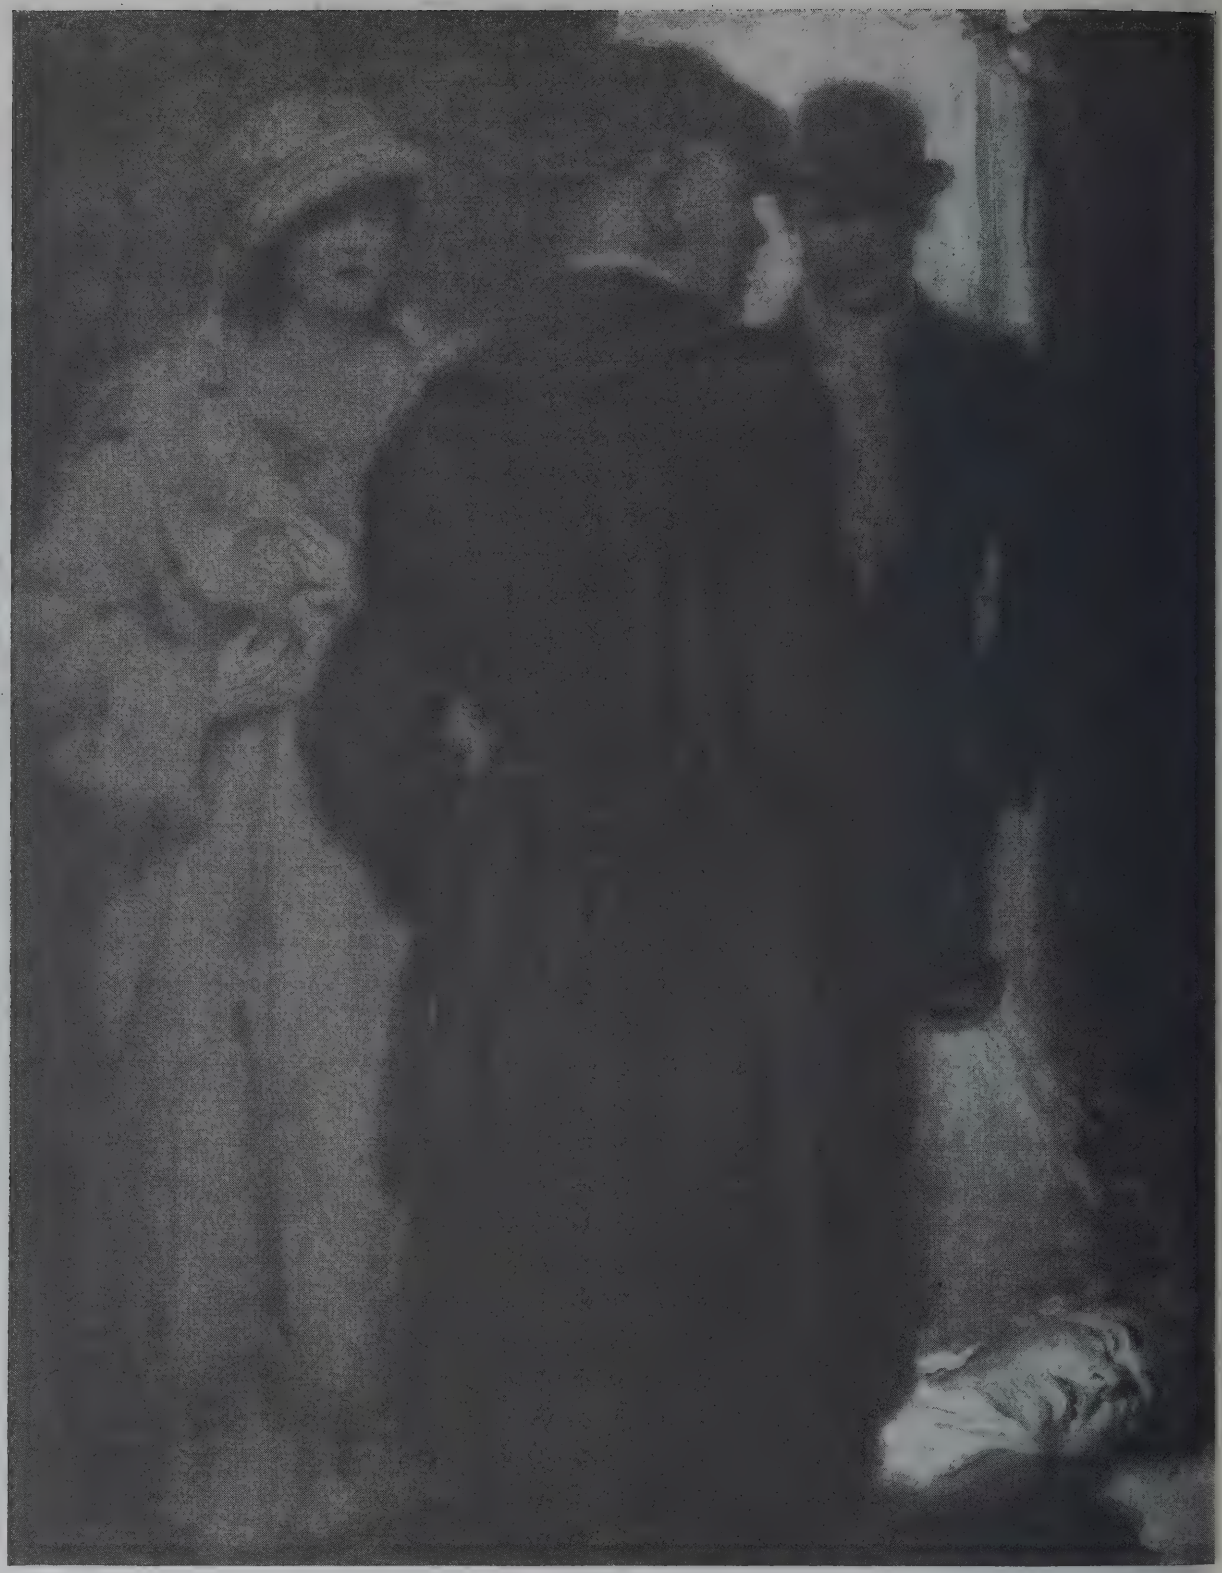
Part Four: CHAPTER XI

"PRETTY!" The chuckle with which Crane let that priceless hoard cascade, clashing, a stream of baleful green fire, into the cupped, eager hands of its owner, ended the hush which had spellbound the assorted actors. "Me," he pursued in high contentment, "I'm convinced! Now if you'll slip your wrist-warmers on our little friend here, the dancing yegg, we'll blow, Hoffmeyer . . . But let's see—I guess Mrs. McFee would just as leave not treat the neighbors to a sight of a patrol wagon boiling up to her front door at this time of night and carting this gay bunch away—it might look sort of funny. So, if it's all right with you, ma'am, I'll just get your butler to breeze out and rustle a brace of taxis. And then, folks"—his tolerant regard embraced Mallison, his soi-disant wife, her counsel and the disgusted collaborator of this last—"we'll all go riding round to the House with the Green Lamps in East Fifty-first."

Neither did argument, expostulation, abuse and threats more or less unveiled budge him from adherence to this program, to which one prisoner alone entered no objection: in disgrace with fortune, Mallison demonstrated at least the wit of silence. Nothing he said was ever to be used against him at his trial, for he said nothing. What, indeed—he must have reasoned—was the use? What possible profit to him could accrue through his protesting that the case against him was a "frame-up," that Lanyard must wickedly have made him an involuntary receiver of stolen goods at some time during their struggle? The other contents of his pockets provided evidence too ruinous as to his character and secret shop to give such a claim a ghost of a show of winning credence.

So Mallison submitted without any murmur; but the attention with which he enveloped Lanyard to the last left that one in no doubt as to his mind; and one less self-reliant might well have trembled to think that next morning at latest would see the man free, "out on bail," with every facility at his command to further plans for vengeance—else one had either overrated the power and prestige of Morphew or wronged that one in crediting him to Mallison in the rôle of patron.

The beck of Folly's head was brusque, in deference to which Lanyard found himself finally closeted with her alone in her study. The temper in which she shut the door was openly one of direct impatience; his most disarming smile was wasted on the face she showed him, with its lips taut, brows level and eyes uncompromising. To the "Well?" with which she chose to prompt him in a voice too cool for comfort, Lanyard returned a deprecating shrug.



"Well enough thus far, if you like; but this is far from the end . . . I wonder, is it waste of time to beg a service of you, madame?"

The even brows contracted, his impudence earned the blank demur: "I don't know whether I ought!"

"After all," he submitted, "madame has again her emeralds . . ."

"And you to thank—I know. But still——"

"And she retains that intangible something which is worth nothing till it is lost; I refer to her—as we absurdly say—good name."

The man lay in a sprawl. "I just don't know how he worked it to get like this," protested the manager

"Haven't I proved my appreciation by letting you lie like a . . ."

Folly faltered, at loss for a figure, and Lanyard gravely suggested: "Like—I trust very truly—a gentleman."

"Well!" Her sense of humor wasn't proof against that, the efforts failed that she had been making to reestablish the poise of impartiality he had already shaken, she twinkled outright. "And I loved you for it and lied like a baggage in your support. Still, I think you owe me something more . . ."

"The explanation which I am as ready to make as you are to hear it, but a strange story——"

"I can imagine."

"Forgive me if I doubt that . . . A story so strange it will hardly seem credible without the testimony of one little likely to be suspected of bias in my favor—I mean Monsieur Morphew——"

"Morphew!"

Lanyard pretended not to know he had managed to stagger her a second time: "If you would be so gracious as to telephone the good man—one assumes you know his number——"

"But Morphy's never at home in the evening!"

"For all that, I venture to prophesy he will be found at home this evening, and not far from the telephone, either—providing you call him without too much delay."

"Morphew?" Folly reechoed as if she mistrusted even her own ears.

"You are such great friends, he won't think it strange if you turn to him for friendly offices in your distress——"

"But I'm not in any distress!"

"Precisely there is the favor I would beg of you, madame; to make believe you are, to tell Monsieur Morphew that something so distressing has just happened, you cannot rest without his

"If you don't mind having him carried indoors," said Lanyard, "I'll make an examination myself."

advice. If you will do that, I think you will find him more than willing to oblige you, to wait on you here with all possible expedition."

"But what on earth——"

"That I will make clear when you have telephoned. If you put it off until the Mallison lot is permitted to call in counsel and arrange for bondsmen, you won't catch Monsieur Morphew at home."

Lanyard endured gracefully the probe of dubious eyes—only a whimsical twitch of lips reminded Folly at length of his exemplary patience; whereupon she did a good descriptive bit with pretty shoulders and plumped herself down at the telephone.

Committing to memory the number she gave the Central operator, Lanyard saw the woman start sharply when the voice that responded bore out his prediction that Morphew would be found anomalously at home, this night of all nights. But the ability of an excellent amateur actress which Folly had once before proved to Lanyard's delight this time again stood her in good stead; he was fain to admit he himself might have been taken in by the ring of sincerity in her tremulous accents.

"Is that you, really, Morphy? Oh, I'm so glad! . . . Something terrible has happened, Morphy. Please don't ask questions now, I don't want to talk about it over the wire, but if you can possibly spare a minute, come around and give me your advice. You're the wisest man I know, and I'm in a peck of trouble, half out of my mind with worry . . . How perfectly sweet of you! Yes, as soon as you can, I'll be waiting so anxiously . . . "

Without rising, Folly swung round and mutely challenged Lanyard to make good his promise. But he merely bowed the bow that signifies "Thank you very much."

"Morphy says he won't be a minute."

"I take it, then, he doesn't live far away?"

"Only a few blocks."

Lanyard's fist glanced upon the fellow's jaw with sufficient weight to dislodge him.

"Figure to yourself, madame, that one can with difficulty constrain oneself to wait."

"That's no fair." Folly got up with a flounce. "You're not telling me anything."

"There is so little time—and one feels sure madame will need all of it if she means to remedy what one may, without intending an impertinence, be permitted to term the quite too delightful unconventionality of her attire."

Not in the least displeased, Folly demanded: "Are you complaining?"

"I am seeking delicately to suggest it would be a pity to give Monsieur Morphew any excuse for jumping at a conclusion which, however flattering to my unworthy self, might prove difficult to correct, not to say painful . . . "

"Painful?"

"To him."

"But you aren't a bit fair, you know, to keep on making me like you when you know very well you haven't been playing the game!"

"Madame wrongs me; one can play only such cards as chance deals to one's hand."

"Oh, dear!" Folly sighed. "I'm afraid I'm too impressionable or I'd never trust you at all, with appearances so black for you."

"Innocence," he modestly opined, "is so shining a garment, black appearances can only lend it an enhancing background."

She wavered between a smile and a frown.

"But you have trusted me so far"—judging the moment ripe, Lanyard passed from trifling to earnest entreaty—"surely you can afford to trust me still a little further. I want you out of the way when Soames shows Morphew in—let him say you will be down directly, nothing more—I want Morphew to meet me alone and without any warning. On the other hand, I wish you to hear every word that passes; so all that seems mysterious now will be made clear. While Morphew is busy trying to dissemble his joy at meeting me so unexpectedly, you will be able to come downstairs without making too much noise——"

"You aren't suggesting that I eavesdrop!"

"Why not? I did as much for you an hour ago—and very much to your advantage, you'll agree. Take my word for it, in this instance you will have even more excuse . . . "

"Heaven knows how you always manage to get round me, but you do." Folly went to the door, but there paused, looking back over her shoulder with provocative eyes, pretty to death as she stood with head perked pertly, her dainty body less hidden than set off by its frothy dishabille. "And it's well for me, I'm afraid," she confided, "if it's true, as Liane says, you're madly in love with another woman!"

She vanished, was heard briefly conferring with the butler in the entrance hall, then scampering up the stairs.

"And well for me!" Lanyard admitted then, with a wry grimace of self-knowledge; and forthwith closed his mind to the troubling concept of Folly as a woman too kindly inclined, a thought it wouldn't do to dally with for weightier reasons than that it was the truth Liane had babbled.

Against this impending interview, whose precarious issue was far too likely to prove one of life or death for Lanyard, he had to make all his dispositions, mental and environmental, in minutes of grace he had no means of knowing how few. Everything depended on how soon Morphew might leave his quarters in response to Folly's call, on whether or not he would learn before leaving of the reverse which had waited on the Mallison coup. Lanyard asked no longer odds than to have Morphew arrive uninformed and unsuspicious; if he didn't, Lanyard would need to mind his eye, likewise his step, if he meant to go on living . . .

Swift review of four walls and all they enclosed, made careful note of the heavier articles of furniture and their arrangement in respect of one another and even more particularly of the four exits: the door to the entrance hall, the draped opening that communicated with the drawing room, the two French windows that gave upon the roof of the extension.

Wall sconces with shields of painted parchment bathed the study in a glareless glow; these darkened, a shaded table lamp was left for all illumination. And this in its turn having been extinguished, it was feasible to reconnoitre at the windows without risking detection by any spy who might be stationed in the vacant land back of the house. But when Lanyard had gently parted the draperies and put his nose to a pane, his vision spent itself to no profit on the welter of blacks, from dense to dusky, that blotted out the kitchen yard within its wooden walls and the open foundation pit beyond. Footfarers on the sidewalks to the north were well defined by the bleak shine of a street light on the Lexington Avenue corner; but if any living thing lurked in the waste between, it was lost to the cunning of Lanyard's eyes.

Notwithstanding, he watched on, to make sure the avenues of escape were not stealthily picketed in advance of Morphew's call, till the house bell dictated retreat from the window to relight the table lamp and take the place and pose which Lanyard most fancied, in an easy chair screened from the hall by the door that opened inward.

The professional soft shoes of the butler padded from pantry to front door, bolts thumped, the latch rattled, Morphew was heard to salute Soames with gruff condescension, the colorless voice of the servant responded; and having surrendered his hat and coat, the Sultan of Loot paraded into the study with a strut —or the observation of his audience erred—colored by a lively sense of gratification in unction yet to come. With Folly netted in his toils and soon to become a suppliant to his mercy—no mistake about it, Morphew in this moment was on the best of terms with the business of life in a richly rewarding world. And viewing the man revealed in this humor, Lanyard, ceased to entertain a doubt as to the best course to take with him.

Near the table whose lamp painted with stagey shadows his pale and crudely modeled features, Morphew halted. He cleared his throat importantly, consulted his watch, pricked an ear impatient for Folly's footfalls on the stairs, frowned ever so slightly over failure to hear them, and, tickled by some furtive thought, flashed his rare, unholy smile. Then, becoming cognizant of Lanyard sitting quietly in his corner, watchfully waiting, the man all at once grew taut in body and limb, like a dog confronted by some sudden shape of danger, and wiped his countenance clean of every treacherous trace of legibility. This much, and the swift veer of his eyes toward the doorway, alone confessed the facer to his expectations. The blinkless gaze that steadied to Lanyard's told nothing. Neither did it put any question. Pending the first move, which he was plainly resolved Lanyard must make, Morphew constrained himself to a set of dull, impassive patience.

An attitude Lanyard was nothing loath to humor. If the enemy preferred to resign the initiative, he didn't mind. If it came to that, he had meant all along, if it should appear, as now it did, that Morphew hadn't as yet heard what had happened in the last hour, to force the fighting. He got up and performed his courtliest bow.

"Good evening, monsieur. It was gracious of you to come round so promptly. Won't you be seated?"

Morphew ignored the gesture that singled out a chair for him, but after a measured instant observed rather than asked: "You were expecting me . . ."

"It was even I who advised Mrs. McFee to call monsieur into consultation."

The full, hard lips grudgingly released the monosyllable: "Why?"

"It recommended itself as the simplest way to seduce you into a conversation which I meant to have before morning whether you wanted it or not; furthermore, for me, by far the safest. Figure to yourself how much more secure I feel in my skin, meeting you here, the last place where you would have thought to find me . . ."

Morphew shifted slightly toward the door, a movement of impulse which he seemed to repent when he found Lanyard in the way. "I came here to have a talk with Mrs. McFee," he stated heavily, "at her invitation . . ."

"I have begged her to grant me the favor of a few minutes alone with you."

"I've nothing to say to you . . ."

"That places one of us at a deplorable disadvantage, for I have much to say to you, monsieur, and mean to say it."

"Suppose I don't care to listen . . ."

"It desolates me to feel obliged to inform you that, entirely by chance and contrary to my preference and habit, I happen to be armed."

"Seems to me I've heard"—a slow sneer darkened the face of uncouth ugliness—"it used to be your boast, 'the Lone Wolf never kills.'"

"Monsieur says truly 'it used to be' . . . He will, moreover, wisely remind himself that the Lone Wolf is no more; his code, such as it was, is no sure guide to what Michael Lanyard may do when he fights for the right to live his own life in his own way."

Another instant their glances clashed, then Morphew's fell, he turned back sullenly to the table, fumbling, to cover nervousness out of character, for his cigar case. "Well—what do you want?"

Lanyard pushed the hall door to before replying.

"First, to give myself the felicity of telling you the great news."

Eyes beneath leaden lids shifted back to Lanyard's face, a gross hand grossly crusted with diamonds brought to light a cigar case of gold studded with diamonds, but delayed to open it.

"Come, Monsieur Morphew! confess you are wondering what has become of that zealous disciple of yours, Monsieur Mallison."

"What about Mallison?"

But Morphew had found it necessary to moisten his lips before he could speak.

"He is, at the present moment, one has good reason to believe, wildly telephoning about town to get in touch with you and pray for a bondsman to bail him out when he is arraigned tomorrow morning for stealing Mrs. McFee's emeralds."

The pupils of the little, flesh-embedded eyes contracted, Morphew licked his lips again.

"How's that?"

"Your protégé, monsieur, so neatly styled the dancing yegg, was caught hiding in the boudoir upstairs, some fifteen or twenty minutes ago, and arrested."

Morphew gave himself time to assimilate this ill-omened information, bending over the gaudy trinket in his hands and making meticulous choice of a cigar. He gnawed off its end, broadcasted the waste, put the case away, struck a match and through a screen of smoke and flame looked back to Lanyard.

"How'd you manage that?"

"But surely one who couldn't—so simple a matter!—is not one to have been honored with the handsome offer you made me last night."

"I've put you a question," Morphew prompted testily. "I want to know how you managed to put it over on Mally. Afraid to answer?"

"All in good time. For the present, I have the whim to point out what dismal stupidity you have displayed in this affair, to the end that you may spare yourself further discomfiture by foregoing any injudicious schemes of vengeance which may be brewing behind that broad, impassive brow."

"You swing a mean tongue in English," Morphew commented, "for a foreigner." He cast about for a chair sturdy enough to sustain the bulk of him, and with an air of resignation, his first voluntary confession of feeling, sat down. "Go on, get it all off your chest, I don't mind listening."

"Monsieur is too amiable. One can only prove one's appreciation by endeavoring to be brief . . . "

"Take your time. I've got plenty."

"Regard, then, my good Morphew, that last night, in this room, I was drugged."

"Hootch?" Morphew queried sagely, and receiving a nod commented: "There's a lot of wicked stuff being served nowadays."

"Four drinks were mixed for us last night, Morphew, by your man Pagan. The other three were consumed without ill effects. Thirty minutes after drinking the one he gave me, I became unconscious of my actions."

"Never knew a Frenchman yet could hold his liquor like a gentleman."

"No doubt monsieur knows best how a gentleman drinks . . . At the same time, Pagan did his best, by means of hints thinly veiled, to prepare Mrs. McFee to credit me with the robbery which was even then planned in detail."

"Is this a confession you're making?"

"Planned by you, monsieur, and brilliantly executed by your henchman, the dancing yegg."

"If you didn't know what you were doing last night, like you claim, how d'you know you didn't pull the job off yourself?"

"One was waiting for that question, one knew it was sure to come after the preparation Pagan had made for it."

"I notice you don't seem in any sweat to answer it."

"It has been answered for me. With her complaint of the theft, Mrs. McFee communicated to the police the suspicions Pagan had been at such pains to sow in her mind; with the result that my rooms were visited early today, and, like me, searched while I slept."

Morphew took the cigar from between his teeth and with an air of anxiety inspected its half-inch or more of ash. "And nothing found," he inferred incuriously.

"Nothing."

"Can't remember what you did with the stuff, either, I suppose?" The cigar went back to its appointed berth. "Too bad. You must've been stewed as a boiled owl, all right."

"Patience. Tonight, when Mrs. McFee called in the police to arrest Mallison for having sneaked back like the thief he is, after having left this house in the character of a guest and friend, he was searched and found to possess"—Lanyard made provokingly deliberate pause—"a pocket kit of burglar's tools."

"Sounds fishy." Nevertheless, more business with the cigar told of strain to keep up appearances under unrelenting study. "That all your news?"

"But by no means all. Further search proved that Mallison had been guilty of the amazing indiscretion of bringing the emeralds, concealed upon his person, back into the house from which he had stolen them."

Untouched by Morphew's hand the cigar between his teeth dropped its ash. "How do you mean?" he mumbled, watching his fat bedizened fingers brush the gray flakes from the lapel of his dinner jacket. "The emeralds couldn't have been found on Mally unless"—the colorless eyes lifted sharply to Lanyard's face—"unless you put them there!"

"My gifts are small; I am hardly so clever as monsieur flatters me by supposing."

"By God!" Morphew heaved out of his chair in a cold rage of conviction, "you planted the stuff on the boy!"

"But," Lanyard pointed out, his suavity unruffled, "if you are so positive the emeralds were in my possession before they were found on Mallison, the admission is implicit that you had compromising knowledge of the robbery. Else how can you be so sure?"

"I'm satisfied you stole 'em," Morphew growled. "I'm satisfied you planted 'em on Mally for fear they'd be found on you."

"But why?" Lanyard argued as one perplexed but reasonable. "Have you never been mistaken in reading the hearts of those whom you employ? Remember what you must have known about Mallison before you reckoned him skillful and unscrupulous enough to be of use to you. Was it altogether wise, do you think, to trust such a one to resist the temptation to keep for himself the plunder you had set him to steal and bestow on me for my undoing? Was it wise to forget the least miscarriage of the scheme would leave you unable to prove your tool had been false to your trust? Was it wise to believe Mallison too dense to think of that for himself? How can you be sure he didn't put the jewels into his own pocket instead of into mine?"

"See here——" Morphew stammered, equanimity at last shaken beyond dissembling.

"Ah! but there I have you," Lanyard chuckled. "There I touched the heel of Achilles—eh, monsieur?—your vulnerable spot! The truth is, you dare trust nobody; you don't know that Mallison didn't play you false any more than you know now that he won't, when the pinch comes, turn State's evidence and betray you to save himself."

"Get out of my way!" Morphew bit through his cigar and cast it from him with a violent hand. "I've had enough of this, I've stood for about all of your nonsense——"

"By all means, monsieur"—Lanyard politely stood clear of the door—"hasten to the police station and put the fear of God into the heart of this poor thing whom you were fool enough to trust. You haven't a minute to lose if you hope to succeed in stopping the mouths of those four whom the police are even now, doubtless, putting through the third degree——"

"Four?" Morphew checked short in ponderous dismay, his heavy head low between his shoulders and swaying like that of a tormented animal. "Four!"

"Bless my soul! did I forget to tell you? How unpardonably stupid of me. The lady so lost to shame that she openly accuses herself of being Mrs. Mallison, the enterprising Mr. Howlin and his associate Mr. Regan—all stepped with Mallison into the trap you'd set for Mrs. McFee, for the purposes of blackmail, and sprung it on themselves. If you doubt my word you'll find them at the east Fifty-first Street police station."

"If that's true," Morphew rumbled, barely articulate, "if I owe that to you, Lanyard——"

"It is—you do."

"You'll settle with me, you crook—if you hide at the ends of the earth, I'll find you and break you——"

"Ah! Thanks, my good Morphew, many thanks!" Lanyard laughed in high delight. "How (Continued on page 153)

By ADELA ROGERS ST. JOHNS

The Great God FOUR-FLUSH

A Story of an Artificial Woman

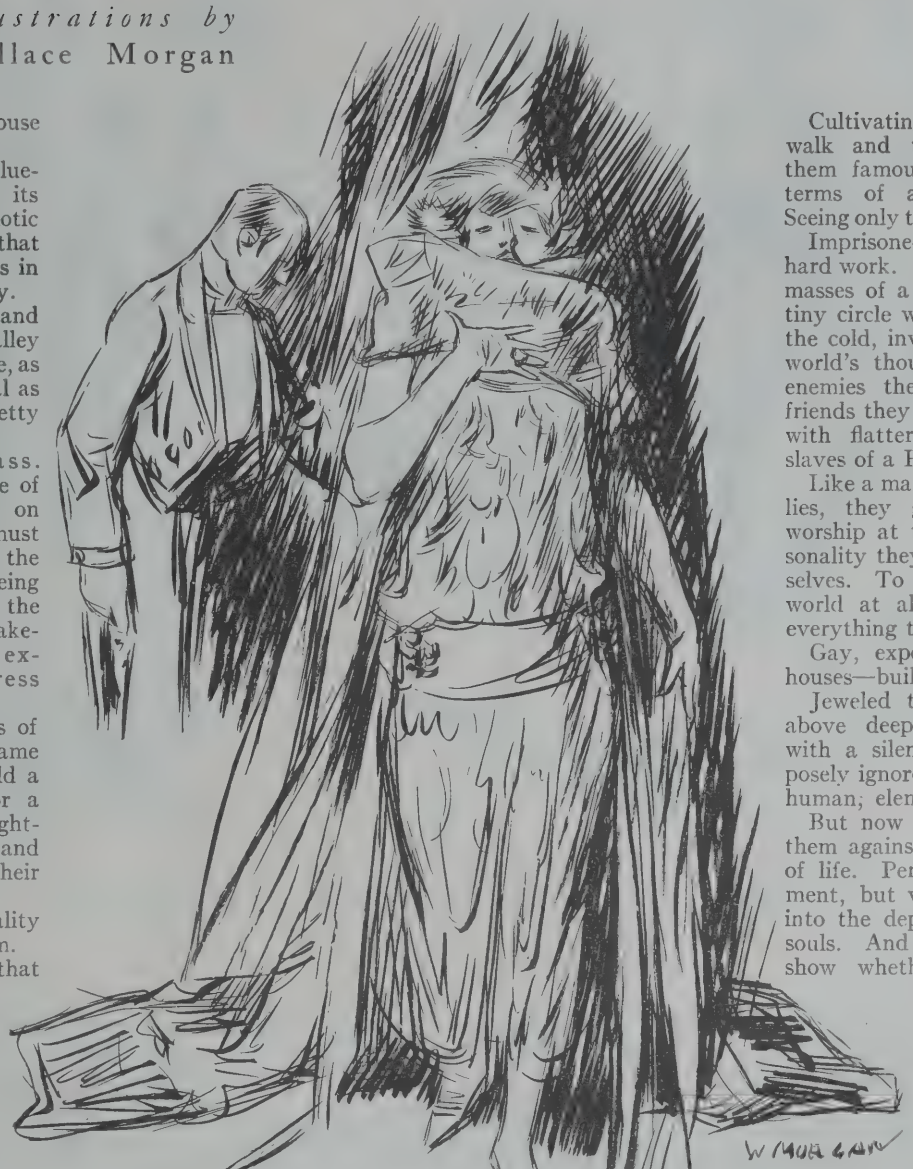
Illustrations by Wallace Morgan

IT IS a giant hothouse—Hollywood.

Beneath the blue-green roofs of its glass stages bloom exotic plants lacking only that perfume which honeys in the sunshine of reality.

Orchids and roses and even lilies of the valley grow luxuriantly there, as alluring and as unreal as the mascara on a pretty woman's eyelashes.

Bred under glass. Warmed by the glare of electric lights. Fed on facile emotions that must answer the touch of the director's whip. Seeing in their triple mirrors the intriguing mask of make-up. Hearing the expensive lies of press agents.



The shooting stars of Hollywood who flame into the sky and hold a world spellbound for a time by the sheer brightness of their beauty and the strangeness of their lure.

The curse of artificiality lies heavily upon them.

So heavily often that they dare not drink from the well of experience which alone inspires great art.

They serve a thousand idols of affectation.

Their common daily round is as hectic and as gaudy as the whirl of a merry-go-round.

Gwynne Gunning was a study in water colors, by Herself.

Flung headlong from a two room flat on the Chicago L. From the drab existence of a Nebraska farmhouse. From the staid coldness of a New England parsonage. From the noisy crowds of Tenth Avenue in New York City. Flung into direct contact with adulation, wealth, fame, position—too many times the tinsel enters the soul of them.

Why, they're only kids—kids without tradition, without background, without training.

Sometimes it intoxicates them into forgetfulness of every law the staid, conventional, everyday world insists upon. Sends them to the very depths of indulgence and mad pleasure. Strips them bare of even a desire to hide their own weaknesses.

Sometimes they forget only what manner of women they really are. They acquire the manner and the pose and the appearance and the habits of polished women of the world. And they cease to consider that, underneath, the little girl who once played in Tenth Avenue lives and breathes and loves and hates.

Cultivating the smile and the walk and the pout that made them famous. Thinking only in terms of a twenty-four sheet. Seeing only the too alluring present.

Imprisoned by long hours of hard work. Driven by the staring masses of a curious public into a tiny circle where they never meet the cold, invigorating blast of the world's thought. Surrounded by enemies they must placate and friends they must satisfy. Stuffed with flattery, they become the slaves of a Pose.

Like a man who believes his own lies, they grow—these girls—to worship at the shrine of the personality they have built for themselves. To defend it from the world at all costs. To sacrifice everything to it.

Gay, expensive, amazing little houses—built upon quicksand.

Jeweled temples constructed above deep crevices that swell with a silent, unrecognized, purposely ignored torrent of common, human, elemental emotion.

But now and then fate dashes them against the nakedest reality of life. Perhaps only for a moment, but vitally enough to dig into the depths of their spangled souls. And only that test can show whether they have been eaten alive by their own affectations, or whether the soul of a real woman throbs within the irresistible creature they have fashioned for the world to adore.

Whether the Great God Four-Flush rules them beyond hope of redemption, or whether the soil heritage of their ancestors will sweep away artificialities as a tidal wave sweeps away the puny defenses of civilization.

The answer is always easy to read. For then, they either sink beneath the load of chinchilla and diamonds and press agent lies, into oblivion. Or they give to the screen its moments of great acting.

As she gathered up the scattered books and papers, Mlle. Decourbey sighed just a little. There was something about Gwynne Gunning that always made her sigh.

She was a tall, plain woman, and when she was with Miss Gunning she felt taller and plainer than ever.

It was an impression that Miss Gunning was apt to make upon other women—a conviction that they were blowzy and awkward and heavy beside the Venetian glass perfection of her.

The French teacher adored an instant longer the picture before her. Approved with her own Parisian taste the drape of Laurine Johnstone, with her titled husband. Yes, she was impressed by Gwynne's dinner party. And she was very cordial to Gwynne.

orchid chiffon that swathed the little figure. The richness of the chinchilla rug across the little feet. The gleam of soft, riotous golden curls against black velvet and rose satin.

Perhaps it was all just a little too perfect, for good taste.

But Mlle. Decourbey did not know that Gwynne Gunning had been born on the west side of New York where she could almost hear the shouts from Hell's Kitchen in her cradle. Otherwise it would have seemed amazing enough that Gwynne should come so near to achieving the really elegant thing.

A French doll.

She sighed again. Life, after all, meant very little to a woman without beauty.

Beauty? Shuffling together the papers upon which Gwynne had written her French exercises in a delicate, artificial hand, the Frenchwoman wondered if Gwynne Gunning had beauty.

What did it matter?

She had something without which beauty is an empty cup.

A lure that was molded into every line of her slim body, every sense-stirring contour of her little face.

It was a bit like a play, to teach Gwynne Gunning. You became a character in the drama of herself which Gwynne was always staging—a comedy-drama of four-flush.

With one of those flashes of insight which her long experience of life had given her, the woman wondered if Gwynne had ever had a real emotion. Ever uttered a sincere word. Ever done a natural, unpremeditated thing in all the long months she had taught her. Tried to visualize her sweet insincerity in the grip of something tremendous. Wondered what she would do in a vital crisis.

And gave it up. Inwardly chuckling as she compared her with another pupil, hard-boiled, reckless, dissipated Aileen Preston, who shouted from the curbstone her impudent motto, "Be yourself." And who said saucily of Gwynne Gunning: "Does she believe all that stuff she pulls? How do they get that way, eh? Always pretending to be something they don't even know what it's all about."

Gwynne Gunning was simply a study in water colors, by Herself.

Mlle. Decourbey tucked the last book under her arm. "Tomorrow at the same time?" she asked.

Gwynne Gunning came back from that delicious dreamland where she had apparently been pursuing beautiful thoughts, and smiled. It was the smile of a great lady. Kind and sweet but with just the necessary touch of hauteur.

"I'm afraid not, mademoiselle." The French teacher suppressed the shudder which Gwynne's French always sent through her. Oddly enough, she had eliminated the Tenderloin twang from her English, but it rasped through every word of French. "I shall be working tomorrow. Come on Saturday, please."

To the maid who came in, Gwynne said: "Jeanne, bring me that copy of Browning I left in the music room last night. I do not wish to be disturbed until four-thirty. Ask my secretary to come then. Mr. Austin is coming to tea at five. And I am dining out. Will you ask Porter to be a trifle more careful about the arrangement of the tea table? Perhaps a few scattered rose leaves would be nice. I cannot eat unless things are daintily served. And please tell cook that unless I am entertaining I do not care for meat, except chicken or a bit of fish. That is all."

The maid nodded seriously. She had no way of knowing that on location, or at hurried, unobserved luncheons Gwynne Gunning might still satisfy a deep yearning for steak and onions, or juicy corn beef and cabbage.

Outside, the afternoon sunshine fought the rolling bank of evening clouds and won to a hue as living and vital as the breath of the sea.

But in Gwynne Gunning's boudoir, the taffeta curtains veiled the windows. Even in her town car, heavy silk curtains shut out the daylight. Daylight made one squint.

Except for the frilly reading lamp above the day bed, the room now glowed only with soft light from brackets of painted candles.

The big day bed stood in the center of a black velvet carpet. About it foamed heaps of cushions, like cream puffs constructed of luscious fabrics. The faintest breath stirred the pastel-tinted ostrich plumes that filled the big gilt basket. A delicate, naked dancing girl blew clouds of incense.

Soul-stifling. Heart-smothering. The narcotic of luxury.

Gwynne Gunning relaxed utterly. Her pretense of reading the poems before her ceased. Relaxing was so good for one. It wiped out any little strain, any tenseness of muscle. It sponged off the ghost of a stray smile. Of course Gwynne Gunning never laughed. She had learned that early in the game. Laughter brought wrinkles.

And she never cried. For drops of water wore lines even in stone. And in that soft velvet skin of Gwynne Gunning's they must leave traces that could not be massaged away. No matter how much she longed to indulge in a good, old-fashioned howl. To relieve her clamped soul with unseemly shrieks of mirth, as she and Sadie Fallows used to do of a Sunday afternoon when they strolled up Thirty-fourth Street—no matter how these longings shook her, she indulged them but seldom any more.

The camera is a cruel taskmaster.

Gwynne knew that she lived in the heart of the public only by her loveliness. She had become hardened to the printed repetition of the fact that she could not act. Had no more expression than a wax doll. Was a stunning clotheshorse and nothing else.

Sometimes the clamor of an old, vital ambition to act started her pulses. Sometimes the memories of old dreams—common, honest, girl dreams—crept like wan little ghosts into her idle thoughts. She had wanted earthily to be a great actress once.

But now—she was afraid of emotions. Now she was a lady. And emotions could never be ladylike. She knew that. Besides, they were hideous things. She had decided upon the path she wished to follow.

The domino of a Parisian marquise became her excellently well.

When she came into the drawing room at ten minutes after five to greet Gregg Austin, the bloom of a beauty nap was still upon her.

The pastel train of her tea gown trailed into a stately weight of her favorite chinchilla. Somehow its expensive elegance symbolized all that Gwynne Gunning hoped to gain from life.

The chiffons wrapped her exquisite figure as the petals wrap a rosebud. Austin took in appreciatively the full, firm bust, the supple, slender waist, the round, pointed limbs.

He did not understand her.

Gwynne Gunning challenged the senses as a sunset challenges the eye. Yet having issued that challenge she refused to recognize it.

He could not classify her. Could not be sure whether she was lady or demi-mondaine or merely manikin.

She came across to him with the famous Gwynne Gunning walk—the fierce glide of a panther in the fluffy softness of a kitten—and held out a little hand upon which one big pearl nestled.

"I am glad you have come," she said. "I am upset. Will you have tea or a highball?"

She nodded his order to the butler. And he grinned inwardly at the languid elegance with which she sank into a big chair. If it was a trick, it was a very good trick. He couldn't be sure.

"Miss Garvy has just brought me the New York reviews of my last picture," she said slowly. "I ran it for you here. They have said most unkind things about my dancing costumes. Gregg, I am hurt."

Gregg Austin stood watching her. For almost a month he had been admitting to himself that he was quite mad about her. Admitting it with just the touch of a sneer. It was, after all, well enough to play about with these pretty little picture girls. Well enough to have his own crowd know he enjoyed the freedom of glittering Bohemia when he chose.

He liked, at dinner parties in Mrs. Wallace Higgen Garrett's Montecito palace, to drop a word here and an anecdote there of his intimacy with the great and near-great of filmdom.

Mrs. Garrett herself had scolded him about his interest in Gwynne Gunning when he went to Santa Barbara to play for the golf cup.

He had laughed it off then, and now—now he was wondering. Now he was having to keep the tightest of tight grips on himself. That she would marry him, he was certain. It would be an exceptionally good thing for her in every way. Exactly what she wanted. But he didn't want to marry her if he could help it.

Now he bent down and laid his brown hand on hers. He was very tall. Very distinguished and disagreeable looking. About his temples was already a sprinkling of gray hairs. He lounged, but he did it well. He had the perfect voice and the charming rudeness of his class.

"No one but a woman would say unkind things about your dancing costumes," he said lightly.

Gwynne thanked him with a wistful upward glance. "You are so kind to me, Gregg. But I am afraid they have not understood me. One hates to have one's highest motives misunderstood. One of them actually said I was—indecent. They intimated that I was only using my—my body to put my pictures over. But Gregg, nature is beautiful, isn't it? I have only been trying to present to them on the screen what the Greeks gave the world in their art. The inspiration of the beautiful. I have been studying Greek literature"—it was a new word, and she said it deliberately—"and it has formed my ideals."

He was still standing, his tall figure in golf clothes outlined against the great, grilled gates that separated the drawing room from the sunken conservatory. As she rose, he puzzled as a clever interviewer had done only that morning over the source of the thoughts she had expressed so charmingly. Were they really her own?

She put one hand on his coat in pretty appeal. "Gregg, my art is all I live for. I am really very spirituelle. Am I not spirituelle on the screen?"

It was the first time Gregg Austin had ever lost his head.

He let her go before a volley of small, clenched fists—fists that developed claws—claws that scratched. Let her go as her vicious, frantic kicks drummed against his shins.

It was the rage of an alley cat. The spitting, lynx-like venom of women who know no other way to defend the body that is theirs.

"You beast, you keep your dirty hands off me, you hear?" she flamed at him.

"I'm sorry. But I'm a man, you know. No man can be with you day in and day out as I've been and not lose his head."

A shudder shook her. Her face was chalky but the lips had twisted back to their sweet and wistful smile. She lifted a pathetic dignity to her aid, and it was like watching a strong man lift a weight.

"You, my friend!" she said. "That is a side of life I know nothing of. It repulses me. I am too spirituelle for that."

A cynical smile shot across his face. "You mean you've never cared for a man like that?"

Reproachfully she shook her head at him. And it flashed upon him that he had seen her do exactly this scene, even to the exquisite quivering of her white throat, on the screen many times.

But truly this time she could not answer.

She was torn between a desire to give rein to her furious anger at his touch, and a knowledge that she could not.

And she was thinking—seeing—remembering, maddeningly, hatefully.

Thinking of her immigrant mother, that ignorant and beautiful creature who had sold and sacrificed all to many loves. Of the dark, violent boy to whom she herself had given her first kisses. Of the suave, cold man whose gambling house she had helped to brilliant success and who in return had helped her to her first chance.

That girl—little Alma Schwartz—had never really existed.

She—she was Gwynne Gunning. A lady. An exquisite idol. A rich woman. Photographed. Served. She knew nothing of those noisy, dirty, poverty-stricken streets. She came from a little village in the lovely South—her biography said so.

Her voice, when it came, was low and sweet and sincere.

"I'm afraid I never could."

He felt himself baffled. Doubting her absolutely. Yet unable to put his finger on the weak spot. Afraid to call what he sensed was a bluff for fear it just might not be.

"Gwynne, you're fighting away from everything real in the world. You're hiding from life itself."

She only shook her head, lovely blue eyes averted. "I am just myself, Gregg. My director says I shall never be a great actress until I feel and know more of life. But—I don't want it. I love things just the way they are. Please, Gregg, just be my friend."

If marriage was in the back of both their minds, neither brought it forward. Gwynne saw her chance to follow up the scene—her chance perhaps to win from him the question she so much wanted to hear. But she had not the strength to play it out.

For with hasty, nervous fingers, poor little Gwynne Gunning was busy burying anew and deeper than ever that lightning flash of remembrance that had torn through her complacent indolence—and praying that it might never come again.

II

GWYNNE GUNNING swayed in her seat.

With her two hands she gripped violently at the edge of the rough chair in which she sat. The breath had stopped in her throat. Her heart was pounding like some wild thing suddenly uncaged.

Her heart! Her heart that she had schooled to beat so evenly, so surely through life. Oh, why had she come?

She looked fearfully about her, feeling a shamed sense that the wave of color sweeping her from head to foot must be visible to everyone around her.

Then her eyes went again to the ring and stayed there, hungrily, as shyly hot and sweet as the eyes of the simplest woman in the world.

The great roofed arena was almost full of smoke, so that the air she drew frantically into her aching lungs was acrid and harsh.

It was strangely dark about her, like a gulf inhabited by passions and not by people at all. Dark except for that white, raised square of canvas on which the glare of electric lights beat so revealingly.

Never, since childhood days when she had seen street fights, had Gwynne Gunning felt the beat of primitive, elemental emotions that swept her now. The roar of the crowd as the fight went on was like the crash of some giant living thing.

An atmosphere like that did things to you.

Why had she come, oh why had she come?

Gregg went to the boxing matches in Hollywood every Friday night. He had tried often before to persuade her. So many women went now. She would see all the stars who worked on her lot, many of her best friends, at the ringside. The arena was owned and managed by the American Legion. The fights were clean and orderly and well conducted. The crowd was high-class. It was a recognized sport now.

Lots of the women he knew came over from Pasadena. In fact, fights were distinctly good form, since the war. Society leaders put on boxing cards for their pet charities.

Anyway, she had come.

It is very hard to hide from life.

The first fights had not particularly interested her. Rather, they had actually seemed slow and stupid to her. She kept the

Gregg Austin—
the first time he ever lost his head. Gwynne's was the rage of an alley cat.

dainty laces of her scented handkerchief against her lips. Or buried her chin in the familiar warmth of her chinchilla.

And then the crowd had suddenly surged to a cheer, to a wave of affectionate welcome.

Even Gregg, in his superior, patronizing manner, had called out, "Hi, Joe, go get this bird!"

A man behind her was jostling her hat. Standing up and yelling:

"He ain't got a thing on you, ole boy. Remember that right to the stomick."

The figure they hailed, wrapped in a blue bathrobe, sat down on a little white stool in a corner quite close to her.

She had a moment's impression of a wonderfully clean-cut young head. A haughty, indifferent young profile, with a fine, straight nose. A crest of smooth brown hair. A column of throat like a Greek boy's.

"Who is that?" she whispered to Gregg.

"Oh! that's Joe Flynn, the best boy they have here. He's cleaned up every lightweight on the Coast, so they've brought a big card on from New York to fight him. Flynn's got the making of a real scrapper."

Another man came into the opposite corner, a squat, dark fellow with a marred and battered face.

The boy rose, slipped off his bathrobe and eased himself up and down on the ropes.

Suddenly Gwynne Gunning's eyes were filled with a vision. A vision of splendid, rippling shoulders that tapered down into a slim, beautiful waist. A skin that dazzled, white as the fairest woman's. Powerful, tapering arms and a lithe, magnificent grace.

More beautiful, stronger and more perfect than any woman's body could ever be.

"Gee, he's a swell built boy," some man near her said loudly. "Look at them shoulders. Ain't he a (Continued on page 106)

THE HOPE OF Happiness

The Setting of the story is an Ohio city today, and it concerns the lives of:

BRUCE STORRS, a young architect of fine personal character.

FRANKLIN MILLS, his real father, an aristocrat, rich, conservative and influential, though little understood by his fellow citizens.

SHEPHERD MILLS, Franklin's son, a dreamer whose character is the antithesis of his father's, and who is head of a storage battery plant.

CONSTANCE MILLS, Shepherd's wife, a social parvenu, restless and avid of personal admiration.

LEILA MILLS, Franklin's daughter, a favorite child, charming but just now inclined to run wild.

MILLICENT HARDEN, Leila's friend, who has beauty and artistic genius.

"BUD" HENDERSON, an old college friend of Bruce's who is as generous and likable as he is irresponsible.

"BILL" FREEMAN, a prominent architect.

DALE FREEMAN, his wife, whose home is the rendezvous for an intelligent social set.

A Résumé of Parts One and Two:

THE world of Bruce Storrs metaphorically comes tumbling about his ears when his mother confesses to him before she dies that he is not John Storrs's son. Her one lapse in a faithful wedded life had been an impetuous love affair with one Franklin Mills two years after her marriage. Bruce is Mills's son.

After a long walking trip to readjust his views, Bruce obeys his mother's dying request and goes to the Ohio city where Mills lives, to work near him.

There he falls in at once with Bud Henderson and is introduced by Bud to nearly everyone of interest and importance. Through Bud, too, he becomes assistant to Bill Freeman, and at Dale Freeman's house meets his half-brother, Shepherd Mills, and Constance, both of whom take a liking to him, Constance as usual starting a mild flirtation. Bruce, of course, keeps the secret of his parentage to himself.

Later Bruce meets Millicent Harden and his half-sister, Leila Mills, by the process of rescuing them from a motor boat stalled on the river. Leila is rather the worse for drink. Toward Millicent, who, he learns, is rather out of it socially because her father made his money in patent medicines, he feels a decided attraction.

At a dance this attraction deepens. Millicent introduces him to Franklin Mills, his own father. Both men are deeply and secretly affected, for Mills is at once struck by Bruce's name and appearance and cannot help wondering if the boy is his own son. The feeling begins to haunt his mind, stirring up old memories of Bruce's mother.

Bruce is again brought to his father's attention when Shepherd Mills gets him to draw up rough plans for a clubhouse he wants to construct for his employees, on some property of Franklin Mills adjoining the plant. This plan Mills brusquely turns down, as he does all of Shepherd's humanitarian schemes, thereby again deeply hurting the feelings of his son.

That evening Shepherd and Constance have dinner at Franklin Mills's house, prior to a dance. Alone with Shepherd, Mills privately requests him to have Constance exert some good influence over Leila, whose drinking he has noticed and whose "gallivanting" with one Thomas, divorced, he dislikes; meanwhile, upstairs, Leila is taking a surreptitious drink. While the young people are at the dance, Mills is to call on Millicent Harden, at whose home he is a frequent visitor.

MEREDITH NICHOLSON'S

Vital Novel of American Life

Constance

Illustrations by Pruett Carter

Part Three: CHAPTER V

IN THE fortnight following his encounter with Mills at the Hardens', and the later meeting that same night in the storm, Bruce had thrown himself with fierce determination into his work. There must be no repetitions of such meetings; they added to his self-consciousness, made him ill at ease even when walking the streets in which at a turn of any corner he might run into Mills.

He had never known that he had a nerve in his body but now he was aware of disturbing sensations, inability to concentrate on his work, even a tremor of the hands as he bent over his drawing board. His abrupt change from the open road to an office in some measure accounted for this and he began going to a public golf links on Saturday afternoons and Sundays, and against the coming of winter he had his name proposed for membership in an athletic club.

He avoided going anywhere that might bring him again in contact with the man he believed to be his father. Shepherd Mills he met at the University Club now and then, and he was not a little ashamed of himself for repelling the young man's friendly overtures. Shepherd, evidently feeling that he must in some way explain his silence as to the clubhouse for the battery plant employees for which Bruce had made tentative sketches, spoke of the scheme one day as a matter he was obliged to defer for the present.

But Bruce too has called on Millicent that evening. He admires the extraordinary fine decorative quality of her music room with its stained glass window depicting a knight in armor, and she plays the organ for him. As she plays, Franklin Mills comes in. The three talk only a few moments when Mills excuses himself.

Going home, Bruce meets Mills in the rain and is invited into the latter's house. He cannot help accepting, though the constant meetings with the Mills family are deeply disturbing to him. As they talk before the fire of commonplace things, Mills keeps studying something above Bruce's head. This, Bruce finds, is a portrait of Mills's father, who looks extraordinarily like Bruce himself.

After Bruce leaves, it seems to Mills that his father's eyes—the eyes of young Storrs—are fixed upon him with a curious disconcerting gravity.

"Does this Storrs," asked Mills, "go out among people you know?" "Oh, I think so, dada!" said Leila.

"It's a little late in the season to begin; and father's doubtful about it—thinks it might cause feeling among the men in other concerns. I hadn't thought of that aspect of the matter——"

Shepherd paused and frowned as he waited for Bruce to offer some comment on the abandonment of the project. It was none of Bruce's affair but he surmised that the young man had been keenly disappointed by his father's refusal to sanction the building of the clubhouse.

"Oh well, it doesn't matter!" Bruce remarked as though it were merely a professional matter of no great importance. But he thought intently, as he left Shepherd, about the relations of the father and son. They were utterly irreconcilable natures. Having seen Franklin Mills, sat at his fireside, noted the man's enjoyment of ease and luxury, it was not difficult to understand his lack of sympathy with Shepherd's radical tendencies. Piecing together what he had heard about Mills from Henderson and Millicent Harden with his own estimate, Bruce was confident that whatever else Franklin Mills might be he was no altruist.

It was in Bruce's heart to be kind and he was sorry after he left Shepherd that he had been so brusque. He might at least have expressed his sympathy with the young man's wish to do something to promote the happiness of his workmen. The vitality so evident in Franklin Mills's vigorous figure, and his perfect poise, made Shepherd appear almost ridiculous in contrast.

Bruce noted that the other young men about the club did not treat Shepherd quite as one of themselves. When Shepherd sat at the big round table in the grill he would listen to the free give and take with a pathetic eagerness to share in their good fellowship, but unable to make himself quite one of them. This might have been due, Bruce thought, to the anxiety of Shepherd's contemporaries—young fellows he had grown up with—to show their indifference to the fact that he was the son of the richest man in town. Or they felt, perhaps, that Shepherd was not equal to his opportunities. No one ever had occasion to refer to him as a profligate young prince whose evil ways were bound to land him in the poorhouse or the gutter.

"I asked him to call and he hasn't. I guess the joke's on me."

Bruce was sorry for Shepherd and in other circumstances would have felt moved to make a friend of him. But the fact that they were of the same blood haunted him like a hideous oft-recurring nightmare.

II

Bruce had reached a mood common to sensitive men in which he craved talk with a woman—a woman of understanding. It was Saturday and the office closed at noon. He would ask Millicent to share his freedom by driving into the country; and without giving himself time to debate the matter, he made haste to call her on the telephone.

Her voice responded cheerily. Leila had just broken an engagement with her for golf and wouldn't he play? When he explained that he wasn't a member of a club and the best he could do would be to take her to a public course, she declared that he must be her guest. The point was too trivial for discussion; the sooner they got off the better, and so two o'clock found them both with a good initial drive starting over the Country Club course.

"Long drives mean long talks," she said. "We start at least with the respect of our caddies. You'll never guess what I was doing when you called up!"

"At the organ, or in the studio putting a nose on somebody?"

"Wrong! I was planting tulip bulbs. This was a day when I couldn't have played a note or touched clay to save my life. Ever have such fits?"

"I certainly do," replied Bruce.

Today he was finding her different from the girl who had played for him, and yet not the girl of his adventure on the river or the Millicent he had met at the Country Club party. There was a charm in her variableness, perhaps because of her unchanging sincerity and instinctive kindness. He waited for her to putt and rolled his own ball into the cup.

"Sometimes I see things black; and then there does appear to be blue sky," he said.

"Yes; but that's not a serious symptom. If we didn't have those little mental experiences we wouldn't be interesting to ourselves!"

"Great Scott! Must we be interesting to ourselves!"

"Absolutely!"

"But when I'm down in the mouth I don't care whether I'm interesting or not!"

"Nothing in it! Life's full of things to do—you know that! I believe you're just trying to psychoanalyze me!"

"I swear I'm not! I was as blue as indigo this morning; that's why I called you up!"

"Now——" she carefully measured a short approach and played it neatly. "Oh, you didn't want to see me socially, so to speak; you just wanted someone to tell your troubles to! Is that a backhanded compliment?"

"Rather a confession—do you hate it?"

"No—I rather like that . . ."

With an artist's eye she watched him drive a long low ball with his brassie. His tall figure, the free play of arms and shoulders, his boyish smile when she praised the shot contributed to a new impression of him. He appeared younger than the night he called on her when she had thought him diffident, old-fashioned and stiffly formal.

As they walked over the turf with a misty drizzle wetting their faces fitfully it seemed to both that their acquaintance had just begun. When he asked if she didn't want to quit she protested that she was dressed for any weather. It was unnecessary to accommodate himself to her in any way; she walked as rapidly as he; when she sliced her ball into the rough she bade him not follow her and when she had gotten into the course again she ran to join him, as though eager not to break the thread of their talk. The thing she was doing at a given moment was, he judged, the one thing in the world that interested her. The wind rose presently and blew the mist away and there was promise of a clearing sky.

"You've brought the sun back!" he exclaimed. "Something told me you had influence with the weather."

"I haven't invoked any of my gods today; so give the Weather Bureau the credit."

"Your gods! You speak as though you had a list."

"Good gracious! You promised me once not to pick me up and make me explain myself."

"Then I apologize. I can see that it isn't fair to make a goddess explain her own divinity."

"Oh-o-o-o," she mocked him. "You get zero for that!"

She was walking along with her hands thrust into the pockets of her sweater, the brim of her small sport hat turned up.

"But seriously," she went on, "out of doors is the best place to think of God. The churches make religion seem so complicated. We can't believe in a God we can't imagine. Where there's sky and grass it's all so much simpler. The only God I can feel is a spirit hovering all about, watching and loving us—the God of the Blue Horizons. I can't think of Him as a being whose name must be whispered as children whisper of terrifying things in the dark."

"The God of the Blue Horizons?" He repeated the phrase slowly. "Yes; the world has had its day of fear—anything that lifts our eyes to the blue sky is good—really gives us, I suppose, a sense of the reality of God."

It was a novel experience to be walking over a golf course with a girl whose thoughts ranged the infinite and who disclosed her views with a perfect naturalness that was quite in keeping with the scene.

"I may be wrong but to me it's a very satisfactory idea. When I was a little girl and went to church I thought God must be terrible. But after a while, when I decided that God is greater than the creeds and churches teach, and that He isn't cruel, but infinitely kind, and wouldn't be pleased to have us approach Him on our knees as though He were a glowering potentate—then I began to be happy. The churches put God too far away. I like to think my Heaven is right here—just as fine and beautiful as I can make it. Does that seem reasonable?" she asked smilingly.

"It sounds pretty fine," he replied soberly.

They had encountered few players, but a foursome was now approaching them where the lines of the course paralleled.

"Constance Mills and George Whitford; I don't know the others," observed Millicent.

Mrs. Mills waved her hand and started toward them, looking very fit in a smart sport suit. Idly swinging her driver she had hardly the air of a zealous golfer.

"Ah!" she exclaimed. "Aren't we the brave ones? Scotch blood! Not afraid of a little moisture. Mr. Storrs! I know now why you've never been to see me—you're better occupied. It's dreadful to be an old married woman. You see what happens, Millicent! I warn you solemnly against marriage. Yes, George—I'm coming. Nice to meet you, even by chance, Mr. Storrs. By-by, Millicent."

"You've displeased her ladyship," Millicent remarked. "You ought to go to see her."

"I haven't felt strongly moved," Bruce replied.

'She doesn't like being ignored. Of course nobody does, but Mrs. Mills demands to be amused."

"Is she being amused now?" Bruce asked.

Millicent laughed aloud.

"I wish Leila could have heard that!"

"Doesn't Leila like Mrs. Mills?"

"Yes, of course she does, but Constance is called the most beautiful and the best dressed woman in town and the admiration she gets goes to her head a little bit. Leila has a sense of humor that sees right through Constance's poses."

"Doesn't Leila pose just a little herself?"

"You might say that she does. Just now she's affecting the fast young person pose; but I hope she's about through with it. She's really the finest girl alive but she kids herself with the idea that she's an awful devil. Her whole crowd are affected by the same bug."

"I rather guessed that," said Bruce. "Let me see—was that five for you?"

"I have no right to help you," Bruce said. "It's part of the game in this funny world that we've got to help ourselves."

III

WHEN they reached the clubhouse Millicent proposed that they go home for the tea which alone could fittingly conclude the

"I want to come back sometime," Bruce told Millicent. "It's been a great afternoon for me."

ıfternoon. The moment they entered the Harden hall she lifted ıer arms dramatically.

"Jumbles!" she cried in a mockery of delight. "Mother has ɔeen making jumbles! Come straight to the kitchen!"

In the kitchen they found Mrs. Harden, her ample figure ɛnveloped in a gingham apron of bright yellow checks that ;eemed to fill the bright, immaculate room with color. Bruce was a little dismayed by his sudden precipitation into the culinary department of the establishment. Millicent was piling a plate with warm jumbles; a maid appeared and began getting the tea things ready. Mrs. Harden, her face aglow from its recent proximity to the gas range, explained to Bruce that it was the cook's afternoon out and at such times she always liked to cook something just to keep her hand in. She was proud of the kitchen with its white-tiled walls and flooring and glittering utensils. The library and the organ belonged to Millie, but Doctor Harden had given her free swing to satisfy her own craving for an up-to-date kitchen.

Bruce's heart warmed under these revelations of the domestic sanctuary. Mrs. Harden's motherliness seemed to embrace the world and her humor and sturdy commonsense were strongly evident. She regaled Bruce with a story of a combat she had lately enjoyed with a plumber. If he would succeed as an architect he must be firm with plumbers!

Alone in the living room with their tea, Millicent and Bruce continued to find much to talk about. She was gay and serious by turns, made him talk of himself, and finding that this evidently was distasteful to him she found the way back to impersonal things again.

"Why go when there will be dinner pretty soon?" she asked when he rose.

"Because I want to come back sometime! I want some more jumbles! It's been a great afternoon for me. I do like the atmosphere of this house—kitchen and everything. And the outdoors was fine—and you——"

"I hoped you'd remember I was part of the scenery!"

"I couldn't forget it if I wanted to—and I don't! Do you suppose we could do it all over again—sometime when you're not terribly busy?"

"Oh, I'll try to bear another afternoon with you!"

"Or we might do a theater or a movie?"

"Even that is possible."

He didn't know that she was exerting herself to send him away cheerful. When he said soberly, his hand on the door, "You don't know how much you've helped me," she held up her finger warningly.

"Not so serious! Always cheerful—that's the word!"

"All right! You may have to say that pretty often."

Her light laugh, charged with friendliness, followed him down the steps. She had made him forget himself, lifted him several times to heights he had never known before.

But as he walked away a dark question crossed his mind: What would Millicent say if she knew?

IV

On a gray November day Bud Henderson sought Bruce at Freeman's office. Bruce looked up from his desk with a frown that cleared as he recognized his friend.

With a cap pushed back on his head and buttoned up in a long ulster, Henderson eyed him stolidly and demanded to know what he was doing.

"Going over some specifications; you might say I'm at work, if you know what the word means."

"Thanks for the compliment, but it's time to quit," Henderson replied, taking a cigarette from a package on Bruce's desk. "I happen to know your boss is playing hand ball this moment at the Athletic and he'll never know you've skipped. I haven't liked a certain look in your eye lately. You're sticking too close to your job. Bill is pleased to death with your work, so you haven't a thing to worry about. Get your bonnet and we'll go out and see what we can stir up."

"I'm in a frame of mind to be tempted. But I ought to finish this stuff."

"Don't be silly," replied Bud, who was prowling about the room viewing the framed plans and drawings on the walls, peering into cabinets, unrolling blue prints merely to fling them aside with a groan of disgust.

"My God! It doesn't seem possible that Bill Freeman would put his name to such things!"

"Don't forget this is a private office, Mr. Henderson. What's agitating your bean?"

"Thought I'd run you up to the art institute to look at some Finnish work they're showing. Perhaps it's Hottentotish; or maybe it's Eskimo art. We've got to keep in touch with the world art movement." Henderson yawned.

"Try again; I pant for real excitement," said Bruce, who was wondering whether his friend really had noticed signs of his recent worry. Henderson, apparently intent upon a volume of prints of English country houses, swung round as Bruce, in putting on his overcoat, knocked over a chair. He crossed the room and laid his hands on Bruce's shoulders.

"I say, old top; this will never do! You're nervous; you're darned nervous. Knocking over chairs—and you with the finest body known in modern times! I watched you the other day eating your lunch all alone at the club—you didn't know I was looking at you. Your expression couldn't be accounted for even by that bum club lunch. Now if it's money——"

"Nothing of the kind, Bud!" Bruce protested. "You'll have me scared in a minute. There's nothing the matter with me. I'm all right; I just have to get readjusted to a new way of living; that's all."

"Well, as you don't thrill to the idea of viewing our local works of art, I'll tell you what I'm really here for. I'm luring you away to sip tea with a widow!"

"A widow! Where do you get the idea that I'm a consoler of widows?"

"This one doesn't need consoling! Helen Torrence is the name; relict of the late James B. deceased. She's been away ever since you lit in our midst and just got home. About our age and not painful to look at. Jim Torrence was a good fifty when he met her, at White Sulphur or some such seat of opulence, and proudly brought her home for local inspection. The gossips forcibly removed most of her moral character, just on suspicion, you understand—but James B.'s money had a soothing effect and she got one foot inside our social door before he passed hence three years ago and left her the boodle he got from his first wife. Helen's a good scout. It struck me all of a heap about an hour ago that she's just the girl to cheer you up. I was just kidding about the art stuff. I telephoned Helen I was coming so we're all set."

"Ah! I see through the whole game! You're flirting with this woman and want me for a blind in case Maybelle finds you out."

"Clever! The boy's clever! But I never try to put anything over on Maybelle. A grand jury hasn't an all-seeinger eye than Mrs. Bud Henderson. Let's beat it!"

On the drive uptown Henderson devoted himself with his usual thoroughness to a recital of the history of Mrs. Torrence. He warned Bruce not to be disturbed by any gossip he might hear about her; the town seethed with gossip, no one was immune. If Mrs. Torrence had been a little too flirtatious for a married woman, her indulgence in this pastime had never troubled her husband. Jim Torrence had been a good sport and a wise guy who wasn't fool enough to think that he could marry a girl half his age and expect her to spend her days sewing for the missionary society. Torrence had been crazy about her and Bud expressed the opinion that the scandalous reports which someone had imported from the Pennsylvania town that had been her home had so enraged her husband as to heighten his blood pressure and shorten his life.

The lady's present social status lay somewhere between the old and the new element, Bud explained. The president of the trust company that administered her affairs belonged to the old crowd—the paralytic or angina pectoris group, as Bud described it, and his wife and daughters just had to be nice to Torrence's widow or run a chance of offending her and losing control of the estate. On the other hand her natural gaiety threw her toward the camps of the newer element who were too busy having a good time to indulge in ancestor worship.

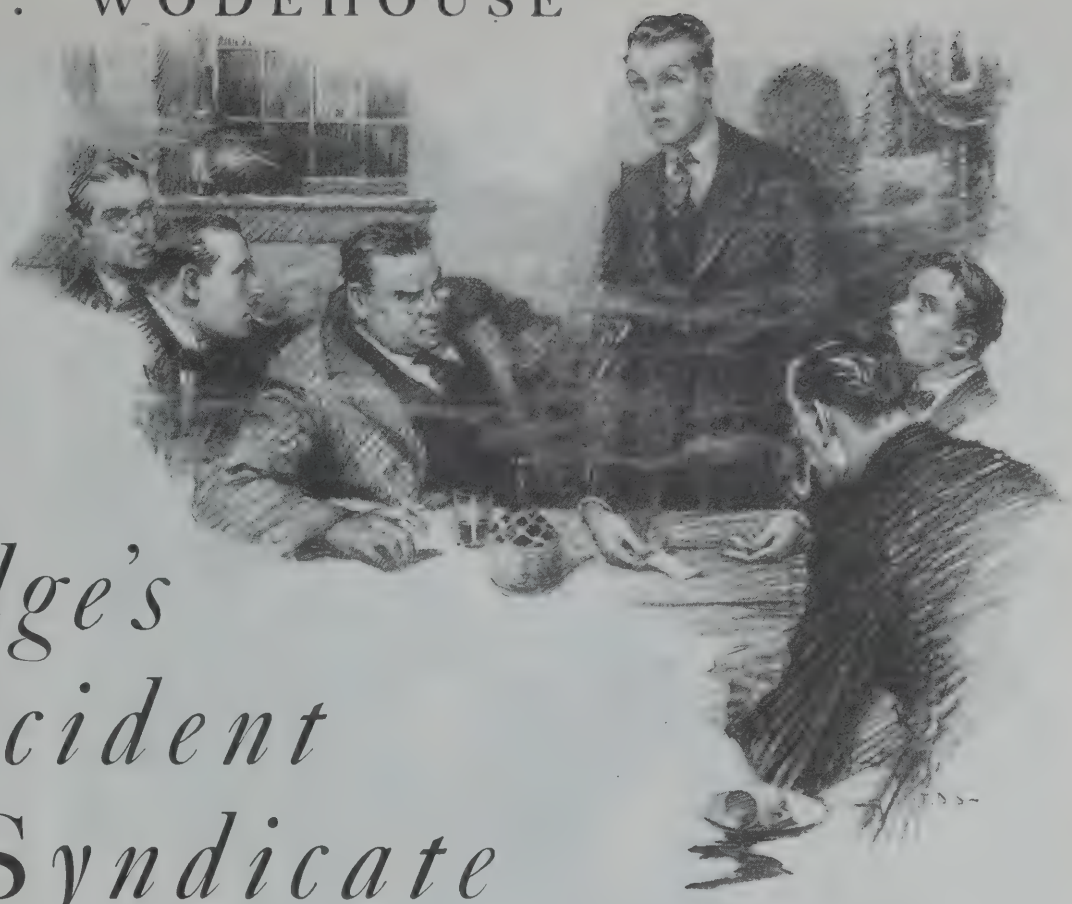
Henderson concluded his illuminative exposition of Mrs. Torrence's life history as they reached the house. They were admitted by a colored butler who took their coats and flung open a door that revealed a spacious living room.

"Helen!" exclaimed Henderson dramatically.

It was possible that Mrs. Torrence had prepared for their entrance by posing in the middle of the room with a view to a first effect, an effect to which her quick little step as she came forward to meet them contributed. Her blue tea gown, parted a little above the ankles, invited inspection of her remarkably small feet adorned with brilliant buckles. She was short with a figure rounded to plumpness and with fluffy brown hair, caught up high as though to create an illusion as to her stature. Her complexion was a clear brilliant pink; her alert small eyes were a greenish blue. Her odd little staccato walk was in keeping with her general air of vivacity. She was all alive, amusingly abrupt, spontaneous, decisive.

"Bud, the old reliable! Mr. Storrs! Yes; I had been hoping for this!"

She gave a hand to each and looked up at Bruce, who towered above her, and nodded her approval of him. "This is delightful! A new man. And a marvelous specimen!"



As she explained that she had been away since June and was only just home Bruce became aware that Henderson had passed on and was standing by a tea table indulging in his usual style of raillery with a young woman whose voice even before he looked at her identified her as Constance Mills.

"You know Mrs. Mills? Of course! If you'd only arrived this morning you'd know Connie. Not to know Connie is indeed to be unknown."

Constance extended her hand from (Continued on page 138)

By P. G. WODEHOUSE

Who Laughs in London and is Heard in Gopher Prairie

Ukridge's Accident Syndicate

Illustrations by T. D. Skidmore

"HALF a minute, laddie," said Ukridge. And, gripping my arm, he brought me to a halt on the outskirts of the little crowd which had collected about the church door.

It was a crowd such as may be seen any morning during the London mating season outside any of the churches in the quiet squares between Hyde Park and the King's Road, Chelsea.

It consisted of five women of cook-like aspect, four nursemaids, half a dozen men of the non-producing class who had torn themselves away for the moment from their normal task of propping up the wall of the Bunch of Grapes public house on the corner, a costermonger with a barrow of vegetables, divers small boys, eleven dogs and two or three purposeful looking young fellows with cameras slung over their shoulders. It was plain that a wedding was in progress—and, arguing from the presence of the camera-men and the line of smart motorcars along the curb, a fairly fashionable wedding. What was not plain—to me—was why Ukridge, sternest of bachelors, had desired to add himself to the spectators.

"What," I inquired, "is the thought behind this? Why are we interrupting our walk to attend the obsequies of some perfect stranger?"

Ukridge did not reply for a moment. He seemed plunged in thought. Then he uttered a hollow, mirthless laugh—a dreadful sound like the last gargle of a dying moose.

"Perfect stranger my number eleven foot!" he responded in his coarse way. "Do you know who's getting hitched up in there?"

"Who?"

Inside the church the organ had swelled into the familiar music of the Wedding March. A verger came out and opened the doors. The five cooks ceased their reminiscences of other and smarter weddings at which they had participated. The camera-men unshipped their cameras. Out of the church came a beauteous being, leading attached to his arm a vision in white.

"Good Lord!" I cried. "Teddy Weeks!" And five years rolled away.

It was at Barolini's Italian restaurant in Beak Street that Ukridge evolved his great scheme. Barolini's was a favorite resort of our little group of earnest strugglers in the days when the philanthropic restaurateurs of Soho used to supply four courses and coffee for a shilling and sixpence; and there were present that night, besides Ukridge and myself, the following men about town: Teddy Weeks, the actor, fresh from a six weeks' tour with the number three Only a Shop Girl company; Victor Beamish, the artist, the man who drew that picture of the O-So-Eesi Piano Player in the advertisement pages of the Piccadilly Magazine; Bertram Fox, author of Ashes of Remorse and other unproduced motion picture scenarios; and Robert Dunhill, who, being employed at a salary of eighty pounds per annum by the New Asiatic Bank, represented the sober, hard headed commercial element. As usual, Teddy Weeks had collared the conversation and was telling us once again how good he was and how hardly treated by a malignant fate.

Modern novelists are fond of writing about the merciless intolerance of youth and youth's clear eyed judgment and all the rest of it; but personally I have always thought that it is the young who are most easily satisfied, particularly when it comes to a choice of companions. Every time I look at the photographs of my school days, I marvel that any community can ever have been broadminded enough to endure the thing I then was.

Apart from that horrible smirk and that brilliantined hair, setting aside the sleek fatness of the cheeks and those dull, repellent eyes, so like a couple of unintelligent poached eggs, how, I wonder now, could my little playmates have stood the sort of collars which I used to wear at that epoch? And yet I had my friends. It was the glorious tolerance of youth that enabled them to bear up and stick it like men; and it was, I suppose, this same tolerance which made us admit Teddy Weeks to fellowship. Ukridge, I own, insisted from the first that the man was a blister and would frequently censure the remissness and lack of public spirit shown by his parents in not having drowned him in a bucket as a child; but to the rest of us he seemed a good enough fellow on the whole.

There is no need to describe Teddy Weeks. Under another and a more euphonious name he has long since made his personal appearance dreadfully familiar to all who read the illustrated weekly papers. He was then, as now, a sickeningly handsome young man, possessing precisely the same melting eyes, mobile mouth and corrugated hair so esteemed by the theater-going public today. And yet at this period of his career he was wasting himself on minor touring companies of the kind which open at Barrow-in-Furness and jump to Bootle for the second half of the week. He attributed this, as Ukridge was so apt to attribute his own difficulties, to lack of capital.

"I have everything," he said querulously, emphasizing his remarks with a coffee spoon. "Looks, talent, personality, a beautiful speaking voice—everything. All I need is a chance. And I can't get that because I have no clothes fit to wear. These managers are all the same—they never look below the surface, they never bother to find out if a man has genius. All they go by is his clothes. If I could afford to buy a couple of suits from a Cork Street tailor, if I could have my boots made to order by Moykopf instead of getting them ready-made and secondhand at Moss Brothers', if I could once contrive to own a decent hat, a really good pair of spats and a gold cigarette case all at the same time, I could walk into any manager's office in London and sign up for a West End production tomorrow."

It was at this point that Freddie Lunt came in. Freddie, like Robert Dunhill, was a financial magnate in the making and an assiduous frequenter of Barolini's; and it suddenly occurred to us that a considerable time had passed since we had last seen him in the place. We inquired the reason for this aloofness.

"I've been in bed," said Freddie, "for over a fortnight."

The statement incurred Ukridge's stern disapproval. That great man made a practice of never rising before noon, and on one occasion, when a carelessly thrown match had burned a hole in his only pair of trousers, had gone so far as to remain between the sheets for forty-eight hours; but sloth on so majestic a scale as this shocked him.

"Lazy young devil," he commented severely. "Letting the golden hours of youth slip by like that when you ought to have been bustling about and making a name for yourself."

Freddie protested himself wronged by the imputation.

"I had an accident," he explained. "Fell off my bicycle and sprained an ankle."

"Tough luck," was our verdict.

"Oh, I don't know!" said Freddie. "It wasn't bad fun getting a rest. And of course there was the fiver."

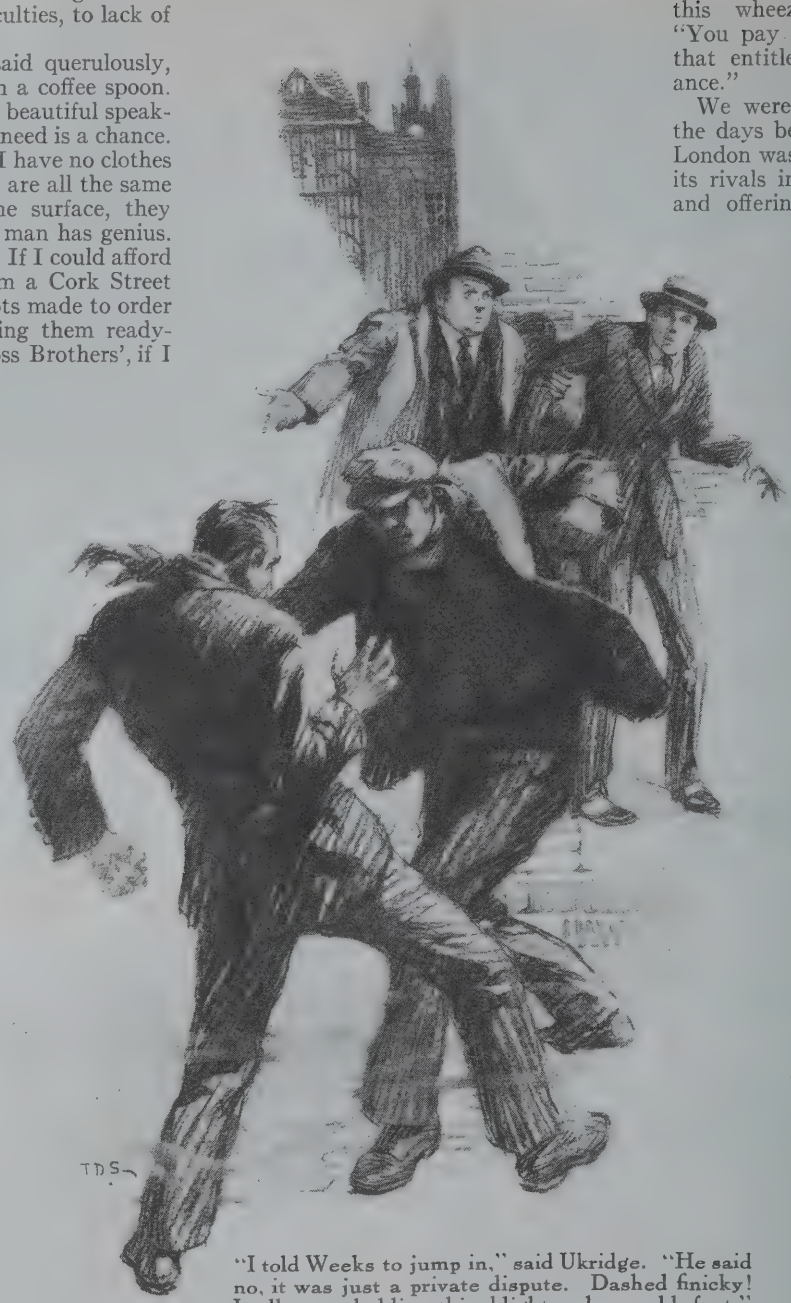
"What fiver?"

"I got a fiver from the Weekly Cyclist for getting my ankle sprained."

"You—what?" cried Ukridge, profoundly stirred—as ever—by a tale of easy money. "Do you mean to sit there and tell me that some dashed paper paid you five quid simply because you sprained your ankle? Pull yourself together, old horse. Things like that don't happen."

"It's quite true."

"Can you show me the fiver?"



"No, because if I did you would try to borrow it."

Ukridge ignored this slur in dignified silence.

"Would they pay a fiver to anyone who sprained his ankle?" he asked, sticking to the main point.

"Yes. If he was a subscriber."

"I knew there was a catch in it," said Ukridge moodily.

"I told Weeks to jump in," said Ukridge. "He said no, it was just a private dispute. Dashed finicky! I tell you, laddie, this blighter has cold feet."

"Lots of weekly papers are starting this wheeze," proceeded Freddie. "You pay a year's subscription and that entitles you to accident insurance."

We were interested. This was in the days before every daily paper in London was competing madly against its rivals in the matter of insurance and offering princely bribes to the citizens to make a fortune by breaking their necks. Nowadays papers are paying as high as two thousand pounds for a genuine corpse and five pounds a week for a mere dislocated spine; but at that time the idea was new and it had an attractive appeal.

"How many of these rags are doing this?" asked Ukridge. You could tell from the gleam in his eyes that that great brain was whirring like a dynamo. "As many as ten?"

"Yes, I should think so. Quite ten."

"Then a fellow who subscribed to them all and then sprained his ankle would get fifty quid?" said Ukridge, reasoning acutely.

"More, if the injury was more serious," said Freddie, the expert. "They have a regular tariff. So much for a broken arm, so much for a broken leg and so forth."

Ukridge's collar leaped off its stud and his pince-nez wobbled drunkenly as he turned to us.

"How much money can you blokes raise?" he demanded.

"What do you want it for?" asked Robert Dunhill, with a banker's caution.

"My dear old horse, can't you see? Why, my gosh, I've got the idea of the century! Upon my Sam, this is the giltest-edged scheme that was ever hatched. We'll get together enough money and take out a year's subscription for every one of these dashed papers."

"What's the good of that?" said Dunhill, coldly unenthusiastic. They train bank clerks to stifle emotion so that they will be able to refuse over-drafts when they become managers. "The odds are we should none of us have an accident of any kind and then the money would be chucked away."

"Good heavens, ass," snorted Ukridge, "you don't suppose I'm suggesting that we should leave it to chance, do you? Listen, here's the scheme. We take out subscriptions for all these papers, then we draw lots, and the fellow who gets the fatal card or whatever it is goes out and breaks his leg and draws the loot and we split it up between us and live on it in luxury. It ought to run into hundreds of pounds."

A long silence followed. Then Dunhill spoke again. His was a solid rather than a nimble mind.

"Suppose he couldn't break his leg?"

"My gosh!" cried Ukridge, exasperated. "Here we are in the twentieth century, with every resource of modern civilization at our disposal, with opportunities for getting our legs broken opening about us on every side—and you ask a silly question like that! Of course he could break his leg. Any ass can break a leg. It's a little hard! We're all infernally broke—personally, nless Freddie can lend me a bit of that fiver till Saturday, I'm oing to have a difficult job pulling through . . . We all need oney like the dickens, and yet, when I point out this marvelous heme for collecting a bit, instead of fawning on me for my ady intelligence you sit and make objections. It isn't the ght spirit. It isn't the spirit that wins."

"If you're as hard up as that," objected Dunhill, "how are ou going to put in your share of the pool?"

A pained, almost a stunned look came into Ukridge's eyes. e gazed at Dunhill through his lopsided pince-nez as one who eculates as to whether his hearing has deceived him.

"Me?" he cried. "Me? I like that! Upon my Sam, that's ch! Why, damme, if there's any justice in the world, if there's spark of decency and good feeling in your bally bosoms, I ould think you would let me in free for suggesting the idea. 's a little hard! I supply the brains and you want me to cough o cash as well. My gosh, I didn't expect this. This hurts me, y George! If anybody had told me that an old pal would . . ."

"Oh, all right," said Robert Dunhill. "All right, all right, all ght. But I'll tell you one thing. If you draw the lot it'll be ie happiest day of my life."

"I shan't," said Ukridge. "Something tells me that I shan't."

Nor did he. When, in a solemn silence broken only by the und of a distant waiter quarreling with the cook down a speak- g tube, we had completed the drawing, the man of destiny was eddy Weeks.

I suppose that even in the springtime of youth, when broken nbs seem a lighter matter than they become later in life, it n never be an unmixedly agreeable thing to have to go out into ie public highways and try to make an accident happen to one. i such circumstances the reflection that you are thereby bene- ing your friends brings but slight balm. To Teddy Weeks it peared to bring no balm at all. That he was experiencing a rtain disinclination to sacrifice himself for the public good came more and more evident as the days went by and found m still intact.

Ukridge, when he called upon me to discuss the matter, was sibly perturbed. He sank into a chair beside the table at hich I was beginning my modest morning meal and, having unk half my coffee, sighed deeply.

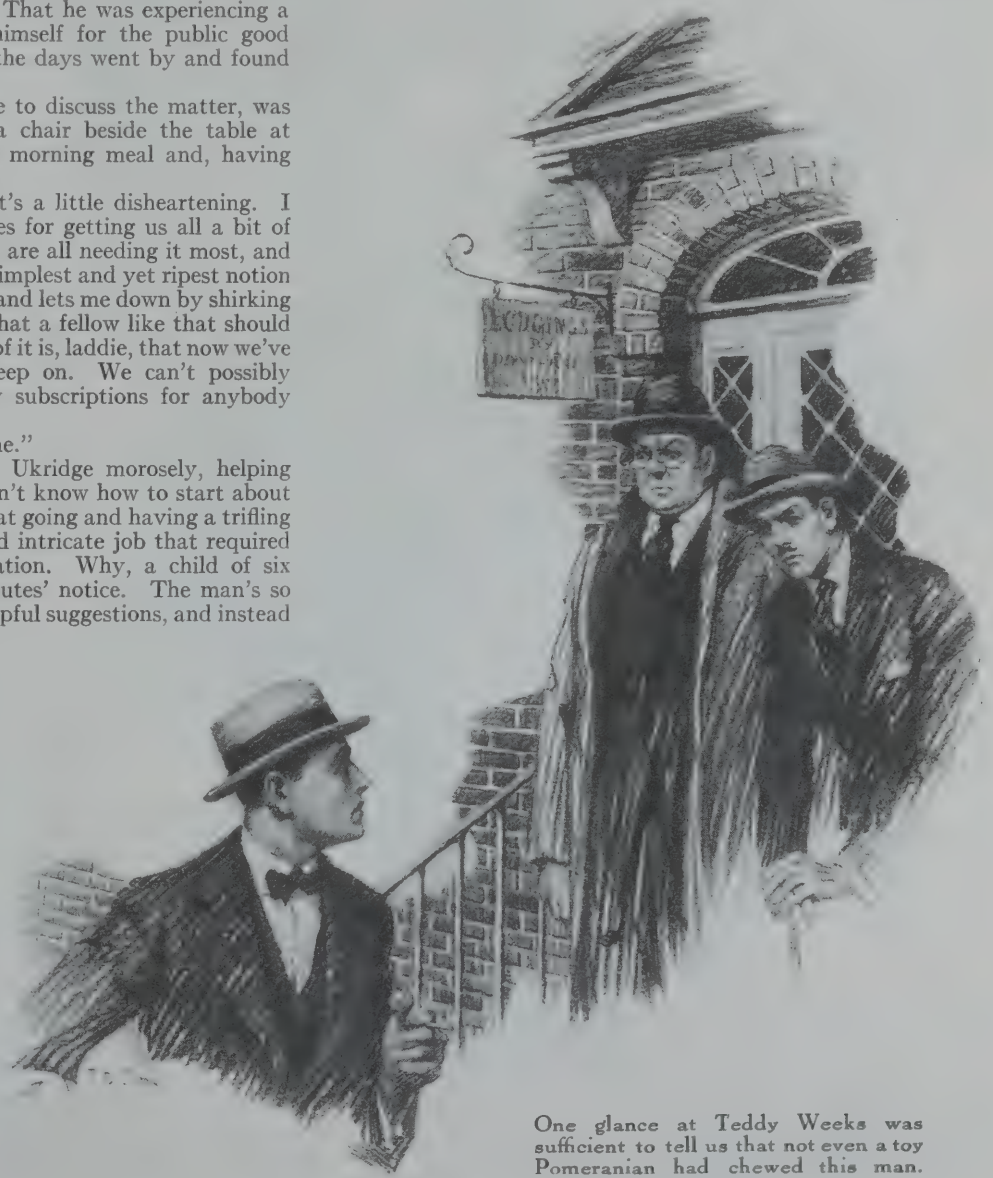
"Upon my Sam," he moaned, "it's a little disheartening. I rain my brain to think up schemes for getting us all a bit of oney just at the moment when we are all needing it most, and hen I hit on what is probably the simplest and yet ripest notion our time this blighter Weeks goes and lets me down by shirking s plain duty. It's just my luck that a fellow like that should ve drawn the lot. And the worst of it is, laddie, that now we've arted with him, we've got to keep on. We can't possibly ise enough money to pay yearly subscriptions for anybody se. It's Weeks or nobody."

"I suppose we must give him time."

"That's what he says," grunted Ukridge morosely, helping mself to toast. "He says he doesn't know how to start about To listen to him, you'd think that going and having a trifling cident was the sort of delicate and intricate job that required ars of study and special preparation. Why, a child of six uld do it on his head at five minutes' notice. The man's so fernally particular. You make helpful suggestions, and instead accepting them in a broad rea- nable spirit of cooperation he mes back at you every time th some frivolous objection. e's so dashed fastidious.

"When we were out last night e came on a couple of navvies rapping. Good hefty fellows, ther of them capable of putting m in hospital for a month. I ld him to jump in and start parating them, and he said no, was a private dispute which as none of his business and he dn't feel justified in interfering. nicky, I call it. I tell you, lad- e, this blighter is a broken reed. e has got cold feet. We did ong to let him into the drawing all. We might have known at a fellow like that would ver give results. No conscience. o sense of esprit de corps. No notion of putting himself out to the most trifling extent for the benefit of the community. Haven't you any more marmalade, laddie?"

"I have not."



"Then I'll be going," said Ukridge moodily. "I suppose," he added, pausing at the door, "you couldn't lend me five bob?"

"How did you guess?"

"Then I'll tell you what," said Ukridge, ever fair and reasonable, "you can stand me dinner tonight." He seemed cheered up for the moment by this happy compromise, but gloom descended on him again. His face clouded. "When I think," he said, "of all the money that's locked up in that poor faint hearted fish, just waiting to be released, I could sob. Sob, laddie, like a little child. I never liked that man—he has a bad eye and waves his hair. Never trust a man who waves his hair, old horse."

Ukridge's pessimism was not confined to himself. By the end of a fortnight, nothing having happened to Teddy Weeks worse than a slight cold which he shook off in a couple of days, the general consensus of opinion among his apprehensive colleagues in the Syndicate was that the situation had become desperate. There were no signs whatever of any return on the vast capital which we had laid out, and meanwhile meals had to be bought, landladies paid and a reasonable supply of tobacco acquired. It was a melancholy task in these circumstances to read one's paper of a morning.

All over the inhabited globe, so the well informed sheet gave one to understand, every kind of accident was happening every day to practically everybody in existence except Teddy Weeks. Farmers in Minnesota were getting mixed up with reaping machines; peasants in India were being bisected by crocodiles; iron girders from skyscrapers were falling hourly on the heads of citizens in every town from Philadelphia to San Francisco; and the only people who were not down with ptomaine poisoning were those who had walked over cliffs, driven automobiles into walls, tripped over manholes or assumed on too slight evidence that the gun was not loaded.

One glance at Teddy Weeks was sufficient to tell us that not even a toy Pomeranian had chewed this man.

In a crippled world, it seemed, Teddy Weeks walked alone, whole and glowing with health. It was one of those grim, ironical, hopeless, gray, despairful situations which the Russian novelists love to write about, and I could not find it in me to blame Ukridge for taking direct action in this crisis. My only regret was that bad luck caused so excellent a plan to miscarry.

My first intimation that he had been trying to hurry matters on came when he and I were walking along the King's Road one evening and he drew me into Markham Square, a dismal backwater where he had once had rooms.

"What's the idea?" I asked, for I disliked the place.

"Teddy Weeks lives here," said Ukridge. "In my old rooms." I could not see that this lent any fascination to the place. Every day and in every way I was feeling sorrier and sorrier that I had been foolish enough to put money which I could ill spare into a venture which had all the earmarks of a washout, and my sentiments towards Teddy Weeks were cold and hostile. "I want to inquire after him."

"Inquire after him? Why?"

"Well, the fact is, laddie, I have an idea that he has been bitten by a dog."

"What makes you think that?"

"Oh, I don't know!" said Ukridge dreamily. "I've just got the idea. You know how one gets ideas."

The mere contemplation of this beautiful event was so inspiring that for a while it held me silent. In each of the ten journals in which we had invested, dog bites were specifically recommended as things which every subscriber ought to have. They came about halfway up the list of lucrative accidents, inferior to a broken rib or a fractured fibula, but better value than an ingrowing toenail.

I was gloating happily over the picture conjured up by Ukridge's words when an exclamation brought me back with a start to the realities of life. A revolting sight met my eyes. Down the street came ambling the familiar figure of Teddy Weeks, an one glance at his elegant person was enough to tell us that ou hopes had been built on sand. Not even a toy Pomeranian ha chewed this man.

"Hullo, you fellows," said Teddy Weeks.

"Hullo," we responded dully.

"Can't stop," said Teddy Weeks. "I've got to fetch a doctor.

"A doctor?"

"Yes. Poor Victor Beamish. He's been bitten by a dog."

Ukridge and I exchanged weary glances. It seemed as if fat was going out of its way to have sport with us. What was th good of a dog biting Victor Beamish? What was the good of hundred dogs biting Victor Beamish? A dog-bitten Victo Beamish had no market value whatever.

"You know that fierce brute that belongs to my landlady, said Teddy Weeks. "The one that always dashes out into th area and barks at people who come to the front door." remembered. A large mongrel with wild eyes and flashing fang badly in need of a haircut. I had encountered it once in the stree when visiting Ukridge, and only the presence of the latter, wh knew it well and to whom all dogs were as brothers, had save me from the doom of Victor Beamish. "Somehow or other h got into my bedroom this evening. He was waiting there whe I came home. I had brought Beamish back with me, and th animal pinned him by the leg the moment I opened the door."

"Why didn't he pin you?" asked Ukridge, aggrieved.

"What I can't make out," said Teddy Weeks, "is how o earth the brute came to be in my room. Somebody must hav put him there. The whole thing is very mysterious."

"Why didn't he pin you?" demanded Ukridge again.

"Oh, I managed to climb on to the top of the wardrobe whil he was biting Beamish!" said Teddy Weeks. "And then th landlady came and took him away. But I can't stop here talk ing. I must go and get that doctor."

We gazed after him in silence as he tripped down the stree We noted the careful manner in which he paused at the corner t eye the traffic before crossing the road, the wary way in which h drew back to allow a truck to rattle past.

"You heard that?" said Ukridge tensely. "He climbed on t the top of the wardrobe!"

"Yes."

"And you saw the way he dodged tha excellent truck?"

"Yes."

"Something's got to be done," sai Ukridge firmly. "The man has got to h awakened to a sense of his responsibilities.

Next day a deputation waited on Tedd Weeks.

Ukridge was our spokesman, and h came to the point with admirable direc ness.

"How about it?" asked Ukridge.

"How about what?" replied Tedd Weeks, nervously avoiding his accusin eye.

"When do we get action?"

"Oh, you mean that accident business?

"Yes."

"I've been thinking about that," sai Teddy Weeks.

Ukridge drew the mackintosh which h wore indoors and out of doors and in a weathers more closely around him. The was in the action something suggestive of member of the Roman Senate about t denounce an enemy of the state. In ju such a manner must Cicero have swishe his toga as he took a deep breath prepar tory to assailing Clodius. He toyed for moment with the ginger beer wire whic held his pince-nez in place and endeavore without success to button his collar at th back. In moments of emotion Ukridge collar always took on a sort of temper mental jumpiness which no stud cou restrain.

"And about time you were thinkir about it," he boomed sternly. We shifte appreciatively in our seats—all excep Victor Beamish, who had declined a cha and was standing by the mantelpiec

"Think of the suits, the boots, the hats, the spats," pleaded Ukridge. "Here's your chance."

"Upon my Sam, it's about time you were thinking about it. Do you realize that we've invested an enormous sum of money in you on the distinct understanding that we could rely on you to do your duty and get immediate results? Are we to be forced to the conclusion that you are so yellow and few in the pod as to want to evade your honorable obligations? We thought better of you, Weeks. Upon my Sam, we thought better of you. We took you for a two fisted, enterprising, big souled, one hundred percent he-man who would stand by his friends to the finish."

"Yes, but——"

"Any bloke with a sense of loyalty and an appreciation of what it meant to the rest of us would have rushed out and found some means of fulfilling his duty long ago. You don't even grasp at the opportunities that come your way. Only yesterday I saw you draw back when a single step into the road would have had a truck bumping into you."

"Well, it's not so easy to let a truck bump into you."

"Nonsense. It only requires a little ordinary resolution. Use your imagination, man. Try to think that a child has fallen down in the street. A little golden-haired child," said Ukridge, deeply affected. "And a dashed great cab or something comes rolling up. The kid's mother is standing on the pavement, helpless, her hands clasped in agony. Dammit, she cries, will no one save my darling? Yes, by George, you shout, I will. And out you jump and the thing's over in half a second. I don't know what you're making such a fuss about."

"Yes, but——" said Teddy Weeks.

"I'm told, what's more, it isn't a bit painful. A sort of dull shock, that's all."

"Who told you that?"

"I forget. Someone."

"Well, you can tell him from me that he's an ass," said Teddy Weeks with asperity.

"All right. If you object to being run over by a truck there are lots of other ways. But, upon my Sam, it's pretty hopeless suggesting them. You seem to have no enterprise at all. Yesterday, after I went to all the trouble to put a dog in your room, a dog which would have done all the work for you—all that you had to do was stand still and let him use his own judgment—what happened? You climbed on to——"

Victor Beamish interrupted, speaking in a voice husky with emotion.

"Was it you who put that dog in the room?"

"Eh?" said Ukridge. "Why, yes. But we can have a good talk about all that later on," he proceeded hastily. "The point at the moment is how the dickens we're going to persuade this poor worm to collect our insurance money for us. Why, damme, I should have thought you would have——"

"All I can say——" began Victor Beamish heatedly.

"Yes, yes," said Ukridge, "some other time. Must stick to business now, laddie . . . I was saying," he resumed, "that I should have thought you would have been as keen as mustard to put the job through for your own sake. You're always beefing that you haven't any clothes to impress managers with. Think of all you can buy with your share of the swag once you have summoned up a little ordinary determination and seen the thing through. Think of the suits, the boots, the hats, the spats . . . You're always talking about your dashed career and how all you need to land you in a West End production is good clothes. Well, here's your chance to get them."

"It was just my fun," repeated Weeks. "You don't mind my fun, do you? All my fun."

His eloquence was not wasted. A wistful look came into Teddy Weeks's eye, such a look as must have come into the eye of Moses on the summit of Pisgah. He breathed heavily. You could see that the man was mentally walking along Cork Street, weighing the merits of one famous tailor against another.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," he said suddenly. "It's no use asking me to put this thing through in cold blood. I simply can't do it. I haven't the nerve. But if you fellows will give me a dinner tonight with lots of champagne I think it will key me up to it."

A heavy silence fell upon the room. Champagne! The word was like a knell.

"How on earth are we going to afford champagne?" said Victor Beamish.

"Well, there it is," said Teddy Weeks. "Take it or leave it."

"Gentlemen," said Ukridge, "it would seem that the company requires more capital. How about it, old horses? Let's get together in a frank, businesslike, cards on the table spirit and see what can be done. I can raise ten bob."

"What!" cried the entire assembled company, amazed. "How?"

"I'll pawn a banjo."

"You haven't got a banjo."

"No, but George Tupper has, and I know where he keeps it."

Started in this spirited way, the subscriptions came pouring in. I contributed a cigarette case, Bertram Fox thought his landlady would let him owe for another week, Robert Dunhill had an uncle in Kensington who, he fancied, if tactfully approached, would be good for a quid, and Victor Beamish said that if the advertisement manager of the O-So-Eesi Piano Player was churlish enough to refuse an advance of five shillings against future work he misjudged him sadly. Within a few minutes, in short, the lightning drive had produced the impressive total of two pounds six shillings, and we asked Teddy Weeks if he thought that he could get adequately keyed up within the limits of that sum.

"I'll try," said Teddy Weeks.

So, not unmindful of the fact that that excellent hostelry supplied champagne at eight shillings the quart bottle, we fixed the meeting for seven o'clock at Barolini's.

Considered as a social affair Teddy Weeks's keying up dinner was not a success. Almost from the start I think we all found it trying. It was not so much the fact that he was drinking deeply of Barolini's eight shilling champagne while we, from lack of funds, were compelled to confine ourselves to meaner beverages; what really marred the pleasantness of the function was the extraordinary effect the stuff had on Teddy. What was actually in the champagne supplied to Barolini and purveyed by him to the public, such as were (Continued on page 102)

Stories That Have Made Me

Illustrations by

MACK SENNETT was speaking the other day about the new Wright Act recently passed by the Legislature of the State of California. He said it resembled the liquor it aimed to destroy, in that while nobody seemed to know what it contained, everybody thought it would be extremely potent.

For instance, Mr. Sennett said, a resident of Los Angeles rang up a New Yorker at his hotel and invited him to attend a party then in progress at the Angeleno's house. It had in fact been progressing for several hours and had reached the point where none of the guests knew or cared whether the party was being conducted under the Wright Act of California or the Mullen-Gage Law of New York.

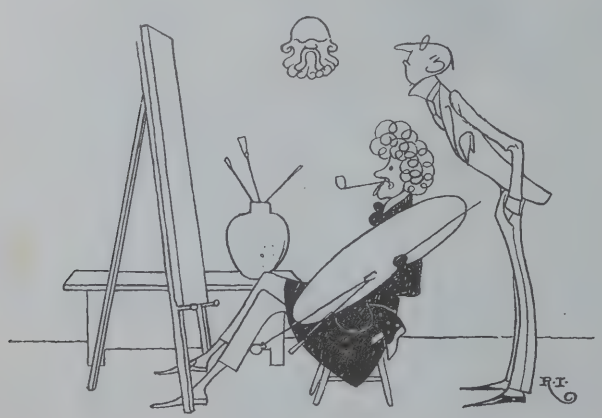
"Take a taxi and come right over," the Angeleno insisted.

"I'm sorry, old man," the New Yorker replied, "but I'm up in my room with a case of neuritis."

"Well, bring it along with you," the Angeleno said. "This crowd'll drink anything."

THE difference between an artist and an art critic is that the artist knows how to do it but not how it ought to be done, while the critic knows how it ought to be done but not how to do it. At any rate, this is what I gather from listening to conversations in the Salmagundi Club, which is composed of artist and lay members.

A great many of the lay members are artists at least in desire; they can talk a picture but they can't paint one, and of such is the kingdom of art criticism. None of them is the type of picture lover who doesn't know anything about art but knows what he likes. They all know what they like and don't like anything.



One of them always criticizes a picture upon the ground that the painter has put too much upon his canvas. His favorite condemnation is that the painter doesn't know what to leave out, and the other day one of the artist members came back at him with the following story:

A celebrated painter lost his mind, no doubt from trying to follow the suggestions of his critical friends. He was confined in an institution and was given canvas, paints and brushes to keep him quiet. When he received visitors they always found him in contemplation of a bare canvas.

"This," he would announce, "is my latest masterpiece."

"What does it represent?" the friend would inquire.

"Why, that's obvious," the artist would say, regarding the vacant canvas admiringly. "It represents the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea."

"But where is the sea?"

"It has been driven back."

"And where are the Israelites?"

"They have crossed over."

"But how about the Egyptians?"

"The Egyptians will be here directly," he would conclude, covering the bare canvas. "They haven't arrived yet."

NOT so long ago I attended some exhibition bouts of scientific boxing at a so-called athletic club near Los Angeles, in which three of the contestants were knocked out, two holes were burned in my overcoat by the gentleman who was smoking cigarettes in the seat behind me and my neighbor on the right had his hat stolen. With this bond of sympathy between us, we ate supper together at a local lunch room and he entertained me with stories of prize fighting.

He said that when Corbett was a novice, his father made him promise to telegraph home the result of every fight in which he engaged. One night in Kansas City Corbett took on a young boilermaker of much pugilistic talent. The fight began at dusk. A few minutes after midnight Corbett sent to his father the following telegram:

WON EASILY SEVENTY-FIVE ROUNDS

YOU know, of course, about the fire-eating Southerner who was referred to by the local paper as a battle-scared veteran, and after he had threatened to kill the editor the item was corrected the next morning by a paragraph which apologized for the misprint of the day before and then followed it up with another misprint in which the same gentleman was described as a bottle-scarred veteran. This by way of prelude to the information that a short time ago the literary section of a Mid-western women's club discussed William Butler Yeats and the Gaelic revival. The local paper reported it as follows:

> The Guest Day meeting of the literary section was held at the home of Mrs. L. A. Frazer yesterday. Mrs. De Morgan Jones of Indianapolis lectured on "William Butler Meats and the Garlic Revival."

SOMEBODY has said somewhere that the process of liking one's mother-in-law resembles the acquirement of a taste for such edibles as the softer and more fragrant cheeses and such drinkables as mescal and tequila. A certain acute repugnance has to be overcome at the start, and the reason for it is that when a man meets his mother-in-law for the first time, it is usually at so early a stage of his acquaintance with his wife that he is still much in love. He sees in his mother-in-law the portrait of his wife as she will appear some thirty years hence, and it is not a flattering one. Unconsciously he resents it and his resentment takes the form of hating the unflattering portrait.

The more he loves his wife, the worse he hates his mother-in-law; and it is therefore no reflection on the man about whom the following story is told that he never compromised in this attitude toward his mother-in-law throughout a long married life. It persisted up to the time of his wife's demise.

"Promise me," she said with almost the last gasp, "that you will ride with mother in the same carriage at my funeral."

"All right, Maria, if you insist on it I will," he said, his body shaken with sobs, "but I'll tell you right now that it'll take all the pleasure out of the day for me."

ACCORDING to my friend Phil Johnson of Los Angeles, two deaf and dumb tourists were engaged in an earnest conversation on an ocean steamer when they were observed by two college students who immediately began with the utmost seriousness to imitate the digital language of the deaf-mutes. One of the deaf-mutes noticed them and nudged his companion, who regarded the two students closely for a few moments and then turned to his deaf-mute friend. He made several rapid gestures with his fingers, hands and one elbow. What he said was:

"F-o-r-e-i-g-n-e-r-s !"

LAUGH By MONTAGUE GLASS

Rea Irvin

IF YOUR wife scolds you for eating your breakfast with the morning paper propped up on the sugar bowl, she's quite right. Be warned by the story of the instructor in biology in a New York City high school who always brought his lunch to school with him and ate it alone while studying a textbook.

"This afternoon," he said, addressing his class, after eating what he considered to be a satisfactory meal in that he had consumed the contents of a brown paper package and an entire chapter of a recent work on invertebrates, "this afternoon I propose to show you a very fine specimen of a dissected frog which I have in this parcel."

Undoing the parcel, he disclosed some sandwiches, a hard boiled egg and a small apple.

IN THAT excellent publication, London Punch, appeared recently a picture of a most forbidding looking woman entering the study of a mild clergyman.

"Mister Smith," she says, "do you remember uniting in marriage me and Henry Binks, bachelor, of this parish?"

"Yes, I think I do," the clergyman replied. "Yes, yes, certainly I do. I married you, Mrs. Binks. I remember it clearly."

"Well, what are we going to do about it?" she demands. "He's escaped."

BANKS and banking methods are a profound mystery to me. What, for instance, do banks do with all that money which depositors are so gullible as to confide to their care? Indubitably such acute monetary experts as Mr. Ford and Mr. Edison know. I see also that Mr. Chaplin has broken into print as a writer on financial topics with a view I suppose to making people call him Mr. Charles Chaplin. Well then, even Mr. Charles Chaplin probably understands the whole arcana of the banker's craft, but I don't, and there are millions of others who don't—including Mr. Max Gubin.

Mr. Gubin is in business as a manufacturer of fine pants and the other day the cashier of his bank rang him up to say that he was overdrawn two hundred dollars.

"What do you mean—overdrawn two hundred dollars!" Mr. Gubin exclaimed. It was a rhetorical question, not calling for an answer, but the cashier replied nevertheless.

"I mean," he said, "that you have exhausted your balance here and have drawn a check for two hundred dollars which we have unintentionally paid. In other words, Mr. Gubin, you have two hundred dollars of our money which doesn't belong to you."

"And that is all the reason why you rung me up?" Mr. Gubin inquired.

"Yes, sir," the cashier said.

"Well, will you be so good and look it up what for a balance I had in your bank this day last month?" Mr. Gubin asked.

"You had two thousand dollars," the cashier replied after an interval.

Mr. Gubin drew a great breath before making the unanswerable comeback.

"And did I ring you up?" he bellowed.

THE Ristorante Giardini di Volterra in San Francisco is noted for the excellence of its paste al sugo, which is the Italian generic term for all kinds of macaroni, ravioli, lasagne and spaghetti. It is also noted for the urbanity of its headwaiter, Joe, who is the most obliging headwaiter in San Francisco, where headwaiters are much more obliging and much less mercenary than in New York. Joe is at every patron's elbow half a dozen times during the course of a small meal and if necessary will smoothly enter the conversation from behind a diner's chair.

Recently, says Grant Carpenter, an ex-army officer was dining with a friend and the officer told a story about something that happened at reveille. He pronounced it revely, rhyming it with Beverley, and the friend objected to it. He was a purist in matters of pronunciation and gave the word its full French pronunciation of reveille. The argument became quite heated, the officer insisting upon revely and his friend asserting it was reveille, until Joe the headwaiter overheard them.

"Excuse-a me, gentlemen," he said. "I am in thees-a busi*ness* now many years, and the word is pronounced, I assure you, ravioli."

ADMIRAL McGOWAN, says Thomas F. Ford, the gifted literary editor of a Los Angeles paper, is a native of South Carolina and returned to his home town in that State for a short visit prior to the World War. He was struck by the large number of negroes on the streets wearing gaudy uniforms. Most of them were strangers to the Admiral, but after a while he met an old negro acquaintance, Tom Mason, who was most elaborately attired. He wore gold epaulettes, a plumed chapeau, a brilliant red sash and a glittering sword as distinctive features of the general dazzling effect.

After friendly greetings, the Admiral asked Tom what occasion had brought all the uniformed negroes to town.

"Admurl," said Tom, "dis is de yearly annual secession of de uniform rank of de 'Sociated Sons an' Daughters of I Will Arise. An' niggers is hyuh fum all ovah de State, tendin' de convention."

"Well," said the Admiral, "from your uniform I imagine you must be an official of high rank."

"Yes suh, Admurl, I is," replied Tom. "I is de Royal High Ruler an' Supreme King."

"That surely is a superlatively exalted title," said Admiral McGowan. "You must be the highest official of the order."

"No suh, Admurl," said the Royal High Ruler and Supreme King modestly, "dey is five above me."

BARNEY BERNARD the well known comedian says that on a railroad train leaving Jersey City a man was beating a little boy, and as the man was a member of a tribe which is notoriously kind to little children, one of his fellow travelers was outraged by the spectacle.

"Here!" he exclaimed. "You stop beating that boy this minute."

"What do you mean—stop beating him?" the man protested. "The boy is my own son—for my sins."

"I don't care who he is," the humane fellow traveler said. "You lay another hand on that boy and I'll make trouble for you."

"You will what?" the father cried.

"I'll make trouble for you, that's all," the boy's defender said.

The inhumane father released his son and smiled sadly at his fellow traveler.

"Listen, my friend," he said. "Three weeks ago this boy's mother, my wife, eloped on me with a traveling salesman; last week my house burned down without a cent of insurance; yesterday the sheriff closed my store not five minutes after I heard that my poor mother olav hasholom died in New Brunswick. Today I am taking my little boy to his grandmother's funeral so as to give him anyhow a little pleasure, and what does he do, y'understand, but he just now goes to work and swallows the railroad tickets on me."

He laughed a short, exceedingly bitter laugh.

"And you would make trouble for me!" he concluded.

Ukridge's Accident Syndicate

(Continued from page 99)

reckless enough to drink it, at eight shillings the bottle, remains a secret between its maker and his maker; but three glasses of it were enough to convert Teddy Weeks from a mild and rather oily young man into a truculent swashbuckler.

He quarreled with us all. With the soup he was tilting at Victor Beamish's theories of art; the fish found him ridiculing Bertram Fox's views on the future of the motion picture; and by the time the leg of chicken with dandelion salad arrived —or, as some held, string salad; opinions varied on this point—the hell-brew had so wrought on him that he had begun to lecture Ukridge on his misspent life and was urging him in accents audible across the street to go out and get a job and thus acquire sufficient self-respect to enable him to look himself in the face in a mirror without wincing. Not, added Teddy Weeks with what we all thought uncalled for offensiveness, that any amount of self-respect was likely to do that. Having said which, he called imperiously for another eight bobs' worth.

We gazed at one another wanly. However excellent the end toward which all this was tending, there was no denying that it was hard to bear. But policy kept us silent. We recognized that this was Teddy Weeks's evening and that he must be humored. Victor Beamish said meekly that Teddy had cleared up a lot of points which had been troubling him for a long time. Bertram Fox agreed that there was much in what Teddy had said about the future of the close-up. And even Ukridge, though his haughty soul was seared to its foundations by the latter's personal remarks, promised to take his homily to heart and act upon it at the earliest possible moment.

"You'd better!" said Teddy Weeks belligerently, biting off the end of one of Barolini's best cigars. "And there's another thing—don't let me hear of your coming and sneaking people's socks again."

"Very well, laddie," said Ukridge humbly.

"If there is one person in the world that I despise," said Teddy, bending a red-eyed gaze on the offender, "it's a snock-seeker—a seek-snocker—a—well, you know what I mean."

We hastened to assure him that we knew what he meant, and he relapsed into a lengthy stupor, from which he emerged three-quarters of an hour later to announce that he didn't know what we intended to do but that he was going. We said that we were going too, and we paid the bill and did so.

Teddy Weeks's indignation on discovering us gathered about him upon the pavement outside the restaurant was intense, and he expressed it freely. Among other things he said—which was not true—that he had a reputation to keep up in Soho.

"It's all right, Teddy, old horse," said Ukridge soothingly. "We just thought you would like to have all your old pals round you when you did it."

"Did it? Did what?"

"Why, had the accident."

Teddy Weeks glared at him truculently. Then his mood seemed to change abruptly and he burst into a loud and hearty laugh.

"Well, of all the silly ideas!" he cried amusedly. "I'm not going to have an accident. You don't suppose I ever seriously intended to have an accident, do you? It was just my fun." Then, with another sudden change of mood he seemed to become a victim of an acute unhappiness. He stroked Ukridge's arm affectionately and a tear rolled down his cheek. "Just my fun," he repeated. "You don't mind my fun, do you?" he asked pleadingly. "You like my fun, don't you? All my fun. Never meant to have an accident at all. Just wanted dinner." The gay humor of it all overcame his sorrow once more. "Funniest thing ever heard," he said cordially. "Didn't want accident, wanted dinner. Dinner daxident, danner dixident," he added, driving home his point. "Well, good night all," he said cheerily. And, stepping off the curb on to a banana skin, was instantly knocked ten feet by a passing lorry.

"Two ribs and an arm," said the doctor five minutes later, superintending the removal proceedings. "Gently with that stretcher."

It was two weeks before we were informed by the authorities of Charing Cross Hospital that the patient was in a condition to receive visitors. A whip-round secured the price of a basket of fruit, and Ukridge and I were deputed by the shareholders to deliver it with their compliments and kind inquiries.

"Hullo," we said in a hushed bedside manner when finally admitted to his presence.

"Sit down, gentlemen," replied the invalid.

I must confess even in that first moment to having experienced a slight feeling of surprise. It was not like Teddy Weeks to call us gentlemen. Ukridge, however, seemed to notice nothing amiss.

"Well, well, well," he said buoyantly. "And how are you, laddie? We've brought you a few fragments of fruit."

"I am getting along capitally," replied Teddy Weeks, still in that odd, precise way which had made his opening words strike me as curious. "And I should like to say that in my opinion England has reason to be proud of the alertness and enterprise of her great journals. The excellent quality of their reading matter, the ingenuity of their various competitions, and above all the go-ahead spirit which has resulted in this accident insurance scheme are beyond praise . . . Have you got that down?" he inquired.

Ukridge and I looked at each other. We had been told that Teddy was practically normal again, but this sounded like delirium.

"Have we got what down, old horse?" asked Ukridge gently.

Teddy Weeks seemed surprised.

"Aren't you reporters?"

"How do you mean, reporters?"

"I thought you had come from one of these weekly papers that have been paying me insurance money, to interview me," said Teddy Weeks.

Ukridge and I exchanged another glance. An uneasy glance this time. I think that already a grim foreboding had begun to cast its shadow over us.

"Surely you remember me, Teddy, old horse?" said Ukridge anxiously.

Teddy Weeks knit his brow, concentrating painfully.

"Why, of course," he said at last. "You're Ukridge, aren't you?"

"That's right. Ukridge."

"Of course. Ukridge."

"Yes. Ukridge. Funny, your forgetting me!"

"Yes," said Teddy Weeks. "It's the effect of the shock I got when that thing bowled me over. I must have been struck on the head, I suppose. It has had the effect of rendering my memory rather uncertain. The doctors here are very interested. They say it is a most unusual case. I can remember some things perfectly, but in some ways my memory is a complete blank."

"Oh, but I say, old horse!" quavered Ukridge. "I suppose you haven't forgotten about that insurance, have you?"

"Oh no, I remember that!"

Ukridge breathed a relieved sigh.

"I was a subscriber to a number of weekly papers," went on Teddy Weeks. "They are paying me insurance money now."

"Yes, yes, old horse," cried Ukridge. "But what I mean is, you remember the Syndicate, don't you?"

Teddy Weeks raised his eyebrows.

"Syndicate. What syndicate?"

"Why, when we all got together and put up the money to pay for the subscriptions to these papers and drew lots to choose which of us should go out and have an accident and collect the money. And you drew it, don't you remember?"

Utter astonishment, and a shocked astonishment at that, spread itself over Teddy Weeks's countenance. The man seemed outraged.

"I certainly remember nothing of the kind," he said severely. "I cannot imagine myself for a moment consenting to become a party to what from your own account would appear to have been a criminal conspiracy to obtain money under false pretenses from a number of weekly papers."

"But, laddie——"

"However," said Teddy Weeks, "if there is any truth in this story, no doubt you have documentary evidence to support it?"

Ukridge looked at me. I looked at Ukridge. There was a long silence.

"Shift-ho, old horse?" said Ukridge sadly. "No use staying on here."

"No," I replied with equal gloom. "May as well go."

"Glad to have seen you," said Teddy Weeks, "and thanks for the fruit."

P. G. Wodehouse, the man whose laughter echoes around the world, spins another mirth-rousing tale in COSMOPOLITAN for June, on sale May tenth.

SOUP MAKES THE WHOLE MEAL TASTE BETTER

Day by day in every way
We gain in health and vigor
With Campbell's aid our health is made—
Just watch us growing bigger!

Tempting!

And no wonder! That fragrant plate of Campbell's Tomato Soup, which is so tempting to your appetite, is pure tomato—the finest red-ripe fruit that grows! The tasty tomato juices and the rich tomato "meat" are strained to a smooth, delicious puree. A delight to the appetite!

Cream of Tomato

Golden country butter is blended with Campbell's Tomato Soup and delicate seasoning is added by the skilled hands of our famous French chefs. Serve it as a Cream of Tomato for a very special treat either for the family meal or when you are entertaining. It takes but a few minutes to prepare it according to the simple directions on the can. And it tastes so good!

21 kinds 12 cents a can

Campbell's Soups

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

"Daylight"

(Continued from page 57)

that everybody must stop whatever they were doing and rally at the bedside of the invalid, who was beginning to have one of his attacks which might prove fatal.

Without waiting even to put on his coat Ben flew on swift noiseless feet to the sick chamber.

Delight was there first but Ben was the one who lifted the old man into a position which relieved the pain and made it possible to breathe more easily.

"Thanks, Ben," he gasped feebly. "Delight, heat up some of that medicine. This plaster I've got on has lost its strength."

His daughter, well trained in obedience, hastened to the kitchen, leaving Ben to support the sufferer in the most comfortable position.

When she had put the can of medicinal clay in a dish of hot water she returned to the sick room. On the way back she noticed that Ben's door stood open and that he had left every light in the room burning. Actuated by an economical motive she stepped in to push the electric switch.

The scattered papers on his table attracted her passing attention.

He had been writing. She wondered if she would recognize the language used by the household mystery and idly picked up a page to see.

She left the room five minutes later without having turned off the lights. It seemed rather better not to.

VI

BEN was by this time strongly entrenched in the position of Blaine Brewster's unofficial nurse.

The next morning her father told Daylight: "Let him off from other duties so he can take care of me. I like to have him around. He understands me a lot better than most people who speak my own language."

Ben, who was noiselessly putting the sick room to rights, looked inquiringly at the invalid when he began to speak, but seeing that he was addressing his daughter went on about his tasks.

"That's something I want to talk to you about, daddy," Daylight replied to her father. "The young man you speak of must not remain in this house another day. I intend to discharge him before night."

"Why, why," sputtered Blaine, "what do you mean? Just when I get a little efficient attention you want to go and ruin it. What for?"

"Because I do not trust him. Don't ask me why, father, but rely upon my woman's intuition. I have taken an instinctive dislike to the man and you know I am never wrong about such things. He's a smug, sycophantic villain."

"Hush, Delight!" with a meaning look toward the object of her remarks.

"He can't understand me. That's another thing against him. He's such a dumbbell——"

"Slang, daughter?"

"Yes. It's the only word that describes him."

"It's silly to hold against him the fact that he is stupid."

"It isn't that alone. If it were I wouldn't mind. But the maids have been complaining about him. They are afraid of him. Hilda says that he approached her last night with some kind of a proposition that she could not understand but she says she is sure it was something wicked."

Ben nearly dropped a flower vase when she began getting specific in her accusations. He had his mouth open to begin an indignant denial but resolutely closed it again and went on about his business.

"Drat the maids!" cursed the sick man. "I should think they might stand being insulted if it would make my last hours a little more peaceful. Ben!"

The slave approached with alacrity.

"His face isn't wicked," Blaine pointed out; "stupid, I admit, but not villainous."

"Stupidity sometimes reaches a point where it becomes bestiality," Delight pursued relentlessly. "To look at his face makes me shudder."

She did—convincingly.

Her father was not beaten down even yet. He had never given up an argument in his life. When all other weapons failed he always used the club of his illness.

"He may be a brute, although I rather doubt that, but he is the only man I've ever seen who can lift me around without puffing."

"And yet you would expose your daughter to the whim of a mere muscular beast like that. What chance would I have against him if he should suddenly go mad or something?"

"No more chance than you would have against any man. But Ben wouldn't hurt you. The poor idiot loves you."

At that psychological moment, just as if he understood that he was the subject of contention, Ben knelt at her feet and, looking up with eyes that were as gentle as those of a mating squab, attempted to kiss her hand.

Delight nearly pushed him over backward with the violence of her rejection of his proffered homage.

And she got her way about having Ben discharged, too. She had inherited some of her father's stubbornness and while she seldom called it into play it was there all the time, and when she really felt that she had to get her own way she could accomplish it amid falling heavens.

"When I'm gone," her father said reproachfully, "I trust you will be sorry." Then he added: "I imagine that's too much to expect. Good by, Ben. You're the only person who understands me."

VII

BEN was a stubborn individual, too. No one had taken that into account. He got the idea that he was fired all right when Delight led him to the back gate and threw his hat out into the middle of the alley, but he did not seem to have any other place to go.

He stayed disconsolately there by the gate all day long. The maids reported this to Delight, who knew it anyway from having looked out of the upstairs windows every little while. When she found that he was still there she smiled every time, partly maliciously and partly, although she would not have admitted it, with genuine feminine pleasure at the tribute to herself.

This was the foolest game that had ever been played by grown-ups. She hoped it would rain on him out there. If it didn't she would call the police and have him arrested. He deserved everything that could possibly happen to him.

Her father grew much more irritable and whiney. Delight had not realized until then how much Ben had taken off her shoulders during the few days he had been a member of the household.

He mourned, "Tomorrow it will be just ten years since your sainted mother went to her heavenly reward and left me to wait and weep." He closed his eyes and wept a little then and there. "It won't be long now, mother, before the barriers will be swept aside. Without proper care I shall probably not live through my next attack."

Delight sometimes cynically wondered whether, from her celestial vantage point, her mother did not view the approaching reunion with apprehension. There was no reason to suppose that Blaine Brewster would cheer up, even when he got his gold harp.

And she remained deaf to her father's hints that she get Ben back. She promised to hire another man in his place but Ben was officially through—finished. She refused to discuss her aversion further. It existed and that was enough.

She hated him.

And yet she always smiled when she thought how much she hated him. It was a pleasure to dislike anyone the way she did the solitary outside guardian of the back gate.

He was still there the next morning when the Brewster cortège left for the cemetery according to an ancient annual custom to weep a little at mother's grave, and view with melancholy pleasure the transitory nature of all earthly things.

Blaine Brewster went in a wheel chair which Delight propelled up the hill to the high ground where the cemetery was located. Being motive power for her father's pushabout was no child's play. Blaine weighed nearly two hundred even yet and Delight was rather small. She did not have brawn proportionate to her determination.

It would have been very easy to have hired an automobile for the trip but Mr. Brewster couldn't ride in automobiles, or thought he couldn't.

"Humph!" grunted the invalid as Delight struggled against the force of gravity. "Don't you wish Ben was here now?"

"I do not!" his daughter replied with what little breath she had left.

To regain her wind and to rest generally Delight headed for the other side of the street. At least the crossing was level.

Midway between curbs came a wild honking of an automobile horn. Delight, winded but still keeping her head, looked to the right and left.

A machine was tearing down the hill from above them. A woman at the wheel was waving wildly at them to get out of the way.

Blankets and woolens are so soft and fluffy after washing with Fels-Naptha! The most delicate fabrics are made wonderfully clean and fresh-looking!

Clean—deep down through every thread!

Real Naptha! You can tell by the smell

Use water of any temperature with Fels-Naptha. Boil clothes with Fels-Naptha, if you wish. The real naptha in Fels-Naptha makes the dirt let go, no matter whether the water is cool, lukewarm or hot.

The original and genuine naptha soap, in the red-and-green wrapper. Buy it in the convenient ten-bar carton.

That's the beauty of clothes washed with Fels-Naptha—the sanitary soap. They get more than surface-cleaning.

No matter how thick or how woolly the fabrics, the real naptha in Fels-Naptha searches out the most deeply-seated dirt, gently and safely breaking its grip from the tenacious woolen fibres, (as of course, it does with thin silk or cotton goods). Then the soapy water, flushing through the fibres, carries all the dirt away.

The clothes are doubly cleansed from dirt, body oils, odors—all the way through—purified wholly and completely. They are made hygienically clean, for Fels-Naptha does all that good soap does, plus all that real naptha does.

When you realize the close relation of clean clothes to health, you will never be satisfied with less thorough cleaning.

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than naptha. It is splendid soap and real naptha so blended that it gives you the best of these two great cleaners in one golden, sanitary bar. Get Fels-Naptha at your grocer's today! Give your home the benefit of Fels-Naptha Cleanliness.

GET an idea of how helpful Fels-Naptha is. Send 2¢ in stamps for sample bar. Address Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia.

FELS-NAPTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

© 1923, Fels & Co. Philadelphia

Delight suspected the truth—that the brakes were not holding and that the chauffeuse did not know what else to do—and summoned all of her jaded strength for a swift spurt to safety.

She would have made it with a little room to spare if the lady driver had not, in a fascination of horror, swerved slightly to the left so as to bear down upon them in the very spot they were heading for.

It was too late for Delight to check the momentum of the wheel chair with its ponderous burden and to start in the other direction. She might have abandoned her father to his fate and saved herself. That, of course, never occurred to her.

Wide-eyed, terror stricken but resigned, she watched the Juggernaut.

So she didn't see what it was that really struck her, that hurled her and the wheel chair back out of danger. The impact was pretty violent and would have knocked her down except for the fact that she was hanging on to the handle of the chair.

As it was, she heard rather than saw the berserk automobile strike something else, something that yielded with a sickening thud.

The reeling car was gone. Delight and her father were safe.

But in the road lay the catapult which had hurled them back to safety—Ben.

Crumpled, unconscious, pathetic.

Delight and her father gazed horror stricken at their rescuer.

Then they started towards him—both of them. Blaine Brewster had risen from his chair and neither of them had noticed it.

Delight got there first. She was like that.

But her father lumbered up no less determinedly and when she started to take Ben's head in her lap he stopped her. "Here, let me do that. He's my nurse, you know."

Delight only held him tenderly closer. "He's my everything."

Nevertheless it was the old man who lifted Ben from the pavement and placed him in his own wheel chair to transport to the nearest house.

VIII

Ben regained consciousness in character—that is, he opened his eyes the next day in his room at the Brewster home and murmured "Daylight! Daylight! Daylight!" as if it were a warning, a caress and a prayer all combined.

She was there. So was her father, who had helped her watch through the night. So also was Ivan Jones, who had been sent for in case——

It was the girl, though, who knelt beside him. "Here I am."

He started to make unintelligible sounds such as had been his language for the last week.

"You may as well speak English," suggested Delight. "You've been raving in American slang all during your delirium."

Ben groaned. "Have I ruined my chances forever?" he pleaded.

"Absolutely. After what I've heard you say I'll never let you escape."

"What?" Even a man who is nearly dead can be revived by a magic incantation.

"I'll even help you win that bet from Ivan." She kissed him gingerly on one of the unbandaged spots. "Sorry, Ivan, to make you lose but we're going to need money for house furnishings."

"You don't get any from me," Ivan responded blithely. "He wrote me a note in the middle of the week calling off the bet. The darn fool said he was too much in love to want to win anything but you with his first kiss if he ever got it."

"Listen!" interrupted the injured man. "For gosh sake, let me talk. Am I to understand, Daylight, darling, that we are to be married?"

"We are if you live."

IX

It would be good cheerful propaganda to record here that Blaine Brewster, after his marvelous recovery during the emergency of the accident to Ben, never suffered another day's illness. There's a considerable precedent for that in "The Miracle Man" and other psychopathic resurrections in film and fiction.

But the truth must be told. The night of Delight's wedding day found her father back in bed with an honest-to-goodness attack of incipient paralysis and the bridal couple spent their honeymoon in two shifts, one nursing him days and the other nights.

They were never off duty for ten minutes together at any one time because if they tried it Blaine always had an almost fatal fit.

However, they are trying a new doctor this week.

Maybe he can cure him.

Or something.

You will count it one of the most enjoyable half-hours you ever spent when you read the next story by Frank R. Adams in June Cosmopolitan.

The Great God Four-Flush

(Continued from page 87)

wonder? And he's so darn fast nobody's ever hit him hard enough to mark him. If he don't stop this bird I don't eat for a week. Look at him."

"I'm looking, thank you," said Gwynne Gunning in her heart and tried to wrench her eyes away.

And could not, any more than you can tear the tides from the moon.

The pulse in her throat was choking her.

As she watched him, with that same indifferent, disdainful air, protect himself and hammer the big dark brute to pieces, her mind, in spite of her desperate efforts to close it, seeped full of him. She thrilled to the sulky, surprised line that came between his eyes when the big fellow landed twice on his chin. Caught his trick of swaying his head from side to side. The half smile that curved his young mouth when he went into the clinches.

Oh, she was crazy! It was silly. A prize fighter. She grasped at her pose, her newer self.

Yet—people felt this way. This was the half forgotten thing she was missing in life. This was the explanation of many, many things in the world nothing else could explain. This mesmerism. Cover it, hide it, deny it as you would——

This was real.

She didn't want it!

Men, she knew, felt like this sometimes when they saw a beautiful woman. But women—no woman ever admitted such a thing. Could not admit it. Oh, it was impossible!

She heard the thud of a body hitting the canvas.

The boy came back to his corner. His hair was rumpled and she saw the least suggestion of a curl where it touched his close-set ears.

It gave her a pang of delight.

Almost without realizing what she did, Gwynne Gunning looked swiftly at the men about her. How soft they looked. How ugly.

As the first faint gleams of dawn came shyly through the drawn blinds of her sleeping porch, Gwynne Gunning buried her golden curls in her scented baby pillows, and by daring at last to imagine that she was in his arms went sweetly and softly to sleep, with the stain of tears on her cheeks and the marks of her small white teeth in her lower lip.

III

"Do you love me?"

"You know I do."

"Then why don't you say so?"

"What's the use of saying it? If I didn't I wouldn't be here."

Gwynne kicked her feet into the air and giggled happily.

The firelight fell on her golden curls, tumbled about her little flushed face, and on the soft chinchilla collar that rolled back from the exquisite line of her neck.

Lying flat on the rug, her head against Joe's knees, she put up one hand to touch his hair.

"Isn't this wonderful?" she asked softly. "Way up on top of a funny old mountain, away from the whole world? I forget everything up here. I love the rain outside when it shuts us away from everyone else."

She turned her head so that, against the flaming logs, she could see the boy's head. How she worshiped the proud, free, strong line of it.

"You've got to go back, haven't you?" she whispered.

He nodded and she caught the swift, teasing twinkle of his hazel-gray eyes.

"Why are you laughing?" she demanded, snuggling her head closer to his knees.

"I didn't."

"You did. You're always laughing at me. I love you too much."

"Do you?"

"Yes. Gosh, I know you've got to go back if you're going to fight next week. But, sweetheart, you've walked a thousand

There is constant danger in an oily skin

IF your skin has the habit of continually getting oily and shiny, you cannot begin too soon to correct this condition.

A certain amount of oil in your skin is necessary to keep it smooth, velvety, supple.

But too much oil actually tends to promote an unhealthy condition of your skin.

A skin that is too oily is constantly liable to infection from dust and dirt, and thus encourages the formation of blackheads, and other skin troubles that come from outside infection.

You can correct an oily skin by using each night the following simple treatment:

FIRST cleanse your skin by washing in your usual way with Woodbury's Facial Soap and luke-warm water. Wipe off the surplus moisture, but leave the skin slightly damp. Now, with warm water work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap in your hands. Apply it to your face and rub it into the pores thoroughly—always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with warm water, then with cold—the colder the better. If possible, rub your face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

Keep up this treatment persistently, and within a week or ten days you will be surprised to see what an improvement it has made in your complexion.

This is only one of the famous treatments given in the booklet which is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Special treatments for each different type of skin are given in this booklet.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today—begin tonight the treatment your skin needs.

A 25-cent cake of Woodbury's lasts a month or six weeks for regular toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments. The same qualities that give Woodbury's its beneficial effect on the skin make it ideal for regular use. Woodbury's also comes in convenient 3-cake boxes.

A complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations

For 25 cents we will send you a complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations, containing:

A trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap
A sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream
A sample tube of Woodbury's Cold Cream
A sample box of Woodbury's Facial Powder
With the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

Send for this set today. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 1605 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio. If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 1605 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario. English Agents: H. C. Quelch & Co., 4 Ludgate Square, London, E. C. 4.

Copyright, 1923, by The Andrew Jergens Co.

miles up here. I should think you'd walked enough to train for forty fights."

At that he laughed aloud. And he had the stirring, warm laugh of a man who does not laugh often.

"Silly, I can't fight a boy like Georgie Farr on walking. I'll run five miles before breakfast from tomorrow on. How'd you like it if he beat me?"

Gwynne considered, always breathlessly conscious of his nearness, of the fragrance of clean living and freshness that came from him.

"If he hurt you, or cut you up, I'd scratch his eyes out. But I shouldn't mind your getting beaten. You're so cocky. I'd like a chance to baby you just once."

"You're my little mama all the time," he said, turning to look full at her. His eyes had gone black as the pupils dilated.

Then his gaze went back to the fire, and she lay quietly content, thinking.

Oh, it was all so strange, this double life she was leading.

Here they were, she and Joe Flynn, alone in this mountain lodge. Outside in the rickety garage was the battered, dark flivver he had bought so they might slip away unrecognized. Here she was no longer Gwynne Gunning. She was just—Joe Flynn's girl.

"You're so wonderful!" she murmured with a happy sigh.

He was wonderful. How panicky she had been when after five weeks of struggle she had schemed to meet him. He had looked so adorable in one of those plain blue shirts he always wore, and the quiet blue suit. Not at all like the descriptions she had heard of pork-and-bean fighters.

Shy and self-conscious he certainly was. Puzzled and reserved. But he was shy of her surroundings and of her position and not of the woman.

It was his first venture into the class she represented and he moved, oh! so cautiously.

Well, that was the thing that had swept her deeper and deeper into this love that possessed her. To him she was never Gwynne Gunning. Never a famous and idolized picture star.

She was just a woman. She had never realized how sick she was of all the pretense, how deeply she longed for natural, heavenly hours of being Alma Schwartz grown up.

In his cool young arrogance, in his confident, limited young philosophy of life, you loved a woman or you didn't. And his reserve, his coolness, his playful teasing fell just often enough before the dangerous, headlong rush of his passion.

Oh, all that was perfect! And governable. For passion is tied closer to the earth than any other human sense and its life must be the shortest.

But the thing that was beginning to strike terror into the very core of her being was the companionship that had sprung up between them. As though he tugged at her heart with every old instinct, every old desire of her life.

They were so happy together. And she had never been just plain happy in all her life before. They could be so overwhelmed with bubbling laughter.

He had a swift, clean, driving young mind. As ardent for knowledge as a child's. The twenty-one years of his adventurous life had been spent at close grips with the world, fighting for a living, for something better than the rudiments of an education. He had an eager craving for finer, better, more worth while things. Her pretenses only annoyed him. He brought her back with one revealing sentence, one hot look, to real things.

"It don't matter what a thing is, if it's the truth it's bound to help you sooner or later," he had said to her once.

She was horribly afraid of losing him. Knew he hated his position.

And he understood her as no man ever had. For, in the last analysis, they came from the same source. Why, as kids they had actually played only a few blocks apart. He had fought his kid battles while she danced on the sidewalks almost within hailing distance. Then—then their lives had branched, but how strangely they had come back together after all these years. Like calling to like.

And still—still she could not marry him.

He had never asked her. But she knew his hot young pride would never chance a refusal.

The hideous habit of years still bound her.

She could not abandon the rôle of Gwynne Gunning she had played and loved so long. Four-flushing had become a habit more deadly, more shriekingly insistent than the craving for the little white needle.

In the lonely nights she fought back those tears that leave lines and moaned into the blackness, "God help me, God help me," while her love and her pride fought.

Once away from him, back in her own world, among her satellites and her friends, she knew—and hated herself for knowing—that she could never go through with it.

Her soul—her strong, young, common soul—had been stifled in chinchilla.

She was ashamed of him. She sickened at the treachery. But she knew she would die if Gregg Austin, if Laurine Johnstone, if any of the crowd she had upstaged and patronized, knew that she loved a prize fighter.

They couldn't see him as she saw him. She had gathered, sneakingly, a fair estimate of what people of her world thought of the boys who fought for their amusement. They could never rate him as different from the rest nor figure that she, Gwynne Gunning, was of his own.

Gwynne's social aspirations were very definite.

No more hanging on the outer fringe would satisfy her. A position that merely meant appearing for charity benefits or as a lion or a curiosity to amuse the fashionable elect—which was the position achieved by most movie folk—was not the thing for which she had builded so long and so carefully.

There were a few who had penetrated, with the help of circumstances, to the Inner Shrine. A few whose names belonged on the intimate guest lists of the really smart younger set and the aristocratic old Californians. Candace Carr, for instance, had achieved real social distinction through her friendship with young Mrs. Billy Hitt. Jane Terry and her equally famous husband, Frederick Shaw, had been taken up by titled folk in London during their European tour. Immediately they became members of the exclusive circles of Los Angeles and San Francisco. Johnny Ingle had married a Southern girl of much charm and breeding, and of course they "belonged."

That was the sort of thing Gwynne was playing for, the thing that had meant so much in her plans for the future. Gregg Austin could give it to her. Probably there was no other way in which she could gain it. And he knew as well as she did that it was the price he would have to pay for her. A price he was still considering.

Why, Joe had never owned dinner clothes in his life. His English tricked him here and there. All that might be changed in time if she were big enough. If she had only been the real thing herself, sure of herself, she might chance it. Though it never worked. She thought of the stories in the papers about girls and women who had married chauffeurs, elevator boys—anybody out of their class. It was never successful.

Oh, she had lived among shams so long they had become her gospel!

She had cheated so long honesty seemed beyond her.

She had flashes of big visions, only to slip sickeningly back.

She dared not—she who had let her father die alone for fear some nurse might recognize Gwynne Gunning.

The glamour of love that swept her that was melting her, teaching her—wasn't strong enough.

She could still have both—even at the price of her honor and Joe's.

Her test had not come.

Only sometimes when she dreamed she must make a decision between the two idols of her soul, she awoke shuddering.

And now, as the fire leaped warmly and the rain pattered on the tin roof, she turned swiftly to him, holding him close in her arms, shaking with some strange fear.

"I love you so, I love you so," she said brokenly.

His arms hurt her.

"Why honey, you're not crying? What made my little mama cry? There, I love you. I love you better than anything else in the world."

His lips, clean and cool, found hers. And even as they lay so sweetly, she felt the heat pour into them and thrill her in every nerve. Felt his strong hands in her curls, jerking her head back.

"I could tear you to pieces," he said suddenly. "You're mine, do you hear? Aren't you?"

"Yes, oh yes! I want to be. All yours, I am."

"You'd better be," he said coldly.

And Gwynne Gunning could have screamed aloud.

For deep in her soul she heard the little mocking laugh of the monster she had created of herself. Heard the whip-crack of the Great God Four-Flush.

IV

It was a very perfect dinner party.

Gwynne Gunning, in pale green sequins with a mass of lilies of the valley caught at her waist, knew that it was her supreme social effort. And her eyes narrowed a little as she glanced at Gregg Austin.

It was a great feather in her cap, catching Laurine Johnstone as the guest of honor.

Laurine Johnstone, whose advent into the films after years of stage triumphs was

Your smooth fresh face—what are you doing to keep it young?

Many famous and lovely women depend on this method

IN your mind you picture yourself always the same. But one, two years from now will your face be as fresh and smooth as it is today? Or will it be a little coarsened? With fine lines growing deeper around the eyes, the nose, your mouth? Will you discover one day, while you are still young, that your skin has grown old?

To save women's skin from this early ageing, to keep it young and soft in spite of modern strain and exposure, two famous formulae were developed.

Two creams, each so wonderful in its results that now literally millions of women depend on them.

Today in 56 different countries these women have decided that no other method gives quite that transparent freshness and velvet smoothness. And that no other has quite that magic efficacy against the drying and coarsening influence of the out-of-doors, or that extraordinary effect of freshening the complexion.

Photo by Brown Bros.

Marion Davies, whose complexion is extraordinarily fresh and young and who is now playing so charmingly in "When Knighthood Was in Flower," says—"My skin is constantly exposed to trying lights and I have to use a great deal of make-up, yet my complexion has kept young and beautifully smooth with Pond's Two Creams. I have used this method for years and know I can depend on it."

The cleansing cream that has doubled its users every two years

So marvelous is the softening, clarifying effect of Pond's Cold Cream on the skin that the number of women using it has actually doubled every two years.

Its special light consistency agrees with your skin. Its fine light oil gives your skin perfect suppleness and then is wiped off with the loosened dirt, so that your face has the exquisite freshness you want. It is never left heavy with cream.

In the whole world the most used of all vanishing creams

But the miracle of one cream's success is no greater than that of its sister cream. So unfailing is Pond's Vanishing Cream in its protection of the skin, so marvelously does it freshen the complexion and keep it lovely through the day that last year the women of the United States alone wanted several millions of jars!

This cream contains such a wonderful soothing ingredient that the minute it is put on you feel your face soften and relax. In the mirror you see how fresh and smooth it has made your skin—almost in an instant. You go out in the severest cold or hottest sun and your skin does not chap or burn.

TRY THIS METHOD— the difference will convince you today

Do this tonight. With the finger tips apply Pond's Cold Cream freely. The very fine oil in it is able to penetrate every pore of your skin. Let it stay a minute—now wipe it off with a soft cloth. The black on the cloth will show you how carefully this cream cleanses. Your skin looks fresh and is beautifully supple.

Then, in the morning, smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream lightly over your whole face. If you wish, rouge—powder. How smooth and velvety your face feels to your hand! How new and charming the reflection in your mirror! The powder is even, not in patches, because it clings evenly to the delicate film of cream. The appearance of your skin for the whole day will prove to you how wonderful for your skin these two creams are.

When you are tired in the evening use these two creams together before you go out. They soften out the lines and smooth away the worried tightness of your face. And always after a motor or railroad trip, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream and then finish with the Vanishing Cream and powder.

To see how these two creams will actually improve your skin use this method regularly. Begin now by buying a jar or tube of each cream.

You will get them in any drug store or department store. Neither can possibly clog the pores or cause the growth of hair. The Pond's Extract Company, New York.

These are the troubles that mar and age your skin

Read how this famous method corrects them

Sunburn, Windburn, Chapping

The daily repetition of weather damage does more to age your skin than any other single factor, but the process is so gradual you do not notice it until your skin has definitely coarsened. Do not let this happen. Be careful before the harm has taken hold. Keep your skin clean and soft and properly oiled with a nightly cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream. Then, always in the morning, smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream. It forms a delicate but sure protection against any weather condition and the trying changes in temperature. This method will keep your skin soft and smooth always.

Premature Wrinkles, Scaling, Peeling

These are especially the troubles of a dry skin. To avoid them you must keep your skin soft day and night. Cleanse with plenty of Pond's Cold Cream nightly and leave some on over night. This will give your skin the oil it needs so badly. Now it cannot scale and peel. It will not develop the little lines that grow into wrinkles.

But do not let the day undo the results of this nightly oiling. Every morning smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream liberally. It contains a wonderful daytime softening ingredient and prevents your skin from drying out again.

That Distressing Shine

Shine is often the result of excess oil in the glands. Your careful nightly cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream carries out this excess together with the dirt. This light cream wipes entirely off. Now in the morning smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream. You can use plenty of it, because it has no oil. This will keep your skin lovely and fresh right to the end of the day.

But sometimes shine is due to a dry, tight skin. You must apply an extra amount of Pond's Cold Cream at night after the cleansing and let it stay on. See how gladly your skin will absorb the fine light oil of this cream, how it will soften and relax and the shine disappear. Put on the Vanishing Cream in the morning to keep this suppleness through the day and to hold the powder.

MAIL COUPON WITH 10c, TODAY

The Pond's Extract Co.
134N Hudson St., New York

Ten cents (10c) is enclosed for your special introductory tubes of the two creams every normal skin needs—enough of each cream for two weeks' ordinary toilet uses.

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....

This smoker says Edgeworth gets better and better

But it doesn't—and no "improvements" are contemplated

To begin with, we had better quote Mr. Whitlock's letter in full. Not in a boastful spirit, but so we can refer back to it farther down in the column.

2844 Accomac Street,
St. Louis, Missouri

Larus & Brother Company,
Richmond, Va.
Gentlemen:

I wish to take this opportunity to tell you what I think of your Edgeworth Plug Slice Tobacco.

I have been a pipe smoker for about 18 years and during that time have naturally tried many different brands and blends of tobacco. I could not seem to find an ideal blend until about six months ago when, at the suggestion of a friend, I tried a pipe of Edgeworth Plug Slice.

I have been a constant user of Edgeworth since and can truthfully say that "Day by day in every way Edgeworth is getting better and better."

You have my permission to use this letter in any way you may desire if by so doing it will enable other pipe smokers to find a really cool, enjoyable and perfectly satisfactory man's smoke.

I beg to remain,

Edgeworthily yours,
Al. F. Whitlock.

We are indeed glad Edgeworth has given Mr. Whitlock such unqualified satisfaction, but we feel obliged to sidestep his suggestion that "day by day in every way Edgeworth is getting better and better."

Our constant aim is quite to the contrary. Just as it is, Edgeworth pleases thousands and thousands of pipe smokers throughout the country.

If we should try to "improve" Edgeworth or change it in the least, we might be doing an injustice to the men who have smoked Edgeworth for years and years and who expect to find it always the same good smoking tobacco.

To add to our list of friends we are always glad to send free samples of both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Ready-Rubbed.

Just drop a postcard to Larus & Brother Co., 61 South 21st Street, Richmond, Va. If you will also add the name and address of your tobacco dealer, we shall appreciate your courtesy.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your dealer cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size of Edgeworth Plug Slice or Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber.

a sensation, had looked askance upon the picture colony when she first arrived in Hollywood with her titled husband.

During her European tours she had dined in many famous houses. But she watched with genuine amazement the splendor of the silver, the perfection of the service, the magnificence of the decoration, the epicurean food in this movie palace.

The guests were a delightful blend of the best the picture people had to offer, and the cream of Gregg Austin's set. Oh well! it was rumored Gwynne Gunning was going to marry young Austin and his millions.

Yes, Miss Johnstone was impressed.

And she was very cordial and friendly to her young hostess.

Yet even while Gwynne rejoiced in the success of her party, her mind was acutely conscious of what was to come. They were going to the fights as a slumming novelty for her guests.

It was very late, of course, when they arrived. Half the fights were over.

Gwynne, wrapping the folds of a new chinchilla evening cloak about her, was glad of that.

The thrill of seeing Joe in the ring, of watching the grace and beauty of him, in the light of the glorious secret of her heart, had never abated.

Then she was proud that she belonged to him.

But the knife twisted in her heart as she tried to picture him with these guests of hers.

Just how it happened no one ever seemed to know.

Farr was a good boy but he had figured to be easy for Joe Flynn. He had never laid a glove on Joe and for the first three rounds the favorite cut him to ribbons.

But suddenly it had happened. And the great mass was silent with that quick, strange prescience of an elemental crowd.

He had caught Joe coming off the ropes. Caught him with the one "haymaker" he had. Lifted him off his feet and dropped him on the back of his head.

And instead of the proud, splendid young figure so strong and graceful, Joe Flynn lay ominously still, his young face turned blindly up to the pitiless glare of the lights.

"That boy's hurt," said Laurine Johnstone's husband quietly.

A woman screamed.

And the mass of silent men broke into wild, hoarse murmurs.

The referee bending over the still figure. Handlers. Towels. Pails. A small grizzled man with a black case. The word "stretcher."

And still the boy had not moved.

Georgie Farr was sobbing. It swept the crowd to its first note of hysteria.

Gwynne Gunning sat with a smile frozen on her face.

Everything was all right. He'd get up in a minute.

But he was hurt, suffering. She must go to him.

Her body seemed paralyzed. She felt her heart break within her breast and the bleeding, inward tears race through her like acid.

Her boy. Her darling. The thing she loved better than anything else in the world. Ah, but did she?

They didn't even know she knew him. What would everyone say? The stately Laurine Johnstone, Gregg Austin, the man she meant perhaps to marry some day. Gregg, with his amused sneer.

They were sorry about it—as they would be sorry for a dog run over in the street.

They didn't know this was the heart of her heart.

If she went, everything was over. Her poor, weak little hand was on the table for the world to laugh at. Before all these people. The reporters. The faces she knew.

She could not leave her seat.

Perhaps he wasn't really hurt. Of course he wasn't.

But—this had to end. These were death pangs, rending her. She couldn't stand it.

Gwynne Gunning's big moment had come.

And suddenly she stood up, before all those staring eyes.

She saw the ghastly, empty stretcher coming down the aisle.

Like the swift flight of a bird, she was in the aisle. Tried to climb into the ring.

The swathing folds of thousands of dollars' worth of chinchilla caught and tripped her.

With a superb gesture she tore off the cloak and dropped it in the dirt.

No one who was there ever forgot it.

The strain had been so horrible.

Then, there under the electric lights, was a beautiful, exquisite young thing, in an amazing gown, who pushed aside everyone and kneeling down took the boy's quiet, splendid young head in her arms.

"Joe," she said very softly, and tried to smile at him, "Joe, it's your little mama. Don't be afraid."

And kissed him before them all.

V

THE flicker on the silversheet ceased. The lights in the small studio projection room went up. But the silence held.

The men and women who sat there, the final judgment committee of the greatest studio in the world, stared at each other wordless.

Tears were on their faces. The first tears the screen had drawn from them in years.

It was the fat little president who spoke first. The man whose word rocked the entire industry.

"That," he said slowly, "is the finest piece of acting I ever have seen on the screen."

"That isn't acting," said the gray-haired woman who ran with amazing efficiency the biggest scenario department in the game, "that's just real feeling. I can't believe it. What's happened to her?"

"No, it don't seem possible," said the president, wiping unashamed the tears from his fat cheeks, "that that's Gwynne Gunning. And I always put her down as beautiful and dumb and not understanding anything about real things. Poor little kid. Poor little kid. If she keeps that up she'll be a great artist. What's done it to her? I want to tell her."

"She slipped out a moment ago," said her director quietly.

"I want to tell her," repeated the president.

But Gwynne Gunning was sitting very quietly in her dressing room.

Her cheek was pressed softly against a little old blue shirt. And she was gazing

Queen Anne or Mary Ann

A Queen Anne front and a Mary Ann back—that's the way a house built all for show is described. To the street it puts up a handsome front—fresh, white paint and smooth green lawns.

Go around to the back, and you get another story.

There are many Queen Anne Towns—

the main business and residence streets are clean and shining. Well-kept parks and squares are show places. But go around to the back streets—to the alleys, to the vacant lots—and you get another story. Rubbish heaps, tin cans, refuse, dirty stables and stagnant water are breeding places for disease carriers.

A town can be clean—only as its back streets are clean. The disease bred in dirty places is ever a menace to the big house on the hill. So however clean the street and however good your neighborhood, you cannot protect your family from malaria, typhoid fever, tuberculosis, spinal meningitis, hook worm, and other germ diseases except by making the back of your town as clean and sanitary as its front.

As a City Father—

don't stop with having dirt and danger removed from one spot to another. That is not cleaning-up. That is only stirring-up. You should see that rubbish and germ-breeding material are not only collected from every spot in the town but that they are burned—destroyed forever.

For germs travel—

some in water; some in milk; some by air; thousands use the common house fly as an airship. Others hop with the flea. Some of the most dangerous come with the sting of a mosquito, while your ten fingers are the favorite transport of many, many thousands from anywhere and everywhere direct to your mouth.

Stamp out disease—

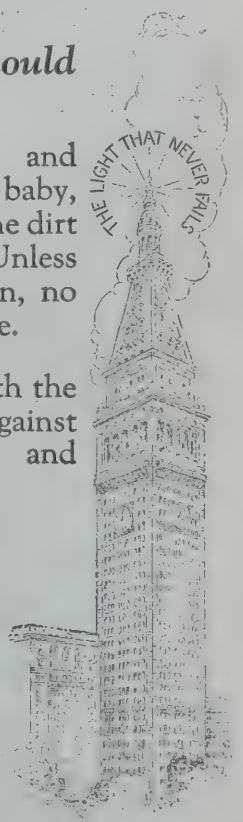
by cleaning-up dirt and filth where disease germs breed.

Be one in your town to start a great town-cleaning drive this Spring. Get your neighbors interested in making your town a safe place in which to live. Help to teach those in the careless house the value of sanitation.

The Three FFF's

"The three F's in the transfer of disease are Flies, Food and Fingers," says a leading sanitarian. He considers a knowledge of the three F's more important than the old curriculum of three R's.

Flies—The common house fly—bred in filth—carries on its legs thousands of germs. The fly lights on your baby—leaving its deadly germs. It gets into milk—poisoning it.



Food—Food handled by unclean hands; food exposed to dirt and flies, becomes contaminated, and may plant the germs of disease directly in the human system.

Fingers—The fingers collect germs and dirt from stair rails, from car straps, from shoes, rubbers, from ordinary objects in every day use. And the fingers are constantly making trips to the mouth.

Every City Mother should remember—that the snow-white house and nursery she provides for her baby, may be made dangerous by the dirt from the unclean places. Unless all of a community is clean, no part of it can be entirely safe.

Start the war on dirt today with the world's greatest weapons against disease—Fire, Soap, Water and Vigor.

Figures show that wherever the Sanitarian holds sway, disease has been lessened, the death rate cut down, and the average life lengthened.

In the interests of its policyholders the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company wages perpetual warfare upon the carriers and breeding places of disease germs. In 1922 it conducted 440 Community Clean-Up Campaigns.

The 17,000 Agents of the Metropolitan are 17,000 Champions of Community Cleanliness and Sanitation. Health Boards and civic bodies everywhere are calling on them for help in carrying on Clean-Up Days and Clean-Up Weeks.

Have a great Spring Cleaning in Your Town, too! Let the Metropolitan Agents in their daily round of visits to the homes of policyholders, help you to enlist your householders in the Campaign.

Don't wait to swat the fly—stamp out her breeding places. Keep highways and byways clean. Build a big Spring bonfire. Let it spread until the dirt from every corner is burned—not just moved from your premises to somewhere else.

Ask the Metropolitan Agent how to do your part. He will be glad to help you. The Company will be glad to send "Clean-Up" literature to public agencies, to town authorities and to householders.

HALEY FISKE, President

Published by

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—NEW YORK

Every ScotTissue Towel contains millions of Soft Thirsty Fibres, which absorb four times their weight in water. They make ScotTissue the quickest-drying, most satisfactory towels made.

Thirsty Fibre personifies cleanliness

Millions of Thirsty fibres are found only in ScotTissue Towels.

These Thirsty Fibres give ScotTissue Towels their pleasing softness, immaculate whiteness, fragrant freshness and quick drying-power, enabling them to absorb instantly four times their weight in water.

A clean, dry, never-before-used towel for every user every time—that's the sanitary story of ScotTissue Towels. A really individual service that assures perfect protection from contagion.

Those who are careful to observe the accepted standards of modern business, both toward patrons and employees, adopt ScotTissue Towels for their washrooms. They enjoy a cleaner, safer towel service—a more economical service too.

Stationers, druggists and department stores sell ScotTissue Towels, 40c a carton of 150 (50c in Canada). Less by the case of 3750 towels. Buy a carton or a case today. Or, we will send, prepaid, the towels or $5 outfit, upon receipt of price.

Don't confuse ScotTissue Towels with harsh non-absorbent paper towels. Remember, it isn't Thirsty-Fibre unless it bears the name ScotTissue.

Own your own Towel-Outfit
Plate-glass mirror
Nickel-plated towel rack
150 ScotTissue Towels
All for $5
($6.50 in Canada)
See it at your dealer's

Scott Paper Co., Chester, Pa.
New York Chicago Philadelphia San Francisco

Scot Tissue Towels

for "Clean Hands in Business"

© 1923, S. P. Co.

with closed eyes into the face of the man who had taught her that truth is the only thing that bears fruit.

The boy who had crept into her heart through the doorway of her passion and led her through blood and tears and agony and shame into the great company of poets and lovers.

The boy who so unwittingly, and at so great a price, had called her bluff.

And little Gwynne Gunning never put on her chinchilla cloak again.

One of the most poignant stories ever told is by Adela Rogers St. Johns in COSMOPOLITAN for June.

The Guests of Honor

(Continued from page 35)

house—he'd have to rebuild anyway."

Mr. Tautphaus pursed his lips and looked thoughtful.

"You see, it just juts into both the Lee and the Lessing places," pursued Juliana shrewdly.

"Now I'll tell you what I'd do," said the agent, with an air of impartial frankness. "I'd put a price on it, twenty thousand dollars. I'd do that. You authorize me to act for you, at that price, and let me see what I can do."

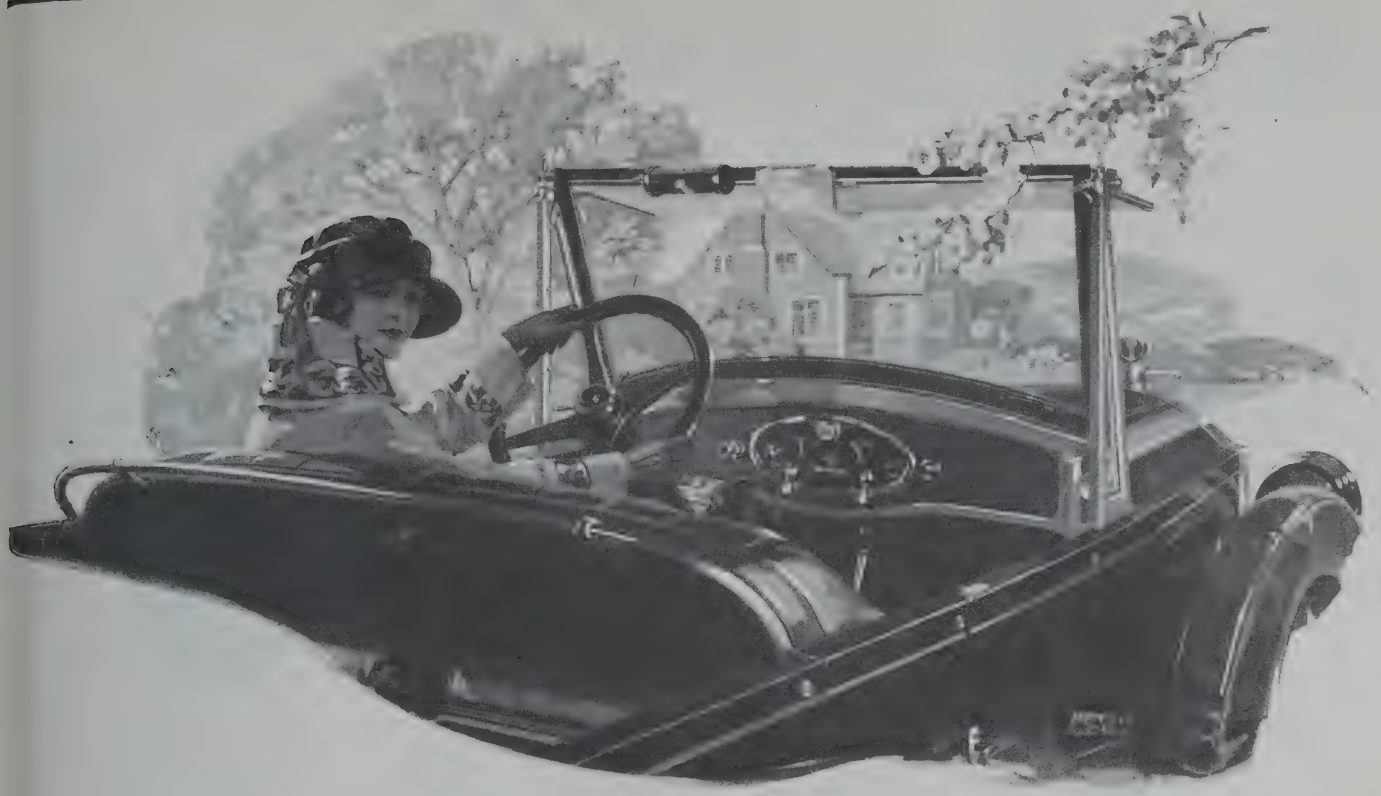
"But good gracious, he could buy any place—for that! No," said Juliana flatly, "I won't do it. You can tell him so!"

And she left the little agent abruptly, in his shiny little car, and went back to Dan in the garden. Dan, with Alexander Joy Rutherford, ravishing in a tight, faded pink romper, staggering beside him, was off to the Whites' to borrow a card table.

But when Dan came back that was another thorn, too. For the Whites' card table had been broken by having the children stand on it, and innocent Dan had wandered on to the Lessings' and had actually asked Mrs. Lessing if he might have hers.

Juliana's face burned.

"Dan, you didn't!"



"Yes I did. Why not? I knew they must have 'em—piles of 'em. She was having her hair done or something, I suppose, because she just sent out word that she would send one down. I said to the butler I'd take it, but he said no, a man would bring it down."

Juliana sat down on a porch step, her mouth hard, her eyes absent. She visualized the scene: the great lady interrupted at her toilet, the surprised moment on the part of mistress and maid before she sent out her message.

"Dan," began Juliana, "if you only——"

"——were a gentleman!" was to be the ending. But she did not say it. A dreariness of spirit fell upon her, and later when she learned from the abashed Dan that the card table had come and that Dan had bashfully attempted to give the chauffeur fifty cents as a tip and had been repulsed firmly but civilly, she merely sighed and shrugged.

She remembered, as she fussed and tasted and polished, that when she had married Dan everyone had said—or at least mama had—— Phrases like "rough diamond" and "not Juliana's type" floated

Her Ideal Car—Our Ideal Paige

SHE knows little—nor need she—of the lifetime care and conscience engineers have dedicated to the nice simplicities of mechanism about her. Enough that all her motoring whims are gratified—that every comfort serves and surrounds her.

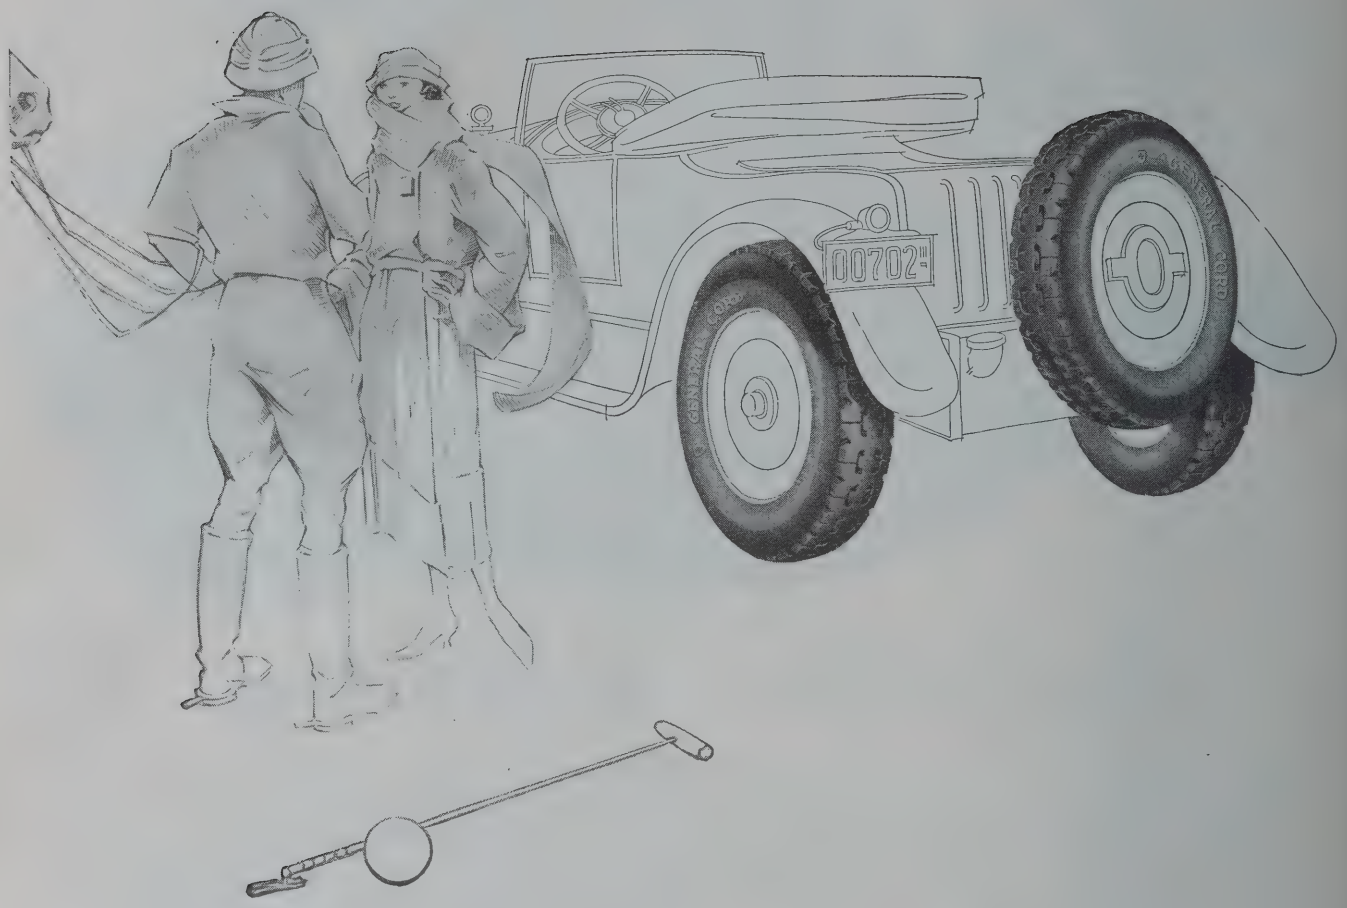
She is proud of her ideal Paige as it stands at her door—delighted by its beauty and substantial character. She is secure in her knowledge that no squeaks or rattles will ever call for apology. In any society its manners bespeak its quality.

Under the hood an ideally quiet seventy-horsepower motor meets every situation, summoned by dainty touch of toe. Through traffic thickets at a two-mile crawl, or over the rolling road at seventy or more—match her thrill, if you can, with any truer mastery of motion!

Delightful above all things is her ideal Paige's ease of handling. Here is finger-touch gear shifting with a bare three-inch movement. No need to pause, or to hurry—thanks to the wonderful Paige non-spin clutch. And so gentle the clutch action, she never "jerks" the car nor "stalls" the motor, however inexpert. With ball-bearing steering spindles, steering becomes easy to the frailest hand.

Against the sudden onslaught of rain or snow, the automatic windshield-wiper preserves her clear vision ahead. The backward panorama of the road and its traffic changes are duplicated in the rear-view mirror; and when her dainty foot presses the brake, a red light warns those behind to greater caution.

Still more comforts for mind and body! A gasoline gauge on the dash warns of approaching need, a Waltham clock of fleeting time. A green glass visor protects view and softens glare. Electric cigarette lighter laughs at forgotten matches. Squeak-proof body construction soothes tired nerves. And rear springs more than 5 feet long, with snubbers, cushion even thought of rough roads.



7-passenger Phaeton $2450
4-passenger Phaeton $2450
3-passenger Roadster $2695
5-passenger Brougham $2850

PAIGE

5-passenger Touring Sedan $3235
7-passenger Sedan $3235
7-passenger Limousine $3435
Prices at Detroit. Tax extra

(294)

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL CAR IN AMERICA

CARS can be run on any kind of tires, just as Polo was once played in England with billiard balls. It isn't so much using tires that "will do," as it is in knowing which tires will do better.

THE GENERAL
CORD TIRE

—goes a long way to make friends

BUILT IN AKRON OHIO BY THE GENERAL TIRE & RUBBER CO.

seditiously through her mind. Now here she was, struggling to meet persons of her own type on their own ground—and Dan——

The happy little house was full of friction and agitation and misunderstanding today. Nothing went right, and the day was a long nightmare to Juliana. The baby got sleepy at six o'clock, a bad sign, for it might mean that he would be wakeful later on. Katie, engaged to assist Lizzie, arrived in a pale blue crêpe de Chine waist, with hair obviously marcelled. Juliana had indicated to her, as boldly as she dared, that she would like her waitress to wear plain black tonight, but she dared not reproach the independent Katie, who was ticklish material from which to concoct a servant, at best. Lizzie waved a stout, freckled hand at the biscuits, when Juliana, deliciously pretty in her white gown, went anxiously out for a last inspection of the kitchen at quarter to eight.

"Biscuits or rocks, I done what she told me," said Lizzie. "If that's what they like to eat, well and good. I had some tea and toast an hour ago, and it feels to me like the middle of the night. I always thought curry was what you done with what was left, like you might make a hash——"

"Delicious—delicious!" murmured Juliana, tasting and stirring. She flitted away—candlelight on the marigolds—that was lovely, and so sweet a spring twilight outside that she would not draw the shades. And here was the first limousine's big eye, gleaming in the opal dusk, at the gate. Both the Lees—that was delightful! She had been so afraid Mr. Lee couldn't come.

And the Lessings, close upon them. She didn't quite like the fact that both men guests asked Dan to show them the place and walked about the fruitful, ordered two acres interestedly before dinner, but she took the women guests gallantly upstairs, hearing murmurs from the girls' room but hoping that the visiting ladies did not. Mrs. Cruikshank gaily and talkatively made her own way up a moment later, and the four women chatted in the speckless spare room.

What a dear little house it was, and what a good baby she must have to go to sleep so early! they said. Ah, well, they thought he was pretty sweet, Juliana smiled. It was awkward to have Mrs. Lessing—the oldest, the most conservative of the group—open the door of the awful hall closet, thinking it was the way downstairs; it was hideous to have the children's toys and play sweaters and various miscellaneous matters come cascading out. Juliana's face flushed as she jammed them back and forced the door closed again.

"How shall you manage your children's schooling when they are a little older?" Ross Lessing asked her as he shook out his napkin, and that was disquieting, too. He wasn't interested in her children's schooling! Juliana's suspicion that he was the "party" of the real estate proposition deepened.

There was a long wait after the soup. Dan talked on gallantly, but not as he would have talked to the Babcocks or the shabby Pattersons, for example, had they brought their wild, disheveled children down for a meal with the Rutherfords. He told them about the Indian village that had once stood on this spot, and of

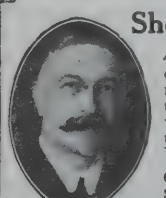
NORTH EAST

YOUR AUTOMOBILE can be kept fit with much less care than a horse. But for this very reason it should have the best of care when care is needed.

Nothing is more vital to the welfare of your car than Genuine repair parts, made by the original manufacturers of the equipment. So when service repairs are needed, do not accept any parts unless you know they are Genuine.

If your car is NORTH EAST equipped you can always be sure of Genuine parts for the electrical equipment by getting them at an Authorized North East Service Station or anywhere else you find the North East Yellow Boxes.

There are over 500 Authorized North East Service Stations throughout the world. Ask for our Service Directory if you do not know where your nearest Station is.



NORTH EAST SERVICE INC.

Atlanta Chicago Detroit Kansas City New York — Rochester San Francisco Windsor London Paris

Official Service for North East Electric Co.
Rochester, N. Y.
Manufacturers of
Starters Generators Ignition Horns Speedometers

Genuine North East Service Parts always come in Yellow Boxes. Avoid Toadstool substitutes

DR ESENWEIN

Short-Story Writing

A practical forty-lesson course in the writing and marketing of the Short Story, taught by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, famous critic and teacher; Editor of The Writer's Monthly.

One pupil has earned over $5,000 writing in his spare time—hundreds are selling constantly to the leading publishers.

150 page catalog free. Please address
The Home Correspondence School
Established 1897
Dept. 84 Springfield, Mass.

In this Bottle

you'll find relief from muscular soreness, tired, burning feet, fatigue, itching skin, bedsores, sprains and bruises.

Ask your druggist

MIFFLIN ALKOHOL
(MASSAGE)
the external tonic

Vantine's
—Enchantment

OH mystic East, with floral gardens of exotic beauty, where Azima in the turquoise twilight meets her lover, and peacocks preen their jewel feathers midst a sweet scented profusion of exquisite petal fragrance!

From your fairest flowers Vantine creates aromatic oriental treasures expressed in the luxurious and irresistible bouquet of

VANTINE'S
Jafleur
EXTRACT

$2.50

Jafleur Toilet Water (4 oz.) - $2.50
Jafleur Powder, in Crystal Jar with lamb's wool puff $1.50
Jafleur Talc 25c the Can
Jafleur Cold Cream - - - - $1.00
Jafleur Vanishing Cream - - - - $1.00

Say "Vantine's" at Drug Stores, Gift Shops and Departments that feature the newest in Oriental Scents; or, if unobtainable of your dealer, send us his name and the price.

Vantine's
The Buddha of Perfumes
71 Fifth Avenue, New York

the mysterious bricks that the Indians must have made—very unusual, nobody quite understood it.

His guests listened, Mrs. Lessing—Juliana noted—not touching her soup; and then Dunham Lee said in a low tone to Ross Lessing, "Funny thing about those Swedish bonds, eh?" and for a few minutes they all talked international loans and bond issues.

Five minutes—ten minutes. It was frightful, but Juliana had to excuse herself and go out and investigate the kitchen for herself. She murmured the maids' names sharply as she crossed the pantry. "Katie—I rang twice!"

"I never heard you," Katie said, all bustle, coming in from the porch.

"Go get the plates. Haven't you got that rice in the mold yet, Lizzie? Here, let me show you—go straight up to bed again, dear, and don't make any noise!" said Juliana to her first-born, who now appeared before her, like a wraith in brief pajamas.

Barbe bore blanching news.

"Grammer's here!" she said, electrically.

Juliana felt her heart plunge; stop short.

"Grandma? How do you know?"

"Me and Mary Ann were looking out from the sleeping porch," announced Barbe, "and we saw the taxi."

Juliana sat down. "Well, she'll simply have to keep out of sight—I simply won't—I can't—she'll just spoil everything!" ran her desperate thoughts. Aloud she said, "Slip round to the garden, Lizzie, and ask Mrs. Rutherford to come in this way, will you?"

Too late, Katie returned with eight soup plates—piled!—and the news that Mrs. Rutherford was in the dining room, and Mr. Rutherford wanted there should be another place set.

With a feeling almost murderous Juliana returned, brightly smiling, to her guests, and kissed her mother-in-law, whom indeed, until this moment, she had always loved. Dan had his arm about his mother, his face was bright with surprise and pleasure, the introductions were just completed.

Mrs. Rutherford was handsome, rosy, reaching sixty. She belonged to the new order of middle-age, the order of balanced menus and calories and civic clubs; she had been an honored delegate at more than one national convention. Her suit was plain, her soft old throat showed above a frill of rather good imitation lace filet, but her hat was unfortunate.

"You poor girl, you, why didn't you write me you were having a party?" she said, with all Dan's serenity. "I guess I'm the mother-in-law of the comics, after this. I've been trying to phone you all day—or at least I did this morning, before I left home. Your father and I saw a real good film about a mother-in-law last week, Daniel," she said to her son. "We have the best, you know, at the new Royal. Oh, that is a beautiful theater, Julie, I just want you and Dan to see it! I said to Mr. Rutherford, 'Well, maybe that'll take some of the curse off!' I knew you and Dan wanted to get away in the car for a few days," resumed Mrs. Rutherford, "and I hadn't anything to do this week—they're papering the upstairs—so I sent your father over to Lou's, and I came down. I'm having a tooth crowned," she explained to Ross Lessing. "It's such a bother I wish now I'd let him take it out. It brings me to the city——"

"No curry?" said Juliana to Mrs. Lessing in dismay. And with a hot and cold thrill she remembered that her most honored guest was a Catholic. Misery engulfed her. What did one do? Offer eggs?

She risked it. Mrs. Lessing smiled reassuringly. No, she had had tea. No, truly. Besides, there was this, she said pleasantly, holding up her salad fork. Just a plain little salad, Juliana said. But she liked Mrs. Lessing, kindly fussing with fried bananas and spinach and rice and chutney. "I've had a big dinner, for me, and everything so delicious!" said Mrs. Lessing.

"Da-ad!" It was a wail, distinguishable as Mary Ann's. It was followed by a banging door, by silence. To the uninitiated it sounded like battle, murder and sudden death, and silence fell upon the dinner party. But Juliana and Dan exchanged only a tentative, inquiring glance. Was it worth notice? Had she gone off to sleep again, or perhaps not entirely wakened at all?

"I'll go up," said Dan's mother.

But the bare feet of Mary Ann had been approaching them unheard all this time, and now Mary Ann burst in, sobbing, in outgrown pajamas whose cuffs Dan had split that very evening so that they should not chafe her, and with a button missing at the neck. Her fair hair was in disorder and she was crying.

"Dad, I had a bad dream," she sobbed, "and you didn't—you didn't hear me!"

"My little sweetheart!" Her father had her in his arms; weeping, pale, straight of hair and missing of tooth, she was welcome there. He was conscious of no onlooking eyes as he dried her tears and held her close and cuddled her bare little feet. "No slippers, pussy?" he said.

Mary Ann sniffled, heaved a deep sigh, gulped and was content. She snuggled in her father's arms, she smiled wetly upon the company. And Katie said blithely "All righty!" when Juliana asked her for more coffee.

The company left the table at about half-past nine, and the house only three-quarters of an hour later. They had pleasantly convincing reasons for so doing; Mr. Lee was extremely tired, Mr. Lessing was making an early start for Boston the next day, Mrs. Cruikshank had promised to look in at the theatricals of the Barnhill Country Club at ten o'clock.

The card tables, therefore, were not used, nor the new packs, nor the sharpened pencils. Mrs. Lessing suggested that they might take the table back, they had the car right here at the gate.

"Oh, we'll send it——" Juliana, flushed but gallant to the end, corrected herself. "We'll bring it back," she said.

Well, perhaps it would be better if the Lessings took it along with them, it appeared. You see, there was to be a card party for the Babies' Hospital tomorrow, at Barnhill, and they had asked for card tables. Mrs. Lessing had gathered up eleven this afternoon and sent them over, and she would——

So they took the card table and all went away, Juliana walking out to the gate with the Lees, the last to depart, under a mellow spring moon.

All outdoors can be yours —

for Economical Transportation

CHEVROLET

The cheapest health insurance for the whole family is a Chevrolet.

In a few minutes it transports you from the close and sultry atmosphere of the city to the pure invigorating air of the country. The nerve-racking city sights and sounds are left behind and replaced by the restful and inspiring vistas of green fields, babbling brooks, cheering songs of birds, lowing of cattle, the rare color of wild flowers and the scent of new mown hay.

Prices F. O. B. Flint, Michigan

Two Passenger Roadster	$510
Five Passenger Touring	525
Two Passenger Utility Coupe	680
Four Passenger Sedanette	850
Five Passenger Sedan	860
Light Delivery	510

Without counting the daily utility of a Chevrolet for going back and forth to work, shopping or taking the children to school, etc., its value in saving doctor's bills, broadening your mental horizon and keeping the whole family physically fit, amounts to more than the cost of the car and its upkeep.

It makes possible the suburban or country home far from the trolley or railroad tracks.

Call on the nearest Chevrolet dealer and learn how much daily utility and year 'round health aud happiness can be had for a sum so low that almost any American family can easily finance the purchase.

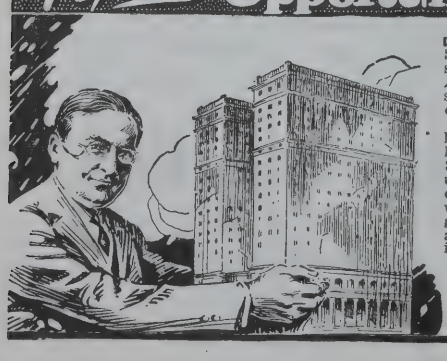
Chevrolet Motor Company, Detroit, Mich.

Division of General Motors Corporation

Dealers and Service Stations Everywhere.
Applications will be considered from high grade dealers only, for territory not adequately covered.

If the subscriber paid direct

Suppose that every Monday morning all the people who have a hand in furnishing your telephone service came to your door for your share of their pay. From the telephone company itself, would come operators, supervisors, chief operators, wire chiefs, linemen, repairmen, inspectors, installers, cable splicers, test-boardmen, draftsmen, engineers, scientists, executives, bookkeepers, commercial representatives, stenographers, clerks, conduit men and many others, who daily serve your telephone requirements, unseen by you.



There would be tax collectors to take your share of national, state and municipal taxes, amounting to over forty million dollars. There would be men and women coming for a fair return on their money invested in telephone stocks and bonds—money which has made the service possible. Then there are the people who produce the raw materials, the supplies and manufactured articles required for telephone service.

They would include hundreds of thousands of workers in mines, smelters, steel mills, lumber camps, farms, wire mills, foundries, machine shops, rubber works, paint factories, cotton, silk and paper mills, rope works, glass works, tool works, and scores of other industries.

When you pay your telephone bill, the money is distributed by the company to the long line of people who have furnished something necessary for your service. The Bell System spares no effort to make your service the best and cheapest in the world, and every dollar it receives is utilized to that end.

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

40,000 Opportunities in Hotels!

You can have one of these well-paid, pleasant executive positions—40,000 of them in the big hotels of the United States—now America's Fourth Largest Industry. Statistics show that ONE IN EVERY TEN HOTELS WILL HAVE AN OPENING FOR A MANAGER THIS YEAR. Thousands of other positions are also open to those who qualify through training.

The Lewis Schools guarantee to give you the valuable knowledge that it has taken some of the most successful hotel men years to obtain—men who are now making $5,000 to $50,000 a year. All of your training will be under the personal direction of Clifford Lewis—a hotel expert of national reputation. A few spare-time hours a week given to the simple, clear lessons of the course will give you the training for a good position, a fine living and a handsome salary. The training will in no way interfere with your present work or recreation.

Send today for Free Book "YOUR BIG OPPORTUNITY." Don't wait a minute—you may lose the opportunity of a lifetime. Write TODAY—now! Your whole future may depend on it!

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOLS
Clifford Lewis, Pres., (Founded 1916) Room 254, Washington, D. C.
The Only Original Hotel Training School

After they had gone she remained at the gate, leaning upon its old-fashioned pickets, her white gown a glimmer in the soft light between the blossoming lilacs and the little Japanese maple. Dan, straightening the sitting room, carrying the chairs about and "smallening" the table, sent her more than one uneasy glance.

"I guess I queered poor Ju's dinner party," he said repentantly to his mother.

Mrs. Rutherford, holding the now sleeping Mary Ann in her arms, looked surprise.

"How?" she asked. "I tasted everything—I'd had my dinner—but it seemed perfectly delicious to me, and I thought Katie did real well."

"Those people don't go to dinners to eat," Dan said dismally.

He carried his daughter upstairs, and Mrs. Rutherford took possession of the spare room, with its unaccustomed candles, powder and embroidered towels.

"Ju's out at the gate," she told her son. "You go out there and make your peace with her. You tell her that I was tired and went to bed, and if I'm still reading when you come up tell her to put her head in here and say good night. Maybe I kind of complicated, Daniel," his mother added, kissing him. "But I knew you folks wanted to get up into mountain country for a few days, to Will's, and I thought you could leave the baby, and Mary Ann too, here with Lizzie and me—you and Julie always seem to entertain so easily and not to mind who comes in——"

"You never complicated anything, darling!" Dan said affectionately. But his heart was rather low as he went out into the flooding moonlight to find his wife.

It gave a leap of relief and astonishment when she turned shining eyes upon him in the soft gloom.

"Dan, was there ever such a night?" she said dreamily.

"Somebody——" He hardly dared venture it, but then, with the high moon shining, and the lilacs drenched with sweetness, and the black shadows lying like lacework on the little lawn, it was easy to put his big arm about her, easy to venture anything. "Somebody ought to be playing 'The Chocolate Soldier,'" he said.

She rested her dark head on his shoulder; the whole sweet, fragrant, lovely woman, in her frail white ruffles, was in his arms.

"Dan, wasn't it horrible?" she said slowly, but without any special regret in her voice. "You know, most dinners—when you think of them, out here under the stars, as microbes doing things in a world of microbes—are nonsense, aren't they?" she went on. "Those people didn't want our food; their houses were full of better food. They could have gone to twenty hotels in the city and bought better. They didn't want to come, they just balanced the pros and cons and felt that they ought to come. And I acted like a—like a—dumbbell!"

"I was a dog," said Dan simply.

"You have no social brains," his wife told him, in a tone of mere dispassionate resignation. "And when it comes to superficialities, I can trust the baby's instincts before yours!" She turned suddenly and kissed him, with that little soft

The New Economical 5-passenger Willys-Knight Touring Car

THE Willys-Knight stops seldom at the gasoline pump. But 20 miles to the gallon is only the beginning of the economy of the Willys-Knight sleeve-valve engine. This marvelous engine actually improves with use.

There is no valve grinding. Carbon only increases compression. Many owners have reported 50,000 miles and more without a single engine adjustment. And a Willys-Knight engine has never been known to wear out. No wonder owners are satisfied.

Thus powered, and further distinguished by beautiful streamline body designs, the seven new Willys-Knight models offer remarkable value at conservative price.

WILLYS-OVERLAND, INC., TOLEDO, OHIO
Willys-Overland Ltd., Toronto, Ont.

WILLYS-KNIGHT

THE ENGINE IMPROVES WITH USE

fresh from the factory

* fresh wherever you get it

* After tobacco has been properly aged, cut, blended and packed for smoking, the sooner you smoke it the better it is.

Every carton of Tuxedo is dated, showing the last day on which it may be sold.

FRESH
Tuxedo
TOBACCO

Now 15¢

© Guaranteed by
The American Tobacco Co.
INCORPORATED

rush of fragrant hair and that quick surrender of arms and lips that always intoxicated him. "But I love you, Dan!" she said.

"I love you, my own girl," Dan answered, suddenly husky. "But I don't deserve to have you nice to me tonight. You struggled and you worked—and you were eager and busy and interested—and then, like boobs, the kids and I, and Lizzie and Katie, and even mother, mixed up the whole party! But never mind, Ju," he added, "some day we'll try it again. They shan't freeze you out of your little farmhouse, and next time it'll all go right—you'll see!"

"Never again!" Juliana said, smiling. "I'm going to give the house to Tauphaus tomorrow," she added calmly, "and I'm going to get my own price for it, too! And we'll cruise about and go somewhere else! Not because"—she interrupted his protest quickly—"not because they don't like us—but because I don't like them! I don't like what they'll make of me if I don't run to cover!"

"Ah, darling, but you love—we love this place!" Dan said, quite overcome by the utter unexpectedness of this mood.

"Yes, and that's just the trouble!" his wife answered, laughing, yet in earnest too. "They love their places, and to have maids in caps and aprons, and meals served like religious ceremonies, and a garage and a tennis court rounding out the estate, instead of the Rutherfords' house! It's all the better, Dan—it kills the spirit! I don't want to get like that. I don't want to have a chill when Katie says 'All righty!' or passes food on the right side instead of the left. I don't want," said little Juliana, her hands on his shoulders now, and her white-ruffled figure close to him in the moonlight, "I don't ever want to have a dinner to which my husband's mother isn't welcome," she said, "or to which my Mary Ann, in her little nighty, can't come down, to be loved and comforted! They're my guests of honor!"

Dan was silent for a long minute, but their eyes, as he held her tight, did not move from each other. Presently the man said slowly:

"You're the most wonder—but I'm not fooling. You are the most wonderful woman in the world!"

They turned from the gate. The shabby little house looked peaceful, under its overarching elms, with a mellow square of light showing Mrs. Rutherford's window. Behind Juliana and Dan, as they went slowly up the path with their arms locked, lights shone from the stately Lessing house, and in the servants' rooms at the Lee mansion, and in the garages. And presently the Cruikshank limousine swept by; Mrs. Cruikshank had changed her gown and she and her escort were on their way to the country club.

But Juliana and Dan saw none of this. They had turned their backs upon it.

A "homey" story that will live in your memory begins Kathleen Norris's new Irish series in next month's COSMOPOLITAN tang of cloves, because it was still new to me and had a curious effect upon my emotions. Strange cries and sounds rang on the warm air like a pleasant symphony of tropic life. The warmth seemed to pulsate with human emotions. The dark shops glowed with romantic suggestions.

Zanzibar

(Continued from page 73)

As we entered the counting room of Ali Beder, the old merchant had just paused on the threshold of an inner compartment to look back at us.

He was a patriarchal figure with a long stained beard, a goat-like face and a high domed forehead which disappeared under a small turban of black cloth embroidered with tarnished gold thread, twisted somewhat in the Persian style. A flowing kanza hung from his shoulders, enveloping him; but, old though he was, it could not disguise the great depth of chest and breadth of shoulder. There was something almost sinister in the suggestion of power, physical and mental, masked by age and the patriarchal garments.

"Hodie!" said Prescott cheerfully. "How are you?"

In the gloomy interior the old man's eyes had the appearance of being rimmed with red lids. They stared fixedly at the nonchalant Christian, until, recognizing him, they blazed curiously, then faded into the dull mask again. A slow weary smile drifted across the heavy countenance. The patriarch beckoned with a friendly gesture to the inner room.

"Salaam," he responded cordially. "Come in."

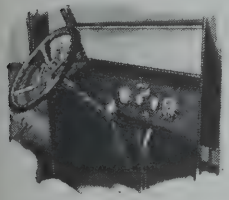
Within the inner room, the old merchant treated us with hospitality and distinction. He made seats for us on mellowed Serabend rugs, bolstered with pillows. Clapping his hands, he called servants who brought narghiles charged with fragrant tobacco; black coffee, flavored with cardamom; sweet cakes made in his own kitchen; all served on etched brass trays from Damascus. This hospitality was particularly significant because it was the season of Ramadan when the Mohammedans themselves fasted throughout the day.

Ali Beder's long, almost lugubrious countenance, the moist, slightly pouting underlip, the watery, pink-edged eyes over which the heavy eyelids appeared to droop languidly, the wavering, kindly smile—all indicated a friendly, almost benign nature, and a somewhat simple intellect. As I observed him more carefully, however, looking through the fumes arising from my coffee cup, my first impression of something sinister beneath that exterior was strengthened. Sensuality was there, with a crushing implacable force, and the superstition of a treacherous nature.

At the same time his attitude towards Prescott was one of genuine friendliness; but it was a peculiar sort of friendliness—the half contemptuous, somewhat pitying tolerance of a perverted character which finds amusement in the companionship of

Oldsmobile
A PRODUCT OF GENERAL MOTORS



The Brougham $1375 at factory

Buy a Complete Closed Car

The new Oldsmobile Brougham at $1375 has no equal in value and completeness

The front seats tilt forward giving unusual entrance space for passengers or bulky luggage.

The instruments on the walnut finish instrument board are separately removable for service.

The tools, carried in the luggage compartment, are accessible without disturbing the passengers.

The seat room and leg room are ample for five grown-up people.

When we say that the 5-passenger Oldsmobile Brougham is the most complete closed car of its type and price, we hope you will challenge our statement. We want you to check the Brougham, point by point, with cars of this type and get the facts at first hand.

Keeping the low price of the Brougham in mind, try to find the equal of these remarkable features:

All Steel Covered Body. No panels of composition materials to warp and deteriorate rapidly. The Brougham is paneled in steel from floor to roof. You are entitled to standard closed body construction.

Front Seats are Pullman Type Chairs. The front seats are used the most—we have made them fully as comfortable as the wide rear seat, with soft upholstery, deep springs and high non-folding backs.

Luggage Should be Under Cover. The locked luggage compartment under the deck at the rear is just right for a traveling bag.

Headlights that Spell Safety. The headlights are brilliant and powerful, yet legal in every state. The anti-glare corrugations in the reflectors make lenses and visors obsolete. A distinctive Oldsmobile feature.

Match this Equipment. Heater, door locks, cowl ventilator, sun visor, windshield wiper, high grade upholstery, satin silvered hardware, cowl lamps, nickeled radiator, one-piece crown fenders, transmission lock, dome light, window lifters and shades, walnut steering wheel and walnut finished instrument board.

Chassis Endorsed by General Motors. Built by Oldsmobile and approved by General Motors—a double assurance of high quality—the Brougham Four chassis is famous for its economy and endurance records. Its wheelbase of 115″ is in contrast to the 110″ wheelbase average of all competitive fours.

Measured by the only impartial yardstick—comparison—the Brougham is the supreme price-value opportunity in complete closed cars.

OLDS MOTOR WORKS, LANSING, MICHIGAN
Division of General Motors Corporation

Price Range: Fours—$975 to $1595; Eights—$1375 to $2025 f. o. b. Lansing

OLDSMOBILE

"I'm making real money now"

"SEE that coupon? Remember the day you urged me to send it to Scranton? It was the best thing I ever did.

"Mr. Carter called me in to-day. Said he'd been watching my work for some time—ever since he learned I was studying with the International Correspondence Schools.

"Then he asked me if I thought I could take over Bill Stevens' job. I told him I was sure that I could—that I had had that goal in view ever since I started my I. C. S. course.

"I start to-morrow, Mary, at an increase of $60 a month. It's wonderful how spare-time study helps a man to get ahead."

FOR thirty-one years, the I. C. S. has been helping men to win promotion, to earn more money, to get ahead in business and in life.

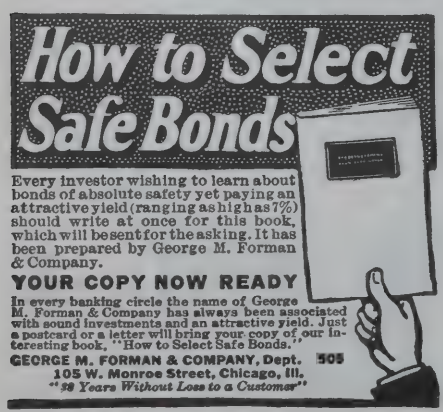
You, too, can have the position you want in the work you like best. Yes, you can.

All we ask is the chance to prove it. Without cost, without obligation, just mark and mail this coupon.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 2516-B, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation on my part, please tell me how I can qualify for the position or in the subject before which I have marked an X:

BUSINESS TRAINING DEPARTMENT



☐Business Management	☐Salesmanship
☐Industrial Management	☐Advertising
☐Personnel Organization	☐Better Letters
☐Traffic Management	☐Foreign Trade
☐Business Law	☐Stenography and Typing
☐Banking and Banking Law	☐Business English
☐Accountancy (including C.P.A.)	☐Civil Service
☐Nicholson Cost Accounting	☐Railway Mail Clerk
☐Bookkeeping	☐Common School Subjects
☐Private Secretary	☐High School Subjects
☐Business Spanish ☐French	☐Illustrating

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL DEPARTMENT

☐Electrical Engineering	☐Architect
☐Electric Lighting	☐Blue Print Reading
☐Mechanical Engineer	☐Contractor and Builder
☐Mechanical Draftsman	☐Architectural Draftsman
☐Machine Shop Practice	☐Concrete Builder
☐Railroad Positions	☐Structural Engineer
☐Gas Engine Operating	☐Chemistry ☐Pharmacy
☐Civil Engineer	☐Automobile Work
☐Surveying and Mapping	☐Airplane Engines
☐Metallurgy ☐Mining	☐Agriculture and Poultry
☐Steam Engineering ☐Radio	☐Mathematics

Name.....
Street
Address.....
1-10-23
City.....State.....
Occupation.....

Persons residing in Canada should send this coupon to the International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Limited, Montreal, Canada one it has wronged. It occurred to me that Ali Beder was looking down on us from an age of adventurous and fearless men. There was no doubt that young Prescott recalled to him old and pleasant memories; while at the same time the young man's unimaginative listless personality appeared to him in contemptible contrast with the flame and vigor of the granduncle, Ibrahim Effendi.

I tried unsuccessfully to draw old Ali Beder out. He spoke freely of Tippoo Tib, whom his father had financed; he had met Henry Stanley, and thought little of him; while he had a genuine admiration for David Livingstone. But when I mentioned Ibrahim Effendi, he dismissed him blandly. I brought up the subject a second time. Ali Beder, looking at me queerly, gave an almost imperceptible shrug, and murmured:

"Bassi!"

I took the hint and said no more.

Leaving the counting room, Prescott and I went on to the godown to which Abu Nawass had already preceded us, to commence the weighing of the cloves Briggs had purchased.

There is a tremendous fascination about cloves in bulk, and here in Ali Beder's godown was a veritable hill of them. They were piled twenty feet high on the floor of a gloomy chamber into which light filtered dimly through iron-barred windows, touching with high lights the black and bronze skin of the hamals, scrambling, plunging and sliding knee-deep in the spice. Glimpses of the glaring blue sea were framed in the casements; the noises of the bazaar and bay were hushed by the thick cement walls; and an atmosphere of romance saturated the ancient edifice.

The cavernous depths of the godown with the black workers flitting back and forth like shadows, chanting as they tossed the spice, seemed to me like one of the subterranean corridors which Irving wrote about in his legends of Alhambra. I wanted to explore deeper into the most remote chambers; but Prescott was bored and indifferent. Sitting on a bale in a dark corner he wanted to talk market prices with Abu Nawass.

At last I persuaded him to come with me. We found nothing new. The inner rooms were simply a series of square cell-like chambers packed to the ceiling with cloves baled in makanda mats and ventilated by means of tiny grated windows. As we penetrated deeper the silence and darkness became oppressive. Still we continued on, until, rounding a dark corner, we became separated. I waited for a moment indecisively, expecting to hear Prescott crunching the crisp cloves under foot, but at first I heard nothing. All at once I distinguished very faintly the sound of water tinkling in a metal basin.

It was a pleasant sound, and I moved quietly towards it, forcing a passage between the bales, until I came unexpectedly upon an iron-grilled door. This door was obviously all that separated Ali Beder's godown from his living quarters. Built at a time when fighting and sudden flight were not unlikely contingencies, it was probably originally intended as a means of escape through the godown to the waterfront. It was apparently no longer used.

Prescott was standing tight against this door, pressing himself against the iron bars, fascinated by something within.

Without advancing farther all I could see was an enclosed courtyard around which ran a latticed balcony. Only an obscure corner of the court and stairs was visible to me. In this corner there was a curbed cistern from which water was splashed upon the black and white checkered flags where pigeons were strutting and ruffling their wings. Brass and pewter trays and long-necked water pitchers were scattered about as though someone had been scouring and refilling them with water. A couple of pomegranates, pink and yellow with fruit, stood near the door in jars, screening the rest of the court from observation.

A young white goat with head twisted on one side was standing with its fore hoofs on the cistern curb looking with a ludicrous expression into its black depths. In the distance I could hear voices—women's voices, speaking and laughing in Arabic and Kiswahili. My heart began pounding with excitement, for I realized instantly that we had accidentally blundered into the heart of the women's quarters of a wealthy Arab's beyt! A big negress, laughing inanely, walked across the court, her bare feet flip-flopping on the wet flags, splashing water slovenly from the buckets she carried.

Then I heard a gurgle of laughter from beside the door, but just out of sight, and I caught my breath. The next instant a pomegranate was thrown across the cistern, and burst upon the forehead of the dazed goat. The startled animal shied off backwards on its hind legs; and at the same instant a girl stepped into view, laughing uncontrollably, bending forward slapping her knees and calling the goat ridiculous names in pure Arabic.

For a moment I was dazed with astonishment. I thought confusedly that we had discovered a beautiful European girl held prisoner in this impenetrable beyt; but her fluent gutturals instantly undeceived me. It was simply that I saw for the first time a very beautiful type of pure Arab, unveiled, and moving about with graceful abandon. Nevertheless, she was beyond comparison the most exquisite creature I had seen in years.

Slim and strong, ardent and young, with the brown expressive eyes of a race which puts high value on the power of the eye, she seemed formed for swift and graceful movement. Her olive skin was flushed with color. Her slippers had been kicked aside and her white dainty feet were bare; while her sleeves, rolled up to the elbow, disclosed white graceful forearms. The fun of playing with the cool water had evidently made the task of polishing the metal a pleasant one.

With bent body she pattered her feet as she danced before the goat; clapped her hands; and, when her thick braids of glossy hair fell over her shoulder, straightened up to toss them back with a movement that showed all the inviting grace of a firm young throat and the curves of her shoulders and bosom, half bared by the slipping blue silken gown she wore. She wore in addition striped trousers caught tight above her ankles, and her black hair was carelessly decorated with bits of blue ribbon and gold ornaments.

She was obviously a member of Ali Beder's own family.

So fascinated was I by the sight that I

Sets a New Mark in Closed Car Value

All-Year Utility at Open Car Cost

The Coach will cost you less even than the open model of any car to which you compare Hudson in quality, performance and reliability.

Yet see how fully it meets your closed car requirements. With the long, carefree service that only a superlative chassis can give, it provides all essential closed car utility and comfort.

The Coach Met Instant Success

It took buyers by storm. More than 30,000 Coaches are now in service. With the Coach you get the famous Super-Six chassis, of which more than 140,000 are in service. Official tests mark it one of the truly great automobiles.

And with its new and improved Super-Six motor you get the best Hudson ever built. It has a smoothness unknown to earlier models. Its reliability and endurance excels even those Hudsons which have registered upwards of 100,000 miles of service.

You Will Like It

Respecting its good looks and substantial quality you need no other assurance than Hudson's reputation as the world's largest builder of fine cars.

The Coach has a sturdy simplicity. It is delightfully comfortable. It is built to stand the hardest kind of service.

Come ride in the Coach. See if it does not fully meet your closed car needs at a saving of $800 to $1200.

Speedster - - $1425 7-Pass. Phaeton - - $1475 Coach - - $1525 Sedan - - $2095

Freight From Detroit and Tax Extra

Canadian Prices, F. O. B. Windsor; All Duty, Sales, Excise Taxes Paid

Speedster - - $2125 7-Pass. Phaeton - - $2200 Coach - - $2275 Sedan $3150

Hudson Coach $1525

Unlocks only at will of user. Not otherwise.

WEST ELECTRIC

Three Aids to Beautiful Hair

WEST ELECTRIC
"Softex" Shampoo

Shampoo with West Softex. It cleanses the hair thoroughly, leaving it soft, full of life, and easy to manage. Contains just enough Egyptian Henna to give the desired shimmering tint. Also prepared without henna. 10c a package.

WEST ELECTRIC
Hair Curlers

Then, for the wave, use WEST Electric Hair Curlers. No heat is required to insure a lasting wave in any desired effect. Simple, quick, and cannot injure the hair. Card of 5, 25c; card of 2, 10c.

WEST ELECTRIC
Hair Nets

Finally the net—WEST "Beach and Motor," the invisible Hair net. They are extra large, made of 30-inch, twice sterilized strands of American prepared hair. Wide variety of shades insures an exact match for any hair. 10c each. Satisfaction guaranteed. For economy, buy them by the dozen. West Double Mesh recommended for sports wear 15c each, 2 for 25c.

If your dealer cannot supply you, order direct from us, enclosing purchase price and dealer's name and address.

Our "Guide to Hair Dressing at Home" shows, in full colors, how to dress the hair in the latest styles. It will be sent free upon request.

WEST ELECTRIC HAIR CURLER CO.
1707 Hancock Street
Philadelphia, Pa.

WEST ELECTRIC HAIR CURLER CO. OF CANADA, Ltd., Montreal

WEST ELECTRIC HAIR CURLER CO.
Hatton Garden, London, E. C. 1.

entirely forgot the presence of Prescott, who, equally forgetful of me, had not budged. The shame I might have felt at this sort of intrusion was drowned by an emotion I had never before experienced. This girl sparkled so with vitality, shone so with natural cleanliness, that she seemed utterly remote from the women to whom I had become accustomed. The European women of the colony were languorous, petulant and pale; the Indians, though exquisite of feature, seemed more or less dirty with their greasy ointments and pomades; while the blacks were savagely coarse and repellent. This girl, laughing aloud with natural expression, dancing, shuffling her feet, tossing her head, clapping her hands, glowing with color, was a fusion of all the passions and graces of her race. The first breath of love might destroy her in flame; but scorn would turn her into a murderous sibyl.

I could have reached out my hand and touched her. She was so near I could distinguish the shadows under her eyes, cast by her long lashes; hear the quick catch of her breath between bursts of laughter; see the warm blood palpitating in her throat; could even perceive the velvet texture of her skin, the moisture of her lip, her little tongue slipping in and out between glistening teeth, the gleam of her eyes as she opened them in mock terror at the prancing goat.

"Ah, stupid Nana," she gasped, "why didn't you dive in, then, when I threw it?"

The goat shook his yellow horns at her and waved his forelegs. The girl backed away, hands stretched at full length in front of her, fingers widespread.

"Coward!" she laughed. "Nana, you'll always look like a fool until you get the courage to attack. Boo! Na-na-na-na! Allah, to be afraid of a woman!"

All at once a curious change came over the girl. A look of uneasiness, of perplexity, slowly drove away the laughter. She straightened up, looking doubtfully about her, at the same time involuntarily drawing together the silken gown at her throat. I knew immediately what had happened. She felt our presence. Instantly my own tremulousness was gone, and I threw out my hand to draw Prescott away from the girl. At that moment he must have whispered to her, or else his foot crunched upon some cloves; for the girl suddenly stumbled backward as though thrown off her balance.

Turning her head sharply in our direction, she discovered Prescott pressing against the bars, his face flushed with excitement, his clear blue eyes fixed upon her, his hair rumpled about his forehead by the toupee that had fallen from his head. With a smothered shriek she jumped away and flew up the stairs to the balcony, looking wildly over her shoulder, until she seized a shawl which she drew over her head, veiling her face.

The big negress came running noisily into the courtyard, followed by others, calling out:

"Safie! Sweetheart, what is the matter?"

I jerked Prescott back into the shadow, cursing under my breath at his awkwardness, knowing that we were in a damnably embarrassing and possibly serious situation. I caught a last glimpse of Safie, hesitating at the top of the stairway, her wide startled eyes filling with curiosity. All at once I heard her say, laughing hysterically as the servants ran towards her:

"It is nothing! Nana—Nana—that wicked goat—ran at me!"

"Oh, Lord," I could not help exclaiming, as I urged Prescott along the passageway, "you lucky devil!"

"What did she say?" he asked confusedly.

"Don't you understand Arabic?"

"Not a word!"

"You idiot," I exclaimed wildly, "why didn't you learn at least a few phrases?"

"What did she say?"

"Never mind," I said after a few minutes, when my judgment was a little calmer; "but remember this. We've just done something that a Mohammedan considers a serious offense against decency. If those women tell Ali Beder, there's bound to be trouble of some sort—I don't know just what. The only thing for us to do is to keep our mouths shut. Forget the whole thing!"

"I don't see it," said Prescott stubbornly. "I've acted pretty decently here in Zanzibar, and no one can say anything against me. Why can't I go to Ali Beder, explain the situation and ask him to introduce me?"

Exasperated, still somewhat agitated by my own emotions, I could only splutter:

"You're not in Boston! If you even drop a hint of this to Ali Beder, you'll never see her again!"

After a moment he said explosively:

"Well, by God, I will see her again!"

We found Abu Nawass leaning against the wall like a figure from Lalla Rookh, frustrating with blunt sarcasm the efforts of Ali Beder's karani to cheat on the weight of the cloves.

"Look for yourself," he said with a contemptuous gesture. "Ali Beder must have a grudge against you. This stuff will have to go through three siftings!"

Prescott looked without interest, a far-away expression in his eyes, the muscles of his jaw working slightly; while I myself felt a mingling of misery and suffocation as I thought of Safie and the utter futility of my even hoping to see her again.

Fortunately for my own peace of mind I received a telegram that same afternoon urging me to go immediately to Dar-Es-Salaam, which is on the mainland across the way from Zanzibar, to see a man who was going inland to Ujiji. Through the influence of the O. O. A. I was given passage on one of the small British trawlers that patrol the coast; and the following morning I was on the mainland. I had a royal time in the navy, and managed through the good will of my new friends to get a lift back to Zanzibar in an aeroplane, which dropped me on the outskirts of the city the fourth evening after my departure.

I cleaned up at the hotel, dropped around to see the O. O. A., only to find him out, and ended up at Briggs's place.

The great Arab pile was as dark and imposing as on the first night I visited it. Old Mzee swung open the heavy carved door and stood aside, holding his yellow lantern overhead as I passed up the narrow stairway. Briggs was out; and I hesitated on the barasa, looking out across the calm waters of the roadstead. The sun had just gone down like a plummet into the blackness of Africa; the sea below me was turning from opal to

*AT PYTCHLEY HUNT

'Well, Archie, I see you've been buying some new tyres."
'New tyres? Not at all. I've driven those Kelly Cords steadily for nearly a year now."

Drawing by Laurence Fellows, London.

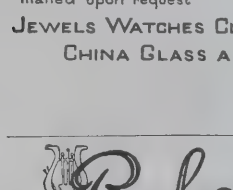
THAT Kelly Kant-Slip Cord tires retain the appearance of newness for an astonishingly long time is, of course, a source of pride to the owner. But this is as nothing when compared to the satisfaction derived from the long, economical mileage they deliver and the sense of safety given him by "the tread that removes the dread of skidding." It costs no more to buy a Kelly.

BAILEY BANKS & BIDDLE CO.
JEWELERS SILVERSMITHS STATIONERS
Philadelphia

DIAMOND RINGS
DIAMOND BAR PINS
DIAMOND BRACELETS

PEARLS AND
PEARL NECKLACES

SUPREME QUALITY BEAUTY VALUE
Correspondence invited



WEDDING INVITATIONS
AND ANNOUNCEMENTS
Social Stationery and Invitations for various Social Functions
Samples upon request

GIFT SUGGESTION BOOK
mailed upon request illustrates and prices
JEWELS WATCHES CLOCKS SILVERWARE
CHINA GLASS AND NOVELTIES

Bakertone
Removes All But The Music From Phonograph Records

Practically eliminates surface noises and metallic sounds. Stops "scratching" and "rasping". Purifies and clarifies every note; individualizes each tone. Makes your phonograph music soft, sweet and mellow without "muffling" or "killing" the tones. Attaches to any phonograph except those using diamond point. Beautifully finished in heavy gold plate, $5.00 each. For sale at music stores, or, sent direct on receipt of price and dealer's name. Money back if not satisfied after 10 days' use.

BAKERTONE CORPORATION
Dept. 105, 408-12 Pearl Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

The HOMCHARGER
charges your AUTO or RADIO Battery at Home for a Nickel
Price $18.50
Send for Free Bulletin
The Automatic Electrical Devices Co.
153 W. Third St. Cincinnati, O.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
School and College Bureau

Offers You its Specialized Services in Choosing a School

Last year the School and College Bureau of The Chicago Daily News saved many busy parents and questioning boys and girls both time and worry by sending them prompt, reliable information about just the kind of school they wanted—personal requirements as to location and tuition charges being considered in each individual case.

This year many young people will again be perplexed by the problem of finding the right school. Why not let us help you?

The Chicago Daily News maintains this service absolutely free of charge to you. No need to hurriedly select a school on mere hearsay when expert advice can be obtained by telephoning, writing, or calling for a personal interview at

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
School and College Bureau
CHICAGO ILLINOIS

shadowy purple, and the islands that dotted it from jade-green to velvet.

A peculiar hush lay over the city.

The season of Ramadan was ending. Each evening the mullahs had been watching for the thin sickle of the new moon to mark an end of the long fast and herald the feast that followed. A heat mist, like a veil, was drawn across the sky, and the watchers waited hopefully for it to pass.

I felt myself sinking into the calm of the moment, but beneath this mood I experienced a sort of pleasant tremulousness, as vague indefinable impulses stirred in my veins. The last four days had been crowded with so much action that now I could hardly compose myself. I felt an intense craving for swift movement; in short, I was in exactly the right mood for adventure. Standing there with arms folded, I waited impatiently for someone to come. All at once, acutely conscious, I swung quickly about and saw an Arab standing immovably in the shadows, watching me.

He had no right there, and I looked at him steadily, feeling the fingers of danger rippling up my spine. After a moment he made a gesture of impatience and stepped forward into the light. It was young Earl Prescott, wrapped in a dark cloak, with a turban pressed down on his head, its loose end muffling his mouth.

"Quick," he said in an uncertain voice; "step out of the light. I want to talk to you." I moved to the darker end of the barasa, without saying a word. "You're just in time," he said, gripping me by the arm and talking rapidly and vehemently. "You've got to help me. You've got to! You know—you're the only one who does know—except Abu Nawass—and I can trust you. Listen! For heaven's sake don't think I'm a fool. Just listen—because you've got to help me!"

"What are you talking about?" I said coldly; but my heart began to pound heavily.

"You know already! It's Safie—Ali Beder's granddaughter. We're in love! She's told me she loves me. As for me—oh, you don't understand! I love her, that's all! I'm crazy about her! I mean it. I never knew there was any feeling like it. If I don't get her," he said wildly, "I tell you there'll be trouble. If anybody tries to stop me, I'll kill him!"

"You dashed fool," said I. "Pull yourself together!"

"You don't understand!" he cried. "You can't understand. Listen. The day after you left, I went to that gate and saw her again—and she smiled at me—and gave me a bit of fruit—and whispered to me, but I couldn't understand her. Then I went back in the afternoon with a phrase book and saw her again, and I found out who she was. When she handed me another piece of fruit, I touched her hand. I can't explain it; but it was like electricity. I—I just went—blooey! I don't know now how I managed it, but I kissed her through the iron bars; and she ran away because someone was coming. The next day she was afraid to come close, and I couldn't explain in a whisper how I felt. Even if I spoke Arabic I think I would have choked. Look! When I talk of her I tremble all over. I know she loves me! I know it! And yet—there's that iron gate—and I can't explain alone——"

"Explain what?"

"Explain just how I love her!"

I snorted, because I didn't trust myself to speak.

"I mean that. Oh, for God's sake please don't jumble me up! I want you to understand! Yesterday Abu Nawass followed me, and he saw me talking to her. Well, I know I can depend upon Abu Nawass; so I told him the whole thing——"

I gave an involuntary exclamation.

"I told him the whole thing," he repeated in a tone of absolute anguish "and he was straight! He—he helped me out. This morning he came with me and acted as my interpreter. The girl promised to meet me tonight—just after sunset—now! I was to bring keys to the godown locks and the inner gate—I had them made this morning—Abu Nawass knew a place. See, here they are! But Abu Nawass hasn't come! I—I've been waiting here almost an hour—with—with old Mzee hanging around watching me as if I'm crazy! Well, I am—pretty near it! About a quarter of an hour ago all at once I remembered what the O. O. A. told us about my granduncle—and—and treachery!"

As he paused to draw a strangling breath, jerking the turban fringe from in front of his mouth, an impassioned voice rose sonorously above the silent housetops.

"Ah, ma princesse! Ma princesse! Je t'adore! Ma princesse!"

Prescott jerked his head nervously.

"Oh, shut up!" he muttered with irritation. Then he gave a short, dry laugh. "I understand that poor devil better anyway," he said. "Romance is the search for love, isn't it? While love is—oh, there's nothing at all like it. Love is love! If I miss it—if I miss it now, I don't care what happens! Don't tell me about success—or my future! These people who measure success by the amount of dollars they make are fools! If you haven't got love, you might as well be dead!"

Suddenly Prescott put his hands on my shoulder. His voice was breaking.

"Bwana," he said, "help me! I'm afraid. Suppose Abu Nawass doesn't turn up?"

A flame swept over me. I forgot my own future. I forgot everything I risked. I forgot that ruin faced me if we were caught. Swept by the breath of sheer romance, I flung myself headlong into the adventure.

"Only one thing," I said, preserving my steadiness with an effort; "if she comes with you, what do you intend to do?"

"Do? Why, get some missionary to marry us—then take her away—anywhere——"

"All right," said I, "I'm with you. The O. O. A., as acting consul, can marry you. The Tabora is ready to sail for Durban; you can get away on her. Anyway, once you're married the rest is easy. Mzee!" I yelled.

Mzee came shuffling rapidly. His heavy drooping face was lighted by a strange expression of expectancy; his aged eyes had a look of shrewdness in them. I told him to bring me a kanza, a jacket, and a tarboosh; and as he shuffled away with a jerking sort of run I pushed Prescott into his room for a paper and pencil and wrote a note to the O. O. A. which no man of feeling could ignore. By the time I had

A. B. C. Always Be Careful!

Motorists who follow this A. B. C. e keep out of trouble.

They are seldom mentioned promi- ntly in police and hospital records.

Taking chances, driving without ins when they are needed, trying to t the other fellow to it, speeding und corners—these are perilous times.

The police chief of a middlewestern says that the number of automobile idents will be materially reduced if ry car owner governs his driving by s schedule:

Railway trains move faster than you n.

Other cars can move just as fast.

Horse drawn vehicles and pedestrians ve more slowly.

The wisdom of this advice is demon- ated when you consider the number accidents that result from failure to nember these facts.

Traffic regulations are an annoyance most motorists. They forget that y are really designed for their pro- tion. It is common practice for some vers to violate them whenever pos- le and to boast of how they got away h it.

It is this spirit that has made the tomobile so unpopular with certain ople—with legislators, particularly. e innumerable restrictions that ham- the operation of cars in many sec- ns can be often traced to recklessness the part of careless drivers.

So, for your own sake, and the sake motorists as a group, don't you be a eless driver.

ALWAYS BE CAREFUL!

Are you going to get a new car this spring? Or are you going to make the old one do another season?

Whatever you decide, let the Motoring Service department help you with your motoring problems. We are anxious to give you any kind of advice on the maintenance and operation of your car. Write for:

Technical information.

Advice on the purchase of a new car.

The resale value of your old car.

Please send a self-addressed stamped envelope for your reply.

Send a two-cent stamp for catalogs and instruction books of any standard car.

Twenty-One Helpful Motoring Booklets

Every motorist should keep a complete set of Cosmopolitan's Motoring Library in his car. These booklets will help you in almost any of the many emergencies which the driver has to face.

Write today for a complete set—or check the numbers of these you want in the coupon. Four cents each, postpaid.

No. 1—Better Winter Driving.
No. 2—Selection and Care of Tires and Tubes.
No. 3—The Car's Electrical Equipment.
No. 4—Engine Carbonization.
No. 5—Motoring As A Cure For Nervous Disorders.
No. 6—Your Storage Battery.
No. 7—Brakes and Brake Relining.
No. 8—Chassis Lubrication. Tables giving oil capacities of transmission and rear axle.
No. 9—Advice On The Purchase of A New Or Used Car. Includes new prices on all models.
No. 10—Oil Pumping—How To Cure It.
No. 11—Spark Plugs. With complete table of spark plugs sizes used in 1923 cars.
No. 12—How To Become A Good Driver.
No. 13—What Makes The Engine Overheat.
No. 14—Getting The Most Power From Your Engine.
No. 15—Things The Tourist Should Know.
No. 16—Curing Engine Misfiring.
No. 17—The Vacuum System—How It Works.
No. 18—How To Stop Clutch Slipping.
No. 19—Lighting and Lighting Troubles. New Table.
No. 20—Motor Car Insurance.
No. 21—Better Service For Less Money.

4 cents each postpaid.

Cosmopolitan's Motoring Service

COSMOPOLITAN'S MOTORING SERVICE
19 West 40th Street, New York City

Enclosed is.....in stamps for which send me Booklets Nos.....
.....
.....
My car is.....
Name .....
Address .....

I would like to know the approximate resale value of my car.

Make..... Model.....
Year.....Miles Driven.....

Health and Happiness

Realize the vital importance of minerals in the foods you supply your children if you would have them grow into strong, robust manhood and womanhood. Foods robbed of their life-sustaining elements do not function when taken into the body.

Kellogg's whole-wheat KRUMBLES contain every atom of whole wheat—including the necessary body-building, blood-making food iron, food lime, phosphorus and potassium. Protect your loved ones against sickness by serving Kellogg's KRUMBLES at least once each day—food that you know will fortify them!

KRUMBLES are delicious and have the full, wonderful flavor of whole wheat for the first time in food history! They're all ready to serve and tempting to the most fastidious appetite. All grocers.

Kellogg's

WHOLE WHEAT—ready to eat!

KRUMBLES

The only whole-wheat food with a delicious flavor!

AMERICAN KAMPKOOK
THE IDEAL CAMP STOVE

Motor tourists and campers everywhere use the American Kampkook. It makes its own gas from motor gasoline, burns a hot blue flame free from smoke, soot and odor. Set up and going full blast in one minute. Simple, dependable, wind proof, safe anywhere. Six styles; $7.50 to $15.60. Complete catalog of Kampkooking necessities sent on request.

It's All Inside
When not in use all parts pack inside case protected against loss or breakage. Handy to carry.

American Gas Machine Co., Inc.
835 Clark St., Albert Lea, Minn.

COMMERCIAL ART

Taught By Improved Methods

Many art school advertisements tell about the great and ever increasing demand for commercial artists—big pay—equal opportunity for both men and women, etc. Very good! This is all quite true, but you must first be properly taught. Understand? Properly taught! Few top notch artists are good instructors. Very few. By searching through many studios we have found them.

A Master Course Is Offered

Endorsed as the official training school for leading Commercial Art houses, employing hundreds of artists. Correct educational methods applied. A practical educator and a corps of top notch commercial artists, offer students the benefit of 20 to 30 years of high grade experience. Only the best instruction is good enough for you. Students finishing half of this unusual course can secure and hold desirable positions. Course can be made to pay for itself many times while studying. Either class room or home study instruction. Same course. Same credits. If you like to draw, let's talk it over. Ask for our book telling all about Commercial Art and the opportunities it presents AS WE TEACH IT. Send 6 cents in stamps for postage.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF COMMERCIAL ART
230 EAST OHIO ST.
DEPT. 2 CHICAGO ILL.

finished this, Mzee had returned with bundle. He laid this on the table a dropping on his knees began to unlace m boots. He had brought sandals.

"Good old Mzee," said I, feeling species of gay intoxication at the prospe before us, "you know the game."

I slipped on the kanza with the jack over it, having first discarded my tuni For my head the tarboosh was sufficien since my complexion is swarthy and m eyes brown. With my bare feet thru into sandals, I looked an Arab.

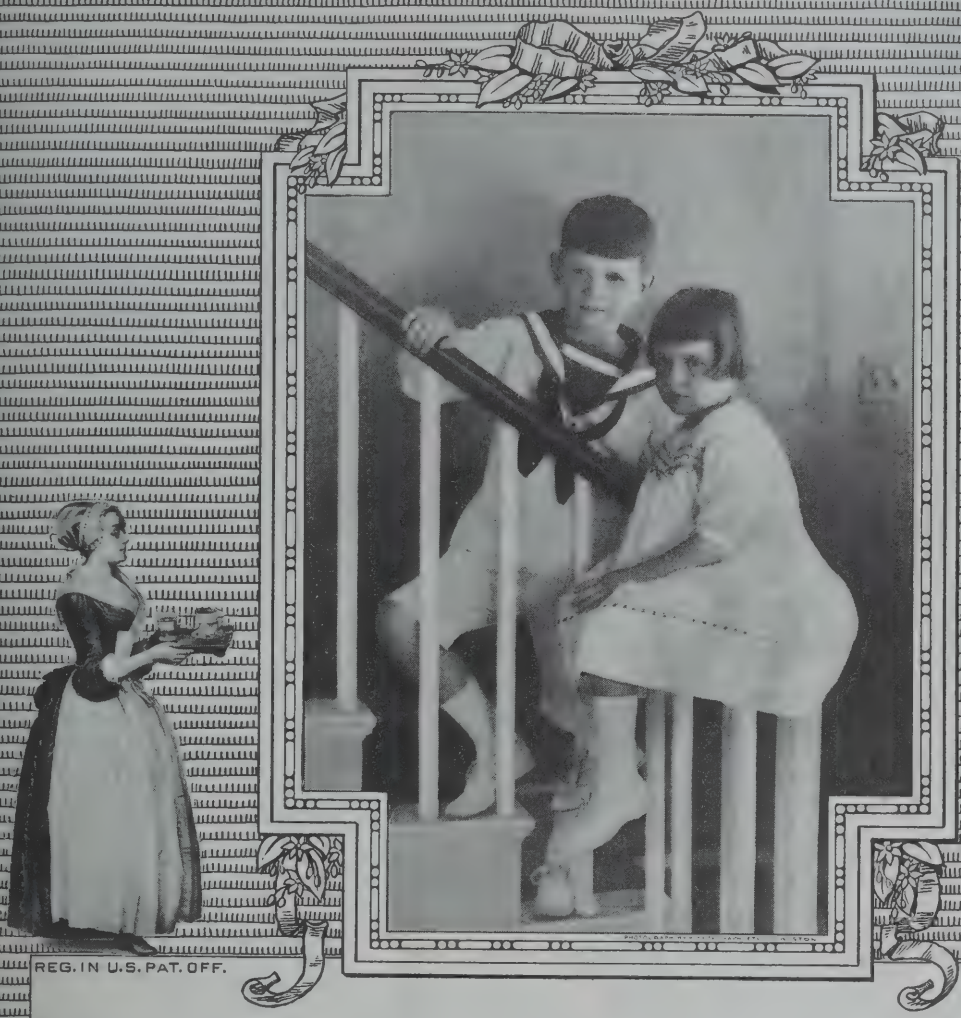
Prescott, robbed of words by his mingle anguish and impatience, stood biting h nails and fumbling with his turban; b Mzee, as I stood up, squatted back on h haunches and chuckled.

"Take this letter," I said, "to t American burra sahib—'Bwana Oh-O Ay.'" In a harsh voice I added: " you do not find him, there will be gre trouble."

"Master," said Mzee, scrambling to h feet and shuffling towards the stairwa "I understand."

As I jerked the sash off the table wrap round my waist, a keen-edge curved jambeer fell out. Somehow called to my mind the fact that Mzee w the oldest retainer of the house. He ha been a servant of Ibrahim Effendi!

"For heaven's sake," burst forth fro Prescott's lips, "please hurry!"



As we slipped down the dark alleyw that led to the door of Ali Beder's out godown by the waterfront, the city w still silent, the mullahs still hopefully loo ing upward as the mist began to dissolv

We entered the outer godown witho difficulty, the alley leading to it bei deserted at night, though forty paces awa it entered a crowded bazaar, while t other end led into the water. Ali Beder fortress-like buildings towered above it o one side, while similar godowns pressed i upon it from the other. As we slid int the velvet blackness of the interior, ha suffocated by the oppressive heavily spice atmosphere, my nerves were acutel sensitive.

Taking one end of my sash, Prescot who had studied the way, led along tortuous passage, while I followed wit hands outstretched, hardly daring t breathe, with the blood thumping in m ears. Very faintly we could hear peopl stirring in the house above and beyond u The sound of waves lapping against th coral foundation of the godown and th harsh rasp of an anchor chain out i the roadstead, came to us through th softness of the night. Our own sandale feet, which we tried to shuffle silently, occa sionally crunched upon the littered clove with a sound that made the hair tingle o my scalp.

Once I felt the strange impression tha someone was near us. Touching Pre cott's wrist, I stopped him while w listened. We could hear the tap-tap-tap of a beetle in the beams overhead, an then, suddenly, the hiss and whisper of rivulet of cloves sliding to the floor and scurrying of rats over the makanda mats.

By this time my gaiety was gone. I wa soaked in perspiration; and I felt weal Young Prescott had his love to stimulat him; his determination was unshakabl On the other hand, there was no reward fo me; and as I recalled old Ali Beder's goa like face and blazing eyes, and thought

REG. IN U.S. PAT. OFF.

We wish we would be invited to have some cocoa with Mother and her friends. She always serves Baker's and we just love it. Don't you?

Get the genuine made only by

WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD.

ESTABLISHED 1780 DORCHESTER, MASS.

BOOKLET OF CHOICE RECIPES SENT FREE

Unexpected Guests!

It sometimes happens, and it's sometimes embarrassing. But you can always be on the safe side with something suitable to serve, if you have Kraft Cheese (in tins) on the pantry shelf.

Kraft Cheese (in tins) is such a convenience; so many ways to serve it, that the prudent housewife will never be found without it.

Neither heat nor cold can harm Kraft Cheese (in tins). Take it anywhere, serve it anywhere. And it's as pure and as fresh when you serve it as on the day it was sealed in the parchment lined tin. The rich mellow flavor is always the same. There are eight kinds.

No rind—it spreads. No waste—100% cheese.
Cheese Recipe Book FREE

J. L. KRAFT & BROS. CO.
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
KRAFT-MacLAREN CHEESE CO., LTD.
MONTREAL, CANADA

the result of failure, I wanted very much to jerk my sash from Prescott's hands and run. As we advanced deeper into the blackness, the uneasiness in my stomach increased, until at last we saw a dim light and came upon the barred door.

It framed a dim scene like a Bakst setting for a gloomy drama. Vague figures moved behind the lattice of the veranda above. A lantern flickered near the well, lighting with yellow touches the metal pitchers and basins that were to be used at the evening meal. There was no sign of Safie. Breathing heavily, Prescott immediately started to fumble awkwardly at the lock with his key.

"Wait a minute," I whispered. "Cool down a bit, and let's get our bearings!"

Prescott looked at me with an insane expression; then, pressing himself hard against the grill, tried to get a better view of the courtyard. Under this pressure the door suddenly flew inward, throwing Prescott off his balance so that he staggered and fell with a clatter among the metal utensils by the well. At that instant there came the muffled boom of the Sultan's gun, announcing to the waiting city that the new moon had been seen, and Ramadan was at an end. Cries and laughter went up within the house; women and servants, laughing and shouting, came running into the courtyard to prepare the feast.

As Prescott fell, instinctively I clutched at his cloak; and he managed to recover himself and throw himself back into the shadows without being discovered. But the door was left open, and we could not reach it without being seen.

"Come on," I said, dragging him deeper into the shadows, "we've got to get out of this."

"No," he said excitedly, "not without her."

"You dashed fool," I exclaimed, "can't you see she's not here?"

"I'm going to see!"

"They'll knife you!"

A servant, coming for the basins, discovered the open door and let out a series of loud yells that brought the household tumbling in confusion about her. Men were called, and I could hear them running overhead. Our only chance was to retreat through the pitch darkness.

"She's probably outside," I said. "Abu Nawass must have taken her away."

In another minute a child saw Prescott's white face staring in the dark, and she stood still looking at him with distended eyes and changeless countenance, and emitted an appalling scream that had no ending. This was too much even for Prescott and we began tumbling back through that tortuous passage in a nightmare flight, followed by a clamoring, cursing, murderous crowd of Arabs and Swahilis, swinging lights above their heads. We skidded on slippery mats, stumbled over misplaced bales, floundered knee-deep in the spice, tangled in bits of rope and our own flowing garments, feeling as though all the devils of Hell were at our heels.

Though I was not familiar with the godown I was the first to reach the door and seize the bolt we had opened less than fifteen minutes before; but I couldn't budge it.

"Here," I said, "try this, Prescott; you opened it! For God's sake hurry!"

Prescott gave three frantic tugs—ran his fingers over it—and said in a strained whisper:

"It's locked!"

There was nothing to do but dive head first among the scattered bales by the door and lie there shaking as the armed servants flung themselves at the barred door. In their excitement the furious Arabs concluded we had bolted the door behind us to arrest pursuit, and they burst it open with a beam without stopping to search the interior. Pressing my lips against Prescott's ear I whispered:

"If Abu Nawass bolted us in, he's only got a lead of ten minutes——"

"Let's go!" said Prescott, scrambling up.

"Wait," I said, jerking him back. "Don't make a fool of yourself again. The alleyway's blocked at both ends. If we go towards the bazaar, they're bound to discover you with your blue eyes; if we reach the water, we've got a chance of swimming for it."

"I'm hanged if I do," he said, jumping up. "I'll fight them, if they want; but I'm going to find Safie!"

He was beyond argument, so I rose with him and darting through the door tried to lose myself in the darkness and tumult outside. A second group of pursuers, issuing from the front of the beyt, had appeared at the mouth of the alley, blocking it; and there, as both groups sighted each other dimly in the dark, they fell into a panting, thudding tumult. The sight of vague, sinister shadows slipping through the darkness, light flashing on drawn blades, sticks rising and falling; and the sound of muffled blows, panting oaths and sudden sharp squeals of pain, checked Prescott. He stood looking about him dazedly until I pushed him violently towards the water.

"If Ali Beder can't rescue her," I said aloud, in order to be heard above the confusion, "you haven't got a chance."

A yell went up from beside me:

"Christians!"

At the same instant I got a blow across the back from a long stick that sent me on my hands and knees among the rocks and slime. As I rose I gave only one look behind. It seemed to me as if the entire frenzied bazaar were surging down upon us with drawn jambeers and waving sticks. In a flickering light near the corner I caught a very fleeting glimpse of Abu Nawass, the traitor, with contorted face, shouting at the top of his voice and gesticulating violently with fists above his head; while the great figure of Ali Beder, followed by his household, rushed at us with drawn knife, his heavy stubborn face looking more goat-like and savage than ever.

In a few seconds I felt a coldness and wetness about my feet and found myself reeling up to my ankles in the litter by the water's edge where a light surf broke against the coral buttresses of the godown. In our sudden flight Prescott and I had saved each other at least three times. He was armed only with a stick which he had torn from the hands of the man who first struck me; while I with my jambeer struck out wildly without hitting anyone, but keeping a space clear about us.

The godowns rose like walls on either hand. With the froth lapping around our knees where the waves broke into pale phosphorescence, I took my jambeer and slit the kanza to the hem. Slipping it off, I put the jambeer between my teeth and dived. When I came up I turned to look for Prescott.

The new use for Lux robs dishwashing of half its drudgery
54 dishwashings in a single package

And now—relief from that three-times-a-day-in-the-dishpan look

This new way to wash dishes is as easy on your hands as fine toilet soap

So natural—so obvious—you wonder it wasn't thought of before!

Lux for washing dishes. Of course it would bring relief from that three-times-a-day-in-the-dishpan look. Of course, too, it would be as gentle on your hands as on the dainty things you have always trusted to its pure suds.

Won't roughen hands

Every day your hands are in the dishpan for an hour and a half—sometimes even longer. How you dread this constant roughening of your hands! But dishwashing needn't make your skin rough and dry. It is the coarse soaps in your dishpan that play such havoc with your hands—robbing your skin of all its indispensable natural oils.

Nature provides the oils in abundance in millions of tiny sacs just beneath the surface of the skin. Their generous supply of healing, nourishing fluid is constantly refreshing the chiffon-thin outer layer of skin. That is why the normal skin is so pleasantly soft and supple.

But the supply is not plentiful enough to hold out when harsh, alkaline soaps are used for washing dishes. They are irritating to the skin; they drain all the oil sacs dry. Your hands become so coarse and scratchy that you can't even touch a piece of silk without roughing it up. With Lux in your dishpan you won't have any of these annoying after-effects. Lux won't dry the natural oils. It won't redden or roughen your hands. These delicate, tissue-thin flakes are as easy on the most sensitive hands as fine toilet soap.

Just one teaspoonful to a pan

That is all you need—just one teaspoonful in your dishpan. It sounds incredible—but try it.

A single package of Lux lasts for at least 54 dishwashings—all the dishes morning, noon and night, for almost three weeks. Not just the china for special occasions, but the regular, everyday dishes as well.

Spotless and shining in half the time

You will be delighted with your bright, sparkling dishes. Lux leaves them without a trace of film or murky cloudiness. Glasses, silverware and china—they're spotless and shining in half the time.

Just toss a teaspoonful of Lux in your dishpan. See how the delicate flakes dissolve the instant the hot water touches them. The Lux way is so much quicker and easier than waiting for bar soap to melt or stopping to beat up a lather with an awkward soapshaker.

Now just a swish of your dishmop and your pretty dishes are cleaner and more lustrous than ever before.

Keep a package of Lux handy on your kitchen shelf. Use it for the dishes always. Don't let that hour and a half in the dishpan every day be a hardship to your hands. Begin washing today's dishes with Lux. Lever Bros. Co., Cambridge, Mass.

As Prescott hesitated at the water's edge, old Ali Beder had flung himself at him with the fury of a madman, actually dragging him down to his knees and flashing his jambeer above his head. The action was so swift and determined I had no chance to reach shore again to help; but I raised myself out of the water and threw my jambeer with all my strength. By the grace of God it struck the first man behind Ali Beder, a giant Swahili, full on the naked chest with the hilt, which saved me from murder; but the black, believing himself to be mortally wounded, fell backward, leaving Prescott and Ali Beder struggling alone.

Prescott had twisted the jambeer from the Arab's hand and with a violent wrench had bent the old man backward and regained his feet. At this moment a beam of light fell upon Prescott's face as he bent over Ali Beder, trying with one hand to choke him. His face was remarkably changed. Streaked with dust and blood, under his touseled sandy hair his eyes blazed; his countenance looked rugged, older, drawn with lines of strength and indomitable passion. Ali Beder let out a babbling scream—the scream of an old and terrified man:

"Ibrahim Effendi! Ibrahim Effendi! Peace! I confess! Allah! Allah is just——"

Tearing himself away from Ali Beder's fingers and flinging him against his retainers, Prescott tore off his cloak and dived after me, streaming phosphorus from every line of his body. Swahilis plunged in too, but, believing either that we were still armed or that friends were waiting for us in a boat, they gave up the chase; and the tumult behind soon became absorbed in the general hubbub of the bazaar. Only one voice reached me coherently—a broken yell, repeated frantically over and over again:

"Peace! Come back! Return with Safie, and I consent! I consent!"

Knowing that Safie was lost to old Ali Beder as well as to us, and in no mood to take chances of treachery by trusting myself in that quarter again, I closed my ears and volunteered no interpretation to Prescott, who swam in silence beside me.

We swam straight out into the roadstead, shedding our clothes until we were stark naked. In this condition we came alongside the navy trawler that had brought me to Dar-Es-Salaam; and we climbed aboard, explaining that we had swum too far and were pretty exhausted. My friends aboard fixed us up with sporting flannels and we were rowed ashore and landed on our own beach.

The sun had set at six o'clock, and it was still only about half-past eight. We found the old beyt deserted; and I had to pour myself a peg of brandy to calm the uncomfortable tingling of my nerves. We both stretched ourselves on Indian chairs and sat there saying nothing, I with my eyes staring out into the dark and Prescott with his face buried in the crook of his arm. After a while he stood up and went into his room.

"Anything I can do?" I asked uneasily.

"No, thanks, bwana," he said in flat tones. "I just want to lie down in the dark. I'm all right. If my old uncle could stand it, I guess I can—only"—he caught the break in his voice with a gulp—"I don't—see how——"

Sunk into a mood of loneliness, I lay stretched in my chair upon the barasa, looking gloomily into the shadows of the balmy night, wondering if my criminal but romantic impulse was going to result in the ruin of my prospects in Zanzibar. With that stigma upon me I had a future to worry about.

The spangled web of a calm tropic night hung its enchantment over the scene. The sea was tremulous with shadows through which the colored lights of ships at anchor faintly glowed. The thin blade of the sinking moon cut through the quivering fronds of the dainty betel palms, and the evening star twinkled like a canary solitaire. I could hear faintly the notes of a Swahili song softened and sweetened by distance until it seemed like the music of a dream. Somewhere in the alley behind two Europeans were talking, the drawl of their voices dropping syllable by syllable upon the still air.

I thought of Prescott's declaration earlier in the evening that romance is the pursuit of love, and my loneliness and depression increased with a sense of futility. I stood up, flipping my cigarette like a shooting star into the dark blue sea, and commenced to pace up and down the barasa.

All at once it occurred to me that Abu Nawass could not possibly have escaped with Safie, for I had seen him unaccompanied in the midst of the tumult angrily waving his arms, and arguing. But I knew also that Safie had left her grandfather's house, because he had cried to us to return with her. And certainly she was not with us!

As I stood still, thinking, old Mzee came shuffling up the dark stairway, breathing quickly, but with his dusty old face curved with smiles. Beside him, like a shadow, moved a slight figure, muffled in a long cloak.

"Bwana," stammered the old man, bowing with dignity and touching his hand to his forehead, his lips and his heart—the gesture which offers complete submission of mind, of utterance and of affection—"where is the young effendi? I have brought the maid to her master's house."

The girl slightly lowered her veil, and I gave a loud shout as I recognized Safie—granddaughter of Ali Beder. She looked slightly frightened, but adorable; and in the surroundings of a European's quarters strikingly resembled a French girl, or an exceptionally beautiful New York Jewess. My spirits leaped with a bound. I advanced towards them, clapping my hands for the servants and shouting for Prescott. Safie, misunderstanding, backed hurriedly away, with hands outstretched, exclaiming confusedly:

"No, no, no! It is not he!"

Then a marvelous change came over her countenance. Her lips parted, her eyes brimmed with feeling; her rigid attitude melted into one of surrender; and Prescott walked by me, muttering:

"It's impossible! My God, it's impossible!"

When he touched her outstretched hands and saw her face turned up to his with the light full on it, he put his arms slowly around her with firmness and tenderness and a lack of self-consciousness that proved, though their lips were inarticulate, their hearts spoke a familiar language.

Old Mzee and I looked at each other for a minute, grimacing; then I drew him to one side and he explained, spluttering a laughing, that as he carried messages to godown where Prescott had been examin the cloves, he had caught on to the intrig Knowing Arabs, he had suspected A Nawass the moment he heard Prescott a ing my assistance. He had immediat preceded us to Ali Beder's godown—giv my chit to the O. O. A. to another deliver—and had stationed himself at corner of the alleyway and the main baza

Abu Nawass must have entered bef we arrived. Mzee saw us enter. F minutes later Abu Nawass emerged fr the godown, leading Safie, complet enveloped in a cloak. Instantly Mzee h let out a watchman's cry of alarm. A Nawass, seeing he was trapped, promp joined in the shout, pushing Safie aw from him, and crying, "Christians! Ch tians have done this!" By this time crowd had gathered, all shouting conf edly, and in the midst of this confusion t Sultan's gun had gone off. In the upro Mzee took Safie by the wrist and led h away, while Abu Nawass, not daring interfere, watched him, cursing and cho ing, and waving his fists impotently in t air.

"Bwana," said Mzee impressively, "t generations have passed, and look! t story is repeated. I was Ibrahim Effend servant in this house. On those very sta there I stood near him and fought with t Christians." He pulled his kanza asi and showed me a white streak across collar bone. "See. Ali Beder's knife stru me there." Mzee commenced to laug softly, almost absent-mindedly. "Allah he whispered. "I hit him a harder bl tonight. Bwana, you will be my witne I have again served my old master, Ibrah Effendi——"

"Mzee," said I, "you are a messenger fate."

"I am house-boy," said Mzee punc iously, "in the Afro-American Tradi Company."

Fifteen minutes later the O. O. A. put an appearance.

I swore that Ali Beder had given consent to the marriage; and the O. O. after being presented to the bride, felt further scruples. A civil ceremony w forthwith performed, and the servants the house began to drift in, rumors of wh was happening having percolated into t bazaar. A messenger arrived from Beder, who, to save his face, gave his co sent to the marriage of his granddaugh to the grandnephew of his old friend a benefactor, Ibrahim Effendi, requesti only that he be given an opportunity feast his friends and celebrate the occasi with due honor. Prescott, now aware the solemnity of the affair, wisely co sented; and we immediately complet arrangements for a religious ceremony the following morning, to be followed by banquet among the Arabs; with a banqu to the Europeans on the succeeding da and a general reception—after which Pr cott and his bride would sail on t Tabora for Durban and home.

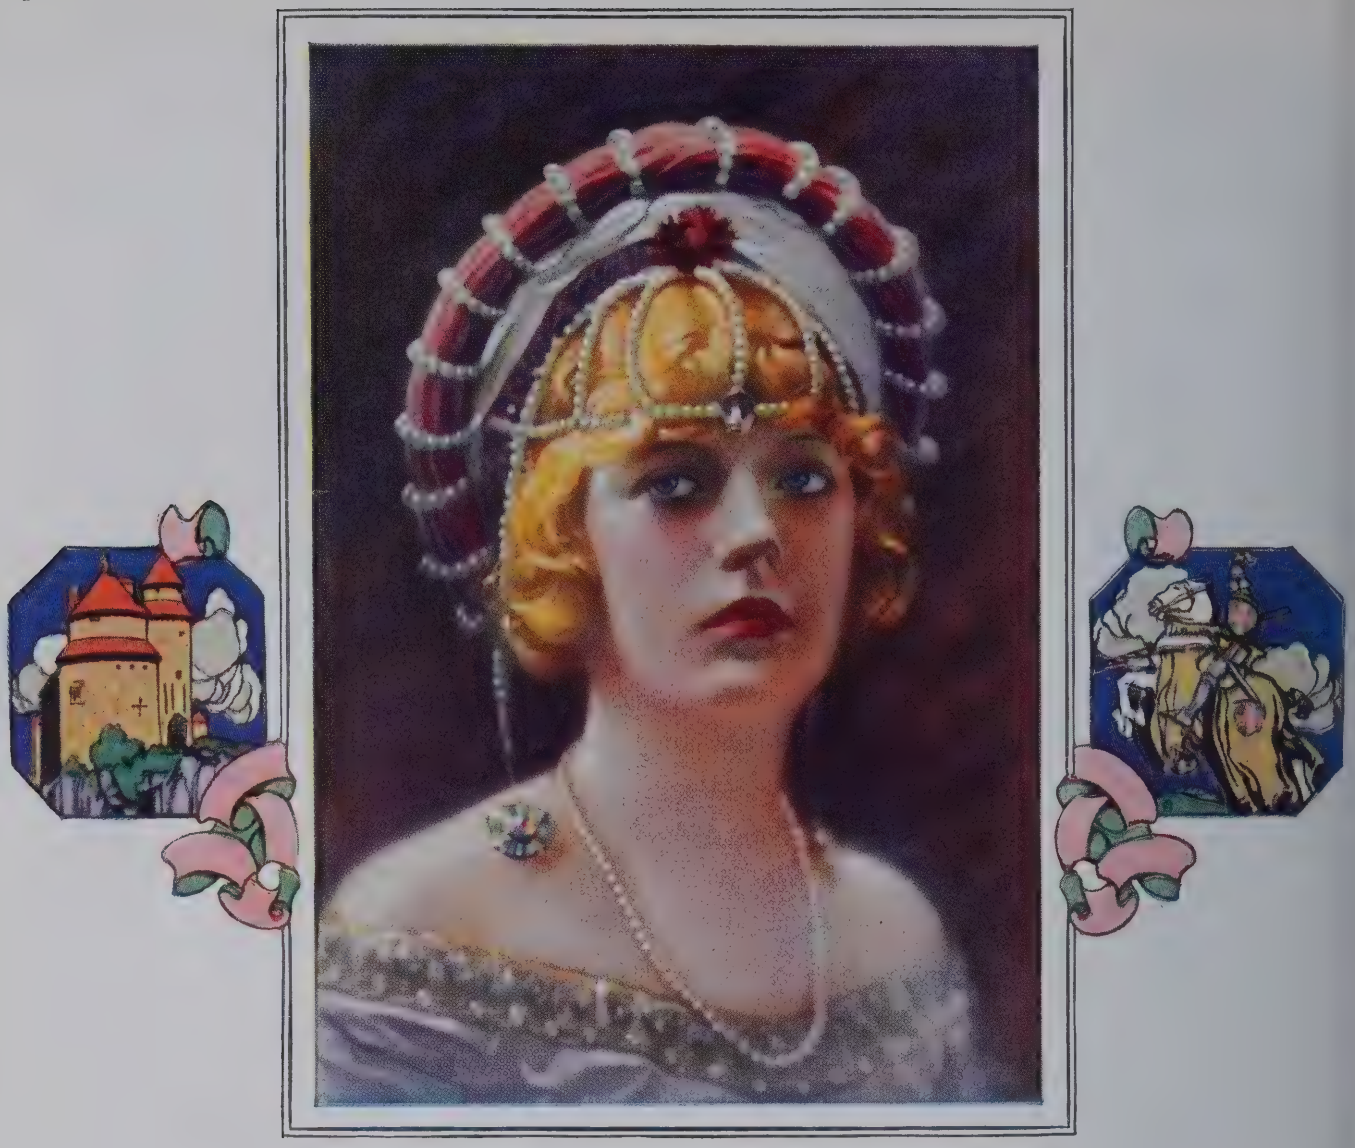
When this was done, Prescott and Saf escorted by a guard of honor and a doz askaris to preserve order, were taken rickshas to one of the missions, where Sa was received as a distinguished guest.

The O. O. A. and I found ourselves aga alone upon the barasa, looking at ea other, half serious, half laughing wi

YOUR FRIEND AND OURS —THE GROCER

Your grocer knows us. He has known us very well for a very long time—ever since he has been in the grocery business.

And we know your grocer. Our force of salesmen is sufficiently large to enable us to visit him very frequently—every few weeks.



In fact, the grocer who distributes the 57 Varieties in your neighborhood is our local representative there. He knows your wants and tastes—and helps us serve you.

By dealing directly with your grocer, and by having such frequent contact with him, we are able to keep him supplied with a good assortment of the 57 in limited quantities. In this way we help him make sure that every one of the 57 Varieties on his shelves is of the very freshest quality when he offers it to you.

Your grocer's cooperation in always keeping the 57 Varieties available in your neighborhood makes him an important factor in our business—and an important member of your community.

H. J. HEINZ COMPANY

57 Varieties

MARION DAVIES

MISS DAVIES, Star of "When Knighthood Was In Flower" in commending the virtues of Mineralava Beauty Clay to her friends and the world at large, is careful to emphasize the fact that she has tried various kinds of complexion clay, but she says: "I have tried many clays for the complexion, but Mineralava surpasses others so far that I use it and it only." Mineralava, sold under a positive money-back guarantee, is to be had at all Drug and Department stores at $2.00 a bottle. There is also a Trial Tube at 50c, enough to convince you how good it is.

SCOTT'S PREPARATIONS, INC., 251 West 19th Street, New York City

Mineralava

BEAUTY CLAY

PARIS VIVAUDOU NEW YORK
Distributor

ardonic humor. It was still short of mid-ight, and we both felt as though we had een kicked out of a show.

"It beats me," said the O. O. A., looking nto his glass and shaking his head solemnly.

At this moment Briggs appeared at the ead of the stairs and, thinking himself nperceived, began to sidle softly towards is bedroom with a shamefaced and furtive ir. We had utterly forgotten him!

"Wait a minute!" shouted the O. O. A. Briggs gave a start. Then he stopped ncertainly.

"Cheerio," he said lugubriously. "I didn't see you chaps."

"What do you think of the news?" demanded the O. O. A.

"Oh, shut up!" said Briggs wearily. "Rose-Marie isn't the only fish!"

"Rose-Marie!" I exclaimed. "What about her?"

"Aren't you talking about her?" asked Briggs diffidently.

Then in a sudden spasm of rage he caught hold of a cane chair and slung it with a crash against the wall. "Why, the little vixen," he cried, "has gone and eloped with that chee-chi from the Mauritius! And she never—said a word—to me—about it!"

When the O. O. A. and I disentangled ourselves from the strangling embrace into which we helplessly fell, I said, stifling a spasm:

"'Romance, bwana, is the pursuit of love!'"

"'And adventures,'" replied the O. O. A., swelling visibly before my eyes, "'are to the adventurous!'"

In June COSMOPOLITAN H. C. Witwer launches another ship on the Sea of Laughter, and cordially invites you to be one of the passengers.

The Hunch-Player

(Continued from page 43)

efore by Olson. Crisp took them into he office of the managing editor, which pened off the city room and which appened at this time to be untenanted, nd bade them be seated. So they took he chairs he indicated, Lieber, the younger nan, looking rather awkward in his civilian arb and his broad-toed shoes whereas in is uniform he probably would cut a oldierly figure, and twirling his hard hat n his hands by its brim; Sweeney, middle-ged and sparsely built, with a bristly eavy gray mustache that somehow did ot seem quite to match in with his lean ace and deep set eyes and high cheek ones.

Then Crisp sat himself down at the managing editor's desk where the light rom the two broad windows behind him assed over his shoulder and fell upon his isitors as they fronted him. He spread couple of galley proofs on the desk op, fumbling them in his hands as he poke:

"I suppose Mr. Olson told you why I ut you to the bother of coming down ere again—that I was after your O. K.'s or these sketches of your lives—hasn't he? Well, before we go at that I'd like to talk vith you a little bit about this case. want to see whether your ideas jibe in vith mine. This affair interests me—remendously. There are some mighty urious aspects to it—not that I need to ell you that."

He went on in a somewhat reminiscent ashion:

"I'm reminded of a thing that I heard he late Lawrence Sebastian say, five or ix years ago, soon after I came to this own and broke into the newspaper game, doing police. I think Sebastian vas about the smartest district attorney his county ever had. Well, I remember hat once we were talking in the reporters' oom up at the old Criminal Courts Building about crimes in general and he said this: He said that in a town like New York we never knew whose eyes were on us; that sometimes, so it seemed o him, a big city was all eyes and all ears."

As I recall, these were about the words he used:

"'A man who's fixing to commit a crime picks out the darkest night in the month, and the quietest place he can think of. He does the job quietly and there's no alarm given. Then he runs away. He's sure nobody saw him; the whole town seemed to be sound asleep—not a living creature in sight. But it turns out that a man with the toothache is nursing his face in an open window on the top floor of a house halfway down the block. And just around the corner a woman has got up out of bed on account of a sick baby and she happens to look out of her window at exactly the right time. And somebody else a little farther along sees something, too, and, the first thing you know you'll find, if you succeed in rounding up all these unseen and unsuspecting witnesses, that you've got a pretty clear record of your man's movements.'

"That's practically what he said and I've never forgotten it.

"Now, in this case it strikes me as a curious thing that nobody caught a glimpse of the murderer getting away from the neighborhood right immediately after the killing must have taken place. And yet, if Mr. Sebastian's theory was correct, somebody should have been running through that street and somebody else should have seen him.

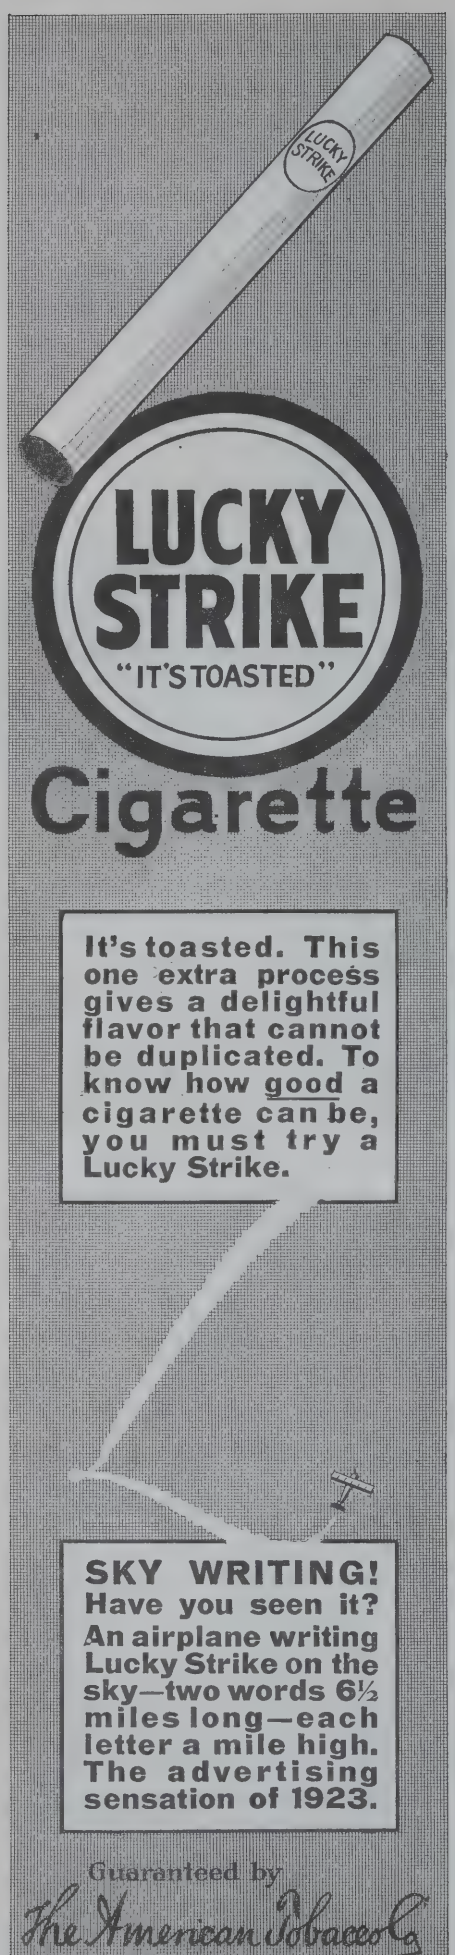
"Well, of course, there was this here trained nurse that was on night duty in that there private residence two doors down from the Lathrop Arms," put in Lieber. "You remember we found her next day. But the only party she seen was Sweeney beatin' it round into the Avenoo to find me—her recognizin' him by his uniform as he passed by the street light under where she was lookin' out."

"Precisely," agreed Crisp; "in a way of speaking, that's in line with the point I was making. Of course, under the circumstances, Sweeney, here, would run—naturally.

"Here's another thing I want to put up to you two while we're alone: Both of you are more or less qualified to be experts in such matters as this one; qualified by your training and your experience and all. I'm only an amateur, as you might say, but, being first of all a newspaperman, I try to figure out how drama—say, a secret motive—might have been at the back of the thing. Maybe I've been a bit far-fetched in conceiving the notion, but I'm going to state now what you might call a hypothetical case. You might call it that."

He bent forward, staring hard into their faces. His voice raised and quickened and he aimed a finger at them to emphasize his sharp staccato sentences:

"As a young man, this Trask lives in a small city up in New England. He does a rotten thing to a family in a poorer walk of life than his. We needn't go into the details. But a woman—or rather a girl—figures in it. And it's an unforgetable and an unforgivable thing. And the girl has an older brother, and this brother is not the kind who either forgets or forgives. He dedicates his whole life to squaring the debt—to evening up the score for his sister.



"Well, soon after the scandal breaks, Trask goes away from that town. Shame or fright—I won't presume to say which—causes him to leave. He has money that he inherited and he comes to this town and cuts a dash here. Probably as the years go by he thinks that early chapter in his life is closed and sealed. The girl has died in the meantime; he gets word that the brother also is dead and he has no reason to doubt it.

"But the brother isn't dead. Causing everybody who ever knew him before to think he's dead is only a part of his plan. And it's a good plan. He disappears from his home; he vanishes entirely. After a while news comes back to the town where he used to live that he's been killed on a construction job up in British Columbia. He has no close relatives—only a few cousins—and nobody is particularly interested in verifying the fact of his death.

"To all intents and purposes he has ceased to exist.

"But, as I said just now, he isn't dead at all. He's very much alive. He has changed his name. He has changed his personal appearance—made a pretty good job of it, too. He has provided himself with a new identity, a new personality—in so far as such a thing is possible. He is posing now as a native of a foreign country, as a member of a different racial stock from the one to which he really belongs. He even goes so far as to fit out himself with a fictitious family history, as a sort of background for his supposed birth and childhood. He hasn't overlooked a single imaginable detail.

"He never marries. He devotes his life, his thoughts, his ambitions, to the scheme that's in his head. All along he's planning to kill Trask and yet be absolutely safe from suspicion. It may take him years to bring this about but he's patient—never for a waking minute does he lose sight of his object. All his ways are shaped to that end. His only fear is that Trask may die a natural death and cheat him out of his revenge. He establishes a reputation for steadiness and sobriety and respectability. He gets himself placed in a line of employment where, without causing remark, sooner or later he will have his opportunity to study his man at close range, possibly to come into direct contact with him. Some people might call such a man crazy. I'd call him a man of a single purpose—of one abiding idea. Anyhow, chance never figures in his plot; there's a purpose and an intent behind every step he takes.

"In his work he is stationed here first, then there; his employers trust him and value his services. Finally, on perfectly plausible grounds, he succeeds in being transferred in his official duties to the very neighborhood where Trask lives. By reason of his position, he now can come and go at all hours. He bides his time, though; he's waiting for the perfect occasion when all the circumstances will fit in with his scheme, when there won't be a single possible danger of a miscue.

"That time comes—on a certain night. The victim comes along, absolutely unconscious of any personal peril. At the most favorable spot for just such a job the other man is lying in wait. There's a quick word whispered in the dark, a blow from behind and——"

The man Sweeney stood up, his features composed, his voice steady.

"That's enough!" he commanded. "I'll say this for you, young fellow—there's only one or two places where your dope is wrong. I don't regret what I did. I'm not sorry—by God, I'm glad! Some way, I don't even much regret being nailed."

He went on, including the dumbfounded Lieber in what he said now:

"Old pal, you might as well have the credit for making the pinch. You ought to know me well enough by now to know that when I pass my word to go along with you nice and quiet I'll keep my word. Still, if you've got any doubts——"

He held out his hands, palm to palm.

As Crisp that night said to his exultant and congratulatory chief, Wendover: "Both the times when I tolled him down here to the shop I purposely had Lieber brought along, too. In the first place, I wanted to quiet any lurking suspicions our man might have—so that's why I included his friend in the visits. And in the second place, I figured it would be just as well to have a regular cop standing by in case he cut up rough when I began to tip it off to him that I had the goods on him."

"Yes, yes; but what I want to know is—how did you get the goods on him?" demanded his chief.

"Oh, I guess you might call it a case of putting two and two together and getting four!" said Crisp with an air of modesty which did not in the least become him. Really, he was tremendously pleased with himself. "You see, almost from the jump I had the private patrolman chap picked as the right party."

"But why?"

"I'll come to that in a minute. So, having him especially in mind, I assigned Olson to get the histories of the two cops—not that I ever expected to run it. It wa all a part of my plant. Anyhow, I neede time to develop the scheme.

"Well, when Olson came back with hi stuff and reported that six weeks befor the killing this Sweeney—which was th name that everybody knew him by then— had asked to be shifted from a bea he had downtown in the Maiden Lan jewelry district to a certain beat over o the east side of Fifth Avenue, uptown— the same beat, incidentally, that include the Lathrop Arms—I began to feel sur that I wasn't very far wrong. To be sure his reason for asking for the transfe seemed perfectly reasonable. He told hi boss at the offices of the Hoster compan that he'd moved to an address over o Third Avenue near Thirtieth Street an wanted a territory that would be hand and convenient to where he lived. Th boss—who gave Olson this detail—didn' attach any significance to it. He didn' think it had any bearing on anythin else. And Olson didn't think it was im portant. Say, that boy has still got a lo to learn about the newspaper game! Bu I did. It meant something to me.

"So, on the pretext of wanting speciall good likenesses of the two of them, invited Lieber and Sweeney to come dow here and be photographed; that was week ago yesterday. And the moment got a good look at Sweeney I knew m own private theory was being confirme in a fresh place.

"According to his personal record, a furnished by him to the Hoster peopl when he first went to work for them he'd been born in the County Wicklow in the Old Country, and brought here b his parents as a child. But I said t myself when I set eyes on him, 'If you'r an Irishman then I'm a Swede!'

"Here's the picture we took of him tha day. Look at it, Mr. Wendover. If he' not the spittin' image of a born-and-bre New Englander—if he's not a true-to-typ small-town Yankee—I'll eat my hat an I'm not very hungry, at that! Wel that didn't absolutely prove anything A man from the South of Ireland migh look like the regulation Yankee just as th Yankee might look like a Dane or a Fin or an Italian, even. But this chap didn' talk like an Irishman."

"But a foreigner brought here as a chil might lose his native idioms—might eve lose his accent or his dialect or his brogu or whatever it was that marked his speech originally—mightn't he?" asked Wendover

"Of course he might—and possibl would," answered Crisp. "The brogu might quit him, in time. But, if h happens to be an Irishman born—a Cel on both sides of his family—there's on thing I'll guarantee he'll never lose. H can't lose it, because it's a labial inheri tance, because it's come down to hin through the generations from the tim when his ancestors knew no English an spoke another tongue altogether. My ol grandmother lived to be eighty-odd an she'd spent more than sixty of those year in the State of Ohio, but up to the day o her death she said 'I will that' when sh affirmed a thing and 'I will not' when sh took the negative side; or else she said ' would not' or 'I would so.' But when talked to Sweeney, feeling him out, h answered 'Yes,' 'No,' as the case might be to my questions. And in the Gaelic, s I'm told, there are no such two words as these. Do you get my point, Mr. Wendover?"

"I'm beginning to see the daylight," said Wendover. "I've got to compliment you again, Crisp. But I'm still puzzled to account for one thing: Back of and behind what you've told me, there must have been a starting point—a primary clue, so to speak, for you to work on. Observation and your powers of deduction served you mighty well, as I now see, once you'd struck the trail. But there had to be a beginning. Out of a clear sky you wouldn't center your suspicions on any one man. At least, I wouldn't."

"Nor would I," assented Crisp. "Just as you say, there had to be a beginning. And this it is." He took a small clipping out of a breast pocket cardcase. "I cut this out of the Morning Transcript's second day stuff on the Trask murder. It's a short dispatch from the town of Medham, Mass., upstate from Boston—the town where Trask was born and grew up.

"It was stuck down at the foot of a column on an inside page at the tail end of the Transcript's local story. As soon as I saw it I sent Sheridan up there—with private instructions not to write up anything but to bring me back what he found out, along certain lines."

Wendover took the slip in his hands, adjusted his nose glasses and read it through.

Then, still with a puzzled pucker between his eyes, he asked:

"I don't see the connection yet. This dispatch merely hints rather vaguely at the old trouble of Trask's youth—mentions a family named Spence—says that a certain Joshua T. Spence, who was a son of that family and a brother of the girl who was mixed up in the mess, went away from this place, Medham, soon after Trask came down here to New York, and afterwards was reported as having been killed in an accident on a Canadian railroad. We know now, and the police know now—thanks to you—that Spence wasn't dead—that he was the man who called himself Sweeney. But what made you suspect it?—that's what I want to know."

"Chief," said Crisp, "it mighty often happens when, for reasons that won't bear investigation, a man changes his name, that he doesn't change his initials. I don't know why, unless it's because keeping the same set of initials makes it easier for him to remember what the new name is while he's getting accustomed to wearing it. It's an old trick with professional criminals. In this case, it would seem that it occurred to an honest man who was aiming to turn criminal. Well, anyhow, it all made good stuff for our extra, didn't it?"

"It surely did," said Wendover.

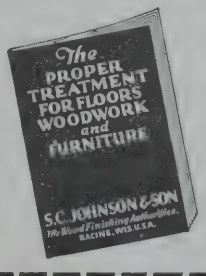
"Mind handing me back my clipping?" asked Crisp. "I think I'll keep on carrying it around in my pocket—for luck."

Irvin Cobbs's story next month deals with a crook who, together with the reader, gets the surprise of his life. See COSMOPOLITAN for June, on sale May tenth

Brighten Up Your Home

JOHNSON'S
Paste - Liquid - Powdered
POLISHING WAX

EVERY room needs the brightening touch of Johnson's Polishing Wax. It will rejuvenate your furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum, and give your home that fine air of immaculate cleanliness.



Your Linoleum will last longer and look better if you polish it occasionally with Johnson's Prepared Wax. Johnson's Wax prevents cracking and blistering—brings out the pattern and color—protects linoleum from wear and makes cleaning easy.

For Furniture and Woodwork
You can easily keep your furniture and woodwork in perfect condition by polishing them occasionally with Johnson's Paste or Liquid Wax. It cleans the surface and forms a thin protecting finish coat.

Are You Building??

If you are building you should have our Book on Wood Finishing. It tells how inexpensive soft woods may be treated so they are as beautiful and artistic as hardwood. We will gladly send it free and postpaid for the name of your dealer. Use coupon below.

Book on Home Beautifying FREE
S. C. JOHNSON & SON, Dept. K. S. 5, RACINE, WIS.
(Canadian Factory—Brantford)
"The Wood Finishing Authorities"

Please send me free and postpaid your book on Home Beautifying, which tells how to make my home more artistic, cheery and inviting. I understand that it gives covering capacities, includes color charts and explains just what materials to use and how to apply them.

My Dealer is.....

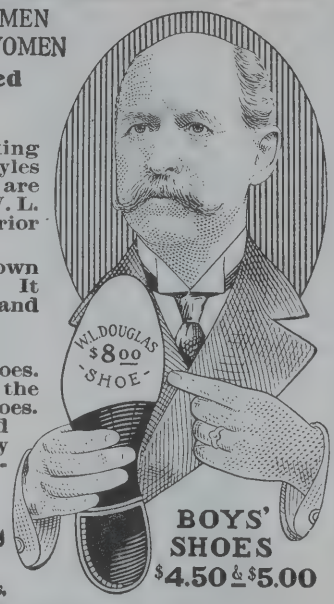
My Name.....

My Address.....

City and State.....

W. L. DOUGLAS

$5 $6 $7 $8 & $9 SHOES FOR MEN AND WOMEN



W. L. Douglas shoes are actually demanded year after year by more people than any other shoe in the world

BECAUSE W. L. Douglas for 46 years has been making surpassingly good shoes and the smart styles are the leaders everywhere. When you need shoes and are looking for the best value for your money examine W. L. Douglas shoes and you will appreciate their superior qualities. Wear them and save money.

W. L. DOUGLAS name and portrait is the best known shoe Trade Mark in the world. It stands for the highest standard of quality, style and workmanship at the lowest possible cost.

No Matter Where You Live

shoe dealers can supply you with W. L. Douglas shoes. If not convenient to call at one of our 116 stores in the large cities, ask your shoe dealer for W.L.Douglas shoes. Protection against unreasonable profits is guaranteed by the name and price stamped on the sole of every pair before the shoes leave the factory. Refuse substitutes. The prices are the same everywhere.

BOYS' SHOES $4.50 & $5.00

If not for sale in your vicinity, write for catalog.

TO MERCHANTS: If no dealer in your town handles W. L. Douglas shoes, write today for exclusive rights to handle this quick selling, quick turn-over line.

W. L. Douglas
President
W. L. Douglas Shoe Co.
146 Spark St., Brockton, Mass.

CLASS RINGS
FRATERNITY JEWELRY
CLUB PINS
WRITE FOR CATALOGS
THE D. L. AULD CO. COLUMBUS, O.
LOCAL JEWELERS WANTED AS REPRESENTATIVES

OPPORTUNITY FOR YOUNG WOMEN, 18 to 30, to become independent for life in agreeable indoor work. Assured pay $200 month. Excellent board, laundry furnished free while learning. Ideal surroundings, congenial companions. In replying state age, religion, education, full details. Miss Lafson, Room 816, 30 No. Michigan Ave., Chicago.

BAYER

Genuine

ASPIRIN

SAY "BAYER" when you buy. Insist!

Unless you see the "Bayer Cross" on tablets, you are not getting the genuine Bayer product prescribed by physicians over 23 years and proved safe by millions for

Colds	Headache
Toothache	Rheumatism
Neuritis	Lumbago
Neuralgia	Pain, Pain

Accept only "Bayer" package which contains proper directions.

Handy "Bayer" boxes of 12 tablets—Also bottles of 24 and 100—Druggists.

Aspirin is the trade mark of Bayer Manufacture of Monoaceticacidester of Salicylicacid

The Hope of Happiness

(Continued from page 94)

the divan on which she was seated behind the tea table—thrust it out lazily with a minimum of effort.

"Ah—the difficult Mr. Storrs! I'm terribly mortified to be meeting you in a friend's house and not in my own!"

"To meet you anywhere——" began Bruce, but she interrupted him, holding him with her eyes.

"——would be a pleasure! Of course! I know the formula but I'm not a débutante. You didn't like me that day we met at Dale Freeman's, and I was foolish enough to think I'd made an impression!"

"Let's tell him the truth," said Henderson, helping himself to a slice of cinnamon toast. "Bruce, I bet a hundred cigarettes with Connie I could deliver you here and I win!"

"Not a word of truth in that," declared Constance. "Bud's such a dreadful liar!"

Mrs. Torrence said they must have tea and Henderson protested that tea was not to be thought of. Tea, he declared, was extremely distasteful to him; and Bruce always became ill at the sight of it.

"But when I told Connie you were bringing Mr. Storrs she said he was terribly proper and for me not to dare mention cocktails."

"Now Helen, I didn't say just that! What I meant, of course, was that I hoped Mr. Storrs wasn't too proper," said Constance, gazing at the ceiling dreamily.

"Proper!" Bruce caught her up. "This is an enemy's work. Bud, I suspect you of this attempt on my character!"

"Not guilty!" Bud retorted. "The main thing right now is that we're all peevish and need Martinis. What's the Volstead signal, Helen?"

"Three rings, Bud, with a pause between the first and second."

The tea tray was removed and reappeared adorned with all the essentials for the concoction of cocktails. When the glasses were filled and all had expressed their satisfaction at the result, Henderson detained the negro for a conference on dice throwing. He seated himself on the floor the better to receive the man's instructions. The others taunted him with his ineptitude. The negro retired finally with five dollars of Bud's money, a result attained only after the spectators were limp with laughter.

"You're a scream, Bud! A perfect scream!" and Mrs. Torrence refilled the glasses.

She took Bud to the dining room to exhibit a rare Japanese screen acquired in her travels and Bruce found himself alone with Constance. She pointed to her glass, still brimming, and remarked:

"Please admire my abstemiousness! One is my limit."

"Let me see; did I really have three?" asked Bruce as he sat down beside her.

"I want to forget everything this afternoon," she began. "I feel that I'd like to climb the hills of the unattainable, be somewhere else for a while."

"Oh, we all have those spells," he replied. "That's why Prohibition's a failure."

"But life is a bore at times," she insisted. "Maybe you're one of the lucky ones who never go clear down. A man has his work—there's always that——"

"Hasn't woman gotten herself everything—politics, business, philanthropy? You don't mean to tell me the new woman is already pining for her old slavery! I supposed you led a complete and satisfactory existence!"

"A pretty delusion! I just pretend, that's all. There are days when nothing seems of the slightest use. I thought there might be something in politics but after I'd gone to a few meetings and served on a committee or two it didn't amuse me any more. I played at being a radical for a while, but after you've scared all your friends a few times with your violence it ceases to be funny. The only real joy I got out of flirting with socialism was in annoying my father-in-law. But I had to give that up for fear he'd think I was infecting Shep with my ideas."

V

A TINGE of malice was perceptible in her last words, but she smiled instantly to relieve the embarrassment she detected in his face. He was not sure just how she wanted him to take her. Her unhappiness he assumed to be only a pose—something to experiment with upon men she met on gray afternoons in comfortable houses over tea and cocktails.

Mrs. Shepherd Mills might be dangerous, or she might easily become a bore. When he met her at the Freemans' he had thought her probably guileless under her mask of sophistication. She was proving more interesting than he had imagined, less obvious; perhaps with an element of daring in her blood. He suspected that she had told the truth in saying that she wasn't finding life wholly satisfying; but all things considered there was no reason why she should confide in him. She was quite as handsome as he had thought her at the Freemans' and she had indubitably mastered the art of dressing herself becomingly.

He was watching the play of the shadow of her picture hat on her face, seeking clues to her mood, vexed that he had permitted himself to be brought into her company, when she said:

"I'm not amusing you! Please forgive me. I can't help it if I'm a trifle triste. Some little devilish imp is dancing through my silly head. If I took a second glass, now——"

Bruce answered her look of inquiry with a shake of the head.

"Are you asking my advice? I positively refuse to give it; but if you command me, of course——"

He rose, took up the glass and held it high for her inspection.

"The man tempts me——"

"The man doesn't tempt you. We'll say it's the little imp. Mrs. Mills, do you want this cocktail or do you not?"

"It might cheer me up a little," she said meditatively. "I don't want you to think me stupid and I know I'm terribly dull!"

She drank half the cocktail and bade him finish it.

"Oh, certainly!" he replied and drained the glass. "Now under the additional stimulus we can proceed with the discussion. What were we talking about, anyhow?"

Who was to blame?

SHE fascinated each one only for a little while. Nothing ever came of it.

Yet she was attractive—unusually so. She had beguiling ways. Beautiful hair, radiant skin, exquisite teeth and an intriguing smile. Still there was something about her that made men show only a transient interest.

She was often a bridesmaid but never a bride.

And the pathetic tragedy of it all was that she herself was utterly ignorant as to why. Those of her friends who did know the reason didn't have the heart to tell her.

Who was really to blame?

* * *

People don't like to talk about halitosis (unpleasant breath). It isn't a pretty subject. Yet why in the world should this topic be taboo even among intimate friends when it may mean so much to the individual to know the facts and then correct the trouble?

Most forms of halitosis are only temporary. Unless halitosis is due to some deep-seated cause (which a physician should treat), the liquid antiseptic, Listerine, used regularly as a mouthwash and gargle, will quickly correct it. The well-known antiseptic properties of this effective deodorant arrest fermentation in the mouth and leave the breath clean, fresh and sweet. It is an ideal combatant of halitosis.

So why have the uncomfortable feeling of being uncertain about whether your breath is just right when the precaution is so simple and near at hand—Lambert Pharmacal Company, St. Louis, U. S. A.

For HALITOSIS

use LISTERINE

$1932

BUYS THIS Dutch Twelve Rooms

You can buy all the materials for a complete home direct from the manufacturer and save four profits on the lumber, millwork, hardware and labor.

ALADDIN Houses Not Portable

All lumber cut to fit by Aladdin System (not portable). Proved savings of over 18% waste in lumber and up to 30% saving on labor. Aladdin Homes built everywhere. Satisfaction or money back.

5-Room Houses—$538

Prices quoted include all lumber cut to fit, windows, doors, woodwork, glass, paints, hardware, nails, lath and roofing. Complete drawings and instructions. Many styles to choose from. Highest grade lumber for all interior woodwork, siding and outside finish. Send today for money-saving Aladdin Catalog No. 2341

The ALADDIN Co., BAY CITY, MICHIGAN

Also Mills and Offices at Wilmington, North Carolina; Portland, Oregon; and Toronto, Ontario

Elinor Glyn says

'Thousands who don't dream they can write really can. YOU have ideas for stories and photoplays—why don't you turn them into cash? There are just as many stories of human interest right in your own vicinity as there are in Greenwich Village or the South Sea Islands. And editors will welcome a story or photoplay from you just as quickly as from any well-known writer if your story is good enough. They will pay you well for your ideas, too—a good deal bigger money than is paid in salaries. You can accept my advice because millions of copies of my stories have been sold. My book 'Three Weeks,' has been printed in every tongue, except Spanish. My photoplays are known to millions. I do not say this to boast, but merely to prove that you can be successful without being a 'genius.' I believe thousands of people can make money in this absorbing profession. I believe this so firmly that I am going to show YOU how easy it is when you know how. Simply write to my publishers, The Authors' Press. They will send you a handsome little book called 'The Short-Cut to Successful Writing.' This book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge—no obligation. Write for it NOW." Just address Elinor Glyn's publishers:

THE AUTHORS' PRESS, Dept. 127, Auburn, N.Y.

Teach Your Child at Home by Our Novel Plan

and give him practically the same educational advantages he would have were he in attendance at the best private day school. Write, Calvert School, 4 Chase St., Baltimore, Md.

Beautifully Curly, Wavy Hair Like "Nature's Own"

Try the new way—the Silmerine way—and you'll never again use the ruinous heated iron. The curliness will appear altogether natural.

Liquid Silmerine

is easily applied with brush. Is neither sticky nor greasy. Perfectly harmless. Serves also as a splendid dressing for the hair. Directions with bottle. At drug and department stores $1.

Parker-Belmont Powder Compact . .$1.00
Parker-Belmont Rose Compact . . . 1.00
Parker-Belmont Beauty Cream . . . 1.00
Powdered Barriflower (depilatory) . . 1.00

PARKER-BELMONT & CO., 2358 Clybourn Ave., Chicago

"It doesn't matter. Life offers plenty of problems. How many people in this world are happy—really happy? Now Bud's always cheerful; he and Maybelle are happy—remarkably so, I think. Helen Torrence—well, I hesitate to say whether she's really happy or not; she always appears gay, just as you see her today; and it's something to be able to give the impression, whether it's false or not."

"Yes; it's well to make a front," Bruce replied, determined to keep a frivolous tone with her. "The Freemans enjoy themselves; they're quite ideally mated, I'd say."

"Yes, they're making a success of their lives. Dale and Bill are always cheerful. Now there's dear old Shep——"

"Well, of course he's happy. How could your husband be otherwise?"

"You're not taking me seriously at all! I'm disappointed. I was terribly blue today; that's why I plotted with Bud to get you here—I shamelessly confess that I want to know you better."

"Oh! You're just kidding!"

"You're incorrigible. I'm that rarest of beings—a sincere woman. You refuse to come to my house, presumably because you didn't like me, so I had to meet you here."

"How you misjudge me! You forget; I belong to the toiling masses!"

"You have time for Miss Harden; you two seemed ever so chummy on the golf course. Of course, I can't compete with her—she's beautiful and a genius—so many accomplishments. But you ought to be considerate of a poor creature like me. I'm only sorry I have so little to offer. I really thought you would be a nice playmate; but——"

"A playmate? Aren't we playing now? —at least you are playing with me!"

"Am I?" she asked.

She bent toward him with a slight, an almost imperceptible movement of her shoulders, and her lips parted tremulously in a wistful smile of many connotations. She was not without her charms; she was a very pretty woman; and there was nothing vulgar in her manner of exercising her charms. Bruce touched her hand, gently clasped it—a slender, cool hand. She made no attempt to release it; and it lay lingering and acquiescent in his clasp. He raised it and kissed the finger tips.

"You really understand about me; I knew you would," she murmured. "It's terrible to be lonely. And you are so big and strong; you can help me if you want to——"

"I have no right to help you," he said. "It's part of the game in this funny world that we've got to help ourselves."

"But if you knew I needed you——"

"Ah, but you don't!" he replied.

Bud tiptoed in with a tray containing highball materials and placed it on the tea table. He urged them in eloquent pantomime to drink themselves to death and tiptoed out again.

"Shep speaks of you often; he likes you and really Shep's ever so interesting," Constance resumed.

"Yes," Bruce answered, serious now; "he has ideas and ideals—really thinks about things in a fine way."

He was not pleased by the turn the talk had taken. He did not care to discuss Shepherd Mills with Shepherd's wife, even when, presumably, she was merely bringing her husband into the conversation to create an atmosphere of intimacy.

"Shep isn't a cut-up," she went on pensively, "and he doesn't know how to be a good fellow with men of his own age. And he's so shy he's afraid of the older men. And his father—you've met Mr. Mills? Well, Shep doesn't seem able to get close to his father."

"That happens, of course, between fathers and sons," Bruce replied. "Mr. Mills——"

He paused, took a cigarette from his case and put it back. There was no reason whatever why he should discuss with Mrs. Shepherd Mills, who was all but a stranger, the relations of her husband with her father-in-law. Bruce was by turns perplexed, annoyed, angry and afraid —afraid that he might in some way betray himself.

"Mr. Mills is a curious person," Constance continued. "He seems to me like a man who lives alone in a formal garden with high walls on four sides and has learned to ignore the roar of the world outside—a prisoner who carries the key of his prison house but can't find the lock!"

Bruce bent his head toward her, intent upon her words. He hadn't thought her capable of anything so imaginative. Some reply was necessary; he would make another effort to get rid of a subject that both repelled and fascinated him.

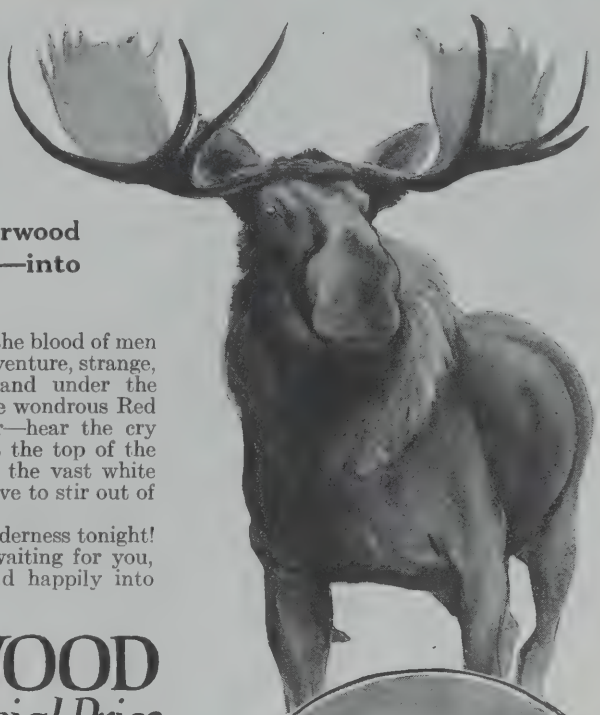
"I suppose we're all born free; if we find ourselves shut in it's because we've built the walls."

"How about my walls?" she asked. "Do you suppose I can ever escape?"

"Why should you?—don't you like your garden?"

"Not always; no! It's a little stifling sometimes!"

"Then push the walls back a little! It's a good sign, isn't it, when we begin to feel cramped?"



"You're doing a lot better! I begin to feel more hopeful about you. You really could be a great consolation to me if—if you weren't so busy!"

"I really did appreciate your invitation. I'll be around very soon."

After all, he decided, she was only flirting with him or laying the grounds for a flirtation. Her confidences were only a means of awakening his interest, stirring his sympathy. She was probably without aims or aspirations worthy of the name. Very likely she had never loved Shepherd, but she respected his high-mindedness and really wanted to help him. The depression to which she confessed was only the common ennui of her class and type; she needed occupation, doubtless children would solve her problem to some extent. Her life ran too smooth a course; life was not meant to be like that.

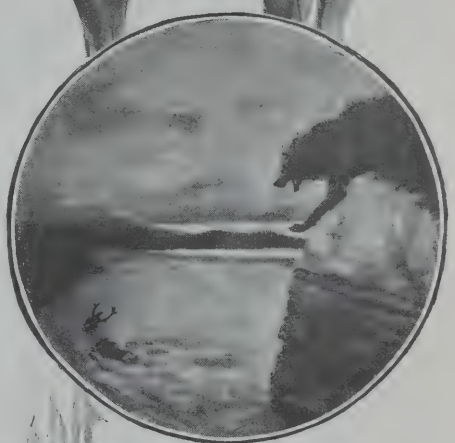
His mother in her cheery way used to say, when he would go to her with the small troubles of his childhood and youth: "It's as easy to laugh, dear, as to cry. We've all got to have our tribulations." He thought oftener than he knew of his mother. Conscious that he was thinking of her as he sat talking to the daughter-in-law of Franklin Mills, he remembered what she had said and written about serving Mills if ever it lay in his power. He experienced a sense of unreality, such a feeling as may at times disturb an actor when, in the midst of some scene he is

To-night!—Answer the Call of the Wilderness!

Ride on the Winged Words of James Oliver Curwood to the Magic Land of the Great White Spaces—into the Heart of Adventureland!

OUT of the rut!

That is the cry, carried on the great winds o' the Northwest, like the echo of a happy song. Out of the humdrum of accustomed routine!—off from the nightly glare of the Great White Way!—away from the clang of trolley cars, the roar of crowds—the endless din of towns and cities!



Here is a land where worry and care are thrown to the four winds. Here is the great magic land where the color of your life is changed in a twinkling—where the breath of Romance stirs in the blood of men and women—the land of adventure, strange, enchanting, wondrous. Stand under the great open sky—gaze at the wondrous Red Moon and the North Star—hear the cry of the wolf pack—stand at the top of the world and feel the spell of the vast white wilderness. You do not have to stir out of your easy chair to do it.

Answer the call of the wilderness tonight! James Oliver Curwood is waiting for you, ready to carry you far and happily into Adventureland!

JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD

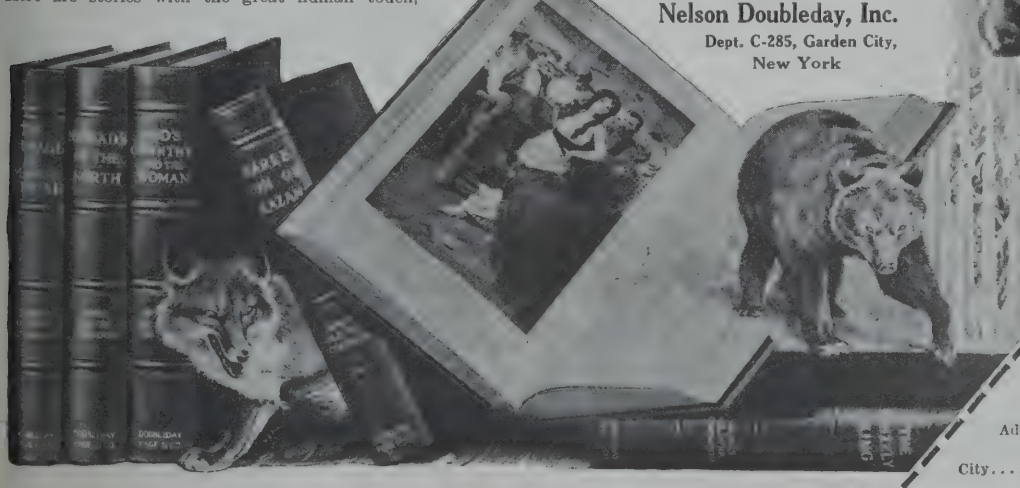
6 Complete Volumes · Now at a Special Price

"The Hunted Woman," "Baree, Son of Kazan," "God's Country and the Woman," "The Grizzly King," "The Courage of Marge O'Doone," "Nomads of the North."

Here are Romance and Adventure of the broad, gripping kind, such as you have never before read. Here awaiting you are great nights—magic nights—thrilling nights! You turn a page of these wonderful books and you are transported to great, white-capped mountains—to smooth, enchanted lakes—to dense forests.

With swift, sure strokes, Curwood brings before you a vivid picture of the land of wild things, of lawlessness—the whole, picturesque, fascinating wilderness of the Great Northwest.

There never was a writer with the strange, magic power of James Oliver Curwood. Read about "Baree," the little outcast wolf-dog who had such a pathetic struggle to find his niche in the animal world. Read about "Marge O'Doone," with her superb courage and fearlessness toward life. Read "The Hunted Woman"—the story of a girl who roamed the great Northwest on a strange quest, and who found her greatest adventure in the arms of John Adams, a novelist. Read "The Grizzly King," the most accurate, lovable picture of bear life ever done with a pen. Read "God's Country and the Woman," an inspired tale that combines the loveliness of the Woman with the charm and mystery of a great and glorious country. And read "Nomads of the North"—a tale of animal rovers, who track the great, white spaces of the Northwest, written with a tender, sympathetic appeal.



Here are stories with the great human touch, the kind that make your heart throb—the kind you will not put down, the kind you remember.

And now you have the opportunity of obtaining a beautiful six-volume set of James Oliver Curwood at an unprecedented price! At last this world-famous author is brought within the reach of everybody. By acting quickly—that is the condition, remember—you can obtain a wonderful six-volume set of James Oliver Curwood, for practically half price! The set, which is beautifully bound in dark maroon cloth, with the titles lettered in gold, has sold regularly for almost DOUBLE the present price!

Send No Money

If you are tired of ordinary novels, if you are "fed up" with the humdrum of your daily routine, if you want to feel the clean white snow of the great Northwest under your feet, if you want to live among real men and women, follow Curwood into adventureland! Don't bother to send any money. Merely mail the coupon and six volumes of Curwood will be sent to you at once. When they arrive, you have the privilege of examining them for seven days and then paying for them in small monthly installment payments. This offer is good only while the present special edition is available. Take advantage of it now—mail the coupon at once and make sure of your set.

Nelson Doubleday, Inc.
Dept. C-285, Garden City, New York

THIS COUPON SAVES YOU MONEY

Nelson Doubleday, Inc.
Dept. C-285
Garden City, N. Y.

Kindly send me the six-volume set of James Oliver Curwood, bound in dark maroon cloth, at the special low price for free examination. I will either return the books at your expense in 7 days or send you $1.50 and then $2.00 a month for three months, making a total of $7.50. [Bound in three-fourths leather, $9.50.]

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

If cash is sent with order deduct 50c.

"It must have been christened by fairies in some romantic garden in Spain, this Stearns' Day Dream Perfume! It is the realization of my dream of what an elusively delicate perfume should be"

Hazel Dawn

Day Dream

The Day Dream Perfume that Miss Dawn has described so well is only one of many charming Day Dream Boudoir Creations. Let us send you the new Day Dream "Acquaintance Box," which gives you an opportunity to enjoy the Perfume, Face Powder, Cold Cream, Poudre Creme and Soap. Sent Promptly on receipt of a twenty-five cent piece.

Dept. R
STEARNS—PERFUMER
Creator of Sadira and l'Amusette
Established 1855
Detroit, Mich. Windsor, Ont.

enacting, he seems to be hearing and watching himself in the character he is impersonating.

VI

He was impatient to leave, but Mrs. Torrence and Henderson had started a phonograph and were dancing in the hall. Constance seemed unmindful of the noise they were making.

"Shall we join in that romp?" asked Bruce.

"Thanks, no—if you don't mind! I suppose it's really time to run along. May I fix a drink for you? It's too bad to go away and leave all that whisky!"

The music ended in a jazzy saxophone wail and Mrs. Torrence and Henderson were heard noisily greeting several persons who had just come in.

"It's Leila," said Constance, rising and glancing at the clock. "She has no business being here at this time of day."

"Hello, Constance! Got a beau?"

Leila peered into the room, struck her hands together and called over her shoulder.

"Come in, lads! See what's here! Oh, Mr. What's-your-name——"

"Mr. Storrs," Constance supplied.

"Of course! Mr. Storrs, Mr. Thomas and Mr. Whitford!"

Bruce had heard much of Whitford at the University Club, where he was one of the most popular members. He had won fame as an athlete in college and was a polo player of repute. A cosmopolitan by nature, he had traveled extensively and in the Great War had won honorable distinction. Having inherited money he was able to follow his own bent. It was whispered that he entertained literary ambitions. He was one of the chief luminaries of the Dramatic Club, coached the players and had even produced several one act plays of his own that had the flavor of reality. He was of medium height and looked the soldier and athlete. Women had done much to spoil him, but in spite of his preoccupation with society, men continued to like "Whit," who was a thoroughly good fellow and a clean sportsman.

Thomas, having expressed his pleasure at meeting Bruce, was explaining to Mrs. Torrence how he and Whitford had met Leila downtown.

"Liar!" exclaimed Leila, who was pouring herself a drink. "You did nothing of the kind. We met at the Burtons' and Nellie gave us a little drink—just a tweeney, stingy little drink."

The drink she held up for purposes of illustration was not infinitesimal, Bruce noticed. Mrs. Torrence said that everyone must have a highball and proceeded to prepare a drink for Thomas and Whitford.

"You and Connie are certainly the solemn owls," she remarked to Bruce. "Anyone would have thought you were holding a funeral in here. Say when, Fred. This is real Bourbon that Jim treasured for years. You'll never see anything like it again."

"Bruce," cried Henderson, "has Connie filled you with gloom? She gets that way sometimes but it doesn't mean anything. A little of this oily Bourbon will set you up. This bird Storrs always did have glass legs," he explained to Thomas; "he can drink gallons and be ready to converse

His Mother — but people think she is his sister

Why is it that some mothers are often taken for the older sisters of their sons? Why is it that some women look years younger than they are?

Because they know that the secret of retaining their youthful appearance depends on keeping the complexion fresh and free from blemishes. Because they know that clear complexions come from within.

Nature's Remedy (NR Tablets), a vegetable aperient, acts naturally to clear the skin of blemishes, and to preserve a healthful, youthful appearance. It improves the general health and prevents and relieves constipation, headaches, and biliousness—those enemies of attractive, youthful looks.

Nature's Remedy does more than a laxative. Take a tablet tonight and tomorrow notice the improvement, not only in appearance, but in the way you feel, in the freedom from the usual headaches, irritations and nervousness.

All Druggists Sell The Dainty 25c. Box of NR Tablets

Used for over 30 years

NR JUNIORS Jrs CANDY COATED

Chips off the Old Block

NR JUNIORS — Little NRs One-third of regular dose. Made of same ingredients, then candy coated. For children and adults. Have you tried them? Send a 2c. stamp for postage on liberal sample in the attractive blue and yellow box. A. H. LEWIS MEDICINE CO., Dept. C, St. Louis, Mo.

SHORTHAND IN ONE MONTH

By the Boyd System—Wonderful, Easy Method. 100 to 150 words a minute in 30 days. Dictation first week. World's Record. Become a trained Stenographer or Private Secretary—Learn a profession that pays big. Send today for catalog and Money-Back Guarantee.

CHICAGO HOME STUDY SCHOOLS, 803 Reaper Block, Chicago, Ill.

DIAMONDS

FOR A FEW CENTS A DAY

Don't send a cent. Ten days' Trial. If you are not convinced it is the Greatest Bargain in America, send it back at our expense. Only if pleased do you send $11.50 as first payment. Then send $1.50 weekly—at the rate of a few cents a day. This Bargain Cluster Ring with 7 Blue-White Perfect Cut Diamonds can be yours. No Red Tape. No Risk.

MILLION DOLLAR BARGAIN BOOK FREE

Million Dollar Bargain Book FREE Send for it today. It pictures thousands of Bargains. Address Dept. 1205.

J.M.LYON & CO.
2-4 Maiden Lane N.Y.

with bishops. Never saw such a capacity! If I get a few more Maybelle will certainly hand it to me when I get home."

Constance walked round the table to Leila, who had drunk a highball and was preparing a second.

"No more, Leila!" said Constance, in a low tone. The girl drew back defiantly.

"Go away, Connie! I need just one more."

"You had more than you needed at the Burtons'. Please, Leila, be sensible. Helen, send the tray away."

"Leila's all right!" said Thomas, but at a sign from Mrs. Torrence he picked up the tray and carried it out.

"I don't think it pretty to treat me as though I were shot when I'm not," said Leila petulantly. She walked to the farther end of the room and sat down with the injured air of a rebellious child.

"Leila, do you know what time it is?" demanded Constance. "Your father's having a dinner and you've got to be there."

"I'm going to be there! There's loads of time. Everybody sit down and be comfortable!" Leila composedly sipped her drink as though to set an example of leisure to the others. Thomas had come back and Constance said a few words to him in a low tone.

"Oh, shucks! I know what you're saying. Connie's telling you to take me home," said Leila. She turned her wrist to look at her watch—frowned in the effort of focusing upon it and added with a shrug: "There's all the time in the world. If you people think you can scare me you've got another guess coming. It's just ten minutes of six; dinner's at seven-thirty! I've got to rest a little. You all look so ridiculous standing there glaring at me."

"Really, dear," said Mrs. Torrence coaxingly, walking toward Leila with her hands outstretched much as though she were trying to make friends with a reluctant puppy. "Do run along home like a good girl."

Leila apparently had no intention of running along home like a good little girl. She dropped her glass—empty—and without warning caught the astounded lady tightly about the neck.

"Stepmother! Dear, nice stepmamma!" she cried. "Nice, dear, sweet, kind stepmamma! Helen's going to be awful good to poor little Leila. Helen not be bad stepmamma like story books; Helen be nice, kind stepmamma and put nice, beautiful gin cocktails in baby's bottle!"

As she continued in cooing tones that only emphasized her mockery Leila stroked her captive's cheek and kissed her tenderly. Henderson and Thomas were shouting with laughter; Constance viewed the scene with lofty disdain; Whitford was mildly amused; Bruce, wishing himself somewhere else, withdrew toward the door, prepared to leave at the earliest possible moment. When at last Mrs. Torrence freed herself she sank into a chair and her laughter attained a new pitch of shrillness.

"Leila, you'll be the death of me!" she gasped when her mirth had spent itself.

"Leila will be the death of all of us," announced Constance solemnly.

"Oh, I don't know!" said Leila, straightening her hat composedly at the mantel mirror.

"Now, Leila," said Constance severely,

"You can buy Topkis for only a dollar!"

"I DIDN'T pick Topkis by the label at first. I chose it because it was the best-looking athletic underwear I saw.

"The salesman had to say 'One Dollar' a couple of times before I grasped the idea that it was the regular price.

"You can bet I pick the Topkis label now!"

Topkis is made of better material than most athletic underwear that costs much more. Best nainsook and other high-grade fabrics.

Real fit, too! Man-size armholes; longer, wider legs; roomy all over. Full size guaranteed. Pre-shrunk to keep its size after laundering.

And wear—man, how it does wear!

That's what One Dollar buys in the Topkis Men's Athletic Union Suit. No good dealer will ask more—most will admit it's worth more.

Men's Shirts and Drawers, 75c a garment; Boys' Union Suits, Girls' Bloomer Union Suits, and Children's Waist Union Suits, 75c.

Write for new booklet, chock full of "inside stuff" on underwear. It's free.

TOPKIS BROTHERS COMPANY, Wilmington, Delaware

General Sales Offices: 350 Broadway, New York City

Ask for TOPKIS Underwear Look for the Topkis Label

TOPKIS

Athletic Underwear

There IS a Rouge that Stays On Lasts all day - It's waterproof

YOU will like Pert. It is a cream rouge that stays on so well that only cold cream or soap and water will remove it. All day or all evening through you can be sure that your cheeks are becomingly pink. Pert is wonderfully natural, too, for the bright orange color changes to rosy pink as soon as it touches your skin. Pert is not merely a rouge. It is a protective cream as well and contains no oil.

At drug and department stores, or by mail. 75c a jar.

Send a dime for a generous sample of Pert Rouge, light or dark. And for another dime, you will receive a sample of Winx, the Liquid Lashlux, for darkening the lashes and making them appear heavier.

ROSS COMPANY
Makers of Winx, the Liquid Lashlux
74 Grand Street New York

Pert
The Waterproof Rouge

Perfume Your Bath—Soften Hard Water Instantly

Bathe with Bathasweet. It adds the final touch of dainty luxuriousness to your bath—it refreshes and invigorates. Bathasweet keeps the skin soft and smooth. Bathasweet imparts the softness of rain-water and the fragrance of a thousand flowers. Always keep a can in your bath room. Three sizes: 25c, 50c and $1. At drug and department stores or by mail. Send 10c for miniature can. The C. S. Welch Co., Dept. C. N., New York City.

TRADE MARK REG.

BATHASWEET

GET THIS WONDERFUL RING

These Amazingly Beautiful CORODITE Diamonds are the nearest approach to Genuine Diamonds that the ingenuity of man, aided by years of scientific and chemical research, can produce. They have the same blazing flash and dazzling play of living rainbow fire. Standing the terrific acid test of direct comparison. Even lifetime experts need all their experience to see any difference. Prove this yourself.

Wear a Corodite Diamond for 7 Days

Make this test. You risk nothing. Wear a genuine Corodite and a Diamond side by side on the same finger for seven days, if you or your friends can tell the difference, send it back. You won't be out a single penny. If you keep the ring, the price printed here is all you pay. No additional installments. Remember, Corodites have the same facet cutting as genuine stones.

No. 1—Ladies' Solitaire 14K Gold S. Ring $2.84
No. 4—Ladies' Hand-Carved Basket Setting, plat. finish $3.96
No. 5—Ladies' Solitaire Bridal Blossom Engraved . . . $3.54
No. 6—Gents' Massive Hand-Carved Green Gold Gypsy $4.39
No. 7—Gents' Heavy Belcher 14K Gold S. Ring $3.68

Carat size gems. Beautiful mountings of most modern design, choice of Gold or Latest White Platinum finish. Unqualified 20-year guarantee. Handsome Art Leather Case free with each ring.

SEND NO MONEY Keep your money right at home, just send name, address and number of ring wanted and size as shown by strip of paper fitting tightly end to end around finger joint. Your ring will come by return mail. When ring arrives, pay postman amount shown above. If you decide not to keep ring, send it back within 7 days and your money will be immediately returned. Send today.

E. RICHWINE CO.
333 S. Dearborn St., Dept. 416, Chicago, Illinois
Sole Importers Genuine Corodite Diamonds

Phyllis Haver, lovely comedy star, uses and recommends Maybelline.

You, Too, May Instantly Beautify Your Eyes With

Maybelline

Just a wee touch of "MAYBELLINE" will make light, short, thin eyelashes and brows appear naturally dark, long and luxurious, thereby giving charm, beauty and soulful expression to any eyes. Unlike other preparations, absolutely harmless and greaseless, will not spread and smear on the face. The instant beautifying effect will delight you. Used by beautiful girls and women everywhere. Each dainty box contains mirror and brush. Two shades: Brown for Blondes, Black for Brunettes 75c AT YOUR DEALER'S or direct from us. Accept only genuine "MAYBELLINE" and your satisfaction is assured. Tear out this ad now as reminder.

Maybelline Co., 4750-76 Sheridan Road, Chicago

"do run along home. Please let me take you in my car; you oughtn't to drive in the condition you're in."

The remark was not fortunate. Leila had discovered a box of bonbons and was amusing herself by tossing them into the air and trying to catch them in her mouth. She scored one success in three attempts and curtsied to an imaginary audience.

"My condition!" she said, with fine scorn. "I wish you wouldn't speak as though I were a common drunkard."

"Anyone can see that you're not fit to go home. Your father will be furious."

"Not if I tell him I've been with you!" Leila flung back.

"Say, Leila!" began Henderson, ingratiatingly. "We're old pals—you and I—let's shake this bunch. I'll do something nice for you sometime."

"What will you do?" Leila demanded with provoking deliberation.

"Oh, something mighty nice! Maybelle and I will give you a party and you can name the guests."

"Stupid!" she yawned. "Your hair's mussed, Helen. You and Bud have been naughty."

"Your behavior isn't ladylike," said Thomas. "The party's getting rough! Come on, let's go."

"Oh, I'm misbehaving, am I? Well, I guess my conduct's as good as yours! Where do you get this stuff that I'm a lost lamb? I'm just a little bit tipsy—that's all! If I had a couple more highballs——"

VII

By a signal passed from one to the other they began feigning to ignore her. Constance said she was going; Bud, Whitford and Thomas joined Bruce at the door where he was saying good night to Mrs. Torrence. Leila was not so tipsy but that she understood what they were doing.

"Think you can freeze me out, do you? Well, I'm not so easily friz! Mr. What's-your-name——" she fixed her eyes upon Bruce detainingly.

"Storrs," Bruce supplied good-naturedly.

"You're the only lady or gentleman in this room. I'm going to ask you to take me home!"

"Certainly, Miss Mills!"

With a queenly air she took his arm. Henderson ran forward and opened the door, the others hanging back silent, afraid to risk a word that might reopen the discussion and delay her departure.

"Shall I drive?" Bruce asked when they reached the curb.

"Yes; thanks, if you don't mind."

"Home?" he inquired as he got the car under way.

"I was just doing a little thinking," she said. "It will take only five minutes to run over to that little cafeteria on Fortieth Street. Some coffee wouldn't be a bad thing, and would you mind turning the wind shield?—I'd like the air."

"A good idea," said Bruce and stepped on the gas. The car had been built for Leila's special use and he had with difficulty squeezed himself into the driver's seat; but he quickly caught the hang of it. He stopped a little beyond the cafeteria to avoid the lights of the busy corner and brought out a container of hot coffee and paper cups.

"Like a picnic, isn't it?" she said. "You won't join me?"

She sipped the coffee slowly while he stood in the street beside her.

"There!" she said. "Thank you, ever so much. Quarter of seven? Forty-five minutes to dress! Just shoot right along home now. Would you mind driving over to the boulevard and going in that way? Gives me more air. It does feel good!"

"Nothing would please me more," he said and looked down at her as they passed under the lights at a crossing. She was staring straight ahead, looking singularly young as she lay back with her hands clasped in her lap.

"Constance was furious!" she said suddenly. "Well, I suppose she had a right to be. I had no business getting lit."

"Well, strictly speaking, you shouldn't do it," he said. It was not the time nor the place and he was not the proper person to lecture her upon her delinquencies. But he had not been displeased that she chose him to take her home, even though the choice was only a whim.

"You must think me horrid! This is the second time you've seen me teed up too high."

"I've seen a lot of other people teed up much higher! You're perfectly all right now?"

"Absolutely! That coffee fixed me; I'm beginning to feel quite bully. I can go home now and jump into my joy rags and nobody will ever be the wiser. This is an old folks' party but dada always wants to exhibit me when he feeds the nobility —can you see me?"

Her low laugh was entirely reassuring as to her sobriety, and he was satisfied that she would be able to give a good account of herself at her father's table.

"Just leave the car on the drive," she said as they reached the house. "Maybe I can crawl up to my room without dada knowing I'm late. Here, I'm leaving you stranded! Well, thanks awfully!"

He walked with her to the entrance and she was taking out her key when Mills, in his evening clothes, opened the door.

"Leila! You're late!" he exclaimed sharply. "Where on earth have you been?"

"Just gadding about, as usual!" replied Leila airily. "But I'm in plenty of time, dada. Please thank Mr. Storrs for coming home with me. Good night and thank you some more!"

She darted into the house, leaving Bruce confronting her father.

"Oh, Mr. Storrs!" The emphasis on the name was eloquent of Mills's surprise that Bruce was on his threshold. Bruce had decided that any explanations that might be required were better left to Leila, who was probably an adept in explanations. He was about to turn away when Mills stepped outside.

"We're entertaining tonight," he said pleasantly. "I was a little afraid something had happened to my daughter."

A certain dignity of utterance marked his last words—"my daughter"—he gave the phrase all possible connotations of paternal pride.

Bruce, halfway down the steps, paused until Mills had concluded his remark. Then, lifting his hat with a murmured good night, he hurried toward the gate. An irresistible impulse caused him to look back. Mills remained just inside the entry, his figure clearly defined by the overhead lights, staring toward the street. Seeing Bruce look back he went quickly into the house and the heavy door boomed upon him.

Bruce walked slowly to a street car and rode downtown for dinner. The fact that Mills was waiting at the door for Leila was not without its significance, hinting at a constant uneasiness for her safety beyond ordinary parental solicitude. What Constance had said that afternoon about Mills came back to him. He was oppressed by a sense of something tragic in Mills's life—the tragedy of a failure that wore outwardly the guise of success.

In spite of a strong effort of will to obliterate these thoughts he found his memory dragging into his consciousness odd little pictures of Mills—fragmentary snapshots, more vivid and haunting than complete portraits: the look Mills gave him the first time they met at the Country Club; Mills's shoulders and the white line of his collar above his dinner coat as he left the Hardens' the night Bruce saw him there; and now the quick change in his face from irritation to relief and amiable courtesy when he admitted Leila.

Henderson and Millicent and now today Constance had given him hints of Mills's character, and Bruce found himself trying to reconcile and unify their comments and fit them into his own inferences and conclusions. The man was not without his fascinations as a subject for analysis. Behind that gracious exterior there must be another identity either less noble or finer than the man the world knew . . . Before he slept, Bruce found it necessary to combat an apprehension that, if he continued to hear Mills dissected and analyzed, he might learn to pity the man.

VIII

THAT evening when Shepherd Mills went home he found Constance seated at her dressing table, her heavy golden brown hair piled loosely upon her head, while her maid rubbed cold cream into her throat and face. She espied him in the mirror and greeted him with a careless, "Hello, Shep. How did the day go with you?"—the question employed by countless American wives in saluting their husbands at the end of a toilsome day.

"Oh, pretty good!" he replied. No husband ever admits that a day has been wholly easy and prosperous.

She put out her hand for him to kiss and bade him sit down beside her. He was always diffident before the mysteries of his wife's toilet. He glanced at the gown laid across a chair and surveyed the crystal and silver on the dressing table with a confused air.

The room denoted Constance Mills's love of luxury, and incidentally her self-love. The walls on two sides were set in mirrors that reached from ceiling to floor. The furniture, the rugs, the few pictures, the window draperies had been chosen with an exquisite care and combined in an evocation of the spirit of indolence. There was a much be-pillowed divan across one corner, so placed that when she enjoyed a siesta Constance could contemplate herself in the mirrors without turning her head. Scents—a mingling of faint exotic odors—hung upon the air.

She was quick to note that something

Look for the Red Stripes

Restful Sleep

YOUR night's sleep should leave you refreshed and invigorated in the morning. Your bedspring has much to do with that! If it sags or sways or creaks it does not allow your muscles and nerves to relax completely.

You may have become so accustomed to the old bedspring that you don't realize its discomforts. You'll notice the difference if you replace it with a genuine

WAY Sagless Spring

"NO SAG IN any WAY"

Then you'll have a bedspring that will give you the utmost in sleeping comfort and restfulness—not only for a year or two—but for at least a quarter of a century.

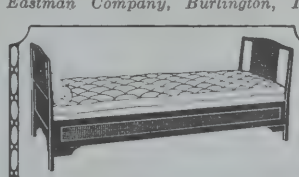
It's the exclusive "Way" features—the patented way hollow strand construction, the "Way" truss supports, etc.,—that makes it so everlastingly comfortable and restful.

You can get these patented features only in the genuine Way Sagless Spring—the kind with the red stripes on the frame.

Guaranteed for 25 years not to sag, stretch or break, a new spring free if it does.

Have you read "The Restful Way"? Write for a copy.

Way Sagless Spring Co.



894 E. Hennepin Ave., Minneapolis, Minn.

Branch factories in Chicago and Cleveland. Distributing warehouses at Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Detroit, St. Louis.

Made and Sold in North Atlantic States by Burton-Dixie Corporation, N. Y.

In Canada: by Dominion Bedstead Co., Ltd. Montreal and Toronto Parkhill Bedding Ltd., Winnipeg.

Southern Distributors: The Belknap Hdwe. & Mfg. Co., Inc. Louisville, Ky., Chittenden & Eastman Company, Burlington, Iowa.

Way Sagless Daybeds

The improved type of convertible daybed (also made in davenport styles) opens easily into a full size bed, equipped with genuine Way Sagless Spring. Attractive period designs, beautifully upholstered. Write for portfolio of styles.

COMPARABLE VALUES

Quality XXX Richelieu Pearls $50 to $300 are perfect reproductions of genuine Ceylon Oriental Pearls that cost $10,000 to $500,000

Quality A Richelieu Pearls $35 to $150 are perfect reproductions of genuine Red Sea Pearls that cost from $5,000 to $200,000

Quality B Richelieu Pearls $20 to $100 are perfect reproductions of genuine Persian Gulf Pearls that cost from $2,000 to $100,000

Quality C Richelieu Pearls $15 to $35 are perfect reproductions of genuine Australian Gulf Pearls that cost from $1,000 to $50,000

Quality PO Richelieu Pearls $10 to $20 are perfect reproductions of genuine South Sea Island Pearls that cost from $300 to $15,000

Quality M Richelieu Pearls $5 to $10 are perfect reproductions of the genuine Bahama Pearls that cost from $250 to $5,000

All Richelieu Pearl Qualities truly reproduce Pearls from the rarest gems to those that are most frequently found. You are urged to demand the Richelieu Guarantee—it assures you that they will not peel, break or discolor, and fully protects your investment. A guarantee is attached to every strand.

Richelieu Pearls are made in America by the J. H. M. B. Laboratories, Brooklyn, N. Y.

was on Shepherd's mind and half from curiosity, half in a spirit of kindness, dismissed the maid as quickly as possible.

"You can hook me up, Shep. I'll do my hair myself. I won't need you any more, Marie. Yes—my blue cloak. Now, little boy, go ahead and tell me what's bothering you."

Shepherd frowned and twisted his mustache as he sat huddled on the divan.

"It's about father; nothing new, just our old failure to understand each other. It's getting worse. I never know where I stand with him."

"Well, does anyone?" Constance asked serenely. "You really mustn't let him get on your nerves. There are things you've got to take because we all do; but by studying him a little and practicing a little patience you'll escape a lot of worry."

"Yes," he assented eagerly. "You know he just pretends that I'm the head of the battery plant; Fields is the real authority there. It's not the president but the vice-president who has the say about things. Father consults Fields constantly. He doesn't trust me—I'm just a figurehead."

"Fields is such an ass," remarked Constance with a shrug of her shapely shoulders. "An utterly impossible person. Why not just let him do all the explaining to your father? If any mistakes are made at the plant then it's on him."

"But that's not the way of it," Shepherd protested plaintively. "He gets the praise; I get the blame."

"Oh, well, you can't make your father over! You ought to be glad you're not of his hard-boiled variety. You're human, Sheppy, and that's better than being a magnificent iceberg."

"Father doesn't see things; he doesn't realize that the world's changing," Shepherd went on stubbornly. "He doesn't see that the old attitude toward labor won't do any more."

"He'll never see it," said Constance. "Things like that don't hit him at all. He's like those silly people who didn't know there was anything wrong in France till their necks were in the guillotine."

"I told you about that clubhouse I wanted to build for our people on the Milton farm? I hate to give that up. It would mean so much to those people. And he was all wrong in thinking it would injure the property. I think it's only decent to do something for them."

"Well, how can you do it without your father?" she asked, shifting herself for a better scrutiny of her head in the mirror.

"You know that little tract of land—about twenty acres, back of the plant? I could buy that and put the clubhouse there. I have some stock in the Rogers Trust Company I could sell—about two hundred shares. It came to me through mother's estate. Father has nothing to do with it. The last quotation on it is two hundred. What do you think of that?"

"Well, I think pretty well of it," said Constance. "Your father ought to let you build the clubhouse but he has a positive passion for making people uncomfortable."

"I suppose," continued Shepherd dubiously, "if I go ahead and build the thing—even with my own money—he would be angry. Of course there may be something in his idea that if we do a thing of this kind it would make the workmen at other plants restless——"

Keeps Eyes Ever Bright and Clear

There's no greater aid to beauty than plenty of sunshine and fresh air. But sun, wind and dust irritate the EYES—make them bloodshot and unattractive looking.

Murine soothes, brightens and beautifies irritated EYES. It's wonderfully refreshing after motoring and every outdoor sport.

EYES cleansed daily with Murine assume new lights and loveliness. It's perfectly harmless—contains no belladonna or other hurtful ingredients. Murine has been beautifying EYES for almost thirty years.

Our fascinating booklet, "Beauty Lies Within the Eyes," is FREE on request

Murine Eye Remedy Co.
Dept. 22, Chicago

MURINE FOR YOUR EYES

INVENTORS Desiring to secure patent should write for our book, "How To Get Your Patent." Send model or sketch of invention for opinion of patentable nature.
RANDOLPH & CO.
Dept: 33 - - - - - - - - Washington, D. C.

Successful because he keeps fit

Perhaps you saw him this morning. His step was buoyant. He was off to work with a smile. He knows that good health is a determining factor in his success. He takes no chances with constipation, which impairs efficiency. Make sure that he is not more fit than you. Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets are a matchless corrective for constipation. Made of pure vegetable ingredients mixed with olive oil, you will know them by their olive color. They are a safe substitute for dangerous calomel and form no harmful habit. Price 15 and 30 cents, at all druggists.

Dr. Edwards' OLIVE Tablets

"Piffle!" exclaimed Constance. "That's the regular old stock whimper of the back number. You might just as well say that it would be a forward step other employers ought to follow!"

"Yes, there's that!" he agreed, his eyes brightening at the suggestion.

"If you built the house on your own land the storage battery company wouldn't be responsible for it in any way."

"Certainly not!" Shepherd was increasingly pleased that she saw it all so clearly.

She had slipped on her gown and was instructing him as to the position of the hooks.

"No; the other side, Shep. That's right. There's another bunch on the left shoulder. Now you've got it! Thanks ever so much."

He watched her admiringly as she paraded before the mirror to make sure that the skirt hung properly.

"If there's to be a row——" he began as she opened a drawer and selected a handkerchief.

"Let there be a row! My dear Shep, you're always too afraid of asserting yourself. What could he do? He might get you up to his office and give you a bad quarter of an hour; but he'd respect you more afterwards if you stood to your guns. His vanity and family pride protect you. Catch him doing anything that might get him into the newspapers—not Franklin Mills!"

Relieved and encouraged by her understanding and sympathy, he explained more particularly the location of the land he proposed buying. It consisted of an old farmhouse, an orchard and a small creek, quite as convenient to the industrial colony that had grown up about the storage battery plant as the Milton land his father had refused to let him use. The land was bound to appreciate in value, he said.

"What if it doesn't!" exclaimed Constance with mild scorn. "You'll have been doing good with your money anyhow."

"You think, then, you'd go ahead—sell the stock and buy the land. It's so late now, maybe I'd better wait till spring?"

"That might be better, Shep. You asked your father to help and he turned you down. Your going ahead will have a good effect on him. He needs a jar. Now run along and dress. You're going to be late for dinner."

"Yes, I know," he said, rising and looking down at her as she sat turning over the leaves of a book. "Connie——"

"Yes, Shep," she murmured absently.

"Connie——" he stammered and took her hand. "Connie—you're awfully good to me. You know I love you——"

"Why of course, you dear baby!" She lifted her head with a quick, reassuring smile. "But for goodness sake run along and change your clothes!"

IX

WHEN his guests had gone, Mills, as was his habit, smoked a cigar and discussed the dinner with Leila. He was aware that in asking her to join him on such occasions of state he was subjecting her to a trying ordeal, and tonight he was particularly well pleased with her. Now and then she had flung into the talk of her elders an amusing, pertinent comment that added greatly to the cheer of the

Now!—Living Flowers

From everywhere comes the edict—the miracle of living flowers to contrast the artificiality of perfumes!

VIVANTE

Madam, Mademoiselle, knows it? This sophisticated fragrance of life that speaks so naively the language of charm?

As indefinable as a smile!

As joyous as the Springtime!

You may obtain a small vial of Lournay Vivante by sending 15 cents to our American address.

LOURNAY

PARIS
7 Rue de L'Isly

NEW YORK
366 Fifth Avenue

Lournay

He has regaled our palates

—has he also ruined our teeth?

THE CHEFS of France have had a tremendous influence on American food. They have taught us how to delight our palates, but they have almost ruined our teeth!

Teeth need work and gums need stimulation, and with this creamy modern food of ours, there is neither work for the teeth nor stimulation for the gums.

Trouble on the increase!

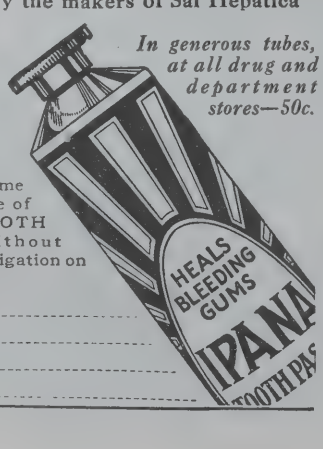
Consequently, teeth and gums are today less robust. Trouble from both is on the increase. The prevalence of pyorrhea is one item in a long list.

Thousands of dentists have written us to tell how they combat soft and spongy gums by the use of Ipana.

The use of Ipana

In stubborn cases, they prescribe a thorough gum-massage with Ipana after the ordinary cleaning with Ipana and the brush. For Ipana Tooth Paste, because of the presence of Ziratol, has a decided tendency to heal the soft gum and to keep the healthy gum firm.

Ipana is a modern tooth paste formulated with an eye to the welfare of your gums, whether they give you trouble or not, and in addition it is a tooth paste of remarkable cleaning power and unforgetably good taste.



A ten day trial tube will be sent to you upon request —use the coupon below

IPANA
TOOTH PASTE

—made by the makers of Sal Hepatica

Bristol-Myers Co.
65 Rector St.
New York, N.Y.

In generous tubes, at all drug and department stores—50c.

Kindly send me a trial tube of IPANA TOOTH PASTE without charge or obligation on my part.

Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State .....

company. She had keen intuitions in matters in which her knowledge was scant and her remarks sometimes were startlingly apt.

"They all enjoyed themselves, dada; you needn't worry about that party!" Leila remarked, smoking the cigarette she had denied herself while the guests remained.

"I think they did; thank you very much for helping me."

Leila had charm; he was always proud of an opportunity to display her to her mother's old friends, whose names, like his own, carried weight in local history. His son was a Shepherd; Leila, he persuaded himself, was, with all her waywardness and little follies, more like himself. Leila looked well at his table, and her dramatic sense made it possible for her to act the rôle of the daughter of the house with the formality that was dear to him. Whenever he entertained he and Leila received the guests together, standing in front of Mrs. Mills's portrait. People who dared had laughed about this, speculating as to the probable fate of the portrait in case Mills married again.

"I'd got nervous about you when you were so late coming," Mills was saying. "That's how I came to be at the door. I'd just called Millicent to see if you were over there."

"Foolish dada! Don't I always turn up?" she asked, kicking off her slippers. 'I'd been fooling around all afternoon, and I hate getting dressed and waiting f a party to begin."

"I've noticed that," Mills replied dryl "Just what did you do all day? Yo doings are always a mystery to me."

"Well—let me see—I went downtow with Millie this morning, and home wi her for lunch, and we talked a while and ran out to the Burtons' and there we some people there and we gassed; a then I remembered I hadn't seen M Torrence since she got home, so I to a dash up there. And Connie was the and Bud Henderson came up with M Storrs and we had tea and Mr. Storrs w coming this way so I let him drive m home."

This, uttered with smooth volubilit was hardly half the truth. She lighted fresh cigarette and blew a series of rin while waiting to see whether he wou crossexamine her, as he sometimes did.

"Constance was there, was she? An one else?"

"Fred Thomas and Georgy Whitfo blew in just as I was leaving."

"So? I shouldn't have thought M Torrence would be interested in tho fellows."

"Oh, she isn't!" replied Leila, w hadn't intended to mention Thomas Whitford. "Connie was trying to t Helen into taking a perfectly marvelo part in the new play the Drama Club's putting on soon, and they a in it, too.

You won't want to miss the June instalment of "The Hope of Happiness," in which Meredith Nicholson develops further the dramatic situation created by Bruce's growing love for the girl with whom his father is considering marriage when his heart would suddenly want to stop for good just before he fell into that deep, dark pit of sleep from which it seemed there would be no returning? He had spoken to Kelly only this morning about that horrible nightmare of sleep, and Kelly had listened with that vague, dreamy air of his and made no comment. Nothing to be done about it, evidently. Grin and bear it, Pam concluded. What did it matter anyhow so long as he had these lovely evening hours alone with Doria and his new found happiness?

---

The Garden of Peril

(Continued from page 52)

This was the time when she was at her sweetest, waiting on him with her own hands, trailing round the dinner table to do things for him, gay and witty, as always after her three hours' rest, as though she had been communing with the gods instead of lying in a hammock under the trees as she said she mostly did. Invariably she came back more vivid, more alive, fuller of hope and plans for their future together. Sometimes, listening to her, a strange fear would grip his heart, remembering that menacing sleep awaiting him followed by the early morning agony of piercing knives in his vitals. But Doria seemed so unconscious of anything's being wrong, so confident that one of these days, soon, would find them both at Scawnshane well and happy, that almost she persuaded him past his own beliefs and fears.

No wonder they spun out this time of theirs together as long as possible, sitti late at the table over liqueurs and smok Doria made the coffee herself in a lit coffee machine, and poured it for him wi her own hands, helping him to liqueur a cutting and lighting his cigar. Then s would steal round the table, so alluring her loose tea gown, and slip on to his kn her lovely daffodil head against his, h scented cheek to his lips. Her arm wou be round his neck, and his about t delicious curve of her waist.

Anyone looking on might perhaps thi it absurd for two people, over ten ye married, to be indulging in these encha ing caresses. But Pam did not think and Doria was never absurd, only tend fanciful and divinely full of variety. had never guessed what a wonderful wife possessed until this last month. Som times it almost seemed worth while have lost Dick for the sake of finding, in grief, this new and adorable Doria. B immediately he recanted that. No—t tragedy of that young life cut off in bloom would never lose its sharpness, n find compensation.

But in this magic hour of his and Dori he could at least forget death, and bani all sad things for a while. Later, Nur Gordon would come back from the hospi to settle him for the night, before goi back too; and occasionally Kelly wou look in to say a last word.

RED BLOODED, BANG-UP STORIES!

12 Great Books!

Don Quickshot of the Rio Grande — Stephen Chalmers
"Lookin' f'r Trouble is my middle name," said Impulsive Pep, adventuring cowpuncher. And there on the border, among raiding Mexican bandits, train robbers, Texas rangers, a prairie fire—not to mention a pair of blue eyes—he did not have far to look.

Loaded Dice — Edwin L. Sabin
A romance of Texas of the early days, when lives depended on the quickness of draw, and all the courage of the pioneers was needed to brave the perils they so fearlessly faced. A thrilling tale of the men who were jugglers with death.

Sontag of Sundown — W. C. Tuttle
The story of the question of ownership of the TJ ranch—a question which promoted bloodshed and a war of no mean caliber. The cowpunchers in this story will live long in your memory for their originality and enterprise. They are men whose best friends were their nerve and their gun.

Spawn of the Desert — W. C. Tuttle
A Tale of Calico Town:
Where men lived raw in the desert's maw, and Hell was nothing to shun; where they buried 'em neat, without preacher or sheet, and writ on their tombstone, crude but sweet: "This jasper was slow with his gun."

Arizona Argonauts — H. Bedford-Jones
Three adventurers whose fortune in the Arizona desert lead through drought and danger to the goal they sought—gold, free gold, the gold of which they had always dreamed. They were men quick on the trigger who loved to face odds.

The Lure of Piper's Glen — Theodore Goodridge Roberts
It was the lure of all the great timber country of the North, of plentiful game, of the clear wind from the great plains. The call came South; young Jim Todhunter heard it, and a great tide of life in the north caught him up to bring adventure a-plenty.

Apache Valley — Arthur Chapman
A story of a cattle war in the Southwest, with all it means—terror and blood feud; alarms by night and day; rustling and stealthy murder. And through it all are woven the lives of true men as well as thieves, men whose lives reflected the glories of the land they protected.

The Challenge of the North — James B. Hendryx
This is a story of the call of the great Northland; of purposes and cross purposes; of true men and of "bad" men; and of big deals and pioneering triumphs. A tale of the North which hold for the young, the strong and the brave adventures that are countless.

The Second Mate — H. Bedford-Jones
Peril and mutiny on the China Seas. When every scupper was running red, and with two white women at the mercy of a villainous crew composed of the sweepings of the outermost islands, Jim Barnes, realized the gage of desperate battle he had accepted when he signed on as second mate of the SULU QUEEN.

The Devil's Payday — W. C. Tuttle
A sky of brass, the sun a flame,
And the land no place to dwell;
The only spot that God forgot,
A hunk of earth, so doggone hot
That it still belongs to Hell.

The Canyon of the Green Death — F. R. Buckley
Who were the devils in human form whose haunt was the lost barranca? Invisible, terrible, they brought the redoubtable young officer of the law to a strange dilemma. The law of the land commanded him not to desert his prisoners; the law of the desert ordained that he stand by his companions. Which did the Fates decree he should obey?

Sky-High Corral — Ralph Cummins
A yarn of the unending feuds between cattlemen and forest rangers; of the forest fires, grazing herds and bitter fights at timberline. Yet in the end our gallant young ranger through ordeal of battles, fire and blood brought the old timers to see that the new ways of forest conservation are best.

Thrills on Every Page

12 Big Bully Books $1.98 For All

Every One a Ripsnorter!

Exciting? You'll say so! Twelve red-blooded tales. Real thrills on every page. You whirl along breathlessly from climax to climax. Smashing, unexpected endings make you gasp. Never a slow evening if you own these books. Just like being a cowboy, a prospector, a dare-devil adventurer yourself. Every story a "humdinger."

Live the life of the big open Western world—among hairy-chested, hard-fighting frontiersmen who tramp, ride, camp, scheme, love and hate—yes, and sometimes shoot to kill! Live among them in Adventure-land! These fascinating, gripping stories will pick you up, and whirl you bodily into the "gun toting" life of the West—the bad old, glad old West. Every one of these books will make you "hold on to your chair."

Send No Money

You can get this whole library of 12 fascinating, nerve-tightening books, for about 16c each, without a penny in advance. But listen! The night these books come you won't sleep! You're just bound to finish the one you start—if it takes till 3 a. m. You can't be lonesome or out of amusement while you have these smashing stories in your home. YET EVERY STORY IS CLEAN AND WHOLESOME—nothing that should not be read by any boy or girl.

Get this whole library right away. Don't send any money. Just your name and address on the handy coupon, and mail it. The whole 12 of these splendid books, each printed on good paper and each with a striking cover in full color, will be sent to you promptly. Just pay $1.98 plus a few cents postage, to the postman who delivers the books, and they are yours. There are no other payments of any kind. Each book complete. If you are in any way dissatisfied, send them back to us—and we will send back your money in full.

Stake yourself to a whole lot of pleasant evenings! Think of it! 12 novels for only $1.98—and you take no risk. Take up this offer right now, for it may not be repeated in this magazine. Send the coupon today—NOW!

Garden City Pub. Co., Inc.
Dept. W-525
New York

MAIL THIS QUICK

Garden City Pub. Co., Inc.
Dept. W-525
New York

You may send me the 12 volumes of Western stories by Hendryx, Tuttle and other famous authors. I will pay the postman only $1.98 (plus postage) on delivery. It is understood that I may return these books, if I desire, within five days and receive my money back promptly.

Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....

Provoking that he should stalk in that evening, though, while the two were still lost in their happy reveries, actually surprising Doria on his knee, and causing a rather embarrassed scramble on her part. But Doria was too finished a femme du monde to be put out of countenance for long by any set of circumstances and easily resumed her natural dignity, getting the Doctor a cup of coffee and insisting on his having a liqueur. Her husband's and hers stood on the table beside their coffee cups, two lovely vases of color, one gleaming bright emerald, the other rosy red.

"Which will you have, Doctor?" she gaily inquired. "A port light, or a danger signal?"

"Both look highly injurious," he smiled. "Which is which, may I ask? And of what are they composed?"

"The green stuff is crème de menthe, of course, my favorite liqueur, and therefore personally recommended. The other is sloe gin—rather a pet of Pam's."

"Sloe gin, upon my soul! Now where did you manage to get such a luxury as that? I don't think I have ever seen it in the country before."

"Probably not, for when you gave permission for Pam to have little drinks again, I had to wire to Cape Town for these. This wretched country never seems to go in for anything but whisky! Now which will you try, Doctor? I really think the crème de menthe is best as a digestive."

"Thank you—but I think I'd like a little of the port light." The Doctor looked round for the bottle, but Doria with the alacrity of a good hostess had already reached the sideboard and taken it up. But she stood there with a laughing and backward glance at her husband.

"Drink yours up quickly, Pam, darling. Doctor Kelly may forbid you when he finds how fascinatingly heady it is."

She stood laughing and guarding the bottle, while her husband entering into the jest laughed too, and taking up his glass drained the contents.

"Oh, come, I didn't know I was such an ogre as all that!" remonstrated Bruce Kelly. "But of course I like to know what my patients are up to when I'm not on hand, and to sample for myself occasionally such dissipations as they are indulging in."

He took the glass of bright liqueur from his hostess's hand and set it on the table before him.

"Is that why you came round tonight?" quizzed Doria mischievously, holding out the cigars. "Do try one. Pam's smokes are really to be recommended, like everything men choose for themselves. You'll like them better than it seems you do my poor little sloe gin!" For the Doctor was not drinking, only holding it up to the light.

"This is not the famous port light you were drinking, Heseltine, surely?"

"But of course," cried Doria, surprise in her voice. "We've only got one kind. Oh, Doctor! Doctor! I can tell you are up to some mischief! I believe you're going to pretend it's too strong for Pam."

"No—no, indeed!" The Doctor sipped at his glass and set it down. "There's no harm in that, I'm sure. Only"—he looked at it critically again, then at Pam's empty glass—"it seems to me a good deal lighter in color than the stuff you had."

"There, I knew it!" cried Doria in mock despair, but Pam, looking at the Doctor's drink, was inclined to agree.

"It does look lighter, somehow. Still, I swear we're not working a fraud on you, Doc." He laughed at the idea, they all laughed together, and the Doctor finished his drink.

"I mustn't stop. What I really came for, Heseltine, was to say that from what you told me this morning about your sleep I think we'd better discontinue the afternoon injections for a bit."

So, the old Doc had considered it after all, thought Pam; but he wished no mention had been made of the matter before Doria, for as soon as they were alone again she insisted breathlessly on knowing everything about his deep sleeping, his racking pains; not a single pain or symptom would she let him off, and broke in all the time with little panting cries of "Oh Pam! . . . my darling! . . . What a shame! . . . How awful for you, poor boy! . . . Oh dear, what can we do?" with fervid little tight clasps and embraces, and kisses dropped like flowers over his face.

"And I know—I feel it in my bones that he's going to be disagreeable about your having drinks and coffee and liqueurs. You'll see."

"Well, if he is what's it matter, dear? I can manage, as long as he'll get me well."

"But why should you be denied every little pleasure?" Then she stopped and looked at her husband earnestly. "Do you really altogether believe in him and his injections, Pam?"

"Believe in him?" Pam stared. "Certainly I do."

"Oh, well!" she sighed anxiously. "I hope you are right, but it seems to me that introducing some sort of poisonous berry juice into the human system is a fantastic——"

Her husband laughed at her doubts.

"Old Bruce Kelly is one of the first medical scientists living—knows all about human systems and what they can stand, believe me."

"I only hope he does, darling," she sighed again and resigned the subject.

But she was right at any rate in her foreshadowing of resumed restrictions, for the very next morning the Doctor had a whole fresh list of things his patient was not to do and take, including coffee, sundowners, liqueurs and sitting up late; and a new régime which included bed at eight after a milk meal to be superintended by Nurse Gordon, "so's not to have any spoiling nonsense from doting wives," he privately told Pam, who did not repeat the remark to Doria. She was furious enough already at the new arrangement, insisting on looking upon it as a direct slight to her in her capacity as nurse. She told Bruce Kelly so too, looking angry and tearful, like a wounded child, but as they were alone together he thought it as well to treat her like a grown-up woman.

"Your husband's condition is worrying me very much, Mrs. Heseltine. He has for some time been slowly reverting to his state when he first came here, and I'm afraid you don't realize how grave that is."

"Oh, yes—I have realized it for a long while! It is you I think who——" she stopped.

"What do you wish to say?"

"That if the injections had been stopped——"

"Yes?" he interrogated with bland and deadly quiet. "Continue, please."

"Probably we would not now have to be stopping the only things that help him at all—good meals, and an occasional glass of stimulant."

There was silence in the room; then Bruce Kelly took up his hat.

"As you seem to have quite finished talking balderdash and trying to teach me my business, Mrs. Heseltine, I'll bid you good morning."

She wept about it to Pam, said she'd been insulted and if it weren't for him she never would have that old bear in the house again.

"All because I fought for you to have your little sundowners and drinks, dearest—which I know do you good—— And you shall have them, too, as long as I'm alive to get them for you."

"I really don't myself think they do me any harm, Doria; in fact, when I've had a bad go of pain a drink is the only thing that pulls me together—so if that's all you're scrapping about with Kelly, it's easily got over. We'll circumvent him."

She clapped her hands, her laugh echoed through the house like a silver chime: "Yes . . . yes . . . we'll circumvent the bear."

And thenceforward it became an exciting sort of game to get in the daily sundowner, the little cup of coffee, the glass of liqueur, at unsuspected moments, dodging the Doctor, and completely deceiving the nurse. They got a lot of fun out of it; at least Doria did. Pam might have got more if from day to day the conviction had not been growing upon him that fun and he would soon be finished with each other forever.

He still rose from bed, which he found an unbearable place, and daily arrangements went on as before, with Nurse Gordon coming and going a little more often than usual, but unable to be there entirely because with the fever season in full swing the hospital was packed and short-handed. Doctor Kelly's hands, too, were overfull with malarial cases. It was comparatively easy for husband and wife to play their little "game" undetected, for Pam found less and less pleasure in anything that he took, except the stimulants his wife managed to convey to him, and his daily agonies became more and more excruciating.

There came a night, however, when after Nurse Gordon had finished with him and gone, Doria did not come at once. It was her custom to lock the front door on the departed nurse, so that they could feel themselves secure from intrusion, and then bring the "port lights" and "danger signals" and all the other materials for an enchanting little orgy on the bedspread. But tonight, though Pam heard the locking of the front door and the slur of his wife's silken draperies in the hall, she did not come immediately, and he was impatient. The rat at his vitals ate more hungrily, bit into him more cruelly than usual, and he wanted something potent to assuage that anguish. Doria's sloe gin would do no good tonight. He must have brandy.

And on the thought he dragged himself out of bed, en route for the dining room where he knew brandy to be. It did not take long to cross the drawing room, then the hall, to where the dining room stood open and lighted up. But when he reached the doorway the sight that presented itself kept him standing, silent and motionless.

Doria, by the sideboard, holding up a

Palm and olive oils —nothing else—give Nature's green color to Palmolive Soap.

Face to Face
—as if you were another girl

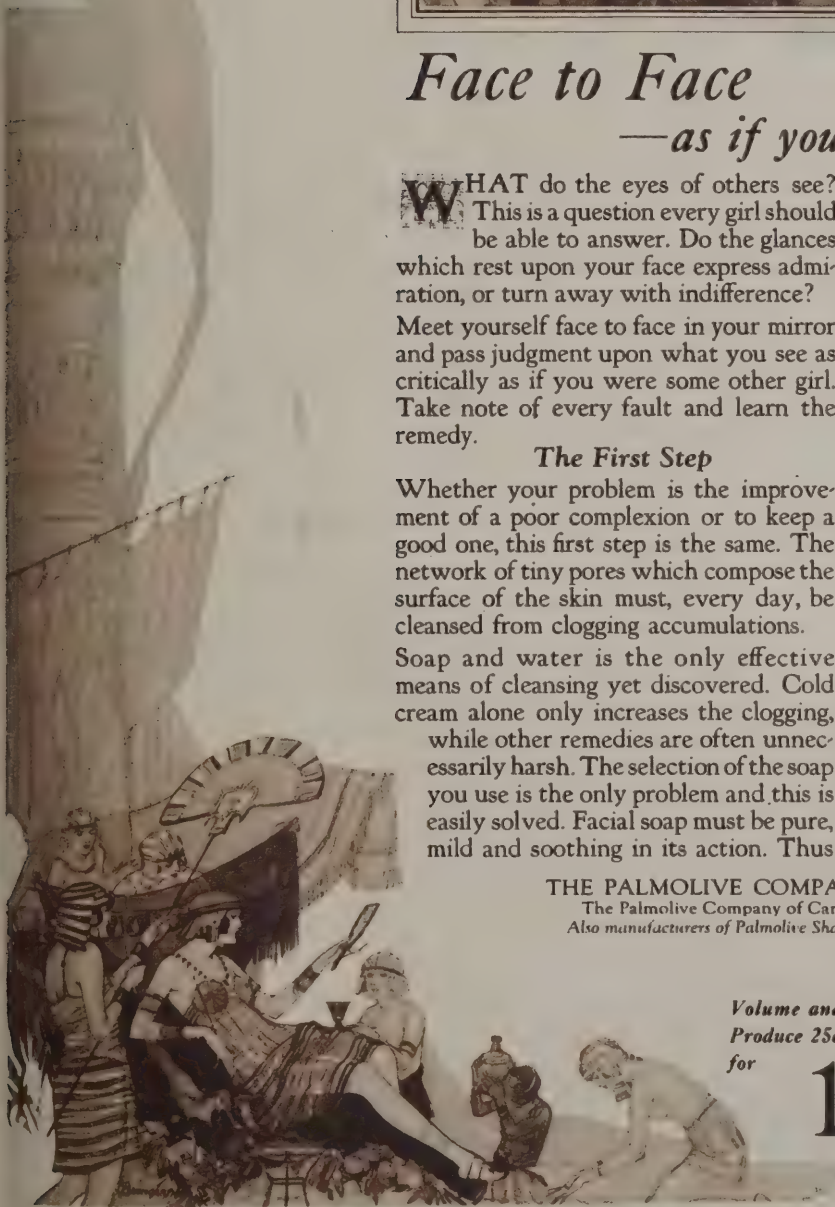
WHAT do the eyes of others see? This is a question every girl should be able to answer. Do the glances which rest upon your face express admiration, or turn away with indifference?

Meet yourself face to face in your mirror and pass judgment upon what you see as critically as if you were some other girl. Take note of every fault and learn the remedy.

The First Step

Whether your problem is the improvement of a poor complexion or to keep a good one, this first step is the same. The network of tiny pores which compose the surface of the skin must, every day, be cleansed from clogging accumulations.

Soap and water is the only effective means of cleansing yet discovered. Cold cream alone only increases the clogging, while other remedies are often unnecessarily harsh. The selection of the soap you use is the only problem and this is easily solved. Facial soap must be pure, mild and soothing in its action. Thus you should select Palmolive. Once a day, and the best time is bedtime, wash your face thoroughly with the profuse, creamy Palmolive lather. Massage it thoroughly into the skin. Then rinse thoroughly and dry with a fine soft towel.



The blend of palm and olive oils has produced the mildest cleanser science can produce.

These rare oriental oils impart their rich, green color to the attractive Palmolive cake. Palmolive green is as natural as the color of grass and leaves.

A 10c Soap

If Palmolive cost many times this modest price it would be considered worth it by the millions of users who find it the only satisfactory soap. But it is these millions who make it possible for us to offer Palmolive at a popular price. The gigantic demand keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night and allows manufacturing economies which makes the 10c price possible.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY, MILWAUKEE, U.S.A.
The Palmolive Company of Canada, Limited, Toronto, Canada
Also manufacturers of Palmolive Shaving Cream and Palmolive Shampoo

Volume and Efficiency Produce 25c Quality for 10c

Copyright 1923 The Palmolive Co. 1769

We have a Gift for You

A beautifully bound copy of

The Pride of Palomar

By

Peter B. Kyne

WE want you to have this book because it will be a valuable addition to your library as well as a fund of present enjoyment for you. So we are offering it to you without charge.

Any book by a writer so well-loved as Peter B. Kyne is bound to be a best seller. But in "The Pride of Palomar" Kyne has put so much of himself, so much of the native Californian's passionate love for his state, so much of sincerity in his expose of the Japanese question in California, that the book is more peculiarly his than anything he has ever done. If you have ever read a Kyne story, or have never read one, you won't want to miss "The Pride of Palomar."

How to Get this Book

IF you will send us the subscription of a friend to Cosmopolitan Magazine we will send you a copy of this great book—or send two subscriptions and get two copies. The subscriptions must be other than your own. Just send us the names and addresses of the friends to whom you want the magazine sent, together with a remittance to cover the cost at $3.00 per subscription. Mail them with the attached coupon. For "The Pride of Palomar" you may substitute: "The Kingdom Round the Corner" by Coningsby Dawson; or "Over Weight?" by Dr. Royal S. Copeland; or "The Vanishing Point" by Coningsby Dawson.

THE pathos of Don Mike's return to his beloved ancestral home from the war after he had been reported killed, only to find his father dead and the ranch in the hands of a man who is planning to colonize it with Japanese; the glory of the fight that he puts up to rid his home of the invaders; the sheer beauty of the pictures of the San Gregorio Valley, of which Don Mike said, "I love every rock and cactus and rattlesnake in it"; or the fine wholesomeness of the love of Don Mike and Kay Parker, daughter of the man who is to dispossess him—it is difficult to tell which of these themes of "The Pride of Palomar" has the most compelling interest. At any rate they all combine to make it a dramatic and stirring tale.

Cosmopolitan Magazine, Dept. 523
119 West 40th Street
New York City

Enclosed find $_____(insert amount of remittance) for which send Cosmopolitan for one year to the friend(s) whose name(s) is (are) on the attached list.
Send me a copy of

_____ } GIVE NAMES OF BOOKS WANTED
_____
_____

*Name*_____

Address _____

*City*_____ State _____

tumblerful of sloe gin—he no longer took it from liqueur glasses—to the light, and letting fall slowly into it, drop by drop, a glorious colored liquid from a little glass bottle. Each drop as it fell between the glass and the light gleamed like a molten rose-red ruby. But the whole performance—the liquid—the color—the little bottle—her concentration—filled Pam with astonishment.

"What on earth? Doria!"

As if the sound of his voice struck her like lightning, her hands fell to her sides, glass and bottle went splintering to the floor, and down her gown, over the carpet everywhere, splashed and spread bright, vivid stains. Strangest of all was her face, riven as if by shock into a mask of terror and surprise, the stiff lips drawn back like those of a panicked animal. Pam Heseltine did not recognize this woman. She was a stranger to him.

"Doria!" he repeated, in a sort of horror.

"What do you want?" she mouthed at him. "You frightened me—you startled me horribly. What do you want?" She stared with hostile eyes, as if he had no right in his own dining room.

"I came for brandy," he said dryly. "I am feeling infernally ill."

She searched his face at that, with a wizened, piercing glance. But already the fearful expression of terror was passing, her features had begun to resume their usual soft beguiling beauty, when suddenly her attention returned to the stains on her wrap, the litter of broken glass about the carpet, and cold fury seemed to rush back to her face and out of her eyes towards him like a torrent.

"What a fool you are!" she cried bitterly, vehemently, as if she could have struck him to earth. Bitterness crept into him too, the coldness of ice round his heart, the old sardonic smile back to his lips. This at least was a Doria he knew well! No stranger here!

"I dare say I am!" he agreed curtly. "That doesn't prevent me from needing brandy, however."

He walked past her to the sideboard, took the decanter, poured himself out a large amount of liquor and drank it neat. When he turned to go back to his room Doria had gone, and he saw no more of her that night.

The climax of "The Garden of Peril" is without question one of the most powerful and revealing studies in character that Cynthia Stockley has ever written. You will not want to miss the last instalment—COSMOPOLITAN for June, on sale at all news stands May tenth stood freshly humbled by such Christian magnanimity. They could only wring the hands of the two, muttering incoherently their thanks.

Mercy

(Continued from page 27)

As he walked away, Walton was thinking: He had wronged two women deeply, irreparably; and now two other women, who knew the secret of this wronging, had agreed to keep it. And they did.

But there was a man—husband or brother or some sort of male relative of these two women—who had also lived in the little hamlet of A——; and in an unfortunate moment he went one Sunday to the Robert N. Walton Bible Class. He came away vowing that he would never go there again; whereupon, in the natural course, after one intervening Sunday, Hollis Gant, a follow-up man from that highly organized class, came seeking him.

Piqued by the refusal either to come again or to give a reason therefor, young Gant persisted to the point of irritating this man who had once resided in the little Hamlet of A——. Angrily he came back with a story, attested by evidence, that staggered Hollis Gant completely. When he had assimilated it somewhat, his anger rose—not against the informer but against the minister who had so deceived him, and not him only.

Hollis Gant was a zealot by nature. Consulting no one, he dashed off a letter to this Reverend Robert N. Walton alias Wills, notifying him that he was found out and that if he did not stand up and tell the Bible class next Sunday morning exactly who and what he was, there were those that would.

How the city in which Walton lived learned of his past, and what they did thereafter, makes the conclusion of this extraordinary fact story next month generously you play into my hands. You confess you employed Pagan to drug me and Mallison to commit a burglary in an attempt to fasten the crime on me—you own your complicity in an even fouler job of blackmail 'framed,' as you would say, for Mrs. McFee—and now you add the capstone!"

The Lone Wolf Returns

(Continued from page 82)

Lanyard checked, then called: "Are you there, Mrs. McFee?"

The portières parted that closed the doorway to the drawing room; Folly entered and halted, her slight figure now decorously clothed but drawn up to the full of its inches and from the crown of the dainty head to the tips of silken slippers tense with contempt, from whose fire, ablaze in her eyes, Morphew had the grace to cringe.

"And now, before this witness," Lanyard pursued, "you add a threat against my life. It's more than I hoped for, Morphew, all I need to insure me a sound night's sleep. If I don't wake up from it unharmed, Mrs. McFee will know what to do. Must you go? Soames, no doubt, is waiting to show you out. But if you'd rather I gave you a lift with my foot——"

Morphew gave an incoherent bellow, lunged blindly to the door, threw it open and himself through to the hall. The very floor of the house itself quaked with the pounding of his feet as he stampeded for open air. The street door banged like thunder while Lanyard stood laughing into Folly's eyes.

CHAPTER XII

BUT Lanyard was one who had learned how to laugh without losing sight of graver matters. So now the surface of his mood alone chimed with Folly's delight in the confusion he had meted out to Morphew; his thoughts were all a ferment with perception of the worth of every instant lost to his first duty, which was straightway to put himself beyond the range of Morphew's exacerbated malice.

Yet he was hardly so concerned with the more serious as to be blind to his closer peril, the glow that warmed Folly's countenance for him beneath the bright ripples of her glee; and in its unmistakable kindness read but one more reason why he must let nothing stand in the way of his prompt going.

The thought took him quickly to the table; he was lifting a hand to the switch of the lamp when Folly caught his arm, both her hands staying him with a gesture as gentle but as importunate as the clasp of tendrils.

"You're wonderful!" she declared in a breath, looking up with round eyes from which mirth had been swift to ebb, "marvelous, the way you managed him, twisted him round your little finger and made him own up to everything! And I'd always considered Morphy a sort of superman, so wise and calm and strong!"

"Never reproach yourself for that," Lanyard replied with a twinkle. "I too was taken in till he made it worth my while to call his bluff. But we must not forget all men are much alike: Morphew will respect me only so long as he fails to find a way to call mine. My one hope is to keep him at a distance—how do you say, over here?—to keep him guessing."

But the young woman wasn't so cheaply to be cheated out of her new-found luxury of hero worship; the dainty dark head dissented vigorously. "Why, Morphy hasn't a chance! you're equal to a dozen of him any day—and as many more Mallisons and Peter Pagans thrown in for good measure. Don't I know? Haven't you proved it here tonight?"

"The night is still young," Lanyard gravely reminded her. "It may tell another tale if Morphew's crew can contrive to lay hands on me before morning."

"After he'd threatened you in front of

The touch of unusual flavor—

Do you know that a STEERO bouillon cube added to hash, stew, soup, or gravy gives a delightful tastiness—the last touch of an unusual flavor? Any warmed-over dish will be more appetizing if flavored with a STEERO bouillon cube.

STEERO
BOUILLON CUBES

Try this—Macaroni Sauce

Melt in frying pan 2 tablespoonfuls butter, adding equal quantity of flour and 1½ cupfuls of milk, stirring till thick. Then add 2 STEERO bouillon cubes dissolved in ½ cup of boiling water.

Send 10 cents for STEERO bouillon cube samples and sixty-four-page cook book

Schieffelin & Co., 287 William St., N.Y.C.
Distributors for American Kitchen Products Co.
New York

20¢ A DAY
PAYS FOR THIS LUXURIOUS
VELOUR SOFA

A thousand other beautiful Furnishings in latest styles. Save big money. Factory-to-Family prices. Pay as little as $3 down. Small monthly payments.

1 to 4 Years to Pay

☐ Symphonola Phonographs ☐ Symphonic Pianos
☐ Symphonic Player Pianos ☐ Furnishings

Check offer interested in and mail this adv. with full name and address TODAY for 104-Page beautifully illustrated FREE Book.

Larkin Co Inc. Desk FCOS-523 Buffalo, N.Y.

PATENTS. INVENTORS should write for Free Guide Books and RECORD OF INVENTION BLANK before disclosing invention. Send model or sketch of your invention for our Free opinion of its patentable nature.
VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
753 Ninth St. Washington, D. C.

A New Perfume

YOU will be delighted to hear of the newest creation of the Rieger laboratories, known for nearly a half century as makers of the choicest perfumes that can be produced. The new odor is

Honolulu Bouquet

Lovers of good perfume are charmed with its fragrance, an exquisitely indescribable mingling of the rarest odors. It is unlike anything you have ever seen before.

Perfume $1.00 per oz. Toilet water, 4 oz. $1.00. Talcum, 25c. At druggists or dept. stores.

Send 25c (silver or stamps) for generous trial bottle. Made by the originator of—

Rieger's
PERFUME & TOILET WATER
Flower Drops

known everywhere as the most precious perfume in the world. Send $1.00 for Souvenir Box of five 25c bottles—5 different odors.

Paul Rieger & Co. (Since 1872) 136 First St., San Francisco

Send 25¢ for TRIAL BOTTLE

me? Nonsense—he simply wouldn't dare—just as you told him."

"My bluff. Not that I mean to give him any opportunity to prove it that. But I will need to move quickly, none the less . . . "

The hint he gave of a desire to disengage her hands got little encouragement; indeed their hold tightened while she mocked his professions with eyes of disturbing admiration and derisive lips: "You're not afraid!"

"But I assure you I am profoundly afraid. I don't say Morphew would be flattered, but I fancy he'd feel far less a fool if he knew how thoroughly I am afraid of him. For we may be sure of one thing; in the event of my becoming an early victim of some curious accident, Morphew's hand would never show. He's not the thundering scoundrel I thought him, but he's far too clever notwithstanding to order a misfortune for me that could possibly be traced to his management. So you see—with permission—I really must be going."

"But where, to be safe?"

Lanyard's expression took on a deeper shade of patience. "Time enough to think about that when I've called at my rooms to collect some belongings."

"But"—Folly held fast to his arm, with a little frown of solicitude to excuse her persistence—"if you feel so sure Morphew means mischief——"

"Do you need more proof than you've had tonight?"

"Then surely he'll have set somebody to watch the house already!"

"The front of it, yes. Precisely why I'm anxious to get away before he can set spies to guard the rear. If you have no objection, I shall leave by one of these windows after putting out the lamp."

"But why?" Folly adorably pouted. "You're safe enough here."

"Madame will forgive if I make so bold as to question that." She let fall her lovely lashes to deny the meaning that informed Lanyard's smile; but still held on. "And every minute I linger makes the danger outside more real."

"Then . . . don't leave at all . . . "

"Madame is generous to a fault. She forgets the world is never broad-minded. There are the servants to be considered, the neighbors——"

"A lot I care what people think; it's you I'm thinking of!"

Suffused with facile emotion, the face at Lanyard's shoulder was that of an exquisite and ingenuous child, vibrant with glad recognition of a world whose wonder and beauty had till that moment been all unsuspected. And the worst of it was, she knew it . . . No; the real worst of it was that it wasn't art, it wasn't put on, she wasn't coquetting; actually she was stirred to the deeps of her being and meant, with all of her, every lovely nuance of her looks. Even Lanyard knew an instant when nothing in life seemed more desirable than those lambent eyes and the yielding mouth whose lips trembled with her hastened breathing . . . His for the taking!

But an instant only; in another he got himself in hand again and steeled his heart to cruel kindness. It went against nature to hurt her; but the hurt would not bite deep, its tonic pang would leave no scar. Not for the first time did life now give him proof of the readiness of a nature emotionally shallow and impressionable to succumb to the glamour of his ill fame as a romantic rogue.

"Madame," said he with genuine reluctance, "would be so much wiser to think first always of herself."

She countered sharply, with a rebellious face: "But I can't help it—can I?—if it's you I must think of first."

"Nor can I help it," he said gently, "if I must always think first of another."

Folly's breathing checked with a sharp little hiss, she released Lanyard's arm and stepped back a pace, coloring but—strangely enough—not in anger.

"Oh!" she cried; and added with a half smile of whimsical self-reproach: "I'd forgotten. So it's true, what Liane told me." She accepted a slow inclination of Lanyard's head, gave a small wistful sigh. "I suppose she must be very beautiful . . . Won't you tell me what she is like?"

"Some day, perhaps," Lanyard vaguely agreed . . . "If you let me live to see another."

"I!"

"There's practically no danger if I may be permitted to say good night without more delay."

"I presume you must . . . " Folly shook her head, with a smile that broke in ruefulness but radiated in unaffected amusement at her own expense. "What a silly you must think me, a sentimental little ninny! No—don't deny it, because you're quite right. So that's that—and what must be, must. Many thanks for my emeralds, Monsieur the Lone Wolf, and"—she dropped him a mischievous courtesy—"more for my lesson! And so—good night."

He waited with intention till, in a gesture of charming petulance, a hand fluttered into his.

"Good night, my dear," Folly murmured tenderly as he bent his lips to her hand, "good by!"

Straightening up, Lanyard turned off the light.

CHAPTER XIII

SOME time after four o'clock the brougham, curbed overlong to pace sedately the interlacing mazes of the Bronx, gave a little start and shudder of pleasure to find itself at last heading into open country, with a soft deep purr crescendo flirted the dust of White Plains from its tires and sped away, ventre-à-terre, upon the highway which, skirting the eastern shores of the Kensico Reservoir, wanders with such a luring, random air the lake country of Westchester.

That day, true to the type of those that render autumn in the northern states the fairest season of the four, had been luminous of sky and languorous with reminiscent warmth. But now, as in a field of pastel tinting ineffably pellucid its sun dipped low to hills whose shadows like vast purple wraiths crept sluggishly across the valleys and their embayed waters, small lakes as still and bright and bleakly blue as plaques of polished steel—now as the dim haze of Indian Summer took on shades of lilac ever deeper and more tender, blotted up all distances and robbed the wooded hillsides of their flaming splendor, premonitions of evening chill lent tang to air aromatic with incense of dead leaves a-smoulder in uncounted pyres.

Of the 1300 Corona stores in the U.S.A., perhaps the most famous is this one—located on 42nd St. near Broadway, New York City.

Let us answer your questions about the New Corona

WHAT ARE THE NEW FEATURES?

1—Automatic Ribbon Reverse, springless and trouble-proof.

2—10-inch Carriage. Wider than in any other portable.

3—High Speed Carriage Return and Line Spacer.

4—Standard Portable Keyboard. The simplest of all keyboards and best adapted to touch-system operation.

HOW DOES CORONA DIFFER FROM OTHER PORTABLE TYPEWRITERS?

The new Corona is really an office typewriter in portable form—complete in every necessary detail and yet so compact and light, you can carry it with you anywhere. It is simpler—more trouble-proof than any other standard typewriter—and it is the only portable that has behind it 16 years of successful experience.

HOW WELL WILL IT STAND UP?

No typewriter in the world has equaled Corona's record for enduring punishment. 30,000 Coronas saw active duty in the war. 500,000 are in use—more than all other makes of portables combined.

WHAT IS THE PRICE? WHERE CAN I SEE IT?

See the new Corona at any one of our 1300 Corona showrooms—from Maine to California—or in your own home, at any time to suit your convenience. Just look up "Corona" in your phone book, or write us for new descriptive literature. $50 still buys Corona, complete with carrying case. In Canada $69.

CORONA TYPEWRITER COMPANY, Inc.

113 Main St., Groton, N.Y. 129 W. 42nd St., New York City

"I never saw a man who looked
With such a wistful eye
Upon that little tent of blue
That prisoners call the sky."
—The Ballad of Reading Gaol

FREE—

"The Story of Oscar Wilde"

This fascinating brochure gives some idea of Wilde's sensational career; it contains "the most pathetic confession in all literature." Read, below, why it is being distributed free.

"I FEAR I am dying as I lived, beyond my means," said Oscar Wilde, before he passed away. It was his last bon mot, so many of which have become famous. He died with his name under a cloud, but not before he had written De Profundis, "a work that has no counterpart in English literature"; The Ballad of Reading Gaol, which critics acclaim as the greatest ballad in the English language; The Importance of Being Earnest, which dramatists themselves assert is the wittiest of all English comedies; not before he had spun some of the tenderest fairy tales written in all the ages. Never was there such a variegated genius as Oscar Wilde and certainly never in the history of literature a more sensational career.

Wilde's case is parallel with that of Poe, DeMaupassant, Rousseau, Coleridge, Dequincey, and many other great masters who lived within the shadows, but whose work is immortal.

A new edition of Wilde is in process that possesses two very unusual features. One is the distinguished company of famous men who have contributed introductions. To list their names is enough. They are: Richard Le Gallienne, Padraic Colum, John Drinkwater, Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, Richard Butler Glaenzer, Coulson Kernahan, Michael Monahan, W. F. Morse, Walter Pater, John Cowper Powys, Edgar Saltus, Clifford Smyth, Arthur Symons, A. B. Walkley, and William Butler Yeats.

The other outstanding feature is that it is to be a Patron's Edition—a genuine de luxe inscribed edition. But instead of limiting the purchasers to a few hundred people of wealth, the edition is to be a larger one, and the price will be no greater than that of any standard set. Never before has it been possible to offer a real de luxe edition—at a price easily within the means of any book-lover.

Will you allow us to send you this interesting book "The Story of Oscar Wilde." It not only gives an insight into Wilde's astonishing career, which one writer has suggested was a case in real life of Jekyll and Hyde; it explains also in detail the nature of this beautiful Patron's Edition. To send for this free book will involve you in positively no obligation; no salesman will call on you; it will be left to your own inclination whether or not you wish to be associated in this unusual enterprise—a truly democratic Patron's Edition. Simply mail the coupon or a letter and the book will be sent immediately.

Doubleday, Page & Company
Dept. 295, Garden City, N. Y.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Dept. 295,
Garden City, N. Y.

Please send, free and postpaid, the little brochure "The Story of Oscar Wilde," and the terms of your new Patron's Edition. It is understood that this request involve me in any obligation whatsoever.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

In the body of the car Lanyard leaned forward and offered to put up the windows. Eve de Montalais gave a slight sign of dissent. "I like it better so, I love this air—if it's not too cold for you, my Michael."

He smiled a negative, and taking the rug from its rail made her snug in it. She lifted her eyes to his in lovely acknowledgment and, emboldened by the closing dusk and the loneliness of that little traveled way, nestled nearer, cheek to his shoulder.

Thus, pensive with the gentle melancholy distilled by that hour of dying beauty, symbolic of the cruel haste with which all beauty passes, the lovers sat a time in silence; so, for that matter, they had, barring a few brief interludes of gossip upon indifferent topics, ever since leaving New York; not that either had too little to say . . .

"Michael: tell me you are happy."

He had to bend his head to hear that whisper, her lips brushed his cheek with a caress so fugitive and light they might have been a moth's fluttering wings.

"Never so happy, Eve."

"Tell me it shall be always so with us. Surely we can make it so . . . "

For all answer she had the tightened pressure of his arm; and, a little chilled with disappointment, she said no more until, after several minutes, Lanyard was moved to wonder aloud: "This country is all strange to my eyes. Where are you taking me?"

"To a far away place I sincerely hope you'll like."

"How should I not, seeing it is your choice?"

"A little old inn, Michael, tucked away in the loneliest hills. We can be quiet there, and talk."

"Talk?" Lanyard made a sad stab at humor to divert her. "Is it kind to encourage my besetting vice?"

"I think," Eve answered, "you have something to tell me tonight."

"But you know it already," he parried poorly in his deep disquietude. "I think you have heard too often what I have to tell you."

As if he hadn't spoken, as if involuntarily giving her heart voice, in a curiously remote tone Eve replied: "We must not part."

Again Lanyard dared not trust his tongue. . .

The afterglow, pulsing through a hundred changes, faded, fainted and contracted, till a long clear pool of emerald alone defined the foot of the sky, the profile of those hills within whose pleats night hung already close and breathless. Through its dark, across gulfs unguessable, lost lights winked, beaconing unknown heights. And the spreading surfaces of still water on every hand, so thickly shadowed as to be more felt than seen, grew wan by degrees with the shine of stars.

Smartly tooled, with the sureness of a swallow's flight the car pursued its fan of yellow light over the intricate meander of the road, its windings, dips and soarings, while ever and again a bend ahead or the summit of some sharp ascent would take sudden shape in a sheen of spectral blue, heralding the advent of twin minor moons which, bearing down upon the brougham with a startling show of destructive mania, would pass harmlessly in a roaring rush; or else some fleeting eye, crimson with anger, would be raised and everhauled and swept astern, metamorphosed into headlights of blank glare rocking in feebly furious emulation of that headlong pace.

The buffeting air grew colder and yet more cold; but neither the man nor the woman minded. His love warm in his arms, Lanyard was trying to live for the moment only, to be oblivious of yesterday and reckless of tomorrow. He failed; impossible for one who loved so well to be deaf to the murmurings of his heart against that resolution which, shaped by his soberest judgment, firmed by his will, bade him put love away tonight forevermore, lest harm befall her in whom love had its source, and whole existence. This evening together must be the last: so he was fixed in his intention. But how tell Eve, how make her understand, win her consent and concurrence?

"Why do you look behind so often, Michael?"

"A bad old habit," Lanyard lied lightly, cursing his stupidity for having let her remark that symptom of a mind perturbed, "a souvenir of bad old days. Jungle folk, they say, never are wholly reclaimed from jungle ways; the instincts of the chase are always cropping up in our least considered actions, we are forever conceiving ourselves, as of old, hunter and hunted in the same skin."

"My poor Michael!" The woman laughed indulgently. "Does he imagine he is deceiving somebody?"

"But do you not forget"—he snatched at a straw—"that there are motor cycle police abroad, even on these back country roads? Naturally one keeps an eye out for them . . . "

For all that Eve had contrived again to put him out of countenance, there had been color of truth in his equivocation which had failed; Lanyard's constant vigilance was more instinctive than excited by any indication either that the car was being trailed or that the riddle of his whereabouts was one of any present interest to those whose malevolence he had sound reason to beware of. Since the previous night nothing had happened to show that Morphew had succeeded in having the devious way traced which Lanyard had taken en route from Folly's residence to his own lodgings and then on to the modest hotel which ultimately had provided him with a bed, or to contradict the inference that Morphew had decided to profit by his lesson in humility and count it cheap at its cost. . . . Than which last Lanyard could not readily imagine any hope more infatuate; life had taught him too well to know the temper of the Morphew breed . . .

It was true, however, that he had been at some pains all day to keep himself rather thoroughly insulated against news from Morphew's side. The story of the recovered emeralds had "broken" too late for the morning papers; and although Crane beyond doubt could have supplied helpful information, Lanyard had been studious to remain lost to that one, too, entertaining as he did not the remotest wish to be haled into court as a witness against Mallison.

Not that conscience reproached for the ruse which had brought about the arrest of the dancing man as the thief of night before last. Even though Mallison might in point of simple fact be innocent of that crime, the severest sentence to which he was liable, if convicted, would be mild ake you hesitate, for fear of giving me in, you wouldn't be trying so hard to lk about everything imaginable but the e thing that counts."

He gave his head a tormented shake. "Is not enough that, the more I weigh the cumstances, the more sure I feel I am ht?—the only way to be fair to you is take myself out of your life."

"But it seems to me I am the one to say at is fair or unfair to me. After all, my ppiness is at stake."

"Not more than mine."

"Much more than yours. You are lfish, Michael—not meaning to be, but cause you would hurt me to my very art to spare yourself self-reproach, if er after our marriage anything should me out of the past to trouble us. As if ything matters to a woman who loves long as she is well loved in return!"

"You make me figure in an unkind ht . . . "

"I am using every weapon I can find in y fight with life for the right to be ppy."

"I would break my own heart rather an cause you an instant's unhappi- ss . . . "

"You think so, dear. But you at least ould have the memory of an act of renun- ation to console you—you could say to urself: I suffer, but for her sake. For e there would be only the knowledge that had been cheated out of my due. I have e right to claim more of life than it has ven me . . . "

The voice of melancholy music faltered, en resumed: "The war took my husband om me before I was old enough to know hat love could mean. Now, long after, I ave found a greater love—and I am re- uired to give it up solely because you are fraid somebody may some day tell me hat I already know, that once upon a me you were a little lower than the ngels!"

To avoid the accusation of her look, anyard stared blindly into the fire.

"I am not good enough for such a love s yours, Eve."

"Perhaps no one of us is good enough r love. Yet we can try to be, by rving . . . "

Lanyard hung his head; and in accents f quiet conviction Eve de Montalais ursued: "Something has happened. I ought so, from your manner this after- oon; now I am sure. It isn't that you ave ceased to care for me——"

"You know it is not that."

"What, then? It must be something uite as serious; you couldn't hold out gainst me as you do if it were anything ss. Michael—you can't refuse to tell me ow."

He made a sign of submission combined ith a plea for time in which to assort his houghts. Indisputably nothing less than he truth would satisfy her; but it might e that something less than the whole ruth, so sure to terrify her, would serve.

And while he sat turning the matter over n his mind, their waiter approached.

"Monsieur Paul Martin?" the man nquired, with an execrable attempt to ive the words a French inflection.

In his abstraction, Lanyard signified an mpatient negative, but Eve de Montalais as less thick-witted.

"What name?" she inquired quickly.

"Paul Martin, ma'am. He's wanted

You wouldn't drink from your saucer

It's NO CRIME to pour tea into the saucer to cool. It doesn't harm anyone. Quite likely George Washington did it in the privacy of Mount Vernon. And yet today a girl might be pretty, sweet, rich and good—and be socially counted a total loss if she did that just once.

It just isn't done. It's one of those things that "place" its perpetrator instantly. It's not good breeding. It's one of those all-important trivialities that mark the ranks of society. No girl can afford to overlook them. No girl can afford to defy them. Society is much too strong and much too merciless for any individual to go contrary to its dictates.

* * *

It's just as bad form to write carelessly on slovenly paper as it is to drink tea from a saucer. Only you don't have an opportunity to see the effect of your "break" mirrored in surrounding eyes. You never know the impression your untidy note makes on the mother of your school friend, or the leader of your club, or the well-set-up young chap you met at Gwen's dance.

Many a girl has cut herself out of a circle of delightful people whom she would have enjoyed, by just being clumsy or careless—once. It's so easy to leave a name off an invitation list. It's so easy not to call. She doesn't know why. And perhaps she goes on making the same careless writing mistakes for quite a long time.

It is the easiest thing in the world to have a correct writing paper—and use it always. It soon becomes a habit. And nothing goes farther in making a good social impression than a letter or acceptance written on the proper paper at the right time.

Make a memorandum today to get a box of Eaton's Highland Linen, made in nothing but the correct shapes, sizes and shades; inexpensive, and on sale everywhere. And—if you're not just sure of up-to-the-moment usage in social forms, send me fifty cents in stamps and I will mail you "Social Correspondence", a dainty little book that answers every possible question, and will also include usable samples of Eaton's Highland Linen.

Caroline De Lancey

Address me in care of
EATON, CRANE & PIKE COMPANY
225 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Eaton's Highland Linen in five smart envelope styles and all the fashionable shades may be bought wherever stationery is sold.

Style is a greater Social Asset than Beauty

EATON, CRANE & PIKE CO.—Sponsors for correctness in Correspondence—NEW YORK-PITTSFIELD, MASS.

Gray Hair Unnecessary

As I Have Proved

I proved it many years ago by restoring the original color to my own prematurely gray hair with the same Restorer I now offer you. This time-tested preparation never fails, as hundreds of thousands of gray haired people since have learned.

There is not space in this advertisement to tell my story. Send for Free Trial bottle and learn all.

FREE Trial Bottle Tells the Story

Mary T. Goldman's Hair Color Restorer is a clear, colorless liquid, clean as water. No greasy sediment to make your hair sticky and stringy, nothing to wash or rub off. Application easy, restored color perfect, in any light. Faded or discolored hair just as surely and safely restored as hair naturally gray.

Experience my teacher

I invented my scientific hair color restorer to bring back the original color to my own hair which was prematurely gray. Since, millions have used it and so will millions more. It is the most popular and biggest selling preparation of its kind in the world.

Now I have something new to offer and almost as important, in the shape of a new preparatory powder which puts your hair in perfect condition for restoration. This powder is a recent discovery of my laboratories and its action is that of tonic and antiseptic. A package now comes with each full sized bottle and a trial sized package is included in my special patented free trial outfit. I urge you to send for this patented outfit today and prove how easily, surely and beneficially you can restore your own gray hair to its natural color.

Mail coupon today

Send today for the special patented Free Trial outfit which contains a trial bottle of my Restorer, and full instructions for making the convincing test on a single lock of hair. Indicate color of hair with X. Print name and address plainly. If possible, enclose a lock of your hair in your letter.

Mary T. Goldman's
Hair Color Restorer
Over 10,000,000 Bottles Sold

FREE TRIAL COUPON — Please print your name and address

MARY T. GOLDMAN,
42E Goldman Bldg., St. Paul, Minn.

Please send your patented Free Trial Outfit. X shows color of hair. Black.... dark brown.... medium brown.... auburn (dark red).... light brown.... light auburn (light red).... blonde....

Name.....

Street..... City.....

LOFTIS BROS. & CO. SINCE 1858

We import Diamonds direct from European markets and sell direct to you by mail. Our immense BUYING POWER is a great saving to you.

DIAMONDS WATCHES CASH or CREDIT

"Charlotte" Diamond Ring
Five radiant, blue white, perfect cut Diamonds. The ring is platinum.
$150
Others at $200 and $250

SEND FOR CATALOG

Bargains in Diamond-set Jewelry, Watches, Wrist Watches, Pearls, Mesh Bags, Silverware, etc. Sent prepaid for your Examination. Easy Credit Terms. Catalog explains everything.

Wrist Watch Rectangular Shape
18-K Solid White Gold, 17 Jewels, $39
14-K Solid White Gold, 15 Jewels, $32

MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

Credit Terms on all articles; One-fifth down, balance divided into equal payments within eight months. Your credit is good with LOFTIS.

LOFTIS BROS & CO. SINCE 1858
THE NATIONAL JEWELERS
Dept. N-892 108 N. State St.
CHICAGO, ILL.
Stores in Leading Cities

on the telephone—a long distance call."

"From New York?"

"I don't know, ma'am, the party didn't say, just asked for Monsieur Paul Martin—party with a sort of a foreign accent, French, I guess."

Eve looked sharply to Lanyard: "It is for you—you must answer it." He responded with a puzzled nod, though his memory needed no more jogging. But was it possible? he wondered as he followed the waiter to the telephone booth in the office of the inn. Aside from Eve and himself, that alias of a day long past was known to but three people in the world; and of these one was in London and one in Paris, at last accounts, while the third was in New York . . .

But if Liane knew where he was dining, so far away from town, she must have been informed by somebody who had followed him without his knowledge!

Not the voice of Liane, but a man's saluted him above the humming of the long distance wire, a man's voice with, as the waiter had indicated, a strong tinge of nasal French.

"Monsieur Paul Martin?"

"Yes. Who wants him?"

"I am spikin' for 'is sister. Ees this Monsieur Martin spikin'?"

It was Liane who for her own ends had nominated herself the sister of Monsieur Paul Martin, one day in Paris long ago.

Lanyard answered "Yes."

"Pardon, monsieur—your sister ees too beesy now to telephone you 'erself. She have ask me to geev you a message."

"Monsieur is most amiable," Lanyard replied in French. "What is the message, please?"

"Prenez garde!"

"What did you say?"

"Bon soir."

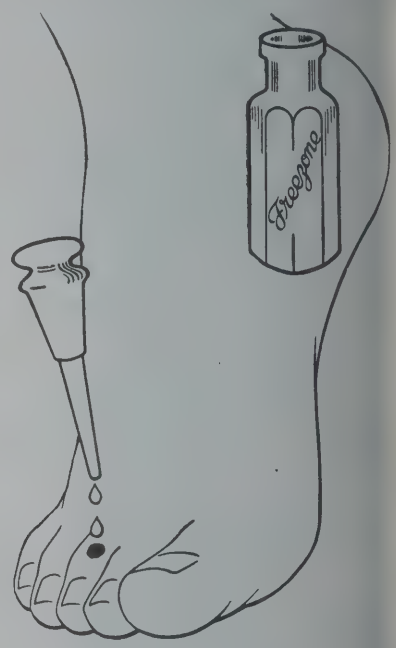
"Hello! hello!"

But Lanyard worried the hook in vain; the other had hung up, the wire was closed. . .

Prenez garde—take care!



CHAPTER XIV

LANYARD took back to Eve by the fire the most dégagé manner he could manage, a manner of leisured good humor that wasn't all put on at the prompting of amour propre, that was assumed less in hope of hoodwinking her ingenious intuitions than for the benefit of their fellow guests, if so be it these entertained any latent interest in the reactions of Michael Lanyard to a long distance call for "Monsieur Paul Martin," and that dissembled better than he believed a sense of discouragement the most devastating he had ever known—not on his account alone so much as that he was not alone.

The quandary in which he found himself trapped, now that his eyes had been opened by that singular admonition from out of the night, at once cryptic and only too intelligible, was one that defied and, what was worse, promised persistent defiance to the utmost of his resources, from which extrication with credit to himself—or, if it came to that, with his life—seemed out of the question. Not that he put life first; his solicitude was nine parts unselfish, his disheartenment the fruit of inability to hit on any pretext that conceivably would induce Eve to part then and there with one whose company had all at once become

Corns

Lift Off with the Fingers

Doesn't hurt a bit! Drop a little "Freezone" on an aching corn, instantly that corn stops hurting, then shortly you lift it right off with fingers. Your druggist sells a tiny bottle of "Freezone" for a few cents, sufficient to remove every hard corn, soft corn, or corn between toes, and calluses, without pain, soreness

Beauty Culture Course at Home
Easy to Earn $40 to $75 a Week

Secrets of beauty parlors revealed. Thirty easy lessons can make you expert in all branches, massage, packs, dyeing, marcel, skin work, manicure, waves, bleach etc. in eight weeks. Study in spare time. Earn while you learn. Authorized diploma. Money back guarantee. 50,000 Opportunities. Get FREE Book

ORIENTAL SYSTEM OF BEAUTY CULTURE
Dept. 175 1000 Diversey Blvd. Chicago

This summer—a different vacation for you. See page 171.

Are You At Ease

It is so necessary to have a smooth, white underarm in this season's sheer fabrics—and it's so easy. Beauty experts recommend

DEL-A-TONE

It is a preparation made scientifically correct for the purpose of safely removing hair from the face, neck, or underarms. It leaves the skin clear, firm and perfectly smooth—and is easy to apply.

Druggists sell Delatone; or an original 1 oz. jar will be mailed to any address on receipt of $1.

SHEFFIELD PHARMACAL CO.
536 Lake Shore Drive, Chicago

equivalent to a pistol trained on her heart point-blank—and with a finger both pitiless and anonymous trembling on the trigger.

A strong statement, but one that by no means painted their predicament an exaggerated black. His "sister" had never played her confreres false or resorted to subterfuge so subtle to put "Monsieur Paul Martin" on his guard against a nebulous or trifling menace. Liane owed Lanyard much on an old score; she would have been faithless to the code of her kind had she, having definite foreknowledge of it, permitted so good a friend to go blindly to meet the fate prepared for him, whatever that might be.

Such women are nevertheless jealous wardens of their own welfare; it had required perception of a peril to Lanyard immediate and desperate to work Liane up to the point of chancing the resentment of Morphew and his crew should her treachery ever transpire. Witness the extravagant pains she had taken to disguise her hand.

No; it would never do to underprize this proof of good will or to read in Liane's warning any spirit but one of the most earnest anxiety. Taken as she had unquestionably intended it, her "prenez garde" decoded somewhat to this effect: You are sadly self-deluded, my friend, if you think Morphew resigned to stomach defeat at your hands, or that you have succeeded in keeping your movements hidden from him; he has never for an instant lost sight either of you or of his revenge, he is playing you as heartlessly as an angler plays a trout, gaff in hand—you must go warily to cheat its barbs.

The dilemma thus exposed was appalling; a clean breast of all he had been trying to hide from her was unavoidable if he hoped to make Eve comprehend why he held it imperative to seek each a separate way back to New York; whereas, once she did grasp the fact that danger threatened him, she would surely refuse to let him risk it alone. Women of her rare stamp are never readily dismayed or disposed to think first of themselves if a frown of physical peril shadow also one by whom their affections have been engaged . . . Regard the spirit that poised Eve then in that juncture, awaiting his return with a countenance as composed as it was fair, with eyes unclouded by any confession of impatience or misgivings.

"Sorry I was so long," Lanyard said, with intention to be heard across the dining-room. "I stopped to pay the bill and order the car brought round. If you don't mind . . . "

"It's quite time," Eve amiably agreed, "if we're to get home at any respectable hour."

He resumed his chair before the fire and made business with cigarette case and a match to cover sidelong scrutiny of the four patrons who had come in so soon after his arrival with Eve, and who remained still at table, dawdling with dessert. But he couldn't see that his announcement had meant anything to these . . .

The one woman of their number was a creature of strapping comeliness, whose hail-fellow swagger was brazen, that had been piquant in the flapper she heavily aped; while the men were such as would hardly have won a second glance on any ordinary occasion, types of the American

Posed by May Allison, attractive star of Metro motion pictures. Miss Allison is one of many charming women "in pictures" who use and endorse Ingram's Milkweed Cream for promoting beauty of complexion.

Springtime—does it restore the glow of youth to your cheeks?

AFTER a winter spent inside, after a season of indoor activities—what of your complexion?

Do spring sunshine and balmy air restore freshness to a sallowed skin? Does your complexion grow fair and radiant?

You can aid nature to bring back a fresh, healthy glow to your cheeks. You can attain new beauty of complexion if you begin at once the daily use of Ingram's Milkweed Cream.

Ingram's Milkweed Cream, you will find, is more than a face cream—more than a cleanser. It has an exclusive therapeutic property which serves to refresh and nourish the skin cells—to "tone-up," revitalize. the clogged, sluggish tissues of the skin. Applied regularly it soothes away redness and roughness, heals tiny imperfections—restores healthy charm to your skin.

For the most effective way in which to use Ingram's Milkweed Cream, read Health Hints, the little booklet packed with every jar. It has been prepared by specialists to insure that you get from Ingram's Milkweed Cream the utmost benefit.

Go to your druggist today and purchase a jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream in the fifty-cent or one-dollar size. Begin now to gain the fresh, wholesome complexion, the clear, soft skin that should be yours.

Ingram's Rouge—"Just to show the proper glow" use a touch of Ingram's Rouge on the cheeks. A safe preparation for delicately emphasizing the natural color. Offered in thin, artistic metal vanity-box, with large mirror and pad—does not bulge the purse. Five perfect shades, subtly perfumed—Light, Rose, Medium, American Blush and Dark—50c.

Ingram's Face Powder—A complexion powder especially distinguished by the fact that it stays on. Furthermore, a powder of unexcelled delicacy of texture and refinement of perfume. Four tints—White, Pink, Flesh, Brunette—in striking container, 50c.

FREDERICK F. INGRAM COMPANY
Established 1885
40 TENTH STREET, DETROIT, MICHIGAN

Canadian residents address F. F. Ingram Company, Windsor, Ontario. British residents address Sangers, 42A Hampstead Rd., London, N. W. 1. Australian residents address Law, Binns & Co., Commerce House, Melbourne. New Zealand residents address Hart, Pennington, Ltd., 33 Ghuznee Street, Wellington. Cuban residents address Espino & Co., Zulueta 36½, Havana.

Ingram's
Milkweed
Cream

Send a dime for Ingram's Beauty Purse—An attractive souvenir packet of the exquisite Ingram Toilet-Aids. Mail the coupon below with a silver dime and receive this dainty Beauty Purse for your hand bag.

FREDERICK F. INGRAM CO., 40 Tenth St., Detroit, Mich.

Gentlemen: Enclosed please find one dime, in return for which please send me Ingram's Beauty Purse containing an eiderdown powder pad, sample packets of Ingram's Face Powder and Ingram's Rouge, a sample tin of Ingram's Milkweed Cream, and, for the gentleman of the house, a sample tin of Ingram's Therapeutic Shaving Cream.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

Quickly Removes All Stains and Marks

For one purpose only—Sani-Flush. It cleans the toilet. Swiftly, easily it removes all stains, discolorations, incrustations. No scrubbing. No scouring. No hard work.

The bowl shines!

The trap—hidden, unhealthful—is reached and cleaned only by Sani-Flush. All foul odors are destroyed. There is no other preparation made that does this work.

The ease of using it—just sprinkle Sani-Flush into the bowl. Follow directions on the can. Flush! It will not harm plumbing connections. Always keep Sani-Flush handy in the bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. If you cannot get it at your regular store, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full-sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
Canton, Ohio

Foreign Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd.
Toronto, Canada
33 Farringdon Road, London, E. C. 1, England
China House, Sydney, Australia

Sani-Flush
Reg U S Pat Off
Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

Moore Push-Pins
Glass Heads-Steel Points
Moore Push-less Hangers
To hang up things
Ask your dealer to show them
Sold Everywhere 10¢ per packet
Moore Push-Pin Co.
Wayne Junction Philadelphia

Reduce Your Flesh in Spots
Arms Legs Bust Double Chin
in fact the entire body or any part without dieting by wearing DR. WALTER'S Medicated Reducing
RUBBER GARMENTS

Bust Reducer, $6.00
Chin Reducer, $2.50
Anklets
or Reducing and Shaping the Ankles, $7.00 per pair. Extra high $9.00
Send ankle measurement when ordering

Send for illustrated Booklet
DR. JEANNE C. WALTER
353 5th Ave., New York

bourgeois case-hardened by "good business," clothed in a weirdly uniform mode of smartness, something stale with overfeeding and drinking and fondling, wanting stimulation yet inclined to grow causelessly arrogant in their cups. But Lanyard was too well learned in the ways of urban America not to know that its Apaches seldom if ever conform to the cliché of the cinema when it turns its cyclopædic if gullible eye on what it knows as denizens of the underworld. The gunman of New York is blown with pride of caste; for all that, he isn't keen on bidding for the attention of the police by sporting the conventionalized make-up of a suspicious character—he far prefers to pass in a crowd as a simple man in the street normally addicted to the machine-made "clothing of distinction" of the magazine advertisements. The fact, then, that these three were apparently nobodies in particular minding their own business didn't necessarily mean that Lanyard could afford to dismiss them from his calculations.

Neither did he, careful though he was to give no excuse for the suspicion that he had a thought to spare from the woman at his side.

"There is no one like you," he was saying in gallant repayment of her steadfast and demanding attention: "the loveliest woman that ever breathed, the most adorably patient . . . "

"How little you know me," she calmly commented, unflattered, so undistracted, "at least, if you expect me to believe you think me patient. Then your message was important?"

"Very," the man admitted gravely; the time was by when fencing were anything but waste of time. "I am worried about getting you back to town . . . "

"So it was Mademoiselle Delorme!"

"That only goes to show," Lanyard remarked obliquely, "one should never tell you anything one expects you to forget."

"I have forgotten nothing you have ever told me about yourself—nothing, at least, that had to do with another woman's affection for you."

"Yet you are incapable of jealousy."

"Still, I am very greedy. I don't like sharing even the least of your thoughts with any other woman."

"Oh!" he laughed; "but Liane isn't a woman, except professionally."

"You are tantalizing me all the same when you don't tell me what she had to say—and how in heaven's name she guessed you were dining here—and why she resurrected that old nom de guerre instead of calling for you by your right name."

"I'm afraid Liane didn't guess; I suspect somebody who knew told her we had stopped here to dine——"

The teasing half smile with which Eve had been regarding her lover was erased. "You think we were followed——"

"How else could they have known?"

"'They'?"

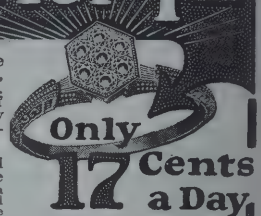
"Who informed Liane."

"But why should she have harked back to 'Paul Martin'?"

"I fancy her reason for that is implicit in Liane's message, a brief one—delivered, if it matters, by a stranger's tongue—'prenez garde.'"

Eve nodded thoughtful confirmation of a private conjecture. "You are in some danger?" Not at all deceived by the shrug that sought to depreciate the weight of that

Beau Brummell
Liquid Nail Polish



FOR a soft, gleaming polish that lasts for several days without peeling use Beau Brummell Liquid Nail Polish. It protects the nails and keeps the cuticle smooth and soft.

And Beau Brummell is quick. It gives the nails a delicate tint and a wonderful polish in just twenty seconds. Price 50c at drug, department stores or by mail.

Send a dime today for a generous sample. And for another dime you will receive a sample of Isabel Cassidy's Depilatory Powder.

ROELLY CHEMICAL CO.
74 Grand Street, New York

Sent for $1.00

7-Diamond Solitaire Cluster set in Platinum, resembles a two ct. Single Stone. Shank of Green Gold, artistically hand-carved and engraved. Only $52.50.

Only $1.00 down and 17 cents a day! On these amazingly easy terms you can buy this beautiful Diamond Ring. Shipment is made the moment your dollar reaches us—then if you're satisfied, pay the balance in ten months. Otherwise, return. No risk—no delay—transactions strictly confidential.

Only 17 Cents a Day

Diamond Book FREE
Contains nearly 3,000 illustrations of exquisite Diamonds, Watches and Jewelry—all on ten months' credit. Write for copy No. 83-K

THE HOUSE OF QUALITY
CAPITAL $1,000,000.
L·W·SWEET INC.
1650-1660 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

A Spare-Time Job That Means Money

It's waiting for a word from you. You will need no experience—you will not have to serve an apprenticeship.

If you are just starting in life it will make possible a college education—if you have a family it will mean more comfort for them. It will mean MORE MONEY, in any event, to use in the hundreds of places most of us need it.

And the work is pleasant and easy—it will not use up the energy that you need for your regular tasks.

Write today for details of our plan for increasing your earnings by paying for your spare time

Agency Bureau, Dept. AC523
International Magazine Co.
119 W. 40th St. :: New York, N. Y.

term, she glanced quickly to and from the little party that was, just then, loudly making merry at its table across the room. In response, another movement of Lanyard's shoulders disclaimed intelligence: "Perhaps . . . Who knows?"

"You must tell me everything . . . "

"I know; but it's a fairish yarn, and the car ought to be here any minute—I'll hardly have time before we leave. So let me first of all throw myself upon your mercy, Eve, beg you to trust me."

"But you know I do, in every way."

"I mean, trust me to know what is best . . . "

Analysis of this ambiguity knitted a speculative frown. "You're going to ask something of me I won't want to do."

"It is dangerous for us to attempt the journey back to New York together."

"Dangerous," Eve objected, "isn't definite enough . . . "

"It would appear that one whom I have recently been obliged to humiliate plans to pay me out tonight. He will fail—trust me for that—but I shall be more free to make him see the error of his ways if I can feel sure the harm meant for me can't by mischance be visited upon you instead."

"Ah, no, my friend! You don't seriously think I will consent . . . "

"You would not hesitate if I could only make it clear how much better my chances would be."

"I'm afraid it's a hopeless task, but"—she made her smile provoking—"suppose you try."

"Conceive, then"—Lanyard spoke deliberately in an endeavor to put the business in a nutshell—"that after leaving you night before last I was thrown in with one who chose to declare war on me for his own ends——"

"The Sultan of Loot!"

"Why try to keep anything from you?"

"You forget, I too had a premonition concerning that creature. Who is he?"

"I can more easily tell you what he is. He styles himself Morphew and the Tenderloin calls him King of the Bootleggers—justly, one is told. In addition, he nurses a penchant for having a finger in every lawless pie. To discipline me, that night, he caused the loot of a burglary to be hidden in my pockets while I lay in a stupor, drugged by his direction, then saw to it that I was suspected of having committed the theft."

"Oh, no!" the woman interrupted involuntarily, revolted by the bare suggestion of such enormity.

"Or else—I must believe I stole the jewels myself in instinctive reversion to old ways, drink having abolished the inhibitions of the new."

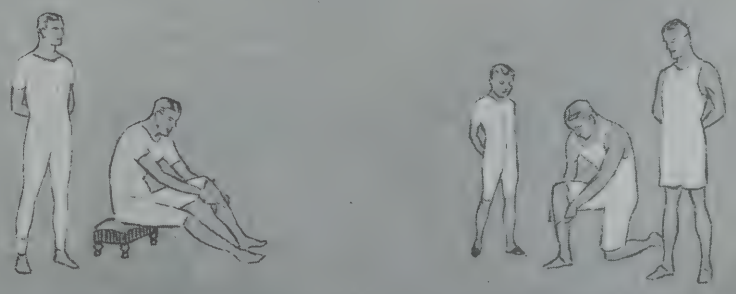
"Never!"

"I do not know," Lanyard confessed with a wry face. "There are circumstances which make me uneasy . . . I do not know!"

"How can you even suggest such a thing!"

"Let me tell you . . . Last night I visited—or revisited!—the house from which the jewels had been stolen, meaning secretly to restore them. This I managed. I was even more fortunate in being able to bring about the arrest of one of Morphew's lot as the burglar of fact—which the fellow may well have been. Finally, to confuse pursuit, I quitted the house by the way the burglar had taken the night before—

DON'T SAY UNDERWEAR—SAY MUNSINGWEAR



MUNSING WEAR

Quality assures Comfort and Service

FORM FITTING KNITTED LOOSE FITTING WOVEN GARMENTS IN THE MODISH STYLES

THE MUNSINGWEAR CORPORATION
MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA

Claire Windsor—Goldwyn Star whose eyes are famous for their beauty.

Eyes that say "Come Again!"

WHEN your lips say "Good-Night," do your eyes say, "Come Again"? Are your glances provocative, alluring, irresistible?

You can make your eyes look deeper, lovelier, by veiling them with dark, shadowy lashes. Use WINX, the Liquid Lashlux. Apply it with the glass rod attached to the stopper; it will bead the lashes instantly, making them appear darker and heavier. And it's waterproof—even swimming or weeping at the theatre will not affect it. Absolutely harmless.

WINX, the Liquid Lashlux (black or brown), 75c. To nourish the lashes and promote their growth, use Cream Lashlux at night. Cream Lashlux (black, brown or colorless), 50c. At drug or department stores or by mail.

ROSS COMPANY
74 Grand Street New York

Send a dime for a sample of WINX, the Liquid Lashlux. And for another dime we will mail you a generous sample of Pert, the waterproof rouge.

WINX
The Liquid Lashlux

Shampooing
A task half done

Noted actresses all recognize the fact that hair to be beautiful needs more than just shampooing. They have no more choice in the color of their hair than you have. Their hair is more beautiful, because their profession — their very environment — soon teaches them how to make the best of what nature has given them.

Practically every woman has reasonably good hair — satisfactory in quantity, texture and color. So-called dull hair is the result of improper care. Ordinary shampooing is not enough; just washing cannot sufficiently improve dull, drab hair. Only a shampoo that adds "that little something" dull hair lacks, can really improve it.

Golden Glint Shampoo was made particularly for medium brown hair—to make it look brighter and more beautiful. When your hair appears lifeless, all you need do is have a Golden Glint Shampoo. It does more and IS more than an ordinary shampoo. With it you can correct—correct, mind you—any little shortcomings your hair may have. It places your hair in your own hands, so to speak.

Have a Golden Glint Shampoo today and give your hair the special treatment which is all it needs to make it as beautiful as you desire it. 25c a package at toilet goods counters or postpaid direct. J. W. Kobi Co., 131 Spring St., Seattle, Wash.

The best summer vacation you ever had! Let us help you. See page 171.

Neet was a Revelation

"I had tried all the methods I had ever heard of to remove surplus hair, and was ready to give up in despair. Then one day a friend of mine told me about Neet.

"Honestly, it was a revelation! Imagine—a smooth, daintily scented cream, that you spread on, let stay for a few minutes and then—wash off and all hair with it!

"And to think that I had spent as high as five and even ten dollars at a time for troublesome and dangerous hair removers that didn't remove. But now—thanks to Neet—my troubles are over, and I can be proud of my arms instead of ashamed of them."

Used by physicians. Money back if it fails to please. 50c at drug and Dept. stores. Trial tube 10c by mail.

Hannibal Pharmacal Co. 667 Olive, St. Louis

In Canada—60c, trial size 10c. McGillivray Bros., Ltd. Agents, 184 Bay Street, Toronto, Can.

Physicians Note—A liberal trial tube with complete instructions for use will be mailed without charge to any physician requesting it.

Neet
Removes Hair Harmlessly

let myself out of a back window to the roof of an extension, dropped down to a backyard, scaled a board fence and stole through an excavation for a new building to the street beyond. Eve . . . "

Lanyard faltered and worked his hands together, his features wrung, haunted eyes reflecting the enigma of the embers which held their stare. And with a gesture of quick sympathy, the woman sat forward to screen him. But these others seemed to be completely preoccupied with their own hilarious concerns; and the racket of congenial voices they raised must have prevented their overhearing anything of Lanyard's confession when at length he resumed.

"Up to that time," he said slowly, "I had hardly questioned the assumption that Morphew deliberately had schemed to victimize me . . . But then, while I was creeping away from that house, quite literally like a thief in the night—once upon the roof, again when I stood in the kitchen yard, looking back at the blank rear windows, and yet again while stumbling through that foundation pit beyond the fence—at every stage of that journey I knew a feeling as of doing something I had done before, repeating the identical gestures I had employed at another time, upon an occasion strangely forgotten . . . "

"Well?" the woman prompted in cool amusement.

"Well!"—his wistful smile sketched a graphic expression of bewilderment—"I do not know, perhaps it was true, perhaps . . . "

Careless whether they were observed, the woman leaned forward and lightly covered one of his hands with her own. "Poor dear!" she cried, with a thrill of fond laughter, "to let himself be so tormented by a sensation such as everybody has at times!"

"Everybody?" he iterated, in a stare.

"It happens to us all—has it never happened to you before?—a phenomenon so common the psychologists have a special name for it. What do they call it? Reflex memory? Something of the sort, I forget . . . One only needs a new scene and a mood especially susceptible to impressions of strangeness or beauty—and all at once one feels quite sure one has visited that very spot in some previous existence. Precisely that happened to you last night, my Michael, in your super-excited state of mind, worried by ignorance of the truth about the stolen property in your possession . . . Take my word for it!"

"You believe that?" he insisted. "Truly?"

"Truly, my dear."

"You don't think I could possibly——"

"Never—I know you better than you do yourself." Eve gave his hand a comforting pressure, and sat back. "If you let anything so absurd fret you another instant I shall be very cross with you."

"You make me very happy," Lanyard said. "It cost me something to tell you . . . "

"I know!"

"I don't deserve such faith."

"But I don't consider you a good judge of your own worth, dear. And now that I understand the situation—you've made a fool and an enemy of this man Morphew, and he's conspiring to be revenged—tell me, what is it you have to propose about returning to town?"

"I want you to let me find my way back alone. I have consulted road maps and time tables posted in the office here. There's a train for New York from the nearest station"—Lanyard glanced at the watch on his wrist—"in about half an hour . . . Which reminds me, your driver is taking his time."

"Patience. He's forever tinkering with the motor—he'll be ready any minute. You were saying——"

"I want you to let me drop you at the railroad and take the train back to town, with your chauffeur for protection, while I go on in the car."

Undisguised derision honored this proposal. "But why should I, when it is you, not I, the Sultan of Loot is after? If the train can be considered safe, surely you're the one——"

"You forget, Morphew's people will aim at your motorcar, believing me to be in it whether I am or not. If I should succeed in leaving it unobserved, they would still pursue the car. You can't ask me to expose you to a danger from which I turn tail."

"Then why shouldn't we both take the train?"

"It is what you Americans call an accommodation—stops at every station. If we should abandon your car to be found near the railroad, it would be too simple to have the train anticipated by telephone, boarded somewhere between here and New York and the two of us kept so closely watched we would have no chance . . . "

The woman's head described a sign of flat rejection, Lanyard's rueful recognition of an outcome foreseen.

"Impossible, my friend! I couldn't dream of leaving you to shift for yourself."

"But how else?"

"I have a saner scheme. Why not stop here for the night? The inn must have accommodations . . . You see!" Eve cried in laughing triumph, "you are trying to get rid of me when the truth is you need me. Two heads are better than one . . . But why shake yours so dourly?"

"I am afraid of your plan for more reasons than one. Daylight for our return will hardly be the same thing as accident insurance. If you give me my choice, I like darkness better."

"And your other reasons?"

"If I stop here overnight, where I am beyond much doubt under surveillance even now, I remain placed and give Morphew just so much more time to close his net round me. And nothing I know of makes this inn a sanctuary or guarantees the bona fides of the management."

"You don't mean to say you think the people who run this place——"

"I have been taught to trust nobody at times like this. More than that, everybody knows most of these resorts in and about New York that openly flout the Prohibition Amendment are actively in league with if not actually owned by bootlegging interests. I will breathe more comfortably, I promise you, when—and if—we are permitted to go our way unhindered."

"Oh, but surely you exaggerate!"

"Possibly; it's not always a bad fault, by no means so bad as under-exaggeration when one's neck is concerned. However, it can't be long now before we know."

Seeing their waiter approach, Lanyard got up and took Eve's wrap from the back of her chair. But the natural expectation

First Aid for home hurts

No injury is trivial when the consequences of its neglect are considered. A cut, scratch, bruise, strain or sprain demands prompt attention and treatment.

Too often is precious time lost in such emergencies. An antiseptic or a liniment may be required, or both! Have you these home necessities combined in one preparation—quickly available in one container?

Its convenience is but one of many reasons why Absorbine, Jr. occupies a never-empty place in so many thousands of homes.

It is because Absorbine, Jr. is safe that children are taught its use as an antiseptic—to cleanse, to guard against infection and to assist nature in more rapid healing.

It is because parents prefer its clean, agreeable odor that Absorbine, Jr. is used as a liniment to ward off stiffness, lameness and soreness after hard or prolonged exertion, and to treat congestion after exposure.

Have it at hand for the emergencies to come!

At most druggists', $1.25, or postpaid. Liberal trial bottle 10c., postpaid.

W. F. YOUNG, Inc., 66 Temple St., Springfield, Mass.

Absorbine Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL
Sold Everywhere

CASH'S WOVEN NAMES
Save Laundry Losses
3 doz. $1.50 6 doz. $2.75
9 doz. $3.50 12 doz. $4.
Write for styles
Branch Factories: Los Angeles, Cal. Brantford, Ont.
J. & J. CASH, Inc. Ninth Street South Norwalk, Conn.

SHORT-STORY WRITING
A practical forty-lesson course in the writing and marketing of the Short-Story taught by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, Editor of The Writer's Monthly.
150 page catalog free. Please address:
THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
Dr. Esenwein Dept. 100 Springfield, Mass.

We Start You in Business, furnishing everything; men and women, opportunity lifetime to earn handsome income operating our "New System Specialty Candy Factories" anywhere. Booklet free.
HILLYER-RAGSDALE CO., East Orange, N. J.

The Joy of Playtime Days is made perfect by the bounding health that Analax helps to bring.

Give your children the delicious fruit-flavored laxative that acts so pleasantly and effectively. It's a few grains of prevention—better than many pounds of cure. At all druggists.

FREE: ANALAX booklet and samples on request. Write to McKesson & Robbins, Inc., 91 Fulton St., N. Y. City

Nothing Acts like
ANALAX

Gray Hair or— Ageless Hair

THIS beautiful woman has chosen wisely. She enters the "golden age of womanhood" with face and figure as charmingly youthful as at twenty. Her hair shows no trace of the flight of time.

Brownatone, the safe hair tint, insures restoration of natural shades to faded, streaked, gray or bleached hair. It is easily applied and guaranteed harmless.

BROWNATONE

TINTS GRAY HAIR ANY SHADE

Thousands of America's best women keep their youth and beauty by use of this tried and trustworthy preparation. At all dealers—50c & $1.50. Trial bottle direct 10c.

THE KENTON PHARMACAL COMPANY

281 Coppin Building, Covington, Ky. Canada Address: Windsor, Ont.

NaTone Lemonated Shampoo, nature's hair wash, cleanes and beautifies. At dealers or direct 50c.

$3 DOWN BRINGS YOU GENUINE UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER

Standard Underwoods, factory rebuilt and guaranteed for FIVE YEARS. They look, write and wear like new. Latest models, perfect machines in every respect. See for yourself. Only $3.00 brings the machine. Try it ten days at our expense. Get all the facts now. Big illustrated typewriter book and bargain offer FREE. Write today.

Actual reproduction of Shipman-Ward Rebuilt Underwood.

Shipman-Ward Mfg. Co.

Typewriter Emporium

2075 Shipman Building, Montrose and Ravenswood Aves., Chicago

MAKE MONEY AT HOME

We Pay 15 to 50 Dollars Weekly for Spare Time Work at Home Writing Show Cards—No Canvassing—Experience Unnecessary—Write Today.

United Show Card System

229-J Dinan Building, Detroit, Michigan

12 Months to Pay

You can easily earn money for the small payments. Parents often advance first payment to help buy a RANGER, 44 styles, colors and sizes. Factory to Rider prices. Delivered FREE, express prepaid, for 30 DAYS' TRIAL. Terms to suit—cash or easy payments.

Tires lamps, wheels, horns, repairs and equipment at half usual prices. SEND NO MONEY. Write today for our big, Free Ranger Catalog and marvelous prices.

Mead Cycle Company Dept. T-33 Chicago

Write us today for free catalog

High School Course in 2 Years

You can complete this simplified High School Course at home inside of two years. Meets all requirements for entrance to college and the leading professions. This and thirty-six other practical courses are described in our Free Bulletin. Send for it TODAY.

AMERICAN SCHOOL

Dept. H-514 Drexel Avenue and 58th Street Chicago

LABLACHE

FACE POWDER

As soft to the skin as the brush of a butterfly's wing.

Chosen for years by women of refinement for its purity, softness and delicate fragrance. So clinging, only a touch needed.

Refuse substitutes. They may be dangerous. Flesh, White, Pink or Cream.

50c a Box

of Druggists or by mail

Send 10c for a Sample Box

BEN. LEVY CO.

French Perfumers, Dept. 59

125 Kingston St. Boston, Mass.

NONSPI

AN ANTISEPTIC LIQUID

Harmlessly Ends Armpit Perspiration

Nonspi keeps the underarms dry and odorless—applied, easily and quickly, twice a week, will free you from all perspiration troubles—discomfort, embarrassment and ruined gowns. Endorsed by physicians and nurses—used by innumerable women everywhere.

Send 4c for personal Testing Sample.

50c (several months' supply) at all leading toilet and drug counters, or by mail (postpaid)

THE NONSPI COMPANY

2657 Walnut Street Kansas City, Mo.

NONSPI

of word that the brougham was at the door suffered a blight even before the man spoke, by reason of the odd look with which he saluted Lanyard.

"Excuse me, Mr. Martin," he said with—or instinct was at fault—a tinge of mockery in his supple habit, "the manager's compliments, and he'd be much obliged if you'd step into the office a minute; he'd like to have a word with you."

"Indeed? What does the good man want?"

"If it's all the same to you, sir, it'd be better if you'd kindly talk with the boss."

"About what?"

"Well, sir," the waiter stammered, "I don't want to alarm the lady—something's happened."

Lanyard looked to Eve with lifting brows.

"If you will excuse me——"

"I don't think I will," Eve cheerfully replied, rising. "And I don't in the least mind being alarmed. I'm coming along."

With a formal bow of consent, Lanyard folded the wrap round her shoulders, then threw his coat over his arm and prepared to follow the waiter. But the latter was just then peremptorily hailed by the host of the remaining party with a demand for "the check"; so Lanyard and Eve proceeded to the little office unescorted, to find awaiting them a person of decent manners with an intelligent if at the moment somewhat harassed eye. There had been, he began, an unfortunate accident, he was more sorry than he could say that it had happened in his establishment . . .

"What sort of an accident?" Lanyard cut his apologies short with a touch of asperity.

"If you and your lady don't mind stepping this way, I'll show you . . . "

Ushered out to the night, they were conducted round the corner of the building to the space where, in the chilly glimmer of a belated moon, the brougham stood parked with the other motorcar; and, near the former, two men were stooping over something that rested motionless upon the packed earth, one of them focusing upon it the beam of an electric torch.

Lanyard touched Eve's arm, recommending her to wait aside, and with the manager joined the group round the supine body of their chauffeur.

The man lay in a limp sprawl, his face in that unflattering glare a congested crimson, the mouth slack and drooling, half closed lids showing only the whites of eyes rolled back, stertorous respiration fouling the sweet smell of the night—evidently no worse than dead drunk.

"I just don't know how he worked it to get like this," the manager was protesting. "It's dead against our rules to sell hootch to chauffeurs, and I'll sack the bird responsible for this if I have to bounce the whole staff to get rid of him. But that isn't any comfort to you, I guess."

"None," Lanyard curtly agreed.

"He was all right as long's he was sittin' in the chowfers' dinin' room," the man with the lamp volunteered. "You wouldn't have thought he'd had more'n a couple. But as soon as the cold air hit him he flopped like he'd been crowned. Funny . . . "

"No doubt you find it so."

"The only thing I can suggest, Mr. Martin," the manager put in, Lanyard thought too eagerly, "is to lend you somebody to drive you back to New York. Ben here's a darn good driver, knows all the roads like a book."

"That's very good of you," Lanyard returned, with a warning eye for Eve. "We'll be glad to make it worth Ben's while, for neither of us can drive or has even a general idea of the roads. But first"—the toe of his boot stirred the body—"we would like to be sure this poor fool will get proper attention. I dare say you can give him a room."

"Of course, sir—and I'll phone for a doctor, if you say, though I don't think that ought to be necessary. This isn't any case of wood alcohol poisoning, there isn't a drop of bad liquor in the house——"

"I'm sure there isn't. All the same, what he had must have been wicked stuff. If you don't mind having him carried indoors, I'll make an examination myself—I have a limited amount of medical knowledge."

"You bet I will . . . "

Directed by the speaker, the underlings, with no noteworthy enthusiasm, surrendered the torch and their leisure, bent to lift the body of the drunkard by the legs and shoulders, and staggering with the weight of that inert lump, made crabwise progress toward the rear entrance to the inn, the manager following with the light while Lanyard turned back to Eve with a suggestion clearly articulated for the benefit of whatever ears might care to hear.

"If you'll make yourself comfortable in the car, madame, I promise I won't keep you waiting long."

"Thank you," Eve equably returned. "I don't mind waiting, and I do want to be sure that poor boy is in no real danger."

Lanyard offered Eve a hand to help her into the car; but the door he unlatched was one that admitted not to the body of the vehicle but to the front seat on the driver's right.

"Quick!" he urged in an undertone, and when Eve was in place, doubled round to the other side of the brougham.

But the manager was not napping. "Here now!" he remonstrated, jolted out of his vocational urbanity as he came running back. "Thought you said you couldn't——"

The moonlight silvered something in his hand which might or might not have been the darkened torch, and which Lanyard could not afford to give the benefit of a doubt. Standing on the running board, without the smallest compunction he planted a foot in the midriff of the manager so forcibly that the latter dropped whatever it was he had been holding and, with a yelp, doubled up.

Immediately settling into place behind the wheel, Lanyard released the emergency brake, with the result that the brougham, standing on a slight downgrade, began to move of its own weight even before he could locate the starting pedal. Muttering a prayer of thankfulness, he meshed the gears in third and swung the car into the downhill road. At the same time the two who had been carrying the chauffeur let their senseless burden drop and started in pursuit. One tripped over some inequality in the ground and plunged to his knees. The other gained the running board in a bound and aimed a blow at Lanyard's head. It went wide, and Lanyard's fist glanced upon the

Put Sound Values in your Safe Deposit Box

WHEN YOU INVEST in high-grade bonds of great railway lines, you are loaning money to one of the moving forces of civilized life—your country's transportation.

Your bond is secured by such valuable properties as rights of way, tracks, locomotives, cars and terminals.

The National City Company carefully studies the underlying values of every bond it offers. The results of these studies will be put before you gladly by National City Company representatives in more than 50 leading cities.

Our broad range Monthly List of well-secured bonds will be mailed promptly upon request.

The National City Company

National City Bank Building, New York

Offices in more than 50 leading cities throughout the World

BONDS SHORT TERM NOTES ACCEPTANCES

IF you have been following our recent advertisements in the Cosmopolitan on bonds as investments, you may have asked yourself—"What personal help could The National City Company give me in the investment of my funds?"

We shall be glad to tell you.

Cut on this line

The National City Company
55 Wall Street, New York City

Gentlemen: I have seen your advertisements in various magazines. Without any obligation on my part please tell me what specific help you could give me as an individual investor.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

*City*_____ *State*_____

F

Eat and Be Well!

A condensed set of health rules—many of which may be easily followed right in your own home, or while traveling. You will find in this little book a wealth of information about food elements and their relation to physical welfare.

Control Your Weight Without Drugs or Tiresome Exercises

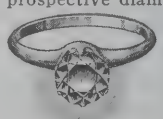
Effective weight control diets, acid and bland diets, laxative and blood-building diets, and diets used in the correction of various chronic maladies.

The book is for FREE circulation. Not a mail order advertisement. Name and address on card will bring it without cost or obligation.

DIET BOOK Sent Free

HEALTH EXTENSION BUREAU
224 Good Health Bldg. Battle Creek, Mich.

Whittemore's Shoe Polishes



ARE SUPERIOR

BUY DIAMONDS DIRECT

FROM JASON WEILER & SONS

of Boston, Mass., one of America's leading diamond importers

For over 47 years the house of Jason Weiler & Sons, of Boston, has been one of the leading diamond importing concerns in America selling to jewelers. However, a large business is done direct by mail with customers at importing prices! Here are several diamond offers—direct to you by mail—which clearly demonstrate our position to name prices on diamonds that should surely interest any present or prospective diamond purchaser.

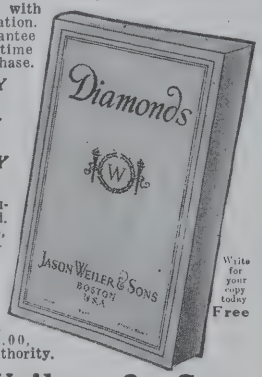
1 carat, $145.00

This one carat diamond is of fine brilliancy and perfectly cut. Mounted in Ladies' style 14K solid gold setting. Order this diamond, take it to any jeweler and if he says it can be duplicated for less than $200.00 send it back and your money will be returned at once without a quibble. Our price direct to you. $145.00

Ladies' White Gold Diamond Ring . . $75.00
Perfectly cut blue-white diamond of exceptional brilliancy with four smaller perfectly cut, blue-white diamonds on the sides. The ring is 18K solid white gold, beautifully pierced and carved.

Ladies' Platinum Diamond Ring . . $305.00
Perfectly cut blue white diamond of exceptional brilliancy with four small perfectly cut, blue white diamonds on the sides. The ring is all platinum, beautifully pierced and carved.

A few weights and prices of other diamond rings:



¼ carat ..$31.00	1½ carats $217.00
⅜ carat .. 50.00	2 carats .. 290.00
½ carat ...73.00	3 carats .. 435.00

Money refunded if these diamonds can be purchased elsewhere for less than one-third more.

If desired rings will be sent to any bank you may name or any Express Co., with privilege of examination. Our diamond guarantee for full value at all time goes with every purchase.

WRITE TODAY FOR THIS CATALOG FREE ON "HOW TO BUY DIAMONDS"

This book is beautifully illustrated. Tells how to judge, select and buy diamonds. Tells how they mine, cut and market diamonds. This book, showing weights, sizes, prices and qualities, $20.00 to $20,000.00, is considered an authority.

Write for your copy today Free

Jason Weiler & Sons
369 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
Diamond Importers since 1876
Foreign Agencies, Amsterdam and Paris

Be a Nurse

Become Independent

Learn in spare time at home
Earn $30—$35 a week

Every woman should learn. We train Beginners, Practical Nurses, Mothers and Religious Workers by our Fascinating Home-study Method. Leading Chicago System. Endorsed by physicians. Established 22 years.

Earn while learning

If you are over 18 and under 55 years of age write for illustrated catalog and 32 Sample Lesson Pages with FREE details of Money-Back Guarantee and FREE NURSE'S EQUIPMENT.

Chicago School of Nursing, Dept. 85, 421 Ashland Blvd., Chicago

"HELP WANTED"
U.S. CIVIL SERVICE

Wanted—Railway Mail Clerks. Write today for full particulars.

United Government Training Institute
229K Dinan Building, Detroit, Michigan

fellow's jaw with sufficient weight to dislodge him. Beating the air with frantic arms, he disappeared.

Fumbling for the switch with one hand, with the other Lanyard steered for the maw of the road through the woods. For a single instant more the inn, painted with pale lunar phosphorescence, stood out in high relief against its background of blurred forest, while with the tail of his eye Lanyard saw its front door of a sudden release a stream of saffron light. Somebody shouted in profane astonishment, somebody stumbled out upon the veranda and pelted toward the parking space. Then, between two heartbeats, Lanyard solved the secret of headlights and ignition, and the brougham, momentum sharply hastened, swept on into the pillared tunnel through the pines.

At first, hands that hadn't grasped a wheel in years had all they could do to hold the lurching fabric to a sharply declivitous and twisting path. Then the grade grew more moderate, the way less tortuous, and the car, obedient to its brakes, slipped gently past the fiery sign to the highway and turned its nose southwards.

"Well done!" Eve applauded. "Oh, well done!"

"Wait!" Lanyard prayed, with the man in mind who had sprinted from the lighted doorway toward the other car. "Physical fact to the contrary notwithstanding, we're not out of the woods yet."

His toe found the accelerator pedal, the motor responded with a mettlesome snort and a drumming drone that waxed apace, the car clove the night like a frightened cat . . .

After a mile or so of fast going on a road whose wendings required for safe navigation a sure hand and eye, Lanyard felt confidence confirmed in his ability to handle the brougham with fair skill and extract from its motor the best it had to give. And when, before long, a rarely long stretch of straight road made a fair trial feasible, he coaxed the speedometer by degrees up to, then past the mark fifty, without feeling that he was tempting fate.

Toward the end of that dash, Eve, who had been keeping an eye on the road astern, reported it bare of pursuing headlights.

"Do you mean to try for that railroad?" she added.

"No—not now, not since things have turned out as they have."

"I am glad," she told him coolly. "This night is too lovely to be spoiled by traveling in a stuffy train."

"Is it?" he queried in grim humor.

"Do you not find it so, my Michael?"

"I find it damnably dangerous."

"And I find it, danger and all, divine."

But Lanyard drove in an obsession of fatality . . .

The road, a river of oxidized silver threading an upland world of purples and blacks in blended masses and ever and again opening up vistas of long valleys filled with mist like streams of milk, was a gantlet of deadly perils. In the blue bowl of the sky it bleached, the misshapen moon swung from side to side of the devious way like a grinning devil-mask. The vast stillness that dwelt upon the world beneath had brooding effect of beauty holding its breath in dread. Through that somehow abnormal hush the swaying bulk of the brougham bored like

WHAT'S AHEAD OF YOUR BOY?

You're mighty proud of him—you have faith in him—and you want him to be a success.

Wouldn't you like to have him get a head start in life now so that he will be prepared to step into the Bigger Job later on?

The purpose of our Junior Leaders' Business League is:

1. To teach the future business man the elements of salesmanship and business, while he is still a school-boy.
2. To show him how to earn money and save it.
3. To help him develop self-confidence and business instinct during his youth.
4. To teach him, through practical experience, how to go ahead on his own initiative and solve the problems that confront him.

The members of our Junior Leaders' Business League are ambitious, wide-awake boys between the ages of 8 and 16, living in small towns and large cities all over the country. Regular Fellows! We'll be glad to show your boy how he can have a bank account of his own.

Simply fill in his name and address on the coupon below and mail it to us right away. Complete business instructions will be sent to him and we'll do everything to help him make good.

Valuable prizes are also awarded to all members, in addition to their regular cash profits.

"Founded To Help Ambitious Boys Succeed"

Mr. D. V. Hill, (M. C.)
Junior Leaders' Business League
International Magazine Co.
119 West 40th St.
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Hill:—

The boy whose name appears below is interested in joining the Junior Leaders' Business League. Please send him full particulars.

Boy's Name.....

Street.....

Town.....State.....

something wild of eye and mad with fear. The wind had an insane whine its flight created, and the incessant drum of its exhaust, echoing from the hard smooth surfaces it traversed, was reechoed by hills and woods and fields with a rumor as of tom-toms thrumming a bacchanal of death . . .

But to the woman who loved Lanyard it was all divine . . .

Summing up another survey of the road behind, she declared: "There is nothing. You have outwitted and distanced them."

"Have I?"

"Is there more to fear?"

"But everything."

"Even an open road?"

"Who can say what may lie in wait for us round the next bend?"

"What does it matter, so we go to meet it together?"

Neither daring to take his eyes from the streaming road nor knowing how to answer her, Lanyard gave only a groan.

"I fear nothing but to be parted from you. Promise we shall never part."

He could not promise . . .

"Michael!" the heartbreaking voice at his shoulder insisted, "why don't you answer me? Surely you can't still be thinking I will ever let you go?"

He contrived to say, almost explosively: "But I must."

"Ah, no, no, Michael! you couldn't hurt me so."

"Is not tonight enough to prove to you that no man who loved you truly could consent to expose you to such a life? It is my fate to love you too well . . ."

What the woman said to that was lost in the blast of a tire blown out on one of the front wheels. An instantaneous swerve toward a ditch by the roadside all but wrenched the wheel out of control and resulted in a wreck. As it was, frantic work averted disaster by the slenderest of scrapes. With locked brakes the brougham skidded drunkenly and rolled to a halt broadside to a bluff over across from the ditch.

With amazing self-command, Lanyard suffered never a syllable of a seething vocabulary to escape his lips as he unlatched the door and leaped down. An instant later Eve on her side alighted and came round to join him. Together they contemplated in silence the ruptured tire and the two good spares locked in their rack—and the key in the pocket of a chauffeur sleeping off his drink in the Inn of the Green Woods, fifteen miles or more away!

From contemplation of this bad business Lanyard turned to consider their position, and found it equally bad. The car stood as far off the road as it could be, but nevertheless somewhat blocking its narrow width, on the waist of an S bend, with a hillside blinding the approach on one hand, a wilderness of young forest on the other. And even as the thought formed that it would be well to move on at once, headlights illuminated the curve ahead, then swung into view, and a car coming from the direction of New York bore down at nothing less than forty miles an hour.

Lanyard had barely time to catch Eve by the arm and drag her out of its path, a maneuver which took them both to the side of the road bordered by the ditch.

No other public improvement makes such a big difference for such a little cost as better street lighting.

Is it 1816 in your town?

In 1816 the Cologne Zeitung published seven arguments against street lighting, of which these three are typical:

1. Artificial lighting is an attempt to interfere with the divine plan which has preordained darkness during the night time.
2. Illuminated streets will induce people to remain later out of doors, leading to an increase in ailments caused by colds.
3. Horses will be frightened and thieves emboldened.

Your electric light and power company will tell you how to get in touch with one of the General Electric Company's street lighting engineers. He knows what other communities have done, how they did it, and what it has meant to them.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Protect that cavity!

Guard against further decay. Fill cavity regularly with Dent's Toothache Gum until you can see your dentist. It does four things

DENT'S TOOTHACHE GUM

1. Relieves toothache quickly
2. Cleanses & protects cavity
3. Retards further decay
4. Destroys all odor

Contains no creosote or harmful ingredients. Does not spill or dry up like liquids. At all druggists' 25c, or by mail upon receipt of price. Made for 35 years by C. S. Dent & Co., Detroit.

DIAMONDS

Here at 60% of Market Price

This snappy perfectly cut diamond 7-8—3-32 ct. at $52.50 among bargains we list. Many other big values in our lists. Buy HERE. Loan values the price basis, not market values. This 75 year old diamond banking firm has thousands unpaid loans and other bargains must sell NOW.

Why Pay Full Prices

Any diamond sent for examination at our risk. No obligation. No cost to you.

Send for Latest List

Diamond Bargains described in detail. Tells of guaranteed loan values, unlimited exchange privilege, details of free examination. Send now.

JOS. DeROY & SONS 1098 DeRoy Bldg.
Only Opposite Post Office, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Plan your European Trip for Mid-Summer

IF you are going to Europe this year plan now to go in late July, in August or September. The season is beautiful; the tourist rush is over; prices are lower; the days at sea are clear, temperate and delightful.

Send the information blank below and let your Government help you with your plans. Learn about the swift, luxurious U. S. Government ships, operated by the United States Lines. They offer a passage for every purse; accommodations for every taste; and they are among the finest ships afloat.

The first class ships are:

George Washington
President Harding
President Roosevelt

In addition, one of the five famous "cabin ships" sail from New York each Wednesday.

Write today for—

A booklet of suggested tours costing $495 and up, including steamship fare; a list of the chief events in Europe in Summer; your Government's handsomely illustrated booklet showing photographs of interiors of Government ships; full information about the United States Lines service. There is no obligation.

For information in regard to sailings address:

United States Lines
45 Broadway New York City
Agencies in Principal Cities
Managing Operators for
U. S. SHIPPING BOARD

INFORMATION BLANK
To U. S. Shipping Board
Information Section Wash., D. C.
1205

Please send without obligation the literature described above. I am considering a trip to Europe ☐to the Orient☐, to South America ☐.

My Name.....

Address .....

Simultaneously the bellow of an unmuffled exhaust told of the approach of another car from the opposite direction. When Lanyard first saw it, it was less than a hundred feet distant, moving at a terrific rate—and running without lights!

So that was why Eve had been able to detect no sign of pursuit . . .

The first car, forced by the stationary brougham to sheer to the wrong side of the road, loosed upon the night a blare of frenzy. Through this penetrated Eve's wail of terror. Lanyard swung to her like a maniac, seized the woman and, exerting every ounce of the strength that was in him, caught her up bodily and flung her off the road, into the ditch.

Too late to save himself . . .

The moon, reeling in its blanched blue field, was a scimitar of white flame. It swooped down through the firmament as might the wrath of God. The world like a bomb exploded beneath his feet; a quivering mass of agony, he was hurled far and far into an everlasting abyss of night impenetrable . . .

Among all of COSMOPOLITAN'S many readers, we do not believe there is one who could guess the outcome of Lanyard's accident. Try it, and then read the next instalment.

Isabel

(Continued from page 64)

drinking. Any girl who was able to take care of herself had a perfect right to drive till sunrise. Indeed, Isabel knew lots of girls who, if they did not motor all night after dances, certainly motored an hour or two. All these things they said, or rather Isabel said, again and again. And yet on those occasions they always planned it that General Valentine should think that Amy was staying with the Halls and that Miss Hall should think Isabel was staying with the Valentines.

Of all her men Amy seemed to like Jerry Kitchen the best . . . But in reality, Isabel knew, Amy liked much better—oh, very much better—a certain Charles Darrow . . . Indeed, Amy had been engaged to Charles in Paris. Amy had regretted the engagement, she said; had provoked a quarrel; broken with Charles; come home. Isabel had never met Charles—Amy called him Chas—but she felt as though she knew him; Amy talked so much about him. Every few days, indeed, Amy told her all over again the whole story of the engagement; proved conclusively that Chas was in the wrong. Whenever, in their drives, Isabel caught fragments of conversation between Amy and Jerry in the front seat, it always seemed to be about Chas . . . Chas was still in Paris . . . Jerry was jealous of Chas.

Amy's gleaming big black car slid over the gauzy, starlit horizon while still Isabel was not a great distance from the house; came to a velvety stop at the side of the road; and both Bid and Jerry leaped out. Jerry stood by the car at attention, but Bid walked to meet her.

They certainly had class, those two men, Isabel reflected. And Bid looked as fresh as though he had just shaved and bathed. But as ever, when she first met Bid, a shiver of repulsion caught Isabel—she wondered what so attracted her in his murky, sullen, wettish face with its shock of black hair and the yellow-green eyes. His nose, broken in football, creased in the middle. But even as she wondered, he took her hand in his warm, close, tingling clasp; drew her to the car step.

The repulsion instantly disappeared. As instantly the attraction which his proximity inevitably exerted set up within her its feverish unrest . . . And as she contemplated the picture—Amy indolently motionless at the wheel, so dazzling in her black furs; with her calm, "Greetings, you wild woman!" Jerry's pictorial, coppery handsomeness—a kind of joy-in-life thrilled her, shook her, sent to her cheeks a mad rush of blood which cast the rouge like a floating film to the surface of its melted, rose-velvet flood. Jerry produced a silver flask; poured into the silver cup-like top a foaming liquid; pleasantly assuring her as he passed it that another little drink wouldn't do her any harm.

"We saved you a div," Jerry declared as she started to hand the silver cup back to him; and he filled it again. Then Bid helped her into the back seat; piled rugs about her, and they were off. Bid outlined the plans for the evening. At the Three Cities for dinner and dancing; and then over to Marm Willoughby's for supper. "After that we'll see—if you want to drive the rest of the night, we can go to the city for breakfast——"

The cocktails had entirely dissipated Isabel's fatigue. Their pungency seemed to gloat back and forth through a sudden exhilaration, sparkling and coloring it. And yet she felt a celestial languor—already she was floating beyond these marvelously bright stars.

"Marm Willoughby's," she murmured slowly. "At last you're making good on that Marm Willoughby proposition. I'd almost begun to believe she was a myth."

"Yes. Marm Willoughby's. Marm Willoughby's a great friend of mine and when I say go—— It's going to be one gay, glad night, Isabel. Am I not right, Jerry? One glad, gay night."

"Surest thing you know!" Jerry promptly reenforced Bid from his front seat. "One glad, gay night!"

Both men laughed tumultuously.

Under the fur rug Bid's hand found Isabel's; grasped it tighter and tighter until she made a little gasp of remonstrance. Bid was always hurting her a little. Once she nearly fainted when he pressed her too close. And mischief with him always took the form of pinching her.

In front, as usual, although Jerry was already engagingly silly, Amy was her calm self. Isabel had never seen anybody like Amy. No matter what she drank, her delicate blondeness was never staled, her exquisite lucidity never blurred. "Me," Isabel often said contemptuously of herself, "one thimbleful—and I'm ready to sob out my troubles on anybody's shoulder." She hated herself as she recalled her actions

Copyright, International Magazine Co., Cosmopolitan Magazine

Where Are You Going For Your Summer Vacation?

A word of advice.—Don't be contented to go every summer to the same old place. See new places—enrich your experience—broaden your interests—make your vacation worthwhile.

Cosmopolitan Travel Service is here to help you—to show you the wealth of summer vacation possibilities that await your bidding.

We have just published five new booklets on summer travel. They cover the five great summer vacation fields of America—picture the cool delights of lakes, mountains and seashore. They are sold to Cosmopolitan readers at cost—six cents apiece.

They were written in collaboration with the Travel Club of America, whose purpose, like ours, is to help you see the most and the best for your money in the travel field.

Write for the booklets. Refer your travel problems to us. Let us help you get the best summer vacation you have ever had.

Send 6c. for these Booklets on Summer Travel

7. Canadian Rockies and the American Northwest.
8. National Parks of Colorado and California.
9. The Great Lakes, St. Lawrence River and Canadian Lake Resorts.
10. New England and the Adirondacks.
11. Atlantic Coast Resorts.

The Travel Show

Do not miss being in New York during the week of April 9th, for if you do, you will miss the Travel Show at the Grand Central Palace.

Take a trip around the world in two hours. Here the whole world will be visualized through exhibits by the many countries and the means of reaching them attractively displayed.

In addition, Hotel Associations and Resorts will be in force so that a summer vacation can be quickly planned.

See the interesting adventure of travel as you have never seen it before unless you have traveled.

The Travel Show is one of the activities of our worthy collaborator—the Travel Club of America—towards helping people to travel.

We cannot advise too strongly.

Don't miss it!

These Booklets are also Available

1. South America and Central America, 4c.
2. Southern Europe and the Mediterranean, 4c.
3. The Pacific Coast and the Great Southwest, 4c.
4. The Orient, 4c.
5. Florida, Bermuda and the West Indies, 4c.
6. That Trip to Europe, 10c.

Cosmopolitan Travel Service

119 West 40th Street New York, N. Y.

COSMOPOLITAN TRAVEL SERVICE, 119 WEST 40TH STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enclosed find.....cents in stamps. Please send me booklets Nos.....(if you care to give the following additional information it will help us to help you). I plan to travel in (Names of countries or localities).....I will leave (Date).....

Name .....Address .....

IN THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS

CANADA'S NATIONAL PLAY-GROUND AND GAME SANCTUARY of 4,400 square miles. Riding, Hiking, Climbing, Fishing, Camping. Mighty snow-capped mountain peaks, gleaming glaciers, great rivers, and shimmering lakes.

JASPER PARK LODGE

[On Lac Beauvert]

(Under management of Canadian National Railways) provides excellent accommodation for 250 guests. All modern conveniences. Rates $5.00 per day and up, American plan (meals included.)

Open June 1st to September 30th

For full information, write for booklet J. P. 26, to any of the following Canadian National Railway Offices:

BOSTON, 294 Washington St.
BUFFALO, 1019 Chamber of Commerce Bldg.
CHICAGO, 108 West Adams St.
CINCINNATI, 406 Traction Bldg.
CLEVELAND, 522 Kirby Bldg.
DETROIT, 527 Majestic Bldg.
DULUTH, 430 West Superior St.
KANSAS CITY, 334 Railway Exchange Bldg.
LOS ANGELES, 503 So. Spring St.
MINNEAPOLIS, 518 Second Ave. So.
NEW YORK, 1270 Broadway
PHILADELPHIA, 702 Finance Bldg.
PITTSBURGH, 505 Park Bldg.
PORTLAND, ME., Grand Trunk Station
SAN FRANCISCO, 689 Market St.
SEATTLE, 902 Second Ave.
ST. LOUIS, 305 Merchants Laclede Bldg.
ST. PAUL, Cor. 4th and Jackson Sts.

Canada Welcomes United States Tourists—No Passports Required

The Canadian National Route through the Rockies skirts Canada's highest peaks, at the easiest gradient and lowest altitude of any transcontinental route.

Canadian National Railways

Cultivate Your Musical Bump

Conn instruments are easiest to play and highest quality, say the world's greatest artists. Write now for Free Book and details of FREE TRIAL; EASY PAYMENTS on any band instrument.

C. G. CONN LTD.
511 Conn Bldg.
Elkhart, Ind.

CONN
WORLD'S LARGEST MANUFACTURERS OF HIGH GRADE BAND AND ORCHESTRA INSTRUMENTS

afterwards; "giggling and screaming," she put it. But she always comforted herself by the thought that it was those very high spirits which made her an addition to any such party.

She was not giggling and screaming now. That stage would come later, probably when Bid produced a second flask. Then last of all when Amy brought forth the great double thermos which she always loaded up. Well, then, Isabel knew, she was likely to do any insane thing. It egged her on, of course—the knowledge that the other three enjoyed these mad pranks. Now, however, she rested quiescent at the heart of her dream. And it pleased Bid tonight to let her stay there. Ordinarily he tormented her during this early exaltée period until her vision was torn to ribbons by her own screaming remonstrances. Into this dream floated a dialogue from the front seat.

"Yes—but I won't tell you!" Jerry remarked in the pleasantest of voices.

"You don't mean that!" came Amy's coaxing tone.

"Sure—won't?" she asked again.

"Nope!"

"Jerry-boy, tell me!"

"No sir!"

"Jerry——" A pause. A faint feather of sound. Amy was pressing her lips to Jerry's, Isabel conjectured.

"No! But I like the bribe."

Amy's voice, pettish, "I know it won't interest me."

"Won't it? If you knew what I knew about Chas, I bet you wouldn't be here." Mischief and triumph struggled in Jerry's laugh.

Came Amy's most velvety-silver tone; her blandest accent:

"You bore me talking so much about Chas."

Then Bid pinched Isabel and she squealed.

They passed what Isabel considered a wonderful evening at the Three Cities. The Three Cities was a big road house at the fork of three roads. One road led to the metropolis, the other two to cities of minor importance. Most of the widely piazzaed lower floor was dining room, glassy dancing space. From one vined and latticed corner a group of uniformed negroes poured a flood of jazz into the warm stale air.

The food was delicious, and expensive. The dancing crowd was a heterogeneous miscellany; passing tourists; clerks from the city with their girls; a few country sports; a party here and there of four or eight, really smart.

At first Bid and Jerry alternated partners. But as the evening wore on, Jerry danced solely with Amy, and Bid only with Isabel. Isabel loved to dance with Bid. She could adapt her step to any man's; but Bid was a perfect height for her; their dancing rhythms were the same. Isabel was fluid; she danced with her entire body. Amy was a beautiful dancer, too; but she did not lend herself so moldingly to her partner as Isabel. "Amy's too much of a lady," Isabel humbly expressed the difference to herself.

As Bid had promised, it proved to be one glad, gay night. Each of the men had two flasks; and at intervals between dancing they all retired to the automobile for these refreshments. They had not touched Amy's reserve when twelve o'clock came and the music stopped.

"Zowie, that air's good!" said Isabel as Amy noiselessly maneuvered the car out from the wriggling, fuming mass of black crustaceans which surrounded the Three Cities. "Drive round a little, Amy, will you, before we go to Marm Willoughby's? Aren't you dizzy yourself?"

But Amy's joyous laughter, thrilling the starry night, proved her clear-headedness. "We'll fix you, young woman!" Jerry, a little thickly, threatened Amy. "The cure for that superiority is the hair of the dog that bit you. And another little drink won't do you any harm. Stop the boat, Amy!"

With a second challenging ripple of laughter, Amy brought the car to a gliding quiet. They sat talking . . . drinking . . . laughing . . . and drinking again . . . To Isabel the stars floated back and forth as though colossal sidereal tides were bringing into harbor the silver flotsam of all space . . .

It was nearly two when they reached Marm Willoughby's. The high, rectangular, tree-shrouded house, set far back from the road, showed but a single guiding light as they entered. In the blaze from a late moon the road seemed to coil about the grounds like a serpent of brassy silver. Amy let Isabel and Bid out at the front steps; parked the car at the back; returned with Jerry.

A negro servant let them in. Marm Willoughby, he explained, was not at home; called away by sickness in the family; but there was a supper laid out for the party, and he himself would serve it. He had a message from Marm Willoughby. "You is the only party has made resahvations. Mistah Kitching is to understan' that the house is his."

"Marm Willoughby's!" Isabel looked curiously about her. Why, it was not at all what she had anticipated. Well, what had she expected? A regular dining hall with a dance hall, crowded with gay people? No, not that exactly! And yet not this. She had never seen a place like this. Rifts of clear space broke in the haze of her thinking. But, after all, wasn't it like any modest summer home?

Downstairs was apparently but a four room floor; the square hall into which they entered; the parlor in which they stood; dining room; kitchen. But how ugly they were in proportion, how high-ceiled; and all those high, gaunt doors, painted rose color . . . All the pennants and calendars and silly bric-a-brac could not take away a look of coldness. Isabel's weaving memory brought back a picture, as they turned into the grounds, of a series of outhouses extending back under the shine of the stars. And a more weaving conjecture guessed that the upstairs would be four more rooms . . . Marm Willoughby—why, she remembered now that Bid had told her this—accommodated small parties. That had sounded interesting, exciting when Bid explained it. But somehow now it seemed strange . . . sordid . . .

The dinner was served—it began with the most delicious hors d'œuvres that Isabel had ever seen. That feeling of strangeness wore away as they talked and laughed. Suddenly Isabel observed that the waiter had gone. In fact he must have disappeared before the close of the dinner, because they did not eat the courses one ht after another. There were interrupt- drinks and more drinks and more inks. They found themselves at inter- ls in the parlor . . . Jerry pounding on e piano while in her brittle, sweet voice— w voluptuous, though, was her rich ench accent—Amy sang some of the ngs she had picked up in France. Jerry d Bid laughed immoderately at these llads. There was more food . . . lad . . . drinks . . . more singing . . ices . . . coffee . . . drinks . . And then they were sliding down the gh banister that railed the broad stair- y. It was—because the place was so normally high-ceiled—long enough to ve them a real ride . . . More drinks d then upstairs . . .

Not four rooms there at all . . . only ree . . . but a big hall and in front a ing room furnished quite prettily; a nter table; a maple desk; wicker chairs . . Jerry banged his head against the ephone box and they all sat down on the or and laughed. Beyond this living om Isabel glimpsed through the door a amber with white painted furniture . . opening out of it, a bathroom.

More drinks . . . torpor . . .

Voices . . . quarreling voices . . . miliar voices, though . . . A row near, ry near. Yet Bid, sitting across the om from her, paid no attention. Isabel tened, languidly interested. Then in- nsely interested . . . She knew who ey were. Why, of course . . . Amy d Jerry . . . Amy and Jerry had gone t into the hall to talk . . . Amy had sed the door so that she would not hear. In Amy's raised voice. "Tell me, Jerry, here Chas is. Tell me!"

"Nossir!"

"Tell me, angel Jerry, and Amy will give u one sweet little kiss."

"Nossir!"

"You dev—tell me . . . is he on the ean?"

Jerry hiccoughed a laugh. "No!"

"You tell me! Tell me or I'll walk right t of this place."

"He's zere."

"Where?"

"Nyork!"

"What hotel?"

"No 'tel! Z'eez driving down tonight ter zeatre—zee you."

"He's driving down tonight to Belaize . . to see me. Is that right?"

"Yez."

Complete silence out in the hall from rry; complete silence from Amy; Jerry nging his favorite song—the aviation clas- c: "The higher she goes, the harder she lls." The rush of Amy's footstep. A nock on the door. Why did Amy knock? id rushed, swaying, to open to her. But, ith his hand on the knob, he paused, eld by the shrill imperativeness of Amy's oice.

"Isabel! Isabel! I've got to go home— once. Do you understand—at once! ill you stay here or will you come with e?"

How surprising that Amy's voice, which as so near when she talked with Jerry out here, should come from so long a distance the very door. From a distance, equally r in the other direction, Isabel had to ull an answer.

"I'll go with you of course, Amy."

Isabel rose from the footstool where she und she had been sitting. But Bid

See the Ancient Glories of the Mediterranean

And now a Mediterranean Cruise under Canadian Pacific management, on the magnificent Empress of Scotland (25,000 gross tons). Everything Canadian Pacific standard—there is none better. Fares, $800 up—limited to 600 guests.

Sailing from New York, January 14, 1924.

Canadian Pacific Agents:

Atlanta, 49 N. Forsyth St.
Boston, 405 Boylston St.
Buffalo, 160 Pearl St.
Chicago, 140 So. Clark St.
Cincinnati, 430 Walnut St.
Cleveland, 1040 Prospect Ave.
Detroit, 1239 Griswold St.
Duluth, Soo Line Depot.
Kansas City, Mo., 601 Railway Express Bldg.
Los Angeles, 605 S. Spring St.
Minneapolis, 611 Second Ave. S.
Montreal, 141 Saint James St.
New York, Madison Av. at 44th St.
Philadelphia, Locust & 15th St.
Pittsburgh, 340 Sixth Ave.
Portland, Ore., 55 Third St.
San Francisco, 675 Market St.
Seattle, 608 Second Ave.
St. Louis, 420 Locust St.
Tacoma, 1113 Pacific Ave.
Washington, D. C., 1419 New York Ave.

Is Egypt Your Mecca

with its historic excavations? This cruise will give you 14 days in the Palestine and Egypt at an inclusive rate. Fascinating shore excursions to different points from Mediterranean ports. All details looked after by competent representatives.

Ancient Cities and Ancient Glories

Rome, Athens, Constantinople. Picturesque races and costumes; Algiers and Tunis, aglow with the sunny charm of Africa. Madeira, Cadiz, Gibraltar. Gorgeous cross sections of the world we live in; Naples, Monaco, Portugal. A touch of Old England—Southampton—on the way home.

Get full particulars now. Write, telephone or stop at the nearest Canadian Pacific steamship agency.

Canadian Pacific

IT SPANS THE WORLD

Mediterranean Cruise

TO EUROPE!

London - Paris - Versailles
Naples - Pompeii - Rome
Florence, etc. $425 and up
Ranging from 30 to 80 days. Write for Booklet F-3.

GATES TOURS—Founded 1892
"World Travel at Moderate Cost"
225 Fifth Avenue, New York

EUROPE—1923

All Expense Tours Under Escort

50 days, $575.00; 60 days, $675.00; 70 days, $775.00; 90 days, $975.00. Also Yellowstone, Glacier, Mt. Rainier and Yosemite National Parks, Alaska, Canadian Rockies, and California. Tours under escort or independent. Write for booklets.

The T. & S. Tours 53 W. Jackson Blvd. CHICAGO, ILL.

Clark's 20th Mediterranean Cruise
June 27, by specially chartered "Baltic", 23,884 tons; 61 days, $600 up including hotels, guides, drives, fees. Stop-overs in Europe.
SUMMER TOURS TO EUROPE.
F. C. CLARK, Times Building . . . . . New York

TRAVEL COSMOPOLITAN WAY

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN SUMMER TOURS

Personally Conducted—All Expense—Moderate Cost

Europe— 8 Tours June, July. $745.00 up. Enjoyable and educational itineraries.
Yellowstone— Every two weeks July, August. Special itinerary in Park. Colorado included.
Eastern— Every week. One and two-week Tours. The best of the East.
Western— July, August. Wonderful trips featuring Canadian Rockies, etc.

Standard Pullman sleepers used exclusively.
Write for full particulars

THE COSMOPOLITAN TOURS COMPANY
15 Dixie Terminal Arcade, Cincinnati, O.
We handle hundreds of pleased clients every season

UNIVERSITIES, PROFESSIONAL AND TRADE SCHOOLS

Continued from page 14

Electrical Engineering men with training are in demand. For more than a quarter of a century, this school has been training men of ambition and limited time, for the electrical industries. Condensed course in Electrical Engineering enables graduates to secure good positions and promotions. Theoretical and Practical Electricity. Mathematics, Steam and Gas Engines and Mechanical Drawing. Students construct dynamos, install wiring and test electrical machinery. Course with diploma complete

In One Year

Over 3000 men trained. Thoroughly equipped fireproof dormitories, dining hall, laboratories, shops.
Free catalog. 31st year begins Sept. 26, 1923.
BLISS ELECTRICAL SCHOOL
149 Takoma Ave., Washington, D. C.

LE MASTER INSTITUTE 30 minutes from New York City
Standard Electrical, Civil, Mechanical, Chemical, and Industrial Engineering Courses completed in two years. No entrance examinations. Regular High School course in two years prepares for leading colleges. Bulletin free.
Drawer 139, East Orange, New Jersey.

Learn Electricity Practical Course in the Great Shops of Coyne. Complete in 3 months. Enter any time. Drafting and Radio included. Special limited offer.
Act NOW! Send for Big Free Catalog.
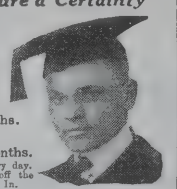
Coyne Electrical School, Dept. 1175
1300-1310 W. Harrison St., Chicago, Ill.

TRI STATE COLLEGE OF ENGINEERING
Makes you a Civil, Mechanical, Electrical or Chemical Engineer in two years, 48 weeks each. No entrance examinations. High School Diploma not required. Compact courses made up of essentials only. Expenses low. For catalog address 20 "C" Street, Angola, Ind.

Columbia School of Drafting
Specializing in training of professional Draftsmen—Mechanical, Architectural and others; personal instruction; complete course 3 to 9 months. For information address Local Dept. 1955, R. C. Claflin, Pres., 14th and T Sts., N. W., Wash., D. C

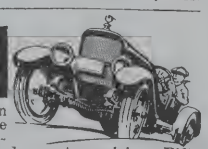
Big Money in Photography! Photographers and Photo-Engravers are well paid. More men and women are needed to fill attractive positions all over the country. The demand is far greater than the supply. The largest and best college of its kind in the world will teach you these fascinating professions in a few months. Established over 30 years. Hundreds of satisfied graduates now earning big pay. Good positions secured. Tuition and living expenses low. Write for interesting book—now!
ILLINOIS COLLEGE OF PHOTOGRAPHY, Box 443, Effingham, Ill.



LEARN MECHANICAL DENTISTRY
Earn $35 to $125 a week. Taught by actual practice—day or night. Three months' course. Modern laboratories. No previous training required. Established 30 years. For 36-page catalog, write Dept. 3
BODEE DENTAL INSTITUTE
New York 136 W. 52d St. Philadelphia 1305 N. Broad St. Buffalo 1226 Main St. Brooklyn 15 Flatbush Ave.

VALPARAISO UNIVERSITY is one of the largest institutions of learning in the U. S. Summer School opens May 29, 1923, and will continue for 12 weeks. Thorough Instruction at Lowest Expense. Catalog free. Address
Dept. 4, University Hall, Valparaiso, Ind.

LEARN ELECTRICITY



Make Your Successful Future a Certainty

We teach by practical work and scientific methods, under practical working conditions. Specialists for seventeen years in training young men for Electrical Engineering with B.S. Degree in 3 years.

A plan for every student, regardless of age and education. We also teach
Automotive Electricity in 3 months.
A. C. & D. C. Armature Winding in 3 months.
Practical Electricity in 6 months.
Electrotechnics in 12 to 18 months.
Commercial Electrical Engineering in 12 months.
ENTER ANY TIME. Radio Broadcasting WIAO every day. Write NOW for Big, FREE illustrated book just off the press. State Age, Education, and Course Interested In.
SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING OF MILWAUKEE
C-5, 415 Marshall Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Do You Want A Better Job?

—or a business of your own with a real future? Then be an Auto Expert! Twelve million cars, trucks, tractors demand expert repairing. Fifty million tires to repair; twelve million batteries to keep up. Unlimited opportunities at $2,000 to $10,000 yearly.

Thousands of Trained Men Needed

The Trained Man Wins! In a few weeks we can train you for a big pay job in this, the world's greatest business. Detroit, the heart of the auto industry, is the place to learn this business. The big auto manufacturers endorse our school. Thousands of graduates making good. Write today for FREE booklet about the opportunities in the automobile business. Don't wait; write today. NOW!

MICHIGAN STATE AUTOMOBILE SCHOOL
4005 Auto Bldg. Detroit, Mich.

suddenly bent over, locked the door and removed the key. "No, you're not going," he said cunningly.

Confusion.

"Why Bid, what do you mean? Of course I'm going. I can't stay here with you alone! I've got to leave with Amy. Unlock the door, Bid!"

"No you don't, Isabel! You're going to stay here with me!"

"Bid! What are you talking about? Bid, give me the key."

"Hurry, Isabel! Hurry! For heaven's sake, hurry!"

"I can't get him to give me the key, Amy. He doesn't know what he's doing!"

"'The higher she goes, the harder she falls!'"

"Give her the key, Bid!"

"Give me the key, Bid. You give me . . ."

"No—can't have the key!"

"Hurry, Isabel, I can't wait!"

"I am hurrying, Amy! but he won't . . . for God's sake, give me that key, Bid!"

"Nope, can't have key!"

"'The higher she goes . . .'"

"Key . . . key . . . give me . . ."

"Hurry . . . hurry . . . I can't wait any longer Isabel!"

"'——harder she falls!'"

"Bid, I tell you give me that key or . . ."

"I'm through . . . I'm going."

"For heaven's sake, Amy, wait . . . don't leave me alone . . . for God's sake, Amy . . . Amy!"

A motor whirring below.

"Bid . . . the key . . . Bid . . . Amy . . . the key . . . oh, Amy . . . Bid . . . Jerry, help me!"

"'The higher . . .'"

"Amy . . . Amy!"

Silence.

Bid walked to the window, opened it. He laughed mischievously as he dropped the key outside. He spread his hand open, palm toward her, like a prestidigitator on the stage, to show her it was empty. In the hall, Jerry ceasing suddenly to sing.

Isabel walked past Bid to the window, glanced out. Too high a drop. She sat down in front of the desk. Flashes, lightning-swift, were driving back and forth through her head. Her mind was sizzling and spluttering like the electric wire over a stalled street car; yet she caught a glimpse of something every time a flash came. . .

She was in as perilous a situation as any girl could be . . . no help anywhere . . . the negro was gone . . . Jerry was in a drunken stupor . . . Bid was drunk and he would be drunker . . . she must get out of it somehow . . . Amy had deserted her . . . In Bid's condition she might be kept there late into tomorrow . . .

Flash!

Why, Amy was a rotter . . . Amy was . . . why, of course . . . Amy was bad . . . she was not like Amy . . . not bad . . . only—wayward . . that was all . . . not bad . . . wayward . . . only wayward . . .

Flash!

Why, she was a wayward girl . . . a wayward girl like Della Eff . . . and the long line of Della's predecessors . . . wayward . . . locked in a road house with a drunk . . . Mathilda Hall's niece was wayward . . .

Flash!

Amy was a snob . . . Amy had just been using her . . . Amy had, on her return from Paris, needed a companion . . . somebody not in her own set . . . who wouldn't tell . . .

Flash!

Dropping the Belaize girls, one by one! . . . the Belaize girls had dropped Amy . . . just as . . . just as . . .

Flash!

Just as the Little Finger girls had dropped Isabel . . .

Flash!

Of course Amy was in love with Chas . . . Chas had broken the engagement . . . Amy would do anything to get him back . . . Amy was perfectly willing to risk their friendship to get home before Chas discovered that Amy was not at Miss Hall's house . . . And Amy—trust her—would get home in time . . . she would make up with Chas . . . Amy had abandoned her to . . . Amy had money and social position . . . And clever . . . Chas would never know . . . Amy could wriggle out of any situation . . . but she'd leave a friend stranded in the mud . . . a wayward girl like Della Eff . . .

A stir behind her. Bid wobbled over to the desk; stood swaying there beside her. Her thoughts kept up their flashing.

A wayward girl . . . like Della Eff . . . She'd need every atom of the ingenuity she'd learned from Amy . . . Della Eff!

An idea came to her. The telephone! If she could only get Bid out of the room . . .

"Bid, dear," she said in an accent as clear and precise as Amy's, "there seems to be a bathroom here. Don't you think you'd better take a cold bath? It'll fix you up."

Bid nodded with a solemn understanding.

"Co'd ba'd fizz me up!" he repeated intelligently.

She listened to Bid lunging through the bedroom into the bathroom . . . heard water running there.

She pulled the receiver off the telephone. She breathed a number into it. Ringing! Long ringing! Prolonged . . . everlasting . . . eternal . . . ringing! Oh, thank God . . . a voice.

"Della, speak low and quick—did I wake Auntie?"

"No!"

"Della, I'm in awful trouble—awful! Don't let her know. Call Wood Vining at the number he gave you this morning. You wrote it on the pad. Tell him to get a machine and come after me at once. I'm at Marm Willoughby's. The third house at the right on the Lathrop Road out of Norbury. The door's locked. I can't get out. Tell him the key to the room I'm in is on the grass under the lighted window. Say it all after me, Della . . . That's right! Work quick, Della!"

Bid swayed back into the anteroom. "Tub won't fil'lup!" he announced tragically. Isabel followed him into the bathroom. The tub was empty.

"You forgot to put the plug in," she said.

He bent to the plug; turned on the water again. Isabel straightened him up as, losing his balance, he started to fall into the tub. Stealthily Isabel looked for a key to the bathroom door. There was none. The faucet released a needle-fine am. She calculated it would take en minutes to fill the tub. She stood ing, coquetting, fluttering about him.

een minutes of that, and . . . suritiously she pulled out the plug . . .
ater's gone again!" Bid murmured y when he discovered it. For the third e he turned on the needle stream . . .
down on a small white painted stool
. His head lolled . . .
. distant hum . . .
id's eyes were glassy. The hum came rer . . . and nearer.
abel stole into the other room.
he opened the window. A flivver ed into the drive. "Oh, thank God—od! But no—Della Eff!" ella alighted; came running round to side of the house; nodded, silent, upds; instantly plucked the key from the s as though led to it by magic. She ppeared in the direction of the back of house. Could she get in? Isabel rd the rattle of windows . . . a foot-on the stairs. The key turned in the
. The door opened. There came sound of a fall from the bathroom.
Where is he?" Della surprisingly asked.
as surprisingly added: "I stepped over of them out there in the hall."
abel pointed.
ella went into the bathroom with as inesslike an air as though she were buy-sugar. No sound came from Bid.
He's passed out!" Della calmly called.
fter a long interval Della returned. "I his collar and coat and shoes off," she . simply, "and put him to bed. You'd er smooth your hair."
. little later they were in the flivver.
el held a corner of Della Eff's coat.
I tried to get Vining," Della was ex-ning after a while, "but I couldn't.
e old dope answered the phone. He dn't hear me and I couldn't get any-g outta him. Of course I hadda be y and he was half asleep. So I see I'd a come after you myself. I left a note ase your Auntie waked up—saying you phoned and asked me to come after as you didn't feel well."
he paused; but it was only a pause.
was, Isabel knew, going on. Isabel ed herself to accept a lecture from la Eff. But she would endure it . . .
humbly . . . all the rest of her life would take anything from Della.
inally Della spoke. Dispassionately

They're awful hard to manage when 're drunk. You hafta have the ck." Then sympathetically but with a t quality of the vindicated prophet:
at Valentine girl turned out just way I know she would; getting you this and then beating it. She's a er—I got that the first instant I seen
"

he last carelessly: "I made the old e that came to the phone understand thing. I told him to tell that Vining w you'd like to have him call tomorrow ning."

If you want to see the Latin Quarter of America as it really is, go to Greenwich Village with O. O. McIntyre in June COSMOPOLITAN

To the Gateways of Europe

FOR ENGLAND:
Plymouth Liverpool
Southampton London

FOR FRANCE:
Cherbourg
Special boat trains to Paris

FOR BELGIUM, HOLLAND and other Continental Countries:
Antwerp

FOR GERMANY, POLAND and RUSSIA:
Bremen Hamburg
Danzig

SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES:
Southampton
Hamburg Bremen

FOR IRELAND:
Cobh (Queenstown)

THESE gateways are opened to you by the ships of our famous Lines: White Star, Red Star, American, White Star-Dominion, Leyland and Atlantic Transport.

One of our ships sails for each of these destinations every week. Our fleets include the world's largest ship Majestic, holder of the record to Continental Europe, the palatial, new Belgenland, the Olympic and Homeric; the famous Big Four — Adriatic, Baltic, Celtic and Cedric— and the new Pittsburgh, Doric and Regina, with a number of other delightful cabin steamers.

Departures from New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Montreal.

Sailing Days: Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

No matter what your requirements, we can meet them. Inquire for details.

WHITE STAR LINE
AMERICAN LINE RED STAR LINE
INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE COMPANY
No. 1 Broadway, New York

PISO'S
for Coughs & Colds

For quick relief try Piso's —a remarkably effective syrup different from all others. Safe and sane for young and old. Pleasant — no opiates — no upset stomach. 35c and 60c sizes everywhere.

WE TEACH COMMERCIAL ART

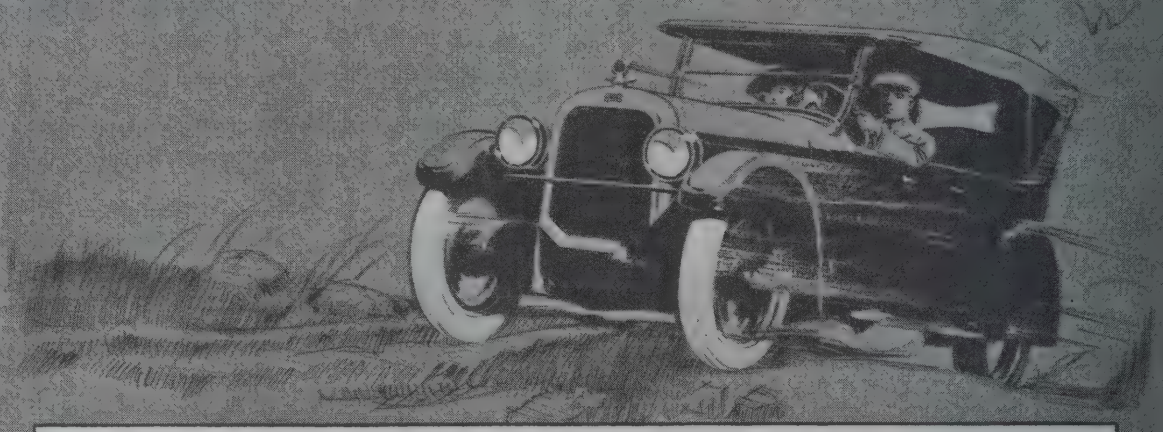
Meyer Both Company, the largest Commercial Art Organization in the World, offers you an unusual opportunity for practical training. If you like to draw develop your talent. Study this practical course—taught by this nationally known organization with twenty-two years success—who each year produces and sells to advertisers over 15,000 commercial drawings. Who else could give you so wide an experience. Meyer Both instruction is the difference between successful fact and experimental theory. Commercial Art is a highly paid, intensely interesting profession, equally open to men and women. Home study instruction.

Get Facts Before You Enroll in any School.
Ask the Advertising Manager of the leading newspapers in your city, anywhere in the United States, Canada, England or Australia about the Meyer Both Company—let them tell you about us. Write for our illustrated book telling about the success of our students—for one-half the cost of mailing—four cents in stamps.

MEYER BOTH COMPANY
Department of Art Instruction
Michigan Ave. at 20th St., Dept. 22 Chicago, Ill.

NOTE—To Art and Engraving Firms: Secure practical Artists among our graduates. Write us.



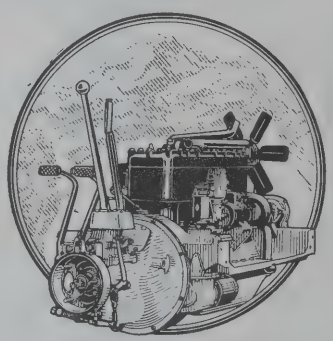
Belber
SAFE-LOCK WARDROBE TRUNK

HERE is a smart, durable Belber Safe-Lock Wardrobe Trunk with every convenience you could possibly desire. There are three generous drawers for clothing, a shoe box, a drawer for hats, laundry bag, hangers and even an ironing-board! And, best of all—it has the wonderful new Belber Safe-Lock that makes locking or unlocking so easy and convenient. Just one turn of the lock up or down automatically unlocks or locks all four catches at one time. Safe-Lock models—Price $37.50 up.

Our attractive booklet, "The Style in Wardrobe Trunks — and how to pack them," gives you intimate details on the model that will suit you best. Write for it.

THE BELBER TRUNK & BAG CO., Philadelphia

NEW CHANDLER SIX



Matchless Master of Hills!

So speedily did the new Chandler establish its supremacy in performance that its phenomenal new power plant is now nationally regarded as one of the truly great motors!

At Pikes Peak the new motor conclusively demonstrated that a driving situation beyond its capacity could never arise.

Equally sensational performances in all sections of the country quickly made it an absorbing topic of local discussion.

Whether on hills or in the trying difficulties of traffic, the owner of a new Chandler enjoys smooth, swift, buoyant acceleration that enables him to forget the existence of the gear shift lever. A single demonstration will be convincing proof.

Pikes Peak Motor

BUILT BY CHANDLER

A notable characteristic of the Pikes Peak motor is the absence of pre-ignition knocking, overheating, and imperfect combustion. These faults have hitherto been regarded as ineradicable even in the most costly motors.

THE CHANDLER MOTOR CAR COMPANY · CLEVELAND

Export Department: 1819 Broadway, New York City — Cable Address "Chanmotor"

Touring Car $1395 Touring Car (7 Passenger) $1545 Royal Dispatch $1695 Chummy Sedan $1695

All Prices F. O. B. Cleveland

VOL. LXXIV JUNE, 1923 NO. 6

COSMOPOLITAN

America's Greatest Magazine

This Month

The Morning Kiss		by Harrison Fisher	Cover
The Law and the Prophets		by S. E. Kiser	21
Refrainers	[Illustrations by Rea Irvin]	by George Ade	22
Ellen's Luncheon	[Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg]	by Kathleen Norris	24
Red-Handed	[Illustrations by Forrest C. Crooks]	by Irvin S. Cobb	30
Greenwich Village	[Illustrated with Photograph]	by O. O. McIntyre	36
Jemima Made Over	[Illustrations by Robert W. Stewart]	by Katharine Newlin Burt	38
When Knighthood was in Tower	[Illustrations by Wallace Morgan]	by H. C. Witwer	45
The Hope of Happiness—Part IV	[Illustrations by Pruett Carter]	by Meredith Nicholson	50
Beaver!	[Illustrations by Harrison Fisher]	by Stephen Vincent Benét	57
It All Depends	[Illustrations by A. H. Henkel]	by Berton Braley	62
The Stage Today	[Photographs in Artgravure]		65
His Past	[Illustrations by Grant T. Reynard]	by Arthur Somers Roche	69
Now That I'm Fifty	[Illustrated with Photographs]	by Albert Payson Terhune	72
The Garden of Peril—Part III	[Illustrations by Dean Cornwell]	by Cynthia Stockley	74
Scandal Street	[Illustrations by Charles D. Mitchell]	by Frank R. Adams	81
Crazy Impulses	[Illustrations by the Author]	by John T. McCutcheon	86
The Lone Wolf Returns—Part V	[Illustrations by W. D. Stevens]	by Louis Joseph Vance	88
The Début of Battling Billson	[Illustrations by T. D. Skidmore]	by P. G. Wodehouse	95
Mercy—Part II	[Illustrations by Herbert M. Stoops]	by Peter Clark MacFarlane	100
Stories That Have Made Me Laugh	[Illustrations by Gordon Ross]	by Montague Glass	106

Next Month

Begins

Never The Twain Shall Meet

A Novel by PETER B. KYNE

With illustrations by DEAN CORNWELL

You know what a treat that means

Published monthly by the International Magazine Company at 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST, President; C. H. HATHAWAY, Vice-President; RAY LONG, Vice-President;
JOSEPH A. MOORE, Treasurer; C. E. FORSDICK, Secretary.
Copyright, 1923, by International Magazine Company (Cosmopolitan Magazine). All rights reserved under the terms of the Fourth American International Convention of Artistic and Literary Copyright.
35 cents a copy; subscription price, United States and possessions, $3.00 a year; Canada, $3.50; Foreign, $4.00. All subscriptions are payable in advance. We cannot begin subscriptions with back numbers. Unless otherwise directed we begin all subscriptions with the current issue. When sending in your renewal, please give us four weeks' notice. When changing an address, give the old address as well as the new and allow five weeks for the first copy to reach you. Entered as second-class matter, September 8, 1905, at the Post Office, New York, New York, under the act of March 3, 1879. Entered on July 1, 1918, at the Post Office, Atlanta, Georgia; Boston, Massachusetts; Chicago, Illinois; Los Angeles, California; San Francisco, California.

If you bought only one new Victor Record a week

Victrola No. 300
$250
Victrola No. 300, electric, $290
Mahogany, oak or walnut
Other styles $25 to $1500

you would have such a treasury of music as could compare only with the great libraries and the great art galleries of the world. You would have a source of untold satisfaction for your every need. The musical genius of the world is graved on Victor Records — not the printed page of music, but the music itself.

"HIS MASTER'S VOICE"

Victrola

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Look for these trade-marks. Under the lid. On the label.
Victor Talking Machine Company, Camden, N.J.

VOL. LXXIV
No. 6
COSMOPOLITAN
JUNE
1923

The Law and the Prophets

by S. E. KISER

I MAY not tell you how you cause
The day to brighten when we meet;
I must obey the man-made laws
That bid me to remain discreet;
I have no right to let you guess
That I observe your loveliness,
For Fate's a tyrant, Chance a cheat.

BECAUSE, one day, you stood before
A preacher who, perhaps, was old
And far past loving any more,
My love for you must not be told;
I must be careful to impart
No word that might delight your heart,
My look must be reserved and cold.

AND you must not, by word or sign,
Disclose the secret that you guard;
The joy that might be yours and mine,
Remember, is forever barred,
For this, they say, is Heaven's decree:
What's done is done, and was to be!
The sacred scroll must not be marred.

WE might rebel, and ask them how,
If Heaven directs and sanctifies,
Our ways diverged so far till now,
And why, when bound by irksome ties,
We are allowed to meet, too late—
Why, after we are tricked by Fate,
We both may see, with opened eyes.

AH, but I must not touch your hand
Nor speak the sweet, forbidden word;
I must not let you understand
When your heart calls that mine has heard;
Our souls must starve, lest we displease
Those who interpret Heaven's decrees
And think them holy, though absurd.

COPYRIGHT 1923, BY INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE COMPANY, (COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE)

The AMAZING of Lazy Men Who
By GEORGE

LET us now turn our attention to the re frainers. Meaning that vast total of wel meaning neighbors who believe that virtue consists of side-stepping and ducking.

They are the ones who have caused icicles to form above the portals of many a church. Why? Because their manner tells us that the consolations of religion are intended only for people already saved.

If you could read the mind of a first class re-frainer, you might discover that his declaration of faith ran about as follows:

"I do not cuss and swear. I do not play poker for money. I do not have liquor in the house. I do not stay away from church unless I have a cold in the head. I do not joy-ride, or encourage all night dancing, or tell blue stories, or shoot craps. Therefore my ticket to Heaven is punched along the margin and stamped on the back and my salvation is a cinch."

He is sincere. The refrainers, as a class, believe that they are going to be rewarded and live in the midst of light and music throughout eternity, while the non-refrainers are going to lie on hot griddles and keep ringing for ice water that never comes.

Each day the refrainers are puzzled and shocked to observe that profane poker players who crave cocktails and have no sectarian affiliations are popular in their home towns, beloved by their associates, honored by the Rotarians — even elected to office.

So the refrainers decide that humanity is on the down grade and headed for the smoke pits. They feel that vice is being publicly endorsed because persons who have cultivated a few well known vices are greeted with smiles and handshakes, while prominent refrainers walk alone under the weeping willows.

Of course they are wrong. Poker players would not vote to legalize gambling. Our most proficient blasphemers punish the children for repeating bad

POPULARITY DRINK and LIE ADE

Illustrations by
Rea Irvin

ords learned in the alley. A very recent marvel as been the upholding of the Eighteenth Amendent, verbally, by thousands of persons who are ot offended by an invitation to drink.

Minor commandments may be violated in a holesale manner, but the violations are never pproved by formal vote.

Frailties and lapses are quite generally tolerated ecause they seem to be the trade-marks of our ommon brotherhood.

"Lightnin' Bill" Jones and Rip Van Winkle ave been the most popular stage characters of ne last half-century. Both of them were lazy rinking men who neglected their families, lied o their wives and invented lame excuses for their wn moral delinquencies. They have been beoved because they were gentle, charitable, sincere nd sympathetic—always pulling to make somene else happy.

Robin Hood is still approved by the public, ven if he did steal from the rich to give to the oor. He is not applauded because he stole but ecause he showered his yellow pieces where they ould do the most good.

The refrainers can get some wonderful tips from ightnin' and Rip and Robin. They need not ide their bottles, or become loafers or hold up ravelers on the highway, but they might arise ach morning all tuned up to make existence a ttle less annoying to all within reach.

The idea is to lay on instead of merely laying off!

This is no slam at the churches but merely a rief clinic on a minority of church members nown as refrainers. If they will get in line with ne progressive majority and learn that the new eligion includes basket ball, playgrounds, flower ardens, orchestral music, nurses for the sick, ork for the unemployed, charity for those who ub their toes, "Welcome" instead of "Verboten" on every signboard—they may, in time, ecome just as popular as their wickedest eighbors.

KATHLEEN NORRI

takes great pleasure in inviting you to mee

THE MURPHYS OF MAY

and their friends, includin

MA

CALLAHAN

Lizzie-Kate

JAMES MONTGOMERY FLAGG

These Lovable Folks are all Present at

Ellen's Luncheon

Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg

Ellen

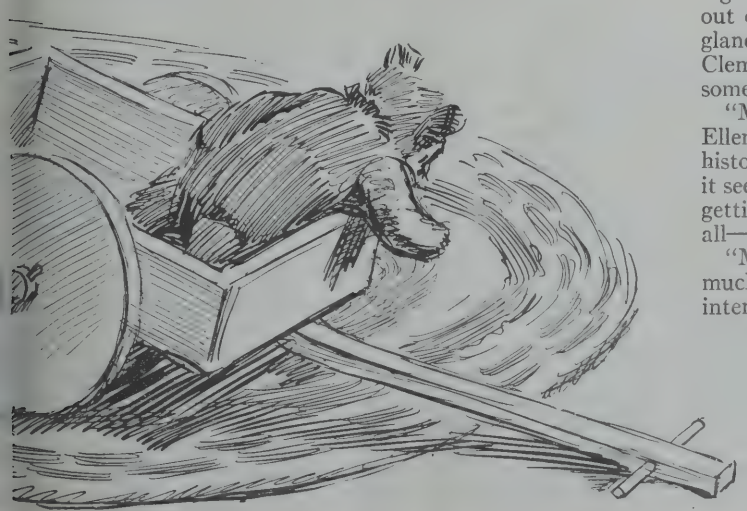
"I KIND of think I let you in for something, Lizzie-Kate," Ellen Murphy said dubiously.

Her sister, wringing with lean, brown, toil-marked young hands an incredible number of steaming squares of heavy cotton, smiled gallantly over her "set tubs."

"Well, I don't suppose it'll kill me to have two or three ladies come in for lunch," she said reassuringly. "Mama'll come over and help with the children——"

"Here's the way it was," Ellen interrupted eagerly, as her sister paused.

Ellen worked in the office of Beatty & Bird in New York, and made the nine mile trip every day from the shabby suburb where she and her sister lived.



"It's Miss Brice, you know," she said. "She's head of the mail order department, and Miss Carter—Isabelle Carter, who is the president's confidential secretary, and Miss Carter's sister, she's with Boller and Company, and one other—a friend of Miss Brice's—that's four. And you see they have to come down here to that Chase wedding, we're all asked at half-past two, and there's no train between the eleven o'clock and the two o'clock. Miss Brice was talking to Miss Carter about it in our office, and Miss Carter asked me if there was a decent restaurant down here where they could get their lunch. Well, you know——"

Ellen interrupted herself eloquently. Then she went on:

"There's the Eyetalian place, where they smear tomato sauce on everything from the waffles to the ice cream, and there's the bakery, with that lemon pie in the window that Mart says looks as if the hand of death was on it, and those rolls with the fly specks——"

"Oh, it's terrible!" conceded Lizzie-Kate, in another pause. "You'd wonder they wouldn't have a good hotel down here, or a restaurant anyway," she mused, her wringing now finished. She began to stretch the squares with hard flaps, holding them by the corners.

"God in His Goodness be good to us all!" she ejaculated under her breath, dropping upon her knees before her first-born,

Flurry, who was staggering about the kitchen with a tin cart at his draggled little heels. "Open your mouth——" directed Lizzie-Kate sternly, exploring with an expert finger. "You bad, wicked boy, you!" she said, wiping his tear-streaming face with a corner of her apron, and rising to pursue instantly her employment and her conversation unruffled. "I wouldn't have to have much lunch for them," she said, of the wedding guests. "Some ham and some cake—and tea——"

"Oh, that'd be oceans!" Ellen assured her. "Maybe mama would make us her maple marshmallow cake," she added, with a rising inflection. For Mrs. Murphy's touch, with this delicacy, was unexcelled.

This question was presently answered in the affirmative by the lachrymose Mrs. Murphy herself, whose dingy weeds and spotted, colorless face now made their appearance at the kitchen door. Lizzie-Kate and her husband Joe Kane lived several blocks from her mother's shanty, and Ellen lived with them because it was nearer the trains. She had to report that she had stopped at Kate Oliver's, and that Bernadette looked as if she was sickening for something, and that she had met Minnie Cullinan, who said Ag was three months along.

Ellen and Lizzie-Kate kissed their mother affectionately, and Flurry was persuaded, under bribery, to submit his loose, soft, cool baby lips to her hard old ones.

"Minnie say anything about being engaged to Harry Casey?" Ellen asked, interested in the love affair.

"Aggie three months along again—my God!" Lizzie-Kate mused, interested in another young mother's problem.

"Poor girl!" her mother said, sighing. "Here she is with a man that'd pick a quarrel with his own guardian angel if he could see him, and another young one coming! You'd wonder a girl like Minnie Cullinan wouldn't have the good sense to keep out of getting married!" she finished darkly, with a significant glance in the direction of Ellen, whose preference for Mr. Clement A. Riordan was just now giving her mother and sisters some concern.

"Maybe I'm the kind that would never have a young one!" Ellen said shamelessly and blithely. "I was reading Immelda's history with her, the night I stayed at Jule's," she added, "and it seems there was a queen—and mind you, she was everlastingly getting up an excitement—but she never had any child at all——"

"Maybe she was one of them Produstunts—you couldn't expect much blessing on them!" Mrs. Murphy interpolated, with passing interest.

"She was a good Catholic," countered Ellen.

"Oh, well! then it was a trile God sent her," Mrs. Murphy decided contentedly. "And God only knows what He'll send you, Ellen," she added warningly to her latest born, "if you talk so free about what's none of your business, an unmarried girl like you! Me own cousin Jule Daly—that I named your sister for—wasn't she married a year, and took sick and all—and she says 'I don't know what's the matter with me!' and the child screechin' in the room——"

Even the sober Lizzie-Kate's handsome young face twitched into an incredulous smile at this, and Ellen laid her mahogany head upon the table and laughed silently but frankly. Mrs. Murphy glanced from one to the other with slit-like, faded old eyes full of bewilderment and suspicion.

"Very good," she said, "go your ways—and make a mock of your mother——"

She entered upon an embittered silence, when both Lizzie-Kate and Ellen, repentant, appeased and caressed her. Ellen presently introduced the subject of the luncheon, and the maple nut marshmallow cake.

Mrs. Murphy received the suggestion unenthusiastically; she pursed her mouth, widened her eyes and began to blink rapidly. Her gaze was fixed on space.

"You could make it, couldn't you, mom?" coaxed Ellen.

Her mother sighed.

"Well, I suppose I could, if I could get the eggs off Daisy Lennon," she admitted. "Me stove's gone back on me," added Mrs. Murphy pathetically. "Didn't I try to make Mart a custard last night, and the whole of it as pale as milk, with soot on it? I had the man there cleaning the best of the morning."

"Dear, dear!" Lizzie-Kate murmured sympathetically, removing Flurry's churning fists from the lard tin. "Well, if you can't bake, mama," she said comfortingly, "I'll make some of my walnut drop cookies. Joe's always glad when I get round to them."

Mrs. Murphy sniffed wetly.

"I don't know why you wouldn't rather have my cake than yours, Lizzie-Kate," she said disconsolately. "I don't know what's come over the ger'rls nowadays," she went on perversely, "the way they'd set invited company down to a lot of cookies—that you'd give children anny day of the week, and they coming home with their schoolbooks from school! Why don't you buy them a ham sandridge off the delicatessen, the way the Polacks do, and call that their lunch?" she demanded scornfully.

"What else would you have, mama?" Lizzie-Kate diverged diplomatically. She was expert in handling her pessimistic mother, or indeed anyone else in her group. Lizzie-Kate was thirty-two; her environment and education had always been of the plainest; she was a trifle too freckled, too pale and too worn for beauty.

She had stepped to the bedroom to get the baby, and had returned, and was seated, with the delicious, damp, wakeful, ringlet-crowned little lump of humanity that was Joe Kane, Junior, in her arms. Everything about her, especially now, when his fat fist beat her flat breasts, and her big, lean figure was bent about the baby, expressed the humble service of poverty and love. Lizzie-Kate would never see her name in print, would live and die, perhaps, in this cheap, two story wooden house; but the older women of her circle said that she was one of God's saints.

Lizzie-Kate had kept peace and harmony between her brothers and sisters years ago, between her dismal mother and her noisy, gay, intemperate father, between the neighbors. She loaned Ellen her new umbrella, and gave Joe the entire tenderloin, and got up noiselessly in the cold nights to give Flurry his cough medicine, and rejoiced and exulted the while as if these were rare privileges.

Her first thought upon hearing of any trouble, however remote from the sphere of her own responsibility, was eagerness to take her share of it—more than her share. "I'll take the children—I'll go in and set with her—I'll send over some soup——" said Lizzie-Kate. And when her husband or mother occasionally suggested that with two roistering babies and a family of five to cook and sweep and wash and slave for, she was already sufficiently employed, Lizzie-Kate was almost shocked by their consideration.

"You'll have me spoiled—the lot of you!" she said.

The family took her for granted. Mrs. Murphy knew now that Lizzie-Kate would presently ask her to come over, on the day before the luncheon, and make the famous cake in Lizzie-Kate's own fine new stove.

Ellen knew that Lizzie-Kate would somehow dispose of the babies, and have the house sweet and quiet, and give her friends a delightful meal.

Mrs. Callahan, who presently came in with her big handsome face flushed from the early summer heat and rings of sloe-black hair plastered upon her forehead under her bonnet, was sure of Lizzie-Kate, too. She wanted Lizzie-Kate to suggest some "talent" for an approaching fair, and Lizzie-Kate was full of suggestions and ideas. This settled, Mrs. Callahan was interested in the luncheon party.

"I'd hate to have mama slaving for my friends, but if you think it isn't too much ——" said Ellen. "I don't think it would do her no hurt," said Mrs. Callahan.

"Why don't you let me come over and fry you some chickens?" she asked. "There's nothing in the world I'd like better. It's Saturday, is it? And Mary's taking all the children into town, for shoes."

"I was thinkin' I'd run in and stuff some potatoes—it's very montonious for me now, what with Mart away all day," Mrs. Murphy added.

"All of you come!" Lizzie-Kate said cordially. "We'll not have much fuss. But there's the chicken and the cake and a salad——" She looked at Ellen interrogatively. "A salad?" she asked.

Ellen had been listening to the rapidly maturing plans with some inward dissatisfaction. She had asked these superior women from the office to an informal luncheon—it would be "fierce," thought Ellen, to have mama and Mrs. Callahan and Lizzie-Kate and the babies screaming and banging and laughing and gossiping in the kitchen, during the meal hour. The Kane house was so constructed that even whispers and smothered laughter and carefully lightened footsteps in the kitchen would easily penetrate into the dining room.

"Help!" said Ellen. "You'd think it was a wedding. Give 'em some spareribs like you had last night, mama, and let it go at that!"

"Listen to that!" Mrs. Murphy said, under her breath, in utter despair and contempt.

"Oh, Ellen, dear, you want it nice for them!" her sister exclaimed. Even the temperate Mrs. Callahan said reproachfully:

"You couldn't sit your friends down to spareribs, Ellen. I never heard the like of that in all my days. Why, at home even we'd kill a little pig, or maybe a goose, and have the lovely gooseberry jam that'd go with it, and maybe hot potato cake with the rich yeller butter melting out of it——"

"But Mrs. Callahan—but Mrs. Callahan——" Ellen protested eagerly. "These are just some of the girls from the office, that go out every day and have a cream cheese sandwich and a cup of cocoa, maybe! They won't expect much——"

"They'll get it then," Mrs. Murphy said grimly. "The least you could give them is a fowl—or maybe a young turkey——"

"Mama, for heaven's sake! Who ever heard of a turkey in June? You'd have them all laid out! They're on their way to a wedding anyway—Miss Chase, who was in the office so long. And they'll get scads of food there——"

"Why not lobster salad, and then the chicken with stuffed potatoes and new peas and maybe asparagus, and hot rolls, and a few things like celery and jelly——" Lizzie-Kate was beginning, when Ellen again interrupted:

"Because I'd like it to be kind of—well, careless," she pleaded, with some hesitation. "You know, as if it was left over—as if it was just what we'd have anyway. I just said to them, 'Well, if you're down our way, there's no decent restaurant, so why don't you just come in and have a cup of tea with my sister and I?' I thought," added Ellen, after an imperceptible pause of faint doubt over the last pronoun, "I thought—remember last Saturday you had such good macaroni, heated up, and two fish balls left, and an omelette?"

"Well, I couldn't give them the leavings of a fish dinner!" Lizzie-Kate said, scandalized.

"As far as that goes," said Mrs. Callahan sensibly, "it's no more trouble to cook one kind of dinner than another. Leave it to Lizzie-Kate, dear, and you'll have enough and plenty, and better food than they get in restaurants, whether it's grand enough for your friends or not!"

They wouldn't understand her. Ellen made another effort.

"I'd feel terrible if mama and Mrs. Callahan and everybody was slaving around in the kitchen," she said, in a distinctly ungracious tone.

"Then I'll do it all myself!" Lizzie-Kate, horrified at the faint suggestion of discord, said hastily and good humoredly.

"Then you'll not," Mrs. Callahan, who was Joe Kane's aunt by marriage and hence sometimes assumed a maternal tone toward Lizzie-Kate, said firmly. "You with two babies, and the weather getting so hot——"

"Why, what is there to do?" Lizzie-Kate asked innocently. "A little taste of lunch for a few girls——"

This was the note Ellen wanted.

"You could give them a stew, or any old thing!" she said eagerly.

"You wouldn't have to set the table for a stew, or get out your good napkins, or polish your forks," Mrs. Callahan said in deep sarcasm.

Ellen flushed resentfully. "My goodness!" she muttered. "I wish I hadn't asked them, the fuss you make! Another time I'll—"

Ellen had been saucy all her life. But she had proceeded no further than she perceived that she had gone too far. Her mother's old gray eyes grew stony in their gaze; Mrs. Callahan flushed with that pride and dignity that is the special attribute of her race.

Majestically the latter rose, and imperially she inclined her handsome head faintly in Ellen Murphy's direction.

"I'll say good by to you, Lizzie-Kate," she said pleasantly, "for I'm making the children an Indian meal pudding, and it has to be in me oven a full hour. Are you going, Mrs. Murphy? Good day to you, Ellen. Come and see me some day when you haven't a great many things you'd rather be doing."

"I hope you'll have too much good sense, Lizzie-Kate, to make any drop cookies for anyone, with all you have to do," Mrs. Murphy, departing, said pointedly to her older daughter, in a terrible silence. "I'd get a cake at a bakery that any one of them could buy for thirty cents, and good enough for them! And be sure you send them on to the wedding good and hungry, that they'd always tell it on the Murphys that they didn't get enough to eat under their roof. No wonder the foreigners get rich on us, with their delicatessen," added Mrs. Murphy, her voice now coming back like a banner through the doorway whence she and Mrs. Callahan had taken their leave. "If it's to give your friends a little ham that's like a few shavings out of a carpenter's shop, and a plaster of Paris cake full of eggs the paper itself called rots and spots——"

Lizzie-Kate, hospitably and distressedly seeing them to the doorway, turned back into the kitchen, to see Ellen, with the baby in her lap, her eyes bright and hard, her cheeks burning and her breath coming quickly, regarding her from the rocker.

"Now, what did I do then?" Ellen asked defiantly.

"Oh, Ellen!" her sister sighed, sitting down beside the table and passing her hand over her troubled eyes.

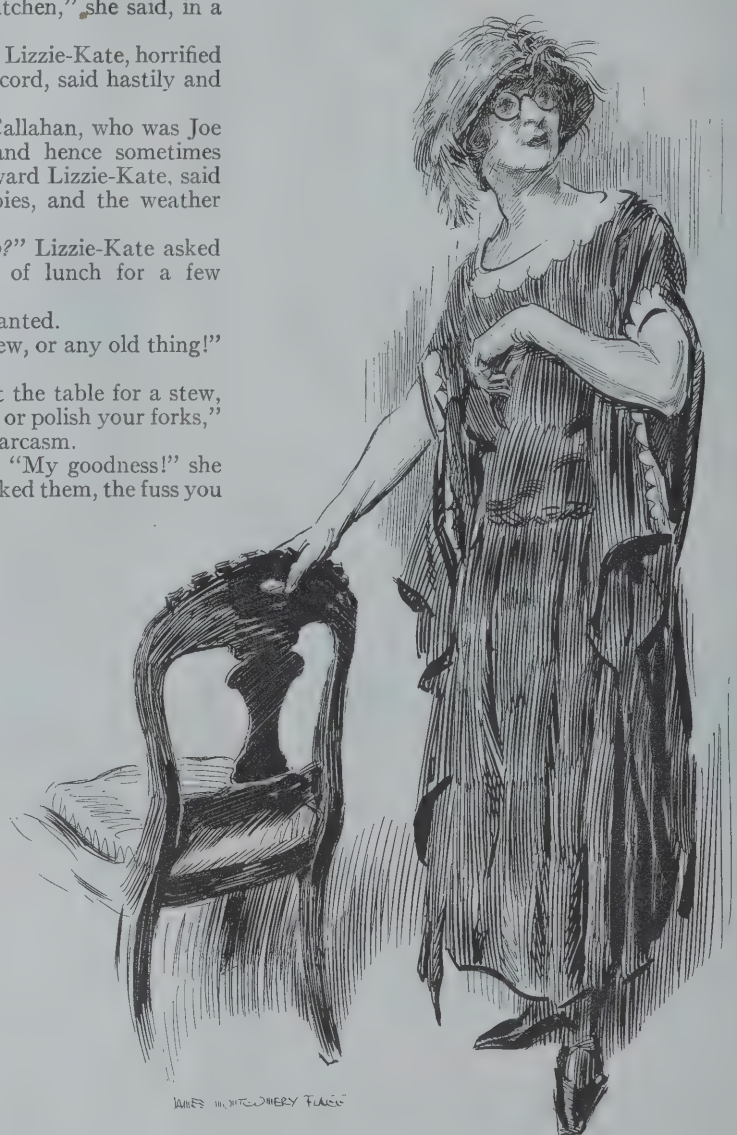
"Don't you mind—they weren't mad," Ellen stated uncomfortably, after an uneasy silence.

"Oh, I think you hurt poor Mrs. Callahan's feelings terribly, Ellen," Lizzie-Kate said miserably. "You as good as said that you didn't want her to come and help out—and you know how wonderfully she cooks chicken, with cream and tapioca in the gravy, and everything! And mama, too—she has so few pleasures, and she does like to make those zephyr potatoes, and cake, and all! And it's only day after tomorrow—they'll not get over it for a week at least—and it does make me feel so badly——"

"Well!" Ellen sniffed and was silent. "Well!" she said again, hesitantly and doubtfully, with her eyes fixed anxiously upon Lizzie-Kate. "But my gracious, what could I say, Lizzie-Kate?" she pleaded, suddenly softened and penitent. "I can't have mama fussing and stewing out there all through lunch, and Mrs. Callahan walking back and forth——"

"You made them feel terrible," said Lizzie-Kate, dispassionate but inexorable.

Ellen looked down, sniffed and twisted a pretty ankle sideways to jerk the rocker, which her mother had sometimes described as the "traveler of the world," back into position.



"Maybe you'd go over now and step into Mrs. Callahan's?" Lizzie-Kate suggested mildly, dampening a towel at the sink to wipe the sticky face of young Flurry.

"Maybe I wouldn't!" answered Ellen briefly, with a scowl.

Lizzie-Kate, unsurprised, continued to hold her hand patiently under the faucet whence hot water was supposed presently to flow, and Ellen continued to rock the blissfully sleeping baby. Nothing further was said upon the subject, until the unexpected arrival of Mr. Clement Aloysius Riordan.

Clem came to the kitchen door exactly as if it was an ordinary week-day, and an ordinary kitchen, and as if he didn't know or very much care whether Ellen Murphy was there or not. Clem with some girls could be a dashing, witty, audacious sort of man, big, good looking and confident. But not with Ellen Murphy.

This afternoon he had been walking about the neighborhood for twenty minutes and had twice passed Lizzie-Kate's house, moving rapidly and as one absorbed in thought, and all the time

Miss Carter—lean, dyspeptic and eye-glassed.

"Well," laughed Mrs. Murphy, "would anyone like Mart to go out and buy some bath mittens for supper?"

his entire being had thrilled to the one thought of Ellen, the one hope that today he might, by special action of a generous Providence, have one more glimpse of her somehow and somewhere.

She must have got home from the office early, was the first heart-chilling discovery. For the five-twelve and the five-twenty-nine trains came in, and she did not descend from their platforms. Maybe she was late——

Or maybe she was sitting in the kitchen with Lizzie-Kate. His heart turned to water at the mere thought, and his mouth was salt. Maybe she was sitting there, with her tousled bronze head and her bold, black-fringed blue eyes——

Clem walked briskly past the gate. You'd wonder, he thought forlornly, that that child of Lizzie-Kate's wouldn't be running about, and Ellen after him——

If he heard her voice calling "Clem!" he would pretend not to notice, for the first time——

He heard nothing. So after a while he opened the gate, his heart like a great dry lump in his throat and his honest face flushed, and went about the house to the kitchen door.

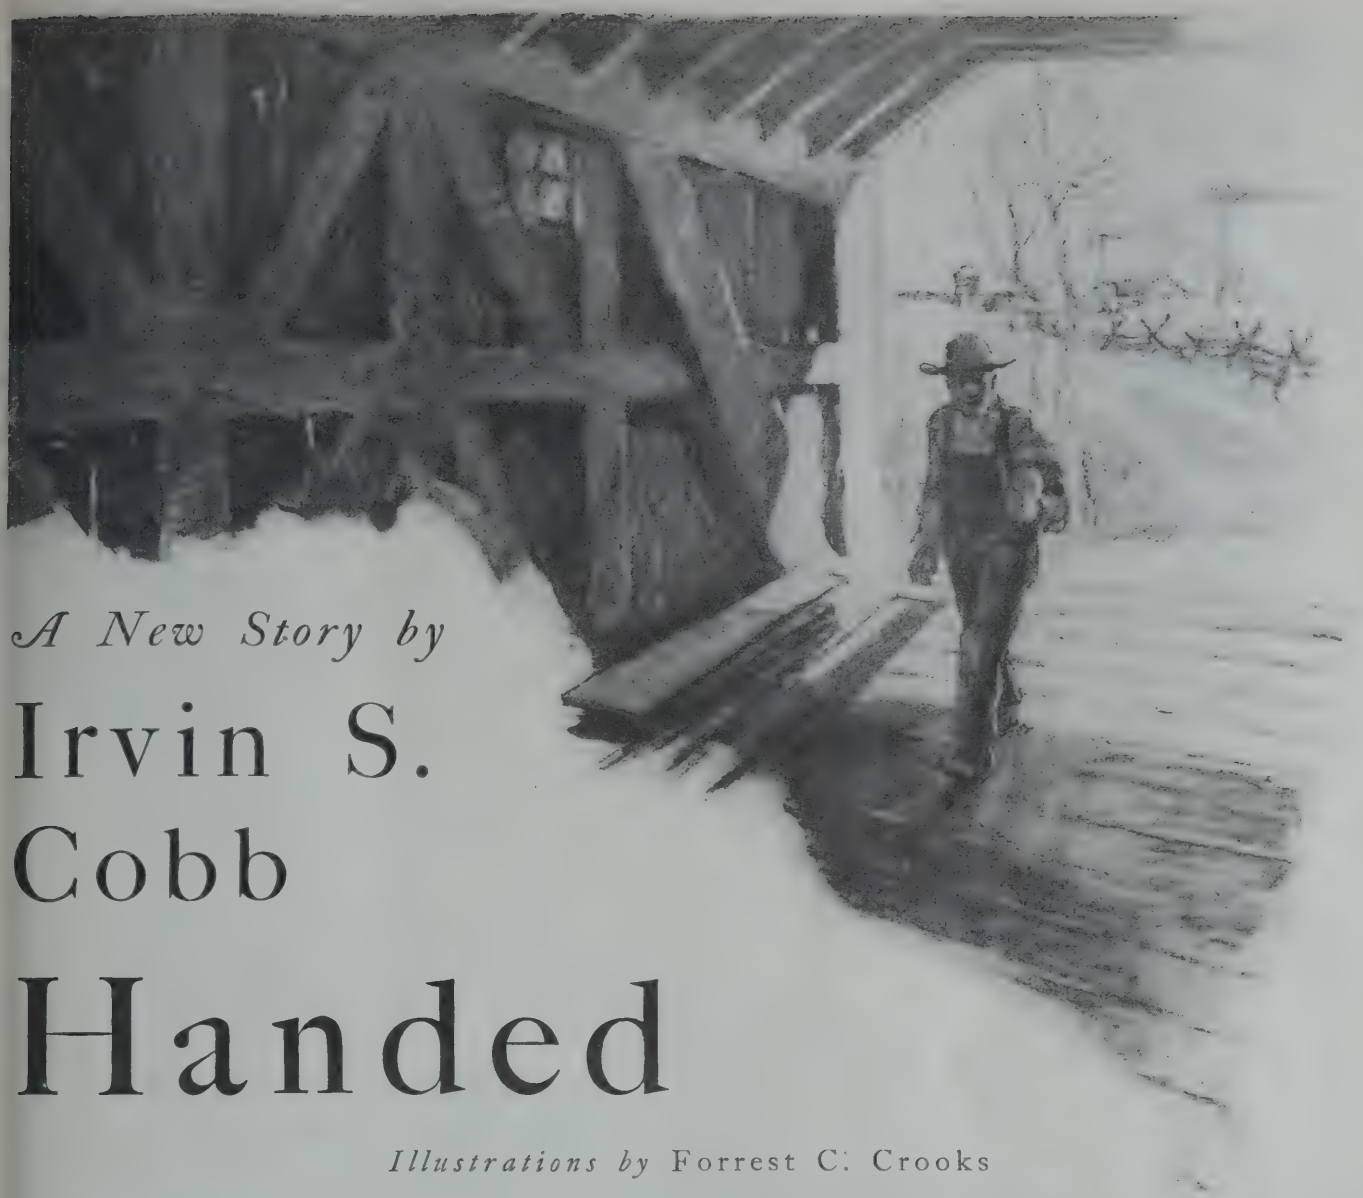
The orb of day itself, wedged into the old rocker, would not have dazzled Clem more than did Ellen, with a silk-clad ankle tucked beneath her and the little lolling body of the baby in her arms.

"Come in, Clem," said the immortally beautiful young voice, with resentment and appeal and laughter and all delicious provocation in it at once. "My sister's giving me the call-down of the year. I was just sassing mama and Mrs. Callahan, and Lizzie-Kate's excommunicating me!"

"I am not, then!" said Lizzie-Kate, with a shocked laugh. "It's her own guilty conscience that makes her feel bad, Clem."

"Why would you sass them?" Clem asked thickly, intoxicated at being here at the table, unconscious (Continued on page 112)

Solitaire had seen enough. The man approaching wore soiled overalls of blue jeans and what he carried was a smallish rounded package, enclosed in paper wrappings.



Red-

ACROSS a yellow creek ran a covered bridge perhaps two hundred and fifty feet long. The street narrowed where it met the bridge at its western end and broadened out again where it took up at the bridge's other mouth; but soon thereafter, as though depleted by the effort of getting over the hollow of the roiled stream. it lost all character of a street and frankly became a sand road, weaving off through the piney flats.

The bridge was built of wood, old but sound. Along its middle breadth even in broad day it was dark. almost. as a tunnel. There were small windows, set like square portholes high up and just under the pitched angles of the roof, but their panes were so dirty and so coated over with cobwebbing that they let in no light at all, and the loose ends of the cobwebs so thickened with dust and so fuzzy with hayseeds that they dangled down straight and stiff, like weighted top strings. Such sunshine as got into the center span at all came in by crannies overhead, where from age and weathering the shingles were warped apart, and it made sliced dapplings on the worn boards.

This being the nesting season, the barn swallows made soft whirring sounds with their wings as they went in and out of their dry-plastered homes under the rafters. At one place the 'dobe houses of the birds studded the side walls in an effect of a primitive mural decoration.

Just here, where the gloom was nice and thick, Solitaire waited for his man. He had been waiting for him for nearly half an hour now, sheltered behind one of the big square timbers that carried the upper works of the bridge. Where he was, he was excellently well sheltered. A person coming from the east to traverse the bridge had no chance to see him until abreast of him, if then. A person coming from the other direction might possibly see him, if that person

A New Story by

Irvin S. Cobb

Handed

Illustrations by Forrest C. Crooks traveled afoot and slowly and had very keen eyesight, or if Solitaire should move. He took due care not to move.

In this time while he waited, three pedestrians, all east bound, went right on by him with no sign on the part of any one of them of recognition of his presence, and a team and wagon rumbled through, making a tremendous clatter in that pent-in place and forcing spurts of dust from between the floor planks. In his ambush back of the support for the superstructure Solitaire felt quite safe. Better lighting would have revealed him, though, as an alien and a suspicious figure for these present surroundings. Realizing this, he was grateful for his artificial gloaming.

Because Solitaire nearly always played a lone hand he was Solitaire. All things considered, he found in the long run that it paid better. If, on the one hand, he took all the risk, on the other hand, he took all the profits out of an undertaking. When the job was finished there was nobody to claim a split with him nor did he run in the danger that somebody might talk too much. This was his way and, owing to it, he almost had lost the name he had been born with, which was Smith.

But in the matter in hand he had, by press of circumstances, been forced to break the rule and take on a partnership. Even so, he retained the captaincy, holding command of the major performance and playing the major rôle. In the jargon of the calling he was the Get-'em-up Guy. Five years ago the trade term for him would have been Stick-up; but crook language changes fast to match the changes of the times and the seasons. Upon him largely depended the success or failure of the major operation.

Still, and too, the duties of his associates carried responsibilities with them. Feary had their small swift new car halted, in readiness with the engine running, a hundred feet from the west entrance of the bridge. His task would be to cover the retreat, with gun fire if necessary, and afterwards to take Solitaire and himself away from there at fast flight. He was one of the Hard Boiled People, or by an argot now almost obsolete, a yeggman, bald in his craftsmanship but crudely efficient. His work, like Solitaire's, lay ahead of him. But the Sweet Caps Kid already had done his share. For two months now he had been upon the ground, spying out the lay of the land, generally getting the hang and the swing of local things. This had taken time, entailing also upon him a spell of uncongenial manual labor; nevertheless, and smothering his distaste for bread earned in the sweat of the brow, he had done his part well.

So both the others voted when, they having arrived, he made his reports to them separately. Feary, two days earlier, had come in overland, driving the car. Solitaire had traveled down by train from Richmond, which was the nearest large city, and had rented a room in a cheap boarding house. Feary was lodged elsewhere; and Sweet Caps yet farther away than either of them. It was desirable that in all preliminary measures they must seem to be as strangers to one another. It not only was desirable, it was most essential. Their one joint meeting had taken place the night before. To the conference the conferees had come by different ways, walking guardedly. The place of their meeting was a disused cotton gin at the end of the short side street whereon Solitaire temporarily was domiciled.

Beforehand, when the project was framed, the terms of division had been arrived at. For having, in the first place, smelled out the prospect Solitaire was to have a fourth; he also would be entitled to a second quarter share for his actual part in the operation. As the moneyed member of the firm he had from his own pocket provided funds for prior expenses. Out of his fifty percent he would reimburse himself for such outlays. The remaining fifty percent would go to Feary and the Sweet Caps Kid, cut even ways between the two of them.

So, at the rendezvous, there was no need for further discussion of financial details. Nor was there need for rehearsing, excepting most briefly, the steps previously taken, nor the somewhat unusual conditions which had brought the three so far from the Big Town for this venture. Regarding this last they already knew all there was to know. It was Solitaire who had nosed the knowledge out.

The situation here was this: The Tuckahominy Mills, the second largest textile plant of private ownership in the State, had lately, by reason of a death and a deathbed request, come into the possession of new proprietors. The original founder of the business had, in his last will, devised that a goodish sum in surplus profits should proportionately be divided among such of his employees as had served him for a stated length of time, or longer. One group of his legatees was content to abide by this decree. But there was a second group who opposed it, proclaiming undue influences on a failing and moribund mind in the final hours of their kinsman.

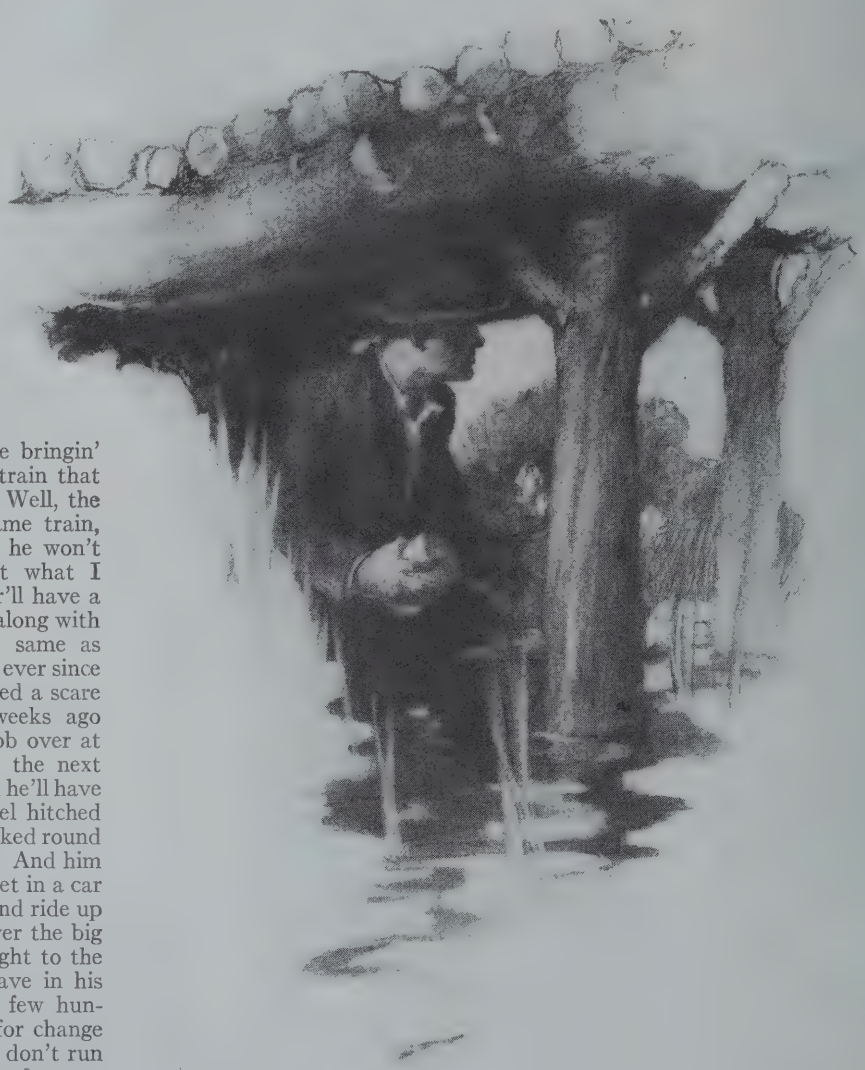
In this issue and on this point litigation and yet more litigation had followed. With other arguments, the contestants advanced the claim that no individual in his right faculties conceivably could have desired to bestow so unreasonably large a benefaction upon workers hired at current top wages and abundantly paid for their past labors. They pointed out that in the active life of the decedent there had been no provable act or word which would indicate in him the forming of so generous and so irrational an impulse. But the high judges ruled that the will was good and the will must stand. By order of court the money, on or before specified dates, must be distributed in specie and currency—for so the testator expressly had required—to the eleven hundred and odd operatives competent to share in it. The total, or any considerable part of the total, made a delectable beautiful stream.

The purpose, therefore, of the federated three in caucus this night in the abandoned cotton gin at the foot of Solitaire's street, was to divert this golden, green-backed bonus out of its ordained courses into a private channel of their own providing.

The Sweet Caps Kid was speaking, his jubilance seeking to lift his note, his instinct for caution striving to hold him to undertones. So his voice ran curiously up and down:

"Now, here's the plant just like I gets it: The regular paymaster of the company is supposed to be bringin' the jack down on the train that gets in at three-forty. Well, the jack will be on the same train, all right, alrighty, but he won't have it on him. Get what I mean? The paymaster'll have a couple of private bulls along with him for a bodyguard, same as they've been doin' here ever since the Ballard mob throwed a scare into these folks six weeks ago with that post office job over at Vanceton, which is in the next county to this one; and he'll have a leather money satchel hitched on to him by a chain locked round his waist, as per usual. And him and his two bulls will get in a car together at the depot and ride up the main street and over the big iron bridge, goin' straight to the mills. But all he'll have in his little keister will be a few hundreds in loose silver—for change when a mill hand's bit don't run to even money. Get me?

"But here's the right dope: While he's gettin' off the train on the side next to the depot another guy will be climbin' off on the other side. My info is that he'll be in jumpers or overalls, like a guy finishin' off a day's work somewheres up the line and on his way back home. Anyways, he'll be carryin' the real bunch of jack—the important money. Maybe it'll just be tied up in a paper bundle like an extra shirt or maybe it'll be hid inside his lunch pail—dinner bucket's what these hicks down here would call it. I ain't right sure on that point, but anyways it's dead certain to be one or the other of these two ways. All of it bein' in bills, it'll fold up nice and snug.



"Well, while the three guys with the phony roll are on their way to the front office of the mill, the guy with the big jack will be ramblin' away from the depot, swingin' north, and he'll cross over by the old covered bridge that you already know about—the one that's half a mile upstream from the iron bridge. Thinkin' that nobody's noticin' him, he'll head for the mill, meanin' to get in by the back door alongside the creek—river, they call it here.

"But he won't never get there—not with his bundle, anyways! These wisenheimers that run this dump think they're makin' it sweet and easy for themselves when all the time they're only makin' it sweeter and easier for us. First place, bein' a Saturday, it's the regular payday for the hands and they'd all be at the mill waitin' for their time even if there wasn't a special attraction to keep 'em there. Second place, everybody else in town that ain't in jail or sick in bed will be hangin' round there, too, to see the big pay-off of the gift money that this here old dead and gone pappy guy left to his pets. But say, listen: With any kind of a break it's goin' to be us three and not them dumb hicks that'll have the spendin' of——"

"Not so loud, Caps—you ain't makin' a speech," counseled the ever thoughtful Solitaire. "This guy that's to bring the important money across—besides his bundle and his workin' man's make-up, what else is there about him to help me spot him?"

"What else do you need? Chances are he'll be the only guy that'll come across that bridge, goin' toward the mill, round four o'clock tomorrow. Him comin' along with his nice tidy little bundle—ain't that enough? . . . Oh, folks"—even in his half whisperings his voice sang with the gloating that was in it—"oh, folks, this is goin' to be the swellest job that ever a small mob like this one pulled off anywheres! If they're only goin' to hand out one-quarter or one-third of the give-away dough tomorrow—and, as I told you, my tip all along is that they're figurin' to divide it up into three or four payments, a week apart, takin' care of the old hands first—why, what with the regular weekly pay-roll added on, the gross ought to run big.

"Why, it might go to seventy grand—eighty grand—ninety, even! And if they've switched Solitaire could not wait another minute. He must have a look at what was inside, count it bill by bill.

"Oh folks!" said the Sweet Caps Kid, "this is goin' to be the swellest job ever pulled off anywheres."

the play unbeknownst and decided to bring along the whole amount that's due to these rubes all in one chunk—but say, that's expectin' too much! My cut on what we do get is goin' be enough for me. Soft livin' for all three of us—huh?"

In the darkness where they squatted they made little greedy sounds with their lips as though sucking juicy morsels. The leader was the first to swallow his imagined tidbit down.

"Well," he said, "the rest of the play is clear enough, eh? Me and Pink, here, we lam in the little car with the stuff. Somewheres down the line we ditch her in a swamp—Lord knows there's plenty of swamps between here and the coast. Then, if there's no hitch, we meet you, Caps, in Charleston four or maybe six days from now, for the big split. If we get there first we'll wait, layin' quiet at that place down by the station where——"

"Don't worry about that," cut in the scout. "I'll be waitin' there myself when you get in."

"Wouldn't it be better if you stuck round for a couple or three days anyhow?" suggested the bulky Feary, in his thick, eaten-out rumble. "You beatin' it too soon might set these here hick bulls to thinkin' somethin', and if they trailed you—well, you know there's goin' to be the devil raised all over when the blow-off comes. And——"

"Not a chance," said the Kid crisply.

The Kid quite often had heard that saying touching on honor among thieves, but being a thief himself he never experimented, if possible to do otherwise, with a view to testing the soundness of the proverb.

"I'm trustin' you two with the bundle for these four or five days because I got to—and that's long enough. I'm beatin' it out of here Sunday, bright and fair. I gave the foreman my notice last Monday. Tomorrow I'm through. And Sunday I blow. I'm sick of this whole country—sick of gettin' blisters on my hands hustlin' stuff in the shippin' room over at that damn cotton mill, sick of talkin' to these Johnny Raws and country Janes that don't speak my language. And I'm sick of the chow they feed you on, thinkin' it's food—corn bread and cow peas and fried fat meat and boiled rice and gummy yellow yams. I don't care if I never see no more boiled rice again as long as I live. Me, with my roll, for the Main Stem quick as ever the rattler can get me back there!"

As he waited, the three foot travelers went by Solitaire but they all came from the east, from behind him, and so he gave them no heed excepting to flatten himself the more closely into his protecting jog until they passed. Then, soon after, the wagon rattled through in the dust cloud of its own raising. Then, watching out from behind his upright, he saw a lone pedestrian coming out of the west and heading toward him. • It was a man, moving along briskly. He carried something under his left arm. For a very brief space his figure was framed in the squared opening of the bridge, with all his contours sharply marked and outlined, and then as he entered the zone of false twilight, the shape became blurry and indistinct. But, for his purposes, Solitaire had seen enough. The man approaching wore soiled overalls of blue jeans and what he carried was a smallish rounded package, enclosed in paper wrappings.

Even in the cloaking dark it was plainly to be seen that this individual experienced a profound shock when, about midway of the bridge, Solitaire, stepping out of covert, met him breast to breast. But this shock for him instantly was swallowed up in a greater one as the barrel of Solitaire's automatic buried itself for half its short length in the bibbed frontlet of his overalls, belly-high on him.

"Stand still, bo!" commanded Solitaire. "Don't you move! And don't squawk!"

The advice appeared superfluous. From fright and astonishment the man was instantly rigid. Only his midriff, obeying a perfectly natural impulse, shrank mechanically inward under the pressure of that blued-steel muzzle.

"What's in that bundle you got?" asked Solitaire, his voice laden with menace. "Talk fast—but talk low." Ordinary procedure would have been to loot the victim without questioning him, but here Solitaire must make sure. In a business so important as this there must be no mistake made. He counted on fear to bring forth the truth.

But fear, it seemed, had in this case gone further. It locked the overalled man's jaws and swelled up his tongue. Striving painfully to answer, he only stammered:

"P-p-p-p——"

He strove harder:

"P-a-a——"

"I know—payroll," supplemented Solitaire, piecing out for him. "Payroll and what else?"

The other tried again but choked on his unintelligible effort. His stutterings made no sense.

"Tell it, bo, if you're hopin' to live," prompted Solitaire "What you got here?—what does it come to?—quick!"

"Q-q-quar—quar——"

"Just about now them suckers are shapin' to give us the race of our lives, Pink," cried Solitaire.

He gagged and gurgled, the sounds fluttering in his constricted pipes. With a supreme desperation he got the final syllables out:

"——m-m-m-m-il-l-l-ion!"

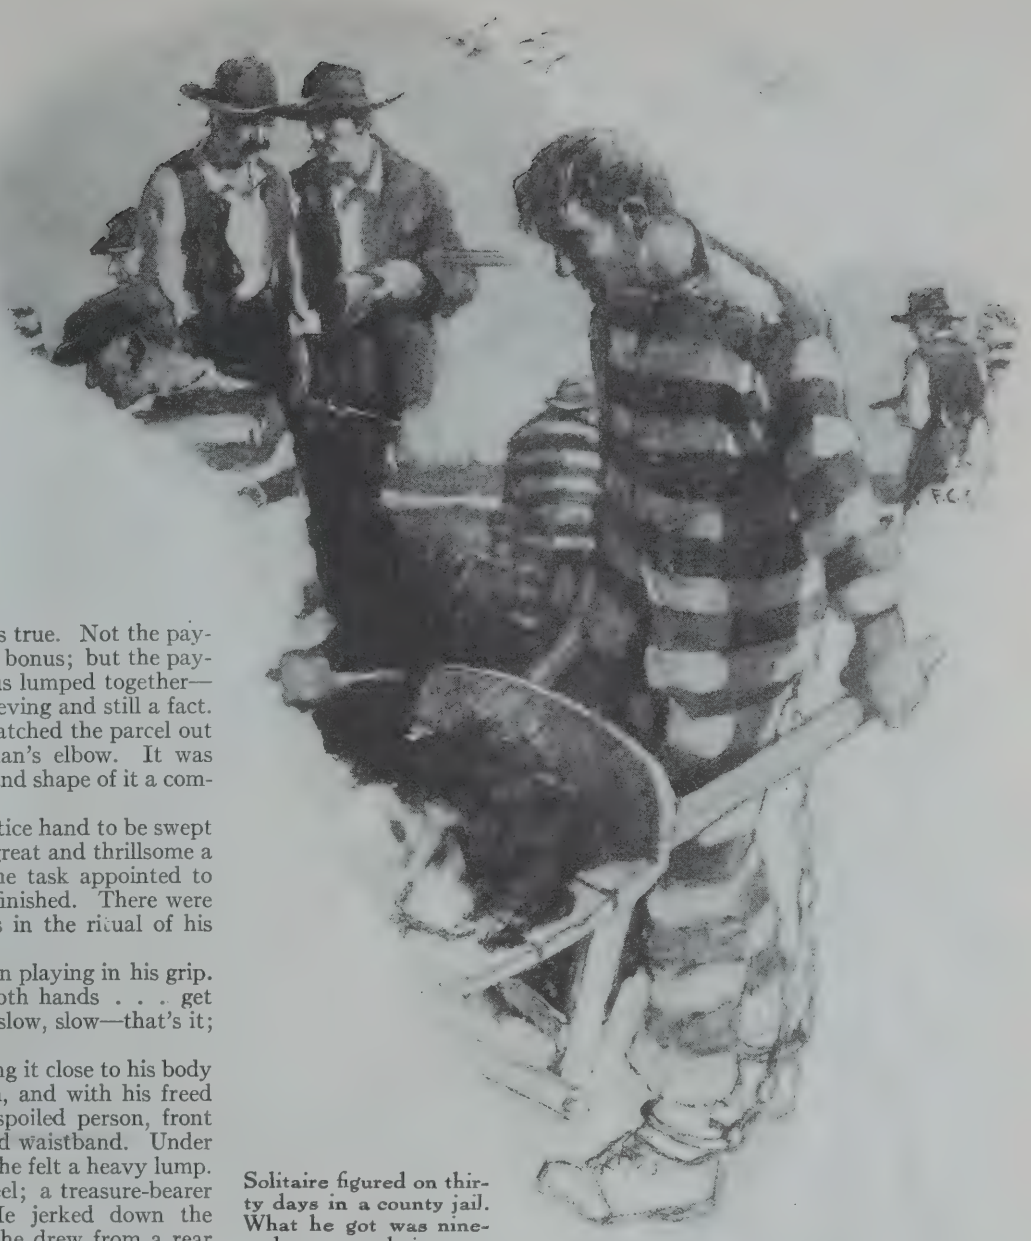
"Quarter of a million! What?"

Incredulity, gloating, a feeling of exultation so great he scarcely could make his brain accept what his ears had caught up out of these scraps of words — the incredible admission temporarily stripped Solitaire of caution. His own voice rose:

"Quarter of a million—that what you're tryin' to say?"

Quite speechless now, the man nodded his head as fast as he could wag it.

It was incredible and yet it was true. Not the payroll and a third or a fourth of the bonus; but the payroll and the full sum of the bonus lumped together—a quarter of a million! Past believing and still a fact.



With his left hand Solitaire snatched the parcel out of the stiffened crook of his man's elbow. It was heavy, firm, solid, the very heft and shape of it a comfort to his clutching palm.

Solitaire, though, was no 'prentice hand to be swept off his feet by tidings of ever so great and thrillsome a joy—to break and run before the task appointed to him had been rounded out and finished. There were formalities remaining; essentials in the ritual of his craft.

He stepped back a pace, his gun playing in his grip.

"Get 'em up, buddy . . . both hands . . . get 'em up high! Now turn round slow, slow—that's it; now stand right still."

He shifted the package, gripping it close to his body by the pressure of his right arm, and with his freed hand he swiftly slapped the despoiled person, front and back, flanks and armpits and waistband. Under the thick jeans, on the right hip, he felt a heavy lump. That was what he expected to feel; a treasure-bearer naturally would go armed. He jerked down the shoulder-straps of the overalls; he drew from a rear pocket of the wearer's trousers a revolver and dropped it into his own side coat pocket. He yanked the sagging overgarment still farther down until it bunched and corrugated in folds on the other's lower legs. For added emphasis to this, his final warning, he bored his gun-snout into the man's spine.

Solitaire figured on thirty days in a county jail. What he got was ninety days on a chain gang.

"Stick right where you are for ten minutes, bo," he admonished. "If you move—if you squawk—if you turn your head to look round—if you make a sound—there's a pal of mine waitin' right here, handy by, to plug you good and plenty. You ain't got a Chinaman's chance. Ten minutes, remember, and then you beat it back out of here the same way you came."

He retreated swiftly, confident that no outcry of alarm would be raised behind him. His confidence was not misplaced. The robbed one, goggling, gasping—and obedient—stood stiffly where he was, his hands above his head, his ankles caught in the accumulations of their blue jeans fetters, a cold sweat rising out of his hair roots, and on his face the look of one who has had a tremendous and a stupefying surprise.

With his gun bestowed in its breast holster inside the vent of his waistcoat, Solitaire came out of the easterly mouth of the covered bridge. He did not run. A casual eye would have been caught by the sight of him running. But he walked very swiftly, like a man going upon an errand calling for haste.

Seeing him coming and seeing that he carried a round small package circular in shape with flattened ends, like a canister, and enclosed in paper coverings well tied on, with stout cord running round and round it and criss-crossed over its top and its bottom, Feary set the car in motion. It was going ten miles an hour as Solitaire, hurrying forward, swung himself up into the seat by the driver. It was going thirty-five when it came alongside the first of several many-windowed buildings of the Tuckahominy Mills Company that stretched in an irregular row along a low ridge of clayey red loam where the land dropped away to the shallow ravine of the creek.

Out of the corners of their eyes as they passed, the two men in the swiftly moving car saw that in front of one of the smaller buildings—one that bore the word Office painted above its doors—a big touring car stood, and about it a crowd that might number hundreds, patently made up of townspeople and operatives. Some few of these persons turned their heads with a mild curiosity as they whizzed on by, but their passing at such speed made no special stir among the crowd. Even in that flash of time they both could tell that much.

Nevertheless, Feary mended their gait. Immediately they left behind the most outlying of the negro cabins on the fringes of the town, and the heavier valley loam gave place to a light white sand where their way wound in and out among the loblolly ranks of cut-over pine lands. Until now neither had spoken a word.

With his eyes front on the road unreeling before him and his capable hands juggling the steering rim of the careening car, Feary, out of one corner of his mouth, presently spoke:

"Got it, huh?"

"Sure," answered Solitaire, who jounced and slid on the cushions, with his body half twisted about as he watched behind them, searching for signs of any pursuit in the spindling second growth, which whirled past, life-size, (Continued on page 128)

PHOTOGRAPH BY NICKOLAS MURAY

South of Washington Arch, the magnificent structure designed by Stanford White, Lies

GREENWICH VILLAGE

The Melting Pot of American Art—New York's Bohemia

Greenwich Village

By O. O. McINTYRE

COME for a stroll through New York's "Bohemia!" It is a cloistered spot a stone's throw from the city's roar where Art and Hokum struggle valiantly for the highest expression. Welcome to Greenwich Village!

Watch Tiny Tim, arch-apostle of indigestion, in tam and velveteen coat, sell his tray of "soul candy."

See Sonia the cigarette girl, with cherry-red lips! The priceless Clivette, the Man in Black and his inspired daughter Sappho! Peter the smocked silhouette cutter!

Walt the caricaturist, who will sketch you as you dine. Diantha the bead girl. Jud the expressionist. Takiro the hatless Japanese poet. Fashion illustrators. Basket weavers. Brass pounders. Boys from Wanamaker's.

Hear Bobby Edwards carol in ribald song to the tune of his cigar box ukulele:

> Way down South in Greenwich Village
> Where the spinsters come for thrillage!

The Village sprawls about the triangular squares that spread out from Washington Arch where Fifth Avenue ends. There are Queen Anne cottages with ivy-clad lintels, musty stable studios, lean-to coffee shops and Colonial mansions with foot scrapers and shiny brass knockers.

Here is a section of New York not swallowed up in the omnivorous maw of progress. It slumbers along with the picturesque dreamers, nurturing the shiftless and cradling the genius.

The keystone of The Village is the historic old Brevoort—the last stand of the glorified table d'hôte—with its tiny office gay with French feuilletons. Southward is the dreamy background of imposing peace and quiet, studded at night with the flaming cross of the Judson Memorial and the Hotel Judson, haven of struggling artists and writers. Nine out of ten famous writers and artists have lived there at some time in their lives.

It is when the first candle sputters in Grace Godwin's Garret that the Village awakes from the slow tides of sleep. At Washington Arch the lumbering buses unload their quota of timid sightseers. Stable doors open. The curtain goes up on the nightly show.

Short-haired ladies and long-haired men move across the Square to cheerful open hearths in the food caravanserais. The intellectual fires are burning.

In a far-away corner at Bertilotti's the smocked young man begins reading Freud. Tonight he seeks the ambiguous thrill in higher thought. Tomorrow he punches the time clock at Macy's.

The worn brick pavements fill with leisurely groups on their way to see John Barrymore's house right next to a stable. Ambidextrous guides lead their wide-eyed charges down the middle of narrow streets flanked with flapping wet wash.

In Frank Shay's bookshop the boy book reviewers, newspaper columnists and juvenile cynics are defending Cabell and damning Sumner. While about the counters girls with slip-on dresses and ponderous horn glasses peep at tomes unexpurgated.

In Sheridan Square the auto salesman from Detroit hears the brigands roar under the buccaneering beams of Don's Pirate Den and lifts the loudest roar himself when he gets the check.

At The Mystic Shrine the sad-eyed lady lecturer reveals the phosphorous painting of the crucifixion. Her daughter is the reincarnation of Cleopatra and is inspired by Cleo to fashion reams of verse. She also dances odes to things and dies at the end of the dance, as is the custom.

In Barrow Street is the "secret" home of the intrepid Arctic explorer who seeks the quiet of the Village to soothe nerves rubbed raw by civilization.

Around a corner is The Samovar, a low-ceiled old stable where prim old ladies gather—the last stand of lower Fifth Avenue's generation of lavender and old lace. Up the street a sawdust-coated place where young men exchange boutonnières.

And just off MacDougall Street the studio of Miss Margaret Wilson. Hard by The Bamboo Forest, where Chinese students from Columbia serve home-cooked native dishes and tutor those seeking to master the intricacies of Chinese.

The whole is a disorderly jumble of tea rooms, coffee house and specialty shops. Each clashing the cymbals of Freedom.

A few yards of chintz, a coal-oil lamp and an iron kettle out front, and lo! a Village shop or tea room.

Tommy's, The Wood Box, Vagabondia, The Mad Hatter, The Pepper Pot, The Jade Buddha, Peg's Pantry, The Pig and Whistle, The Red Head, The Blue Horse, The Flamingo, Romany Marie's, Jean's Dye Pot, and so on without end.

From the cobwebby attics and dank cellars come the sagacious and slovenly, the unfed and unwashed, whose only crime is "idealism."

Some to whom Art is the mightiest shibboleth and others to whom Art inspires the interrogative: "Art who? And what's his last name?"

Overexploited and undernourished, the Village greets Life with an Eva Tanguayish shrug of "I don't care!"

It will apparently be as unmoved over the master hand that paints the deathless canvas as it is over the unspeakable bordel a few doors away where men paint their lips.

What cares the Village if ladies stencil their stockings, shear their locks, rouge their knees or smoke thimble pipes? Or if the men go hatless, sockless and shirtless?

No elusive complex the Village pursues is so complex as the Village itself. As rakish as a pirate brig, it manages to streak hocus-pocus with the alloy of greatness.

Genius is combed from the attic as well as the parlor and many of the foremost poets, authors, painters and sculptors came from there.

Out of a tumble-down shack two years ago a penniless youth named Schwartz went forth to Rome with the Tiffany prize to pursue his studies in plenty.

It was at a corner table in The Mad Hatter that Hendrik Van Loon patiently wrote "The History of Mankind" and at the same table drew his illustrations. O. Henry, too, wove many classic tales at the café tables.

In the salons you will find such gifted persons as Frederick MacMonnies, the sculptor, Rose O'Neill, mother of the Kewpies, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, and a host of others.

Few Village stores open during the day and the hubbub of trade reaches the crescendo after the dinner hour. Here one may buy a ten cent cigarette holder for a dollar and not give a hang. After all, one must remember the "atmosphere."

There are batik gowns, hand-woven dresses, old samovars made week before last in New Jersey, metal work, lamp shades, "new" antiques, naughty pictures and trick ukuleles.

After the shopping hour, the alley theaters with dramas sometimes classic but more often guttery draw their heavy audiences, who are unconcerned over the hard bench seats and gunnysack curtains as they thrill to Art's Great Impetus.

There is Harry Kemp's shrine of art with the vagabond poet selling tickets, passing programs and taking part in the play.

Butler Davenport a little north of The Village has his Bramhall Players with Davenport directing, acting, producing and sleeping upstairs. If you like the play drop a coin in the collection plate when the curtain falls.

Too, the Provincetown Players, who paved the way for Eugene O'Neill to Broadway. Here is an institutional flower that grew in the bog—giving the Rialto astounding plays.

After the play, to the Club Gallant, that aristocratic haunt of Barney Gallant, the Village Mayor. A shrewd little Hungarian, with a Piccadilly accent and Chesterfieldian manners.

A six by four stage with a Continental review and a female Balieff. Intimate and cozy, and one may find a sprinkling of Broadway's Who's Who willing to step out on the Lilliputian dance floor and "do their stuff."

One sees the circusey side of the Village and chuckles. And then turns down one of the quiet streets going home to see silhouetted figures in studio windows—patiently sculpturing, painting and scribbling until dawn pinks the sky.

And one wonders and wonders!

Jemima Made

A Story of a Woman who it Means to Love

Illustrations by

Jemima, slim, prim, with the clean beauty of a tulip, was made out of the stuff of martyrs.

THE missionary passion burned like red pepper in the soul of Jemima Taylor. Slim, trim, prim, with the bright, clean, upstanding beauty of a tulip or a hollyhock, she was made out of the stuff of martyrs. When she came to the town of Glory, she came, with her preacher-father's picture, her Bible, her volume of Whittier's poems and her Book of Sermons, ostensibly in answer to a call for schoolmistress, but covertly to "carry Christ."

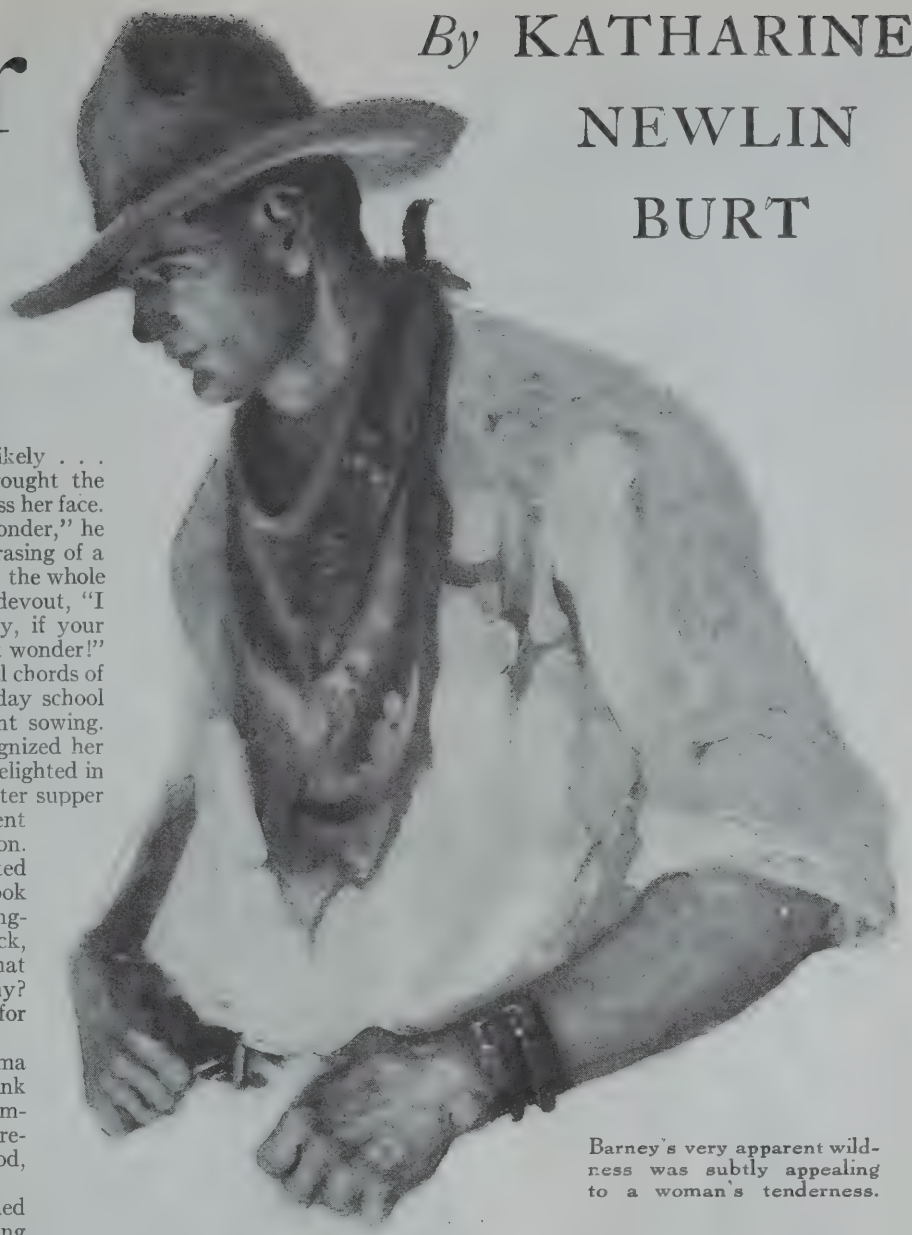
And her Christ was the Christ of a New England Puritan, a figure unrecognizable upon the shores of Galilee or in the narrow alleys of Jerusalem, a Christ who did not eat and drink with sinners, who lifted no healing hand upon the Sabbath day, and who not only scourged buyers and sellers from the Temple but who gathered stones for the surer execution of a "certain woman"; a frigid, unsparing northern divinity whom it was difficult to imagine as the Beloved Son of any Father, human or divine. Nevertheless, in worship of Him, Jemima Taylor bent her slim pale knees and folded her slim brown hands. And in His name she felt strong enough to walk across hot ploughshares, to brave lions or—if it were really necessary for His service—to eat at the same table with Peter McQuarg!

It was not long before, as schoolmistress, she knew every man in the country, beginning with the more familiar town dwellers in that town of fifteen houses and ending after a few Saturdays and Sundays with the names and faces of the ranchers who rode or drove in for their weekly business and recreation.

In town the school board were her lovers to a man. Honesty Grill said that she "put him in mind of an old-fashioned garden"; Rawle Jones, the barkeeper, said she was as "pretty as a spotted pig under a painted wagon," which, with a wink, was his way of paying compliments; Bertie Maroon, the male milliner and barber, said she had a "poke-bonnet kind of face" and was accused of sitting up nights to fashion one for her.

When she told them sternly that Glory must have a new schoolhouse, of concrete, well heated and with modern ventilation, they knew that this must indeed be so and bent their brows. It would cost a pile of money and Glory was "short," always "short" and always in debt to Rawle Jones. But "something, Miss Taylor, would sure be done." When she started a Sunday school for her children the attendance was predominantly masculine and adult. It brought a grave slim dimple into that pink cheek of hers, to see them move across the schoolroom and settle into the little overwhelmed seats. But she thrilled to hear them singing "In the vineyard of our Father, Daily work we find to do" or "There's a home for little children above the bright blue sky," for she said to a rebellious sense of the comic, which had many a time been brought to death's door but which lived on faintly in spite of her, "except ye become as little children ye shall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven."

And there was so very much of the child in the souls and eyes and faces of these weather-beaten men; in all, that is, but the soul and eyes and face of Peter McQuarg. Plain to a Puritan instinct, there was set upon his countenance the Devil's seal of mockery. She would have dreaded his sure appearance on a Saturday evening if that had not meant also the sure appearance of his partner, Barney Griffith. She was not at all satisfied that Barney was not a Devil's disciple—certainly he followed upon the heels of Peter like a swaggering and slender shadow—but for so young and beautiful a disciple, with so disarming a gay smile, for a disciple with so sweet a deference, for a disciple, in short, whose very apparent wildness and lack of anything so stern as a Puritan upbringing was subtly appealing to a woman's tenderness, there was hope. If she had been sent by a merciful Father to Glory in time to save the soul of Barney Griffith, she had not been sent in vain. Thus reasoned Jemima.



She lived in Room No. 3 at Mrs. Phin Clay's road house beside the creek which divided one half of Glory's buildings from the other, and she ate at Mrs. Clay's long narrow table. It was at this table on a Saturday and Sunday that she had to face McQuarg. Always he sat opposite to her. If necessary, he commandeered the seat. But this position was taken primarily for entertainment, not for admiration. His dark, weather-beaten, thirty-five year old face, given to terrifying vociferations, appalling stories of successful villainy perpetrated by himself and "the boys" he had known in a sinful past, prone to occasional queer oaths and quick with a sneering, whip-like mockery of her pretensions, took away her appetite. He had a horrible fashion of deferring to her speeches, of murmuring with a ducked

Over

Learned what Greatly

By KATHARINE NEWLIN BURT

Robert W. Stewart

Barney's very apparent wildness was subtly appealing to a woman's tenderness.

head, "Yes, ma'am? And then what?" or "Likely . . . likely!" in an incredulous drawl which brought the lively blood of unchristian fury tingling across her face.

At times he dared to be personal. "I wonder," he said once, interrupting her careful paraphrasing of a sentence from the Book of Sermons, to which the whole table was listening with eyes tender and devout, "I wonder what you'd look like, Miss Jemimy, if your face was dirty. Kind of pretty, I wouldn't wonder!" And there thrilled a giggle through the vocal chords of the devout. Just so one bad boy at Sunday school will tear out an acre of "teacher's" patient sowing.

She could see too that he perfectly recognized her fury, her hatred and her fear, that he even delighted in the trilogy of her emotions. Sometimes after supper in the crowded little parlor, he would present himself like an empty vessel for reformation.

"I was onc't inside a church," he admitted reasonably, "and a man dressed up to look like a ghost sure give me a reg'lar dressing-down. When I begun to answer him back, they throwed me out. Now, do you call that a square deal, man to man, Miss Jemimy? Would you 'a' had me throwed out jest for standin' up for myself thataway?"

"You were in God's house," said Jemima with a supreme exercise of courage, a pink forehead below her yellow hair, and a trembling voice, "and the parson was His representative. Would you talk back to God, Mr. McQuarg?"

"Likely . . . likely," sighed Peter; folded his hands between his knees and stuck his long tongue into his cheek. "You may be right about that representative business . . . but it ain't democracy!

"Now I want to ast you, Miss Jemimy, like one of your scholl'ards in the schoolhouse, would you marry a hard drinker?"

Young Barney Griffith, looking over a fashion magazine three years old, flushed scarlet and put the paper up before his face, not noticing that almost every other male face in the room had assumed what, under the circumstances, might almost be called "protective coloring."

"Certainly not!" Jemima answered and added rather weakly, "not that I think it a question you have any right to ask me, Mr. McQuarg!"

"Well, ma'am, just to be clear, and sence you hev answered—would you marry a man who drank strong liquor?"

"A man who loved me," Jemima murmured, "would be willing to give up alcohol for my sake, I presume."

"Likely . . . likely," drawled McQuarg, and while the faces about him faded to a strong self-sacrificial pallor, he swung one dusty boot across the other and went on, "Now, as to yer attitude towards tobaccy?—smoke and chaw."

Jemima rose and stood flowering vividly from a proud root; then she gathered up her papers, uprooted herself and stepped out of Mrs. Clay's red-hot parlor. As soon as she was safely upstairs the phonograph was turned on and a comic song, in which she felt there must be some impropriety or McQuarg would not so noisily have enjoyed its chorus, racketed through the frame house. In the middle of its third verse something came with a violent thud against her window.

Jemima stood up from her knees—anger at McQuarg had made prayer an instant necessity—and pushed up her sticky pane.

Below stood Barney, who had thrown his glove and now spoke wistfully: "It's real early, Miss Taylor. I was wishing you'd let me show you that pony I was telling you about last week."

Jemima hesitated. In the wide stare of a full moon, Barney in his rancher's best of new blue overalls, beaded boots, yellow shirt and flaring silk handkerchief, was as gorgeous as a passion flower. He needed salvation obviously and bitterly. McQuarg's partner, living day by day under the dissolute eye of an atheist, a mocker, a despiser of women—oh, how the poor boy needed her! Her heart—she thought it was her soul—melted, grew large and quivering and sorrowfully glad.

"I'll be down, Barney," she called in her voice like a wineglass touched ringingly. "I'd adore to see your pony!"

She wrapped her soft brown cape around her and came out, bareheaded, by the back door into the moonlight. Barney and the night and youth made her forgetful of her driving God. Her blood of a martyr was inevitably also the blood of an eager and dissipated lover of life. She was gay and sweet and her eyes warmed. Sometimes the dedication of her soul, renewed weekly with prayers and tears, to McQuarg's reformation, gave her beautiful, almond-shaped eyes a gray and shining splendor which was colder than winter dawn; but not so her resolution to save Barney. The temperature was altogether different and her eyes looked meek and quite unfathomable. Like all saints, she was far more dangerous in her softness than any sinner.

When, several months later, after tears and prayers innumerable, she consented to marry Barney, it was apparently in such a spirit of golden dedication. She refused to let him kiss her until they were man and wife.

"And, oh, Barney," she mourned when she had silenced his timid protests—he was still very much afraid of her—"must McQuarg live with you after we are married?"

"Why, sure! Ain't he my partner? Why, Jem, think of all you can do for him, girl!" By which it may be seen that Barney, even with his fears, was not without a certain artfulness.

She stood drooping, then seemed to gather herself together and held up her head like a lighted taper.

"With God's help!" she said, closed her eyes, opened them and added, "Won't I need it, though!"

Anyone but Barney watching the change from sanctity to vindictiveness in her twenty year old face would certainly have laughed.

Barney looked worship and uneasiness.

The night before she left Glory to follow her husband to his ranch ten miles away, Jemima, at Mrs. Clay's celebrating board, made a last appeal for the modern schoolhouse. She had not given up teaching the dear children of Glory, she said; she hoped to be able to go on with her work next winter. She felt that it was a work entrusted to her, to which she had dedicated herself; that, and the Sunday school. But she did please want them to make a supreme effort to give their children the healthful and civilized surroundings which their promise deserved. They ought to have desks which gave them elbowroom, seats which would not cramp and deform their supple little spines, and light so scientifically distributed that their sensitive young eyes would not suffer. There should be new clean books to replace the dirty, dog-eared, germ-saturated readers and arithmetics.

She left Glory brooding in a cloud of self-reproach, remorse and civic conscientiousness. If this dainty New England scholar had dedicated her flower-like self to the service of their offspring, even to the extent of being willing to ride twenty miles bi-weekly in winter to her duty, then should they not be willing to provide these improvements she demanded? But the cost! The cost! Fathers, yes, and conscientious bachelors, beat at their brains, while mothers, newly awake to the horror of germ existence, gave such looks as are difficult for a sensitive souled man to bear.

Jemima, meanwhile, proud of the disturbance she had wrought in Glory's domestic peace, drove on the high seat of a "white-top" by her bridegroom's side, away and away, slowly, behind the heavy team, from the kindly little dwelling places to that white road which went faring with a desolate pioneer courage out across the loneliness of plain and distant hills. She was, for the first time in her rapt life, afraid of living. She had the feeling of a disembodied creature who, after floating for pure æons in azure space, discovers that he has a body by being crashed against the earth. There went a shattering and grinding sensation through her bones.

On that soft and sappy day of June, a high rare June of snow patches and little ready golden flowers, McQuarg stood waiting, grave and clean and well controlled, in the doorway of their home. The two men had been at tremendous pains to sweep and garnish their abode. They had added to the original three-room shanty a fine, clean, aspen-scented chamber, freshly daubed and chinked, wide-windowed, its board floor washed with sunshine, furnished in bedstead, tables and chairs of peeled logs, and boasting, besides, Jemima's heart's desire, an open fireplace.

For a wedding gift McQuarg had sent as far east as Chicago for a wicker rocking-chair. He had allowed neither Barney nor himself nor the Airedale terrier to desecrate it. It was, like all rocking-chairs in his mind, sacrosanct to wifehood and maternity. He would have liked to lay a square red shawl smoothly across its back. Jemima pleased him with her pleasure when she came into the room, and especially with the look in her gray, home-loving eyes when she sat down in that rocking-chair of his.

But neither man had realized how the new apartment would contrast with the older portion of the building. Jemima's immediate desire—missionary zeal as usual—was to uplift the old level of living to the new. Therefore she turned everything out of doors, including McQuarg, Barney and the Airedale; she scrubbed and scoured, she swept and beat, she mended, she painted and she inconveniently demanded carpentry. Also, she made war upon the habits of McQuarg. A frenzied longing for the extremity of tidiness was a natural longing of her soul.

Jemima knew that the estate of matrimony was accounted holy, but not all the sacraments of all the priests in Christendom, not any fifteen minutes of churchly abracadabra could undo the sinister deformation of her mind, consistently shaped through twenty sensitive years, to the effect that a body in itself is unclean, shameful, sinful, that its natural pleasures and experiences are of an evil and secret complexion, and that, though a man may be a beast, a pure woman gives herself coldly like a pearl to swine. So, if Jemima at times was, in spite of her long inhibition, a thrilled and thrilling thrall to her young passion, it must be admitted that at other times, taking vengeance on herself and all mankind, she was something of a Tartar.

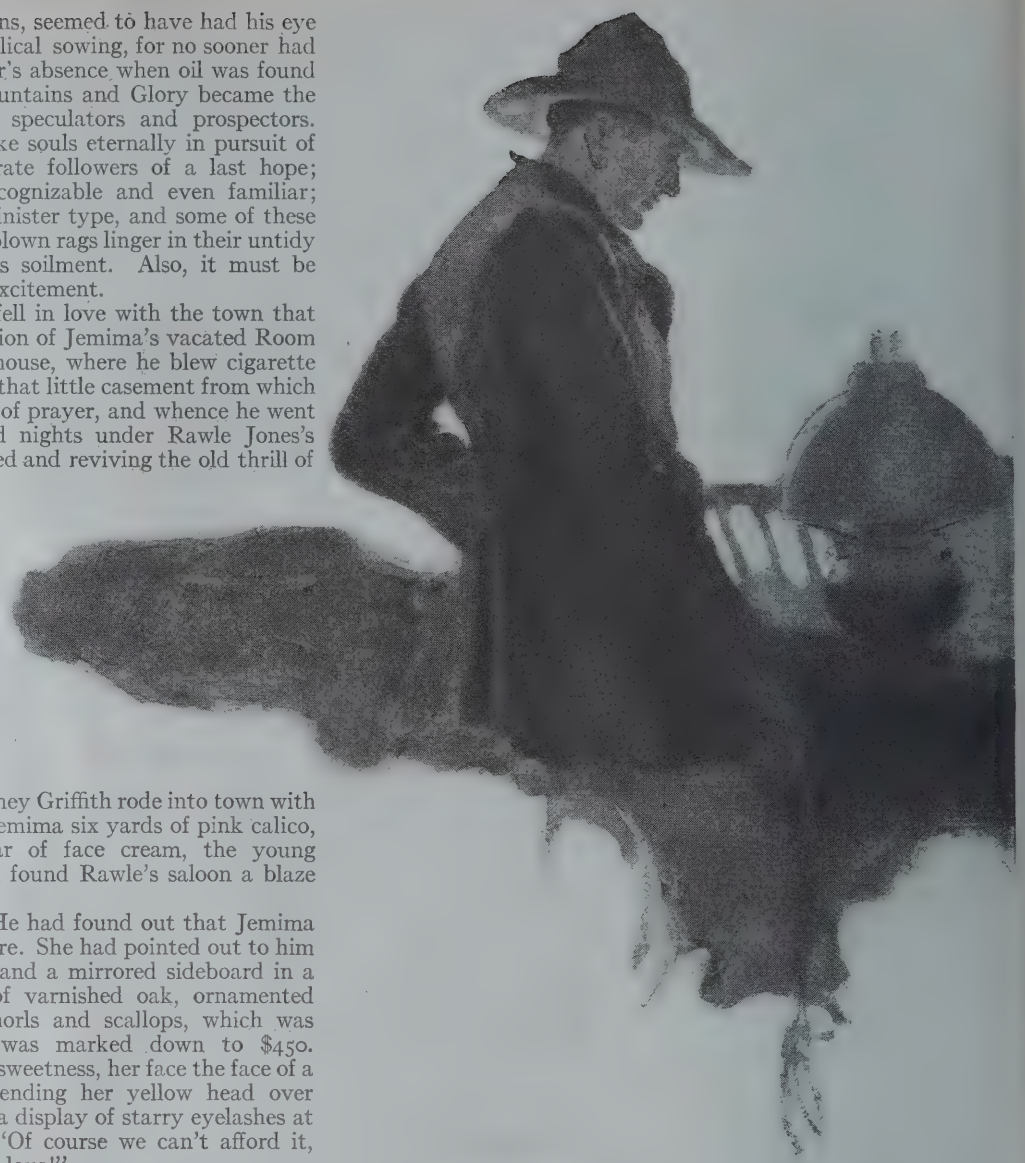
Jemima hit her man in the boot.

And because tenderness for Barney held her hand, she made McQuarg her victim. Causes of persecution were: his dirty-footed—even if she did kiss his nose in corners when nobody saw—dog, the mud from Peter's boots, his odor of the corral, his tobacco, his smelly old pipe, his newspapers, his cigarette ashes, the crumpled bandana handkerchief which always lurked in the corner of any chair which he had just vacated, his fishing tackle and bait, his old cap and mackinaw, the way he ate, his grimed and broken finger nails, the infrequency of his shaving, his need of a new pair of overalls and a sanitary toothbrush, his spitting into the stove.

McQuarg was curiously patient. He attempted small reforms. He even bought a brand new doormat and remembered, every now and then, to wipe his feet. He spared Jemima his wit, his laughter and his cynicism; he even curtailed the gorgeous exercise of his gift for satisfying and unusual oaths.

None the less, she contrived still to hate and to fear him. His spiritual conversion limped. He avoided the institution of family prayers. He never opened, she was sure, the Bible she laid upon his table. He did not bend his head for grace, which always caught him unaware with his mouth open for speech or food. He rode oftener than before into Glory and came back redolent of strong drink and boasting of a gambler's rewards. The beautiful persecution of her eyes, like slender greyhounds, pursued him about this home he loved; they were always cruelly on the scent of his soul.

"Oh Barney," cried Jemima, "must McQuarg live with us?" "Why, sure! Ain't he my partner?" said Barney.



For Barney's soul she considered already saved. The man to whom she had sacrificed her spirit's conventualism must inevitably be saved. Besides, he was still very gentle and timid and obedient. The natural swagger of him, body and mind, had been chastened by his entire devotion. He feared her daytime self because, knowing so well the starry glory of her, he dreaded to frighten it and went softly through the hours in unconditioned surrender to the termagant for fear of losing forever her beautiful, desirous, loose-haired sister. He no longer sang the gaudy songs which so offended her; he chanted the hymns she had taught him.

O what fear man's bosom rendeth
When from Heav'n the Judge descendeth
On whose sentence all dependeth.
Worthless are my prayers and sighing
Yet, good Lord, in grace complying
Rescue me from fires undying.
With Thy favored Sheep, O place me,
Nor among the goats abase me
But to Thy right hand upraise me.
While the wicked are confounded
Doomed to flames and woe unbounded
Call me, with Thy Saints surrounded

Such words she sang, high and sweet and shrill, inside the house, while he outside, within earshot, sang the same words, strong and deep and true. It was a duet beautifully to her liking. Yet all the while a tiny worried corner of her consciousness was occupied by McQuarg, perched like a lean demon on a rail fence by her window, mending rope with his great, clever, labor-gnawed hands, and—oh, how well she knew!—with that terrible half pitying laughter in his deep-set crinkled eyes.

Satan, father of all lesser demons, seemed to have had his eye upon the field of Jemima's evangelical sowing, for no sooner had she turned her back for a summer's absence when oil was found in the flat plains beyond the mountains and Glory became the halfway house for a stream of speculators and prospectors. Some of these were eager, childlike souls eternally in pursuit of rainbow gold; some were desperate followers of a last hope; others were just speculators, recognizable and even familiar; but there were many of a more sinister type, and some of these last, going or coming, lingered as blown rags linger in their untidy journeyings, in Glory, to Glory's soilment. Also, it must be admitted, to Glory's pleasurable excitement.

There was one visitor who so fell in love with the town that he settled into months of occupation of Jemima's vacated Room No. 3 at Mrs. Phil Clay's road house, where he blew cigarette smoke on summer mornings from that little casement from which she had sent up the frosty breath of prayer, and whence he went out to spend his afternoons and nights under Rawle Jones's patronage, initiating the uninitiated and reviving the old thrill of the half forgetful in the delights of faro. Ambrose John was always friendly, smiling and beyond belief entertaining. Unheeded hours could drift over the head of an enchanted listener. He dressed with a sort of splendor, used pomade on his bright hair, waxed his mustachios and showed, when he laughed, teeth as bright as china between his healthful lips. A diamond flashed on his dexterous hand.

On that August night when Barney Griffith rode into town with Peter McQuarg in order to buy Jemima six yards of pink calico, ten yards of toweling and a jar of face cream, the young exile of love and of sanctification found Rawle's saloon a blaze of conviviality and mirth.

Barney had been depressed. He had found out that Jemima didn't like the living room furniture. She had pointed out to him a set of beautiful chairs, a table and a mirrored sideboard in a mail order catalogue: a suite of varnished oak, ornamented with nicely applied repoussé whorls and scallops, which was exactly her ideal. The suite was marked down to $450. She had smiled with renunciatory sweetness, her face the face of a Peri glimpsing Paradise, and, bending her yellow head over the page, she had looked up with a display of starry eyelashes at her husband, to reassure him. "Of course we can't afford it, darling, but wouldn't it be mar-ve-lous!"

For the first time in a careless, busy and self-sufficient life, Barney had felt the pinch of poverty. He owned a good little hay ranch, to be sure, and he and McQuarg between them could boast now of a tidy herd of cattle, a herd for which they had comfortable winter feed and upon which they were certain this year of a profit. But $450 was the cost of an entire year's supply of canned goods and was obviously not to be thought of. But oh, how the young husband yearned to make one of the big gestures natural to his generosity and to say, "Sweetheart, these elaborate upholstered chairs, this elephantine table and this sideboard, polished and magnificent, are—yours!"

He came out to his saddled horse—he had been delayed in his farewell to Jem by her absorption in the catalogue—with a bent head and a pinched face, so that McQuarg, mounted and waiting, had stopped abruptly in his whistling.

"Sacred Maria!" he ejaculated. "I must 'a' shed my old pants plumb in the middle of the floor."

"No"—Barney shook his head—"you're not in wrong this time, Peter. It's me. I'm a no-account kind of husband for a girl like Jem."

"Ain't you religious enough for her yet?"

"Religious? Oh, likely I am. But I'd sure like to buy the girl some store furniture."

Peter nursed his bewilderment in silence as they rode.

But Glory, ablaze and vocal, distracted the two ranchmen and the spell of Ambrose John fell dazzlingly upon them so that Jemima's cloud was lifted from their souls. When McQuarg went over to the furnishing store with its abstracted owner and a lantern, to buy six yards of pink calico, ten yards of toweling, and a jar of face cream, he left Barney deep in faro, flushed, a glass at his elbow and many times its contents inside of him. And McQuarg rejoiced.

"It was time that young feller bust loose a bit," he confided to his companion.

That night Ambrose John was like a man inspired. He stood up on his chair and made a speech. He said that the town of Glory had been so almighty good to him that he'd like to do it a service. He said he'd heard that Glory needed an up-to-date schoolhouse. He suggested that half the proceeds of the night's activities, Rawle's and the winners', all and sundry—there being a crowd of oil prospectors in their midst—be dedicated to the building of a schoolhouse worthy of the "best traditions of Old Glory, of which Old Glory might be Glory-ously proud."

His eloquence, his glittering black and white smile, his soft voice and flitting diamond, mounted like a firefly on his gesticulating finger, all cast their spell. Glory, its natives and its visitors, agreed to the proposal and prepared to be magnificent. Rawle's properties flowed and the card tables were overfilled. It was a night of mighty expenditure, not easily to be forgotten.

At dawn the proceeds were counted and divided by the one entirely sober man, Ambrose himself, and presumably the half dedicated to civic improvement was handed over to Honesty Grill for temporary safe-keeping. Honesty was especially reliable in his mild cups; the native guilelessness of his soul blazed like a ruby in his face. He invited Barney to accompany him when he carried the treasure to his home. He wanted to show the boy a newly "mountain head of mounted sheep." The transposition of syllables was unnoticed by Barney, who gravely and gracefully accepted the invitation.

That brief walk across the bare and windy central spaces of Glory between the saloon and Honesty's home was long enough to bring to Barney's consciousness the fact that he was drunk, that he had gamed away the money for the pink calico, the toweling and the face cream, and that Jemima had expected him home before midnight and that it was now very nearly morning. At that, a thousand tons of misery and fear thundered down on his mind and he followed Honesty into his kitchen with the face of the condemned.

Jemima flickered like a straight flame. "I'd as soon touch a poisonous toad—as him" she said with a spurning look.

Honesty put the money entrusted to him into an empty tobacco box and went out to bring in the "mountained sheep" from an outside shed. Before he went, he remarked: "Four hundred and fifty dollars! Four hundred and fifty dollars! That'll sure help Miss Jemima some!"

Barney, tottering to and fro near the table, began to whisper to himself: "Four hundred and fifty dollars! They're going to give her a schoolhouse when what the girl really wants is a set of furniture," and then his liquor-released soul suggested, "What'll she care if I do come home the worse for strong drink if I can say to her as I walk in, 'Girl, here's your set of furniture!' "

Golden light radiated through the inky blackness of his mind. All the weight of remorse, dismay and fear rolled from him. Like a boy who stands in immediate peril of a flogging and is miraculously provided with a convincing excuse, he staggered with the face of such a happily reprieved culprit across the room, transferred the $450 from Honesty's box to his own pocket and then sat down, his booted legs sprawled out, his handsome head thrown back, on his lips the smile of a kind deed well done, to wait for Honesty. Vaguely he felt that he ought to explain to his host the transfer of Jemima's money, but the obligation was not weighty enough to trouble his serenity. So he still sat when McQuarg joined him.

"We'd better be getting along towards home, Barney," said McQuarg uneasily.

"Sure had," agreed the boy provided with a good excuse, and amiably but without great physical certainty arose.

They made their excuses to Honesty out in the shed where he was still wrestling with the pale stiff face of the "mountained sheep," and just as Barney collected the words for explanation, McQuarg pulled him away. "Can't stay here forever jawin'," he remarked.

They went over to their ponies. Barney mounted without the aid of his stirrup and saved himself with exultant laughter from falling off on the other side, and they galloped away under stars all pale and shaken by dawn across the gray sage plain pearly with coming light. Five minutes out of town Barney pulled up and wheeled.

"Peter," he said thickly, "you go on. I'll overtake you. Post office will be open now and I've got to get back. Money order."

McQuarg thought it just as well and rode on alone slowly. He was not, he told himself, especially "suffering with impatience" to see Jemima. There would be time enough, time enough. As he came to the outer ranch gate, Barney, galloping like a devil on a rocking-horse, overtook him, pulled rein and rode his lathered animal more soberly beside his partner's up the home trail. He looked white now and dazed and there were smudges as of burnt cork about his eyes and lips.

"You turn the hosses out, Pete, will you? I want to see Jem—quick!"

Peter, whistling doubtfully the tune of "O what fear man's bosom rendeth," eyed the swaying and stumbling figure as it made its confused way towards the cabin door.

"There will be hell to pay," said McQuarg, and made time with the untying of his cinches.

When at last he opened the door he found himself immediately face to face with Jemima. She was dressed in a wrapper of pale blue flannel, beneath which showed the hem of her long nightgown and the whiter insteps of her slippered feet. Her hair hung down like two thick ears of corn on either side of her face. Between these bands of golden color, she was gray with an extreme disgust. Straight at her feet like a shadow from a taper's foot, lay Barney. He slept noisily and his unconscious face was sodden and discolored. The sun had risen so that a cool, clean red light came through the open windows.

"Yes," said McQuarg, "we both drank more than was good for us and played cards. I carry my liquor better'n Barney. Let's get him to bed, Jemima."

Jemima flickered like a straight flame. She tightened her hands into slender marble fists.

"I'd as soon touch a poisonous toad—as him," she said, and her eyes swept the six feet of relaxed manhood with a spurning look.

McQuarg caught her eyes as they lifted from their castigation of his friend and for an instant held them.

He then put off his hat and coat and went over to Barney. His strength lifted the lumpish weight and supported it into that spotless, aspen-scented bedroom, where he got it into a bed only faintly disturbed by Jemima's half-hour of anxious sleep. After the victim of Glory's hospitality had been tenderly bestowed, McQuarg returned to Jemima. She stood at a window breathing deep breaths of giddy mountain air and staring at the untainted sky.

"You can go to him now," said McQuarg coldly; "he's pretty near good enough now to be looked at by his wife."

Jemima turned, came across the room and gathered herself together into one of the big log and rawhide chairs. She pulled up over her a coyote skin and resolutely closed her eyes.

"I will sleep here," she said, "until it's time to get breakfast. My bedroom is no better than a beast's den."

McQuarg's face, grim and pale, flamed redder than the day.

"Do you love my partner, Barney, Jem?" he asked.

"Not that Barney." Her lips spurned his name as her eyes had spurned his unconscious body.

"Well," said McQuarg and pointed to the door, "this is his home and the home of them that loves him, bad or good, drunk or sober, in Heaven or in Hell, uplifted or forsaken by Almighty God—like I do. What's love if it ain't more'n one-half loyalty and forgiveness?"

"He is a drunkard and a coward," Jemima answered, white-hot as her faith, and sitting up straight to face him. "He tried to buy my forgiveness with a lying gift. He said that he had made four hundred and fifty dollars at the gaming table and that he had sent a mail order for a suite of furniture. Then he asked me for a kiss!" She sobbed once.

But McQuarg had suddenly forgotten to be angry. The signals of his rage had been wiped entirely from his face.

"Four hundred and fifty dollars! Great guns! Honesty had just that amount of cash. Barney went back to send a mail order. Four hundred and fifty dollars! The boy gets clean out of his sense of what's his and what's your'n when he's good and drunk."

McQuarg's lips were drawn and his eyes scorched with dread of something. He went in and began a brutal and determined rousing of the stupefied man. After a half-hour of deliberately inflicted torment he came out to Jemima, whiter than she.

"Jem," he said, "Barney was clean out of his head. He took four hundred and fifty dollars from Grill's tobacco box and sent it off to buy your furniture. By now likely Honesty has missed the fund—it was to help towards the new schoolhouse. Glory is full of dangerous hoboes this morning and even its own folks won't be in a nice frame of mind if they're roused early after last night. Barney and I are the only men they can suspect. We was both at Grill's house. Barney showed his hand at the post office when he sent that money order. What in hell can we do?"

"What—in hell!" she muttered with a detached and dreadful bitterness.

"He's got to get on a horse and ride over to Gramer's and collect that money Gramer owes me. It's money he's had under his hand, as I asked him, to be delivered without question or delay at my demand. I'll write to him. If Barney's quick and if we can hold up any that comes to ask questions, he can just about make it and save his skin."

"He can't stand or walk, how can he ride?" she asked with the same impersonal and scornful aloofness.

"He's got to." McQuarg went in again. From behind the door came moans and enforced footsteps. At last Barney appeared, death-gray, his eyes wet and dazed with pain and weeping. He was fully dressed. Without looking at Jemima he stumbled past her and McQuarg presently had him on a horse. Unwillingly Jemima watched him ride past her window, sitting low in his saddle, bent forward like a man in pain.

McQuarg returned. He held himself quiet and taut like a listener. He did not look at Jemima again and she began to feel a queer sensation of disembodiment as though she had altogether ceased to exist.

"Ah!" said McQuarg sharply after a time of dreadful silence, and stood up. "Go into your room, girl, and stay there!"

As she rose she too heard the mad thudding of hard-driven hoofs. She obeyed him slowly.

McQuarg went out and stood before his door.

He had been right in his summation of the mood of Glory. These riders, half a dozen or so, who tumbled from their saddles and ran across his sage, were an advance guard of picked rascals who had galloped ahead of a more measured justice so that they could indulge their secret appetite for violence, cruelty and power. They demanded harshly:

"Where's Barney Griffith? We want a thief. And we want four hundred and fifty dollars."

McQuarg, standing at ease a little above them by his door, smiled down. "Sorry, boys, I haven't the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars in the house, and Barney is asleep."

"All right. You let us go in and wake him up. We want to see your partner, feller!"

"If anyone wants to see my partner in that tone of voice, he's got to hev a sheriff's warrant."

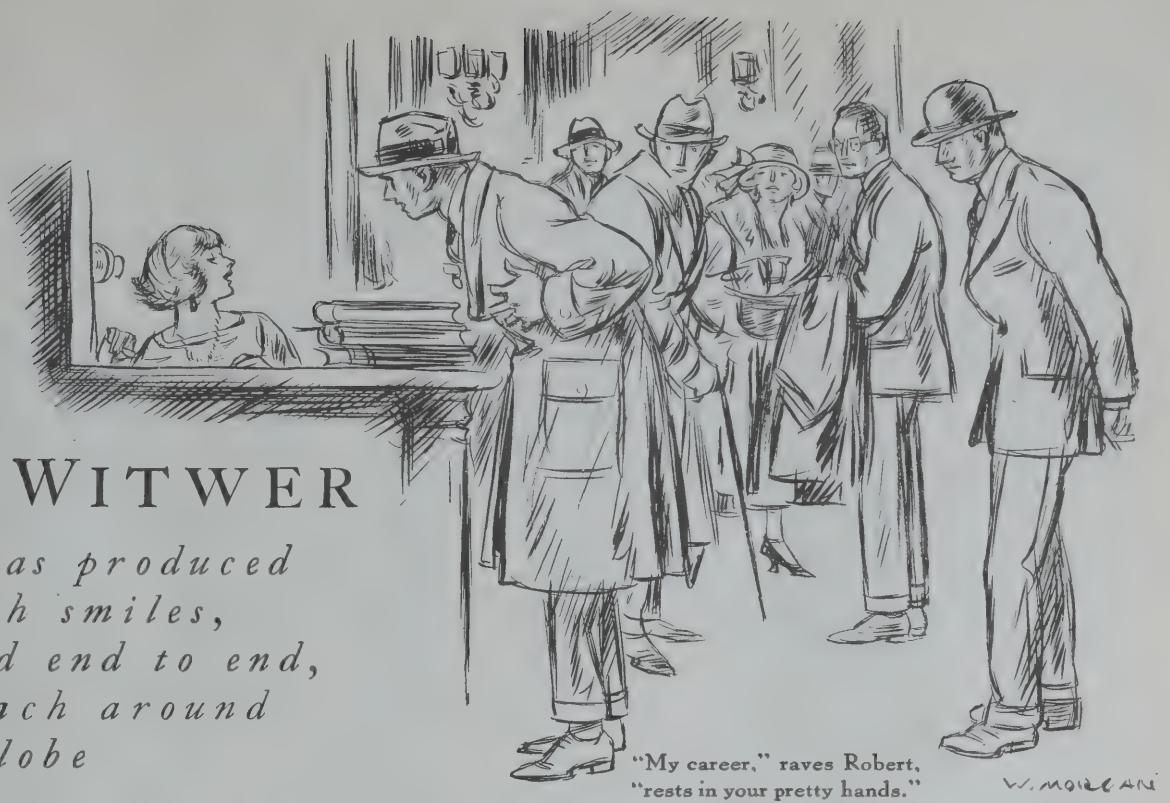
"To blazes with warrants! We forked out four hundred and fifty dollars' worth of charity and we ain't figgerin' to give the spendin' of it to Barney Griffith. We know he took it, man. The dern fool went and handed in the exact amount at the post office and sent a mail order."

"Hold up the mail stage then, why don't you?" McQuarg suggested.

"Oh, we ain't worryin'! We'll get the cash all right. But we're figgerin' on gettin' the thief, savvy?"

"Well, keep right on figgerin'. If you meet the sheriff on your way back to Glory, tell him if he rides quick he'll be in time to have his breakfast with us."

And McQuarg turned to go in at his door.



At this, one of the strangers, unsteady and blear-eyed, pulled out his six-shooter. The bullet stung the tip of McQuarg's left ear and made a hole in the door. He spun in swiftly, slammed it, locked it, and shouting, "Lay down on the floor, Jem!" he proceeded to clap to the heavy winter shutters of solid wood. When he had finished he found Jemima, fully dressed, standing beside him.

"There's a big square hole in one of the shutters," she said, "where Barney was going to nail a new board."

"Yes, ma'am. We got to close it."

Jemima put a thoughtful finger against her dimple.

"I've seen something just the right size and shape," she meditated, went swiftly in and out, and fitted her Book of Sermons into the open place. It filled (Continued on page 112)

"My career," raves Robert, "rests in your pretty hands."

W. MORGAN

By

H. C. WITWER

who has produced enough smiles, placed end to end, to reach around the globe

When Knighthood Was in Tower

Illustrations by Wallace Morgan

A HUNDRED and fifty years ago, the late Mr. Samuel Johnson yawned, picked up his pen, jabbed it in the nearest inkwell and dashed off the following nifty:

"No man but a blockhead ever wrote except for money!"

Now, really, with plenty of due respect for the deceased, I'm compelled to remark that in my opinion the above wise crack is the ant's smoking jacket. I admit that I have yet to stumble across a writer who made it a habit never to take any doubloons for his stuff, but I do know a milk-fed author who says it with plays and who doesn't give a good gosh darn whether he gets pennies for 'em or not, as long as he gets his concoctions produced with his name on 'em. My boy friend, Guy Austin Tower, is an incurable addict of that habit-forming drug, Fame, and he'd rather have three cheers than three dollars. Oh, yes, I forgot to mention that this master mind is a full-blooded millionaire and that does make a difference, now doesn't it?

Mr. Tower's first play is still running on Broadway and if it isn't a success then neither is Henry Ford. Getting a seat in Heaven and getting a seat in the show shop where Mr. Tower's riot is on view are two feats of equal difficulty, and judging by the lines outside the box office there's the same number of people trying to get into both places. I have a season pass—to the theater, not Heaven—and can go as often as I can stand it. That's very nice, but what I should be clicking off is a large slice of the weekly loot, because if it hadn't been for me there wouldn't have been any play!

In case my face isn't familiar, I'm a telephone operator at the hotel St. Moe and one of the girls the Prince of Wales didn't dance with when he was seeing America thirst. The other girl who missed a one-step with His Highness can't get nobody to believe her. I was baptized Mary Johnson by poor but Irish parents and after winning first, second and third prize in a beauty tournament at Bountiful, Utah, I changed my name to Gladys Murgatroyd and descended on the movies.

Not so good! It didn't take me long to discover that Hollywood is a place where many are stalled and few are chosen, so I fled to Manhattan and while waiting for something better I accepted this portfolio on the St. Moe switchboard. Not much money, but lots of laughs.

Like all little girls which are not painful to the eye I get most of my innocent merriment from the wronger sex and I'm perfectly parked to watch their dizzy antics as they swarm around my switchboard, trying to get numbers—and me. But I'm generally a dead wire as far as the boys are concerned, giving 'em all nothing in the line of encouragement. I either smile and stall 'em or steam and bawl 'em, according to their method of approach. Being marooned on the island of New York, I have learned that I've got to be circumspect to avoid *dis*respect. Say—long ago I got fed up on getting out to walk from autos whose exceedingly disappointed owners in that way discovered they were poor guessers. Still, as France remarks to Germany, it's all fun!

Occasionally, however, this being alone gets much more monotonous than monotony itself. Going to movies and shows with Hazel Killian, my girl friend, is not very thrilling to a refugee from Hollywood, which Heaven knows is just Sleepy Hollow, but there is a kick in living in a place which everybody east of Albuquerque thinks would goal Nero. Then again, I'm wild about dancing and know how it's done, so there are times when I cast a speculative eye over the field and choose some safe and sane male, neither too old nor too bold, who I can ruin a few hours with when off duty and yet be able to look back to the excursion later with nothing more than a smile.

In that way I have twice broken my own rule and bounded around to perfectly proper places with boys. In both cases my merry men happened to be in a jam and little Gladys dried their tears and came to bat with some scheme that solved their problem. The first patient, Julius De Haven, who I helped get from the chorus of a musical comedy to stardom, urgently desired to commit matrimony with me as his accomplice. But, honestly, marriage is the furthest thing from my thoughts. I suppose wedding bells are as good a way as any to wind up a romance; still I've listened in at my switchboard to too many phone conversations between man and wife to want to be a ball and chain on any male, or versa vice. My second experiment was Hurricane Sherlock, a gentleman who made his living by assault and battery. He was light-heavyweight champion of terra firma and I was beginning to like him when he introduced me to one of his relatives by marriage—viz., his wife.

My next imitation was Guy Austin Tower, the millionaire playwright who I made a knight for a day. Let's go!

At the time Mr. Tower crossed my path I had just finished reading a story entitled "When Knighthood Was in Flower" by Charles Major, and really Charley manipulated a wicked set of writing implements, no fooling! Often I'd close my eyes over that book at the switchboard and imagine I was living in the romantical days of old like the kind Charles wrote about and then I'd gaze around at the leering lounge lizards and smirking lobby hounds who jam the gorgeous corridors of the St. Moe—hunting in packs like the wolves they are!—and believe me, I'd come back to earth with a thump! Many and many a time I've wished I had been current when gleaming blades flashed in the sun for a lady's smile and when a perfumed glove, tossed from a balcony, was ample to start a revolution, a duel, an empire or a scandal. But now that's all as out of order as a suit of white ducks would be in a coal mine. These days, men start wars for dollars and fight for women with the same weapons.

Well, I was in this silly, sentimental frame of mind when along came Mr. Tower, and then the fun began!

The meeting was very scenario. I overslept one morning after going to a ball the night before with Hazel Killian. Hazel's a great drawing room favorite, that is, she poses in studios, and as all the other girls worked at the same gift, why, it really was a very model ball, wasn't it? Don't bother with that one if it's too difficult. Anyhow, on this morning which was to have so little effect on my future, I was afraid I'd be late at the mill so I blew myself to a taxi. About halfway to the St. Moe, the motor quit like a dog and after my fearful looking chauffeur had leisurely pottered around it and tried without luck to start it with curses alone, I impatiently commanded him to get me another and less shopworn bus. Time and tide not only waits for no man, but it waits for no woman either and I was frantic to get on the job.

"Hey, quit that hollerin' at me!" says the chauffeur politely. "I'm doin' the best I kin, ain't I? I'll git you downtown in good time. They seems to be somethin' the matter with the carburetor, but I ain't sure if——"

"You're a fine automobile mechanic!" I interrupt, with equal courtesy. "I bet you think a wrist pin is jewelry. It's taken you nearly fifteen minutes to go three miles!"

"Who d'ye wish to drive you for a buck and a half—Barney Oldfield?" he sneers.

"Listen!" I says. "I'm not going to do an act with you, so save that cross-fire patter for the garage. Call me a taxi with a motor in it and make it snappy!"

The chauffeur scowls at me.

"You certainly like to arg, don't you?" he says. "All right, I'll git you a cab. Gimme the one fifty what's on the clock for haulin' you this far."

I reached in my hand bag and then, honestly, I thought I'd swoon! In my mad rush to get out of my apartment and down to the hotel I had forgotten my purse—can you imagine that?

"I—it seems I have left my money at home," I began to stammer, my face as red as his ungainly nose. "If you——"

"Apple sauce!" butts in this charming gentleman of the old school. "Don't try to kid me, cutey. That stuff might git you by in them out of town slabs, but I was born and dragged up on Second Avenoo and I have met you gyppers before! I wouldn't care if you was so good lookin' you'd make a gold fish forgit to keep openin' and closin' its mouth, I'm blonde proof. You don't shove off from here till I git my jack and that's that!"

Ain't we got fun?

Well, an interested knot of innocent bystanders begins to rally round us and this modern Sir Galahad squawks his head off till, really, I never was so mortified since I first tried roller skating. I have met some hard-boiled citizens in tripping gaily along life's promenade, but Mr. Taxi Driver was a china egg if there ever was one! No give to him at all and the more I pleaded with him the more abusive he became and the more the shipping clerks, bootleggers, pickpockets and floorwalkers on their way to business seemed to enjoy it. Honestly, it was horrible!

At this critical moment along comes Mr. Guy Austin Tower, Esq., in his costly imported horseless carriage, built along racing lines to hold two people—if they're kind of affectionate friends. Mr. Tower leaps lightly and gracefully out of his car, shoulders his way to my taxi and raises his cap with the air of two Valentinos.

"As I live!" he remarks with a bright smile. "The Goddess of the Switchboard! May I be of service?"

Not even his mother will ever be any gladder to see him than I was right then! I remembered him instantly as my wealthy admirer who is parked in the royal suite on the tenth floor of the St. Moe—two hundred dollars the day, but then you get a lovely view of Central Park.

I made him a present of the smile that had no little to do with me winning that beauty contest, and reading the immediate effect in his eyes I felt more at ease right away.

"Thank you!" I says. "I left my purse at home and——"

"Blah!" the taxi apache shuts me off. "What d'ye wanna tell this cake eater that stuff for? Ask him to slip you the buck and a half you owe me, he looks dizzy enough to fall for it!"

Mr. Tower certainly was light on his feet for a big man and he acted promptly, as all first-class knights do. His arm shot out from his shoulder and down flopped friend chauffeur as if he'd been shot through the heart. A round of applause went up from the delighted spectators, just as a burly policeman pushed his way through the throng.

The cop looks at me and I'm trembling with fear, he stares curiously at the prostrate chauffeur who won't be any more still when he's dead, he gazes around at the grinning witnesses, and then he turns to the flushed Mr. Tower, who's standing there blowing softly on his skinned knuckles.

"Hey, what's all the excitement here, heh?" growls the gendarme.

Mr. Tower smiles cheerfully and pats John Law on the arm.

"Eh—just taking a movie!" he says pleasantly.

Going to shows with my girl friend is not very thrilling to a refugee from Hollywood.

"Hey, what's all the excitement here?" growls the cop. "Just taking a movie," says Mr. Tower pleasantly.

"Move along and give these people a chanct to see what they're doin'!" bawls the cop to the laughing crowd as Mr. Tower hands me into his car with so much grace that I could close my eyes and see him standing there in silken doublet and hose and hear him say, "I prithee, fair lady, wouldst step in yon equipage?"

I don't know what the name of Mr. Tower's car was, but I think it must have been a Leaping Tuna from the way it carried on when we hit bumps and crossings en route to the St. Moe. I promised to go to dinner with him at my earliest convenience, too, because by this time I was up to my neck in romance and I thought my millionaire cavalier was the gnat's bathrobe!

Enter Robert Meacham Westover, playwright number two. Robert was writing dramas for such producers as the Shuberts, A. H. Woods, Dillingham, Savage, Brady, Morosco and Lederer. He wrote for them all, yet unfortunately none of them gave his plays a tumble. Like Mr. Tower, Robert was young and comely, but he was also an incurable pauper and the other girls on the board liked him and carbolic the same way. Really, he was a fearful pest, hanging around the switchboard all day and asking over and over again, "Are you sure there were no calls for me today?" or "There must have been a phone call for me—I have a play being considered by Klaw and Erlanger, and——" etc. But there were no more calls for Robert Meacham Westover than there are calls for hot water bags in Hades.

Personally, I was very sorry for Robert, who looked like he never had a good time in his life. Every day and in every way he kept getting thinner and thinner, till he resembled a model for a "Help the Starving Kanakas!" poster, or something similar, honestly! I knew he didn't have a dime in the wide wide world and I often wondered how he managed to live. I even had a hazy idea of taking him out and feeding him some day as a simple act of charity, but of course a girl has to be careful mothering strange young men in New York—or anywhere else, for that matter. Look at the jam Eve got herself into by feeding Adam that apple!

It was Jerry Murphy who made up my mind for me regarding Robert. Jerry is the house detective at the St. Moe, a wild admirer of mine and about as useful as a toothbrush would be to a hen. He looks like a mock turtle and don't know what it's all about and every time he gets a chance he moors himself at the switchboard, gazing at me like a man on a raft in the middle of the Atlantic would view the approach of the Aquitania. This gives the other girls plenty giggles, but Jerry's a good scout even if he is a total loss and I'm very lenient with him. However, one day he loomed up over the board just as Robert Meacham Westover had walked away.

"What's 'at clown pesterin' you about now?" growls Jerry, jerking a pudgy thumb over his shoulder at Robert's threadbare back.

"Are you my father?" I says, haughtily working the plugs.

"No," admits Jerry, "but they's a movie by 'at name right across the street. Listen, has 'at guy Westover been annoyin' you?"

"No," I says. "You do all that! What right have you got to question me about my friends? Run along and play, when I wish your services I'll whistle. Go on, shoo—you're on a busy wire!"

"Somebody must of put in a rap for me," says Jerry mournfully. "Seems to me you're always busy when I give you a ball, but 'at Westover mug can buzz you all day long and make you like it! Why show him any favors? He's been tryin' to promote you now since——"

"That's out!" I shut him off. "Don't get out of line, Jerry, or I won't let you talk to me at all. Besides, I don't believe Mr. Westover is even interested in women—he's too busy writing plays."

"Blah!" snorts Jerry scornfully. "Show me a guy which can't get no kick out of you and I'll show you a place in the East River where it's nothing but consommé! If 'at scissor-billed boloney ever tries to make a date with you I'll lay him like a carpet. I'm goin' to bear down on him anyways. He gets checked out of this trap tonight, or else——"

"Or else he don't!" I finish for him. "Look here, Jerry, I don't need a guardian and if you ever start a disturbance around here on my account I'll make you so sorry you'll sob yourself sick! Understand?"

"Don't get red-headed," says Jerry soothingly. "I ain't goin' to cuff him, but I got orders to pinch him. Laugh that off!"

"Arrest Mr. Westover?" I says, and I'm so startled I gave two people their right numbers. "What for?"

"He's got a hobby of not payin' his rent," says Jerry. "The big stiff! So he writes plays, hey? Well, six months on the island ought to give him plenty ideas for his next comedy!"

Then I saw Jerry was serious, so I got serious, too. Somehow the idea of this starving kid being thrown in the Bastille didn't appeal to me. No matter what anybody says, I have never believed that a writer does his best work when the world's against him. Why, six months in a cell might ruin that boy's entire future and prevent the world from meeting another Avery Hopwood! So I manage to smile and flirt Jerry Murphy into keeping his hands off Robert Meacham Westover till I had interviewed the young man and got a line on where, if anywhere, he expected to turn for some pieces of eight.

That very night as I was going out to dinner I ran across Robert standing in front of the big plate glass window of the Café les Infants, watching the chef juggling wheat cakes. Some of the numbing chill of New York's regard for a loser has crept into the air itself and Robert's coat collar is turned up, his hands are in his pockets, and in his eyes, glued on the golden brown wheat cakes, is a look of longing such as probably Cleopatra saw when Mark Antony first gave her the up and down. Just saying it was pathetic is not doing the scene justice. He started, kind of guilty, when he pegged me, but I grabbed his arm.

"Greetings!" I says smilingly. "Speaking of Lake Erie, come on, I'm going to feed you!"

Yes, men can blush.

"Why—I—why—eh—really, I'm not hungry," he stammers but how his eyes did glint at the mention of food! "I——"

But by this time I have crowded him inside and seated him at a table, where his protests got weaker and weaker. One glance at the line of march and he simply ordered everything on it and a pot of coffee. However, he insisted upon paying for his dinner and mine—borrowing ten dollars from me for this worthy purpose. Robert carefully marked down the loan on the back of a letter rejecting one of his plays, with the solemn promise that when his first drama was accepted he would repay me about two thousand percent. Tomato sauce! I waited till he had finished giving his one man banquet a beating and then I took him in hand.

"What's the idea of storing yourself in the best hotel in Gotham when you have no visible and apparently no invisible means of support?" I ask him, over the cheese and crackers.

Robert turns a rosy red.

"I imagine that must look a bit odd," he says. "But allow me to call your attention to the fact that I'm occupying the cheapest room in the—eh—hostelry, and I must have a good address to get even casual attention from the theatrical producers."

"Listen," I says quietly. "As long as you have failed to set the lake ablaze as a playwright, are in debt and have no more idea than a rabbit where you're going to promote any money, why not forget about the hard hearted theatrical producers and go to work?"

Robert's knife clatters to the table and his mouth opens wide. In his eyes is a look of genuine amazement. Then he smiles.

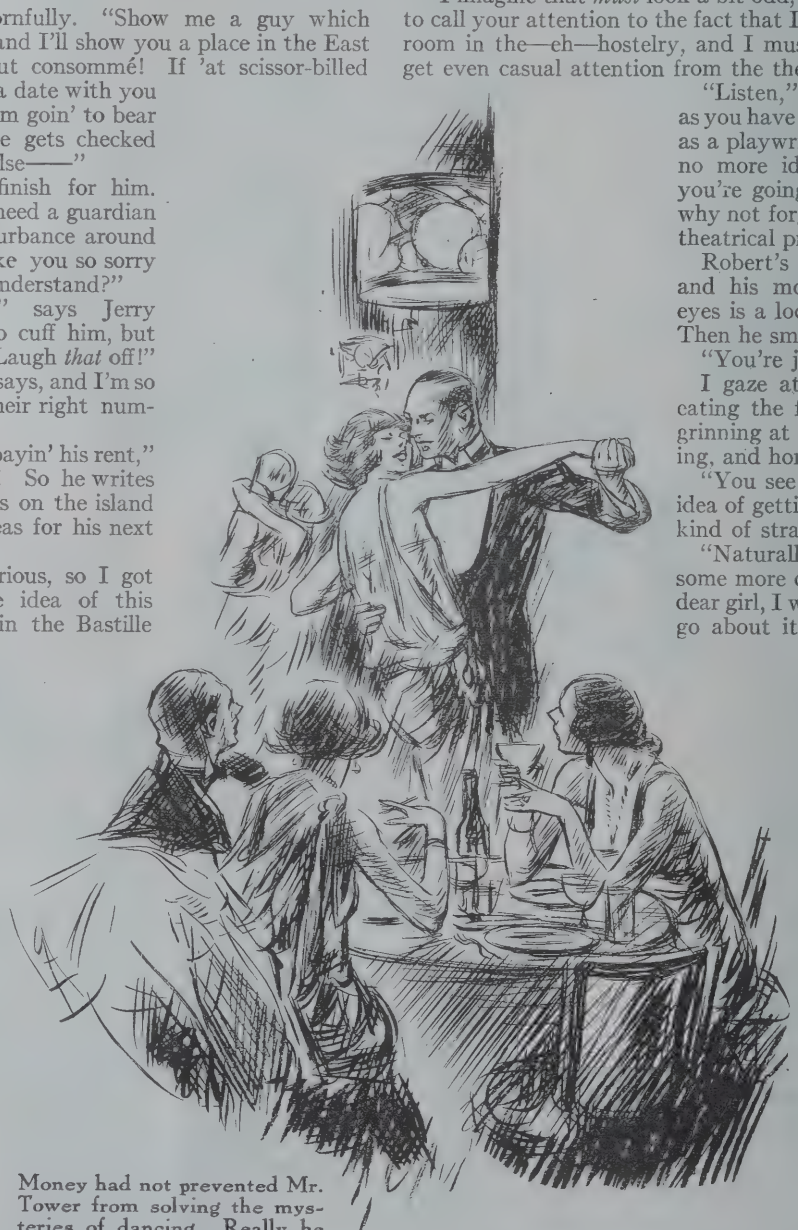
"You're joking," he says calmly.

I gaze at him, coolly sitting there eating the food I have paid for and grinning at the idea of earning his living, and honestly I get burnt up!

"You see something comical in the idea of getting a job?" I ask him, in a kind of strained voice.

"Naturally!" he answers, packing some more cheese on a cracker. "My dear girl, I wouldn't even know how to go about it! What would I do, for instance?"

"What would you do?" I says angrily. "Why, anything! Drive a truck, dig streets, sell books, learn a trade of some kind or enlist on the police force! Get up early in the morning, study the want ads and then lay out a route for yourself, taking the first job that's offered you! Why——"



"I'm afraid you don't understand," butts in Robert, with coldly raised eyebrows. "I'm an artist—not a laborer!"

"I wouldn't brag about it!" I says. "Do you mean to say you have never done a day's work in your life?"

"I was at one time engaged in the work of bringing men's and women's attention to the fact that this life is not eternal—that death must come to us all!" says Robert. "And——"

"You were a minister?" I interrupt, full of surprise.

"No," says Robert. "An insurance agent."

Money had not prevented Mr. Tower from solving the mysteries of dancing. Really he glided a wicked ballroom.

Well, we sat there and argued till I was plenty late when I went back to my board. Honestly, I rode Mr. Robert Meacham Westover to a fare-thee-well in an attempt to make him snap into it. He broke out with an attack of temperament and angry words flew back and forth like swallows, till finally he threw up his hands and promised me faithfully that if his latest masterpiece, "An Illegal Crime," wasn't accepted within a week he'd return to the respectable science of selling life insurance, as he was doing when what he called the "divine afflatus" knocked him for a loop.

The very next day Robert gave me a copy of "An Illegal Crime" to read and I took it home with me when I went off duty that night. I must admit I didn't expect to get much of a kick out of it, but I thought I'd at least glance through it, so that when Robert crossexamined me about this drama, I'd know how many acts was in it, if nothing else.

Every day and in every way Robert kept getting thinner and thinner.

Well, really, I don't know when I got such a surprise! From the minute I started to read "An Illegal Crime" I simply couldn't lay it down, and it was nearly four A. M. when I turned out the light at the indignant request of Hazel Killian. I had read every word of Robert's play and some of it twice, and if it wasn't a knockout then I'm Queen of Sheba!

Two days later I kept my dinner engagement with Guy Austin Tower.

If I'd been going to get married I couldn't have donated more time to dolling myself up than I did on the day of this date. The first thing I did was to phone Mr. Williams, manager of the St. Moe, another male who fancies himself highly. If I had a dollar for every time this dizzy dumbbell has tried to take me out, he'd never be in a position to invite me again! I told him I was sick and couldn't report and he says I should try Doc Cooey's system, because all ills are only imaginary. So I sweetly said that in that case he could imagine I was there and then I hung up. My next move is to drop in at a beauty parlor and let the skilled labor there have a field day. I had my hair waved, my nails done, my classic features massaged, sat for a troubled hour with my face caked in mud, etc., etc., and even etc. When I came out I was all in, but I was also a success!

I have exactly one evening gown. Buying it swept away my lifetime savings and made Hazel Killian hysterical laughing at what she called my maniacal extravagance. I don't consider getting this dear of a dress was extravagance! Looking at it, wearing it, even touching it, gives me more joy than I can tell you. I just love it. If I had a million dollars I'd have $975,000 worth of clothes! This one is pink satin covered with crystals, wrapped tightly around the figure towards the front, where the draperies are fastened with large ornaments of silver leaves and buds. It's a rather daring gown and not everybody could wear it, but I didn't win that Utah beauty contest because the judges were nearsighted!

Mr. Tower called for me at seven and the look he gave me as his face changed color when I opened the door repaid me with illegal interest for my preparations. In dinner clothes, he was very restful to the eye himself. In fact, the openly envious Hazel thought my knight had stepped right off the screen and she told me later she got such a reaction that she deliberately broke a date with a boy poet from Greenwich Village and went out with a dashing young peddler of automobiles instead, simply because the latter sheik had a pleasing habit of wearing a tuxedo of nights.

Well, Mr. Tower and I had dinner at Jonquin's, the Polo Grounds of the restaurant league, and he seemed as proud of me as if he'd won me at golf. We talked about this and we talked about that and then, of course, the conversation got personal. I soon found out that Mr. Tower, who had nothing but money, was as temperamental as Mr. Westover, who had nothing but nerve. My millionaire is dissatisfied with things in general. Although his father left him about everything but South Dakota when he died, Mr. Tower says he wants to make good—that is, he craves fame. A moment afterwards when he confesses that he's an author and playwright, I nearly choked.

"What's the matter?" he asks me anxiously.

"Nothing," I says. "I—well, I seem to be in the midst of an epidemic of writers! I had dinner with one only the other day, Robert Meacham Westover. He lives at the St. Moe, too—do you know him?"

"No, I don't believe I do," says Mr. Tower thoughtfully. "But if his plays have been produced, I envy him!"

"Save your envy," I says. "What plays have you had produced, Mr. Tower?" I started something.

"None!" he says, banging the table with his fist. "And I or any other unknown playwright never will have his work produced while conditions in the theatrical business remain as they are. Genius is strangled, sacrificed to the god of the box office! Originality is penalized and becomes a serious handicap—art is symbolized by the lady on the face of the dollar!"

"In other words, it's all wrong," I says, feeling I should say something.

"Exactly," says Mr. Tower. "How quick you are to grasp one's meaning and how wonderfully sympathetic!"

"It's a gift!" I says demurely. "Like being able to wiggle your ears or play the oboe."

"By Jove, that's clever!" says Mr. Tower. "I shall put that in my next story. Have I your permission?"

"Go right ahead," I says. "Don't hesitate to call on me at any time. So you write stories, too? I suppose you're what they call ambidextrous, aren't you?"

Mr. Tower throws back his head and laughs like a kid.

"Now you're joshing me!" he says, wagging a reproachful finger at me. "Write stories? My dear girl, under various nom de plumes I have submitted verse, essays, short and long stories, jokes, epigrams, plays and what not to producers and publishers, but thus far I have failed to ring the bell. I have been told by competent authorities that my style and technic—the result of much study and training—leave (Continued on page 118)

Millicent Harden

The Hope of Happiness

Illustrations by
Pruett Carter

The Setting of the story is a Mid-west city today, and it concerns the lives of:

BRUCE STORRS, a young architect of fine personal character whose mother has told him on her deathbed that he is not the son of her husband.

FRANKLIN MILLS, his real father, an aristocratic widower from an old family, rich, conservative, influential, domineering, and little understood by his fellow citizens.

SHEPHERD MILLS, Franklin's son, placed at the head of a storage battery plant by his father; a dreamer whose character is the antithesis of Franklin's.

CONSTANCE MILLS, Shepherd's wife, a social parvenu, restless and avid of personal admiration, rather disliked by her father-in-law.

LEILA MILLS, Franklin's daughter and favorite, charming but just now inclined to run wild.

MILLICENT HARDEN, a close friend of Leila's who has beauty, poise and artistic genius.

"BUD" HENDERSON, an old college friend of Bruce's.

"BILL" FREEMAN, a prominent architect.

DALE FREEMAN, his wife, whose home is the rendezvous for an intelligent social set.

MRS. TORRENCE, a widow, and delightful.

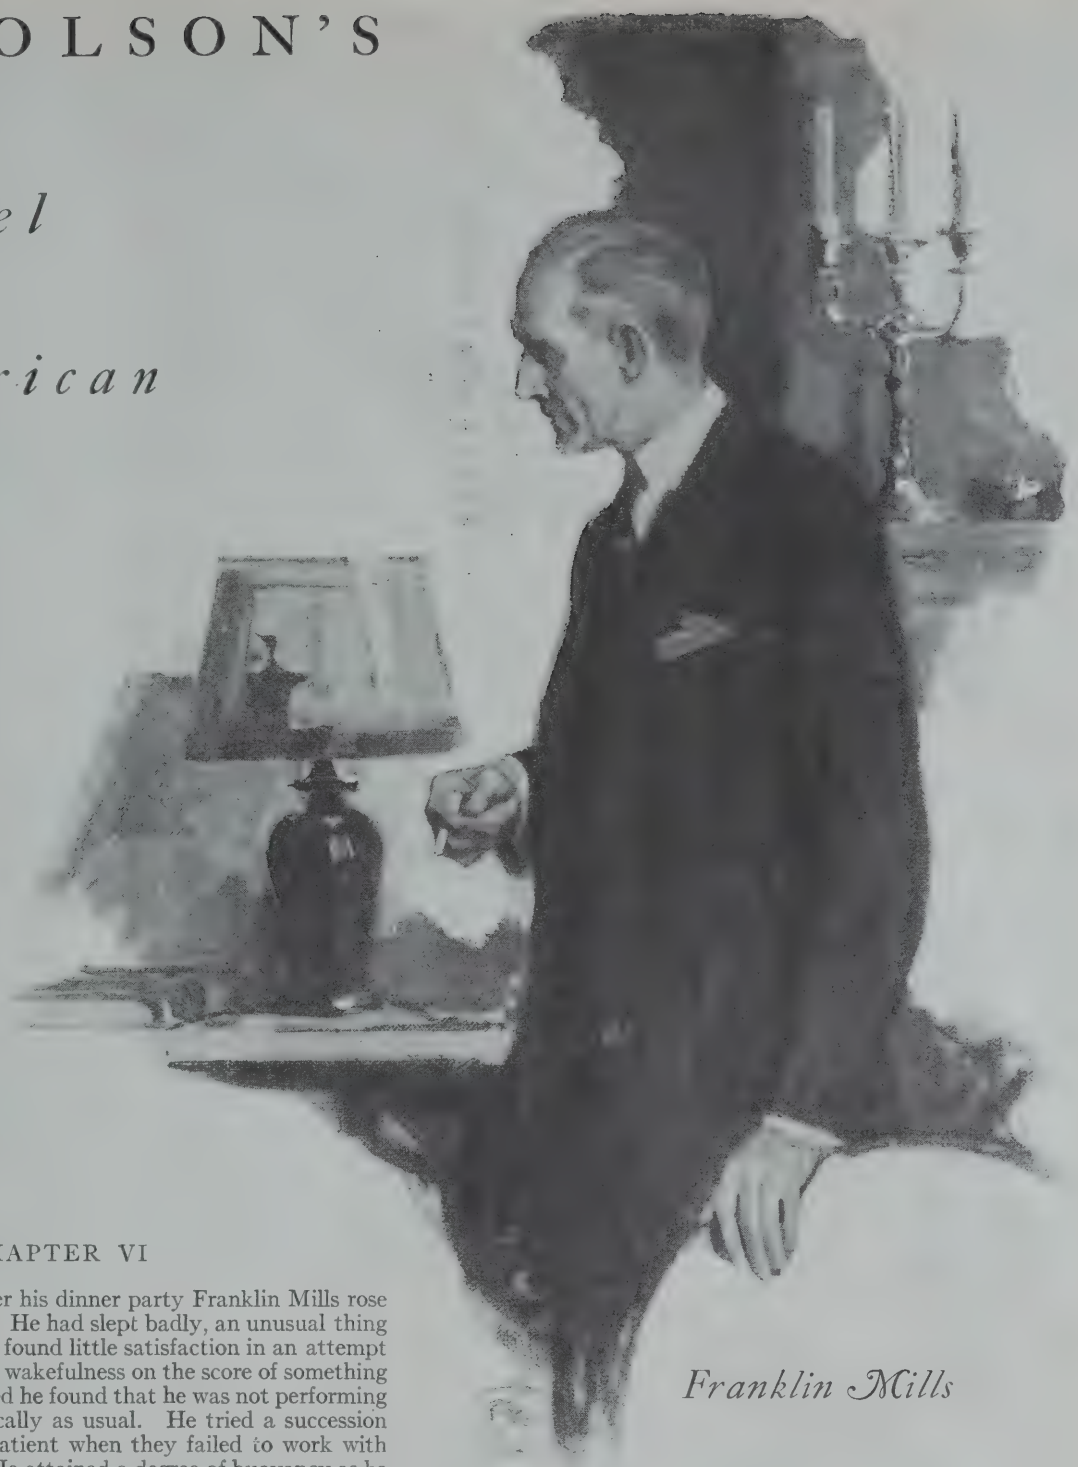
A Résumé of Parts One to Three:

THE confession of his mother's one lapse in a faithful married life is a great shock to Bruce Storrs. At her dying request, Bruce goes to the Mid-west city where Mills lives to be near his unknown father.

There, keeping his secret closely guarded, he secures work as assistant to Freeman, and through Bud Henderson meets the city's "best people"—including his own family, the Millses. Indeed, some impish fate seems from this time on to be constantly dragging him into contact with the house of Mills.



For instance, twice he rescues Leila from difficult situations when she is a little the worse for drink—once taking her from a stalled motorboat, once driving her home from Mrs. Torrence's. As for Constance Mills, each time he sees her she engages him in confidential chats that have all the earmarks of flirtation. And Shepherd Mills wants him to design a clubhouse for his workmen, until his father summarily refuses to sanction the scheme; even then, when his wife urges him to go ahead without his father's approval, Shepherd plans to consult Bruce again.

But the more serious contact is that between Bruce and his father. Bruce is attracted to Millicent Harden, though he has called on her only once and once played golf with her. He senses that Franklin Mills also may be in love with Millicent; indeed, his father is at Millicent's the night he calls.

The whole situation is wearing on Bruce's nerves. He finds himself growing frequently moody. Everywhere he turns, he runs into a Mills. He begins almost to dislike his father.

Franklin Mills too is beginning to be perturbed by this situation. And he strongly suspects that Bruce is his own son; a suspicion that nears certainty when he sees the astonishing resemblance Bruce bears to a portrait of his, Franklin's, father. Does Bruce, he wonders, recalling that brief romance of

NICHOLSON'S Vital Novel of American Life

Franklin Mills

long ago, know of this relationship?

The question comes home to him with especial keenness one night after a dinner party when he has been talking casually to Leila about Storrs. Alone with the portrait of his father, his meditations become intolerable.

Part Four: CHAPTER VI

THE morning after his dinner party Franklin Mills rose at eight o'clock. He had slept badly, an unusual thing with him, and he found little satisfaction in an attempt to account for his wakefulness on the score of something he had eaten. As he shaved he found that he was not performing the familiar rite automatically as usual. He tried a succession of blades and became impatient when they failed to work with their usual smoothness. He attained a degree of buoyancy as he dressed by thinking of his immunity from the cares that beset most men. No other man in town enjoyed anything like his freedom. He had not dreaded age because he never thought of himself as old. And yet the years were passing . . .

He must study means of deferring old age. Marriage might serve to retard the march of time. The possibility of remarrying had frequently of late teased his imagination. Leila would leave him one of these days; he must have a care that she married well. Mills had plans for Carroll's future; Carroll would be a most acceptable son-in-law . . . Leila had so far shown no interest in Carroll, but Leila had the Mills common sense; when it came to marrying, Leila would listen to reason.

He called his man to serve breakfast in his room, read the morning paper, inspected his wardrobe and indicated several suits to be pressed.

From his south window he viewed the Harden house across the hedge. Millicent was somewhere within . . . It might be a mistake to marry a girl as young as Millicent. He knew of men who had made that mistake, but Millicent was not to be measured by ordinary standards. With all the charm of youth, she was amazingly mature; not a feather-brained girl who would marry him for his money. There was the question of her family, her lack of social background; but possibly he magnified the importance of such things. His own standing, he argued, gave him certain rights.

Delay might be hazardous; he began thinking of the young men who had been attentive to Millicent. Most of them were of Leila's set; he had no very good opinion of any of them. And there was Storrs, who had so unaccountably projected himself into the scene. Storrs was young, handsome, with an artistic nature to which Millicent, with her own endowments and tastes, might easily respond . . .

The remembrance of the young architect's head superimposed upon the portrait of Franklin Mills III caused him an uneasiness which he was not able to dispel by a snap of the fingers. If Storrs boldly confronted him and asserted a claim upon his bounty the thing could be dealt with on a strictly business basis; but there was no reason for suspecting that he meditated blackmail. Possibly the young man himself was unaware that there might be a doubt as to his parentage; but how was he, Franklin Mills, to satisfy himself on this point? Any attempt to learn what had prompted Storrs to choose for his residence the city so long sacred to the Mills family might easily arouse suspicion.

The portrait in itself was a menace. People were such fools about noting resemblances! If his sisters met Storrs they might remark upon his resemblance to their father. And yet they were just as likely to note the removal of the picture if he relegated it to the attic . . .

By the time he had interviewed the house servants and driven to the office Mills had passed through various moods ranging from his habitual serenity and poise to apprehension and foreboding. This puzzled him. Why should he, the most equable of men, suddenly fall a prey to moods? He put on a pair of library glasses that he kept in his desk, though he usually employed a pince-nez at the office—a departure which puzzled Carroll, who did not know that Mills, in the deep preoccupation of the morning, had left his pocket case at home. Mills, in normal circumstances, was not given to forgetfulness. Aware that something was amiss, Carroll made necessary reports and suggestions with more than his usual economy of words.

"Doctor Lindley telephoned that he'd be in to see you at eleven. You have no engagements and I told him all right."

"Lindley? What does Lindley want?" Mills demanded.

"He didn't say, sir, but as you always see him——"

"I don't know that I care to see him today," Mills mumbled. Mills rarely mumbled; his speech was always clean-cut.

Carroll, listening attentively to his employer's instructions as to answering letters and sending telegraphic orders for the sale of certain stocks, speculated as to what had caused Mills's unwonted irascibility. A few minutes after eleven word was passed from the office boy to the stenographer and thence from Carroll to Mills that the Reverend Doctor Lindley was waiting.

Mills detained Carroll rather unnecessarily to discuss matters of no immediate moment. This in itself was surprising, as the rector of St. Barnabas, the oldest and richest church in town, had heretofore always been admitted without delay. The Mills family had been identified with St. Barnabas from earliest times and Doctor Lindley was entertained frequently by Mills not only at home but at the men's luncheons Mills gave at his clubs for visiting notables.

"Ah, Mills! Hard at it!" exclaimed the minister cheerfully. He was short, rotund and bald, with a large face that radiated good nature. A reputation for breadth of view and public spirit had made him, in the dozen years of his pastorate, one of the best liked men in town. He gave Mills a cordial handshake, asked after Leila and assured Mills that he had never seen him looking better.

Lindley was a dynamic person and his presence had the effect of disturbing the tranquillity of the room. Mills wished now that he hadn't admitted the rector of St. Barnabas, with his professional good cheer and optimism. He remembered that Lindley always wanted something when he came to the office. If it proved to be help for a negro mission St. Barnabas maintained somewhere, Mills resolved to refuse to contribute. He had no intention of encouraging further the idea that he could be relied upon to support all of Lindley's absurd schemes for widening the sphere of the church. It was a vulgar idea that a sinner should prostrate himself before an imaginary God and beg for forgiveness. Where sin existed the main thing was to keep it decently out of sight. But the whole idea of sin was repellent. He caught himself up sharply. What had he to do with sin?

But outwardly Mills was serene; Lindley was at least a diversion, though Mills reflected that someone ought to warn him against his tendency to obesity. A fat man in a surplice was ridiculous, though Mills hadn't seen Lindley in vestments since the last fashionable wedding. At the reception following the wedding Mills remembered that he had been annoyed by Lindley's appetite.

Mills wondered what he had ever seen that was likable in the rector, who certainly suggested nothing of apostolic austerity. Lindley threw back his coat, disclosing a gold cross suspended from a cord that stretched across his broad chest. Mills's eyes fixed upon the emblem disapprovingly as he asked his visitor to have a cigar.

"No, thanks, Mills; I never smoke so early in the day—found it upset me. Moderation in all things is my motto. I missed you at the Clayton party the other night; a brilliant affair. Dear Leila was there, though, and Shepherd and his charming wife, to represent your family. Margaret and I left early." The clergyman chuckled and lowering his voice continued: "I've heard—I've heard whispers that later on the party got quite gay! I tell you, Mills, the new generation is stepping high. All the more responsibility for the forces that make for good in this world! I was saying to the bishop only the other day that the church never before faced such perplexities as now!"

"Why do you say perplexities?" asked Mills in the quiet tone and indulgent manner of an expert crossexaminer who is preparing pitfalls for a witness.

"Ah, I see you catch at the word! It's become a serious question what the church dare do! There's the danger of offending; of estranging its own membership."

"Yes, but why is it a danger?" Mills persisted.

The minister was surprised at these questions, which were wholly foreign to all his previous intercourse with Mills. His eyes opened and shut quickly. The Reverend Stuart Lindley was known as a man's man, a clergyman who viewed humanity in the light of the twentieth century and was particularly discerning as to the temptations and difficulties that beset business men. Mills must not be offended; he was the largest contributor to St. Barnabas.

"My dear Mills," he said impressively, "you know and I know that this is an age of compromise. We clergymen can't soften our warnings—the wind, you know, no longer blows on the lost sheep with the violence it once manifested, or at least the sheep no longer notice it!" A glint in Mills's eye gave him pause, but he went on hurriedly. "In certain particulars we must yield a little without appearing to yield. Do you get my point?"

"Frankly, I don't know that I do," Mills replied bluntly. "You preach that certain things are essential to the salvation of my soul. What right have you to compromise with me or anyone else? You either believe the Gospel and the creeds that are used every day in our churches or you don't. I didn't mean to start a theological discussion; I was just a little curious as to what you meant by perplexities, when the obligation is as plain as that table."

"But—you see the difficulties! We have a right to assume that God is perfectly aware of all that goes on in His world and that the changing times are only a part of His purpose."

"Well, yes," Mills assented without enthusiasm. "But I was thinking of what you and the church I was born into declare to be necessary to the Christian life. I go to church rarely, as you know, but I'm fairly familiar with the New Testament. I've got a copy with the words of Jesus printed in bold type, so you can't miss His meaning. He was pretty explicit; His meaning hits you squarely in the eye!"

"But, my dear friend, above all He preached tolerance! He knew human frailty! There's the great secret of His power."

"Oh, that's all true!" said Mills, with courteous forbearance. "But you know very well that few of us—no—I'll admit that I don't live the Christian life except where it's perfectly easy and convenient. Why talk of the perplexities of the ministry when there's no excuse for any of us to mistake His meaning? You either preach Jesus or you don't! We lean heavily on His tolerance because we can excuse ourselves with that; it's only an alibi. But what of His courage? Whatever I may think of Him—divine or merely a foolish idealist—He did die for His convictions! It occurs to me sometimes that He's served nowadays by a pretty cowardly lot of followers. Oh—not you, my friend!—I don't mean anyone in particular—except myself. Probably there are other men who think much as I do, but we don't count. We pay to keep the churches going but we don't want to be bothered about our duty to God. That's a disagreeable subject!"

He ended with a smile that was intended to put Lindley at ease.

"You are absolutely right, Mills!" declared the minister magnanimously. "But as a practical man you realize that there are embarrassments in the way of doing our full duty."

"No; truly, I don't!" Mills retorted. "We either do it or we don't. But please don't think I meant to quiz you or be annoying. I wouldn't offend you for anything in the world!"

"My dear Mills!" cried the clergyman with the disdain demanded by so monstrous a suggestion.

"It never occurred to me before," Mills went on, his good humor only faintly tinged with irony, "it never struck me in just this way before, but I suppose if you were to preach to your congregation just what Jesus preached you'd empty the church."

"Well, of course——" began Lindley.

"Of course you can't do it! Jesus is the Great Example of a perfect life; but do we any of us really want to live as He lived?"

"Ah, Mills, we can only approximate perfection; that's the best we can hope for!"

"Thank you! There's some consolation in that!" Mills laughed. "But if we really took the teachings of Jesus literally we wouldn't be sitting here; we'd be out looking up people who need shelter, food, cheer. As it is I'm not bothering my head about them. I pay others to do that—Carroll hands me a list of organizations he considers worthy of assistance and all I do is to sign the checks—ought to be ashamed of myself, oughtn't I?"

"Do you really think me disgraceful?" asked Leila She seemed to Bruce like an impulsive child tonight.

"Well, now, Mills," Lindley laughed pleasantly, "that's a matter I leave to your own conscience."

"But you oughtn't to! It's your duty to tell me that instead of riding up to a comfortable club today to eat luncheon with a couple of bankers I ought first to be sure that every man, woman and child in the community is clothed and fed and happy."

"What would you do if I did?" Lindley demanded.

"I'd tell you to go to the Devil!"

"There you are!" cried Lindley with a gesture of resignation. "You know your duty to your neighbor as well as I do. The affair isn't between you and me, after all, my dear friend—it's between you and God!"

"God?" Mills repeated the word soberly, his eyes turning to the window and the picture it framed, of a sky blurred by the smoke of factory chimneys. "I wonder——" he added, half to himself.

Lindley was puzzled and embarrassed, uncertain whether to try to explain himself further. His intuitions were keen and in his attempt to adjust himself to a new phase of Mills's character he groped for an explanation of the man's surprising utterances. There had been something a little wistful in Mills's use of the word God. Lindley was sincerely eager to help where help was needed, but as he debated whether Mills really had disclosed any need that he could satisfy, Mills ended the matter by saying a little wearily:

"What was it you wanted to see me about, Lindley?"

"It's about the Mills memorial window in St. Barnabas; the transept wall's settled lately and pulled the window out of plumb. Some of the panels are loose. The excavations for the new building across the alley caused the disturbance. Now that the building's up we'll hope the worst is over. That's one of the finest windows in the West. I had Freeman look at it and he says we'll have to get an expert out from New York to take care of it properly. The vestry's hard up as usual but I felt sure you'd want us to have the job well done——"

"Certainly, Lindley. Go ahead and send me the bill. Of course I'm glad to take care of it."

II

Mills was again himself. The mention of the Mills memorial window had touched his pride. The window not only symbolized the miraculous powers of Jesus but quite concretely it visualized for the congregation of St. Barnabas the solid worth and continuity of the house of Mills.

He detained Lindley, gave him a chance to tell a story, made sure before he permitted him to go that the minister had not been wounded by anything he had said. He had come out pretty well in his talk with the minister; it did no harm to ruffle the complacency of a man like Lindley occasionally. But he wanted to guard against a return of the vexatious thoughts with which the day had begun.

A ride would set him up and he would find some cheerful companions to join him at the farm. Usually he planned his parties ahead but the day was too fine to let pass. He rang for Carroll, his spirits already mounting at the thought of escaping from town.

The towering white pillars, Bruce thought, made a fitting frame for Millicent, emphasizing her pictorial beaut

"I believe I'll run out to Deer Trail this afternoon. I'll ask some people who like to ride to join me. Will you call Mrs. Freeman, Mrs. Torrence, Leila and Miss Harden? I'll be glad to have you go if you can arrange it—I'll leave it all to you. As to men, try Doctor Armstrong, Mr. Turner, Ralph Burton—say that I'll send machines to take them out unless they prefer using their own cars. You'll look after that?"

"Yes, sir."

"Let me see; this was the day Freeman was to meet me out there to look over the superintendent's house. I've promised Jackson to make the addition he wants this fall. Freeman's probably forgotten it—he has a genius for forgetting engagements, and I'd overlooked your memorandum till just now. Freeman hates a horse but if he goes it will only take a few minutes to show him what's wanted."

III

Bruce was finding his association with Freeman increasingly agreeable. The architect, amusingly indifferent and careless as to small things, was delighted to find that his new subordinat was not afraid to assume responsibility and grateful that Bruc was shielding him from the constant pecking of persons wh called or telephoned about trivial matters.

"By the way, Storrs, can you run into the country this afte noon?" Freeman asked. "I promised Franklin Mills I'd mee him at his farm to look at his superintendent's house. I've pu him off several times and now that Brookville man's coming in t talk house and I've got to see him. There's not much to do bu get data and make my apologies to Mills. Mrs. Freeman jus called up to say she's going out there to ride. Mills is having party so he'll get through with you quickly. I don't want him t think me indifferent about his work. He's been a loyal client.

"Yes, certainly," Bruce replied, reluctant to trouble Freema by refusing, but not relishing another meeting with Mills.

"Everybody knows where Deer Trail is—you'll have no troub finding it. I think he said he'd be there by two-thirty. Liste carefully to what he says, and I'll take the matter up with hi tomorrow. Now about the specifications for that Sterlin house——"

It was thus that Bruce found himself at Deer Trail Farm o the afternoon of the day that Mills was giving his riding part

'Leila's really growing superstitious about you," she told him. "She says you're always saving her life."

Mills, with whom punctuality was a prime virtue, came down he steps in his riding clothes and good-naturedly accepted Bruce's excuses in Freeman's behalf.

"Freeman's a busy man, of course, and a job like this is a good leal of a nuisance. You can get the idea just as well. Can you ide a horse?"

Bruce, whose eyes had noted with appreciation the horses that ad been assembled in the driveway, said that he could.

"All right, then; we'll ride over. It's nearly a mile and we'll ave time."

He let Bruce choose a horse for himself from a dozen or more horoughbreds, watched him mount with critical but approving yes, and they set off over a road that led back through the fields. Mills sat a horse well.

Finding that Bruce knew something of the American saddle tock, he compared various breeds, calling attention to the good oints of the horses they were riding.

When they reached the superintendent's house Bruce found hat what was required was an extension that would provide he family with additional sleeping rooms.

He took measurements, made notes, suggested a few difficulties nd in reply to Mills's questions expressed his belief that the addition could be made without spoiling the appearance of the house.

"I suppose I really ought to tear it down and build a new house, but this hundred acres right here has been in my family a long time and the place has associations. I hate to destroy it."

"I can understand that," said Bruce, busy with his notebook. "I think I have all the data Mr. Freeman will need, sir."

As they rode back Mills talked affably of the country; spoke of the history and traditions of the vicinity, and the sturdy character of the pioneers who had settled the region.

"I used to think sometimes of moving East—settling somewhere around New York. But I've never been able to bring myself to it. This is my own country right here. Over there —you notice that timber?—well, I'll never cut that. This whole region was forest in the early days. I've kept that strip of woodland as a reminder of the men who broke through the wilderness with nothing but their rifles and axes."

"They were a great race," Bruce remarked.

There was sentiment of a sort in Mills. As an enigma Bruce found him increasingly provocative. Mills called attention to a young orchard he had lately planted, and to his conservatories, where he amused himself, he said, trying to produce a new rose. "Won't you stay and join in the ride?" he asked as they dismounted. "I can fit you out with breeches and puttees. I'd be delighted to have you."

"Thanks, but I must get into town," Bruce replied.

"Well, if you must! Please don't let Freeman go to sleep on this job."

Bruce, glad that his duty had been performed so easily, was starting toward his car when a familiar voice called to him from the broad pillared veranda:

"Why such a hurry? Aren't you in this party?"

He swung round to find Millicent Harden, dressed for the saddle, standing at the edge of the veranda a little apart from the animated group of Mills's other guests. As he walked toward her she came down the steps to meet him. The towering white pillars made a fitting frame for her. Here, as in the library of her own house, the ample background served to emphasize her pictorial effectiveness. Her eyes shone with happy expectancy.

"I don't care if you are here on business, you shouldn't be running away! On a day like this nobody should be in town."

"Somebody has to work in this world. How are the organ and the noble knight?"

"Both would be glad to welcome you. Leila's growing superstitious about you; she says you're always saving her life. Oh, she confessed everything about last night!—how you ministered to her and set her on her father's doorstep in fine shape. And she's going to be a good girl now. We must see that she is!"

At this moment Leila detached herself from the company on the veranda and called his attention to the fact that Mrs. Freeman was trying to bow to him. Mills, who had been discussing the fitness of one of the horses with his superintendent, announced that he was ready to start.

"I wish you were coming along," said Leila; "there's scads of horses. We'd all adore having you!"

"I'd adore coming!" Bruce answered. "But I've really got to skip."

"I'll tell dada to ask you another time. Dada isn't at all bad when you know him, is he, Millie?"

"Oh, one learns to tolerate him!" said Millicent teasingly.

"You might like driving through the farm—good road all the way from that tall elm down there," suggested Leila, "and it takes you through our woods. The color of the maples is marvelous. There's a winding stretch over yonder that's a little wild but it's interesting, and you can't get lost. It would be a shame to dash back to town without seeing something of this gorgeous day!"

"All right, thanks, I'll try it," said Bruce.

With his roadster in motion he wondered dejectedly whether there was any way of escaping Franklin Mills and his family. But the sight of Millicent had heartened him. The glowing woodlands were brighter for his words with her. He wished he might have taken her away from Mills and his party and ridden alone with her in the golden haze of the loveliest of autumn afternoons . . .

Suddenly when he was beyond the Deer Trail boundaries and running along slowly he came upon a car drawn up close to the stake-and-rider fence that enclosed a strip of woodland. His quiet approach over the soft road Leila had described had not been noted by the two occupants of the car, a man and a woman.

Two lovers, presumably, who had sought a lonely spot where they were unlikely to be observed, and Bruce was about to speed his car past them when the woman lifted her head with an involuntary cry of surprise that caused him, quite as involuntarily, to turn his gaze upon her. It was Constance Mills; her companion was George Whitford.

"Hello, there!" Whitford cried and Bruce stopped his car and got out. "Mrs. Mills and I are out looking at the scenery. We started for the Country Club but lost interest."

"Isn't this a heavenly day?" remarked Mrs. Mills with entire serenity. "George and I have been talking poetry—an ideal time for it!" She held up a book. "Yeats—he's so marvelous! Where on earth are you wandering to?"

"I've been to Deer Trail—a little errand with Mr. Mills for my boss."

"Oh, is Mr. Mills at the farm? What is it—a party?" she asked carelessly.

"Yes, Miss Mills, Miss Harden, Mrs. Torrence and Mrs. Freeman are there to ride—I didn't make them all out."

"It sounds quite gay," she said languidly. "I've thought a lot about our talk yesterday. You evidently delivered Leila home without trouble. It was awfully sweet of you, I'm sure. I don't believe we'll go in to the farm, George. I think a crowd of people would bore me today, and we must get back into town."

Whitford started his car, and as they moved away Constan leaned out and smiled and waved her hand. Bruce stood for moment gazing after them, deep in thought. Constance Mil he decided, was really a very clever woman.

IV

After his visit to Deer Trail Farm Bruce found himself in cynical humor with reference to his own life and the lives of t people with whom he had lately come in contact. He w again isolating himself, spending his evenings in his apartmer where no one was likely to trouble him. He found no consolati in the thought that so many others apparently found as lit satisfaction in existence as he. Nothing was substantial definite. He read prodigiously—poetry and philosophy, a the latest discussions of the problems of the time—caught these an occasional gleam. It seemed centuries ago that had walked in the Valley of the Shadow in France. The trage of war seemed as nothing weighed against the tragedy of own life. Why had she told him? was a question he despairing asked himself. His mother had had no right to go out of t world leaving him to carry the burden her confession had l upon him. Then again, with a quickening of his old affecti for her, he felt that some motive, too fine and high for his und standing, had impelled her to the revelation.

He had settled himself to read one evening when Henders always unexpected in his manifestations of sociability, dropp in at his apartment.

"Maybelle's at Shep Mills's rehearsing in a new drama club show so I romped up here hoping to catch you in. guessed you'd be here laughing heartily all to yourself. I cut the booze; honest I have. My bootlegger strolled in tod but I kissed him good by forever. So don't offer me any lick my noble resolution isn't so strong that I mightn't yield t whisper from the Devil."

"You're safe! I'm a tame devil tonight. There's nothi stronger on the premises than a tooth wash warranted not remove the enamel."

Henderson picked up the book Bruce had been reading, World in Need of God," and ran his eye over the chapter headin

"'The Unlit Lamp,' 'The Descent Perilous,' 'Untend Altars'—so you've got it too, have you?"

"I've got the book, if that's what you mean," Bruce repli "I paid two dollars for it. It's a gloomy work; no wonder author put it out anonymously."

"It's a best seller," Henderson replied mournfully as seated himself and drew out his pipe. "The world is nerv about itself—doesn't know whether to repent and be good stroll right along to the fiery pit. Under my stoical exteri Bruce, old boy, I trouble a good deal about the silly human ra That phrase, 'The Descent Perilous,' gives me a chill. If edited that book I'd have made it 'The Road to Hell is Ea and drawn a stirring picture of the universe returning to ch to the music of jazzy bands. People seem anxious to be cau all lit up when our little planet jumps the track and runs amu But there really are a few imbeciles, like the chap who produ that book, who're troubled about the whole business. We think we're playing comedy rôles but if we'd just take a g square look at ourselves in the mirror we'd see that we're ma up for tragedy."

"Lordy! Hear the boy talk! If I'd known you were com I'd have hidden the book."

"There's a joke! I've been in several prosperous hon lately where I got a glimpse of that joyous work stuck un the sofa pillows. Everybody's afraid to be caught with i afraid it points to a state of panic in the purchaser. It's kind of thing folks read and know it's all true and get so low their minds they pull the old black bottle from its hiding pl and seek alcoholic oblivion."

"I bought the thing as a matter of business. If all creatio going to shoot the chutes I want to be prepared. It's silly me to get all set to build houses for people if the world's com to an end."

"By Jove, when the crash comes I'm going to be stuck wit lot of Plantagenets!"

"But this chap thinks the world can be saved! He says the mad rush to find some joy in life we're forgetting G The spiritual spark growing dim—all that sort of thing."

"Um-m." Henderson took the pipe from his mouth a peered into the bowl. "He may be right, at that. I'm a sin —chock full of sin, original and acquired. I haven't been church since my wedding except to a (Continued on page 1

By
STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT

A Love Story as fresh as a Spring Breeze

Beaver!

Illustrations by Harrison Fisher

Marcia

"EVERY day, in every way," asserted Mrs. Conduit, looking firmly at herself in the mirror, "I am getting better and better. Every day in every way I am getting better and better. Everydayneverywaymgetnbettrbettr. Evryd——"

She stopped, abruptly. "But it doesn't! It just aches worse all the time," she confided, with a sigh. Then she brightened—she was a person of great persistence.

"If it only weren't for the headache! I could do it so nicely when there wasn't anything the matter with me," she thought resentfully. "So unobliging of it. Perhaps I'd better try the other way."

She straightened herself and began to apply the palm of her hand to her forehead with a curious circular motion as of rubbing in invisible cold cream.

"Ça passe!" she intoned. "Ça passe! Ça passe, çapasssszzzz——"

The rubbing grew faster. So did her chant. In a moment she was humming like a gigantic, dignified top.

"Pzzzzzzzzz——"

The door flew open, admitting, with a bounce, William Conduit Junior; a short, pink, worried looking young man with surprised blond hair.

"Mother! What on earth are you doing? Pretending you're a bee?"

"I was just trying a little ça passe, Billy, for one of my headaches," murmured Mrs. Conduit mildly, "and I really think it must have worked this time—or else it was your coming in so suddenly—startled me——"

"I'm awfully sorry. How is it?"

"Quite gone, I think," said Mrs. Conduit nervously. Then a smile came. She spread her arms, with a gesture. "Quite gone!" she repeated melodiously. "Quite—qu-i-te—go-one!"

"That's fine!" commented her offspring absent-mindedly. Then his grievance returned. "See here," he began in a threatening voice, "is this straight, what Dotty's just told me, or is she lying again? Is it straight? Have I got—have I got——" His voice wavered. "She says you told her I've got to go down with the big car and wait for this wet smack of an English Egyptologist—Lord Whoozis. Oh, she doesn't know which his train is! Said he wired he was coming between five and eight. Between five and eight. And then I'm to shepherd him al around and see he gets dressed and over to the Club and si through the dinner and lecture and everything myself!" H uttered loud, rude sounds expressive of rage and dismay. "I she right, I ask you?" he finished with a snort. "Because i she is——"

"Now, William," began Mrs. Conduit patiently. "Now William—if you'll remember—at lunch——"

Her forehead contracted. She put her hand to it weakly.

"Ça passe!" she murmured "Ça passe—ça passe—ça passe All is Good. Good is All. Karma, Karma—oh no, that' theosophy, isn't it? Ça passe, I mean, ça——"

"Now, William!" said her infuriated child. "Now, William indeed!" Then he changed to a pleading whine. "Honestly mother—I can't. I just can't and that's all there is to it. I've go a date. I've got a tea date—a dinner date—and I'm going to the Marstons' dance—it's the year's best party—and——"

"William!" breathed Mrs. Conduit. She reclined her brow upon her hand. No man with a spark o chivalry could have failed her.

"Oh, all right, then—all right! I'm the goat, I suppose. As usual. Only——"

Mrs. Conduit's glance drifted towards a clock.

"I don't want to hurry you, William dear. Bu as long as he said that he might come at five——"

"Oh Lord! Why can't Dotty go?"

"She couldn't, dear. He would think it much too American."

"Well, isn't there anybody else?"

"No, dear!" said Mrs. Conduit decisively. "I would but—there's a meeting of the Friends of the Wayward Girl. At half-past five."

"Well, how long is he going to stay?"

"A week, I think. He has another lecture Wednesday."

William groaned aloud.

"A week. And it's only another week till I have to go back to college! I suppose I'll have to play nurse to 'Is 'Ighness the whole blame week. No that I count," he inserted bitterly. "I don't matter —oh, no—I——" His feelings choked him.

"I thought you might take him out for some gol on Monday," said his mother placidly. "I under stood from Mrs. Remsen that Lord Dolicho plays."

"Golf? An Egyptologist? I bet he thinks you play it with cues."

"Lord Dolicho is a very agreeable and well in formed young man. You will have a great oppor tunity before you in meeting him, William," said Mrs. Conduit. "International friendships—so de lightful!" she continued vaguely. "The bonds of a common heritage."

"Opportunity—huh! I bet he's agreeable—on of those nice, chatty Englishmen. Really? Aw-fly So good of you. Don't y'know! Oh, I bet he's a prize wet towel!" he concluded with extraordinary vehemence. Then a horrible thought occurred to him. "I don't have to take him along to the dance, do I?" he said in breaking tones.

Mrs. Conduit relented.

"I don't know if his lordship dances. From what I gather, he seems to be a rather serious young man." She smiled. "But of course if he should dance——"

"Oh, holy Henry Ford! He probably polkas Well—it's lucky I'm going East again—that's al I'll say. I wouldn't be able to speak to a girl if I stayed—after wishing a dumb bunny like that on a real six cylinder party."

"It's getting later, William," said Mrs. Conduit

"I suppose so. Don't worry—I'll be there—be tween five and eight. I'm going." He turned toward the door. "Say, how am I going to recog nize this baby? Will he wear a red carnation in his buttonhole or what?"

"He will have a great many bags." Mrs. Conduit was amused. "And an English accent. He is tal and, as I remember, wears gold spectacles. A charming young man."

"Nice specifications!" grunted her son. "And I suppose he'll wear one of those Airedale suits without any crease in the trousers. Oh really—aw'fly—so glad to meet ya—darn!" He departed, slamming the door.

Billy

Mrs. Conduit waited a second. Then, "William!" she called.

"Yeah. What?"

"Oh, nothing. Marcia Mather will be at the dinner tonight."

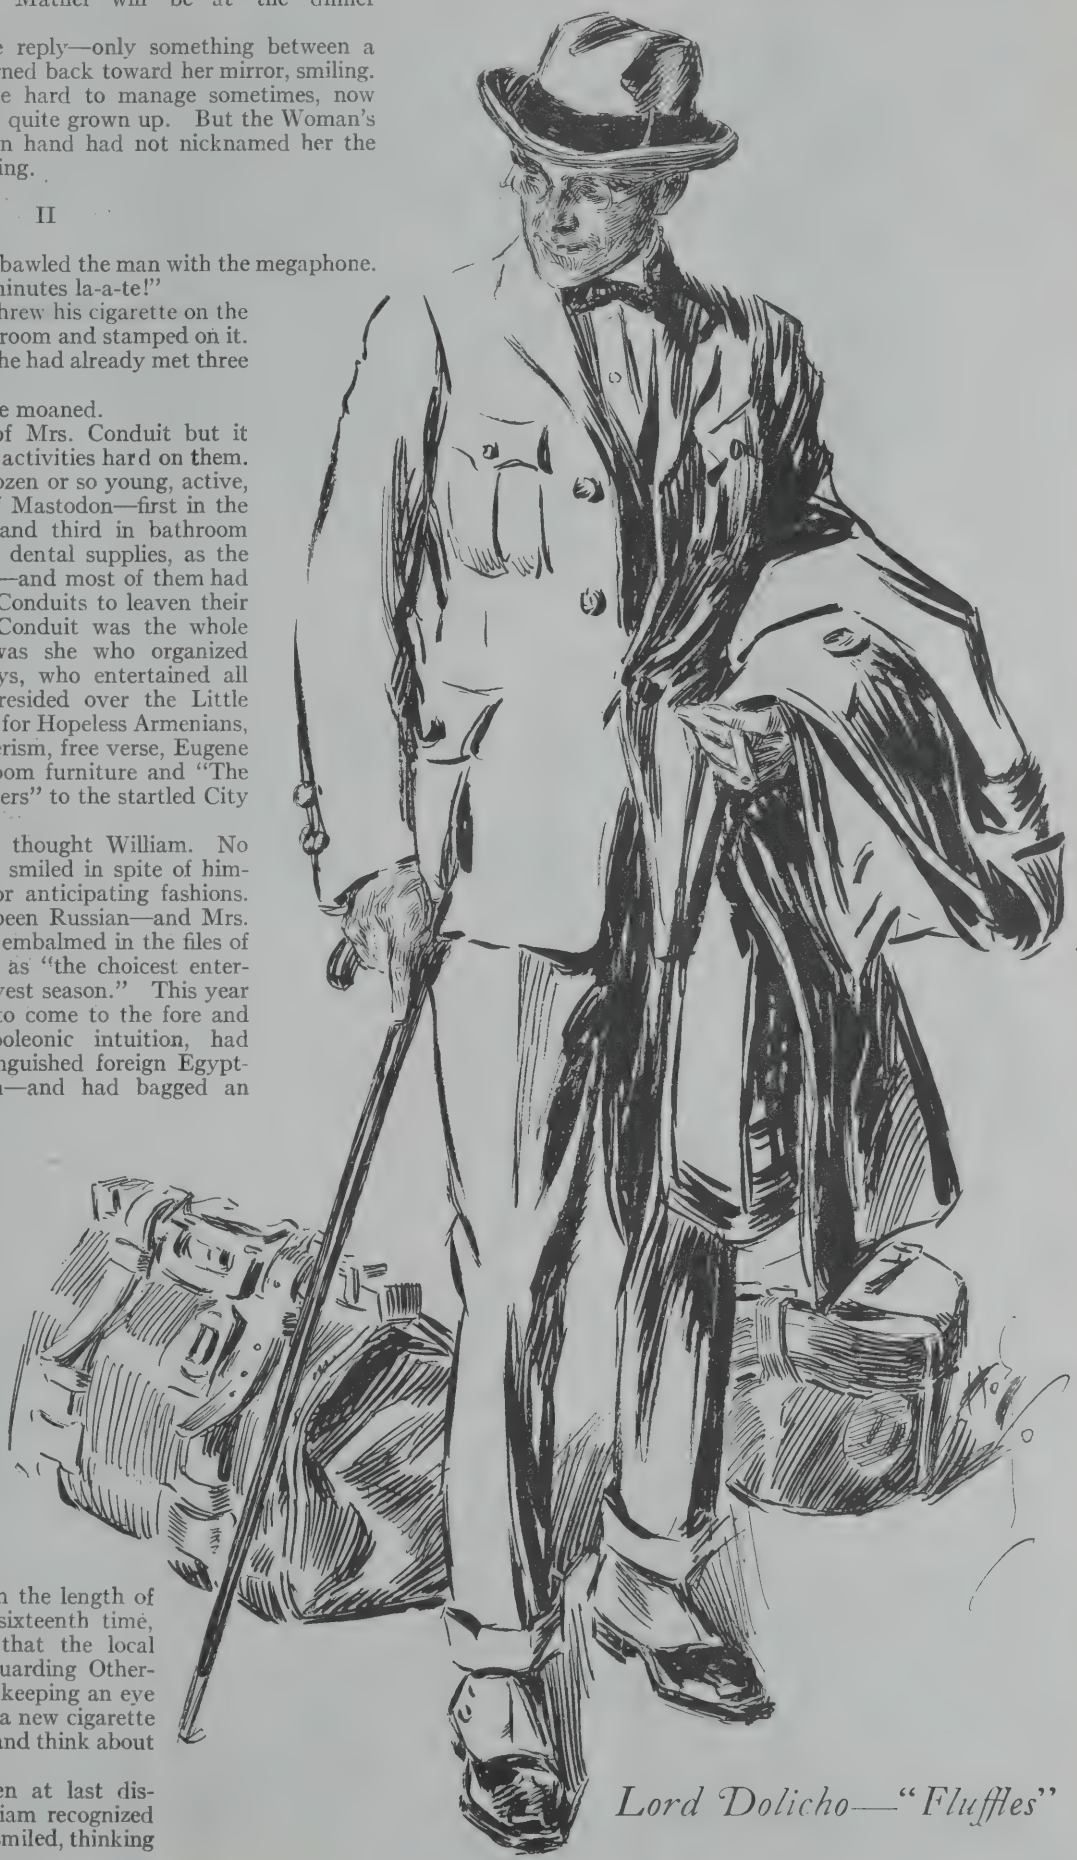
She heard no intelligible reply—only something between a snort and a grunt. She turned back toward her mirror, smiling. Dear Billy—he was a little hard to manage sometimes, now that he was so sure of being quite grown up. But the Woman's Club she ruled with an iron hand had not nicknamed her the Holy Steam Roller for nothing.

II

"NUMBER SEVUN-TEEN," bawled the man with the megaphone. "Now re-ported forty-five minutes la-a-te!"

William Conduit Junior threw his cigarette on the floor of the station smoking room and stamped on it. It was nearly six-thirty and he had already met three trains without result.

"Oh mother—mother!" he moaned.



Her family was proud of Mrs. Conduit but it sometimes found her varied activities hard on them. The last census showed a dozen or so young, active, prosperous cities the size of Mastodon—first in the manufacture of adhesives and third in bathroom fixtures, waste baskets and dental supplies, as the Rotary Club would tell you—and most of them had from two to a dozen Mrs. Conduits to leaven their material side. But Mrs. Conduit was the whole thing in Mastodon. It was she who organized charity drives and tag days, who entertained all visiting celebrities, who presided over the Little Theater Guild and the Fund for Hopeless Armenians, who had introduced Fletcherism, free verse, Eugene O'Neil, hand painted bedroom furniture and "The March of the Wooden Soldiers" to the startled City of Mastodon.

His mother was superb, thought William. No doubt of it. But—— He smiled in spite of himself, recognizing her gift for anticipating fashions. Last year everything had been Russian—and Mrs. Conduit's Russian ball was embalmed in the files of the Mastodon Sun-Journal as "the choicest entertainment of Mastodon's gayest season." This year Egypt was just beginning to come to the fore and Mrs. Conduit, with Napoleonic intuition, had seized upon the only distinguished foreign Egyptologist west of Pittsburgh—and had bagged an English lord as well. It was magnificent—very—but William sighed and yearned for a quiet life.

Still, mother was square. She had managed to let Marcia Mather in for this terrible affair. William had suffered all summer from excessive competition—for Marcia was inordinately popular. There would certainly be little competition tonight—everyone else would be at parties preliminary to the Marston dance. William smiled. It really mightn't be so bad, after all.

He paraded up and down the length of the waiting room for the sixteenth time, feeling horribly conscious that the local agent of the Society for Guarding Otherwise Unprotected Girls was keeping an eye on him. Then he lighted a new cigarette and settled himself to read and think about Marcia.

When Number Seventeen at last disgorged its passengers, William recognized Lord Dolicho at once. He smiled, thinking of his mother's description. Lord Dolicho was just like that. He was tall, gold-spectacled and dressed in a fuzzy tweed. His collar was a size too large for him and his face had the bricky tint and extraordinary absence of all human curiosity which one associates with the leading juvenile in a British comedy of manners. Two porters carried his multitudinous bags. William went up to him.

Lord Dolicho—"Fluffles"

"Lord Dolicho?"

"Yes."

"I'm Mr. Conduit—here to meet you. The car's outside. If you'll just——"

"Oh yes, rather! How do you do, Mr. Conduit. Jolly of you, this. Stranger in a strange land and all that sort of thing. Hope I haven't kept you waiting—the train was beastly late."

"Oh no—not at all!" said William politely. He was somewhat oppressed by wonder as to whether he should add "Your Lordship" or not.

Lord Dolicho relapsed into silence during the drive home, arousing only once when they swung down by the river.

"What—a river?" he said with apparent excitement. "Didn't know you had a river. Stupid of me."

"Oh yes, it's quite a big river!" said William, feeling like a fool.

He guided his guest to his room and then walked about nervously while Lord Dolicho began to fiddle with his numerous bags.

"I'm afraid you'll have to dress in rather a hurry," William said. "You see, it's after seven and I think you're having dinner at the Club at eight——"

"Right!" said Lord Dolicho at once and began to paw feverishly in the largest bag. "Notes for my lecture," he explained. "Can't think what I could have done with them—ah!" and he extracted about three pounds of typewritten matter and a huge collection of photographs. "I say, how long have I got? Mustn't drag it out too long, eh? Bore them."

"Oh, they're all very anxious to hear you!" said William insincerely. He gave Lord Dolicho up. He had visions of that suave and bricky gentleman dilating for hours upon the Egyptian vegetation myths while Marcia escaped to the Marston dance and he, William, sat in the front row with the smile of a dying gladiator frozen upon his lips. He would not be able to escape. He knew his mother.

He returned about twenty minutes later to find Lord Dolicho struggling with his tie. An inspiration had occurred to him in the interim. He carried it in on a tray.

"How about a cocktail?" he proffered hospitably. "I'm afraid the dinner'll be dry."

"Oh, very pleasant!" said Lord Dolicho. His face seemed to flicker with something approaching interest. "Jolly good of you."

William felt cheered.

"Well, here's to crime."

"Cheerio."

The process was repeated.

"Hot dog!" said William appreciatively.

"Excellent, what?"

"And now how about a little dividend?" said William persuasively.

"Ah well." Lord Dolicho seemed pensive. He abolished his quota with neatness and dispatch. William's heart began to warm to the man.

"A touch of Scotch?" asked Lord Dolicho diffidently. And in the instant he had conjured a gigantic flask from his bag.

"Real thing," he proffered. "Five star. Brought it over myself."

There was a knock at the door.

"Mrs. Conduit's compliments and the car is waiting."

"Just a nip?" said Lord Dolicho. "No time? Too bad."

"Take it along," said William firmly. The three cocktails had hit him all at once and he felt to Lord Dolicho as to a long lost brother.

"Really? But I say, would that be all right? Breaking laws and things?"

"Take it along!" said William decisively, his eyes beginning to bulge. "Like dancing?"

"Eh?"

"Like to dance? Oh, you know — tango — toddle — the lancers——"

"Oh, rather!" exclaimed Lord Dolicho, suddenly performing a perfect pirouette.

"All right. Big dance on tonight. We'll sneak away and crash in on it. Take that along—I'm going heeled myself."

"Sport. O nuts in May!" asserted that serious young Egyptologist, Lord Dolicho, and wedged the flask into his pocket where it seemed to sink without a trace.

III

Lord Dolicho's lecture was nearing its peroration, and William, in the front row, felt a trifle dazed. The dinner had not been a dry one—but that was not the reason, for he had been careful. What dazed him was the behavior of his friend, Lord Dolicho.

The dinner had begun like most good American dinners by the ushering of the guests into a side room for cocktails. Of these Lord Dolicho had partaken freely—William had counted three at least—and during dinner there had been champagne, which Lord Dolicho had by no means refused. After dinner, and just before his speech, he had also absorbed some quantity of Mr. Willoughby's hospitably proffered Scotch. With no apparent result except a slight additional brickiness of countenance and an occasional furtive smile.

"He must be lined with porcelain," thought William enviously. "Except where he's full of phonograph records on Egypt." He gritted his teeth. He was not having a very good time.

At dinner he had been seated between Marcia and Professor Grosbeak's wife, with Lord Dolicho on Marcia's other side. And from the fish course on he had seen nothing of Marcia except the back of her neck. It had been the work of a second—only a second—when he had had to turn and answer one of Mrs. Grosbeak's questions. But when he turned back to Marcia she was talking to Lord Dolicho and he had never been able to get her attention again. All he got was irritating scraps of what appeared to be Lord Dolicho's autobiography.

"But was it really a lion?" from Marcia, in her most innocent voice.

"Rather. A big fellow. But then, you see, my bearer . . . You American girls are jolly sporting, Miss Mather. It reminds me of one time when we were digging near Luxor and a sand storm . . ."

Things like that.

And now the dumbbell had been talking for at least two hours. William considered savagely, and everybody was simply popeyed about him. He craned his neck to look at Marcia. She was leaning forward, lips parted, fairly drinking in Lord Dolicho's description of the nuptial customs of the Shepherd Kings, that look on her face that is hardest of all for a suitor to bear when it is not directed at him—a Desdemona-like frankness of admiration for the hardy exploits of a big, brave, modest man.

Lord Dolicho sat down amid a storm of applause. He had to bow repeatedly, and even William admitted that he did it well. Women were pressing forward to shake his hand. William struggled against the current, looking frantically for Marcia.

"Hey, Marsh! Let's wander over to the Marstons'—I've got the car."

"You're an angel, Billy—I'll be with you in half a sec—I've just got to ask Lord Dolicho one question first. He certainly is the alligator's adenoids, isn't he?"

William swore.

Nor was he any more pleased when, after most of the audience had ebbed away, Marcia appeared, dragging Lord Dolicho after her by the hand.

"He's crossed his heart he's coming with us, haven't you, Lord Dolicho? He says he's just dying to go to a real American party. And he dances like Valentino—we've just been practicing."

"Indeed?" said William Conduit Junior in an unnatural voice.

The dance, though eventful, was not as William had pictured it. Lord Dolicho swept all before him—rather, I am afraid, in spite of William than because of him. William managed to stick him once with bulbous Minnie Colgate, but that was all. And then, mused William bitterly, Jim Colgate had to cut right in, of course. Once rescued, Lord Dolicho eluded all similar traps with a practiced airiness, devoting himself with unerring good judgment to a half-dozen of the most attractive—and first and foremost to Marcia. William, drooping like a limp lily on the edge of the stag line, regarded the gay scene before him with melancholy eyes. It was one o'clock and the party had just attained the condition known as "right"—and he hadn't seen either Marcia or Lord Dolicho for a long, long time.

He was joined by Obie Clark—an ex-rival rendered ally by the pressure of a common distrust.

"Say, who is this English sheik you and Marcia wished on the party, anyway?" Obie growled. "He's just about ruined my evening. The girls won't talk about anything else, and a for Marcia——"

"He's an Egyptologist," said William. "An Egyptologist. And I used to think that meant an old blind man with woolly whiskers! Have you seen his flask? It's a pocket aquarium."

"Have I seen it? Have you heard his line? Hot baby! He must be wild! He and Marcia have been parked in your car for the last half-hour."

"In my car?" said William incredulously. "In our car?"

"Oh rather!" mocked Obie viciously. "Rather—what?

Eloise

suppose because it's the most comfortable looking boat around. If there were any better looking ones he'd be there."

"I'm going to bust it up," said William, pallid but determined. "No Prince of Wales is going to get away with that while I'm conscious. In our car!"

"Now, Bill," the malevolent Obie reminded him, "now Willyum—don't get fractious! Remember he's your little guest!"

"Guest!" said William intensely, and made for the porch.

The cool air sobered him slightly, and besides he forgot, at the moment, just where he had parked the car.

He was about to go around toward the back of the Club when low voices came to him from a dark corner of the porch. He stopped, transfixed. It was Marcia and Dolicho, and their tone informed him plainly that they were completely unaware of his presence.

"It's so different—to meet a man who's really done things, Lord Dolicho. That is, I mean a real man who's done real things. Not just a boy. Honestly, Lord Dolicho——"

"Call me Fluffles!"

"What?"

"Title. Hate the beastly thing. Call me Fluffles, Miss Mather. All my pals call me Fluffles."

"Well, Fluffles"—her voice was exquisitely silvery—"if you'll call me Marcia——"

With a low cry William turned and fled to the coat room. He found Obie Clark there, engaged in extracting the cork from a bottle whose label said something stern about the contents being for medicinal purposes only.

"Find 'em?"

William nodded. "Gimme a drink. Gimme ten drinks. No—wait a minute! I got some gin. We'll mix 'em."

"Shades of a happier time!" said Obie, impressed. "What are you after, big boy?"

"Paralysis," said William, and reached for the bottle.

IV

Lord Dolicho's eleven foot putt just wobbled into the cup.

"That breaks it," said William resignedly. "Three and two. Sorry, Eloise."

"Oh, hot stuff, Fluffles!" cried Marcia enthusiastically. Lord Dolicho gazed at her fondly as they clasped hands.

"You were ripping!" he murmured. "Ripping!"

They stood that way for a most unnecessary length of time. William thumped the sand-box violently with his pet putter.

"Want to play it out?" he queried. "Only two more."

"Oh no!" said Marcia with a pretty yawn. "It's hot. Besides, we've demonstrated our superiority, haven't we, Fluffles?"

The foursome started toward the clubhouse. William devoted himself exaggeratedly to Eloise. (Continued on page 124)

It ALL

A Versatile Drama in Tw

[Including

By BERTON

Illustrations b

THE CHARACTERS: Priscilla Dunn,
Blonde, beautiful—and twenty-one;
William, or rather "Billy" Moore,
Handsome, gray-haired and forty-four;
Friends, kin, sophisticated mockers,
Crape-hangers, loyal boosters, knockers.

Place—anywhere; the Time, today
Or thereabouts. That sets the play,
Come on folks, let's be on our way.

Act One, Scene One

The play's begun

Discovered—Bill, also Priscilla;
Bill speaks, as they rest from a dance:
"That music would certainly thrill a
Dominican monk with romance!
And I'm not an anchorite—no, not at all,
For music like that casts a magical thrall
About all my being, and so—well, you see——"

Priscilla: "The music is nice as can be,
But weren't you thrilled—just a little—by Me?"

Bill: "Wasn't I? Darling and dearest of girls,
You thrill me till all of the blood in me swirls.
My heart fairly thunders and—whoa, Billy, whoa!
An old bird like you are can't play Romeo!"

Priscilla: "Old! Billy, why what do you mean?
You're just the right age, you are quite young enough,
Beside you the college boys seem sort of green,
I won't hear you spill such ridiculous stuff;
Now, what were you saying—or going to say?"

Bill: "I am December, and you—you are May.
At least that's what sensible people would say."

Priscilla: "December! September, my dear,
The loveliest, splendidest time of the year!
Go on—please go on; I am listening, Bill."

Bill: "No, no! I mustn't—I shouldn't! But still,
I love you, Priscilla, more dearly than life,
Oh, darn all my doubting! Will you be my wife?"

Priscilla: "I'll say so! Gosh, nobody knows
How hard I've been working to make you propose!"
(Concluding this scene is a regular cinch,
We merely remark that it ends in a clinch.)

And now we view
Scene Two

Priscilla's friends (or quite a bunch
Of her companions) meet at lunch
Or tea, perhaps, it doesn't matter;
And mid their energetic chatter

This is the sort of thing we hear:
"A terrible mistake, my dear.
He must be more than twice her age.
I don't see how she could engage Herself to such a patriarch."
"Well, as for me, I must remark,
I think, it's Money."
"Nonsense, she has,
As much, or even more, than he has."

"Of course he's clever and all that,
And dances well—and isn't fat;
But just the same he's past his prime."

"He'll think she ought to spend her time Darning his socks."
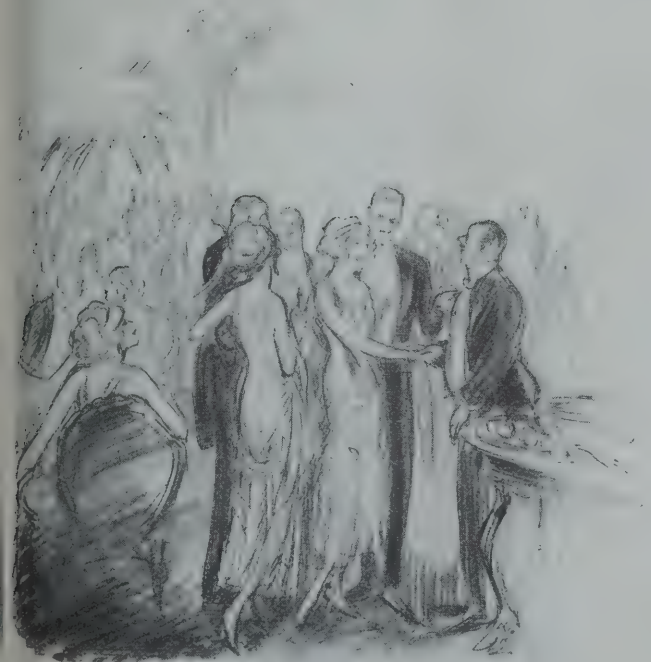
"And when she goes
To dances, parties, teas and shows,
She'll find he can't keep up the pace;
And he'll insist that woman's place
Is home sweet home."

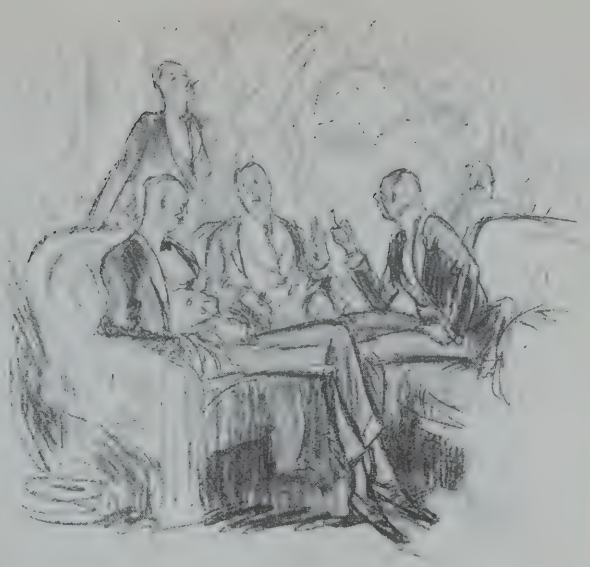
Depends

Acts and Lots of Scenes an Epilogue]

BRALEY



A. H. Henkel



"To me it's clear
The marriage will not last a year."

Scene Three

Bill's friends;
A smoky cloud
Wavers and blends
About the crowd
Which holds some bachelors like Bill,
Some younger, and some older still;
Some married men, and two or three
Who "are not now, but used to be."

The talk runs thus:
"Bill's done for."
"Say
I wonder how they get that way,
These cradle robbers!"
"He'll regret it,
The poor old wreck!"
"Wreck? Say, forget
There's not a young man in this bunch
With half Bill's muscle, pep and punch!"
"But she's a flapper, just a kid."
"He's much too old. I never did Believe in such a match."
"A wife
Will lead that bird an awful life."

"She's twenty-one, he's forty-four,
I give 'em, well, a year—no more."
"What could that girl be thinking of?"
"Well," Bill's best friend observes, "perhaps
You wise old guys and bright young chaps
Have heard of something known as—Love."

Act Two, Scene One

They are married, Priscilla and Bill,
The honeymoon's over, the first gorgeous thrill
Of marriage is passing. The conjugal pair
Are slowly but surely becoming aware
That there are a number of people about
Besides just the two of them. There's not a doubt
They're showing at last a decided proclivity
To welcome some measure of social activity.

Though home's where the heart is
They're going to parties
And Bill and his wife are the life of the crowd;
Priscilla is blooming, and Billy is proud
To take her about and exhibit his prize,
A wife who is easy on everyone's eyes.

They golf and they bridge and they tennis and dance,
And Bill is as gay as a youth of romance.

But—hark to the gossips, both female and male:
"They're certainly hitting the primrosy trail, Bill can't keep it up!"
"She's a regular gadabout;
Oh, somehow there's something that's awfully sad about
A man at the middle-aged season of life
Who tries to keep pace with a very young wife!"
"I'll bet he is tiring
Of constantly squiring
Priscilla around to these various places."
"His face shows some most unmistakable traces Of having enough
Of frivol and fluff."
"Poor Bill."
"Well, his future is certainly tough,
He loves her, no doubt,
But she'll wear him out
With all of this dancing and running about!"
"December and May—Bill's getting more gray!"
"I wager he's begging Priscilla to stay

More often at home for an evening of quiet
In place of society's turmoil and riot."

"It all shows the cold inescapable truth
That age can't keep up with the vigor of youth."

Act Two, Scene Two

Priscilla; Bill.

Priscilla: "Dear, it's time to go."

Bill: "Aw, let's stick around until
The party's over. If we blow
We'll miss a lot of gorgeous fun.
Seems like the evening's just begun.
Come on, kid, where's your well known pep,
Let's do that latest fox-trot step;
We'll show this bunch a married pair
That, as a dancing team, are there."

Priscilla: "Billy, please let's stop!
I am so weary I could drop.
We've been out every night this week
Till two o'clock or three or four,
I'm so fatigued I want to shriek,
I simply can't dance any more.
Please take me home and let me sleep,
I can't sustain the pace you keep."

Act Two, Scene Three

Priscilla lies
Abed, with heavy-lidded eyes.

Bill tiptoes in all shaved and dressed
And radiating vim and zest,
Smiles as he sees her sleeping there,
Kisses her lightly on her hair
And tiptoes out to work. And when He calls his house at half-past ten
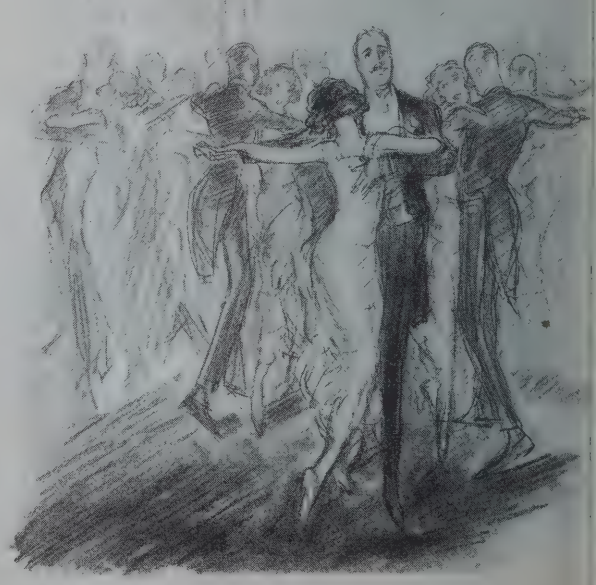
Priscilla answers: "Morning, Bill,
I just woke up. I'm sleepy still;
But if you'd like to have me to,
I'll lunch at one o'clock with you."

Epilogue



The method dramatic we'll herewith abandon,
It isn't as easy a job as we planned on.

In simple narration
The Moores' situation
Has come down to this—that Priscilla stays home
While Bill is the butterfly, eager to roam
With other gay spirits. He urges his wife
To join him in "getting some fun out of life,"
And sometimes she goes
To dances and shows,
Or plays in society's mad hurly-burly,
Providing that Bill
Makes promise he will
Be certain to bring her home "decently early."
And now all the knockers
And gossips and mockers
Are busy constructing a peppy scenario
With Bill as the wicked and cruel Lothario
Neglecting his spouse
That he may carouse,
And setting a pace which "no weak little woman
Can possibly travel."
"It's simply inhuman
The way that he treats her," the gossipers say.
"I wonder she stands it for even a day!"

The Moores, as a matter of fact, are quite happy.
Bill's busy and daily more peppy and snappy;
He outplays the young 'uns at golf; and at tennis
He's known and respected as always a menace.
The flappers enthuse over Bill and his dancing,
Which seems to grow better as years are advancing

Priscilla's contented, and proud of him, too.
And as for herself—she has plenty to do.
With three husky young ones to nurture and train,
She's busy for most of her time, it is plain.

The moral is simply: You Never Can Tell.
There isn't a rule which works equally well
For different cases. December and May Have often been wed in the happiest way.
December is, frequently, you may recall,
A brisk, snappy, vigorous month, after all.

MARION DAVIES has a most congenial rôle in the Cosmopolitan picture, "Little Old New York," as the plucky Patricia O'Day who left her native Ireland and came to New York disguised as a boy.

JULIA ARTHUR has closed her very successful engagement in a tabloid version of "Hamlet" in order to play the part of Queen Elizabeth in a new Cosmopolitan picture with Marion Davies and an all star cast.

PHOTOGRAPH BY WHITE STUDIO

ALLYN KING, who violates the tradition that blondes are passive and calm as she breezily sings and dances her way through Lew Canter's musical comedy, "Sun Showers," wherein she is prima donna.

PHOTOGRAPH BY PACH BROS.

DOLLY WEGMAN, who has that rare combination, blue eyes and brown hair, and who came here from Petrograd and achieved immediate success, her latest engagement being in "The Dancing Girl."

PHOTOGRAPH BY APEDA

By ARTHUR SOMERS ROCHE

His Past

A Story of the Inside of a Man's Heart

Illustrations by Grant T. Reynard

THE clerk who ushered the woman into the private office grinned furtively at the big man who sat behind the big desk. He had been his employer's lackey for years enough to know how Henry Staggard, of Staggard, Inc., would treat such a timorous visitor as this. The boss certainly was a wonder at getting rid of women.

Staggard did not invite the woman to sit down. He busied himself for fully five minutes with important looking documents, while the perspiration grew thicker upon the forehead of the visitor. Standing there, fidgeting, picking at her shabby coat with stubby nervous fingers, pushing back from her wet temples sparse strands of gray hair, she was an object to inspire chivalrous pity in the heart of a decent man. Life had been so harsh to her; one knew that the callouses on her hands had not been put there by golf clubs or tennis rackets, but by the laborious wielding of a mop upon an office floor. The sun gleaming upon the sands of a beach had not weakened her eyes; painstaking work of nights with a needle had dimmed them.

Suddenly Staggard looked up. "You're Mary Fenwick, aren't you?"

She bobbed her head. "Yes, sir, Mr. Staggard, sir."

He frowned heavily. "Don't you know that I'm a busy man? I've written you letters explaining that I can't do anything for you, and yet you force your way into my office."

She was white; the crimson of embarrassment had given way to the pallor of fear.

"Your advertisement said that Tri-State Oil would be worth twice what it cost," she said.

"It will be," declared Staggard.

"But the doctor says I've got to quit work, and I tried to sell my stock, and nobody'd buy it. I need the money, and that's why I wrote to you."

"And I replied that you must be patient," said Staggard.

"But I must have my money," cried the woman.

"Is that so?" asked Staggard. "Are you threatening me? If you are I'll send for a policeman."

She burst into frightened tears. "I don't know what I'll do," she moaned.

Staggard rang a bell; the clerk entered, wiping a grin from his mouth with the back of his hand. Staggard pointed at the woman.

"Show her out," he ordered.

Unresistingly the woman followed the clerk. There was something brutal about the bigness of Staggard that made her forget all that she had planned to say. She knew how useless words would be. Staggard smiled as the door closed behind her. He had kept well within the law when he sold the stock.

Five minutes later the clerk announced that a man was calling, and that he was a tough customer.

"He's liable to kick up a fuss, and I thought maybe you'd better see him yourself," explained the clerk.

"All right," said Staggard. His manner was entirely different as he noted the bulk of this visitor. He was fully as big a man as Staggard, and had a bronzed color that spoke of outdoor work.

"Are you Staggard?" he demanded.

Staggard beamed expansively. "I certainly am," he replied breezily. "What can I do for you, partner?"

The visitor's ire lessened perceptibly. "You can give me back the money I paid for a hundred shares of Tri-State," he stated.

"That so?" Staggard was interested. "What's the matter?"

"Plenty! I got talking with some friends of mine and they said your stock was a fake."

Staggard whipped a fountain pen from his waistcoat pocket and drew a pad of paper toward him. "Names! Addresses!" he cried.

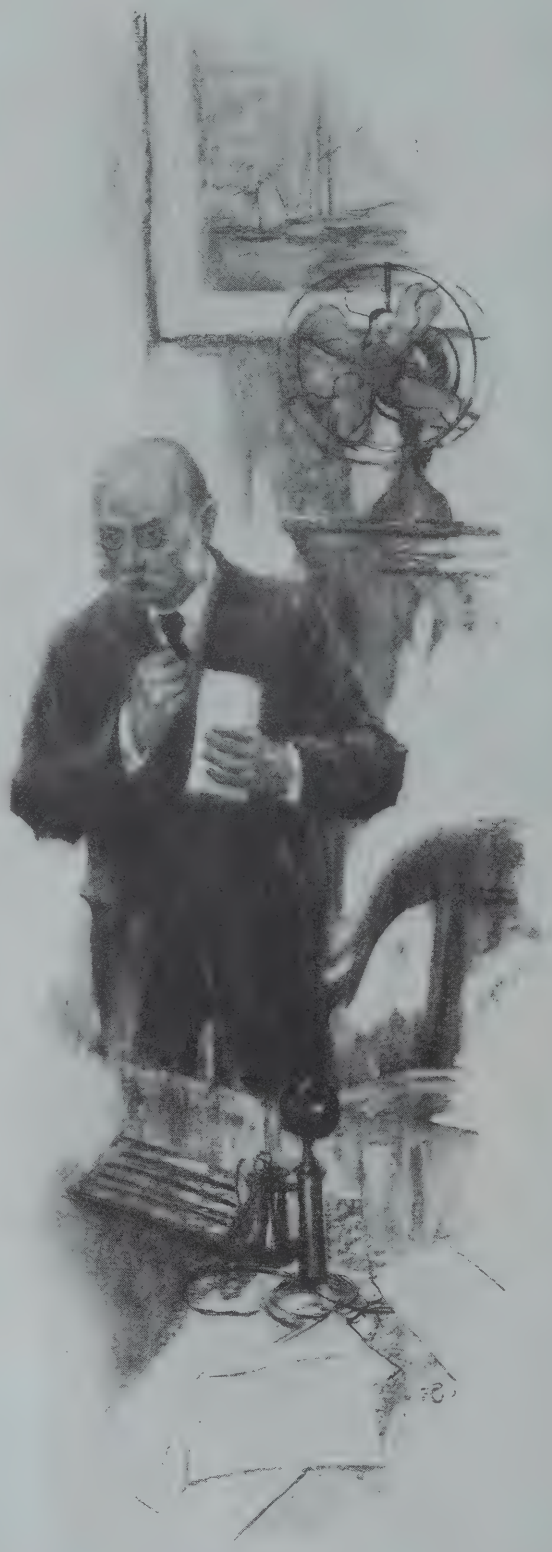
"What for?" asked the other.

"Sue them," exclaimed Staggard. "Sue them for criminal libel; put them in jail where they belong."

The bronzed man whistled. "Oh, you needn't get het up!" he said. "They're just friends of mine who are kinda interested in me. You see, there's no market for Tri-State——"

Staggard uttered a grunt of impatience. "Of course not! Not now. But in three months—— Give me the names of those people."

"Then the stock is good?" asked the man uncertainly.



Staggard eyed him pityingly. "Do I look like a man who'd sell worthless stock? I tell you, partner, that the way to get ahead in this world is not to listen to a lot of simple minded friends, but to listen to a shrewd business man. Have your friends made a million dollars? I guess not. But I have! And I have hundreds of thousands invested in Tri-State."

Simple, as nearly all men who live by their hands are, the man was impressed by Staggard's blunt speech. "I guess I'll wait awhile," he declared.

Staggard smiled almost affectionately. "That's good sound sense," he said. He rose, gripped the man's hand fervently, and ushered him from his office. He returned, grinning, to his desk. There was always a way. If threat were inadvisable, blunt camaraderie would serve . . .

He leaned back comfortably in his chair. His thoughts ceased to dwell upon business; they traveled toward Rose Bellamy. On the way they rested upon Frank Allen, just long enough for him to sneer. For he was quite sure that Rose Bellamy was not going to marry young Allen. He had his ways of finding out things; he could draw conclusions from scattered facts. And if she had decided not to marry Allen, it could be only because she had decided to marry Staggard. His smile of self-content was expansive. Today he would arrive at the summit toward which he had been traveling so long.

And how easy the road had been! He had begun with nothing save a certain gift for chicanery. He could tell part of the truth with an engaging frankness that made his auditor feel ashamed of himself for wishing to ask searching questions. And he could lie in a downright fashion that compelled belief. But he was a bit afraid of the complete falsehood. It was, he learned, so much easier to say something that was based upon a flimsy foundation of truth, and later to maintain that he had been misunderstood or duped himself, as the case might be.

From his pocket Blaney took—Staggard's past.

Most of the time he got away with it. But there had been two times when he hadn't, and a third when he had felt the manacles reaching out for his wrists.

On the first two occasions clever lawyers had aided him; once he had escaped with a suspended sentence and the other time with a fine. After that he had been careful—save once. And then he had signed a confession, paid back several thousand dollars and considered himself lucky to have been permitted to live.

Not that he condemned himself from a moral standpoint. Most certainly not. Fools were his meat, and he was a long-fanged wolf. But he had been too confident of himself, too sure of the asininity of the victim . . . He shuddered now when he thought about it.

And today he was thinking about it. It had always been a cloud upon the serenity of his outlook. He was a practical man; he knew that the confession, signed though it was, could be discounted. In these days of prosperity he could befog the matter, claim that he signed to protect a third person . . . Only, along with the confession had been certain other papers that would eternally disprove any attempt on his part to prove himself a victim of circumstance . . .

But now, this minute, he beamed. This morning would settle it all. Not merely the confession, but the evidence that would prove the confession not to have been extorted unfairly: all were to be returned to him.

It was about six months ago that the idea had come to him. That was when a group of citizens had expressed to him their desire that he should run independently, on a platform of reform, for the Congressional seat from the district. He had accepted, and the next morning he had withdrawn.

He was rich, he was successful. But he was by no means famous. The press, the general public—he was not even a name to them. But let him accept a reform nomination and his name and picture would be spread broadcast by the newspapers. And out in a certain Western town a lawyer would read about him, would say to himself, "Henry Staggard, eh? Ah-ha! Hen-ry Stag-hard."

One thing or the other would then happen—blackmail or exposure of that third occasion in Staggard's life when no lawyer could have saved him. Either would be most unpleasant.

But he couldn't forever refrain from that gratification of ambition that public laudation meant. It was not sufficient to be rich, to be successful in business. He wanted to let the world know about it. There were other things, too. For instance, certain conservative bankers, merchants, financiers, looked upon him with disdainful eyes. His methods were not theirs. Of course, he kept within the confines of legality, but—they didn't care for him. When the inner circles met at dignified clubs Henry Staggard was not present. Oh, they did business with him, but only because it was necessary!

And he wanted them to do business with him because they wanted to, because they liked him.

Staggard was a man who would never fall in love with anyone. But Rose Bellamy belonged to the inner set.

But he had not been asked to join the right sort of club; he had never dined in the houses on Park or Fifth Avenue, or one of the proper side streets that cross these. Not even a nomination to Congress, he had decided, would bring him the coveted invitation.

And so, the money ambition having been gratified, he turned to methods whereby he should achieve this later ambition, the outgrowth of financial success, without which money meant little—he wanted to belong.

He knew how—instantly. If he could marry the right woman . . . To meet her was not too difficult. One who has money may not necessarily be welcomed in the home, but may be greeted with open arms at the charity bazaar. It was at one of these that he met Rose Bellamy.

He didn't fall in love with her. He would never fall in love with anyone. But she was well born, belonged to the inner set, was beautiful, gracious . . . That an English duke had recently joined a group that had formed (Continued on page 108)

© Pirie MacDonald

ALBERT

What Am I

I THINK that Fifty ought to correspond to the stock-taking season in business. It is an ideal time to find what one has lost and what one has gained and what is left in stock and how the assets line up against the liabilities.

Let's tackle the liabilities first. There are more of them; though that doesn't mean necessarily that they outweigh the assets. A dozen lumps of dirt don't outweigh a single pound of gold; even though they outnumber it, twelve to one.

Into the liabilities side of the scales we may as well dump the body. The body, from the ears down. Dump all of it at once, to save argument. Apart from its brain there isn't one fraction of an inch of it that is anywhere near as good as it was twenty-five or fifteen or even ten years ago.

At this point I can visualize some brawny fifty year old with wide shoulders and deep chest and ruddy skin and clear eye. He rises to declare: "I'm every bit as good as I was at twenty-five. I live clean and I keep out of doors and I exercise steadily. Where d'you get that stuff about my not being as good physically as I was at thirty? I feel as husky as ever I felt. I played thirty-six holes of golf yesterday and I——"

Then I interrupt: "Oh, sit down! You're the very man I've been wanting to answer. You need it. As good today as you were at twenty-five, are you? I seem to remember your boxing ten fast rounds with me when we were in the late twenties; and finishing as fresh as you began. Put on the gloves. No, not with me. I'm too old for that sort of fun, and I realize it. Put them on with that twenty-eight year old middleweight. He is lighter and shorter than you; and he isn't much of a boxer. But he's in the twenties. . . . Time!

Good For—Now That I'm Fifty

"My friend, you've boxed only three moderately lively rounds; and I can hear you puff clear across the room. Your poor face is purple, and your knees are wobbly.

"Besides, tomorrow those light swats he's handed you are going to swell and turn yellow-green; and you're going to be as sore all over as a smashed thumb. And you were as slow after the first round as a hippopotamus. So far as boxing is concerned you've proved my point. Yet not one man in ten, at your age, is as strong and as fit as you are.

"The test wasn't fair, eh? Very good. Remember the day you and I ran all the way from Paterson to Pompton, uphill and down, just for the fun of it? Pretty fair clip we hit, too; and we finished the eight miles strong, and hardly out of breath. Well, then, just run a single mile now on level ground, and sprint at the finish. No, I won't be your pacemaker. I'm sane enough to know I wouldn't last half the distance. Here's a fifteen year old schoolboy who'll pace you. On your marks! Get set! Go! . . .

"Yes, old chap, it was rotten of the kid to laugh at you when you caved in on the last quarter, and your sprinting muscles wouldn't sprint. But you did make a show of yourself.

"Convinced, are you? Good! Then cut out that nonsense about 'feeling as husky as ever you felt!' A bankrupt can still feel like a millionaire—till he begins to write checks."

At Fifty—usually long before—a wise man realizes his body can no longer do the splendid things which once it could achieve with ease. He learns the true tragedy of that most tragic of the Bible's myriad tragic lines; the line which tells of the shorn Samson when he went forth with his wonted confidence that he could crush his Philistine foes by brute strength, as of old:

"He wist not that the Lord was departed from him!"

Not that Fifty is an age of decrepitude. But it is an age when a score of things which once were fiercely necessary are now merely desirable; and when no man but a fool will attempt to excel in athletics. Moderation must be Fifty's keynote.

True, at Fifty you can walk comfortably in the wake of a gutta-percha pill on the links. You may acquire or retain a very creditable stroke at golf. But that entails only a few dozen arm motions and a calm trudge over turfed ground.

Some big doctor has said a man needs no violent exercise after he passes forty-five. Some big doctor is right.

True, E. P. Weston walked innumerable steady miles on a stretch after he was seventy. But he walked them, remember. And walking is nature's own subconscious form of exercise. It lasts when almost every form of active endeavor has died.

A fat Wall Street man of Fifty went to Muldoon's and besought the master to put him in such shape that once again he could touch his finger tips to the floor without bending his knees.

"Sure," assented Muldoon. "I'll teach you to do it if you'll give me one sane reason why you want to do such a thing."

Then there is the matter of eating. This morning I had a glass of orange juice, a soft boiled egg, a thin slice of toast and a half cup of coffee for breakfast. The egg was added because I planned a five mile tramp with the dogs. My luncheon was toast and bacon. My dinner will be reasonably heavy. If it is *un*reasonably heavy I shall pay the penalty.

Twenty-five years ago my breakfast invariably consisted of fruit, cereal with much cream, a couple of big cups of coffee, some form of hot bread and two or three chops or liver and bacon. My invariable luncheon was a pound of blood-rare steak, a heaping dish of fried potatoes and a quart of beer. I ate a hearty dinner at night. And I ran a fast mile, directly after dinner, to settle the repast. Usually I wound up the day by a before-bedtime Welsh rarebit and a bottle of beer.

Only by exercise of memory can I make myself believe I ever ate and digested such hoggish quantities of food and drink. One month of that diet today would do unspeakable things to me.

Nor can a man of Fifty eat hearty and indigestible late suppers and drink all manner of things at them, as he could in the twenties and thirties or early forties. That, too, is past. His body can't stand it. Nothing tastes good enough at night to warrant next morning's pangs of indigestion.

It is still more the case with sleep. At Fifty we don't need quite as many hours of slumber a night as younger people like to have. Yet we not only need our sleep mighty regularly but we are prone to go to pieces if we don't get it. Said a fifty year old officer of the A. E. F. to me:

"I could fight alongside the younger men and I could march or starve or suffer alongside them. But I couldn't lose sleep as they could without feeling it. Two or three sleepless nights put me out of business. That's how I knew I was old."

So much for the liabilities of Fifty. The assets are fewer, but more worth while. For instance, when I was twenty-four years old and an athlete I undertook to write for three hours a night after my day's work at the office was done. In three weeks it gave me insomnia and ripped my nerves to ribbons.

At Fifty I can sit down to my desk five evenings a week, if need be, after a fair day's work, and can write steadily for five hours; and then sleep like a child and wake up none the worse for the toil. It is so with many another fifty year old.

In other words, the mind is stronger; the ability for steadily continued mental overwork is far greater at Fifty than at twenty-five. What we oldsters lose in body we seem to gain in power of mental labor. My mother, at eighty-eight, often spent nine hours a day at her desk, with no after-fatigue. At twenty-eight she suffered a severe nervous breakdown from much shorter hours.

At Fifty the mind is at its best. It may not be much of a mind. But such as it is, it is doing its strongest and most sustained work.

That is something business men may find it profitable to remember when they plan to discharge a fifty year old employee because he seems to be aging. And the employee will find it even more profitable if his boss will bear this in mind.

There is too much talk about the value of young blood in a business's routine departments. If you want a fine piano mover, hire a young man. If you want good and sustained brain work done, don't kick out the man of Fifty.

By CYNTHIA STOCKLEY

The Garden of Peril

Part Three:

THE spell was broken. She came kittening and cozening to his bedside next morning, dropping a tender kiss on him when the nurse had her back turned for a moment, full of solicitude for his languor, and of gentle chiding at the melancholy that had returned to his eyes. But the spell was shivered into a thousand atoms, as a crystal ball is shivered by the blow of a hammer. Those words that had burst from her lips during that strange scene the night before when she stood in the dining room, amid bright stains and broken glass—"What a fool you are!"—those haunting words possessed a ring of truth that he could not discern in these soft cajoleries of the morning.

Something unreal, too, rang in her brightness. Shades of deeper blue lay under the forget-me-not of her eyes, and lines of sleeplessness were scribbled about them, and well he knew she was not one to greet the dawn with smiles after a bad night. Yet she smiled and said nothing of wakeful hours passed. And there was a strange watchfulness in her glance. Even while she laughingly excused the previous evening's "access of nerves," the sharpness of the scrutiny she set upon him keyed his own jangled nerves to unbearable tension.

Consciousness was forced upon him of something going on under the smooth surface of things; something he did not understand. He did not want to understand it either, for it was disquieting, sinister, disintegrating. Fear of understanding it came at last to eat him more agonizingly than the rat at his vitals.

Some more desperate change, too, had entered into his bodily condition. Dissolution of his physical elements appeared to be occurring within him. His very viscera seemed composed of fire, and the marrow in his bones to have turned to molten liquid. Appetite had gone. Nothing remained except a burning thirst. But he did not ask for stimulant now . . . only water . . .

Bruce Kelly's concern and puzzlement was such that he spent almost the whole day in the sick room, sitting beside the patient to insure his remaining in bed, inspecting every grain of food and drop of liquid that came into the room. The injections for the first time were discarded. By six o'clock that evening he announced his intention of wiring for a consultant from Johannesburg unless the patient's condition had improved by morning. That, from Bruce Kelly, was admission of defeat, and his face looked terribly old and tired when he made it, standing by the sick man's bed, in the presence of Nurse Gordon and Doria.

But Pam only smiled rather wearily, and said he'd be all right. He did not know . . . particularly did not want to know what was wrong with his body. He only knew that the spirit of joie de vivre so recently revived in him had received a mortal blow; that dreams were composed of dust, and ashes were the ordained fare of fools.

Nevertheless, when morning came he seemed a shade better, and after that from day to day an improvement, almost infinitesimal yet enough to satisfy Doctor Kelly, was maintained. After that things went on much as usual, only that the patient was quieter than he had ever been, uncomplaining, gentle with his wife, obedient to his nurse, but with the last spark of his old fire dashed out and dead. There were no more sloe gins and sundowners, naturally. Impossible under the circumstances to dodge Doctor's orders, even had Pam or his wife been so inclined. But indeed Doria, when they were alone together, had explicitly renounced "the game"; for a while.

"We must give Doctor Kelly the reins now," she said, "and see if you are the better for it. If not—well, of course, darling, I think he's wrong, and as soon as you feel able to take your little drinks again I am quite ready to abet you in what I am sure cannot be bad for you."

It was not long before Pam got to his feet again, being one of those who openly averred a preference for walking to the gates

A New Novel of South Africa by the Author of "Ponjola"

Illustrations by Dean Cornwell

Bruce Kelly's face looked terribly old and tired as he stood by the sick man's bed in the presence of Doria.

of death rather than waiting to be wafted there on his back. The old order of things resumed, with Peril coming to read to him in the afternoons while Nurse Gordon took her two hours off and Doria aired herself in the sunshine. The latter, in spite of her dissension with Doctor Kelly, still continued to make his garden the scene of her rest cure; and one evening on her return, looking refreshed and happy, she carried in her hand a couple of little dappled primulas, which she openly admitted to having stolen from a big bed of them just out in all their spring glory. But as she went to fix them in the buttonhole of her husband's lounge coat, Peril gave a startled exclamation:

"What is that stain on your fingers?"

The girl leaned forward with an expression of anxiety unusual to her serene features, and just for a moment Pam Heseltine witnessed in his wife's eyes that expression of animal fright that once before he had seen, but so fleeting was it that almost he might have believed himself mistaken. Doria was laughing now with her hands whipped behind her like a naughty child.

"I'm a grub . . . I've been poking round your garden as well as stealing your flowers. Shameful of me not to have washed before I came in here!"

She fled on that, but when she returned Peril still wore a troubled preoccupation that did not disperse on Doria's casual recital of the purchase of a pomegranate from a coolie fruit vendor, and the subsequent devouring of it in the garden and making a horrid mess of herself.

There is not really any need to make a mess of yourself when eating a pomegranate, for no fruit is more delicately arranged for dainty eating; and perhaps Peril was thinking of this when she walked home with knitted brows and a bewildered expression on her face. The Doctor was out to dinner that evening as it happened, so she had time and solitude for her uneasy meditations, whatever they were. Afterwards Valpy brought in the housekeeping books to go through with her. Just as Valpy was in the act of departing she remembered something else.

"Oh! and Mrs. Keable was asking me if I knew anything to take out stains, Miss Perrul. Her lady's beautiful sea-green tea gown is all a mess with sloe gin. I said I'd ask you."

"Sloe gin!" uttered Peril, arrested by the words and some correlation of ideas they aroused. Instantly she had a vision of Doria Heseltine leaning over the little gate of "the garden of peril," her handkerchief extended; her gay excited exclamations: "What a heavenly color! . . . I must have some! . . . a sloe gin tea gown!" Then she remembered the stain she had seen on Doria's fingers that very evening, and realized clearly at last why it had startled her. A little tense line like a cut showed suddenly between her brows.

"Did Keable tell you how it happened?" she asked slowly.

Doria uttered a hard, contemptuous laugh. "What horrid, spying people! Inventing fantastic nonsense! Really, Miss Kelly, I am surprised at you."

"Jest an accident. Mrs. Heseltine spilt a glass of the stuff over herself an' was in an awful rage about it nex' morning, insisting that Mrs. Keable shall get the marks out again. But as I tell her, Miss Perrul," continued Valpy in her soft, blurred Cape accent, "she never will. They look to me more like some of the stains you an' the Doctor makes on the labertery towels —you know what a business of boiling in soda that is. But you can't boil a beautiful Parus wrapper of sea-green silk, can you?"

Peril did not answer, and Valpy, enjoying the office of narrator, continued:

"It appears that it's all over the dining room carpet too. A nice fuss there'll be when the Mintos get back from Muizenberg to their old Lodge!" She added with relish, "And a nice bill to pay for damages."

Peril was not listening to this chatter. The little line between her brows had turned into a deep groove.

"Bring me the tea gown to the laboratory, Valpy," she told the woman.

Pam felt a good deal better that morning. In fact he had been aware for some days of a sensible diminution in his physical misery. Besides, he knew from the gray pin point of acute intelligence in Bruce Kelly's eyes that that vaguish, stoutish, reddish man of medicine was more at ease as to the general condition of his patient. Could it be possible, after all, Pam "Will you give up the berries," Doria persisted quietly, "if I promise you to tell no one, to speak to no one about it?"

Heseltine wondered, that Life with long years in her hand waited upon him? And what was the worth of long years with only dust of dreams and ashes of hope to fill them?

"What is a violet, with no one to give it to?" Or was he wrong in thinking thus bitterly? Had sickness turned him into a jaundiced misanthrope full of foul and ungrounded suspicions? Had suffering poisoned his brain and distorted his mental vision into seeing guilt where only innocence was? On that morning of sweet autumn sunshine and mellow airs these were the questions he asked himself. At any rate, it seemed to him, after Nurse Gordon had settled him on the sofa and gone off on some urgent duty at the hospital, that the garden would be a better place than this darkened room in which to think out and perhaps banish forever from his mind the dark and hateful suspicions that haunted it.

The house was very quiet. He met no one as on somewhat shaky legs he made his way out through the drawing room and stoop down the steps into the mild green and gold of the garden. But the sense of exhilaration with which he had started soon passed. Physical effort after days of prostration left him exhausted and he looked round for a place to rest, but nothing offered except a lopsided Madeira chair too decrepit to bear his weight.

Nothing to do but return slowly to the house.

He reached it on its left side, and spied on the stoop there an old Dutch settle of substantial oak, on which he stretched himself at length, hands under head and body at ease on the laced leather thongs composing the seat. Only then did he realize that he was right under the window of Doria's bedroom. He heard the rustle of her movements in the room above him, the little humming sound she often made with her lips when her hands were engaged doing one thing and her mind clearly occupied with another. They were very slight sounds, but somehow they made it impossible for him to concentrate his mind on those problems he had wanted to solve. Besides, he had grown suddenly very tired . . . so tired that he presently fell asleep.

That which roused him was a voice, tranquil yet with a grave note in it; a voice he knew well, speaking in Doria's room.

"I must ask you to give them to me, please, Mrs. Heseltine—those berries you plucked in the Doctor's drug garden."

Then Doria, a haughty edge of astonishment to her tone: "I'm afraid I don't know what you are talking about, Miss Kelly!"

But Peril continued, firm and steady:

"You see . . . Valpy saw you take the key of the drug garden from its nail inside the surgery window. Being curious, she went up to her bedroom and watched you go in and gather the berries. You must give them to me, please."

Doria uttered a hard, contemptuous laugh.

"What horrid spying people! Watching from windows—inventing fantastic nonsense and lies! Really, Miss Kelly, I am surprised at you—listening to servants' gossip!"

"No—not gossip. I called Valpy into the laboratory and questioned her after I had discovered a reason myself for thinking——"

"All I can say," broke in Doria impatiently, "is that you bore me with this idiotic story. It really doesn't interest me in the least to hear what your impertinent servant says, and I know nothing whatever about berries."

"You do know of berries, Mrs. Heseltine. Those that I once warned you of, in the drug garden—that they were a slow deadly poison. You said their color fascinated you—reminded you of sloe gin." Her voice suddenly became urgent. "Do give them up to me, please. There were just five left on the bush yesterday—before you went to rest in the garden—and now there is not one. You must give them to me."

"You are mad."

"Will you give them up if I promise to tell no one, to speak to no one about it?"

"I wish you would be good enough to go away," drawled Doria, coldly insolent. "You are boring me to the verge of tears." But there was no movement of departure.

"Then I must tell Uncle Bruce."

"Tell him!" cried Doria, suddenly violent. "Considering that he has been filling my husband with that very poison, and against my wish, I fancy he would have some difficulty in proving that I——" She pulled herself up sharply. "Anyway, the whole thing is too fantastic. No one would believe you."

"Oh yes they would!" Peril persisted quietly. "And there would be other things to tell. The stain on your fingers when you came back yesterday—after you had been plucking them. You said it was a pomegranate bought from a coolie—but pomegranates are not ripe enough for eating till the end of next month. Then—the silk gown on which you spilled the sloe gin, mixed with some other red stuff. I have that gown. Keable brought it up to Valpy for advice."

"How dare she!" Doria's exclamation rang sharp and furious. "And how dare you come here . . ." Her words died away, as though something she saw in Peril's eyes frightened her. Indeed, the girl's voice was cold and relentless now, like that of a judge arraigning a criminal at the bar.

"You see, I happen to know about drugs and stains, and I recognize the curious magenta juice of that poison berry on your gown. You must have gathered them before—when you went to rest in the garden! And for some reason that I do not know you made them into a liquid and mixed them with sloe gin. That mixture was spilled—I cannot tell under what circumstances. So yesterday you went for more berries, and took the last of them. What your purpose has been in all this I am not able to guess. I can only say that you will have to explain it to my uncle unless you give me those berries now, at once."

There was a heavy silence then, a silence that seemed to fill the room, pass out of the open window, slowly tumbling like a stone upon the heart of the man lying there. No more denials now from Doria. No protestations of anger or boredom. Just silence, broken only by the sound of someone breathing hard, long, deep breaths, in-drawn with a slight hissing. Then the sound of a chair, dragging feet across the floor; a cupboard door opened and shut again with a sharp click; again the dragging feet. At last Doria's voice, flat, toneless, muttering incoherent phrases:

"This little bottle . . . I made them into liquid . . . I told you the color fascinated me . . . I wanted to experiment with . . . dye silk for a gown . . . only a woman would understand, of course. No doctor would . . . men are such fools . . . But you promised, didn't you, if I gave it up? Not a word to anyone? . . . That's all right, then. You see . . . he wouldn't understand how silly I am . . . about color . . ."

She was still murmuring disjointed phrases when Peril went. Pam, lying like one already dead on the old Dutch bench, heard a door close, and the girl's light feet pass through the house and down the garden. It seemed to him that that was the last kind and friendly sound he would ever hear in this world. Inside the bedroom Doria had begun to laugh. Trill after trill of silver chimes, jangled and out of tune, echoed through the house.

When Nurse left at three that afternoon for her "off duty" spell, she naturally supposed that Peril according to custom would be with the patient in a few minutes. Heseltine did not think it necessary to inform her that he had sent a boy to The Hill with a message to Peril not to come down until half-past five. The fact was that he had things to do in which he required neither help nor company; and when Nurse had gone he locked himself into his room and set about doing them.

He did not really anticipate interruption, for Doria, the only person with any right to intrude upon her husband's privacy, had not, since the morning's fit of hysteria, emerged from her bedroom. For some little time Keable, with flurried look, rushed back and forth, carrying alternate lumps of ice and jugs of hot water. But at length it was evident that emotion had exhausted itself.

A period of hush ensued. The victim of "nerves" rested. Fresh air, however, and an entire change of scene being essential to complete recovery in such case, Mrs. Heseltine, with the savoir-vivre that distinguished her and doubtless kept her young and fresh while others grew weary of living, proceeded later to arrange for this supplementary cure by having a cavalier rung up and invited to come after tea and take her for a long drive. It was just as Pam had finished writing the last of two difficult letters that he heard a racer belonging to the "Hon. Jon," purring like a tame tiger outside the front gate.

After the pleasant flurry of departure was over and the house all quiet again, he went to the box room to hunt through old trunks and portmanteaus for something he had brought from home but had never expected to need. Finding it at last, he hid it in the drawer of his dressing table, then lay down on the sofa to rest, for the exertions and emotions of the day had tired him out.

It was there that Peril found him when she came. She had brought with her a volume of Adam Lindsay Gordon's poems—now a special favorite of his—and he surprised her by asking at once for "Doubtful Dreams," a strange sad thing full of the anguish of a man's wasted days, and bitterness for bright hopes turned to ashes. Her glance tinctured with distress flickered mournfully upon him from time to time as she read, but he seemed very composed, lying there listening with closed lids. When she had finished he spoke calmly.

"Peril—I want you to promise to do something for me . . . in case I don't last much longer."

She put out her strong little hand and laid it on his. "Of course I will do anything. But you mustn't talk like that, you know."

He smiled at her. "I only said 'in case' . . . and after all it's on the cards for any one of us . . . isn't it?"

"You are getting better every day."

"Yes, I know . . . but accidents happen in the best regulated families . . . You ought to humor a sick man, anyhow."

"Not in being morbid . . . but, of course, you can rely on me to do anything. Tell me."

"There's a man I'm fond of, and want to help . . . and supposing I were not here in the flesh . . . it's you who must do it for me. Do you understand?"

"But what—how could I?"

"If you saw him in what you believed to be danger . . . not to his body, perhaps, but his soul, his future . . . then you must put out a hand and stay him. Could you do that for me?"

She nodded, with troubled eyes.

"Even if it meant betraying a secret? No. I can see you are going to say no to that, so I won't press the point. Only remember this: it nearly always lies in some woman's loved and trusted hands to make or wreck a man's life. . We Heseltines, for instance, are like that. We give everything into the keeping of the one woman . . . our souls, our future, our hopes of Heaven.

When he found her at last under the trees, Punch knew that all he had dreamed of was true.

"So . . . if he delivered himself up into the hands of the wrong woman . . . well, you can see where old Punch would be."

"Punch!" At that the peace and grace of Peril's face was invaded; from the low forehead, like a bar of ivory beneath the darkness of her hair, to the base of her throat, color flushed and flooded her. "It is your cousin you are speaking of?"

"Yes—old Punch."

Pam, staring hard at the wild rose beauty awakened by the sound of his cousin's name, understood slowly, and then was swiftly thankful. A great many things had become intelligible to him during the hours of this long day. It was as if for his benefit a Hand had turned on the awful searchlight of the Day of Judgment, revealing to him dreadful acts and the motives that had urged them. By that white, strong light he saw again the look in Doria's eyes and heard the sharp edge of her voice when Punch announced his departure.

Only too well now he knew the meaning of both. It was not very difficult to realize how much more desirable such a man as Punch would seem, compared to himself, in the rôles of lover, husband and Peer of England. The sequent happenings, then, ruthless, remorseless, crueler than the grave in their subtle and hideous contriving, were all quite logical. The whole plan of action and every move in it were clear as the noonday sun.

But Punch he exonerated from any share in it. The Heseltines fought clean and struck in the open. No poisoners and assassins in that race! And now when he saw that this girl with her white soul, the promise of mountain tops and untrodden wastes in her eyes, loved his cousin, he was glad with a great gladness.

"Yes, old Punch," he repeated softly. "If ever he's in danger, Peril, remember he's worth saving. There are big things in him. But often the bigger a man is the more completely is he wax in the hands he loves and trusts . . . And supposing they are the wrong hands! That is what you've got to watch out for. That is where I am going to depend upon you . . . Reach out if you see him in danger. Save him. Remember, you have promised that! And one more thing . . . I want you to take this letter and deliver it into his own hand when next you see him."

"But," she objected quickly, "you will see him first. He is sure to come straight here when he returns on the tenth."

"Ah—coming on the tenth, is he? You've heard from him, then?"

Again she flushed. "He wrote because he is bringing me a bush-baby. You remember when my little Evvie was killed . . . he was so kind about it, and he found me another up at Kafüe . . . on about the tenth he said he would be here."

"That settles it, then. He's sure to come to you first. A man's not going to lug a bush-baby round while he calls to see his sick relations. So take the letter, and be sure to give it him if you see him first. And now, I wish you'd read me 'How We Beat the Favorite,' will you, before you go? Then I think I'll try and sleep a little before Doria gets in."

So, when she had finished that breathless narrative which some sportsmen think the finest racing poem ever written, Peril shook his hand and left him, for he seemed tired and desirous of being alone. Yet when she had gone he did not sleep. Instead, he took the book of poems and opening it again at "Doubtful Dreams" he set to work to copy one of the verses on a half-sheet of note paper. His hand shook and scrawled, but the task was accomplished at last. Then, very quietly, he went to the dining room, filled a little liqueur glass with sloe gin and carried it carefully to his wife's room. Placing it on the dressing table, just where anyone coming to the mirror would instantly see it, he laid the scrawled sheet of note paper on top of it. Then he went away to his own room.

Doria, returning from a forty mile an hour rush through the air, to say nothing of the exercise of bouncing over boulders and skidding against tree stumps, might reasonably have been expected to feel invigorated, if not refreshed. Instead, her soul was filled with detestation of her companion and an abomination of despair. The Hon. Jon, though a daring fool, and at his best with his hand on the steering wheel of a racer, remained a fool, and his callow adoration bored her horribly. Even while she listened to him she was aware of an ache that ate like fire for the sound of Punch Heseltine's voice and the sight of his eyes.

She had borne that ache with patience while hope stayed with her. But now! . . . Trembling just below the polite surface of things lay the memory of the morning's bitter happenings . . . the fear and mortification she had tasted . . . the future's uncertainty and disappointment! Her castle of hope, fashioned subtly with her hands and the bright instruments of death, lay in the dust. Broken, ruined, smashed—by a girl! She could not brook it . . . Oh God, she could not brook it! Fury and murder were in her heart at the thought. But fear was there too. She feared that girl. Ah! that was bitter.

How then should she feel refreshed by her drive, or predisposed to courtesies at the end of it? The Hon. Jon, much to his chagrin, found himself callously dismissed at the gate.

All she longed for was the privacy of her own room where she could throw off the gauze shroudings that sometimes came near to suffocating her, breathe freely and plunge once more into plot and counterplot. That she would have to go slowly now she knew well, walk warily, mingle the wisdom of the serpent with the innocence of the dove as never before, wait long weary months perhaps for the fulfillment of the passion that devastated her. But she would not be defeated—would not relinquish her plan . . .

And above all she must cherish her beauty more than ever, for by that chief weapon she would still beat, beguile and burrow her way to triumph as Marchioness of Kenchester and wife of a man who set her veins aflame as no man in the world had done.

Her first act, then, on entering her room and throwing off her veils, was to approach the mirror, to examine her face and compute how much havoc the day's experiences had wrought upon it. Instantly, of course, her eyes fell upon the little glass standing there, with the paper laid on it. What was this? Sloe gin . . . and a verse of poetry in Pam's writing! Her face blenched with terror and guilty apprehension as she looked first at the one, then slowly read the other:

For nothing on earth is sadder
Than the dream that cheated the grasp,
The flower that turned to the adder,
The fruit that changed to the asp;
When the day-spring in darkness closes,
As the sunset fades from the hills,
With the fragrance of perished roses,
With the music of parched-up rills.

While she still stood there with the paper in her hand a revolver shot rang through the quiet house.

There are pink brides and blue brides; lavender, primrose and eau de Nil brides; but it is difficult to introduce any dashing variety into the trappings of widowhood and yet retain the sympathy of your friends.

Doria Heseltine, however, had always been unusual in coping with the conventional, and clever enough withal to make her way of doing things excusable, if not exactly acceptable to the crowd. Her decision, therefore, to become a white widow was not so severely criticized as it might have been with some women.

"You see," she gently explained, "one can mourn just as deeply for one's beloved clad in a cool white garment as laden with heavy blackness." She added pathetically, "Pam always loved me in white, and I feel it is a kind of tribute to him, somehow, to look as nice as I can."

She certainly succeeded. Her "weeds" were of a snowiness that was dazzling, and to say that she looked seraphic in them is to express the facts very mildly. The combination of a Florentine head of daffodil-yellow, blue eyes haunted by grief and the pearliness of a ravishing skin framed sorrowfully in the finest crêpe de Chine, composed a vision that few men could have witnessed without being stirred by uneasy longings "for the mystical better things," as the poet hath it. That at least is what the Hon. Jon thought, after catching sight of her walking in her garden at even. For of course she received no men visitors; received no one, indeed, except a few kindly women almost as overwhelmed as herself by the dreadful tragedy of a suicide happening in their midst.

Shyly they came, offering their sympathy to the beautiful dame du haut monde, and were touched and impressed by the dignity and simplicity of her grief. She seemed to them more like a tragic bride than the widow of tragedy. And when they left her they thought of her still, picturing her, beautiful and desolate, wrapped in her sorrow. For she continued to stay at Minto Lodge, inaccessible to all but the chosen few, hidden in her shaded and silent abode as the pearl of great price is hidden in the jeweler's case . . . until that propitious day when someone with the price on him shall come along!

People rather wondered at first why she should linger in Umtété, marveling too at her "nerve" in continuing to inhabit that house of fateful incident. But it was given to few to compute the quality of Doria Heseltine's nerve.

One man at least knew its inflexibility and her strength of will to fashion circumstance to her desire. But that man tarried in his coming. Up beyond the Zambesi, work detained him that even the calamity of his cousin's death did not induce him to curtail. Fortunately his presence was not officially necessary, and the inquest had gone forward without him.

The last letter written by the dead man, and addressed to his doctor, had made everything dramatically simple. In it he set forth his gratitude for all that (Continued on page 176)

By FRANK R. ADAMS

A Story of Love in the City of a Thousand Tongues

Scandal Street

Illustrations by
Charles D. Mitchell

"Call me," she told Harrison, "either Cora or May, unless you want to make up a sweet nothing of your own."

Work at this studio will be suspended today, Thursday, March 22, on account of the death of Harrison Halliday. Services at the chapel of Grey and Craigin, Morticians, at 10 A. M. tomorrow.

THE camera man and the extra girl happened to be standing side by side as they read the notice. They were early. Extra people very often are early, especially if they need employment rather badly, as this one did.

"Funny," growled the camera man, "to close the entire Keeley-Kane Studio for the funeral of that guy—and right near the finish of the biggest picture we ever filmed, too. It'll cost ten thousand bucks to lay off this outfit for two days like that. And the sun is shining perfect for the location stuff that is scheduled."

The extra girl was not worried much about the sun. She was wondering if she would get paid for the lay-off. Still, she replied, just to register interest, "I don't even know who Harrison Halliday is."

"You wouldn't, probably," conceded the man. "He isn't around the studio much. We used him mostly on location. He's the guy who doubles for Neil Keeley in all the rough stuff. Nice, quiet chap but nobody to hold much of a funeral over at that."

The notice closing the studio for the day had just been posted by Sol Friedman, president and general manager of Keeley-Kane Productions, Inc. He had stuck it up with four or five thumb tacks and had then hurried away like a man who has a guilty secret to hide.

Mr. Friedman was not feeling absolutely top-hole that bright sunshiny morning. For one thing he had not been in bed since the morning before.

At eleven forty-five P. M. he had been called to the telephone just as he was undressing.

"This is Stewart."

"Yes. Anything wrong?"

"He's dead."

"Good Lord, no!"

"Yes."

"How?"

"Listen, chief. This ain't going to sound right over the telephone. Better come out here pronto yourself. I'm the only one that knows it yet."

Friedman reflected. "All right. Where?"

"Pick me up on the Coast Highway north of town about six or seven miles out. I'll be looking for your car and flag you."

Sol Friedman put his clothing back on his round little body and went out to his garage. His roadster would be the fastest and he usually drove that car himself anyway.

His ordinarily resourceful mind was fighting a blank wall for the time being. He did not yet quite comprehend the situation.

The man who had called him on the telephone was William Stewart, ex-sergeant of police and now a private detective, whom Friedman himself had hired as a sort of special bodyguard for Neil Keeley, the biggest financial craft that Friedman had ever piloted.

No names had been mentioned over the telephone but the little manager knew that the "he" referred to must be Neil Keeley himself.

Dead! It was incredible. Friedman did not want to believe it.

Not that he was so fond of Keeley. On the contrary, he, in common with nearly everyone else on the lot, rather cordially disliked the handsome star. For one thing, there was the way he treated his wife, who had elevated him from mediocrity when she had married him and given him the chance he would never have had otherwise. And there was no denying the fact that his riotous escapades had caused more than one of the white hairs that fringed Friedman's bald spot.

But even though it was not a cause for inconsolable personal grief, there were many reasons why Keeley's taking off just at that time was as crushing a blow as the loss of Friedman's right arm would have been.

The Keeley-Kane production of "The Idylls of the King" was two-thirds completed with Neil Keeley as Lancelot. A million and a quarter dollars, many of them Sol Friedman's own, were already tied up in the production. A tremendous advance publicity campaign had been under way for nearly a year and motion picture fans all over the world had been keyed up to expect something rather extraordinary.

Some of the most expensive sets had been demolished in order to make room on the lot for others needed in later sequences. They would all have to be rebuilt in case it were necessary to shift another star into the principal rôle.

All in all the loss of the principal player just at that time was practically the same as the finish of Sol Friedman's career, too.

He had plenty of time to think that all out before he arrived.

Stewart, standing in the middle of the road, was stopping all north bound cars until he found his employer.

"Well?" demanded Sol Friedman. He had his poker face on now and was not going to admit to anyone how much he was disturbed.

"He's over here in the ditch," the detective replied, "under a car. It's just where your headlights miss it as you go around that turn so nobody's seen it yet but me. I wouldn't have noticed it either except that I was only a few hundred yards behind and saw them go over."

"Them? The other one was a woman?"

"Yeh."

"She killed, too?"

"No, not hurt much, I guess. Anyhow she beat it and I haven't seen her. I thought it was more important to notify you than to trail her."

Sheila

They had arrived at the wreck. The detective had a flashlight so they were able to see it distinctly.

"Why, this isn't Neil Keeley's car," Friedman declared.

"No," the detective admitted, "this is one of those you rent for fifty cents an hour downtown. But Keeley always does that when he's going on a party. Thought I'd reported it. The first time he did it he fooled me because I was looking for his big flashy bus. He leaves his own car at one garage and walks a block to another, where he rents this cheap outfit that looks like every other car you see anywhere. I ain't had no trouble trailin' him since I got wise to the trick. I know where he goes and everything. I didn't recognize this Jane though. Mebbe she's a new one or else she's got on a different hat or something. Your orders was merely to keep an eye on him and help if he got into a scrap."

"Yes, that's right." Sol Friedman was thinking of something else by that time. "I'm going back to town. You stay here long enough to cut the name tags out of his clothes and remove any identifying papers. Then go home and go to bed. Keep your mouth shut and report to me at noon."

"Gee, boss, what are you going to do?"

"I'm not sure yet myself, Stewart, but whatever it is you're going to be one of the few men in the world who will be 'in the know,'" said Friedman.

Friedman did not call up but went directly to Neil Keeley's home. Mrs. Keeley, or Sheila Kane as the world knew her, had gone to bed but was not sleeping and came down herself in a dressing gown to answer Friedman's pounding on the door.

"I thought it was Neil," she explained. "He usually loses his key."

Sol Friedman was not a very tactful man and he confronted the task of breaking the news to Sheila with an overwhelming sense of his own shortcomings in that line.

Sheila was so little, so young looking, so elflike in the impression she made upon one, that it seemed quite probable that she would not be able to support the contact with sordid tragedy.

Still, she had lived with Neil Keeley for two years. She must know something of sorrow. Her eyes said so, anyway. Perhaps it was only the dim light in the reception hall that made them appear so large and so sad.

So he told her, simply, directly, in the only language that he knew, the language of business.

"The biggest money making star in the film business was killed tonight and——"

"Neil?" Unerringly.

"Yes."

"That woman shot him?"

"Why no," Friedman replied, puzzled. "You were expecting something of the sort, then?"

"I had warned him to be careful," she said unemotionally. "I'm very sorry for Neil."

"Aren't you sorry for yourself?"

"I suppose so. But part of me has been dead a long time so I don't feel things so much any more. But Neil wasn't ready to go yet. There was much he had to do——"

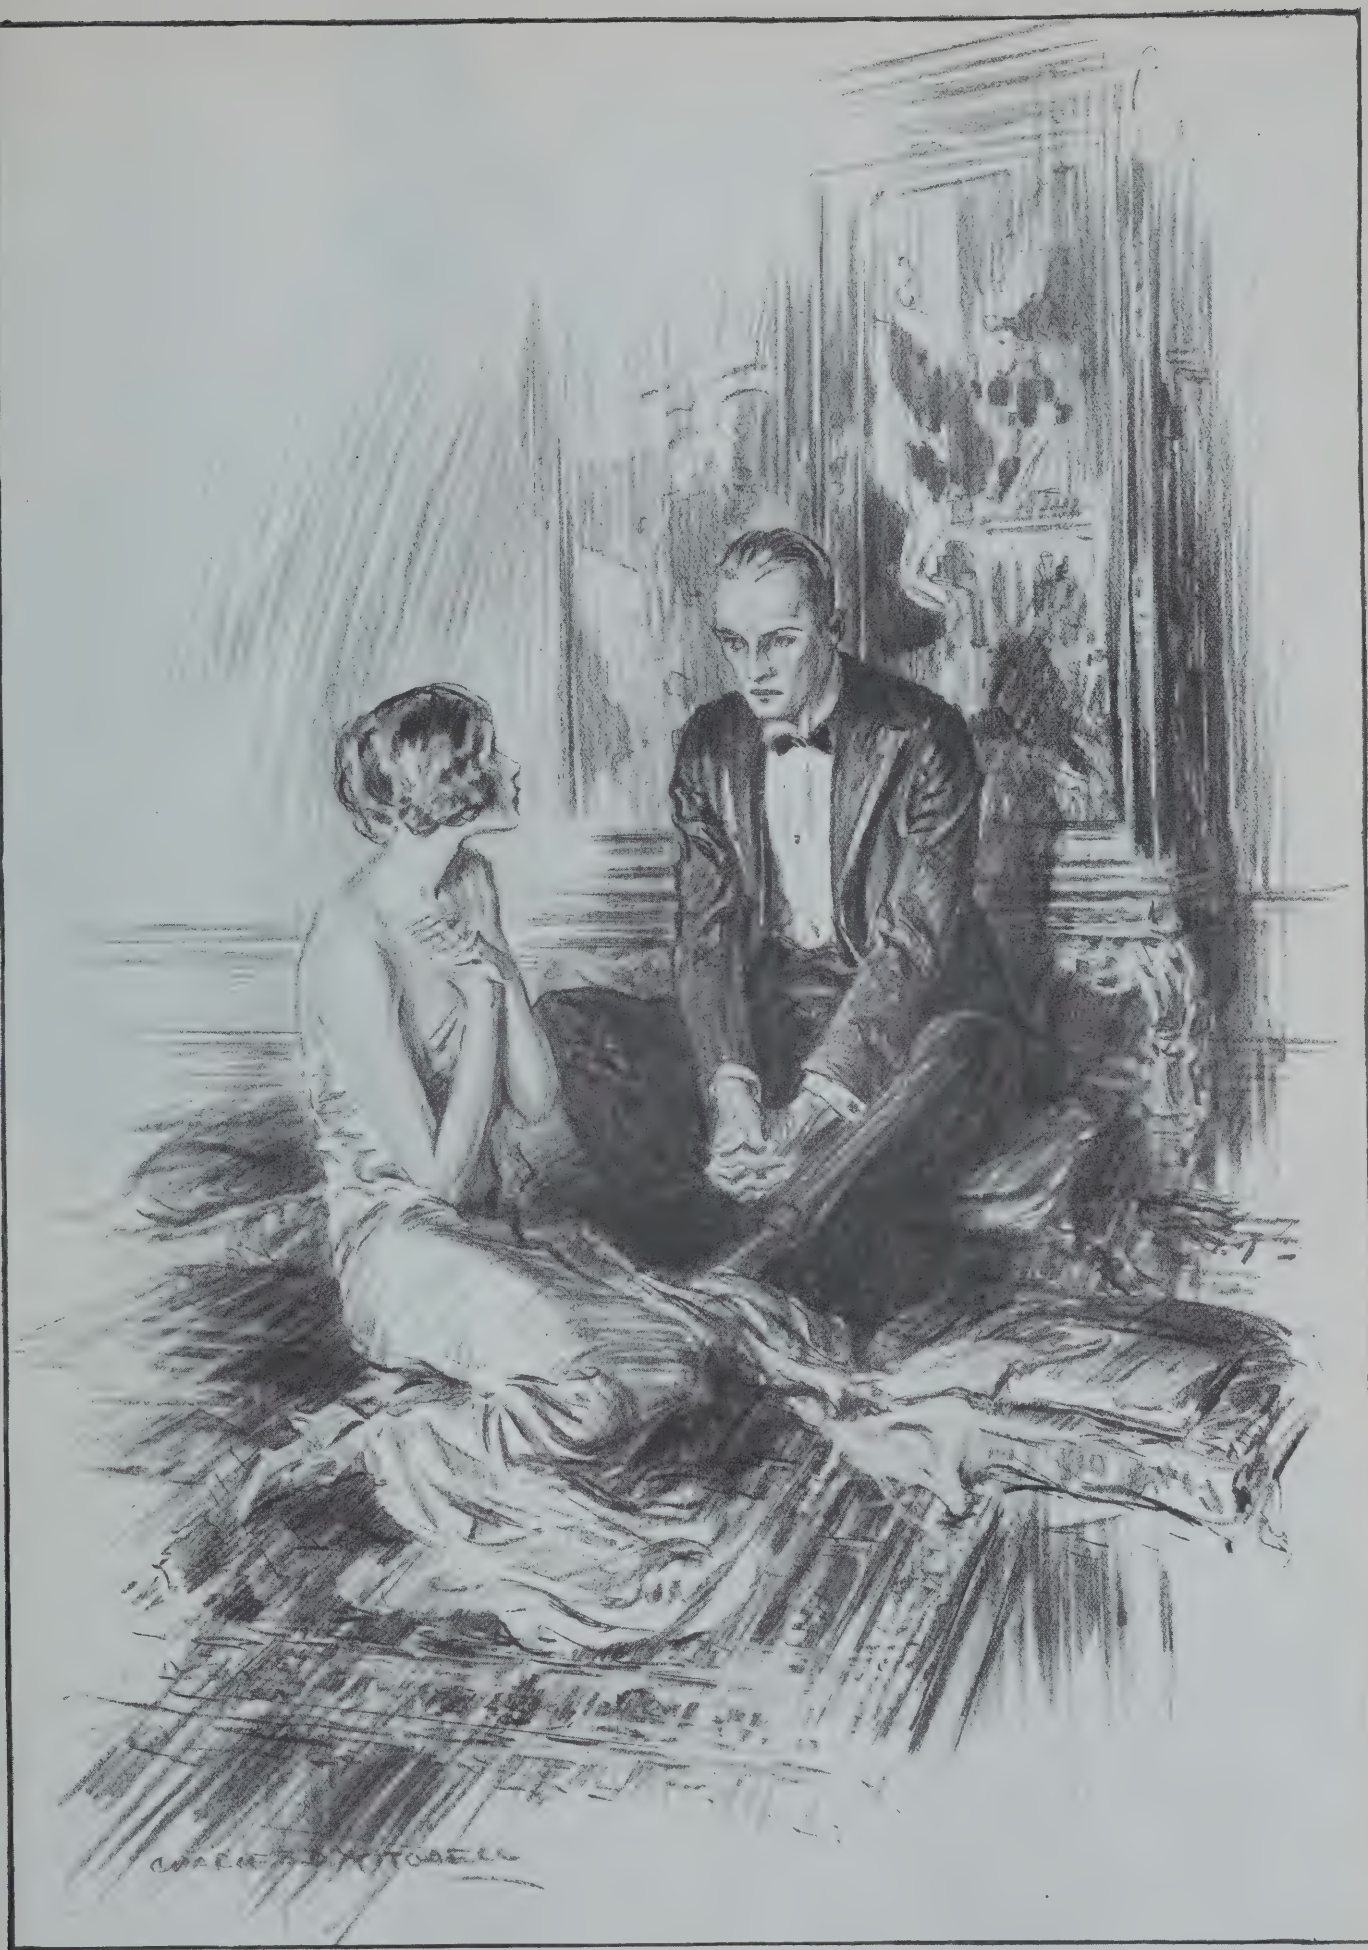
"You said it. The King Arthur story ain't over two-thirds finished."

"I wasn't referring to the film."

"Mebbe not but we might as well because that's the reason I came myself to talk to you instead of sending somebody else or telephoning."

"Yes." Pleasantly. Her tone gave him permission to proceed.

"There's two or three reasons why this thing hurts like the deuce just at this time. You know what Will Hays says—'No more front page stories out of Hollywood. Clean up Scandal Street from Gardner Junction to Glendale.'



"The motion picture industry can't stand another scare head. Enough is enough. We've got to keep off the front page or we're done for. We all know that. No more murders, no more dope, no more wild parties.

"Another reason is we've got over a million dollars in this film and if we put someone else in as Lancelot it will mean retaking almost all of it. Even if it was all done the fact that Neil was dead would queer it with the public. Neil can't be dead."

"But you say he is."

"Nobody knows it yet and you've got to help me keep 'em from knowing."

Harrison Halliday brought his high hopes West with the avowed intention of making a name that would be blazoned in electric lights before most of the theaters in America.

Sheila swayed to the music like a charmed cobra. She was beautiful, she was sweet and she was enticing. On the gentle current of the vanishing melody she floated to Harrison and dropped at his feet.

Halliday had reason to expect to make good. He was not an inexperienced movie-struck youth. On the contrary, he came from four generations of actors. His grandfather had once been the idol of Broadway. There were traditions back of Halliday, fine ones, even if the name had been slightly forgotten in the press of more recent luminaries. Still, there was no reason why Harrison couldn't put the patronymic back in the public eye. He knew how to act, he was good looking, well built and had a pleasing personality.

But when he arrived in Hollywood he ran into a distressing situation.

He looked so much like Neil Keeley that everybody laughed when he asked for a job, and then, when he proved that he wasn't Neil, they refused to employ him on the ground that it would seem as if they were trying to cash in on an imitation.

At the end of six months Harrison Halliday was down to one meal a day at a lunch counter and one suit of clothes that was beginning to lose that look of smartness so necessary to one seeking employment, especially in the show business.

There were unhappy times in the motion picture industry, anyway. People had less money to spend for amusements and even the inexpensive neighborhood theaters failed to catch them. Many studios shut down.

The Keeley-Kane production of "The Idylls of the King" proved a blessing to the entire industry because it used such a tremendous cast of players and literally thousands of extra people.

Quite naturally Harrison Halliday, in his rounds, landed at the Keeley-Kane studios with sickening regularity. He seemed to be one of the few men in Hollywood who could not get a job even there. It was that confounded resemblance again. They didn't dare use him even in a mob scene for fear it would confuse the audience.

And then came the curious chance. They were filming some tournament scenes and the actor who was doubling for Neil Keeley in the tilting got a very mean fall while they were rehearsing. Not to go ahead with the camera work on that particular scene meant laying off a great many actors who were called, and the great Fenway, who was directing, got distinctly temperamental about it. "Get me somebody else and get him quick!" he demanded.

And the message was carried duly to the casting director, who was just on the point of yanking out another wisp of hair when his eye fell on Harrison Halliday about to pester him again.

"Can you ride?" the casting director demanded.

"If we plant your papers on him, Halliday, there won't be any trouble," said Sol Friedman, "and he will be buried under your name."

"I can do anything," Harrison declared optimistically.

The casting director grinned.

"I've been down on the rocks myself before now, but if you are willing to back that up by taking a chance on your life I'll tell you what you can do."

He told the young man what had happened and let him decide for himself whether or not he cared to make the acrobatic contribution to the cause of art.

Halliday decided he couldn't be any worse off than he was and asked to be introduced to the assortment of tinware that he was expected to wear for a winding sheet.

As soon as he appeared on the lot, Fenway, who had never seen him before, got good-natured right away.

"Great!" he exclaimed. "You look enough like Keeley himself so that we can take a medium shot of this fight. We can even show you in one of the rounds with your helmet off. That will put their eye out. Let's go!"

That was only the beginning. Whenever there was any scene that Neil wasn't quite up to, too many nerves or something like that, Fenway always sent for Harrison. Keeley detested Halliday and never lost an opportunity to sneer at his double's ability. But Fenway wouldn't give him up.

It wasn't in the least what Harrison Halliday wanted to do and it certainly wasn't building up any reputation for himself. But it was one way of earning bed and board. He was at the point now where that was essential.

It took Sol Friedman quite a while to find out where to locate Harrison Halliday. He went through the casting director's desk with all the efficiency of a burglar, with a flashlight, too, because there was no particular point in attracting the notice of the night watchman to the fact that the general manager was prowling around in offices not his own.

He found the address and proceeded to the rooming house where Harrison lived, arriving about two o'clock.

There he managed to wake up the landlady and, without letting her know who he was, and allowing her to infer that he was drunk, he got the young man out to his car.

In the street Friedman demanded brusquely, "You know who I am, don't you?"

"Yes."

"All right. Have you any papers in your pockets that will identify you?"

"Why"—in surprise—"yes, I guess so, a letter or two and a driver's license."

"Good, come with me."

Mystified and slightly awed Harrison Halliday took his seat beside the man who could make or break a star on twenty-four hours' notice. Friedman did not say where he was going and Halliday did not ask. His wonderment was not abated when the car drew up before Neil Keeley's quarter-million dollar bungalow. Sheila Kane admitted them.

"Now," Sol began when they were seated in the big star's living room, "you want to get ahead in the motion picture game, don't you?"

"Why, naturally," Harrison replied.

"Well, your chance has come, then. Neil Keeley is dead and you're going to take his place until we finish 'The Idylls of the King'."

"But," objected Harrison, "how can we do that?"

"Well," Sol returned, "I'm not absolutely positive we can, but there seems to be a good chance. Nobody knows he is dead yet but just we who are here and one private detective who is in my employ. Neil's body is lying out in the road six or seven miles north of here. It hasn't even been found by the police yet. It was an accident, and his face—pardon me, Mrs. Keeley—is not so easily recognizable as it was once. If we plant your papers on him, Halliday, there won't be any trouble. The coroner won't be very excited about it and he will be buried under your name. The whole thing won't get more than a paragraph in the newspapers. But you know what would happen if the truth came out.

"What do you say? I am not positive that it will work but there is a chance for you and for me both. I'll give you Keeley's salary, which is something scandalous for size as you probably know, and then when it is over I'll see that you get another good job. It is the one way to make good in a game that you haven't got a chance in the world of succeeding at otherwise."

Harrison was silent, debating the proposition.

Sheila Kane took a hand in the discussion for the first time. Her voice was a little high and shrill. "I trust, Mr. Halliday, you will pardon me if I ask you to come to some sort of a decision as soon as possible. I will do whatever I can to help you in any way, shape or manner, but"—she faltered—"it isn't going to be easy for me, you know, and even right now I don't think I can stand much more."

She had stood up and her fists were clenched as if she were repressing a scream. It was quite obvious that she was laboring under a mental strain, a cumulative strain that had been building up for weeks. She appeared very frail, very white, all spiritual, not a creature of flesh and blood at all. Her face was colorless with a sharp black frame of hair and two dim coals for eyes. Her ultimatum delivered, she swayed slightly and the two men jumped to catch her lest she fall. She straightened herself with a hand on the arm of each.

"I am quite all right," she said. "Thank you."

Sol Friedman looked across questioningly at the young actor. "What do you say?"

Harrison hesitated a moment.

"I'll try it," he said.

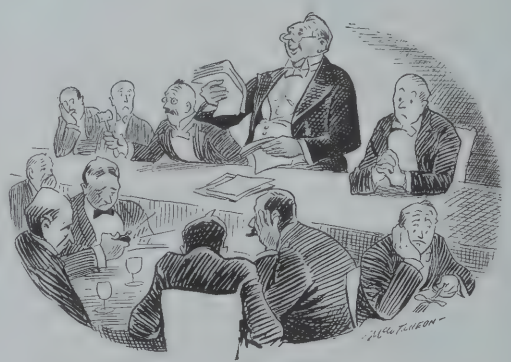
"Good! Sheila, go to bed! Sleep if you can, my dear. Have breakfast in your room in the (Continued on page 165)

CRAZY

Words and

JOHN T.

A FAMOUS wit once confessed to a secret ambition to throw an egg into an electric fan. Very likely he will go through life with this wish ungratified, although gratification is easily within his means.



Another man, equally great in his line, was once seized at a large dinner party with the impulse to throw a stuffed tomato at the gleaming shirt front of the gentleman opposite. The more he thought about it the more the idea fascinated him. Perfectly aware that all standard books on etiquette are opposed to such quaint conceits, he nevertheless acted upon the impulse, greatly to the surprise of the gentleman opposite, who, however, responded in kind. Soon all the guests were likewise engaged and so continued throughout the salad course.

Very few people would have had the courage to act upon such an impulse, although nearly everyone has at times been tempted by other impulses just as bizarre.

Who has not been almost irresistibly beguiled—when the minister inquires if anybody knows just cause why these folks, etc.—into hopping up and shouting "He has a wife in Oskaloosa."

Who among churchgoers has not felt the urge in the midst of a drowsy, long drawn out sermon, to rise in his pew and wail plaintively, "Are you never going to end?" He would be echoing the thoughts of all present, but what a terrible uplifting of eyebrows there would be. His wife would speak to him about it after he got home—long after.

And surely it is fortunate, in the interest of the peaceful conduct of banquet programs, that people are taught to curb their impulses. There is always at least one speaker who forgets to stop when the stopping is good.

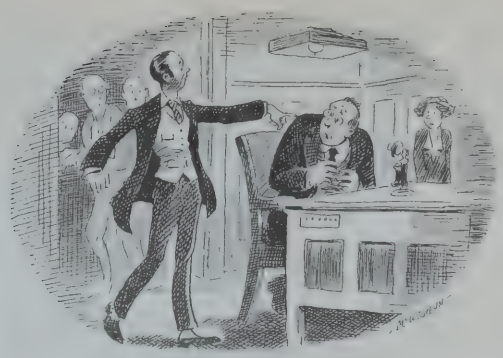
During the first ten minutes the banqueters listen with rapt attention. "Say, this fellow is a wonder." "The best after-dinner talk I've ever heard."

At the end of twenty minutes they are beginning to look around to see how the others are taking it. At thirty minutes they are thinking, "Why doesn't he stop?" and at thirty-five the back tables are buzzing with conversation, the worried toastmaster is pounding for order, watches are snapping shut with meaning clicks and every white shirt front covers a black impulse to shout "For heaven's sake, sit down!"

And yet if any one of those present, with the courage of his convictions, were to arise and sing out those welcome words, steps would be taken by the banquet committee to insure his absence at ensuing functions.

Once a distinguished gentleman had seen the new year in at a fashionable restaurant and was starting for a less dignified eating place where there was a prospect of seeing a good deal more of the new year in. As he wove his way out between the crowded tables, a large lady's expansive and aristocratic back arrested his attention. It gleamed invitingly at a moment when resistance was at its lowest ebb. There was no chance for a sober second thought, or even a sober first one.

He hauled back and slapped with a resounding smack, contrary to all rules of etiquette, for he didn't even know the lady.



Pandemonium broke loose. If it had happened a hundred years ago he would have been dated up for duels every morning for a week, Sunday included.

By good fortune he escaped to the street and is alive and well today.

Here was an impulse gone wrong, and yet for one delirious fraction of a second he must have enjoyed the realization of it. Many impulses spring from a real desire to effect good in the world, such as cutting short long-winded speeches and sermons; others are more or less ignoble, and should rightly be choked at the source, for example, the one just quoted. Still others are inspired by simple curiosity to see what will happen under such and such circumstances—such as pouring a glass of near beer into a base horn when it is in action or sticking a pin into a pompous gentleman who is bowing before the king.

Impulses

Pictures by McCUTCHEON

In giving dinner parties the hostess is always careful that no discordant elements are included at the same dinner. Mrs. Blank, recently divorced with sensational publicity, is not to be asked with her late husband. Political rivals and social feudists never confront one another across the table of an intelligent hostess.

But who, in planning a dinner party, has not been momentarily intrigued by the fascinating possibilities of a dinner table surrounded by the most discordant elements, the Honorable Bunk with the editor who has been crucifying him, the young lady and the man she has heartlessly jilted, the capitalist and the Red.

It would be a most interesting occasion, but the hostess would have to be a composite of Lucretia Borgia and a full grown East Indian rhinoceros, I am afraid, to pull it off.

What employee, smarting under a scathing call-down by his employer, has not entertained the thought, "I'd like to tell him what I think of him, the big stiff." But somehow he never gets beyond rehearsals. In the quiet watches of the night he conjures soul-satisfying scenes in which he stands before the employer's desk, pointing out to that cringing creature the limitations and defects of his character, ancestry, breeding and appearance.

This is one of the most prevalent but least vociferous impulses.

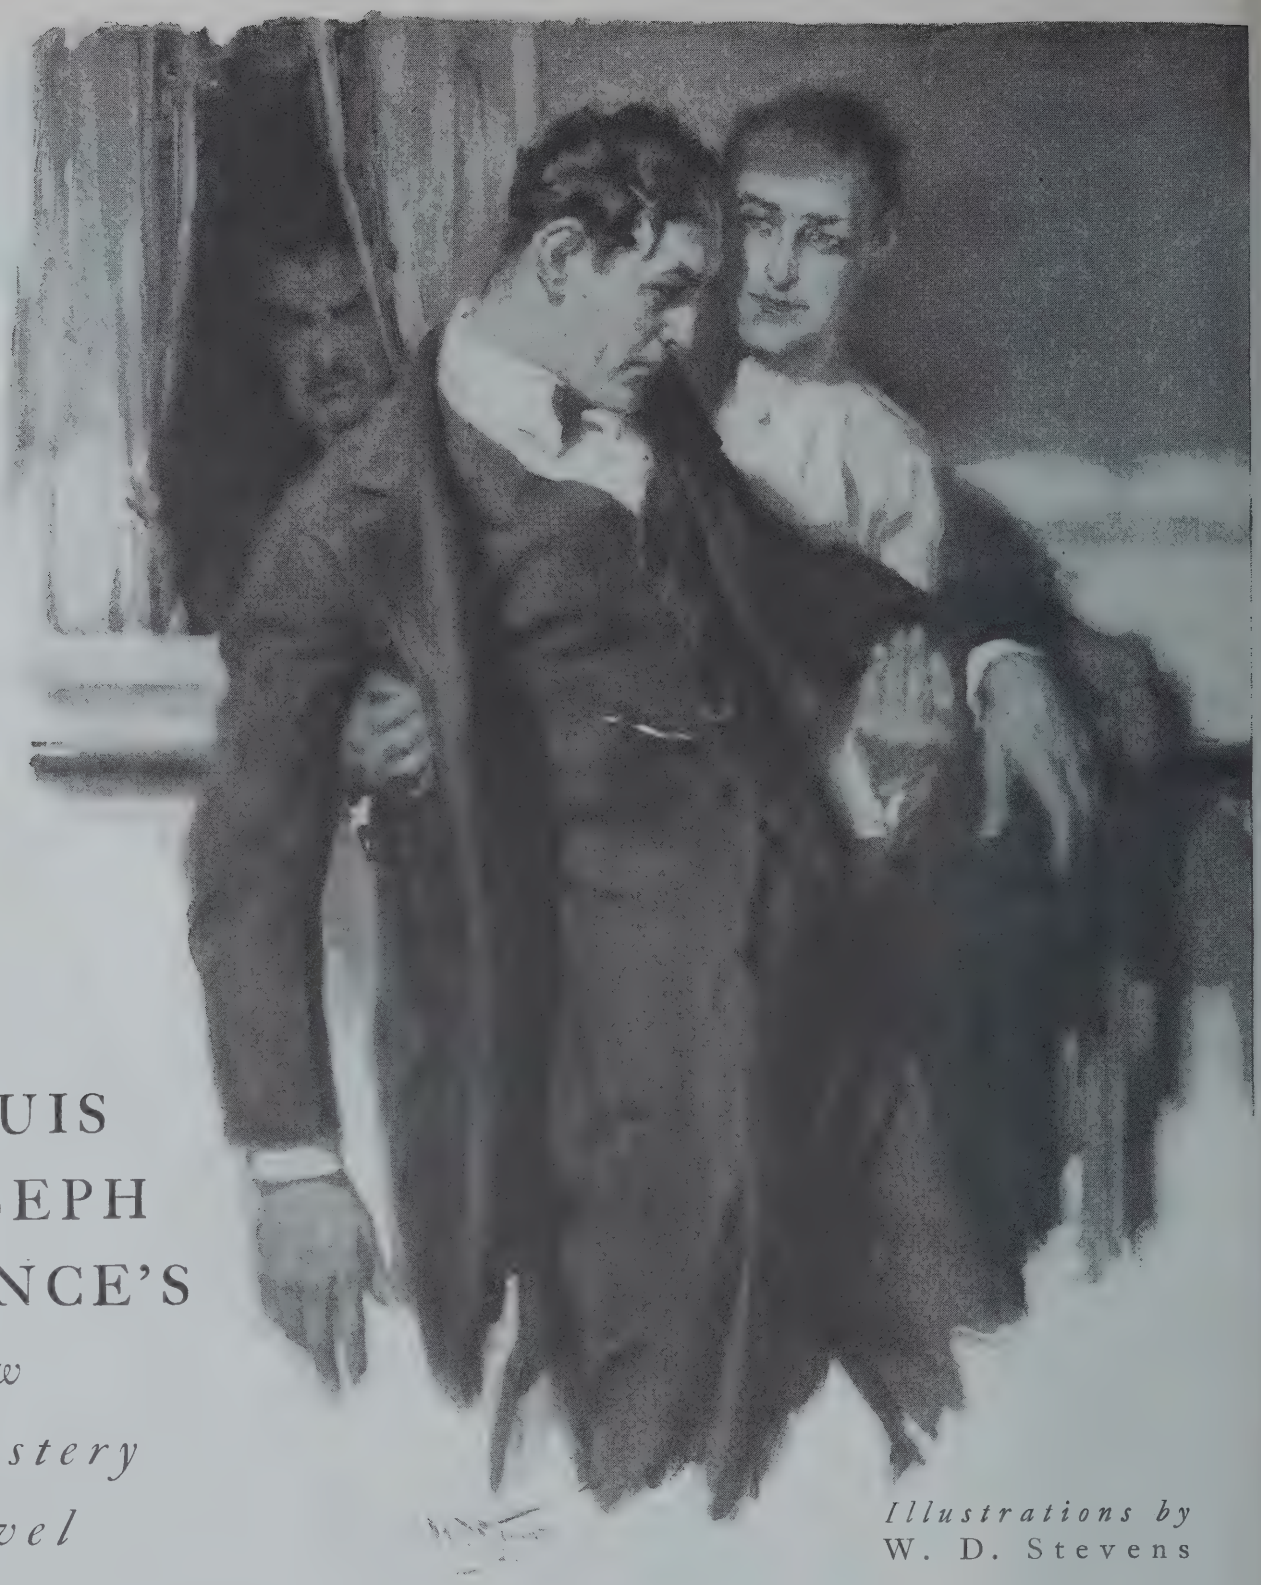
When watching one of these interpretative eurhythmic dances, the kind where the dancers wear a few yards of chiffon and in bare legs and feet impersonate a faun being chased by a satyr or something, who has not idly toyed with the thought of what would happen if he tossed a tack or a lighted cigarette in the path of the prancing satyr?

The tack motif, although low-brow in its comedy aspects, nevertheless occurs frequently in conjunction with impulses. When the Prof. in closing his lecture on astronomy says that "The contemplation of the vast immensity of space so dwarfs our little world that one is enabled to regard petty earthly worries with philosophic calm—too petty to warrant more than a shrug of the shoulders" and then prepares to sit down, it occurs to you how easily a little tack could play havoc with his philosophic calm.

Happily no one would dream of converting this thought to action, for the Prof. is a lovable old party.

Perhaps one of the commonest impulses is that which surges and boils within you at the opera where you have paid five dollars for the purpose of hearing the music. In the box near-by a party arrives in the middle of the second act. They are still full of conversation. "Sh's" greet them. Angry glances are shot at them, but glance off. A girl, dripping with pearls, is telling a chinless youth with plastered hair what she said to Gwennie and what Gwennie said to her.

Who, in this situation, has not harbored a martyr's willingness to pay the death penalty for the satisfaction of standing up and thundering as follows: "Blankety blank, blankety blank— xx ! ! - - xx ( ) - ! ! " supplementing this remark by grabbing the girl by the string of pearls and throwing her out the nearest exit to the alley below?



It is a crystal day in June and the graduating class is herded together to hear an address by a pompous old party whose life and works have put him on the first page in Bradstreet's.

After Prexy has introduced the speaker as a man who, etc., the speaker arises and counsels honesty, perseverance, thrift, industry and character.

The new-fledged graduates drink it in, but you, made cynical by inside information concerning the speaker's business career, nurse an impulse to interpolate. His war profits are still awaiting action by the Department of Justice, his income tax report is a marvel of scientific evasion, his cellar is receiving frequent accessions from neighboring countries, his generous campaign contributions insure special favors in Washington.

Yet nobody pulls the chair out from under him when he sits down! There is dutiful applause, led by Prexy, who is hoping for a generous contribution to the endowment fund.

And so it goes.

LOUIS JOSEPH VANCE'S New Mystery Novel

Illustrations by W. D. Stevens

The Setting of the story is the New York of today and it concerns:

MICHAEL LANYARD, THE LONE WOLF, once prince of European jewel thieves, now a member of the British Secret Service on leave of absence in America.

EVE DE MONTALAIS, whom he loves as he has never loved before—a woman of beauty, of charm, of wealth.

MORPHEW, powerful New York bootlegger and director of criminals.

PAGAN, a satellite of Morphew's.

MALLISON, gentleman crook and member of Morphew's crew.

LIANE DELORME, demi-mondaine and one-time Parisian underworld acquaintance of the Lone Wolf.

MRS. FOLLIOTT MCFEE (FOLLY), a society woman, piquant, rich.

CRANE, New York detective, an old friend of Lanyard's.

A Résumé of Parts One to Four:

WHEN Michael Lanyard falls in love with Eve de Montalais, he believes that he cannot marry her because, despite his reform, he is a marked man on whom society will pounce at any excuse or none. But Eve will not listen to his reasoning; and he determines to make his life so blameless that nothing can come between them.

The machinery of fate at once sets to work against him. He accidentally meets Liane Delorme, who introduces him to Morphew, who in turn has been planning for some time to get Lanyard in his power. Morphew's proposal is that Lanyard go to thieving again under his, Morphew's, protection.

This occurs in the Clique Club, a drinking and gambling resort of Morphew's.

Lanyard, contemptuously refusing, escapes unharmed only because the place is raided. One of the raiders is his old

The Lone Wolf Returns

He goes to Folly's that evening, slips in unobserved, sees Liane, Pagan and Mallison at dinner with Folly, goes upstairs and hides. There, by intercepting a phone call on an extension, he learns that Mallison has "framed" Folly for blackmail. Lanyard quietly phones Crane's office and leaves word for the detective to come to Folly's address.

Mallison leaves, but sneaks back (having fixed the lock) and also hides upstairs. Then when Folly, in négligé, is about to retire, he seizes her and makes violent pretended love to her.

As Lanyard hears Mallison's accomplices, who are to discover this compromising situation, at the door downstairs, he steps out, floors Mallison with a blow, and calmly confronts at the bedroom door a woman who pretends to be Mallison's wife, a "shyster" lawyer and a fake detective. These are, of course, upset by the turn of events; more so when Crane appears, searches Mallison, finds on him a kit of burglar's tools and Folly's stolen emeralds, and arrests the lot.

Folly is grateful, if mystified. At Lanyard's request, she phones for Morphew to call; and him Lanyard confronts with the tale of his foiled plot and the arrest of Mallison. In a rage, Morphew threatens Lanyard's life before the hidden witness, Folly.

Lanyard laughs, but he is not yet safe. Next day he goes with Eve to a Westchester inn for dinner, and there tells her all that has happened. As they talk he is called to the phone, where a long distance call, obviously from a proxy of Liane's, warns him—"Prenez garde"—take care!

He and Eve find their chauffeur drugged, but manage to escape from the inn in the car, driving at tremendous speed apparently unpursued; until a blowout stops them. They get out of the car, nonplused. Of a sudden gleaming headlights appear from the opposite direction; simultaneously a pursuing car, driven without lights, bears on them from behind. Lanyard flings Eve off the road—too late to save himself. The world seems to explode like a bomb; he is hurled into an everlasting abyss of night impenetrable.

friend Crane, who passes Lanyard out with Folly McFee. He accompanies her home and warns her of the character of her associates, Morphew's crew.

But Morphew strikes back quickly, through Pagan, who with Liane comes to Folly's. Pagan mixes drinks for all, and apparently drugs the one for Lanyard. At any rate, Lanyard suffers from powerful delusions as he walks home, and falls on his bed unconscious.

Next morning he is awakened by Crane, who breaks the news that Folly's jewels have been stolen overnight. Crane has searched Lanyard's clothes and exonerates him of the crime. No sooner has the detective gone, however, than Lanyard finds the jewels in the tail pocket of his own dress coat; finds, too, that his shoes are covered with mud like that behind Folly's house. Were the emeralds "planted" on him? Or did he really steal them in a semi-conscious, drugged state? The question is an agonizing one he cannot answer.

Part Five: CHAPTER XV

PAIN that threatened to rend his head asunder played before his eyes in blinding flashes, like ragged lightning, crimson and soundless—or the man was deaf to its thunders whose every other faculty was numb in subjugation to sense of pain intolerable, who was faint with pain, sick with it . . .

Hands clipped his body beneath the armpits, a thin, far rumor of articulate noise pronounced some stupidity which he made no attempt to acknowledge. Arms, wrapped round him from behind, tightened, heaved, he was set upon usnteady feet. then half carried, half guided to an angle of some sort and propped up in it, with arms resting upon its two broad, plane surfaces, elbow-high. A rudely genial voice volunteered: "There you are, sir, and no 'arm done. Now you'll do nicely . . ."

Lanyard wanted to tell the speaker he was a fool.

It was impossible for one to have come through that motor wreck, impossible for any mortal to have been caught between two heavy cars meeting head on in headlong flight, without incurring desperate if not deadly injuries. How reasonable that was this pain proved that racked him from head to foot, but more particularly his head, and made him want to retch, pain so intense it paralyzed the very instinct to complain . . .

His tongue temporarily refusing its office, Lanyard contented himself with a feeble grunt through locked teeth; and because his knees were as water, hung on with both hands to the rounded surfaces that met behind his back to form the angle, till presently the pain grew less, the feeling of nausea passed off, his senses renewed contact with their environment and flashed strange tidings to his brain in respect of conditions they could neither grasp nor accommodate themselves to . . .

Some moron had taken to amusing himself with the headlights of one of the motorcars, switching them on and off while they stared Lanyard full in the face at such close range that he was conscious of the heat they generated between the spaces of darkness. Furthermore, a storm of sorts had evidently sprung up out of that clear midnight sky; he remembered well how cloudless it had been just before the collision, how bright with mockery the gibbous moon; the boding calm which had bound everything in nature he recalled distinctly, too. But now a great wind was shrieking like a warlock, gusts of warm rain spattered the flesh of his face, the very earth beneath him was convulsed, bucking and rocking like a wild mustang, and the keen, sweet smell of the inland night had given place to the salt breath of the sea . . .

Lanyard opened his eyes, only to close them tight the next instant and shut out what was indisputably the delusion of a mind deranged; yet a vision so vividly colored and in every particular so circumstantial, stamping the retinae with such an impression of brilliance and animation, that he could not refrain from looking again, if only to convince himself of the sheer wonder of it—but half expecting his sight, on this occasion, to be greeted by another illusion and a different, if one quite as impossibly unreal.

He saw precisely what he had seen, and rejected, before . . .

A length of steamer deck, looking forward from the angle in which he stood at the after end of the superstructure, with deck chairs all folded and lashed to the inner rail and window ports all fast; its scoured planking now blue with the shadow cast by the deck overhead, now flooded with sun glare from end to end, as the vessel rolled heavily in a rough seaway. Beyond the rail a bright blue sky without a cloud, a horizon unbroken by any loom of land, a sea of incredible ultramarine creaming under the lash of a full gale, the sleek hollow bellies of its charging waves a-dazzle with the sun's spilled gold, its flying spindrift sprays of diamond dust . . .

Forward, opposite the entrance to the saloon companionway, a girl clinging to the rail, bobbed blonde hair fluffed out by the wind, filmy yellow sweater and brief sports skirt of white silk molded to her slender young contours, intent eyes turned aft to Lanyard. In the dark mouth of the door a cluster of men and women, likewise staring. Nearer and a little to the left a lithe young man of British cast, wearing a look of cheerful concern and the white duck jacket of a steward, with long legs well apart balancing to the motion of the vessel while he watched Lanyard.

Finding himself the target of the latter's blank regard, the man grinned broadly. "Nahsty tumble, sir," he cried in the penetrating pitch of a seafarer schooled to talk against the wind, and with an inflection that suited precisely his racial type, "and a wicked crack it did give your 'ead and no mistike. Like a pistol shot it sounded. Thought for a minute it 'ad done you in for fair, but it didn't tike long to mike sure you 'adn't broken no bones. 'Ow do you feel now, sir?"

"What . . ." Lanyard's voice in his hearing was attenuated and strange. His tongue felt unwieldy. "What . . ."

The figure in the white jacket waved a hand toward the foot of a ladder near-by. "You was comin' down from the bridge deck, sir—don't you remember?—when a sea 'it us and knocked you clean off your pins. 'Ad to 'ang on to the rail to keep from bein' knocked abaht myself."

Lanyard replied with a sign of exorcism, releasing the rail with one hand to describe it. At the same time he shut his eyes fast and made a determined effort to shake off the bondage of this fantastic dream. But when he looked again nothing had changed, the hallucination remained as definite and bright as ever, perfect to its last least detail.

"Feel a bit shiken up, don't you, sir?" The steward moved to Lanyard's side. "I don't wonder. But if you'll just tike it easy awhile, I think you'll find you ain't much 'urt."

Dumbfounded, Lanyard wagged his head, bringing about recurrence of its splitting ache, which none the less led to the discovery that, barring a bruised shoulder and elbow, a soundly battered head was all his damage. But this too he laid to delirium, as being a manifest physical inconsistency in one who had just taken part in a motor smash of the first magnitude. And wondering if exertion of will would bring this lunatic scramble of a world round to its right guise of reality, he fixed the steward with an exacting eye, the eye of a man who had made up his mind to stand for no more nonsense.

"Madame de Montalais," he enunciated distinctly—"is she all right?"

But demonstrably this wasn't the requisite magic formula; enunciation of it failed to do away with those unbelievably factual circumstances of a summer gale at sea and set up in their stead an autumnal nocturne of moonlit hills and vales. Its only effect, indeed, was to light a flicker of real solicitude in the steward's eyes.

"Beg pardon, sir—what was that you said?"

"The lady with me—was she injured?"

"But there wasn't any lidy with you, sir—you was quite alone, arfw'y down the ladder, when the sea 'it us. I 'appened to be watchin' you, sir, though not 'andy enough to save you the fall, I'm sorry to s'y. But per'aps you feel strong enough now to let me 'elp you to your berth and fetch the doctor to give you a look over."

Lanyard in despair resigned himself; the world had gone stark staring mad and he was the maddest madman in it. Weakly he suffered the steward to take his arm in a respectful yet persuasive hold.

"Let me see, now, sir—what was the number of your stiteroom?"

In unbounded amazement Lanyard heard himself reply without any hesitation:

"Thirty-nine."

"Quite so, sir. This w'y, if you please, and lean on me."

A door in the after wall of the superstructure admitted to a passage by way of which it was only a step to Stateroom 39. Here the steward considerately removed the passenger's coat and shoes and made him comfortable in a berth wedged with pillows, then hurried away to call the ship's surgeon, leaving Lanyard to wait in a temper of dull indignation, satisfied that he was being somehow sold by his ingrate senses, but quite incapable of understanding how. His head still hurt badly—there was a cruel swelling above one ear—and seemed to be utterly of no service other than as a container for pain-impregnated cotton wool that stifled every essay of his wits to seize the meaning of his present plight. After a while he gave up trying to think and lay looking round the room with resentful eyes.

The stateroom had been designed and fitted to accommodate three people without crowding. Nevertheless it had every appearance of dedication to the uses of a single tenant. A solitary dressing gown and only one suit of pyjamas hung on the hooks behind the door. One assortment of shaving implements and other masculine toilet articles cluttered the shelves above the washstand. A lonely kit bag, obviously on its first voyage out of the shop, displayed the monogram A. D. None of these was Lanyard able to identify as property of his. If you asked him, he could swear he had never laid eyes on them before. But neither was he on terms of visual acquaintance with the coat which the steward had stripped from his shoulders and which was now oscillating like some uncouth and eccentric pendulum from a hook at the foot of the berth. A garment fashioned of the smokiest of Scotch tweed but with an incurably American accent, it gave circumstantial contradiction to the feeling that one had no business to pose as the rightful tenant of that stateroom; for quite as apparently one had had no business posing as the rightful tenant of that coat.

But the affair as a whole was past puzzling out by a head whose buzzing mocked every attempt at ordered thought; and with a sigh Lanyard gave it up for the time being, and shut his eyes to screen out refracted sun-glare on the white paint overhead . . .

Consciousness was on the point of lapsing when the door latch rattled and the inimitable cadences of a British public school voice hailed him with an affectation of friendliness whose falsity was more elusive, and yet somehow less successful, than it commonly is in the bedside geniality of the general practitioner.

"Ah, Mr. Duchemin! Been tryin' to butt a hole through the promenade deck, have you?"

Disguising instinctive resentment, Lanyard smiled amiably up at a new face that proved a good match for the voice, the sanguine face of a young man, cleanly razored, set with hard blue eyes and an arrogant, thin nose. "Monsieur . . ." he managed to say, rousing on an elbow; but the effort caused agony to stab through his temples again and he dropped back to his pillow, groaning.

The photograph of the man at the safe door was an exact likeness of the Lone Wolf.

"Bad as all that, eh?" the other commented in a tone that somehow implied he wasn't being taken in. "Well! needn't punish yourself to prove it to me; I'm not fussy about fine points of etiquette. Lie still now, and let me have a look."

"You are the ship's surgeon, monsieur?" Lanyard inquired with difficulty because his teeth were set to stifle grunts as fingers deft enough but none too gentle searched out the sore spot.

"Well—I leave it to you," their owner replied in ironic patience . . . "Hm'm—worse than I expected. Miracle you got off without a fracture . . . Do you think I've been pullin' your leg about my ratin' these last few nights? Or d'you mean my luck at bridge qualifies me in your estimation as a card sharp first and a seagoin' sawbones last? . . . Hold still, now, and don't try to answer; I'm goin' to sponge this noble contusion and decorate it with a becoming patch."

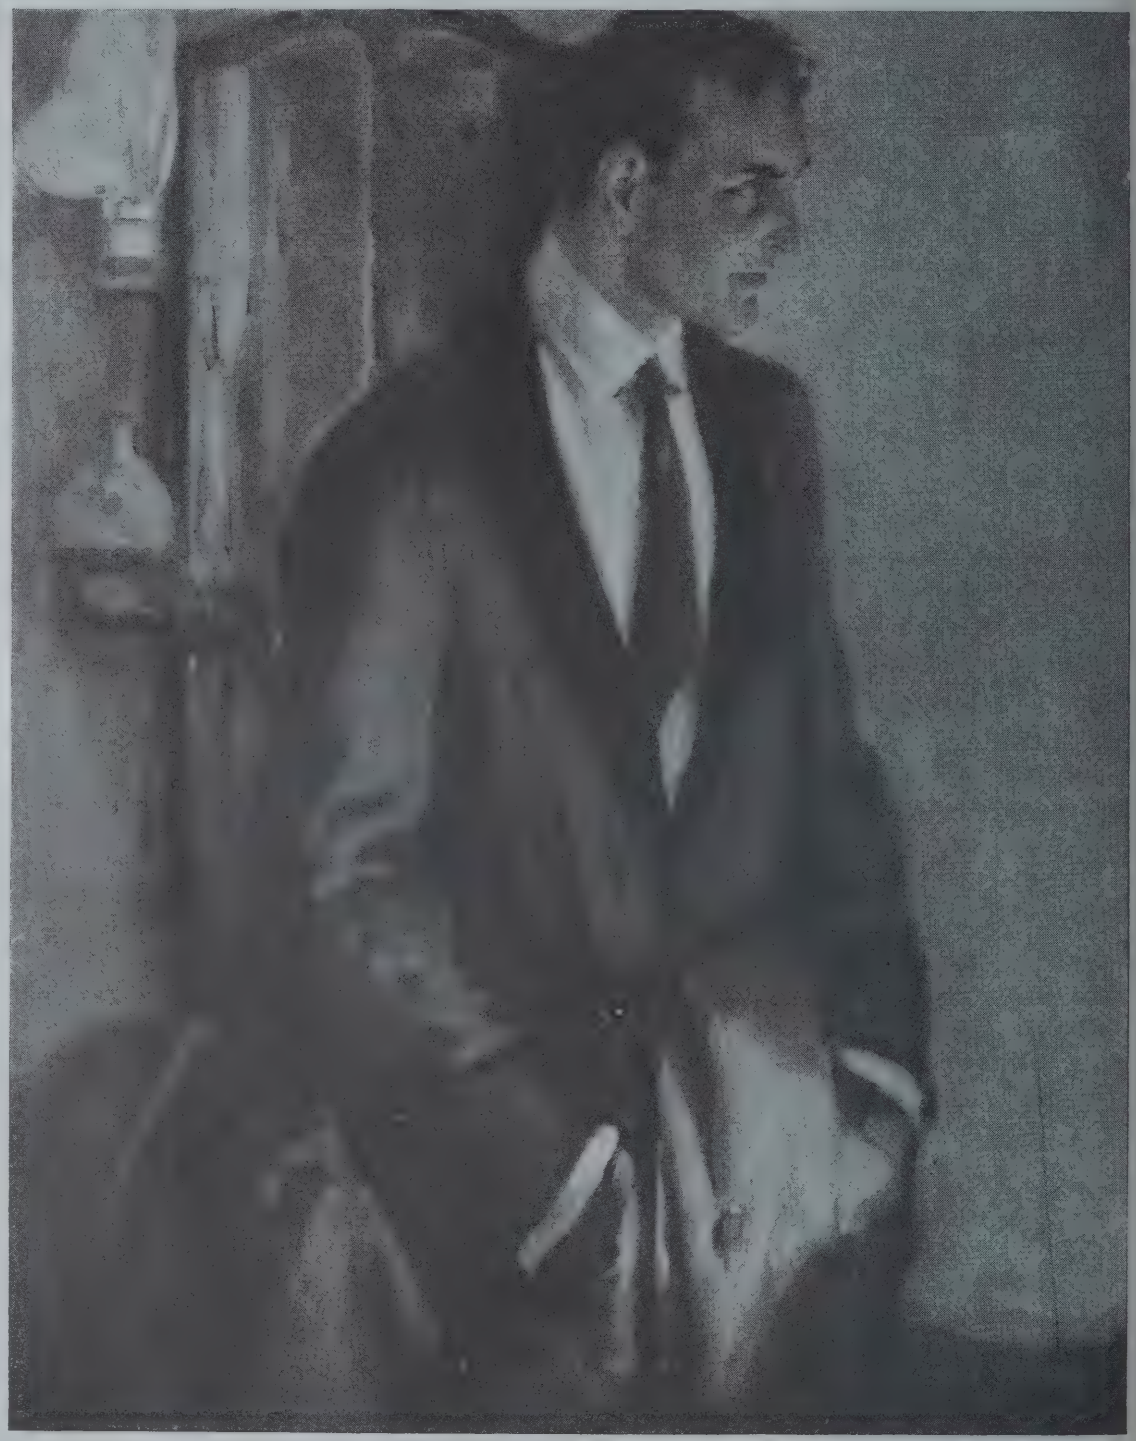
An interlude of acute discomfort came to an end with the announcement: "You'll do now, I fancy; but if I were you, my friend, I'd take it easy and watch my step till this hatful of wind blows itself out—which it ought to before long, goin' by the glass."



"Many thanks, Monsieur——"

A rising inflection made that last word an open bid for the name of the person addressed; who, however, chose coolly to ignore it.

"And now, if you don't mind ownin' up," he said with a clearer note of sarcasm, "what the devil are you drivin' at? Am I the ship's surgeon! Tryin' to make out a triflin' crack on the head has knocked you silly? Because it's no go, if you are; I may be the demon bridge player of this vessel, but I'm a good enough medico besides to know that, barrin' a beautiful bump, you're as right as rain."

It was anything but easy to school oneself to swallow such superciliousness of phrase and look; but it had to be done if one hoped to learn the inwardness of several matters.

"If you would be so good as to sit down one moment, monsieur," Lanyard suggested civilly, "assuming, of course, your valuable time permits—I would be most grateful indeed for your professional advice."

The woman gave a start, drew back with a veering glance as if disturbed by some noise unheard

"Right-o!" The surgeon drew up a chair and settled himself in it with the manner of a man who didn't mind humoring a persistent child just this once.

"What's on your mind, Mr. Duchemin—more than your casualty?" he went on.

"To begin with, I should be glad to know the time of day."

"Why not consult that pretty trinket strapped on your wrist? Or was that, too, cracked by your fall?"

Indignation failed while Lanyard studied the timepiece to which his attention had thus delicately been drawn, with the more interest because, to the best of his knowledge, the watch, unmistakably a fine one, was none of his.

Through the concert of the gale three double strokes of resonant bell metal sang and were followed by a single. "Seven bells of the forenoon watch," the surgeon interpreted of his own accord. "Does yours agree?"

"Precisely . . . Monsieur," Lanyard said earnestly: "I should like to consult you concerning myself in strict confidence . . ."

"Let the oath of Hippocrates comfort your misgivings."

"Then let me tell you something." After a brief pause Lanyard announced with a deal of true diffidence: "It is now some twelve hours, or little more, by my best reckoning, since I figured unfortunately in a motorcar accident on the Armonk Road, in Westchester County, thirty miles or so north of the City of New York."

"That's interestin'," the Englishman commented with a skeptical twitch of lips, "especially interestin' in view of the fact that we are now three days' run south of New York."

"Monsieur is not making fun of me?"

"No, thanks: that sort of thing doesn't amuse me as it does you."

"But I am entirely serious, I assure you."

"Haven't the slightest doubt of it. All the same, I'd give somethin' to know what it is you're so serious about."

"Be patient with me another minute, monsieur." Lanyard devoted at least that much time to anxious thought. "Yesterday," he at length submitted, "was the third of November, nineteen twenty-one."

by Lanyard, then laid her finger to her lips, sprang up lightly and went to the port to look out.

"You're going to have trouble, my friend, makin' that statement jibe with the log, which calls today the fifth of June, 'twenty-two."

Lanyard lifted a hand to beg for grace, and did the sum in his head while the Englishman sat watching him with what all but insufferably seemed to be contemptuous amusement. But one couldn't afford to resent that yet.

A double line deepened between Lanyard's brows. His first guess appeared to have been a poor one; the elapsed time proved that Morphew hadn't picked him up unconscious after the crash, hurried him in that condition back to New York, and caused him forthwith to be shanghaied.

"Seven months to be accounted for," he mused aloud, "seven months lost out of life!"

"Oh?" None but a Briton could have infused so much cynic incredulity into one lonely syllable. Lanyard flushed.

"Oblige me, monsieur, by believing that, between losing consciousness in that motor crash of November fifth and regaining it after being thrown from that ladder half an hour ago, I remember nothing whatever."

"Astonishin'."

"Eyen so, not—I believe—a case without precedent."

"Quite so."

"One is misled, then"—Lanyard's tone was as cold as his eye—"by an impression you give—no doubt without intention—of disbelief in my sincerity?"

The eyes of the Englishman winced, he colored in his turn, but with anger more than with mortification to find his unmannerly attitude so directly challenged.

"My dear Mr. Duchemin," he protested uncomfortably, "when you consider one has seen a good deal of you in the last few days, talked with you, dined with you, played bridge with you for hours at a time and found you always a man of entirely collected mind, no different from the man one is conversin' with at this moment, perhaps you'll agree there's some excuse for one's bogglin' over a pretty tall tale on the face of it."

"It makes me very happy to accept your apology, monsieur." Gravely Lanyard watched the face of the surgeon burn a deeper red. "And on my part I am truly sorry to think I have put too great a strain upon your charity. Yet, you must let me assure you again, what I am telling you is the simple truth. I am afraid I shall need time to get my bearings, and I would be vastly grateful for assistance."

"By all means," the other said in a stifled voice, " 'm sure."

"It would help measurably to know what vessel this is . . ."

"The Port Royal—Monon Line."

"Ah! a fruit steamer, I take it?"

"Right; you took it for Nassau, Havana, Kingston, the Canal Zone and Costa Rica."

"I think you said we were three days out? Then we ought to be not far from Nassau now."

"This gale has held us back a bit, but we ought to make port by daybreak tomorrow."

"One can send a cable there, of course . . ."

Either a mistrustful mind deceived Lanyard or the Englishman wasn't happy in his efforts to disguise a thrill of keen inquisitiveness. "Of course; but why wait? Mean to say, there's our wireless at your service if you're keen to get some message off your mind, Mr. Duchemin."

"How stupid of me to forget." Lanyard's smile could be as charming as he chose, and he chose it to be entirely so just then, intent as he was on disarming one whom he had reason to think curiously hostile to him. "But then you will be indulgent, remembering the circumstances. One question more, Doctor——"

"Bright!" that person snapped curtly.

"Thank you. I am wondering . . . No doubt you saw me when or soon after I embarked?"

"Happened to be standin' by the head of the gangplank when you came aboard, in point of fact."

"If you could tell me whether that event was marked by any unusual circumstances, such as might possibly shed light upon the riddle of why I came aboard at all——"

"Sorry, but you seemed to be quite peaceable."

"Nothing to lead you to suspect I wasn't in full command of my faculties?"

"Rather not!"

"I was—alone?"

"Quite."

"Nobody to bid me bon voyage?"

"At least, I saw nobody."

"And my subsequent behavior has been, I trust, discreet?"

"To the letter of the word. If you mean your smokin' room habits, they've been above reproach—more than one can say of most Americans since the 'greatest country on God's green footstool' dried up."

"But I am not an American——"

"Never thought you were, Mr. Duchemin." Doctor Bright's sprained self-esteem was now convalescent. The eyes he bent on Lanyard were lambent with secret satisfaction, as if he knew something that Lanyard didn't, and found this proof of his superiority gratifying. "There's your name, for one thing. And then no American ever spoke such French; saw enough service in France to know the true Parisian accent when I hear it."

"Indeed? So I have found occasion to speak French about this vessel?"

"Rather. You've been at it daily, and a good part of every day, with the attentions you've been payin' the pretty lady."

Lanyard's eyebrows went up alertly. "'Pretty lady'?"

"Madame la Comtesse de Lorgnes. At all events that's her style on the passenger list. Most fascinating and highly finished piece of work this tub has ever carried."

"Good to look at, you mean, monsieur?"

"Good to look at is a feeble way to put it. Every unattached male on board is balmy about her; and the attached ones aren't what one might call unconscious when she's in sight. And every man jack loathes you like fun because the pretty lady has a hospitable eye and you haven't given anybody else a ghost of a look-in."

"Beautiful and—shall we say—not ingénue, eh?"

"Look here," the Englishman laughed knowingly, "if you keep on guessin' so closely, I'll have to suspect your memory isn't as poor as you claim."

"It is true," Lanyard admitted with an air of perplexity, "that name, de Lorgnes, seems not unfamiliar. One wonders where, or when, one has heard it before, if possibly this lady is some friend of younger years . . ."

"Not this Comtesse de Lorgnes," Doctor Bright asserted in another turn of impertinence, "that is, unless the two of you have been playin' a game with me."

"Impossible, monsieur."

"Then you'll have to take my word for it—just as I took yours—you never met Madame la Comtesse before the first day out, when I had the honor of presentin' you—at her request."

"It must be an echo," Lanyard speculated, "that name—from some forgotten yesterday. I recall now—it is odd, I think—the number of this stateroom fell spontaneously from my lips when the steward who picked me up asked for it."

"Not really?" The surgeon had the laugh of one hugely entertained. "There's another point you've overlooked, I fancy—your name, Duchemin. Feel quite at home with that, don't you? You answer to it readily enough."

"But naturally," Lanyard returned with the utmost naïveté "Why should I not, seeing it is my name?"

"Well! there you are. Cases of submerged identity always go by another name while their first personality is in under the cloud. But you came aboard as André Duchemin, you admit you're André Duchemin now; and I dare say you were André Duchemin at the time of that motor crash, what?"

"Monsieur is quite right."

"That settles it, as I see it. You'll find it will all come back to you, everythin' you've forgotten, bit by bit as the shock of your tumble wears off. It would be an interestin' thing from a professional view point if this should turn out to be a true case of mislaid identity; but I'm afraid you needn't hope for that."

"Hope, monsieur!"

"Mean to say, you'll find it's somethin' much more simple and elementary with you. You've had a bad fall and a rap on the head that recalls a similar mishap several months old, and for the time bein' everything that has happened in between seems wiped out. But I'll go bail it will all come back to you inside of twenty-four hours."

"Why twenty-four hours?"

"As soon as you've had a sound sleep, that is—same thing. Let me send you in a powder, and by dinner time you'll be ready to apologize for tryin' to take advantage of my innocent and trustin' nature. What do you say?"

Lanyard said that monsieur was too kind . . . "But a favor, my dear doctor," he added with a tolerably crestfallen air. "We won't find it necessary to tell our fellow passengers what a sorry fraud I am, will we?"

"Oh, I won't be the one to expose you!" Bright replied with vast conceit in his ambiguity. "And you won't have a chance to tell on yourself before the sea goes down a bit. Meanin' to say, Madame la Comtesse is a poor sailor. But you see, your anxiety not to be made a laughin' stock to her proves that your memory is improvin' every minute."

"One wastes time trying to deceive you," Lanyard admitted with humility. "But there is one thing, I believe, that might aid my recovery—a look at the passenger list. Do you think you could by any chance find a copy for me?"

Contentment with his great cunning sustained this shock with poor grace; the surgeon frowned a frown of impatience mixed with mystification. Was it possible this chap still imagined he had found an easy dupe? But, one had to be diplomatic . . .

"Oh, very well!" Bright said shortly. "I'll have the steward bring you one with your sleeping powder. Though I must admit I don't quite see . . ."

Lanyard forgot to offer any explanation; and when the passenger list had duly been delivered and scrutinized was obliged to confess that he had exerted himself to no purpose. "Madame la Comtesse de Lorgnes" was much too transparent an incognita for Liane Delorme; and the discovery that she was a fellow passenger had been excuse enough for the surmise that others of their common acquaintance might be keeping them company en voyage.

But if such were the case, the printed list of passengers gave no clue; no other name suggested a likely alias for Morphew, or Pagan, or Mallison, or . . . Mrs. Folliott McFee.

Neither did anything reward his eager search for a name whose music was like an old song singing in one's heart.

The list slipped from his grasp and joined the surgeon's rejected sleeping powder on the floor. Lanyard lay with a face that mirrored pain more real than that which racked his head, blindly studying the play of rainbow gleams upon the painted ceiling. Seven months lost beyond recall . . . And Eve?

CHAPTER XVI

WITHIN the hour thought flagged for sheer weariness of beating to no purpose against that wall of oblivion whose featureless façade sequestered seven mortal months of forfeit yesterdays, nerves grew weary of the zooming wind, incessant slap and slash of broken water streaming down the side, the tuneless crooning of the engines; Lanyard slept.

A noise of light knuckles on the door awakened him when the afternoon was old and wind and sea had both abated, as the muting of their deep diapason affirmed.

Without waiting to receive permission, Liane Delorme turned the knob and entered.

Most adept of actresses, she carried herself now with an air of delicate audacity that would have (Continued on page 136)

An Exploit of Ukridge, The Incorrigible Optimist,

By

P. G. WODEHOUSE

The Début of Battling Billson

Illustrations by
T. D. Skidmore

IT BECOMES increasingly difficult, I have found, as time goes by, to recall the exact circumstances in which one first became acquainted with this man or that; for as a general thing I lay no claim to the possession of one of those hair-trigger memories which come from subscribing to the correspondence courses advertised in the magazines. If I encountered Mr. Addison Simms of Seattle after a separation of years I should probably spoil his whole day by cutting him dead. Certainly I should not ask him how he came out on that granary deal.

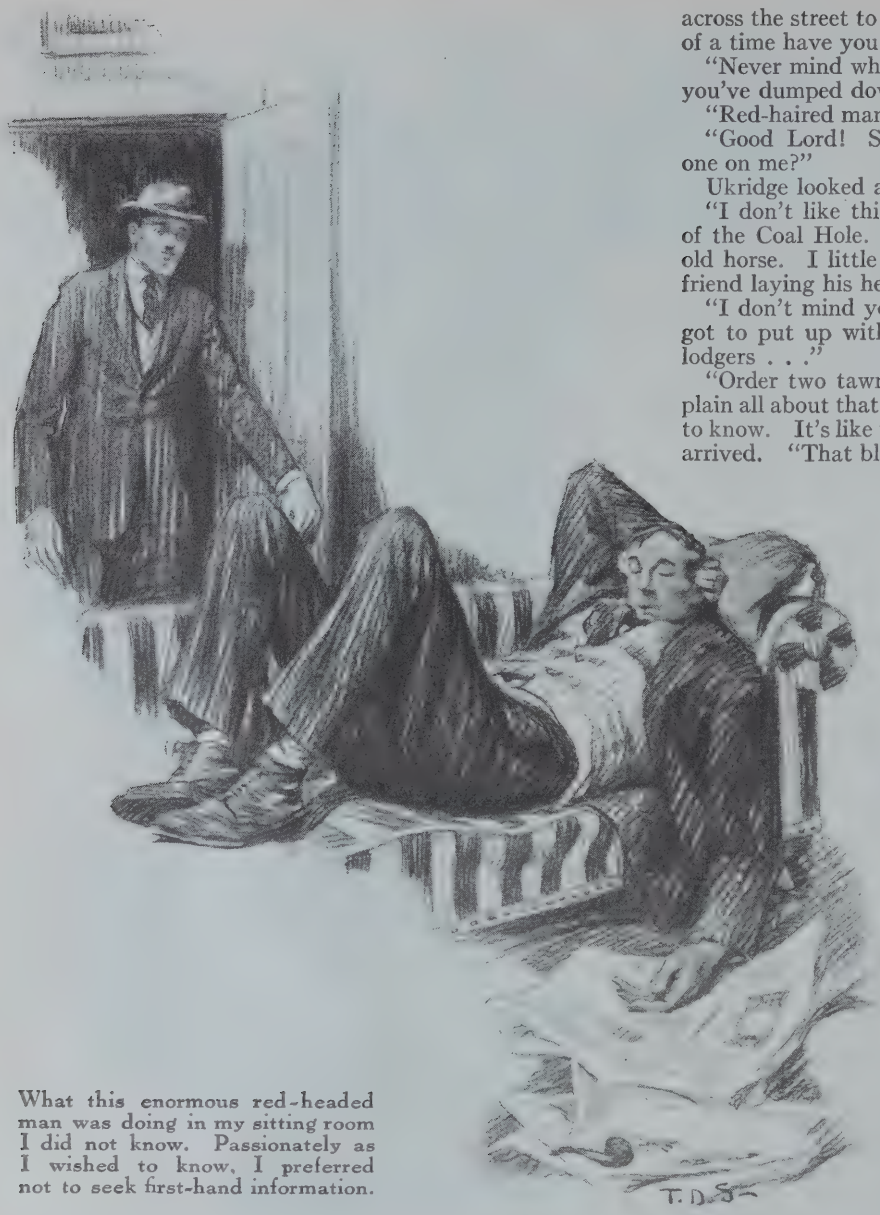
And yet I can state without doubt or hesitation that the individual afterwards known as Battling Billson entered my life at half-past four on the afternoon of Saturday, September the tenth, two days after my twenty-seventh birthday. For there was that about my first sight of him which has caused the event to remain photographically lined on the tablets of my mind when a yesterday has faded from its page. Not only was our meeting dramatic and even startling, but it had in it something of the quality of the last straw, the final sling or arrow of outrageous Fortune. It seemed to put the lid on the sadness of life.

Everything had been going steadily wrong with me for more than a week. I had been away, paying a duty visit to uncongenial relatives in the country, and it had rained and rained and rained. There had been family prayers before breakfast and bezique after dinner. On the journey back to London my carriage had been full of babies, the train had stopped everywhere and I had had nothing to eat but a bag of buns. And when finally I let myself into my lodgings in Ebury Street and sought the soothing haven of my sitting room, the first thing I saw on opening the door was this enormous red-headed man lying on the sofa.

He made no move as I came in, for he was asleep; and I can best convey the instantaneous impression I got of his formidable physique by saying that I had no desire to wake him. The sofa was a small one, and he overflowed it in every direction. He had a broken nose, and his jaw was the jaw of a Wild West motion picture star registering determination. One hand was under his head; the other, hanging down to the floor, looked like a strayed ham congealed into stone. What he was doing in my sitting room I did not know, but, passionately as I wished to know, I preferred not to seek first-hand information. There was something about him that seemed to suggest that he might be one of those men who are rather cross when they first wake up. I crept out and stole softly downstairs to make inquiries of Bowles, my landlord.

"Sir?" said Bowles, in his fruity ex-butler way, popping up from the depths accompanied by a rich smell of finnan haddie.

"There's someone in my room," I whispered.



"That would be Mr. Ukridge, sir."

"It wouldn't be anything of the kind," I replied with asperity. I seldom had the courage to contradict Bowles, but this statement was so wildly inaccurate that I could not let it pass. "It's a huge, red-headed man."

"Mr. Ukridge's friend, sir. He joined Mr. Ukridge here yesterday."

"How do you mean, joined Mr. Ukridge here yesterday?"

"Mr. Ukridge came to occupy your rooms in your absence, sir, on the night after your departure. I assumed that he had

What this enormous red-headed man was doing in my sitting room I did not know. Passionately as I wished to know, I preferred not to seek first-hand information.

your approval. He said, if I remember correctly, that 'it would be all right.' "

For some reason or other which I had never been able to fathom, Bowles's attitude towards Ukridge from their first meeting had been that of an indulgent father towards a favorite son. He gave the impression now of congratulating me on having such a friend to rally round and sneak my rooms when I went away.

"Would there be anything further, sir?" inquired Bowles with a wistful half-glance over his shoulder.

He seemed reluctant to tear himself away for long from the finnan haddie.

"No," I said. "Er—no. When do you expect Mr. Ukridge back?"

"Mr. Ukridge informed me that he would return for dinner, sir. Unless he has altered his plans, he is now at a matinée performance at the Gaiety Theater."

The audience was just beginning to leave when I reached the Gaiety. I waited in the Strand, and presently was rewarded by the sight of a yellow mackintosh working its way through the crowd.

"Hullo, laddie," said Stanley Featherstonehaugh Ukridge genially. "When did you get back? I say, I want you to remember this tune so that you can remind me of it tomorrow when I'll be sure to have forgotten it. This is how it goes." He poised himself flat-footedly in the surging tide of pedestrians and, shutting his eyes and raising his chin, began to yodel in a loud and dismal tenor. "Tumty-tumty-tumty-tum, tum tum tum," he concluded. "And now, old horse, you may lead me across the street to the Coal Hole for a short snifter. What sort of a time have you had?"

"Never mind what sort of a time I've had. Who's the fellow you've dumped down in my rooms?"

"Red-haired man?"

"Good Lord! Surely even you wouldn't inflict more than one on me?"

Ukridge looked at me, a little pained.

"I don't like this tone," he said, leading me down the steps of the Coal Hole. "Upon my Sam, your manner wounds me, old horse. I little thought that you would object to your best friend laying his head on your pillow . . ."

"I don't mind your head. At least I do, but I suppose I've got to put up with it. But when it comes to your taking in lodgers . . ."

"Order two tawny ports, laddie," said Ukridge, "and I'll explain all about that. I had an idea all along that you would want to know. It's like this," he proceeded, when the tawny ports had arrived. "That bloke's going to make my everlasting fortune."

"Well, can't he do it somewhere else except my sitting room?"

"You know me, old horse," said Ukridge, sipping luxuriously. "Keen, alert, far-sighted. Brain never still. Always getting ideas—bing—like a flash. The other day I was in a pub down Chelsea way having a bit of bread and cheese, and a fellow came in smothered with jewels. Smothered, I give you my word. Rings on his fingers and a tie pin you could have lighted your cigar at. I made inquiries and found that he was Tod Bingham's manager."

"Who's Tod Bingham?"

"My dear old son, you must have heard of Tod Bingham. The new middleweight champion. Beat Alf Palmer for the belt a couple of weeks ago. And this bloke, as opulent looking a bloke as ever I saw, was his manager. I suppose he gets about fifty percent of everything Tod makes, and you know the sort of purses they give for big fights nowadays. And then there's music hall tours and the movies and all that . . . well, I see no reason why, putting the thing at the lowest figures, I shouldn't scoop in thousands. I got the idea two seconds after they told me who this fellow was. And what made the thing seem almost as if it was meant to be was the coincidence that I should have heard only that morning that the Hyacinth had come in."

The man seemed to me to be rambling. In my reduced and afflicted state his cryptic method of narrative irritated me.

"I don't know what you're talking about," I said. "What's the Hyacinth? In where?"

"Pull yourself together, old horse," said Ukridge with the air of one endeavoring to be patient with a half-witted child. "You remember the Hyacinth, the tramp steamer I took that trip on a couple of years ago. Many's the time I've told you all about the Hyacinth. She docked in the Port of London the night before I met this opulent bloke, and I had been meaning to go down next day and have a chat with the lads. The fellow you found in your rooms is one of the trimmers. As decent a bird as ever you met. Not much conversation, but a heart of gold. And it came across me like a thunderbolt the moment they told me who the jeweled cove was that, if I could only induce this man Billson to take up scrapping seriously, with me as his manager, my fortune was made. Billson is the man who invented fighting."

"He looks it."

"Splendid chap—you'll like him."

"I bet I shall. I made up my mind to like him the moment I saw him."

"Never picks a quarrel, you understand—in fact, used to need the deuce of a lot of provocation before he would give of his best—but once he started—golly! I've seen that man clean out a bar at Marseilles in a way that fascinated you. A bar filled to overflowing with A.B.'s and firemen, mind you, and all capable of felling oxen with a blow. Six of them there were, and they kept swatting Billson with all the vim and heartiness at their disposal, but he just let them bounce off and went on with the business in hand. The man's a champion, laddie, nothing less. You couldn't hurt him with a hatchet, and every time he hits anyone all the undertakers in the place jump up and make bids for the body. And the amazing bit of luck is that he was looking for a job ashore. It appears he's fallen in love with one of the barmaids at the Crown in Kennington. Not," said Ukridge, so that all misapprehension should be avoided, "the one with the squint. The other one. Flossie. The girl with yellow hair."

"I don't know the barmaids at the Crown in Kennington," I said.

"Nice girls," said Ukridge, paternally. "So it was all right, you see. Our interests were identical. Good old Billson isn't what you'd call a very intelligent chap, but I managed to make him understand after an hour or so, and we drew up the contract. I'm to get fifty percent of everything in consideration of managing him, fixing up fights and looking after him generally."

"And looking after him includes tucking him up on my sofa and singing him to sleep?"

Again that pained look came into Ukridge's face. He gazed at me as if I had disappointed him.

"You keep harping on that, laddie, and it isn't the right spirit. Anyone would think that we had polluted your confounded room."

"Well, you must admit that having this coming champion of yours in the home is going to make things a bit crowded."

"Don't worry about that, my dear old man," said Ukridge reassuringly. "We move to the White Hart at Barnes tomorrow, to start training. I've got Billson an engagement in one of the preliminaries down at Wonderland two weeks from tonight."

"No, really?" I said, impressed by this enterprise. "How did you manage it?"

"I just took him along and showed him to the management They jumped at him. You see, the old boy's appearance rather speaks for itself. Thank goodness, all this happened just when I had a few quid tucked away. By the greatest luck I ran into George Tupper just at the very moment when he had had word that they were going to make him an under-secretary or something—I can't remember the details, but it's something they give these Foreign Office blokes when they show a bit of class—and Tuppy parted with a tenner without a murmur. Seemed sort of dazed. I believe now I could have had twenty if I'd had the presence of mind to ask for it. Still," said Ukridge, with a manly resignation which did him credit, "it can't be helped now, and ten will see me through.

"The only thing that's worrying me at the moment is what to call old Billson."

"Yes, I should be careful what I called a man like that."

"I mean, what name is he to fight under?"

"Why not his own?"

"His parents, blast them," said Ukridge moodily, "christened him Wilberforce. I ask you, can you see the crowd at Wonderland having Wilberforce Billson introduced to them?"

"Willie Billson," I suggested. "Rather snappy."

Ukridge considered the proposal seriously, with knit brows, as becomes a manager.

"Too frivolous," he decided at length. "Might be all right for a bantam, but . . . no, I don't like it. I was thinking of something like Hurricane Hicks or Rock-Crusher Riggs."

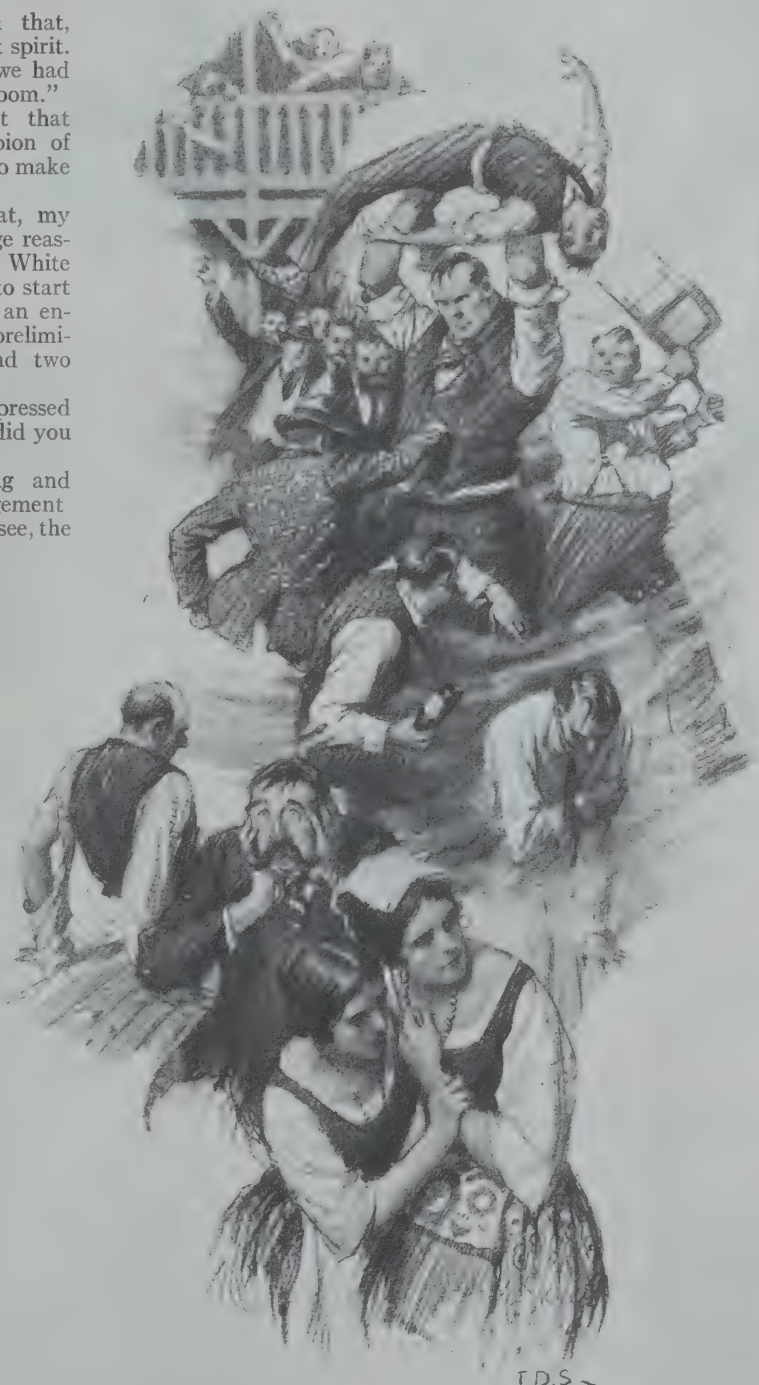
"Don't do it," I urged, "or you'll kill his career right from the start. You never find a real champion with one of these fancy names. Bob Fitzsimmons, Jack Johnson, James J. Corbett, James J. Jeffries . . ."

"James J. Billson?"

"Rotten."

"You don't think," said Ukridge, almost with timidity, "that Wildcat Wix might do?"

"No fighter with an adjective in front of his name ever boxed in anything except a three-round preliminary."



"How about Battling Nelson?"

I patted him on the shoulder.

"Go no further," I said. "The thing is settled. Battling Billson is the name."

"Laddie," Ukridge said, in a hushed voice, reaching across the table and grasping my hand, "this is genius. Sheer genius. Order another couple of tawny ports, old man."

I did so, and we drank deep to the Battler's success.

In a dance hall in Naples, Billson took on eleven Italians simultaneously.

My formal introduction to my godchild took place on our return to Ebury Street, and—great as had been my respect for the man before—it left me with a heightened appreciation of the potentialities for triumph awaiting him in his selected profession. He was awake by this time and moving ponderously about the sitting room, and he looked even more impressive standing than he had appeared when lying down. At our first meeting, moreover, his eyes had been closed in sleep; they were now open, green in color and of a peculiarly metallic glint which caused them, as we shook hands, to seem to be exploring my person for good spots to hit. What was probably intended to be the smile that wins appeared to me a grim and sardonic twist of the lip. Take him for all in all, I had never met a man so calculated to convert the most truculent swashbuckler to pacifism at a glance; and when I recalled Ukridge's story of the little unpleasantness at Marseilles and realized that a mere handful of half a dozen able-bodied seamen had had the temerity to engage this fellow in personal conflict, it gave me a thrill of patriotic pride. There must be good stuff in the British Merchant Marine, I felt. Hearts of oak and all that.

Dinner, which followed the introduction, revealed the Battler rather as a capable trencherman than as a sparkling conversationalist. His long reach enabled him to grab salt, potatoes, pepper and other necessaries without the necessity of asking for them; and on other topics he seemed to possess no views which he deemed worthy of exploitation. A strong, silent man.

That there was a softer side to his character was, however, made clear to me when, after smoking one of my cigars and talking for a while of this and that, Ukridge went out on one of those mysterious errands of his which were always summoning him at all hours and left my guest and myself alone together. After a bare half-hour's silence, broken only by the soothing gurgle of his pipe, the coming champion cocked an intimidating eye at me and spoke.

"You ever been in love, mister?"

I was thrilled and flattered. Something in my appearance, I told myself, some nebulous something that showed me a man of sentiment and sympathy, had appealed to this man, and he was about to pour out his heart in intimate confession.

I said yes, I had been in love many times. I went on to speak of love as a noble emotion of which no man need be ashamed. I spoke at length and with fervor.

"R!" said Battling Billson.

Then, as if aware that he had been chattering in an undignified manner to a comparative stranger, he withdrew into the silence again and did not emerge till it was time to go to bed, when he said "Good night, mister," and disappeared.

It was disappointing. Significant, perhaps, the conversation had been, but I must confess that I had been rather hoping for something which could have been built up into a human document, entitled "The Soul of the Abysmal Brute," and sold to some editor for that real money which was always so badly needed in the home.

Billson's opponent passed out of the room as we came in. "I been talkin' to 'im. 'E's 'ad a lot of trouble," said the Battler.

Ukridge and his protégé left next morning for Barnes, and as that riverside resort was somewhat off my beat, I saw no more of the Battler until the fateful night at Wonderland. From time to time Ukridge would drop in at my rooms to purloin cigars and socks, and on these occasions he always spoke with the greatest confidence of his man's prospects. At first, it seemed, there had been a little difficulty owing to the other's rooted idea that plug tobacco was an indispensable adjunct to training; but towards the end of the first week the arguments of wisdom had prevailed and he had consented to abandon smoking until after his début. By this concession the issue seemed to Ukridge to have been sealed as a certainty, and he was in sunny mood as he borrowed the money from me to pay our fares to the underground station from which the pilgrim alights who wishes to visit that Mecca of East End boxing, Wonderland.

The Battler had preceded us; and, when we arrived, was in the dressing room, stripped to a breath-taking seminudity. I had not supposed that it was possible for a man to be larger than was Mr. Billson when arrayed for the street, but in trunks and boxing shoes he looked like his big brother. Muscles resembling the hawsers of an Atlantic liner coiled down his arms and rippled along his massive shoulders. He seemed to dwarf altogether the by no means flimsy athlete who passed out of the room just as we came in.

"That's the bloke," announced Mr. Billson, jerking his red head after this person.

We understood him to imply that the other was his opponent, and the spirit of confidence which had animated us waxed considerably. Where six of the pick of the Merchant Marine had failed, this stripling could scarcely hope to succeed.

"I been talkin' to 'im," Battling Billson said.

I took this unwonted garrulity to be due to a slight nervousness natural at such a moment.

"'E's 'ad a lot of trouble, that bloke," said the Battler.

The obvious reply was that he was now going to have a lot more, but before either of us could make it a hoarse voice announced that Squiffy and the Toff had completed their three-round bout and that the stage now waited for our nominee. We hurried to our seats. The necessity of taking a look at our man in his dressing room had deprived us of the pleasure of witnessing the passage of arms between Squiffy and the Toff, but I gathered that it must have been lively and full of entertainment, for the audience seemed in excellent humor. All those who were not too busy eating jellied eels were babbling happily or whistling between their fingers to friends in distant parts of the hall. As Mr. Billson climbed into the ring in all the glory of his red hair and jumping muscles, the babble rose to a roar. It was plain that Wonderland had stamped our Battler with its approval on sight.

The audiences which support Wonderland are not disdainful of science. Neat footwork wins their commendation, and a skillful ducking of the head is greeted with knowing applause. But what they esteem most highly is the punch. And one sight of Battling Billson seemed to tell them that here was the Punch personified. They sent the fighters off to a howl of ecstasy, and settled back in their seats to enjoy the pure pleasure of seeing two of their fellow men hitting each other very hard and often.

The howl died away . . . I looked at Ukridge with concern. Was this the hero of Marseilles, the man who cleaned out bar-rooms and on whom undertakers fawned? Diffident was the only word to describe our Battler's behavior in that opening round. He pawed lightly at his antagonist. He embraced him like a brother. He shuffled about the ring, innocuous.

"What's the matter with him?" I asked.

"He always starts slow," said Ukridge, but his concern was manifest. He fumbled at the buttons of his mackintosh.

The referee was warning Battling Billson. He was speaking to him like a disappointed father. In the cheaper and baser parts of the house enraged citizens were whistling "Comrades."

Everywhere a chill had fallen on the house. That first fine fresh enthusiasm had died away, and the sounding of the gong for the end of the round was greeted with censorious catcalls. As Mr. Billson lurched back to his corner, frank unfriendliness was displayed on all sides.

With the opening of the second round considerably more spirit was introduced into the affair. The same strange torpidity still held our Battler in its grip, but his opponent was another man. During round one he had seemed a little nervous and apprehensive. He had behaved as if he considered it prudent not to stir Mr. Billson. But now this distaste for direct action had left him. There was jauntiness in his demeanor as he moved to the center of the ring; and, having reached it, he uncoiled a long left and smote Mr. Billson forcefully on the nose. Twice he smote, and twice Mr. Billson blinked like one who has had bad news from home. The man who had had a lot of trouble leaned sideways and brought his right fist squarely against the Battler's ear . . .

All was forgotten and forgiven. A moment before the audience had been solidly anti-Billson. Now they were as unanimously pro. For these blows, while they appeared to have affected him not at all physically, seemed to have awakened Mr. Billson's better feelings as if somebody had turned on a tap. They had aroused in Mr. Billson's soul that zest for combat which had been so sadly to seek in round one. For an instant after the receipt of that buffet on the ear the Battler stood motionless on his flat feet, apparently in deep thought. Then, with the air of one who has suddenly remembered an important appointment, he plunged forward. Like an animated windmill he cast himself upon the bloke of troubles. He knocked him here, he bounced him there. He committed mayhem upon his person. He did everything to him that a man can do who is hampered with boxing gloves, until presently the troubled one was leaning heavily against the ropes, his head hanging dazedly, his whole attitude that of a man who would just as soon let the matter drop. It only remained for the Battler to drive home the final punch, and a hundred enthusiasts, rising to their feet, were pointing out to him desirable locations for it.

But once more that strange diffidence had descended upon our representative. While every other man in the building seemed to know the correct procedure and was sketching it out in nervous English, Mr. Billson appeared the victim of doubt. He looked uncertainly at his opponent and inquiringly at the referee.

The referee, obviously a man of blunted sensibilities, was unresponsive. "Do It Now" was plainly his slogan. He was a business man, and he wanted his patrons to get good value for their money. He was urging Mr. Billson to make a thorough job of it. And finally Mr. Billson approached his man and drew back his right arm. Having done this, he looked over his shoulder once more at the referee.

It was a fatal blunder. The man who had had a lot of trouble may have been in poor shape, but like most of his profession he retained despite his recent misadventures a reserve store of energy. Even as Mr. Billson turned his head, he reached down to the floor with his gloved right hand, then, with a final effort, brought it up in a majestic sweep against the angle of the other's jaw. And then, as the fickle audience with swift change of sympathy cheered him on, he buried his left in Mr. Billson's stomach on the exact spot where the well dressed man wears the third button of his waistcoat.

Of all human experiences, that of being smitten in this precise locality is the least agreeable. Battling Billson dropped like a stricken flower, settled slowly down and spread himself out. He lay peacefully on his back with outstretched arms like a man floating in smooth water. His day's work was done.

A wailing cry rose above the din of excited patrons of sport endeavoring to explain to their neighbors how it had all happened. It was the voice of Ukridge mourning over his dead.

At half-past eleven that night, as I was preparing for bed, a drooping figure entered my room. I mixed a silent, sympathetic Scotch and soda, and for a while no word was spoken.

"How is the poor fellow?" I asked at length.

"This bloke says 'Put 'em up!' Tod says 'Put wot up?' 'E says 'Yer 'ands.' An' then they're fightin' all over the shop."

"He's all right," said Ukridge listlessly. "I left him eating fish and chips at a coffee stall."

"Bad luck, his getting pipped on the post like that."

"Bad luck!" boomed Ukridge, throwing off his lethargy with a vigor that spoke of mental anguish. "What do you mean, bad luck? It was just confounded bone-headedness. Upon my Sam, it's a little hard. I invest vast sums in this man, I support him in luxury for two weeks, asking nothing of him in return except to sail in and knock somebody's head off, which he could have done in two minutes if he had liked, and he lets me down purely and simply because the other fellow told him that he had been up all night looking after his wife, who had burned her hand at the jam factory. Infernal sentimentalism!"

"Does him credit," I argued.

"Bah!"

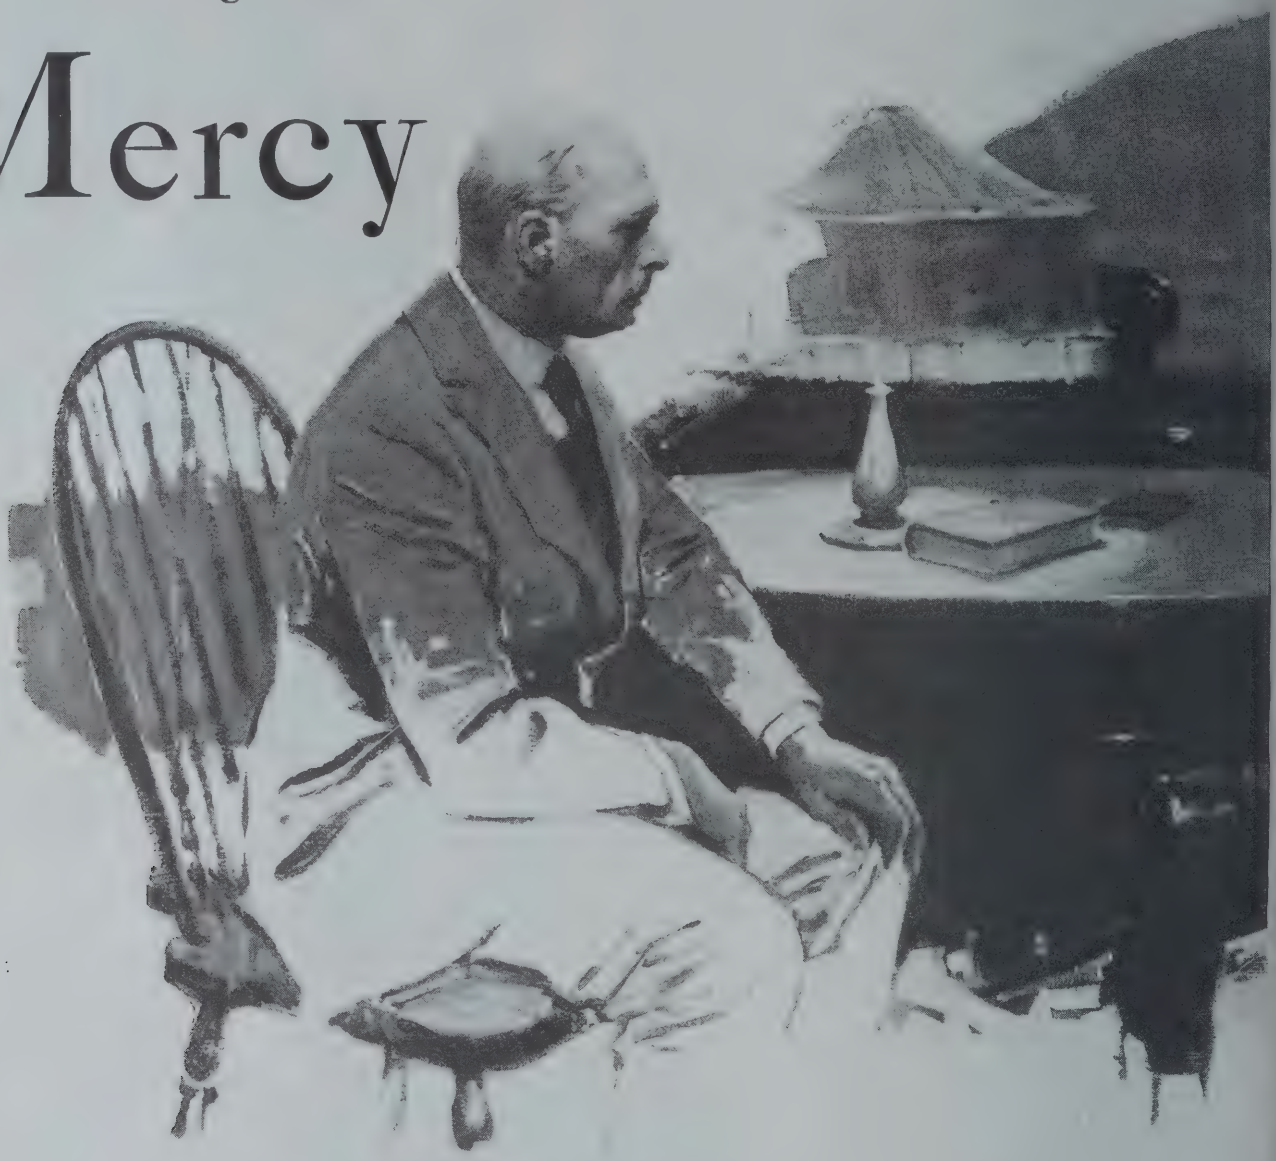
"Kind hearts," I urged, "are more than coronets."

"Who the deuce wants a pugilist to have a kind heart? What's the use of this man Billson being able to knock out an elephant if he's afflicted with this maudlin mushiness? Who ever heard of a mushy pugilist? It's the wrong spirit. It doesn't make for success."

"It's a handicap, of course," I admitted.

"What guarantee have I," demanded Ukridge, "that if I go to enormous trouble and expense getting him another match, he won't turn aside and brush away a silent tear in the first round because he's heard that the blighter's wife has got an ingrowing toenail?"

"You could match him only against bachelors."



"Yes, and the first bachelor he met would draw him into a corner and tell him his aunt was down with whooping cough, and the chump would heave a sigh and stick his chin out to be walloped. A fellow's got no business to have red hair if he isn't going to live up to it. And yet," said Ukridge wistfully, "I've seen that man—it was in a dance hall at Naples—I've seen him take on at least eleven Italians simultaneously. But then one of them had stuck a knife about three (Continued on page 151)

The Second Part of

PETER CLARK MACFARLANE'S

True Story of a Man's Conscience, a Woman's Love, and a City's Heart

Mercy

THIS is a true story. It is the story of a once prominent minister, whom the author names Robert N. Wills. In his youth, Wills abandoned his wife and children to run away with a beautiful young woman in his choir. Under the assumed name of Walton, he found work on a newspaper. One night he spoke in a prayer meeting; spoke so movingly that the congregation insisted on his taking the pastorate of their obscure little church. Despite his past wrong-doing, something deep in Walton made it impossible for him to resist the call.

From then on, his life was a strange one. Pursued by fear of discovery, he and the woman he loved fled from one church to another, each larger than the last. His influence grew. He seemed to command a curious love and admiration; he understood men. Yet there was always a shadow in his eyes. At last, after many years, two women from his first congregation found him in his large city church. He confessed to them; and they were so moved by his story that they agreed to keep his secret. But a man, who also knew it, in a fit of anger told one of Walton's church leaders. Horrified, he wrote a letter threatening exposure unless Walton resigned at once.

THIS letter of Hollis Gant was handed to the Reverend Robert N. Walton at the midweek prayer meeting. Some intuition must have told the man it threatened to denounce what the envelope contained, for he thrust it deep into his pocket; and only at home, in the secure privacy of his study, with the faithful partner of his ghastly secret by his side, did he read the letter—read it and put it from him, lips twisting, but with a new kind of weakening in the glance he bent upon the brown-eyed woman. Years—years, and that one fatuous yielding up to hope—must have softened his endurance; for, hitherto, at the first hint of exposure, it had been enough for him to fly. Tonight he felt that he had not only to fly, but that he must tell somebody—tell!

The man he turned to was Elder George Fawcett, soft-spoken, kindly, of about his own age, diligent in business, diligent for the church, diligent also in his friendships. He, having just parted from his pastor in apparently normal spirits at prayer meeting, was astounded to hear the pastor's stricken voice on the telephone. Backing his roadster out of the garage, he reached the parsonage in a few minutes and the sweep of his lamps picked up the figure of the minister already waiting on the curb.

"What's wrong, Bob?" he inquired anxiously, with a sympathetic lowering of his voice.

Illustrations by
Herbert M. Stoops

"Mrs. Walton," Mose demanded abruptly, "have you got any sand in your craw? Are you a fighter or a runner?"

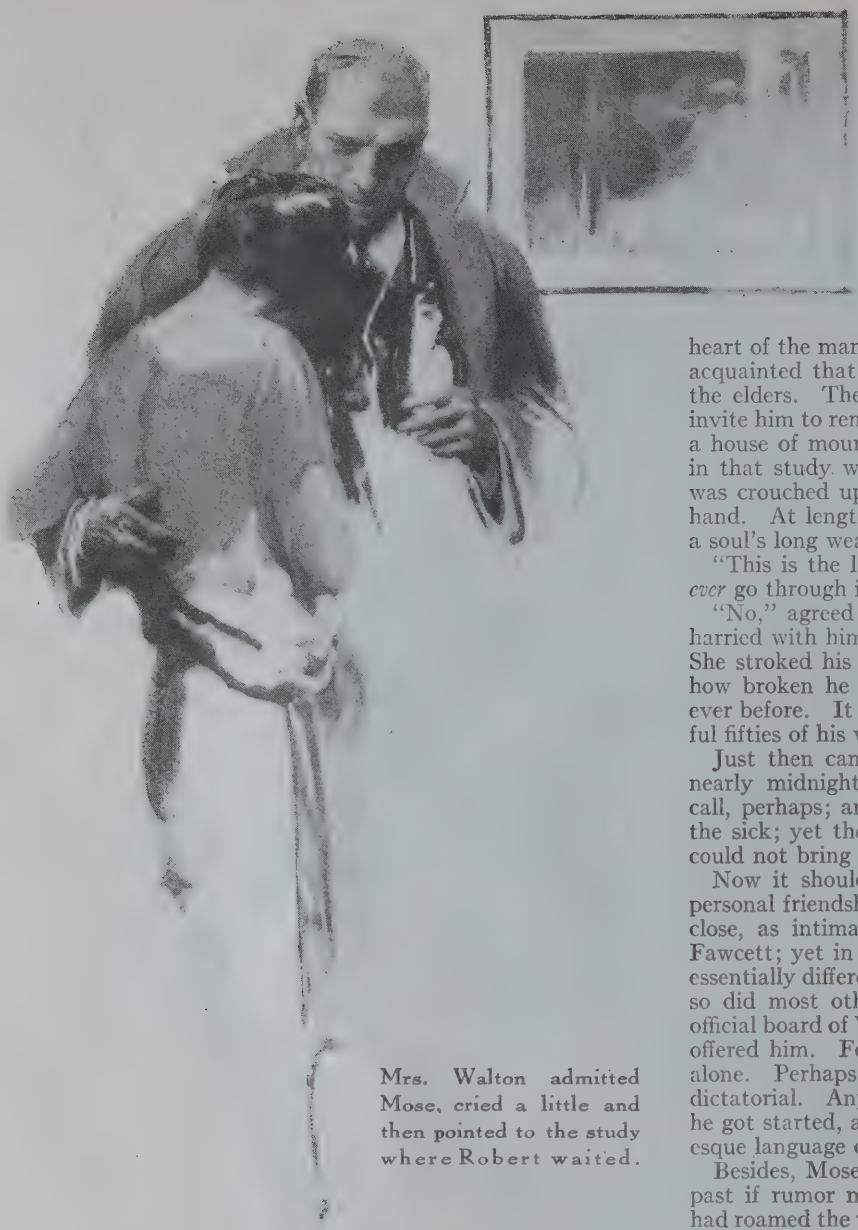
"Let's drive, George!" proposed Walton hoarsely. "I've—I've got to tell you something."

It was a four hour ride they took, northward out of the city and into the night; and at length the minister had labored out a story—a story of what he was!

Fawcett had listened with slowly congealing horror and instinctive shrinking from the man by his side. This man! This idol of his church—not merely weak but sinful, and through a lifetime deliberately a hypocrite in the most sacred relations of life! Why, it was unbelievable—yet related with an agony which enforced belief. But after a time the elder had bucked himself up sufficiently to face the fact.

"There—there must have been mitigating circumstances," he urged.

"No, no! No alibi! I wish there was," groaned Walton. "No, it was just the flesh! I saw this young woman and I wanted her. Oh, God, how I wanted her—more than faith, more than honor, more than anything! I knew it was wrong, but I didn't care, I wanted her so much. I just—took her! She has been everything to me ever since . . . But afterward I did care," he panted. "I did care. But then it was too late; I couldn't undo it. There was nothing to do but just—go on. No, there isn't any alibi. Not even God could find one!"



The elder, loving his friend, trying to find excuses for him, found it a mitigating circumstance now that no mitigating circumstance was pleaded; then reproached him gently: "Of course, Bob, this going right on in the ministry is what puts the worst angle on it."

But at this point the convulsed sinner rallied and had something to say for himself.

"I didn't want to, George; you can be sure I didn't want to," he urged in his defense. "I went into another business; and I was getting along all right. But somehow I couldn't keep away from the church, and when I went I couldn't keep from speaking, and—well, can't you see, George—that part of it?" And Fawcett, at the wheel, felt the hands of Walton tugging at him to understand that much of it. " 'Unclean! Unclean!' I kept crying to myself, but they would have me in the pulpit. Finally, Brownie and I said to each other: 'Well, if the Lord can use us this way, why not let Him?' So we did. Wasn't that right, George; wasn't it, do you think?"

And Fawcett found the plea in his friend's voice almost irresistible; found all this later life of his suddenly comprehensible.

"And think of it, George," besought Walton; "think what it's been to be dogged by fear for twenty-five years—afraid to go out on the street, afraid to go to the church, afraid to look out over the congregation for fear of seeing a familiar face; afraid to answer a knock at the door or a ring on the phone, afraid to open a telegram or a letter, afraid to pick up a newspaper—afraid to be found out, George, and see a wreck made of the work that, under God, I've been permitted to do. It was ghastly, brother; ghastly!"

Mrs. Walton admitted Mose, cried a little and then pointed to the study where Robert waited.

The hoarse voice was swallowed up in a shudder and at last the man broke down and wept inconsolably.

"And now it's come!" he sobbed. "It's come! There's nothing to think of but the good name of the church. We'll go, Brownie and I and the boys; we'll go." The man gulped another sob as he mentioned his boys. "Oh, we'll go quick! We must. I want you, Brother Fawcett, to lay my resignation before the elders tomorrow night. You'll have to call a meeting. Tell them my reasons are imperative. Tell them if they love me, if they've ever cared a thing for what I've done, to accept the resignation without a question. I'll be gone before Sunday."

It was now two o'clock in the morning and Fawcett was by this time beginning to recover himself somewhat. The sin seemed less enormous now in the light of those twenty-five good years. His heart went out to the sinner less reservedly. He spared an arm from the wheel to put it round him. He loved him again—as much as ever—more tenderly than before. But—he was a churchman. The church must be protected at all costs. He saw this just as clearly as Walton did, and he believed it just as fervently. Therefore on the succeeding night, which was Thursday, he called the elders together.

Without giving them any reason except the minister's imploring demand, Fawcett presented the resignation of Robert N. Walton to their astounded eyes; and such was the power of his appeal, such was the measure of their faith in him, such was their love for their pastor that they bowed to his communicated wish. They became responsible to the congregation for the acceptance of its pastor's resignation—a quite irregular procedure. Having done which, they sat or stood or stared, stunned and wondering.

Yet their confidence in Walton was still unimpaired. George Fawcett, seeing this, knowing it would comfort the anxious heart of the man, was careful to tell him of it when he made him acquainted that same night with the result of his efforts with the elders. The minister thanked him gratefully but did not invite him to remain. George, heavy in spirit, went out as from a house of mourning and Walton dropped in his Morris chair, in that study which had become his Gethsemane; the woman was crouched upon a hassock by his side, holding tight to his hand. At length he heaved a deep-drawn sign, freighted with a soul's long weariness.

"This is the last church, mama," he mourned. "I—I can't ever go through it again."

"No," agreed the little woman sadly, who had so long been harried with him from field to field. "No—you mustn't ever." She stroked his hand, gazing up into his unseeing face, noting how broken he looked this time—so much more broken than ever before. It was the long strain, she told herself; these fruitful fifties of his were to be also his failing fifties.

Just then came a ring upon the telephone. The hour was nearly midnight. That ring meant a sick call—a deathbed call, perhaps; and Robert N. Walton never refused himself to the sick; yet the days of his pastoring were at an end and he could not bring himself to answer. But the jangling persisted.

Now it should be explained that the minister had another personal friendship in this flourishing city of E——that was as close, as intimate in all respects as that with Elder George Fawcett; yet in its essence different, for Moses Mullen was an essentially different man. Mose Mullen he called himself; and so did most other people. Moses was not a member of the official board of Walton's church, although that dignity had been offered him. For Mose was sui generis—and inclined to go it alone. Perhaps his reputed three or four millions made him dictatorial. Anyhow, he had a resistless way with him, once he got started, and a marvelous command of biting and picturesque language once he set out to command language at all.

Besides, Mose was known to have had a past—a hell-roaring past if rumor might be believed—and sometimes it can. He had roamed the world around. He had roped cows and punched steers; he had navvied in many ports; he had played a year or two in professional baseball and sat in at more poker games than there are verses in the Bible.

But eventually he had graduated himself into the business game, and being by temperament a gambler, found his way into the Chicago wheat pit, there to attract the attention of Frank Norris at the very moment when he was gathering material for his second great epic of the wheat. Struck at once with the picturesque force and charm of Mose—young Mose then—the California author transplanted him in all but name to the pages of his immortal story, and there you may find him in the broker sent to execute that series of startling and eventually disastrous orders with which the dénouement of the tale is brought about.

But Mose wasn't on 'change now. He was chastened a great deal, cured from the eccentricities and errata of youth; but he had still the instinctive independencies of the Southern-born. His grandfather had been a great breeder of race horses; his father had been selected by General Lee to rule with stern hand over Quantrell's famous undisciplined band; and Mose was himself now a sort of guerilla—even about things in the church. True, he loved the church—this church which had received him a penitent into its arms when he was a liability even to himself, and carried him along till now he was an asset to church and community. But—he was a bushwhacker Christian—fighting the Devil according to tactics of his own devising. Yet he had always been devout. Even in his gambling days, many was the time he had fervently prayed for another ace in the draw, and religiously had he sent his winnings home to his God-fearing parents, scrupling only to tell them that they were winnings and not earnings.

Yes—Mose had seen the seamy side of life and lived some of it; the seams were still visible upon his face. Serene in the consciousness of his fundamental rectitude, he lifted himself above resenting the brethren who couldn't understand him. He understood them and that was enough. His heart was full of charity; but this did not blur his almost uncanny powers of discernment.

"This is the last church, mama," he mourned "I—I can't ever go through it again."

The first time he met Robert N. Walton, he put him on probation as it were; as if he recognized in him an unusual man, but—with something doubtful about him.

"I'm going to watch you for a year," he said bluntly.

"Fair enough," agreed Walton, accepting the challenge. "I've heard enough to know that you'll bear watching yourself."

Both men laughed.

"So good so far!" announced Mose at the end of that twelve months. "I'm going to watch you another year."

"It isn't often a church gets a chance to do a great big Christian thing," Mose told

At the end of that second year, he said, "Walton, I want you to join my lodge." That was Mose Mullen's supreme compliment to any man; and the joining of that Masonic lodge became later almost as significant as this striking hands between two men who had seen far down into the open craters of human passion.

Now it had happened that Mose was away on a fishing trip on the day when Robert Walton received that disturbing letter from the zealot of the Bible class; therefore still away when the minister got home at two o'clock in the morning from the long ride with the elder in which his resignation had been agreed upon; and nobody could have been gladder of this than Walton himself, for it would have been bitter hard, this parting from the rough old walrus of a Mullen, who loved him with a love that went clear down into the taproots of his being. Accordingly the minister had put his farewell into a short, poignant note, breathing affection and communicating the startling fact that he had resigned and would be gone before his friend returned to the city.

But fate—or was it Providence?—brought Mose Mullen home from his fishing four days earlier than he had expected; and though it was late at night, some "hunch" that would not be denied drove him immediately to his office. There he found an envelope marked "Private and Strictly Confidential." He tore it open, read it with a picturesque exclamation, literary rather than profane, and reached for the telephone.

It was Mullen's ring that Walton had been sitting for some seconds afraid to answer; but at last he got up courage to take the receiver from the hook.

"That you, Bob?" came over the phone.

"Yes," answered Walton, recognizing the voice at once.

"Well, what in blazes do you mean?" blustered Mose, in his biggest roaring voice.

"Just that—that——" faltered Walton, heart melted by this boisterous friendliness in which surprise, reproach and grief were mingled in equal parts. "Just that——" But his voice broke. He could not talk.

"Wait up, Bob! I'm coming there fast!" bellowed Mose, sensing a tragic situation; and as quick as twelve cylinders could bring him, he was there.

The woman admitted him, cried upon his arm a little while his big hand patted her brown head, then pointed silently to the study door where Robert waited, covered with shame, to face one of the finest, truest friends a man ever had. And he did face him and he told his story again, as frankly, as mercilessly to himself, only more coherently perhaps, than he had told it to Fawcett; but Mose Mullen was far less shocked than the elder had been. He was hurt; he was astounded, and a good deal indignant; he looked Robert N. Walton through with such a glance as had never shaken him before. But he understood more easily than Fawcett; for he knew better the wild horses that are in man.

He could understand how Robert N. Walton, a very intense sort of fellow in all that he did, had been for some days in his life just a weak, flabby sinner; and he knew out of his wide experience that there is no man who has not his weak and flabby moments and that lucky are they who do not in them commit some such sin as manacles them for life. Lucky, that's all, lucky; God, he believed, caring no more for them who have been saved from sin by cowardice or chance than for those who by that same chance are snared.

them. "You've got it now. God has forgiven this man. Can't this church forgive him?"

Mose was much less horrified by Walton's confession than Walton was horrified by himself. Fawcett and the minister, when they looked at this blighted career, felt concern first for the church. Mose felt concern first for his friend. Of course there was this difference between Fawcett and Mullen: the elder had grown up in the church, got his religion from the church, and he thought of it as the nourishing mother of the Christian spirit; while Mose had got his religion at a human mother's knee. Christianity wasn't a thing of institutions with him; it was just spirit, a spirit of forgiveness, of saving, of helping. He looked across at the pitiably dejected figure of Robert N. Walton and he thought: "If Christianity is any good it ought to save this man." And for Mose to think a thing was to begin at once to act it.

"Mrs. Walton!" he called out in that large voice of his. "Come in here!"

She came—quickly, revealing that she had been listening at the door, quite as he divined.

"Mrs. Walton, have you got any sand in your craw? Are you a fighter or a runner?" Mose demanded abruptly.

The brown-eyed woman stood, halted by the seeming import of those words, scanning the broad face of the man, broad and hard, yet somehow mellow; for though Mullen's forms of speech were at times uncouth, there was in him a tenderness like the tenderness of a woman.

"You've been running away from this for years! Are you willing to stay here and make a fight?" he proposed bluntly.

Robert N. Walton himself was staring. Was the man meaning—meaning that they should face it down? Face open denunciation? He was actually amazed that his wife weighed her answer to Mullen's question; but she did weigh it; for she had been harried until the worm in her was about to turn. She was rebellious that this great work which God had wrought through her husband should be broken off, wrecked or even impaired because of a sin they two had committed in the hot blood of a youth that was now pitifully departed from both of them. She fixed her wide, wistful eyes upon this rugged friend with a sudden crystallization of her rebellion into faith.

"Yes," she answered hoarsely. "Yes, Mr. Mullen; I am."

"Hear that, Bob!" commanded Mose triumphantly, his voice ringing out, for he couldn't help ringing out when he was in deadly earnest. "Hear the little woman! She's going to stand by you and fight. So am I. God A'mighty hates a coward, Bob. He sure does hate a runner."

But protest was in Walton's face; horror was rising into it. "But the church must not be brought into——"

"Bob!" Mullen broke in solemnly, "it's very seldom a church gets a chance to practice—really practice the Christian religion. This church is about to get it. The elders are going to squelch that resignation."

"No, no!" groaned Walton. "I've gone through this agony for the last time. No; I must go away."

"You'll not go away!" thundered Mose. "But you're right, Bob, you've gone through this for the last time; because now we're going to tell those elders the truth."

"The truth?" inquired Walton, in a ghastly whisper. "The truth?"

"You must tell the elders tomorrow night!" declared Mose, inexorable.

(Continued on page 144)

Stories That Have Made Me LAUGH

IN AMERICA and England it is customary for comic papers to run at intervals paragraphs headed "English as She Is Spoke," being a form of humor derived from the attempt of some poor foreigner during a moment of excitement to speak the English language. Here in Mexico City some of the heartiest laughs that taxi drivers and waiters have enjoyed in years are elicited by the attempts of a miserable American writer to make his wants known in the Spanish language.

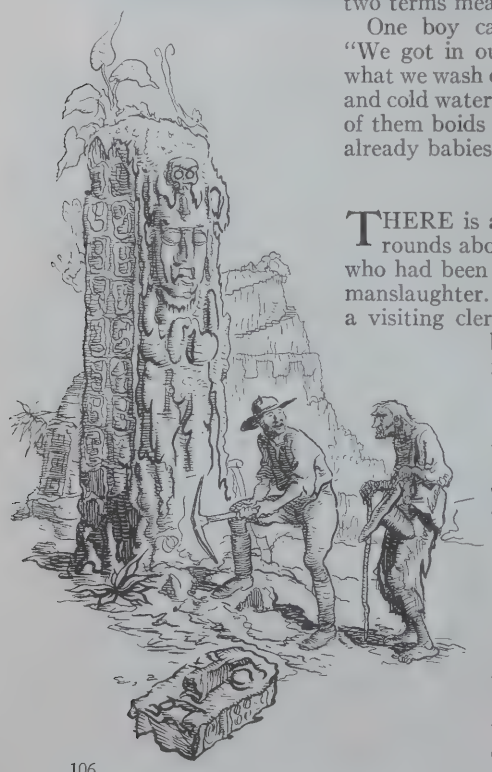
In retaliation therefor, let me say that there was a Spaniard in London who was heard to say to a cabman:

"If I did know ze English for ze box, I would blow your nose, by damn, I am."

There was also a waiter in an English restaurant professing to be Swiss who repaired to the kitchen with an order for a plate of chicken and tongue. He came back to the customer and shrugged his shoulders helplessly.

"Tongue iss no more," he announced. "Schicken never vas."

Lastly, another waiter in an English hotel was accustomed to address the guests at breakfast somewhat in the following fashion:



"How you like your eggs boilt? Tight or loose?"

DURING the recent business depression two cloak and suit merchants met on the street.

"Hello, Ben," one said to the other. "How's business you darned liar."

A DOCTOR told me this one. He said he found it in the Journal of the American Medical Association. The children of an East Side school were being instructed in the difference between a cynic and a stoic. Before proceeding with the lesson, the teacher asked her class of little boys what they thought the two terms meant.

One boy called Louis said: "We got in our rooms a cynic what we wash dishes in it by hot and cold water, but a stoic is one of them boids which they bring already babies."

THERE is a story going the rounds about a colored man who had been put in prison for manslaughter. When asked by a visiting clergyman if he had been sentenced for life, he replied:

"No, suh, not for life. Jes' from now on."

This story may or may not be derived from a volume which I ran across in a book store on the Avenida Francisco I. Madero, in Mexico City, where this is being written. It was called "Mexican Life and Character" or some such title and tells about a peon in Coyoacan who was present at the excavation of some Toltec or Aztec remains. He was an extremely old man, and some of the other peons present thought that the relics must have been buried there within his recollection.

"They were not buried in my time," he said.

"And you have lived here all your life?" the excavator asked.

"No, caballero, not all my life," the old peon replied. "Only up to now."

NO DOUBT you have seen pictures of mountain climbers scaling the Alps with alpenstocks in their hands. Sometimes a party of six or seven will be roped together so that if one of them slips the others will dig in with their alpenstocks, and altogether the whole thing is done in an out-of-date fashion—not at all in the manner of California mountain climbing.

In California, people climb mountains in parties of six or seven roped together in flivvers or sometimes not roped together but just tucked in so snugly that they cannot possibly fall out. In fact they can't even breathe, except in turns. My friend Doctor A. R. Goodman of Mexico City says that during a recent stay in California he heard of at least three thousand hardy California mountain climbers ascending the summit of Mount Wilson in this fashion on one Sunday alone.

There was one still hardier mountain climber who made his ascent on that particular Sunday in a limousine. He did it in the afternoon and met all the other climbers flushed with success on their way down from the summit. Now the Mount Wilson toll road is just wide enough for one car when driven by a courageous driver, and not wide enough for me by about six feet or on a bet of a million dollars. At intervals of a quarter of a mile or so there are turn-outs, and the rule of the road is that if two cars meet the ascending car must back down to the nearest turn-out.

The limousine mountain climber had backed down to the nearest turn-out ten times for ten flivvers and after completing his tenth back-down he had proceeded to within a hundred feet of the next turn-out when he rounded a curve in the road and encountered his eleventh flivver. They stopped radiator to radiator, and the limousine mountain climber alighted from his car.

"Stranger," he said to the driver of the flivver, "how much will you take for that car of yours?"

"Why, this is a new flivver!" the stranger said.

"I don't give a whoop," the mountain climber retorted. "How much do you want for it?"

"I'll take five hundred dollars," the flivver owner said, "and not a cent less."

"Well," the limousine man said, pulling a bill fold from his

By MONTAGUE GLASS

Illustrations by Gordon Ross

breast pocket and counting out five one hundred dollar bills, "if there's any keepsakes in that car you don't want to have go down the side of this here mountain, I'll give you sixty seconds to take them out."

HERE is another story which has recently been revived and has also been pinned on after-dinner speakers and any other Reformer who works for his audience's kind applause. It was told first about Arthur Lloyd and one Vance, both of them well known music hall artists.

"Shocking thing about poor old Vance!" Arthur Lloyd said one day back in 1880. "They hissed him frightfully last night. I went on immediately afterwards and quieted them down with a couple of songs. But when I finished, blest if they didn't start in to hiss old Vance all over again."

Koppel may or may not have been reading Professor Sumner's "Folkways," which cites examples of stone hammers hanging behind church doors in mediæval Scandinavia to be used for the humane purpose of keeping grandpa out of the Bergen Home for Aged and Infirm Scandinavians.

It is doubtful whether Koppel will mourn the untimely end of his poor father as did the old countryman cited by the London Morning Post.

"Ah!" he said sadly, somewhat muddled by conventional grief and the beer he was sipping. "I just come from burying my poor old feyther; he were ninety-five, he were. I be only seventy-four last Christmas. We don't live to them old ages nowadays."

A BANKER in a Southern city writes me that he holds a mortgage on a small farm in a remote part of his state. The interest had been in arrears for nearly three years, and the other day he was much gratified to receive a visit from the owner of the farm, who handed him not only the entire interest to date but the principal as well.

"Things must be looking up for you," the banker said.

"Tolerable," the farmer replied.

"How is it that you were able to raise all this money?" the banker inquired.

"Well, it's like this," the farmer said. "For several years I planted my land to cotton and it didn't make out so good, but this last year I planted the whole durned place to corn."

"And did you do well?" the banker asked.

"Better than I expected," the farmer answered. "I got about six gallons to the acre."

A NEW YORK theatrical manager was contemplating the purchase of a Chicago theater and took his consulting architect with him to look over the auditorium. They were standing in the rear of the orchestra seats during a performance when the architect nudged the manager.

"The acoustics of this place seem very bad, Jake," the architect said.

The manager sniffed vigorously once or twice. "Maybe I've got a cold or something," he said, "but I don't notice it."

THERE is an old story about a colored man on trial for burglary who was asked if he would like to have counsel assigned to him for his defense. On inquiring as to what all that miscellaneous language meant, he was told that the court proposed to assign him a lawyer to get him off.

"And whaffo' is all dem gen'lmen ovah dar?" he asked, pointing to some talesmen sitting in the enclosure for counsel.

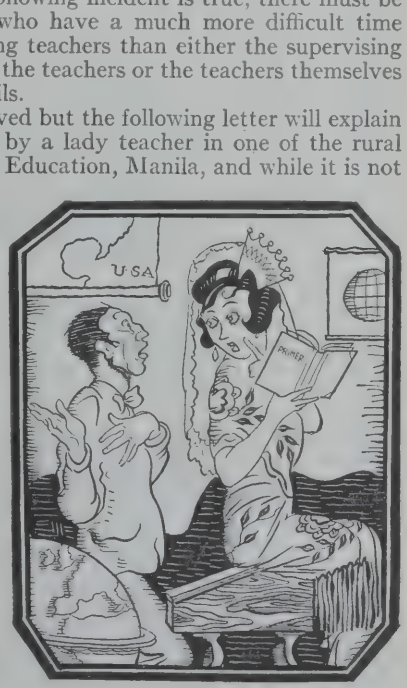
"They're jurymen," he was told.

"An' kin dey git me off?" he asked.

"Well, I suppose they can," he was told by the clerk.

"Den Ah reckon Ah'll take a juryman," he replied. And this is only preliminary to the story of another colored man. He was assigned as his joint counsel two young lawyers who had recently gone into partnership in a Southern town. The colored defendant consulted with these inexperienced attorneys for some time, and every minute or so the word alibi could be heard by the judge.

At last the defendant rose and addressed the court.



"Jedge, Yo' Honah!" he said. "Ef it's all de same to you all, Ah'd sho like to trade one of dese hyuh lawyers fo' a witness."

THE San Antonio Express recently contained a news item which said that Koppel Light, a fish peddler, was sentenced to jail for failing to pay two dollars a week towards the support of his 106 year old father, Reuben Light.

"Koppel's ingratitude," his sister told the court, "has broken his father's heart. He will not live long."

PUBLIC education in the Philippine Islands has now reached a stage of organization where the greatest efficiency prevails—at least in the matter of organization, if not in education. There are teachers to teach the children, supervising teachers to teach the teachers, and if the following incident is true, there must be supervising supervisors, who have a much more difficult time supervising the supervising teachers than either the supervising teachers have in teaching the teachers or the teachers themselves have in teaching the pupils.

This sounds a bit involved but the following letter will explain everything. It was sent by a lady teacher in one of the rural schools to the Director of Education, Manila, and while it is not offered as a form to be followed by any lady teacher of these United States who may at some time find herself in similar circumstances, it is recommended as vividly yet simply conveying what it sets out to convey:

DEAR SIR:

I have the honor to resignate as my works are many and my salary are few. Besides which my supervising teacher makes many lovings to me to which I only reply, "Oh, not, Oh, not."

Very respectfully,

Josefina Villareal

His Past

(Continued from page 71)

a semi-organization called "Men whom Rose Bellamy won't marry" did not deter Henry Staggard. The more difficult the battle the greater the victory.

She was ice, but he knew the fire that burned beneath the ice. Carefully, he studied her. He analyzed the men who, if gossip could be trusted at all, had wooed and failed to win her. Every last one of them had inherited his wealth and his position. Could it be that she had entered her twenty-eighth year, still a belle, but unwed because she asked of her future husband something of that iron strain that these men whom she met in her everyday life might seem to lack?

Staggard had succeeded because he had traded upon the weaknesses of human nature. Knowledge of weakness gives one knowledge of strength. He believed that he had learned the method whereby Rose Bellamy could be won.

She was secretary, he learned, of a society whose purpose was the Americanization of the foreigner. He sent her a check for twenty thousand dollars, to further the society's aims. He knew, he wrote, what the right sort of work could do for the immigrant. He himself had been turned adrift at the tender age of nine; he had fought for education, fought for success . . .

He was invited to address the society. He was a good looking chap, and his forty years sat lightly upon his broad shoulders. He had the trick of looking one directly in the eye, of gripping one's hand firmly, of affecting an open generosity.

At the society's meeting he was as frank, apparently, as a child. He'd had a hard time; he'd struggled, slaved! He'd won out. No, he'd be honest—he hadn't won out. The things that belonged to men who had been born in gentle homes could never be his. He knew it; he wouldn't be weak enough to delude himself with the idea that he could measure up with born gentlemen. But he'd made, he could safely say, a good job with poor materials. And what he'd done any foreigner, anybody, could do, provided he had ambition and were willing to work. And after all, he asked ingenuously, why should a man aspire to heights beyond him?

"But," said Rose Bellamy to him later, "I think it's ridiculous the way you disparage yourself. Because you were not the son of wealthy parents——"

"That is kind of you," he told her. "But the thing that I would want must be denied to me."

She wanted to know what he wanted. She was his champion without realizing it. And so from an invitation to tea he progressed to an invitation to dinner. She came to understand what it was that he wanted—herself.

She was not in love with him. But there was a glamour about his achievements. His modesty, his unwillingness to push himself—why, these were the attributes of gentility, of a gentleman, the thing which he thought that he was not.

A woman of Staggard's own stamp would have known him for what he was, an unscrupulous adventurer. Confidence men would have read him at sight. But a woman like Rose Bellamy never had a chance with him. She believed him. And so today he knew that, whether or not she really loved, it would not be difficult to persuade her that she did. And so he beamed. There was no warmth in the beam; it was cold as the winter sun.

Ah, well, this afternoon he'd propose, be accepted—he was sure of that; Rose Bellamy was intrigued with the things that she might make of this self-made—thus far—man from the West.

His secretary interrupted his pleasant dreams. "Mr. Blaney to see you."

"Show him in," said Staggard curtly.

Blaney entered. A stoop-shouldered man, with furtive eyes that watered easily behind thick glasses, his face wore a defiant expression now. He waited until the secretary had vanished behind the softly closed door. Then he spoke.

"If this is a trick, Staggard——"

Staggard waved him to a seat. "Why should I trick you?" he asked.

"Once a thief, always a thief," quoted his visitor.

Staggard did not become angry. No red showed in his cheeks. His easy acceptance of the insult proved his dishonesty. "Have a cigar?" he invited.

The watery eyed man shook his head. "I want the money," he said harshly.

Staggard opened a drawer in his desk. He drew out an envelope. He tossed it to his visitor. "Count it," he advised.

Blaney fingered the envelope a moment. He glanced over his shoulder as though he were afraid. Then his air of defiance came back to him. He opened the envelope, withdrawing from it packages of currency, each package neatly bound in tape upon which was printed the amount within.

"Fifty thousand," he said at length.

"Exactly what I agreed, Now—give me what I want," demanded Staggard.

Slowly the other unbuttoned his coat. From an inner pocket he produced an envelope. He handed it to Staggard.

For a moment the room turned upside down for Staggard. This was his past. Ah, how many persons were ever privileged to hold their pasts in their hands, to do with as they willed, to destroy, wipe out, obliterate? And he could do that. He looked through the papers inside. There was the evidence of his crime of years ago; there was his own confession . . . How cheaply, all things considered, he had managed to purchase them from the lawyer who held them. Now he could do as he willed. Blaney had surrendered the things that prevented Staggard from entering into his own. He could enter into it now.

The shabby lawyer arose. He fumbled for words. He found "Much obliged."

Staggard smiled. "Same to you, Blaney. Hope this money will help you to a better place."

He, the crook, suddenly patronized the lawyer who alone had held evidence of his crookedness. Blaney flushed. It had taken months of negotiation before he had surrendered his decency, had taken hush money. Now he realized that he was as low as Staggard. He shuffled from the room.

"Every last one of them—they have their price," grinned Staggard. He need fear no exposure; he could go to Rose Bellamy . . . Ah! He reached for the telephone.

"Miss Bellamy?" he asked a moment later. "This is Henry—Staggard." He paused after uttering his first name; then courage failed him. To go slow, until the psychological moment, and then to sweep her off her feet; that was the way. So he gave his full name.

"Good afternoon," she said.

"It will be a good afternoon if you are to be at home," he told her.

She laughed. Another man would have thrilled at the low delicious tones. But not Staggard. Although by every right that the possession of beauty, breeding and charm conveys, she was entitled to give any man a thrill, she could not do that to Staggard. No one could. He was that sort. He'd marry her and get along with her, but—he was of the commonest, meanest clay; his kind could not appreciate a Rose Bellamy.

"That's a pretty speech. I couldn't very well refuse now. At tea?"

"If I may," he said.

And so it was agreed. Once again he dreamed. He saw himself received in all those mansions whose occupants ignored him now. Political place, too, he would dare accept now . . . He roused himself, rang for his secretary, gave some business orders and left the office.

His car was awaiting him. The quiet, polite chauffeur did his share in contributing toward the sense of well-being that possessed Staggard. How pleasant it was to roll luxuriously uptown while millions hung on to subway straps . . . On the Avenue, slightly above Forty-second Street, he stopped. He entered a florist's shop and selected long-stemmed roses, two dozen of them. They would arrive, the florist assured him, at Miss Bellamy's address within twenty minutes. That suited Staggard; his entrance would follow just soon enough upon the flowers.

It was a brisk day of early spring, Octoberish in the air's tang. His Japanese servant had lighted a fire in the living room, huge for an apartment in New York. Staggard warmed his hands before the open blaze. Then he withdrew from his overcoat pocket the fateful documents that he had this day purchased.

When first he had opened negotiations with Blaney looking to the recovery of the papers, he had thought, of course, that once they were in his hand he would destroy them instantly. But burning paper in his office would look queer to his staff. "Looking queer" was something that, with his desire for respectability, nowadays mattered a lot to Staggard. So he had decided to burn them at home. But now, looking at them, he could not bear to relinquish the thrill that handling them gave him.

The small boy undoes the bandage about his thumb and presses against the cut; he knows that it will hurt, but still . . . So Staggard read, reread and fumbled these documents. Their destruction should be a matter of formality; when one obliterates one's past one should pay the action the tribute of a ceremonial.

SOUP MAKES THE WHOLE MEAL TASTE BETTER

When you should eat vegetable soup!

Really good vegetable soup is a splendidly filling and hearty dish. It appeals most when you are more than usually hungry. After a good day's work, following vigorous exercise in the open air, or at the midday meal it is both nourishing and stimulating.

Campbell's Vegetable Soup is real food, tempting to the appetite and rich with sustaining, healthful nourishment.

Fifteen fresh garden vegetables. Big barley grains. Alphabet macaroni. Broth of choice beef. Tasty herbs and seasoning. Thirty-two different ingredients combine to make Campbell's Vegetable as wholesome and satisfying a soup as you can place on your table.

21 kinds 12 cents a can

My game of golf is something classy
I wield a fearsome, wicked brassy
And when I've laid them all a stymie
Straight home to Campbell's Soup I hie me!

Campbell's Soups

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

Later this evening he would sit down before the fire, tear each paper slowly across and across again—feed them, bit by bit, to the flames . . . He put them back into his coat pocket. He hung the coat in the closet off the hall. Then he went to his bedroom, where his servant was now laying out some clothes.

He changed from his office suit, not to don anything approaching afternoon formality—that would not be within the scope of the part of rugged self-made man which he had planned for himself—but into garments not creased by sitting before a desk. He selected his tie carefully; he admired himself cordially in the mirror. Then, in the hall, he stopped, reached into the closet and brought forth his overcoat. He put his hand in the inside pocket to take out the papers that he had bought from Blaney. But his hand came back empty. It was better to have them with him. It wasn't particularly safe to leave them around the flat.

Besides, it rather intrigued him, the thought of proposing to Rose Bellamy, winning her because of his rugged honesty, while a few feet from her would repose evidence of a guilt that would make her shrink from him. He grinned at the thought. Marriage was to him no sacrament; it was a means whereby ambition could be gratified.

So he put on the coat, descended in the elevator to the street floor and stepped again into the waiting limousine. Ten minutes later he was admitted to the Bellamy home. It was a pleasant home, an old-fashioned brown-stone house in the Murray Hill section. It was dignified; he thought that he preferred it to a house farther uptown on the Avenue.

The manservant held out his hands for Staggard's hat and coat. The visitor remembered. He thrust his hand into the coat pocket and transferred several envelopes to the inner pocket of his jacket. Then he entered the drawing room.

Many men had loved Rose Bellamy. None of them characterized her as a flirt. She was not that sort. They believed her when she told them all, regretfully, that she did not love them.

Of late she had begun to wonder what love was, if it perhaps could exist without one's knowing it. She was drawn strongly to Staggard. He had achieved. By his own strength of character, not by some inheritance of millions, he was winning a place for himself. That was the sort of man she admired. She wondered if her admiration really amounted to love. There was another man, and for him she felt a feeling that was different from that which Staggard inspired. She trembled when young Allen was near her.

Yet Allen had never done anything. He was a gentleman and that was all. That all was not enough—for her.

Well, she would soon know. For, being a woman, she knew that Staggard would speak when she gave him opportunity. She was giving it to him today.

"Aren't you," she asked, "neglecting business? Afternoon tea is for idlers, not men of affairs."

He sat down, deliberately, as he did all things. She was giving him, he knew, an opening. He took it.

"My business, Miss Bellamy, is you," he told her.

Well, she was face to face with it. She could look the other way, or meet the issue. She didn't love him, but—she respected him, was fascinated by him, felt that love might come. So she said:

"I don't think I understand."

"I love you," he told her. Oh, he'd planned it carefully, and he had decided to dispense with rhetoric! Simply, as became the rugged, honest, self-made man. "And I want you to marry me," he said.

She was silent a moment. "I don't think that I love you," she finally said.

He smiled, a humble sort of smile. "Of course you don't. I wouldn't expect that. But in time—perhaps——"

He stopped; he waited for her to speak. Uncertainly, her voice the least bit shaky, she said: "I—I cannot be sure. I respect you—tremendously. Of all the men I've ever met, it seems to me that you are the most honest. And honesty, I think, is the greatest thing in the world."

Inwardly he smiled. It pleased his sense of chicane, of underhandedness, this praise of his honesty, when all the time he had upon his person the evidence that would damn him to anyone.

"You are too kind," he told her. "I—I do try—oh, Miss Bellamy—Rose—please——"

"I will marry you," she said.

A second later she was in his arms; a second after that she knew that she did not love him. There had been another man, and only yesterday, because he had achieved nothing particularly in life, she had sent him away. He had been a gentleman, charming but—without achievement. Now, as Staggard's lips touched her own, she knew that she loved the other man.

But honesty, keeping one's word—these were the only things that mattered. Rose Bellamy was that sort.

And so twenty minutes later, when she had dismissed Staggard, she went weeping upstairs to her bedroom while Staggard went swaggering, smilingly, toward his car. He had succeeded. She loved him; anyway, she'd marry him; love meant nothing to him, even the possible love of so adorable a creature as Rose Bellamy.

Inside the car he patted his breast pocket, within which reposed the confession and the other papers. When he reached home, having achieved the final ambition of his life, he'd hold a party . . . He took the envelopes out of his pocket. The one he sought was not among them. Then he felt in his overcoat pocket, from which he had transferred them when the Bellamy servant had taken his coat.

The confession was not there. His somewhat highly colored face went dead white. Ass! Fool! When he'd transferred them he'd dropped them . . . By now, undoubtedly, the butler had handed them to Rose Bellamy. The envelope had not been sealed . . . She'd read the papers!

Harshly he spoke through the tube to the chauffeur. Ten minutes after he'd left her drawing room he was speaking to Rose Bellamy again. He'd made no mistake. Look at the traces of tears on her cheeks, her eyes a bit swollen, red. She'd learned what he was. But there was a chance. A profession of utter frankness, of love having awakened him to the final knowledge that honesty was above all . . .

"Rose, I had to come back to you," he said. "I've deceived you. Fifteen years ago I was a thief; I stole. I saved myself by confession. I've never done a dishonest thing since."

She stared at him. "A thief?"

He bowed his head. "Yes," he said humbly. "And I release you from your promise to marry me."

That was the final stroke. She knew all about him anyway; no woman on earth would have failed to read the contents of that envelope. By pretending that his conscience forced his confession to her he'd discount all the revulsion toward him that the reading must have aroused in her. And then he heard the words of his doom. For him no place in the social sun!

"I thank you for your release, Mr. Staggard. I—I am sorry, dreadfully sorry, but——"

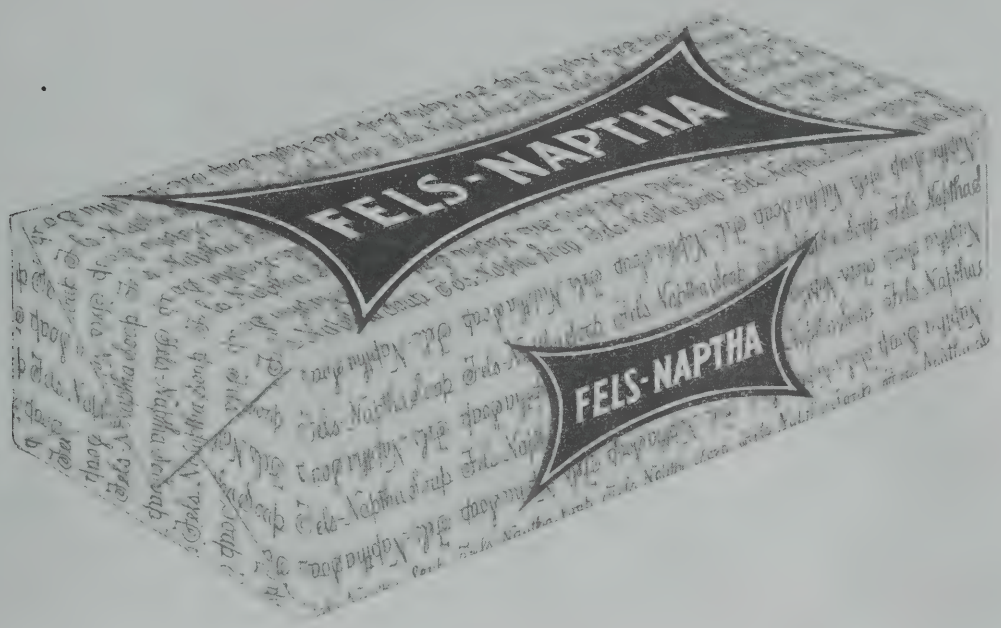
He never remembered what else she said. He vaguely knew that it was gentle, pitiful. But he wanted to strike her, to crush her slim throat between his two hard hands. He'd have done it, too, but for the fact that her menservants were doubtless within hearing. And so he left her.

So consumed with anger was he that he forgot the envelope, forgot everything save the fact that, while he might make money, the things he wanted would be forever denied to him. For he recognized the soul of Rose Bellamy. If he announced an engagement to one of her friends—and only among her friends could he find what he wanted, needed—she would insist that he tell his past . . . Rigid, uncompromising . . .

The Jap servant let him into his apartment. He flung himself before the open fire, staring gloomily, hatefully, into the flames.

The servant came to him. "Here is an envelope, sir. I found it as I was about to press your coat. In the pocket."

Wild-eyed, Staggard stared at the envelope that held his confession.



He realized what he had done. This second coat was the one he had worn to call upon Rose Bellamy. The first one was the one that he had worn from the office. He cursed the habit that made him, in fall or spring, affect always the same sort of coat. The two were almost identical. Envelopes with papers were always in his pockets. He had not examined them when he had transferred them to his jacket in the Bellamy home. And all the time, when he had thought that she had read the proofs of his guilt, those proofs were at home in another coat!

If he hadn't confessed . . . Why, when he had worn a coat, did he keep it? And why, oh why, had he assumed that Rose Bellamy had read papers that did not belong to her?

Suddenly he knew that she would have died before prying into a matter that did not concern her. He was seeing things a bit more clearly than ever in his life before. Of course she'd never have stopped to read his private papers. But he'd assumed that she would . . . He strode to the open fire. Into it he hurled the evidence that he had bought today from Blaney.

But he knew what all men must, soon or late, know: neither flames nor water, craft nor cunning, man nor devil, can obliterate the past.

For the past is not written on pieces of paper that may be destroyed. It is written in the hearts of men.

The soap that radiates FELS-NAPTHA Cleanliness!

You can tell Fels-Naptha by its clean naptha odor

There is deeper cleanliness to clothes than you can see. A kind that goes below the surface, where dirt is routed from every thread.

Soap alone will not produce it. But you get it from real naptha, that amazing dirt-loosener, combined with good soap in the Fels-Naptha way.

Clothes sop up perspiration, and dirt sticks. Then they need the deep-down cleanliness of Fels-Naptha. The real naptha goes through every tiny thread, and silently, gently makes the dirt let go. The sudsy water flushes it away completely. A good rinse, and clothes are safely washed—sweet, and hygienically clean.

Fels-Naptha sends its Cleanliness also into the kitchen, the bathroom, and to every part of the house where there is dirt to be washed away and things to be made sanitary.

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha that gives you the benefit of both these two great cleaners at one time, and in one economical golden bar.

Get Fels-Naptha, and know the deeper Fels-Naptha Cleanliness.

Campers are enthusiastic Fels-Naptha users. Even with cold water it cuts grease from pans, it makes clothes thoroughly clean, and removes grit and grime from hands.

Buy Fels-Naptha in the convenient ten-bar carton. The original and genuine naptha soap, in the red-and-green wrapper.

PROVE the cleanliness of clothes washed with Fels-Naptha. Send 2c in stamps for a sample bar. Address Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia

FELS-NAPTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

© 1923, Fels & Co. Philadelphia

Jemima Made Over

(Continued from page 44)

it with exact and snug dimensions and McQuarg's eyes glittered into a smile.

"And now what?" asked Jemima.

He said: "I can keep the front under range——"

"Give me Barney's gun and I'll look out for the back," said Jemima. "When must I shoot?"

McQuarg lifted his voice.

"The man that comes six steps nearer any door or window in this house gets lead!" he announced.

There was no answer. In the dimness of their lair he saw Jemima smile. "That scared them, didn't it? I've always heard that a mob was easy scared."

"It's the devil to handle them, though," McQuarg admitted. "They ain't a mite reasonable. These fellers now don't keer so derned much for their money—unless they mean to get away with it before the sheriff calls. But they've got sore heads and they're half drunk and they're as dangerous as a locoed beast. They want to kill somethin'. I've seen queer things.

Two fellers, out'n out strangers to the parts they was travelin' through, and nice, quiet boys, got herded into a cabin up Montany way and besieged by a posse all day, shootin' and cursin', and they not allowed to come out and explain theirselves. The dern fool posse had got a notion they was some hoss thieves they was after. When the two chaps surrendered and agreed to git hung that evenin' and came out limpin' and bleedin' with their hands above their heads, why the besiegin' gang knowed right away they'd been barkin' up the wrong tree. And the rest of that twenty-four hours was just plain celebratin'. They was bound, you see, to treat them pore devils like kings . . .

"Well," Peter sighed sharply, "I hope that fool Barney boy is travelin'. If I hadn't betted on some of the old crowd that knows him, the sheriff or a number of real folks, bein' on the spot right soon after these hoboes, I'd hev told Barney to make his get-away."

While McQuarg talked, made loquacious by excitement, the two prisoners had posted themselves at convenient loopholes and were ready. There were several raucous summonses from without, something in the nature of a consultation and then a pattering of bullets. McQuarg laughed.

"Send out Barney and we won't hurt you!" they shouted.

No answer was required for this. They rushed simultaneously the front door and the back and Jemima, laughing with a catch in her breath, made her gun bark in unison with McQuarg's. She hit her man in the boot and hid her eyes. McQuarg unhatted his quarry. There were no more rushes. After that followed intermittent firing. At last a bullet found some chink and McQuarg, starting, cried out softly and put a hand against his shoulder.

"Sacred Maria!" cried Jemima loudly. "You're hit!"

An outburst of applause showed that the besieging party rejoiced in this information.

McQuarg took away his hand and laughed. "Jes' touched me!" he said as loudly as she had spoken; then he added, chuckling: "What you said must 'a' turned the bullet, Jem! Keep away from that side of the room."

In fact from outside there began to be a systematic search for that vulnerable spot, then presently, a second rush.

Peter groaned. "If we really hit any of 'em, Jem, our game is up. Aim for the ground. Why don't them sensible fellers hurry up and—come!"

Jemima bent her white, keen face to her loophole, flushed suddenly, dropped her gun and wailed: "It's Barney, Peter, it's Barney coming back. He's riding up behind them—O my God! My God!"

Barney had chosen the manner of his appearance with audacious cleverness. Anything advancing upon this pack, anything in flight from it, was inevitable prey, but this slim, amiable and laughing youngster, trotting confidingly from behind into their midst, wan-faced, indeed, and dusty, but clear-eyed and entirely sweet mannered, was like a contrary wind in a full sail.

"Say, boys," drawled Barney, dropping down among them and holding out a roll of bills, "I guess you've come after this. I knowed you were good friends to me and to that little schoolmarm wife of mine, so, since I was almighty anxious to get off an order for her birthday present, I borrowed your money. I knowed I had a cache with enough and some over to pay you back before noon today. Why, you sure ain't sore at me, are you?"

The aggrieved and astonished dropping of his voice was their undoing. One burst into a tremendous roar of mirth. Others succumbed to that contagion. The roll of bills was entrusted to the oldest man; thereafter they clapped Barney's shoulder, wished his wife a happy birthday, mounted their ponies and rode fast away, "to intercept the sheriff." Their raucous shouting and guffaws dropped into the stillness of the August plain.

Barney came slowly into the opened house. He closed the door, leaned against it, turned his back to Jemima and, dropping a contorted face into his bent arm, sobbed like a despairing boy.

"I always knowed," he choked, "that I couldn't keep your love. Now that I'm a drunkard and a coward—and a thief—I've lost you. Oh, my God, Jem, I hev lost you!"

Jemima turned him about with her two gentle, powder-scorched hands.

"Don't you ever be afraid of me like that again!" she cried in a sort of tender anguish. Then she shook him with her hands tightened on the edges of his coat, and began to cry. "I—I have been all shamed," she wept, "I don't feel good. I will never feel so good again. I'm all broken up inside. I'll have to be made over. Barney, teach me to forget my soul, to—to love you, with loyalty and courage and self-sacrifice—like Peter McQuarg—like dear Peter McQuarg!" She buried herself in her husband's arms, trembling down into the strength of him.

Peter, sitting where she could not see him and absently nursing his wounded arm, showed a face stern and happy, irradiated with a cold and shining joy, the joy of an evangelist, the joy of a successful reformer. And his lips unconsciously shaped themselves to a tune. McQuarg whistled in soft spiritual triumph:

> With Thy favored sheep, O, place me,
> Nor among the goats abase me,
> But to Thy right hand upraise me.
>
> Worthless are my prayers and sighing,
> Yet—good Lord, in grace complying
> Rescue me from fires undying.

Ellen's Luncheon

(Continued from page 29)

that he was sitting upon Flurry's old red sweater, and that his hat was revolving in his big hands, and that Lizzie-Kate was sweeping dexterously out of sight several small garments not usually displayed to bachelor eyes—unconscious in fact of all material and external matters, and desperately fumbling for the casual words and smiles that would save him from betraying his inner agitation.

"I don't know," Ellen said, enchantingly small and childish and sorry. "I've a good mind to walk over to Mrs. Callahan's and make the peace with her," she submitted, with a rising inflection.

"I'll—I'll walk with you," Clem began, clearing his throat and trembling like a man who sees a lode of gold shining in pebbly earth.

"Oh, I wouldn't take you out of your way for the world!" said Ellen considerately.

"I'm goin' that way anyway," Clem assured her.

It was sunset, June sunset, and the world was flooded with glory, and filled with men and women streaming home along the broken sidewalks, and windows flashing back the red light, and children squawking and running like scattering fowls. There were magnificent elms along the shabby street, elms rich in rustling leaves, and the ends of the irregular lanes lost themselves in gold haze—a haze charitably disguising into beauty even heaps of rusting old iron, and out-dated stables, and minor factories, and lumber piles.

The air was warm, moving and alive, but still sweet and scented with kitchen fires and cut grass and now and then a clean rift of bacon smoke. Everybody was out, murmuring and laughing and exchanging cheerful views of this punctual world. Men jaded from hot offices, and women jaded from hot kitchens, met at the bakery door, and the children whose small hands they held exchanged shy smiles.

"Ellen," said Mrs. Callahan dispassionately, from the stove, when Ellen and Clem

How do you picture the woman you would like to be? Do you think of her as a happy wife—a happy mother?

The Woman You would Like to Be—

How do you picture her? A happy wife—a happy mother—a great artist, or an accomplished woman of the world? In a hundred ways—it lies in your power to make yourself the woman you would like to be. Below you will read of one way—simple as it is, no girl can afford to neglect it.

Do you wish, more than anything else, to be beautiful? To have a face that charms and attracts the people about you?

Make up your mind, then, that you will have a beautiful skin; that you will not rest until you have made your skin absolutely clear, smooth, flawless.

For how can woman's face be lovely and attractive if her skin is disfigured by blackheads — by ugly little blemishes? if the pores are too large? if her nose is shiny with oil?

Any of these faults can be overcome

If you are troubled with any of these faults — begin, now, to overcome them. You can make your skin what you will, for each day it is changing; old skin dies and new takes its place. Give the new skin the special treatment it should have, and see how smooth and lovely you can keep it—how quickly the defects in it will disappear.

You will find the right treatment for your special type of skin in the booklet of famous skin treatments that is wrapped around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Complete treatments for all the commoner skin troubles are given in this booklet. Two of these famous treatments are reproduced below.

By using these Woodbury skin treatments regularly, thousands of girls and women have overcome the faults in their complexion and have gained the lovely clear, soft skin they longed for.

Get a cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap today, and begin, tonight, to give your skin the treatment that will make it fresh, radiant, flawless, as a beautiful woman's skin should be.

A 25-cent cake of Woodbury's lasts a month or six weeks for regular toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments. You can also get Woodbury's in convenient 3-cake boxes at any drug store or toilet goods counter.

Send today for this new 10-cent offer!

For 10 cents we will send you a miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations, containing week-end packages of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Cream, Facial Powder, together with the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

Send for this set today. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 1606 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio. If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 1606 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario. English agents: H. C. Quelch & Co., 4 Ludgate Square, London, E. C. 4.

FOR CONSPICUOUS NOSE PORES

To reduce conspicuous nose pores, use this special treatment:

Wring a soft cloth from very hot water, lather it with Woodbury's Facial Soap, then hold it to your face. When the heat has expanded the pores, rub in very gently a fresh lather of Woodbury's. Repeat this hot water and lather application several times, stopping at once if your nose feels sensitive. Then finish by rubbing the nose for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

BLACKHEADS ARE A CONFESSION

To keep your skin free from blackheads, use the following treatment:

Every night before retiring, apply hot cloths to your face until the skin is reddened. Then with a rough wash cloth work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and rub it into the pores thoroughly, always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with clear hot water, then with cold—the colder the better. If possible rub your face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

Copyright, 1923, by The Andrew Jergens Co.

reached her kitchen door. She slid a smoking pudding dish upon the wet boards of her sink, making one more scar upon the scarred wood.

"How do, Mis' Callahan," said Ellen.

She sat down; Clem remained silent. Annie Callahan Curley's baby looked up, solemn and hostile, from the mud-colored floor where his little romper gave a striking instance of protective coloring.

There was a silence. Then Ellen said: "Goodness—don't that pudding smell good!"

Mrs. Callahan glanced at it dispassionately, with no softening of her grave face.

"There's some likes home cooking," she observed.

Silence again. Ellen made a fresh start: "Here's the thing, Mis' Callahan," she said bravely. "I do want these girl friends of mine to have the best, you know, and yet I hate to ask you—with all you have to do—to come over to that hot kitchen of Lizzie-Kate's and fuss with that wonderful chicken of yours. I don't suppose I could learn to cook it?"

Mrs. Callahan looked unconcerned.

"Oh, you'll be able to find them lots of better things than that!" she said lightly and evenly, measuring baking powder into flour with a quick dexterous jerk of the opened tin. Mrs. Callahan scorned set measures for seasoning or shortening.

"What do you think?" Ellen, undaunted, pursued patiently. "Do you think it's bad for mama, cooking so much? You know her better than anyone else—I'll never forget what you did for her when papa died. The priest said mama might have died herself if it wasn't for Mrs. Callahan, Clem," Ellen assured her escort seriously. "Mrs. Callahan sent over chicken soup every day for a month—and that was every mouthful of food mama took. I guess the Callahans got pretty sick of chicken," said Ellen adroitly.

"I guess it didn't hurt them," Mrs. Callahan said grimly.

This was not much, but it was something. The girl was encouraged.

"Is it broilers you use in the creamed chicken, Mrs. Callahan?"

"They're best, of course."

"And do you fry them first?"

"Well, you can."

Silence. Then Ellen rose. "Well, I'll be going on. I want to see mama. I hate to have her slaving for my friends, but if you think it isn't too much for her——"

Mrs. Callahan yielded a reluctant inch. "I don't think it would do her no hurt."

Ellen and Clem departed.

"Ellen," said Mrs. Callahan, when they were on the kitchen porch. The girl turned back. "Maybe I'll get one of the kids to write out the creamed chicken for you tonight and send it over by Martin," said Mrs. Callahan, very busy with her biscuit dough. "Get in a quart of cream and some instant tapioca."

"And how many chickens ought I have?"

"Well——" Mrs. Callahan came to the door now, her expression once more its usual pleasant self and her eyes interested. "There'll be you and Lizzie-Kate and your mama and your four lady friends—seven of you——" she mused. "I'd get three—wait a minute. I'll get them for you, Ellen," promised Agnes Callahan wholeheartedly, "and then I'll step over Friday and get them started cooking. So don't concern yourself——"

"Well, then you'll be at the luncheon too?" cried Ellen loyally.

"I will not. You couldn't get me there under chloroform," the older woman assured her. They parted upon a friendly laugh.

So there were great friendliness and great doings in the Kane kitchen forty-eight hours later. The day began with scorching heat at dawn; it was a day of lowered awnings and wilted collars and parsimonious blots of hot shade in blazing streets.

But Ellen had foreseen this the day before, and had bought eight tall glasses and eight lemonade spoons in a department store, and her mother and sister had washed the straw and chaff and stuck tissue paper from them, and there was to be iced tea—lots of it. Mrs. Callahan and Mrs. Murphy arrived early, in time to direct Mart and Joe Kane in the enlarging of the table; everything was in encouraging shape as Ellen left the house for the office at ten minutes past eight.

Mrs. Murphy and Lizzie-Kate had humbly begged not to be present at the luncheon, preferring to remain invisible, and serve. But Ellen would not hear of this—she persisted that she only wanted a family meal, filling, delicious, unpretentious—just a convenience to friends who chanced to be passing that way, and in no sense a social overture of her own. Her mother and sister must of course share it. As for Mrs. Callahan, she flatly refused to do anything but come in and help.

Ellen and the ladies could not arrive before twenty-seven minutes past twelve. The wedding was a short car ride away, at half-past two. There would be but an hour and a half of strain, and to that Lizzie-Kate, with her hair crimped, and her mother, in her best black silk, felt equal.

At twelve all was in order. The baby was asleep. The ladies of the family were dressed. The table was set and the tea made and a bowl of chopped ice waiting. The chicken, the stuffed potatoes, the vegetables simmered, and were tasted and approved, and simmered again. The hot rolls were covered with a white napkin, the homemade strawberry ice cream with ice and salt and an old gunny sack sacred to this purpose, the maple nut marshmallow cake stood in magnificence and perfection upon a hand-painted plate that Loretta Keating had given Lizzie-Kate for a wedding present. Cascading uncomfortably upon the ice in the ice box were seven carefully arranged plates of lobster salad, and Lizzie-Kate went about saying mentally a hundred times: "Well, it's only a home lunch. This is all you get!"

The shades in the dining room were drawn, a glint of bright sunlight touched the dome of currant jelly, and the saltines, and the olives, and the green pickles, and the chow-chow with its ornate plated spoon from Niagara Falls, and the freesias delicately arranged with maidenhair, in the center of the table. At each place was a frilled paper cup of salted almonds, and what was always called the "Sheffield type bonbon" was neatly loaded with candy. Ellen, browsing idly over a fashionable magazine months ago, had come upon an illustration of the "Sheffield type bonbon" and had sent three dollars for it, and felt well satisfied. It certainly added a tone.

This half-hour of waiting was hard for the three matrons. They peeped, murmured, tasted, loitered about. Flurry had been sent to Kate Oliver, the baby slept on like a baby angel. Mrs. Callahan said she was only going to wait for one good look at the company.

At last the sound of girls' voices was heard under the heavy foliage of the elms, motionless in the hot spring noon, and then the chip-chipping of feet and the bang of the gate. The women in the kitchen fluttered, stirred, advanced, reconnoitered and retreated, finally went to meet their guests with a sort of surprised spontaneity—well, here they all were!

Miss Carter, who was lean and dyspeptic and eye-glassed, came first; then her sister, who was thin and had a bad skin; and last, plump, jolly Miss Brice. Miss Brice's friend, unfortunately, could not come. So that meant that one place must be spirited away from the table before the churning and twisting guests all were introduced and had laid aside silk coats and bags and had filed into the dining room.

Cream of tomato soup first; it was perfection. Mrs. Callahan decided to stay in the kitchen, at the last minute, and simplify serving and clearing. Ellen and Lizzie-Kate and their mother ate their soup; but Miss Brice would not take anything with cream in it, she was on a no-fat diet, and the Carters had to be careful of acids.

Then the marvelous chicken. And now it developed that the older Miss Carter was an out-and-out vegetarian; she was pleasant about it, taking some peas and just a taste of the mushrooms.

"I am not going to let you put that wonderful piece of chicken on my plate, Mrs. Murphy," said Miss Brice frankly, forking it back to the platter with a lack of ceremony that outraged the secret heart of her old hostess. "Nothing with gravy or starch."

"I feel the same way," murmured the younger Miss Carter, with a shy smile. "I'll tell you, Mrs. Murphy. You know how it is. I've been having what they call a duodenal infection—have you ever heard of that?"

"My God, no!" whispered Mrs. Murphy, awed, her stony gaze never leaving the speaker.

"They won't let me eat anything but gluten bread and stewed vegetables and fruit," pursued Miss Carter. "But I'm going on a perfect carouse today and have just a tiny bit of that wonderful looking chicken—no, just the wing, please—no, truly, no more, for I shall just waste it! And a tiny bit of gravy——"

"I simply have to diet," said Miss Brice. "I'm engaged to be married, you know, and my young man looks like a crane. He says he'll love me up to one hundred and fifty pounds, and not a pound over, and I'm one hundred and sixty-eight now. So I've cut myself down to three hundred calories a day—no, thanks, no bread. No, no jelly—looks delicious! If you could see me, standing outside of bakery windows with the tears running down my face, you'd feel for me. I don't eat gravies, sauces, starches, sweets, oils, fats or sugars——"

"At which meal don't ye?" Mrs. Murphy, shocked out of her affronted silence, asked in involuntary pity.

"At all! Never! Not at any!" Miss Brice said. "Take away those rolls, I

What ten million motor cars have taught women about their skin

The method they have learned to depend on

Two unbroken lines of cars wind along the popular motor roads. Everyone is motoring—week-ending at the beach, or the country club, or just driving for the pleasure of it. Fine dust settles in their skin and the wind brings a dry tightness.

Yet many women's complexions are younger and lovelier than ever before!

The severe exposure of motoring has taught them how important it is to find the right way to care for their skin, keep it beautiful and supple in spite of all exposure.

Today millions of women have found a method so wonderful in results that in all the world it is used more than any other—Pond's Two Creams. They leave your skin softer, more supple than you could have dreamed. They give just that finishing touch of loveliness you have always wanted.

A fine light cleansing that never leaves your face heavy with cream—gives the beautiful suppleness you want and then wipes entirely off! This is why millions of women prefer to cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream.

A marvelous freshening, an adding of youth—and unfailing protection. No wonder that the women of the United States alone use several millions of jars and tubes of Pond's Vanishing Cream every year!

TRY THIS FAMOUS METHOD

See the wonderful improvement in your skin

Do this tonight. With the finger tips apply Pond's Cold Cream freely. The very fine oil in it is able to penetrate every pore of your skin. Let it stay a minute—now wipe it off with a soft cloth. The black on the cloth will show you how carefully this cream cleanses. Your skin looks fresh and is beautifully supple.

Then, in the morning, smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream lightly over your whole face. If you wish, rouge—powder. How smooth and velvety your face feels! How new and charming the reflection in your mirror! The appearance of your skin for the whole day will prove to you how wonderful for your skin these two creams are.

Always after a motor or railroad trip, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream and finish with the Vanishing Cream and powder. To see how these two creams will improve your skin use this method regularly. Begin now by buying both creams in jars or tubes in any drug or department store. The Pond's Extract Co.

removes coarsening dirt—restores suppleness defies exposure—holds the powder

Photo by Victor Georg

Florence Nash says she likes Pond's Cold Cream because it leaves her face feeling so refreshed—not heavy and oily. And that Pond's Vanishing Cream really keeps her skin wonderfully smooth and fresh.

Exposure starts these troubles or makes them worse

Sunburn, Windburn, Chapping

The daily repetition of weather damage does more to age your skin than any other single factor. But the process is so gradual that except on specially severe occasions you do not notice it until your skin has definitely coarsened. Do not let this happen. For the insidious every-day exposure use the same method that saves your skin from the excessive damage of a long motor ride or a day on the beach. Keep your skin properly oiled by a nightly cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream. Then always in the morning, smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream. It forms a delicate but sure protection. This method will keep your skin smooth and young years longer than would otherwise be possible.

Premature Wrinkles, Scaling, Peeling

These are especially the troubles of a dry skin. To avoid them you must protect yourself from all exposure and keep your skin soft day and night. Cleanse with plenty of Pond's Cold Cream nightly and leave some on over night. This will give your skin the oil it needs so badly and keep it from scaling and peeling. Then it will not develop little lines that grow into wrinkles.

But do not let the exposure of the day undo the results of this nightly oiling. Every morning smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream liberally, prevent your skin from drying out again. Always carry a tube with you on motor trips to counteract their drying, ageing influence.

That Distressing Shine

Sometimes shine is due to a dry, tight skin, and motoring or even the slightest daily exposure aggravates the condition. You must apply an extra amount of Pond's Cold Cream at night after the cleansing and let it stay on. See how gladly your skin will absorb the fine light oil of this cream, how it will soften and relax and the shine disappear. Put on the Vanishing Cream in the morning to keep this suppleness through the day and be sure to carry it with you and use it frequently on any occasion of unusual exposure.

Accumulation of dirt and fat in the pores

Sometimes the oil in your skin accumulates in the glands and attracts dirt and bacteria—dust that blows into your face when motoring, or the daily soot of city streets. Your complexion is dulled, disfigured. You need specially careful cleansings. Pond's Cold Cream is so light it penetrates the glands and takes out excess oil and dirt together. Do this every night and always after any motor or railroad trip, and you will avoid a dull, muddy skin.

GENEROUS TUBES—
MAIL COUPON
WITH 10c TODAY

The Pond's Extract Co., 134P Hudson St., New York

Ten cents (10c) is enclosed for your special introductory tubes of the two creams every normal skin needs—enough of each cream for two weeks' ordinary toilet uses.

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....

feel a sort of weakness coming over me," she added, to Ellen. "You know, you never take it off until you're just ravening with hunger," she told her hostess.

"Take what off?" said Mrs. Murphy, bewildered.

"Fat—fat—fat!" the girl answered. "You get so that you can't think of anything else. My brother and I are doing it, and we compare notes at night. No sugar, thanks—is there sugar in it? I use saccharine."

"Next week," said Miss Carter, "a friend and I are going to try this new idea—nothing but raw food."

"God save us—like the horses!" muttered Mrs. Murphy.

"Lettuce, apples, nuts and sun-sweetened prunes and raisins," said Miss Carter. "Grated carrots—they're delicious."

"Grated—holy mother!" Ellen heard her mother murmur.

"We tried the chop and pineapple diet," Miss Rose Carter contributed with animation. "You eat a hot mutton chop and two slices of pineapple at every meal, and nothing else. It seems that the dietary balance is perfect—it's like that old famous diet of lettuce and chocolate, or the eggs and milk diet——"

"You're going to have some salad?" Ellen, whose face was somewhat flushed, asked at about this point. Her mother had fallen silent.

"Oh, no, thank you! Truly, I've eaten enormously. I've had more than I usually eat."

Miss Carter had a few peas, two mushrooms and the crust of a roll, buttered, for her meal. Her sister had a chicken wing, some gravy and half a roll. Miss Brice had some white meat carefully scraped of the tapioca gravy, some peas and the lettuce from under her lobster salad. A platter full of chicken returned to the kitchen; the candy and the rolls, the jelly and the big cake, the stuffed potatoes and the ice cream, were untouched.

"I usually allow a hundred for luncheon, fifty for breakfast and a hundred and fifty for dinner," said Miss Brice, of calories. "But I've certainly had a hundred and fifty here. I shan't eat anything at the wedding, I know that!"

"You've et nothing at all here," Mrs. Murphy said flatly, too demoralized by the turn of events to think of manners. "I never heard the like! Horse food, and pineapples with lamb chops, and calleries and hay, for all I know—— I don't know what a body would be eating that way for at all," pursued Mrs. Murphy, her voice falling to its customary note of vague complaint. "There's no blood in bran and hay and carrots, unless it'd be for an animal that ate it. And the two of you look as if you wasn't eating enough, even of sawdust and raw turnip!" she added, half apologetic for her own boldness.

"Oh, we eat enough!" Miss Carter said with a light little laugh. This kind little old peasant woman, with her apple cheeks and her nights of deep, childlike sleep, naturally had no idea of what complications might go wrong in the human system.

"As for you," Mrs. Murphy continued, her keen old eye now turned to Miss Brice, "God help us all! Didn't there used to be fat people and thin people, the way God made them? You'd never sit down to a meal, I should think, that you wouldn't be thinking more of the fats and thins and the starching and the blueing it would do to you, rather than say your grace that you had it at all! Calleries, is it? And a few years ago it was microbes, the way many a one wouldn't cross herself with holy water for fear she'd be poisoned in the church itself!"

"Well, I guess there's a lot in what you say, Mrs. Murphy," said Miss Brice, laughing good temperedly. "And yet, you know, it is nice to have your clothes comfortable, and not to be puffing on a hot day just because you're greedy!"

"Some's fat and some's thin, and the Lord et what His friends did," Mrs. Murphy said dazedly but stubbornly. And when Ellen and her guests suddenly rustled away from the scene, declaring themselves already late for the wedding, the old woman sat on, puzzled, baffled and vaguely angry, in the pleasantly shaded room.

Lizzie-Kate, who had been superintending the baby's luncheon, and Mrs. Callahan, who had been lurking in the kitchen, now came in.

"Whatever happened the lot of them?" said Mrs. Callahan amazedly. "Was the fowl high on us that they'd not eat it? The shame that come over me when that platter come back into the kitchen will foller me to the grave!"

She seated herself before the tumbled napkins and the broken rolls. The great column of pink ice cream was melting, something like a sixteenth of the great cake had been cut, the candy retained its perfect formation.

"I don't know what's come to them at all!" Mrs. Murphy said drearily. "You'd wonder they wouldn't fold their clean napkins at least. All they done was say what they couldn't eat, and sure it was nothin' but elephant food I heard them talk about! A couple of Zulus out of Roosia would eat more than they done! It was all hay and bran and carrots and middlin's—I declare it doesn't sound Christian. There was never anyone at home that didn't have a taste of potato cake and tea when there'd be company in, but faith you could fit up me fine young ladies in any stable in this country!"

"Maybe they had a little snack in the train," submitted Lizzie-Kate, nibbling a nut and marshmallow loaded fragment of cake.

"Ellen said all she wanted for them was toast and an omelette or some such trashy stuff," said Mrs. Callahan, with a troubled and puzzled look. "I'll bet she's got the grand mad on us all!"

"I'll bet she's fit to be tied that we made such a fuss," Ellen's sister said musingly. "She hates a fuss, you know, and her face got perfectly blazing as they went on refusing, and picking at their food like a lot of monkeys!"

"We'll have a scene with her—sure, I don't know where she'd get the temper she has on her at all," said Mrs. Murphy fearfully.

"Oh, mama, papa was a holy terror!" said Lizzie-Kate unfilially but affectionately.

"Well, he was—in a way——" his relict conceded reluctantly. "He tuk a little dish of curds I had on me table one day ——" she remembered, smiling.

The conversation rambled on comfortably; even with the melting ice cream confronting them, no one of the three practical women felt inclined to move. The afternoon was blazing hot, and the dining room and kitchen windows faced west.

The kitchen, they knew, was a welter of sticky plates, cooling food, congealed vegetables, half filled saucepans, platters, plates, bowls and cups. Later, well before supper time, they would all get to work and reduce the place to what was supposed to be cleanliness and order.

Meanwhile they idled and chatted, nibbling, drinking from the new iced tea glasses, growing more and more critical of their guests all the time and more restively and resentfully apprehensive of Ellen's anger when she returned.

What finally interrupted them was confusion in the yard. Who was it—what was it—God save us, it looked like a funeral! muttered the women as they rose to their feet and craned anxiously at the window.

Mart—it was Mart Murphy, for one—Mrs. Murphy's bachelor son. Mart, anyway, and who else? Who was it? Was it Lucy Mullen and all the young children?

They met them at the kitchen door. Lucy it was, a pale, sad young woman in streaming, shabby weeds. And with Lucy were her two big boys, Willie and Paul, and her two small girls, Gertie and May, and the old baby, a stout, curly-headed girl of three, and the new baby, a drooling, stolid child of fourteen months.

Lucy had not seen the Murphys and Mrs. Callahan since her husband's funeral two months ago; as she came in she burst into bitter weeping, and all the children, as well as Lizzie-Kate and her mother, cried too.

"To think that you—and me—Lizzie-Kate—that made our first communions together—and me wid the whole crowd of them at Tom's grave!" sobbed Lucy, hiccuping, shaking, clinging first to Lizzie-Kate and then to Mrs. Callahan, and then collapsing into a chair and gathering into her forlorn young arms as many of the children, besides the whimpering baby, as she could encircle at once.

"Mama, look here!" said Mart eagerly. "I met the whole gang of them streaming down the cemetery road in the blazing heat, and they've not had a bite of lunch, and here was Lucy going to take them to White Plains, and half kill herself—say, can't these kids have some of this cake?"

"I couldn't run the whole crowd of them into any restyrant," pleaded Lucy pathetically, her eyes brimming again. "I'm kilt as it is, what with them all weepin' over Tom's stone and yelling to him to come back. 'Papa!' May says——"

But Lucy was again overcome at this memory, and wept with her face against May's curls.

"And I haven't the money for it, Mart," she added with dignity, regaining her self-control suddenly. "I have me two little houses to rent, but I have the whole of them to feed and dress on a hundred and thirty-three dollars a month. And I had to paper one of me tenants, the way he would have walked out on me. If it was only fried potatoes in a restyrant it'd cost me a dollar before the whole of them was filled up! And to fast for a day," ended Lucy, half defiantly and half apologetically, "won't hurt them none!"

"Well, they'll fast no longer," said Mrs. Murphy, wiping her reddened eyes.

At the end of the dance

FROM the ballroom floated the strains of a waltz, and from out beyond came the sleepy night-sounds—the late call of a bird, the faint whispering of leaves in the summer breeze.

The man watched the woman before him in the mellow glow of the lanterns, drinking in her loveliness with eyes that could not leave her face.

"What is it?" she asked softly. "You look as if you were in a dream."

"I think this is a dream, and you a dream woman," he answered; "for I never saw anyone so lovely! There is something that makes you stand entirely alone, in a delicate, glowing radiance. I think the greatest charm of all is your wonderful coloring."

The last notes of the waltz were quivering into silence. "That is the end," she said. "I think it is the beginning," he answered, still watching her.

"I think it is the beginning," he answered—

A Happy Last Touch

When you use the Pompeian Beauty Trio you can feel assured that your skin is always fresh and glowing, and that it will remain so almost indefinitely.

Pompeian Day Cream is a vanishing cream that is absorbed by the skin, protecting it from dust, wind and sun. The delicate film that remains on the surface after the Day Cream has disappeared holds powder and rouge so well that constant re-powdering is unnecessary.

Pompeian Beauty Powder is of so soft and fine a texture that it goes on smoothly and evenly. A light coating will last a long time; for this powder has, to a remarkable degree, the quality of adhering.

The Bloom is a rouge that is absolutely harmless. It comes in the desired shades—light, medium, dark, and orange tint.

Use the Pompeian Trio together for Instant Beauty; for great care has been taken that all Pompeian Preparations blend perfectly.

Remember, first the Day Cream, next the Beauty Powder, then a touch of Bloom, and over all another light coating of the Powder.

"Don't Envy Beauty—Use Pompeian"

Pompeian Day Cream (vanishing)	60c per jar
Pompeian Beauty Powder	60c per box
Pompeian Bloom (the rouge)	60c per box
Pompeian Lip Stick	25c each
Pompeian Fragrance, a talc	30c a can
Pompeian Night Cream	50c per jar

The MARY PICKFORD Panel

and four Pompeian samples sent to you for 10 cents

Mary Pickford, the world's most adored woman, has again honored Pompeian Beauty Preparations by granting the exclusive use of her portrait for the new 1923 Pompeian Beauty Panel. The beauty and charm of Miss Pickford are faithfully portrayed in the dainty colors of this panel. Size 28 x 7½ inches.

For 10 cents we will send you all of these:

1. The 1923 Mary Pickford Pompeian Beauty Panel as described above. (Would cost from 50c to 75c in an art store.)
2. Sample of Pompeian Day Cream (vanishing).
3. Sample of Pompeian Beauty Powder.
4. Sample of Pompeian Bloom (non-breaking rouge).
5. Sample of Pompeian Night Cream.

Pompeian Laboratories, 2036 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio
Also Made in Canada

Pompeian

Day Cream Beauty Powder Bloom

© 1923, The Pompeian Co

The Girl Who Was Out of Date

By Mme. Jeannette

Not long ago I had a call from a young friend. She came in wearily and sank into a chair. The brilliant afternoon sunlight fell full on her face, and I was appalled when I saw how pale she looked.

"What is the matter?" I asked, expecting to be told that she was ill.

"Oh, I'm just tired," she said; "so tired I don't care how I look."

I was so indignant that for a moment I could not speak. There is no possible excuse for such an attitude!

To make the best of herself is the conceded duty of every woman, young or old; and a modish gown means very little when her complexion is uncared for.

"Come here," I said to her, "and let me see what I can do for you."

First I used a vanishing cream, gently patting it into the skin. This was Pompeian Day Cream. I always use this, for it leaves only a faint creamy film on the surface and holds powder and rouge so well. Next a coating of the soft, clinging Beauty Powder. Then a bit of rouge blended downward and outward from the cheekbone; dusting over all with a last touch of the powder. And this I had done to only one side of her face!

I turned her around to face the mirror. You never saw anyone so surprised! She looked and looked, turning from side to side; and I don't wonder, for she saw two entirely different girls, and one was so much lovelier it seemed incredible.

"That is what you can make of yourself every day, and it will take only a few minutes," I told her.

I couldn't help laughing at her astonishment; she had never had an idea she could be so pretty. She realized now the mistake she had been making, and watched with the keenest interest, while I made the other side of her face just as charming, adding at the last a touch of Pompeian Lip Stick.

She didn't say very much, but all the afternoon I saw her eyes straying toward the mirror. I hoped then that she would profit by my little lesson, and I know now that she did, for I've never seen her looking pale and weary since.

Jeannette

Specialiste de Beauté

TEAR OFF, SIGN AND SEND

POMPEIAN LABORATORIES
2036 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Gentlemen: I enclose 10c (a dime preferred) for 1923 Art Panel of Mary Pickford, and the four samples named in offer.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Flesh shade powder sent unless you write another below.

What would you do in his place?

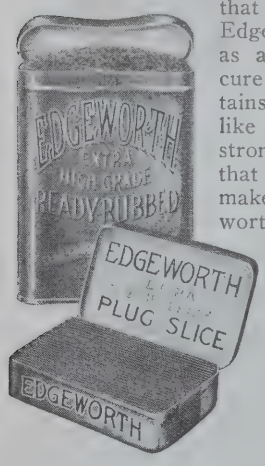
The steeplejack lights his pipe and goes on painting

Imagine, if you can, a steeplejack 487 feet above the street level. Hanging on by his teeth he is applying a more or less rough-and-ready coat of paint to a flagpole.

Right in the midst of a busy morning's painting an adventurous bee buzzes into the picture. In fact, there are two bees, both buzzing viciously.

What should the steeplejack do?

There being in the profession no local rules for buzzing bees, your average steeplejack probably would get the all-clear signal from below and slide promptly down to safety.



But not Our Hero. He takes out his pipe, lights it, and goes on painting.

"It soothes the nerves," he says frankly about pipe smoking.

We have no way of knowing what kind of tobacco the steeplejack pours into his pipe on these bee-buzzing occasions, but we have a feeling that it is Edgeworth.

For Edgeworth does much to give the smoker a sense of calm, peaceful security.

Of course we wouldn't care to go on record as claiming that smoking a can of Edgeworth is as good as a two-weeks rest cure in the mountains; but we would like to register strongly the opinion that smoking any pipe makes life seem more worth living and that smoking a pipe filled with Edgeworth helps a lot.

If you are interested in finding out more about Edgeworth, the most sensible plan is for you to let Larus & Brother Company send you some free samples so that you can try the tobacco for yourself.

Just write your name and address down on a postcard and you will receive immediately generous helpings both of Edgeworth Plug Slice and Ready-Rubbed. If you will also include the name and address of your tobacco dealer, we will make it easier for you to get Edgeworth regularly.

For the free samples address Larus & Brother Company, 61 South 21st Street, Richmond, Virginia.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your jobber cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size of Edgeworth Plug Slice or Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber.

"Go upstairs with Lizzie-Kate and wash your eyes and lay off your bonnet, Lucy," added Mrs. Callahan, easily assuming command. "Take the baby with you and put him down on a bed—the child's dropping asleep. And you children run out into the yard and play until we call you! I'll pop the cream back into the freezer, and all we have to do is wash up a dish or two and heat the food——"

"Oh, but that's such a lot of trouble!" protested poor Lucy, clinging to the kindly hands even while Lizzie-Kate firmly drew her away. "Just bread and butter would do for the lot of them—and God knows you're angels to think of that——"

This was at about four o'clock, and it was quarter to six when Ellen Murphy came slowly through the side yard of her sister's home and stopped short, in a state of stupefaction at the scene in the kitchen.

The eager young Mullens, aided by Mart and Joe Kane and adoringly abetted by young Flurry, were having their faces wiped at the sink by four excited and interested women, preparatory to an orgy. They had played for two hours with the exhilaration of sensible children who know that every degree of increasing appetite represents an eventual deepening of delight.

Now the feast was spread; the big platter was loaded with chicken again, and the rolls and potatoes smoked appetizingly into the bright afternoon air, and there were jelly and nuts and celery and candies, and a cake that the Mullens would never forget, and a damp gunny sack over the freezer.

"For the love of St. Louise of Prussia!" said Ellen simply. Her mother's heart stood still; Lizzie-Kate paused, in the very act of tying on a big apron, and sent her sister a fearful glance.

"Hello, Lucy," said Ellen, with a kiss. "Hello, kids! Why didn't you bring the family, Lucy? Hello Mart! My God, are we going to eat again?"

She went up to her mother and managed the feat of encircling with her arm the little dried-up walnut of a woman, whose hands were filled with hot dinner plates.

"Mama, are you mad? I was awfully ashamed of those girls today," Ellen said bravely. "The gall of them—the airs of them—eating in a boarding house in Madison Avenue, and then coming down here to pick faults in your food! I'd like to have told them what I thought of them—but you know how it is, mama—you can't, in your own house! I wanted to say 'the sole of my foot and the back of my hand to the whole crowd of you!' what with Mrs. Callahan coming down here and cookin' herself to death for them——"

Mrs. Murphy and Lizzie-Kate exchanged an innocent, wondering glance, their eyes wide with amazement and relief.

"I didn't mind it at all, dear," said Mrs. Murphy then, in a tone not often heard by Ellen nor any one of her children. "As long as yourself is the dear, good, appreciative child you are!" added the pessimist astonishingly.

And immediately, in a riot of laughter, they were all seating themselves at the table and fussing with re-folded napkins and buttering and jamming bread for the famished youngsters. And then came that rarely heard sound, the laughter of Mrs. Murphy.

"I didn't let on I seen nothing today at lunch——" she began.

"Oh, no you didn't!" said Ellen, in high feather. "All you did was to call them horses and camels!" And at this her mother's grizzled thin hair actually went down on the tablecloth in a spasm of mirth.

"Well, would anyone like Mart to go out and buy some tanbark or a few bath mittens for supper?" she sobbed joyfully. And there were shrieks.

"Sit back—and hold your horses—and have some manners to you!" said Lucy Mullen, in a sudden imperious voice. Her children slid the buttered bread from their obedient hands; even the curly-polled "old baby" shut her round black eyes.

"Will you say grace?" Lucy asked Mrs. Murphy.

The Murphys looked a trifle guilty. Lizzie-Kate indeed "blessed herself," and her food, at every meal. But for the rest of them this old country custom had somewhat lapsed.

But they were all silent now, and in the silence Mrs. Murphy's old pipe, still thinned with laughter, said reverently:

"Bless us, O Lord, and these Thy gifts, which we are about to receive from Thy bounty. Through Christ our Lord——"

And all the little Mullens, eying the gravy and the candy and the big maple nut marshmallow cake on the golden oak sideboard, said "Amen!"

As you read the next story by Kathleen Norris, in July COSMOPOLITAN, you will find laughs and lumps meeting each other in your throat

When Knighthood Was In Tower

(Continued from page 49)

nothing to be desired, but it appears that I lack that unusual imagination necessary to invent new and interesting plots. Perhaps that is because I have not seen enough of life in the raw—I have never actually experienced hunger, fear, envy; in fact, few, if any, of the standard emotions. There has been no necessity for me to feel them. My infernal wealth has been fatal to inspiration. Yet, by heaven, I can write, and some day I——"

"But with all your money, Mr. Tower," I interrupt, "why not rent a theater and produce one of your own plays yourself, since all you really want is to see it on Broadway?"

"Yes, I could do that," he tells me, "but that is not my desire. I want my work accepted by a disinterested producer, on its merits!"

"Fair enough!" I says, foiling a yawn in my throat. "Isn't that waltz they're playing delightful?"

Well, money had not prevented Mr. Tower from solving the mysteries of

Kodak Keeps the Story

What a chance for a picture—and how easy it all is the Kodak way. "Click" the shutter goes and the story stays—for all time.

Autographic Kodaks $6.50 up.

Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N.Y., The Kodak City

NOW that fresh fruits and vegetables are here you want a good vinegar—one that is more than "just sour." Heinz Vinegar brings out the hidden flavors of the foods and adds a rich mellowness of its own. There are four kinds:—Malt, Cider, or White to suit your purpose or your taste, and Tarragon for your special salads.

Heinz Vinegar mixed with Heinz Olive Oil assures the perfection of any salad combination.

HEINZ
PURE
Vinegars

dancing, and really he glided a wicked ballroom. While we're tripping the light fantastic, as they call it on Avenue A, I can't seem to keep my mind off this queer situation in which the millionaire Mr. Tower and the starving Mr. Westover play the leading parts. The thing interests me strangely, and having helped a chorus man and a prize fighter to solve similar problems, I can't see why I should be baffled by a couple of synthetic playwrights. Then in a flash the answer comes to me! I will have Mr. Tower buy "An Illegal Crime," which will put Mr. Westover on his feet and give him a stake for coffee and cakes while he writes other gems. In turn, Mr. Tower through his influence can have Mr. Westover's play produced under his own name and in that way gather the fame he craves, because I'm satisfied "An Illegal Crime" will slap Broadway for a row of parsley!

I'm so excited over my idea that I talk of nothing else to Mr. Tower all the way home in his car—this time it's a Boles-Joyce limousine, carrying a crew of two on the front seat. When we reached my bower, I ran up and got my copy of "An Illegal Crime" and gave it to Mr. Tower to read, together with my proposition to think over. He was very doubtful and far from sold on the idea. In fact, he seemed much more interested in getting a rough estimate from me on when he could play around with me again. I said let's get his future all fixed up and we'd speak of recreation later. He then told me I was wonderful and I told him good night.

The very first thing the next morning Mr. Tower called me on the switchboard and he's the height of enthusiasm over both "An Illegal Crime" and the idea of buying it from Mr. Westover. Could I arrange a meeting? I said of course I could—and then it suddenly dawned on me that I hadn't yet mentioned a word of my scheme to Mr. Westover.

At first the highly astonished Robert couldn't see my proposition with a telescope and he most indignantly refused to have anything to do with it. What, allow his brain child to appear as the progeny of another? Never! He barked and meowed along these lines till I called his attention to the fact that he was broke, in debt, on the brink of being streeted from the St. Moe and had a six months' vacation in the hoosegow staring him in the face for not being able to pay his hotel bill. This made Robert thoughtful and he finally agreed with me that he who writes and makes it pay will live to write another play. He insisted, however, that he wouldn't take a nickel less than a thousand dollars for "An Illegal Crime." When Mr. Tower offered him $7500 cash for it Robert nearly swooned, but he recovered in time to gurgle "Sold!" Then the gambling millionaire starts the rounds with the play.

Well, where poor Robert Meacham Westover had to be content with interviewing office boys and having stenographers pass on his play when he was peddling it, Mr. Tower was ushered right in to see the big theatrical moguls themselves. There's only one place on earth where a man who is able to write a check for a million and get it cashed can't get attention and that place is called Nowhere. Sidney Rosenblum, the first producer Mr. Tower called on, looked greatly disappointed when the young money king declined to put up the sugar to produce the play or even to go fifty-fifty on it. Still, out of respect to Mr. Tower's bankroll, Rosenblum glanced carelessly over "An Illegal Crime." Mr. Tower told me afterwards that before Rosenblum had finished reading the first act he rang for his secretary and asked her to break out a contract!

Six weeks later the play was produced with Mr. Tower's name on it as author, and to the hysterical joy of Mr. Tower, me and Rosenblum, it turned out to be the success of the year. The critics went crazy and point-blankly accused Mr. Tower of having wrote the great American play. Honest, he was interviewed silly and his picture was plastered all over the papers—in other words, he was famous and his lifelong ambition was realized.

Then along comes the fly in the ointment and the fly's name was Robert Meacham Westover, the real author of "An Illegal Crime." When Robert sees what a knockout his drama has turned out to be and realizes that he has sold all his rights in it, he's fit to be tied, no fooling! He made quite a scene at the switchboard, blaming me as all men since the first one blame the woman when anything goes wrong.

"I worked the best part of a year on that play," he almost sobs to me. "I starved and slaved in composing it, and now, by heaven, I have to buy tickets to see my masterpiece, with another's name on it as its author! It's driving me insane!"

"Well, why didn't you think of that when you sold your frolic?" I says, but I'm really a bit upset myself. "You took seventy-five hundred dollars for it and Mr. Tower took all the chances. Suppose it had been a flop, would you have given him back his money?"

"I'll give him back his paltry seventy-five hundred now!" raves Robert. "Why, 'An Illegal Crime' will make that in royalties within a few weeks. I'll make him take back his gold and return my play! It's my greatest effort and I demand the fame and prestige it will give me and which is my right. Oh, whatever possessed me to enter into such an indecent, immoral bargain—to sell the child of my brain! I may never again compose such a plot. I'll have to start all over again. I——"

"Be still!" I butt in. "You got everybody in the lobby looking at you. As long as I started this, I'll try and finish it. I'll talk this over with Mr. Tower today. Remember, I promise nothing, but I'll do my best!"

"Straighten this out and you will never regret it," says Robert frantically. "My career now rests in your pretty hands!"

Well, honestly, I was very sorry for Robert and the more I turned matters over in my troubled mind the more I began to see some justice in his stand. After all, it was his play that New York was wild over and it must have been horrible to have to see someone else get the credit. I hated myself for getting mixed up in his affairs at all, even though what I did was only done to help him. Then there was Mr. Tower's side to be considered, too. Hadn't he gambled his seventy-five hundred—just seven and a half times what Robert asked for "An Illegal Crime?" Mr. Tower had no way of knowing that the play would get over.

I just couldn't stand thinking about it any longer, so I went right to Mr. Tower and

Our Ideal Paige Sedan-Limousine

TWO cars in one—a 7-passenger Sedan for personal driving—instantly convertible into a smart limousine with separate chauffeur's compartment.

Here is a car any member of your family may properly drive in the chauffeur's absence. As a Sedan it is fully open. The front seat is comfortable, and upholstered like the rear. Raise the window dividing front and rear and your Sedan is a smart Paige Limousine.

The roominess of it is delightful—wide rear seat for three—comfortable auxiliary seats with ample foot room. Every appointment you expect in an exclusive Limousine—etched, silvered dome and quarter-lights—taffeta silk shades—completely fitted vanity cases. The entire body made squeak and rattle-proof with double strips of patent leather keeping metal from touching metal or wood.

Especially when you drive it yourself will our Ideal Paige delight you. The steering column is adjustable to your convenience. A finger's touch guides the Paige—due to ball-bearing steering-spindles in the Paige-Timken axles. Two to seventy miles an hour by throttle, makes gear-shifting rare. When necessary, an effortless, bare three-inch movement makes the change noiselessly.

The woman driver is never embarrassed by stalling the motor or jerking the car; the smooth engagement of the Paige clutch forbids. And whatever the road, the performance and comfort of this car are superb. Rear springs more than five feet long—with snubbers front and rear—131 inches of wheel base—perfect balance—make swift travel comfortable.

Paige high-pressure oiling system gives you a smooth, silent motor, with wear so minimized that long life is certain; while an automatic take-up eliminates adjustment of the silent timing chains. Thousands of Paige chassis dimensions are held to a thousandth of an inch accuracy or closer—the finest attention to details: Thus we maintain the high standards of our Ideal Paige.

7-passenger Phaeton $2450
4-passenger Phaeton $2450
3-passenger Roadster $2695
5-passenger Brougham $2850

PAIGE

5-passenger Touring Sedan $3235
7-passenger Sedan $3235
7-passenger Sedan-Limousine $3435
Prices at Detroit. Tax extra

(341)

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL CAR IN AMERICA

Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcases

HERE are really fine bookcases that protect your books and keep pace with you. Add a section whenever needed! Attractive period designs, in all the woods. Popularly priced, see Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcases almost everywhere!

LET US HELP—We will gladly send without charge our booklet of Unusual Decorative Effects for Bookcases. Please address Dept. B 8-6 at Cincinnati, Ohio

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
CINCINNATI
New York . Chicago . Boston . Detroit . Cleveland
Philadelphia . Washington . New Orleans . St. Louis

Music Lessons UNDER MASTER TEACHERS At Home

Complete Conservatory Course by Mail

Wonderful home study music lessons under great American and European teachers. Endorsed by Paderewski. Master teachers guide and coach you. Lessons a marvel of simplicity and completeness.

Any Instrument Write, naming course you are interested in: Piano, Harmony, Voice, Public School Music, Violin, Cornet, Mandolin, Guitar, Banjo or Reed Organ —and we will send FREE CATALOG. SEND for it NOW!

University Extension Conservatory 784 Siegel-Myers Bldg., Chicago

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
School and College Bureau

Offers You Its Specialized Services in Choosing a School

Last year the School and College Bureau of The Chicago Daily News saved many busy parents and questioning boys and girls both time and worry by sending them prompt, reliable information about just the kind of school they wanted —personal requirements as to location and tuition charges being considered in each individual case.

This year many young people will again be perplexed by the problem of finding the right school. Why not let us help you?

The Chicago Daily News maintains this service absolutely free of charge to you. No need hurriedly to select a school on mere hearsay when expert advice can be obtained by telephoning, writing, or calling for a personal interview at presented the case of Robert Meacham Westover to him. Mr. Tower, joyful as a lark, was busy autographing his pictures, dictating letters to admirers, signing contracts for movie rights and Lord knows what else. He was busier than Busy himself, and sitting pretty, and I just hated to be a crape-hanger.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
School and College Bureau
15 N. Wells St., Chicago, Illinois

Mr. Tower was smiling happily when I began my story, after he had told his secretary to step out, but before I got half finished he was pacing the floor and the smile was conspicuous by its absence. To say it was a shock would be a niggardly use of adjectives! He never expected anything like this to gum up his fun.

"This is terrible—terrible!" he says finally. "I bought all rights to the infernal play from Westover, didn't I? Any court in the land will sustain my position. I'll give him all the royalties! I have no use for the money, I only want——"

"You only want the same thing Mister Westover wants," I interrupt. "That's credit for writing the play! There's no use offering him money either, Mr. Tower, I know he wouldn't accept it, and of course if he sued you and won, he'd get all the royalites anyhow. He could have me dragged to court for a witness—and I'd have to tell the truth, wouldn't I?"

Again Mr. Tower nervously patrols the room. "Well, what shall I do—what would you do?" he asks me desperately.

"Mr. Tower," I says seriously, "if you're a real man, a true knight, such as I like to think you are, here's the chance of a lifetime to show your bigness, and you'll jump at it! There's only one thing to do and that's the honorable thing. Take back your money from Mr. Westover and we'll both make an affidavit that he, not you, wrote 'An Illegal Crime'."

Mr. Tower gave me a long, long look and I returned it, putting everything I had in my eyes. "It will please you if I do this?" he asks me soulfully.

"Very much," I answered promptly. "And it should please you, too!"

With a deep sigh Mr. Tower became a knight. He called in his secretary and dictated a statement that caused the dumbfounded secretary's eyes to bulge. Then we got Mr. Westover, stopped at a notary public, and we all wrote our names on the dotted line. Mr. Westover signed with a flourish, but Mr. Tower's signature was shaky. Our next port of call was Sidney Rosenblum.

It goes without saying that Rosenblum was dazed when we had told him our little bedtime story, but he wasn't so dazed that he forgot to get his press agent busy on this new and sensational angle to the production of the play. There was little else in the newspapers the next morning, and, yes, my picture was there with the others. The thing burst like a bombshell on Broadway and the avalanche of publicity started "An Illegal Crime" on what has all the earmarks of a two-year run on the Big Street alone. Robert Meacham Westover was made for life, of course. Why, he and this Rosenblum have turned down $80,000 for the movie rights! I could have entered the chorus of any musical show on Broadway as the result of my photos being incessantly printed and the general notoriety I drew out of it, and even Mr. Tower got the best of the big exposure. He was highly praised for his sportsmanship in acting like he did, when he was legally entitled to claim authorship of the play.

Well, success brought about a great change in Robert Meacham Westover, the boy playwright. It went right to his head, where there was the most room. He moved from his cupboard under the roof to a classy suite in the most expensive part of the St. Moe and stalked through the lobby like he'd suddenly been appointed Duke of Diphtheria, or something. Instead of pestering me and the other girls about his imaginary phone calls as he did in days of yore, he now refused to talk to anybody over the phone.

However, he was grateful enough to me, who he swore put him over. He wanted me to go here and he wanted me to go there with him, but I couldn't use him and was ready and anxious to let him pass out of my life. Robert was too much in love with himself to really love anyone else, and when he asked me would I consider marrying him I told him I was afraid I couldn't get off duty to go to the church and they wouldn't stand for a wedding in the lobby.

"But I don't object to taking back the ten dollars I loaned you before you became the talk of New York," I says.

"Oh—I beg your pardon!" he stammers, getting red, and why shouldn't he? "I —I'd forgotten all about that—rushed to death—working on my new play, you know—that sort of thing——"

He pulls out a roll of bills that would strangle a hippo and makes a big display in the crowded lobby by thumbing them over a couple of times before counting me out a hundred dollars in ten-dollar bills. He let everybody see him handing me that money—and that's the tip-off on him.

I took one ten and coldly told him to keep the rest for writing materials. I haven't spoke two words to him since!

One more minute and I'm through, take off your coat and make yourself comfortable. Guy Austin Tower rushed up to the switchboard a few days later to excitedly announce that he'd been commissioned to write a play by no less than Sidney Rosenblum himself. Rosenblum had sent for Mr. Tower and told him he saw no good reason why the publicity he'd just enjoyed shouldn't be made use of. He then made Mr. Tower repeat all the circumstances connected with the authorship of "An Illegal Crime." When my boy friend got finished with the sad tale, Rosenblum puffed thoughtfully at his cigar for a minute or two and remarked that in his opinion the story of how Mr. Tower had bought Mr. Westover's drama and then given it back to him would make a corking play itself.

Well, with a plot at last to mix with his fine writing, Mr. Tower tied in enthusiastically and wrote the play.

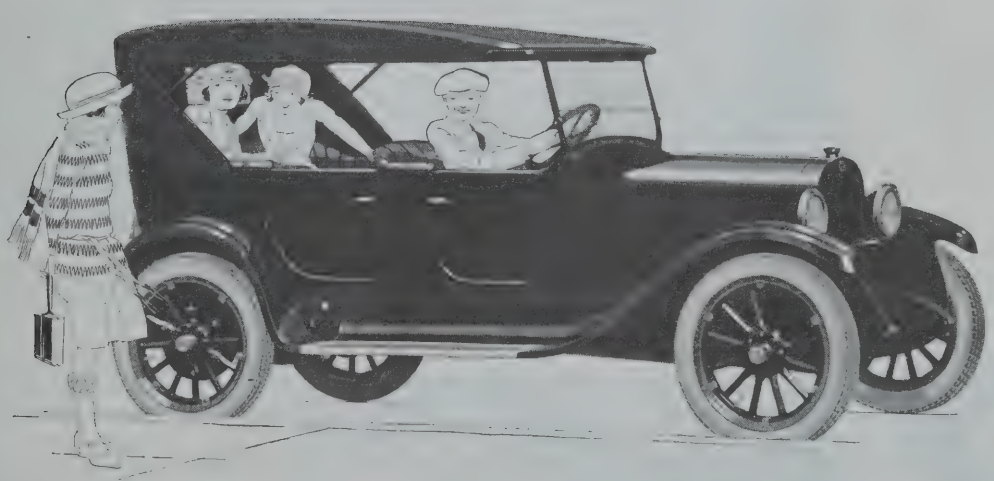
It opened six months ago, and try to get in. The last I heard they were selling tickets for the New Year's matinee, 1924.

Be yourself!

H. C. Witwer tells another adventure of Gladys Murgatroyd, the girl who gets more fun out of life than anyone else, in a forthcoming issue of COSMOPOLITAN

PERMANENT ENAMEL BAKED ON STEEL

Eight years ago, when Dodge Brothers originated the all-steel motor car body, they took advantage of the absence of wood in the framework to bake an enamel finish on the surface of the steel.



In a vast series of electric ovens, especially designed and built by Dodge Brothers' engineers for this process, three distinct coats of black enamel are successively baked on the steel at an intensely high temperature.

The result is a finish so hardy and durable that it seldom requires more than a good cleaning and polishing to restore the original brightness.

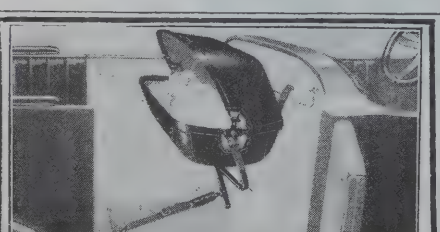
Even in sections of the Southwest where alkali in the soil is especially destructive to body finishes, Dodge Brothers enamel retains its beautiful lustre after years of wear.

DODGE BROTHERS

The price of the Touring Car is $880 f. o. b. Detroit

A telephone personality

In your face to face contacts with people, your appearance, your bearing and many other things help you to make the right impression. But in your telephone contacts there is only one thing by which you can be judged—your speech.



An effective telephone personality is to-day a business and social asset. Everybody appreciates the person who speaks distinctly and pleasantly, neither too fast nor too slow, with a clear enunciation of each word, with lips facing the mouthpiece and speaking into it. In business, this is the telephone personality which induces favorable action on the part of the listener. To the salesman it may mean the difference between an order and no order; between an interview granted and an interview refused.

Curiously enough, people who are careful to make themselves effectively heard and understood face to face, often disregard the need for effectiveness in their telephone speech. Perhaps they shout, perhaps they mumble, perhaps they hold the mouthpiece far from their lips. And frequently they never realize that their carelessness has defeated the purpose of their talk.

The Bell System maintains for telephone users the best facilities that science, modern equipment, skilled operation and careful management can bring to telephone speech. But these facilities can be fully effective only when they are properly used.

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

Have Baby Comfy

In a Gordon Motor Crib. More pleasure for you when motoring with baby tucked snugly in this convenient crib. "The safest way the doctors say." Crib easily strapped in any touring car. Spring arrangement absorbs all shock over roughest roads. Hood when raised protects against weather. Fold crib flat or detach when not in use. Sold everywhere or sent parcel post prepaid.

Send for illustrated booklet and dealer's name

GORDON MOTOR CRIB CO.
1519 Wabash Ave. Dept. 17 CHICAGO

$3,000.00 IN ONE YEAR

Easily possible with Tire Surgery. Tire prices on upward trend. Car owners again flocking to repair stations. We have wonderful proposition for ambitious men. Oldham made $2200 in 4 months Evans averages $100 a week. Some choice locations available. Write quick for details. May be opportunity you seek. Write and find out. We'll place whole proposition before you within 72 hours. Address

Haywood Tire & Equipment Company
1322 S. Oakley Ave. Chicago, Ill.

Beaver!

(Continued from page 61)

Internally, he seethed. Day after tomorrow he would be returning to Princeton. Lord Dolicho had consented to stay another week—both the Rotary Club and the Elks were anxious to hear him. And all the past week seemed to William to have been exclusively composed of incidents like that of the eleven foot putt.

He didn't like the way Marcia sometimes looked at Lord Dolicho. He didn't like it at all. Mentally he characterized it as "an awful soft kind of a look."

Lord Dolicho's debonair accents aroused him from his walking stupor as they reached the porch of the Club.

"I say, let's play some sort of a silly game now, what?"

"How 'bout Drop the Handkerchief?" suggested William bitterly.

"Now Billy!" said Marcia in her most irritating voice.

"Ha, ha, not bad!" said the imperturbable Lord Dolicho. "Not bad!"

"What kind of a game?" asked Eloise respectfully.

"Oh, any sort of a silly one! Let me see. When I left home they were all playing Beaver, but that was ages ago. Good game, though."

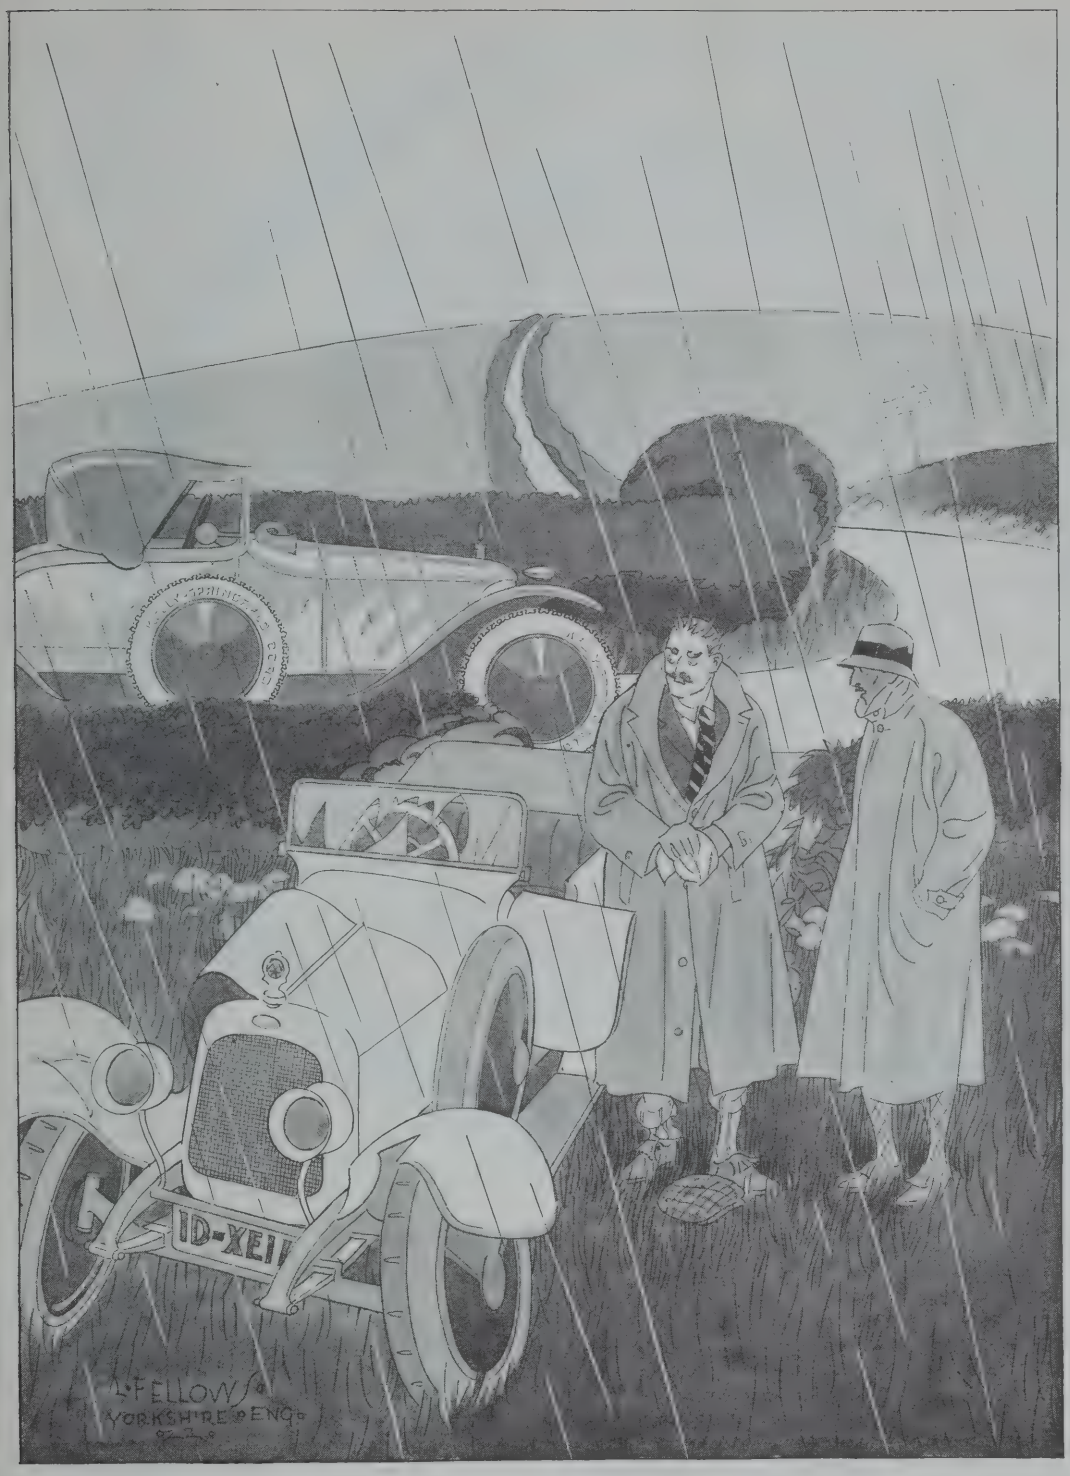
"That's the one about people's beards, isn't it?" from Marcia, dubiously.

"Right-o. Good game. When you see a chap with any kind of a beard you cry 'Beaver!' at him and point, and if you spot him before the next lad it counts you one. A white beard's a Polar Beaver—five, that counts. And then if you run across a lad with a streaming red Vandyke he's supposed to be the Red King Beaver and you win the game. No end of fun. Couldn't play it much in London myself, though—family reasons," and Lord Dolicho chuckled.

The realization of that peer's connection with actual royalty descended upon William like a damp shroud. But he struggled on.

"I imagine it might be fun—in London," he remarked with heavy sarcasm. "But over here nearly everybody shaves."

"Oh, no they don't!" exclaimed Marcia excitedly. "Beaver! Polar Beaver!" She pointed.



A little gentleman with a meek white chin tuft scuttled away into the Club like a chevied rabbit. Everybody but William laughed.

"Oh, jolly good for Marcia!" said Lord Dolicho approvingly. "Beaver!" he howled abruptly at the top of his lungs, arms waving.

The President of the Plasterers' and Plumbers' Bank, about to drive from the first tee, jumped, topped his ball and swore like a top sergeant. His bushy whiskers waved angrily in the breeze.

"Not quite a full grown Beaver," said Lord Dolicho calmly. "Have to chuck him back in the brook if he were a trout. But still, I think I score him."

The beaver hunt that followed occupied the rest of the afternoon. When, finally, they adjourned to Marcia's for tea, Lord Dolicho led Marcia by one hotly disputed hirsute tuft with Eloise a bad third and William a wretched fourth. One sprout of hope alone still waved like a sickly plant in the desert of William's disgust. He had

*YORKSHIRE MOORS, ENGLAND

"Confound these infernal slippery roads! Why don't some of these clever Johnnies invent a tyre that won't slither about so?"
"They have—Kelly-Springfield Cords."

THERE is ample justification for the absolute confidence which the owner of Kelly Cords places in them. Not only are they surefooted on practically all kinds of roads and in all kinds of weather but they have that characteristic Kelly sturdiness which insures long mileage in spite of severe punishment.

Truly, a rare combination of safety and service, yet —it costs no more to buy a Kelly.

Drawing by Laurence Fellows, England.*

engineered the recess for tea at Marcia's.

Marcia's father, Mr. Alexander Mather, was a testy old gentleman known behind his back as "The Czar"—by far the most important male citizen of Mastodon. And, next to his daughter and his honorary colonelcy on the Governor's Life Guards, his most cherished possession was his long, patriarchal beard of a luxuriant magnificence seldom seen in these razored days; an immense and snowy shrub still streaked with patches of bright auburn that showed whence Marcia had inherited her spectacular hair.

But William's half conceived plot received a staggering blow when they arrived at the Mathers'. Mrs. Mather remarked casually that she didn't know when Alexander would be home—he had a committee meeting of some sort. William sighed.

The minutes passed with Lord Dolicho and Marcia in low voiced converse on the sofa and William doing his best to overhear their conversation and at the same time make appropriately polite replies to Mrs. Mather's stream of questions about the Princeton curriculum. He began to hate Mrs. Mather. From time to time she observed the couple on the sofa with a wide, approving smile.

The butler was discussed but Lord Dolicho and Marcia agreed that mere sideburns should not count. The day lapsed into that dead, stale interval between tea and dinner when strong young men begin to think of marrying into the Follies. William, looking desolately out of the window to avoid having to look at Lord Dolicho and Marcia—Mrs. Mather had pumped him dry—stiffened suddenly, like a cat in the intoxicating presence of a catnip mouse. The disgraceful old runabout to which Alexander Mather still clung, with the stubborn affection of a child for its first rag doll, was wheezing up to the door.

William trembled with joy. He could not believe his eyes.

Mr. Mather got out gingerly. His expression as he turned to dismiss the chauffeur was not a happy one. In fact, William thought with enthusiasm, he looked mad enough to eat tacks. The meeting had obviously been a wayward one.

He stumped heavily up the front steps and Marcia heard him.

"That must be daddy!" she said; then, tenderly, to Lord Dolicho, "You know daddy, don't you, Fluffles?"

"Oh yes indeed!" said Lord Dolicho, beaming.

The steps stumped down the hall. The door was thrown open. Mr. Mather stood in the doorway, red and fuming. He had not bothered to remove his hat and one hand clutched the handle of a brief case as if it were an enemy's neck. He presented a figure of wrath at once unmistakable and portentous. His very beard seemed to bristle with passion and electricity. William gloated at him.

"Well! Of all the inordinate fools in the city of Mastodon," he began in a hoarse, harsh voice, "I think I have just been talking to the most pig-headed, venomous lot of——"

But the pithy conclusion of his sentence was never reached. Lord Dolicho had leaped to his feet, upsetting one of Mrs. Mather's best teacups with a crash to the floor.

"Beaver!" he screamed, and pointed an accusing arm. "Beaver! Red King Beaver! I win the game!"

The pyrotechnics that followed were brief but gaudy. William, dissolved in hopeless laughter in a corner, viewed them with a satisfaction sweeter than honey. He heard Lord Dolicho's stammering apologies roared down and trampled upon. He saw that peer well-nigh driven out of the door by Mr. Mather's furious finger shaken in his face. He heard Mrs. Mather's ruffled "Impossible! Quite impossible! And I always thought he was such a nice young man!" He saw Marcia's hurt, dumbfounded stare.

When Lord Dolicho was quite gone, William turned to Mrs. Mather.

"I think I'd better go after him," he said in tones of gentle apology. "After all—he's mother's guest."

"That's nice of you, Billy—and characteristic, too," said Mrs. Mather very pleasantly.

The hope that never dies in the breasts of social mothers aroused again. After all, in some ways, Marcia could hardly do better than Billy.

William took his departure very nicely, except for Marcia. She followed him to the door without saying anything, though her eyes were extremely bright. But when he offered his hand she put hers behind her back, and, "William Conduit, I'll never forgive you long as I live!" she said. Then the door slammed, leaving William gaping.

Still, going home, he smiled. She'd get over it. Women were always like that—but they always got over it, he thought experiencedly.

He found Lord Dolicho bundling things into his bags.

"I say—I find I can get a train at seven," Lord Dolicho remarked as soon as William came in. "Sorry about the lectures—I'll write and apologize. But I've just had an urgent telegram. Called back." His face was a mask.

"Oh, I'm awfully sorry!" said William insincerely. "About everything," he added.

"Did rather make an ass of myself, what? Sorry. A most perfect ass. Knocked over the apple cart for good and all."

"The Mathers are an awfully devoted family," said William treacherously. "If it weren't for that——" He sighed.

"Yes," said Lord Dolicho reflectively. "Quite."

He went on packing, finished the bag and locked it. Then he stared at William for a moment but seemed to find no comfort in his face. Then abruptly, astoundingly, he chuckled.

"All the same, the old sportsman is a most complete King Beaver!" he said. "Couldn't resist it. Well——" He began on the other bags.

William was just about to tiptoe away when the telephone rang.

"That Club, most likely—the Elks—telling me to bounce myself against a wall," said Lord Dolicho wryly. He picked up the receiver.

"Hello. Are you there?"

But the voice from the telephone was clearly not that of a club.

"Fluffles!" it said distinctly, and then there seemed to be a disturbance on the wires.

William should not have listened, doubtless, but he did. And as he listened he felt his heart slide down, down toward the pit of his stomach.

"Miss Mather! I say, Miss Mather! Marcia!"

"Oh Fluffles, I'm so glad you're there! I thought I'd never get to the phone. Oh Fluffles!" and the voice became inarticulate.

"I say!" said Lord Dolicho jerkily. "You know I apologize. Beastly of me. Acting the complete bounder. I say, it was ghastly. Can you ever forgive me?"

"Oh Fluffles, of course! It's I who want to apologize all over myself for the awful, awful way that daddy behaved. Oh, I'm simply raging! I can't stand it! When you——" The voice choked.

"Marcia!" said Lord Dolicho in a strange voice, "Marcia darling, you're crying! Oh Marcia——"

William opened his mouth and shut it. The conversation went on. But he had heard enough.

He crept toward the door.

V

A MONTH later William, at breakfast, turned cautiously to the society column of his newspaper. Yes, there it was, in cold type, the finish of everything.

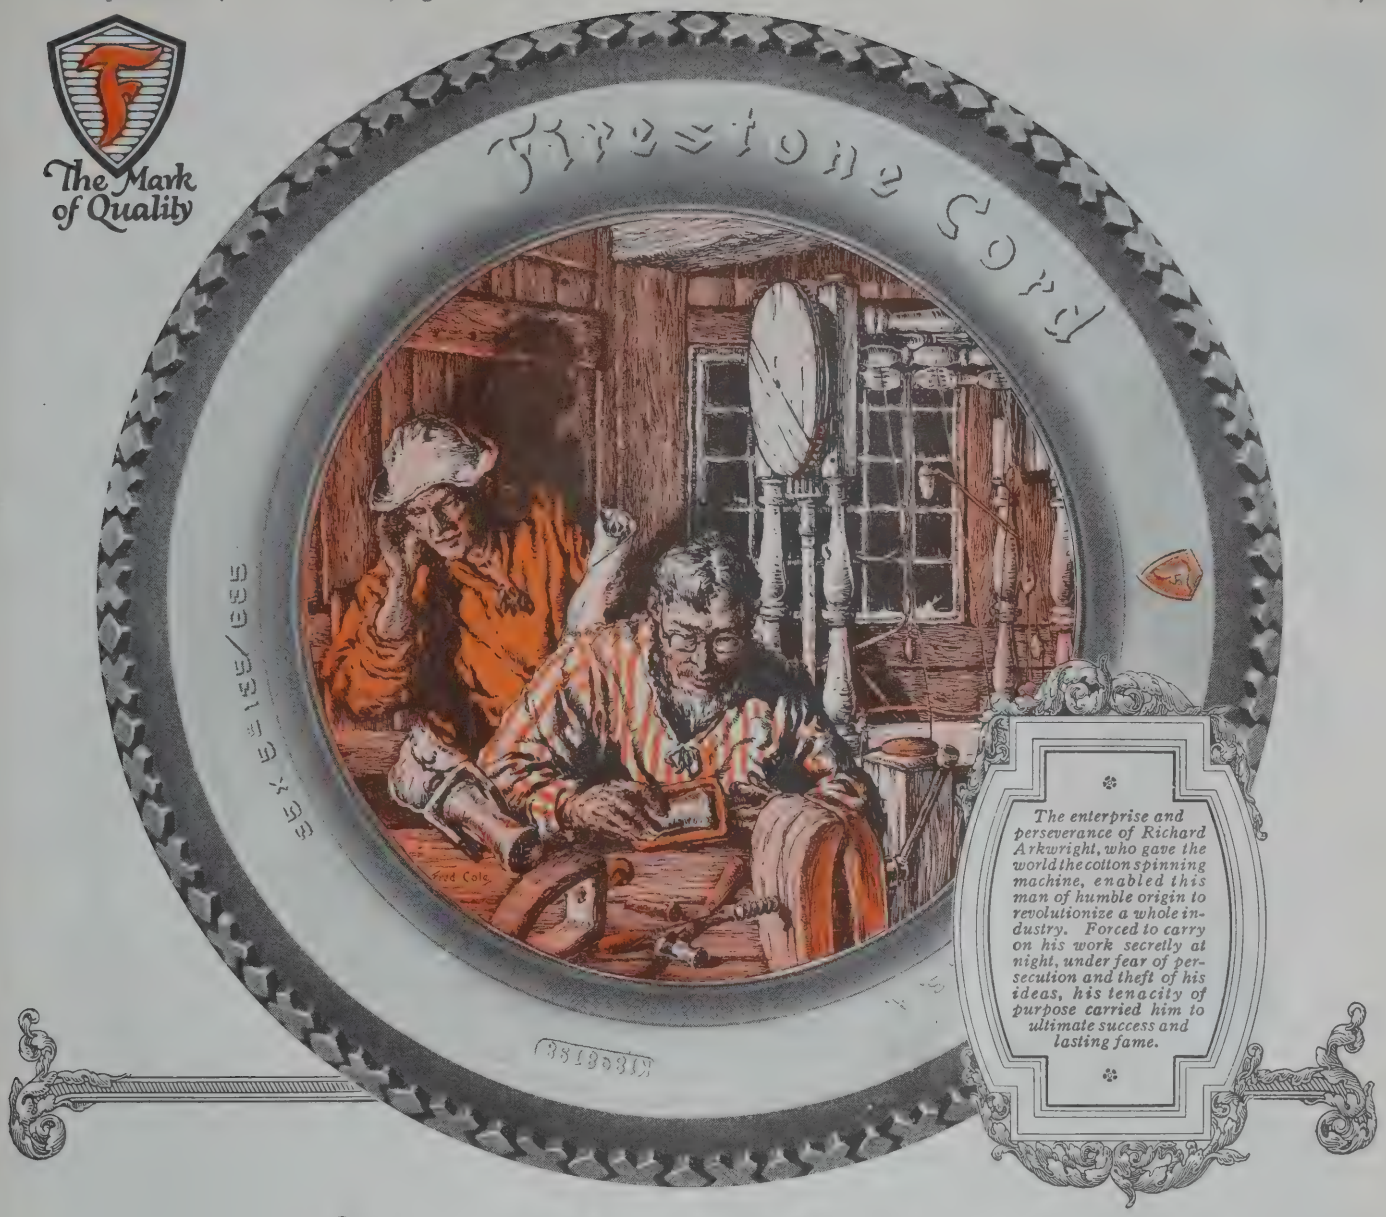
He glared at the little paragraph.

> Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Mather of Mastodon announce the engagement of their daughter, Marcia, to Lord Henry Albert Edward Charles Eustace Dolicho of Park Lane and Whortleberry Towers, Hants-on-the-Wold, Buckmastershire, England. The wedding has been set for early spring, following which Lord Dolicho, who is a well known Egyptologist, will take his bride to Egypt for their honeymoon.

The headline was "American Society Beauty Nabs English Peer."

William let the paper flutter to the floor. His eyes stared into vacancy. Then, after a while, he began to feel a little better—for he was his mother's son. This hurt, but it would go by.

Still, it hurt. He picked up the paper and read the paragraph again. Then a certain memory of his mother returned to his mind. He attempted a feeble smile. After all, why not try it? He glanced around cautiously to make sure that he was not observed. But nobody else was paying any attention to him.



He propped the fatal journal against his coffee cup where he could stare at it intently but unobtrusively. Then he hesitated, but mastered himself.

"All a matter of what you think, Bill—just thought, that's all," he asserted.

He began gently to massage himself with the flat of his hand just above the region of his heart.

"Ça passe!" he whispered, "Ça passe! Oh, Marcia was grand while she had it—but ça passe—ça passe—passe—passe——"

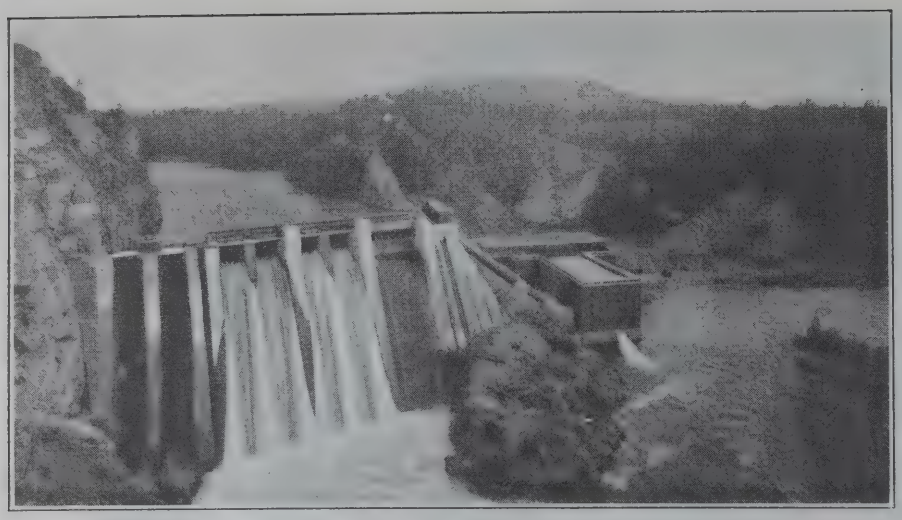
Adela Rogers St. Johns knows the story of everybody in Hollywood: She tells one of these stories in July COSMOPOLITAN—the story we had promised for this issue

Steadfast Purpose

THE unswerving determination with which Arkwright labored to produce the spinning machine is paralleled in many instances throughout the course of our industrial progress.

It was such steadfast purpose that ultimately achieved a tire for which the public had long waited—the Firestone Gum-Dipped Cord.



Measuring up to the needs of today for greater dependability and economy of tire performance, this highly perfected cord has been acclaimed everywhere as a contribution of permanent importance to motorists.

Its success amply rewards the persistent effort of the Firestone organization during a period of twenty-three years.

A multitude of car-owners responding to the standard of value set by the Firestone Cord are showing their unwillingness to speculate further on quality of less certain dependability.

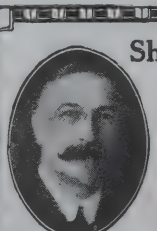
Most Miles per Dollar

Firestone

Every idle stream or waterfall that is put to work, and furnishes light and power to homes and factories many miles away, means a saving in coal and, what is more important, a saving in human energies.

How far can a waterfall fall?

In 1891 General Electric Company equipped an electric plant at Pomona, California, for transmitting electric power 28 miles—a record.



Today electric power from a waterfall is carried ten times as far.

Some day remote farm homes will have electricity and streams that now yield nothing will be yielding power and light.

Improvements in electrical development do not "happen." They come from the tireless research of trained scientists. The General Electric Company invests in the work of its Research Laboratories more than a million dollars a year.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

DR ESENWEIN

Short-Story Writing

A practical forty-lesson course in the writing and marketing of the Short Story, taught by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, famous critic and teacher; Editor of The Writer's Monthly.

One pupil has earned over $5,000 writing in his spare time—hundreds are selling constantly to the leading publishers.

150 page catalog free. Please address

The Home Correspondence School

Established 1897

Dept. 84 Springfield, Mass.

Red-Handed

(Continued from page 35)

then at once diminished in perspective.

"Any rough stuff?"

"Like takin' marbles from a kid. He had a gat on him, too—I got it here. The poor fish—carryin' his gat where he'd have to halfway undress himself to get it out. Scared stiff, scared dumb, too—mighty near it!"

"How much in it?"

"How would I know? All I know is I got it." Solitaire, between jolts and side slips, answered this with a seeming sharp impatience.

"What say I slow up and we give it a look?" Feary's eyes were on fire with greed. His coveting glance darted to the paper-wrapped cylinder in his companion's lap and at that the car buck-jumped out of the soft ruts.

Solitaire, in great apparent alarm, cried out:

"Look where you're goin'! Have you gone dippy, Pink? I don't know what we got and I ain't carin', neither—not till we're a couple hundred miles from here and hived up somewheres, safe. Think we've got the only fast car there is in this country? Just about now them suckers have quit runnin' round in circles and are shapin' to give us the race of our lives. You drive her—and you drive her like the devil!"

And Feary, seeing the force of this argument, drove her like the naughty word. In forty-five minutes the car ate up nearly thirty miles.

Now, in this respect, the trouble with Feary was his ignorance. As well as a man might who assiduously had studied local maps, he knew the route they meant to follow, its main roads and its crossroads, and its detour lines for avoiding the occasional small towns of this sparsely settled district. What he did not know was the physical configuration of the country or the natural characteristics which hereabouts marked changes in the terrain. Even at this speed at which they traveled a native-born would have been advised by certain things—by the increase of the salmon tint in the soil; by the thickening up of the underbrush, with briers and bays and gumberry bushes; by the water maples and holly and cypress and live oaks succeeding the pine barrens; by the recurrence of puddles filled with water that was the color of freshly steeped sassafras tea; and, most significant of all, by the appearance of stringy tufts of Spanish moss dangling like gray scalp locks in the clutches of the tree limbs. But Feary's experience had taught him that the transition from a flat to a bottom invariably was marked by a dropping-away in the earth.

So, since the road vanishing in the twist of a sharp angle just ahead of him seemed to continue straight on and on ahead upon a surface as level as the palm of your hand, he took the turn without checking speed. But the heated tires met soft gray mire and skidded, and the car spun around almost in its own length. A mud guard caught on a cypress knee so that the car reared up behind like a breachy colt.

The whirling blur passed from before Solitaire's eyes. He got on his feet,

See America First From Your Car

YOU DON'T get the full benefit from owning an automobile unless you go touring every once in a while. Of course a motor car is primarily for utility transportation—to take you from where you are to where you want to go.

But you really should start out sometimes in your car, with no particular destination in mind. Just loaf along, invite your soul and make the acquaintance of the glorious country you live in.

Every variety of scenery is yours for the seeking. There are no more beautiful lakes, rivers, mountains and forests in the world. And the improvements in highways and tourist accommodations during recent years make a motor trip very comfortable indeed.

One of the greatest conveniences on such a trip is an accurate touring map. Cosmopolitan's Official Touring Maps were used by thousands of motorists last season. This season in addition to the Official Touring Map of the United States we are issuing nineteen official District Maps. All these maps show trunk highways, national trails, main auto roads, and free tourist camp grounds.

These maps comprise the series:

Official Touring Map of the United States.

District Maps

1.—Illinois, Northeast Missouri, Southeast Iowa.

2.—Indiana, Southern Michigan, Western Ohio, Northern Kentucky.

3.—Michigan.

4.—Eastern Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Southeast Michigan, Southern Ontario, Western New York.

5.—New York, Northern Pennsylvania.

6.—New England.

7.—Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Northern West Virginia, Maryland, Delaware.

8.—Wisconsin, Northern Illinois.

9.—Minnesota, Northwest Wisconsin, Eastern North Dakota, Eastern South Dakota.

10.—Iowa, Northern Missouri, Northeast Kansas, Western Illinois.

11.—North Dakota, South Dakota, Northern Nebraska, Eastern Montana, Eastern Wyoming, Western Minnesota.

12—Kansas, Southern Nebraska, Southwest Iowa, Northern Oklahoma, Northeast Mexico, Eastern Colorado.

13, 17.—Montana, Eastern Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico.

14.—Washington, Oregon, Western Idaho, Northern California.

15, 16.—California, Nevada.

18.—Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, Southern Oklahoma, Western Mississippi.

19.—Southern Missouri, Southern Illinois, Southern Indiana, Southwest Ohio, Western Kentucky, Western Tennessee, Northwest Georgia, Northern Alabama, Northern Mississippi, Arkansas.

20.—Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Southern Ohio, West Virginia, Southern Maryland, Southern Delaware, Northern Georgia, Eastern Tennessee, Eastern Kentucky.

21.—Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Eastern Louisiana, Southern South Carolina.

Order by Number on coupon. Only 30 cents each, postpaid.

Help For Every Motorist

COSMOPOLITAN'S Motoring Service is ready to give you any sort of motoring advice.

If you are going to get a new car send us your detailed requirements, the use you will make of it, the sort of country you drive in, speed, economy, life, performance, etc.,—and we will help you.

We also give you any sort of technical information or the resale value of your old car. A self addressed, stamped envelope should be sent with all inquiries.

Send two-cent stamp for catalogs and instruction books of standard makes of cars.

Write for one or all of these booklets. Every driver should keep a set in his car.

No. 1—Better Winter Driving.
No. 2—Selection and Care of Tires and Tubes.
No. 3—The Car's Electrical Equipment.
No. 4—Engine Carbonization.
No. 5—Motoring As A Cure For Nervous Disorders.
No. 6—Your Storage Battery.
No. 7—Brakes and Brake Relining.
No. 8—Chassis Lubrication. Tables giving oil capacities of transmission and rear axle.
No. 9—Advice On The Purchase of A New Or Used Car. Includes new prices on all models.
No. 10—Oil Pumping — How To Cure It.
No. 11—Spark Plugs. With complete table of spark plugs sizes used in 1923 cars.
No. 12—How To Become A Good Driver.
No. 13—What Makes The Engine Overheat.
No. 14—Getting The Most Power From Your Engine.
No. 15—Things The Tourist Should Know.
No. 16—Curing Engine Misfiring.
No. 17—The Vacuum System—How It Works.
No. 18—How To Stop Clutch Slipping.
No. 19—Lighting and Lighting Troubles. New Table.
No. 20—Motor Car Insurance.
No. 21—Better Service For Less Money.

4 cents each postpaid.

Cosmopolitan's Motoring Service

COSMOPOLITAN'S MOTORING SERVICE
119 West 40th Street, New York City.

Enclosed is.....in stamps for which send me Booklets Nos.....
.....
Official Touring Map of the U. S.....and District Maps Nos.....
My car is.....
Name .....
Address .....
I would like to know the approximate resale value of my car.
Make..... Model.....
Year..... Miles Driven.....

fresh from the factory

* fresh wherever you get it

* After tobacco has been properly aged, cut, blended and packed for smoking, the sooner you smoke it the better it is.

Every carton of Tuxedo is dated, showing the last day on which it may be sold.

FRESH Tuxedo TOBACCO

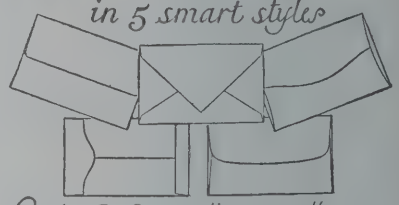
Now 15¢

© Guaranteed by The American Tobacco Co. INCORPORATED

somewhat shaken but so far as he could tell not really hurt. A holly tree had broken his plunge; its prongs had scratched him, but the stiff foliage had saved his bones. He must have been flung right against the top of it. With one arm thrown up he had saved his face as he shot in among the barbed leaves and spiney twigs—he remembered doing that. Even in the shock and flurry of the smash-up he had not failed to hold fast to his burden. One set of fingers were gripped in the stout twine fastenings of it as he lifted himself up and recovered his hat from where it had fallen.

The car was alongside him. Its nose was half buried, right on the verges of the swamp; its rear wheels, though, still rested on the narrow strip of solid ground. But it would run no more for a while; an appraising glance at it told Solitaire that. A forward fender was stripped entirely away. Through its dished-in front the radiator was slobbering steam and hot water, and the back axle had knuckled and twisted out of all proper shape, where it had struck something solid and unresisting as the car came slap down after that violent back kick.

He circled behind the car. Feary lay on his face in a little pool of saffron water, his figure curiously foreshortened. One of his legs was twisted up under him in an unnatural crook and the trouser leg that covered it seemed strangely flabby. He might not be dead but he surely had a dead look about him. Certainly the leg was smashed. Probably the steering wheel had done that. Solitaire saw now that the steering wheel was bent forward on its stem as though a heavy body had been jammed with great violence against it; he had overlooked that detail in his first swift inventory of damage.



He put down the parcel, caught hold of Feary by the hollows under his arms and, without troubling to turn him over, dragged him through the soft ooze to a sizable cypress tree fifteen feet out in the edges of the swamp and left him, still face downward, behind the tree bole. Returning to the roadway, through muck halfway up to his legs, he observed with satisfaction that the intervening trunk almost completely hid the flattened body.

This admirably suited Solitaire. If Feary was dead he would rest there as well as anywhere. If he wasn't dead or dying, but only knocked cold, it merely was a question of time—of minutes, perhaps, hours possibly—before those who must be following, found him. Anyone who came upon the crippled car hunkered down halfway on and halfway off the strip of road would search about the spot, of course. Personally, he rather preferred Feary dead to Feary living; thereby things would be simplified.

To lighten his slimed feet he cleansed them as well as he could and with his precious package bestowed under his arm stood for a moment invoicing the prospect. Taking a short cut to one side or the other was not to be thought of. Either he would bog down, perhaps to founder and be smothered, or what was almost as serious a thing, he would get lost. So he must push ahead, across the slash, traversing a built-up dirt causeway that became of semi-liquid consistency in places where the seepage had come through its saturated walls. On ahead of him,

Style is a greater social asset than Beauty

EATON'S HIGHLAND LINEN in 5 smart styles

Caroline De Lancey will answer all questions relating to correct social correspondence
Address her in care of
EATON, CRANE & PIKE CO.
225 Fifth Avenue New York

$100 a Week FOR DRAWING

How would you like a fine position at $100 a week? If you like to draw, develop your talent in a practical way. Good commercial artists earn this much, and more. Well-trained beginners soon command $50 a week.

Learn Quickly at Home

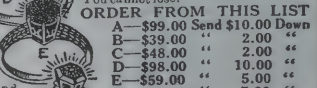
The "Federal" Master Course teaches you by mail in your spare time. No experience needed. Read "Your Future," a splendid book telling all about this remarkable course, and the success of Federal Students. If you are in earnest and 16 years old or more, write today for this free book, kindly stating your age.

Federal School of Commercial Designing
253 Federal Schools Bldg.
Minneapolis, Minn.

$2 AND 10 MONTHS DOWN TO PAY

NEW LOW PRICES—SAVE 1/3

You can now buy on credit at lower prices than even cash jewelers charge, because we import our diamonds from Antwerp and sell at wholesale prices. Your dealings with us are strictly confidential. There is no red tape nor delay. Your credit is good



30 DAYS TRIAL

Select article desired and send deposit to show good faith. If you are not satisfied we will return your money. This is the most liberal offer ever made. You cannot lose.

ALL BLUE WHITE DIAMONDS Perfectly cut, sparkling, brilliant, genuine Diamonds, set in 14 Kt. and 18 Kt. solid gold rings. 8% yearly increase in value allowed. Guarantee certificate with each sale.

ORDER FROM THIS LIST

A—$99.00	Send $10.00	Down
B—$39.00	" 2.00	"
C—$48.00	" 2.00	"
D—$98.00	" 10.00	"
E—$59.00	" 5.00	"
F—$67.00	" 7.00	"

$22

24 in. PEARLS—DIA. CLASP

WRITE FOR CATALOG No. 871

It brings a big jewelry store right into your home

14 Kt. Gold PLATINUM FINISH $16.00 4 Genuine Diamonds $42.00

$32.00 Only $2.00 Down

Address Div. 871

STERLING DIAMOND & WATCH CO.
83 PARK ROW WORLD BLDG. NEW YORK

some two hundred yards, he saw open water; a flimsy looking corduroy bridge spanned a slough. At no matter what risk, he must for a while stick to the highway, such as it was.

He started on, then halted and turned back, possessed suddenly of an idea. He took his own hat off his head and pitched it well out into the swamp to the left of the squatting car. It sailed prettily, struck flat and floated brim down. That was good. It was more than likely the pursuers would waste time there, probing for the hat's owner and for the money. Wearing Feary's hat, he went east, running hard and casting up with his feet sprays of yellow water.

As he ran, high thoughts possessed him. Thanks to chance and his late associate's recklessness he was on his own; he was playing the good old single-handed game again. Win or lose now, he would play it out so to the show-down.

And wasn't it a stake worth playing for? —a quarter of a million! There was the suggestion of an anticipatory caress in the way he hugged the small round firm burden to his breast as he splashed ahead. He had an almost overpowering desire to halt and tear away the wrappings, to open the container, to feast his eyes and favor his fingers with the sight and the touch of what was inside. He wanted to fondle it, tick it off in thousands and tens of thousands, stack it in sheaves on some handy stump. But he put the teasing thought from him. It was delectable, but also it was childish, foolish, dangerous, entirely out of the present question.

From the dizzied second when realization of the value of his prize came out of the sputterings of the man in overalls, Solitaire had designed to keep the whole lot for himself. Had the amount been within the scope of their original calculations—running up, say, to seventy or eighty thousand dollars—he would have kept the faith, breaking bulk fairly with the confederated pair of his helpers. But this purse was too big for splitting or subsplitting. It should be for him and him alone, a suitable reward for the larger risks he had taken and for his wits in scenting the great chance back yonder at the very beginning.

Perhaps Solitaire's reactions were unique —I don't know. Perhaps his temptation was comparable to those which come sometimes to men calling themselves honest. I am no psychologist to say which it was.

Anyhow, he had meant, from the moment of that first overpowering revelation, to trick the two accomplices for their shares—to make away with Feary, if needs be, at some favorable period of their flight, then later, when opportunity and comparative leisure served, to eliminate the Kid from consideration, either by violence or threats of violence, possibly by craft, but somehow. The Kid had been the smallest of his worries. The Kid was timorous with the lily liver of a rabbit and the guts of a guinea pig; in this equation he represented the Least Common Divisor. Bare suggestion of a gun play would take the soul right out of him.

But now the combination of a mud slide and a cypress root had solved the more pressing part of the problem. Practically, Feary had been disposed of by his

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen

"... and here's your Waterman"

SHE has hers, of course. But she's making sure that scratchy pens and gummy ink-wells will play no part in their vacation this summer and that their necessary correspondence will all be done out of doors in the open.

There is a size in

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen

that fits your hand exactly, and a style of point that was shaped and tempered to fit perfectly your individual character of handwriting.

Waterman dealers, the world over, will gladly help you in selecting this perfect combination.

THREE TYPES

Regular — Safety — Self-Filling

$2.50 and up

Waterman's Ideal Ink—Best For Fountain Pens and General Use—Writes Blue—Dries Black

L.E. Waterman Company
191 Broadway, New York
Boston Chicago San Francisco

own act, saving mess and bother. The immediate concern was for Solitaire to save, intact, himself and the swag.

On all sides the outlook was lined with difficulties; apprehension began to ride even higher than his hopes rode. By now, the whole territory behind him must be up and humming. There would be policemen, constables, sheriffs and sheriffs' deputies on the move. There would be citizens organizing in groups as volunteer vigilantes, or trailing as solitary huntsmen. If he succeeded in eluding the domestic possemen, there would be private detectives—Burns men and Pinkertons—hurrying down from the North as fast as the steam cars could fetch them. And here he was afoot, on his own slender resources, and a stranger to these parts, using an accent foreign to the customary forms of speech, a figure fit for the scrutiny of every native eye.

He had set foot upon the sagging corduroys at the passage of the slough when the hope of deliverance budded in his mind to definite form. What quickened his brain to a shaped purpose was a thing he just now heard. Ahead of him, as yet out of sight but clearly audible, something—men or cattle or possibly men on horseback—made splashing, floundering sounds in the slushy underfooting. He caught no note suggestive of tires or wagon gear jangling; but the slog-slog of soggy feet was plain enough, not far off, either, and drawing nearer.

In their well devised course he and Feary neither had met nor had overtaken any others. They had passed, at a distance, some darky cabins and that was all; the section over which they had come was one of poor lands and of few and scattered houses. But here, in this whereabouts, walled in by quagmires and by dense hedges of poisonous looking greenery, he was about to encounter these oncoming travelers. The travelers, whoever they were, conceivably might not suspect him, but assuredly they would mark him for an alien. Inevitably, the townspeople, outpaced thus far but no doubt coming up hot-clip, would ask questions of all and sundry along the way, especially with the clue of the wrecked automobile to warm the chase for them.

But the pursuers would look for a man reported to be armed and presumably desperate, a man dressed after a certain fashion and answering to a given description, and, moreover, one literally quilted with stolen moneys in a vast amount. What if such a man, thus distinguished, should vanish altogether and in his stead there went forward one who was ragged and penniless and in all seeming respects a harmless wayfarer? What if this transformed loiterer very shortly, at a point somewhat distant from these present surroundings, so maneuvered as to get himself bestowed in a retreat where the searchers would seek last of all, if at all, for a driven fugitive known to be enormously in funds?

The project, whole and complete, spurred into his mind in that same flash when the sound of approaching steps came to his sharpened ears. In no time at all he was out, thigh-deep in the swamp, and had wedged himself in under the bridge logs, close against the sodden, quaky bank. A minute or two later two mounted men clattered over his head, speaking of trivial personal matters in their drawled vernacular.

A little farther along the sight of an abandoned car bedded down across their path, like a brood sow, sent them hurrying forward. So they did not see the blocky figure, unencumbered excepting by its dripping wet garments, that immediately thereafter emerged from hiding and regained the made ground and ran swiftly off, heading for the higher places lying to the east and south of the drowned lands.

With Solitaire haste was the essence of the contract he had made with himself. With as little delay as possible he counted on snugging himself in where, by his estimations, he would be safest from the chances of detection. Lying doggo in his cell in some remote and rural hoosegow he could, by means of newspapers and lock-up gossip, keep track of the vain hue and cry until it ran its abating course. Without bringing suspicion upon himself he could follow the fortunes of his late associates. He would know whether Feary lived or had died, whether the Sweet Caps Kid had been apprehended as an accessory before the fact. If, in spite of all, they found him there, if they recognized him for the Tuckahominy hold-up, he still would have a potent weapon in reserve for his own defense. Through the bars he could traffic with them; a prisoner, he yet could bargain practically on his own terms. For he alone could lead them back to the treasure with which he had levanted. It would be his freedom against so much cold cash. Money talks and in his behalf a quarter of a million would argue with an eloquent separate tongue for every one of its quarter of a million units.

Solitaire figured on getting a matter of thirty days or so in a convenient county jail. His mistake was that he did not know the custom of the neighborhood. What he got was ninety days on a county chain gang—a vastly different thing.

Where the swamp petered out, first to half flooded islands set in reedy and weedy waters, and then to solid earth, he struck across fields and woodlots. He slept, supperless, that night in a thicket. In the morning at daylight, on the edge of a patch of young sweet corn, he stripped a scarecrow's frame of a terribly faded, terribly weather-beaten coat. Under a brush pile he hid the coat which he had worn in his rôle as an itinerant steam fitter looking for odd jobs; that was the part he had played coming into the State. With the coat he left the two pistols—his own automatic and the overalled man's cheap gun—and all other things which by any contingency might serve to identify him in his proper person. He carried the scarecrow's bleached and ragged vestment on his arm as he went along on his way.

Luck continued to serve him. Two miles farther on he came upon a cabin, standing in a small clearing. Watching from a fence row, he saw a negro woman stretch a plow rope between the pole of a martin box and the trunk of a chinaberry tree and drape thereon a meager string of newly rinsed garments which she took from a tub in the doorway. Then she balanced a heavy basket of garden truck on her head and went singing along a grass lane into the woods. He waited until he made sure that, with this negress gone, the cabin was quite empty. He took from the line a damp cotton jumper, ragged at the elbows, and from the house a pair of broken brogans and an ancient cap. On a kitchen table in the one room stood a tin plate containing pones of stale corn bread and some slivers of side meat, glazed over with cold grease. He breakfasted swiftly on these scraps. Safely back again beyond the brush fence he made more changes in his wardrobe. He now was satisfied with his appearance; it ought to deceive anybody.

He knew that not far to the east of him must run the railroad. He came upon it, at a siding where a south bound freight waited for a passenger train to pass. When the passenger train went by and the freight shuffled back on to the main line Solitaire went with her, curled up in a far corner of an empty box car. Fifteen miles below, the free passenger dropped off when a halt was made at a fair-sized town, a county seat by the looks of it.

An aproned individual who, by the looks of him, was a solid citizen, stood at the door of what apparently was his own retail grocery establishment at a corner of the street running parallel with the tracks. With his sockless feet dragging in the pilfered shoes that were too big for him, Solitaire limped up to this person, beginning his plea for alms in the studied whine of the professional panhandler.

The business man shook his head.

"Better get out of here while you can," he said, in a soft and almost a gentle tone. "This ain't the best town in the state for tramps. And you make the second one I've seen already this mawnin'."

It was the cue Solitaire desired. He cursed the citizen vilely. He called him a certain name—a name often used in debate elsewhere but not as yet popular for common usage in the cotton belt. There it is still the primest fighting word of all the fighting words.

With a promptness of gesture which did not match in with his air of being a sober burgess nor yet with his lazy speaking voice, the grocer flung his right hand back under his apron skirt. For Solitaire, realism was being carried too far. He had calculated, by his insolence, to bring on a wordy encounter, no more. But what sort of a country was this where side street retailers carried gats in the daytime and craved excuse to use them?

Solitaire ran, ducking low as he turned the corner. Half a block along he ran into the arms of a coatless man in a uniform cap with a large silver badge pinned to his shirt.

It seemed that in the squatty city hall the city judge sat, awaiting any possible court business. Solitaire, being arraigned, gave a name and the frightfully indignant merchant and the city marshal gave testimony.

"Hum," said His Honor. "The big cities, seems like, are tryin' to unload all their tough hoboes on us folks down here—gettin' to be worse than the boll weevil. Let's see, now—vagrancy, beggin', usin' profane and insultin' language, disaw'dly conduct—say, I reckin it's just about time some of you bums from up Nawth had a lesson."

Solitaire grinned. Calling him a bum—him who could buy and sell this dump of a city hall and its police judge five times over and still have a couple of hundred

Are you making the most of your hair? Here are six pictures of the same girl showing her hair dressed in six different ways. Notice how the various arrangements change her appearance.

The way you dress your hair and the way you care for it, means the difference between looking attractive or just ordinary.

©THE R.L.W. CO.

Why you must have beautiful well-kept hair—to be attractive

WEAR your hair becomingly, always have it beautifully clean and well-kept, and it will add more than anything else to your attractiveness and charm.

Wherever you go your hair is noticed most critically.

People judge you by its appearance.

It tells the world what you are.

Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

You, too, can have beautiful hair if you care for it properly.

In caring for the hair, proper shampooing is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out all the real life and lustre, the natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

When oily, dry or dull

If your hair is too oily, or too dry; if it is dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy; if the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch; or if it is full of dandruff, it is all due to improper shampooing.

You will be delighted to see how easy it is to keep your hair looking beautiful, when you use Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo.

The quick, easy way

Two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water is sufficient to cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly.

Simply pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out quickly and easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil—the chief causes of all hair troubles.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it really is. It keeps the scalp soft and healthy, the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Splendid for Children—Fine for Men

Mulsified

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Cocoanut Oil Shampoo

Palm and olive oils—nothing else—give nature's green color to Palmolive Soap.

She looks as young as ever

How often one hears this said of some woman whom the passing years seem to leave untouched. She rivals her daughters in freshness, and other women marvel.

Keep that schoolgirl complexion—this is the secret, and every woman should share it. Don't let the years write their record on your face when care will prevent it.

Begin today the beautifying that will help renew youth and charm. It will put natural color in your cheeks and make your face look firm and young.

Simple, but effective

This restorative treatment may seem almost too simple, but it is based upon real skin hygiene.

Dirt, oil and perspiration accumulate and must be removed. Otherwise the pores enlarge and blackheads and blotches result.

Wash your face daily with pure soap and you needn't fear complexion troubles. Your skin will remain firm, with a smooth, satiny texture which makes maturity as attractive as early youth.

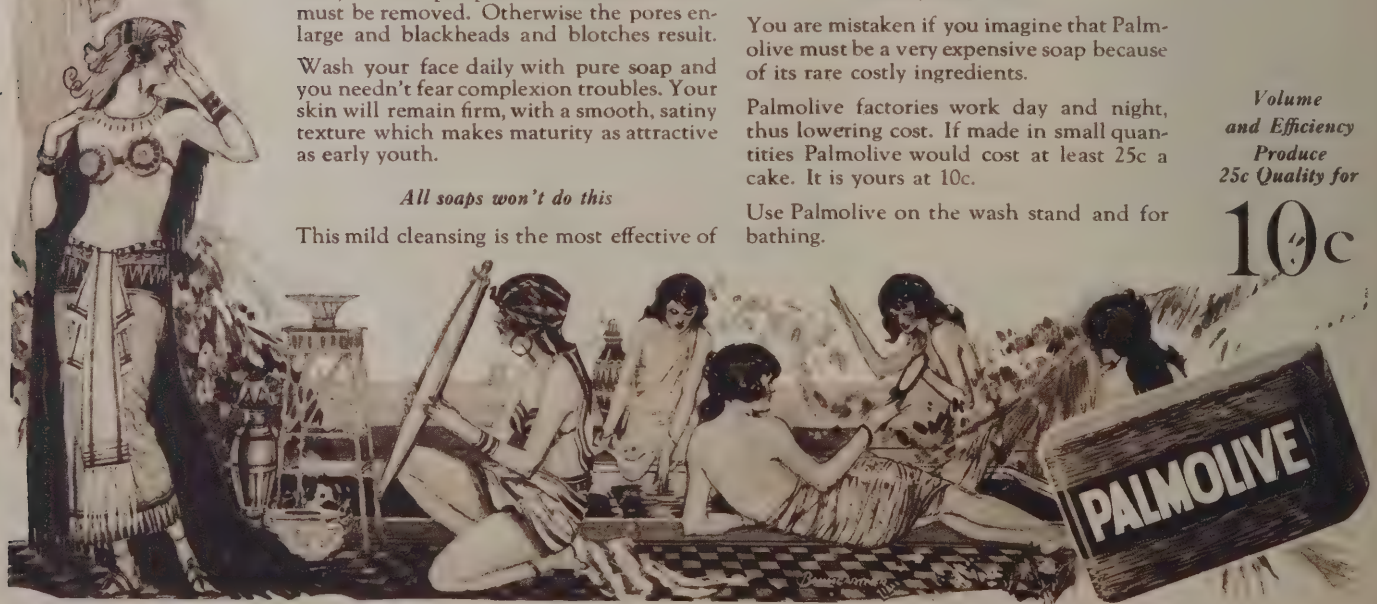
All soaps won't do this

This mild cleansing is the most effective of all skin treatments, but you mustn't be careless about soap. Facial soap must be mild, soothing while it cleanses. It must be lotion-like, with no harshness. Such a soap is Palmolive, blended from palm and olive oils. They are nature's cleansers, valued since the days of ancient Egypt.

Apply the creamy lather freely, massaging it thoroughly into the skin. Rinse thoroughly and dry gently with a soft towel.

Bedtime is best for cosmetic cleansing, that your skin may be renewed and refreshed while you sleep. In the morning rinse with cold water and then look in the mirror. Your reflection will delight you by its radiant freshness and charm.

Luxury soap for 10c



You are mistaken if you imagine that Palmolive must be a very expensive soap because of its rare costly ingredients.

Palmolive factories work day and night, thus lowering cost. If made in small quantities Palmolive would cost at least 25c a cake. It is yours at 10c.

Use Palmolive on the wash stand and for bathing.

Volume and Efficiency Produce 25c Quality for 10c

Copyright 1923—The Palmolive Company 1752

thousands left! Besides, this scheme of his was progressing so beautifully! He just had to grin. But his honor on the bench did not see the joke.

"Think maybe it's funny, huh?" he commented acidly. "I'll learn you to laugh—three months' hard labor. Any other cases, chief? If not, court's adjourned."

Evidently justice hereabouts moved speedily. Solitaire ate his midday meal, such as it was, at a place called a county farm. Already he was encased in a shapeless two-piece rig of broad striped black and white and on his legs were noisy hobbles. Most of the convicts at the farm were "single shackled"—a ring fast on the left ankle and a long chain with a loose end which might be looped up about the waist. But for some reason or other, perhaps because he was a city product, so Solitaire subsequently decided, the blacksmith who served as deputy keeper chose to double shackle Solitaire, with a ring for either ankle, one riveted on him and the other locked on, and an eighteen-inch length of clanking ironmongery to join them.

He stayed at the farm less than two hours. That same afternoon, with two other newly sentenced offenders, he was taken in a wagon to a camp, so called, in the lowermost edge of the county, a dismal empty place of tidal creeks and sand banks, and was entered there as a member of a road gang. Part of the time the gang repaired roads over which scarcely anyone traveled. Mostly, though, they spaded out canals and laterals for the reclaiming of some salt water meadows, digging and wheelbarrowing and stacking from sun-up until dark under the eyes of warders who were so singularly alike that it seemed they must have come, finished and set-up, from the same mold—three lanky, sun-dried men with prominent noses and unprominent chins and languid malarial eyes, who carried sawed-off shotguns and heavy canes and seemed to dislike all things except authority and chewing tobacco.

At night Solitaire slept—if the mosquitoes, which took on at dusk when the sand flies left off, would let him sleep—as one of a double row who lay on fouled blankets upon straw, with their heads lined close up under the side walls of their canvas shelter and their feet edging an aisle down the middle; each one of them being threaded on by a link of his own private chain to a longer and heavier chain which stretched the length of the tent. He was fed on corn bread and salt pork and blackstrap molasses and a brackish fluid which passed for coffee. Six days a week, while his cumbered shank bones ached continuously to the weights upon them, and the winged vermin stung him and bit him and hummed at him, and the semi-tropical sun cooked him, he shoveled stinky black mud or else fine hot white sand. Sundays were the days of rest. He spent his Sundays beneath the tent with his bondmates, all of them tethered together as though for the night watch, like so many uneasy living charms strung on a giant's bangle; and the guards sat under a fly and played seven-up.

Ninety days Solitaire did thus and so, and all that time the irons were never loosed off from his legs. He toiled until he was spent from heat and exhaustion and insects' poison. He got a touch of coastal fever from the uncongenial climate and was cured of it by his toil. In his filthy motley he looked rather like a gross and unwholesome worm, or rather more like the piebald larva of some vast worm, and he lived the life of a worm. In all his ninety days on the gang he saw no newspaper, nor heard one single informing word from any source of what went on in the world beyond his resident marsh. He might as well have been dead. Often he almost wished he were dead.

It was along about the beginning of May when Solitaire first penetrated the inland swamp where Feary smashed up his car for him. It was early in July when he returned to it, walking with a peculiar spraddle-legged gait which had become his enforced habit. The swamp thatch along the marges was jungle-thick by now and the slough was shrunken up and all its surface was scummy from stagnation; instead of standing inches above water level the causeway stood a good yard above it. As soon as he was in sight of the crossing he broke into a shambling run, scuffling his feet over the earth. It would be a good long time before he accustomed himself to the fact that he could take a long and a free step. Now, for all his haste, his stride measured just eighteen inches.

In a fierce fever of hurry he splashed down off the roadbed and, stooping, pushed under the corduroy bridge and felt in a little recess in the spongy soil. His heart gave a big jump in him when the probing fingers met a solid cylindrical object. Through his captivity he had been tormented by profound misgivings touching on this hiding place for his treasure. He had thoughts of the possibility of a freshet swelling the slough and washing the bank away, or a hog rooting the cache out; of the chance that repairing the bridge, say, some human visitor had happened upon it. But here it was, identically where he had left it and surely all whole and tight. The wrappings about it were molded and stained but still quite intact.

He could not wait another minute. This was the moment he had been picturing since the end of spring. He must have a look at what was inside—must tally it, bill by bill, and count it in multiples and check and re-check the noble total of it. Squeezing the package in both affectionate hands, he scrambled out from under the logs and on a dry place behind a clump of young water maples he squatted down, got a cheap new knife out of his pocket and cut the mildewed strings. The paper, glued by the dampness to what it enclosed, stuck tightly. He set the thing on end, ripped away a segment of the adhering cover from the top and seeing then that the container was of tin, sealed and soldered fast, with a grunt of eagerness he drove the knife-blade down through the thin metal and wrenched sideways to make the cut larger. He bent the edges of the opening down and in.

A smear of bright red instantly appeared upon the hand that gripped the can to hold it upright. He must have gashed himself—no, he hadn't either. The sticky red stuff wasn't blood; it hadn't come from him. It had come from the triangular rip in the tin top. More of it was coming, oozing out under jostling and pressure and bringing with it an oily, pungent, familiar smell.

He stood up, turning the can downward and away from him, and with a small bubbling sound a slender stream of the thick red liquid spurted forth, coating his hands and splattering his legs and his old shoes, and making a little red pool at his feet. It continued to run out until he knew the receptacle must be about empty. To make sure, he shook it and the answer from within was a very faint splash and gurgle. He felt empty, too. There was an all-gone sensation at the pit of his stomach as though he had eaten no breakfast that morning, as though his disappointment had translated itself into a hunger pang.

Immediately, though, he pulled himself together, readjusting. Solitaire had a certain rough philosophy in him. Those have to be philosophers of a sort who live by the chancy trade he followed.

"Devil of a country!" he said aloud. "I'll say it's a devil of a country where even a rube goin' home to paint up his hen house or his back stoop or somethin' has to pack a gat on his flank."

He shook his head in puzzlement. It was as if this shook a new thought loose in his mind. Addressing himself, he spoke on: "But say, look here now, that guy told me, well as he could for stutterin', that it was the big money he was carryin'. Yes, and didn't I ast him twice't to make sure, and didn't he try to say 'Yes' plain as a guy could that was past talkin'? That guy was too skeered to try to lie to me. What the . . ."

With a dripping red finger he shucked away the torn paper altogether and, turning the can over, found pasted on the under side of it a printed label.

"So that's the answer to the little riddle," he said, almost casually. "Well, darn a stutterin' guy anyways!"

He tossed the smeary thing from him and shambled briskly away. He stopped once to stoop down and rub the scars on his irked ankles, then went on without a backward glance.

The can rested on a tussock of rank swamp grass, its branded side looking up to the hot sun so that the lettering on the label stood out in clear relief.

It read as follows:

ACME READY MIXED PAINT COMPANY

ST. LOUIS, MO., U. S. A.

ONE QUART OF VERMILION

Those to whom a masterly story is one of the joys of life will eagerly await Irvin Cobb's story in COSMOPOLITAN for July—on sale June tenth

COOKS THREE THINGS AT ONCE

Ready to cook breakfast right at the table

BECAUSE it cooks three things at the same time, the Armstrong Table Stove offers a really practical way of preparing any meal right at the table.

You can cook above, between and beneath the double heating unit, all at the same time. For breakfast, fry eggs in the aluminum pan on top, bread in the toaster which fits between, and browns, without warping, on both sides at once, and grill bacon in the deep aluminum pan below.

The Armstrong Table Stove is a pleasure to own because its gleaming white enamel does not tarnish from the heat. The sparkless tilting plug makes heat control simple and easy, for it lifts off—no tugging or pulling.

Ask to see an Armstrong Table Stove—in the distinctive square shape—at your electrical or hardware dealer's. Price $12.50 with aluminum toaster, deep broiling pan, griddle, four egg cups and rack. Write for our folder, "A Week of Menus," which contains suggestions for breakfast, lunch, afternoon tea, dinner and late supper for seven days.

THE ARMSTRONG MANUFACTURING CO.
Formerly The Standard Stamping Company
196 Seventh Avenue Huntington, W. Va.

A cast aluminum waffle iron which needs no greasing may be purchased separately for $4.00. It fits into the toaster compartment and makes beautiful, crisp waffles, browned on both sides at once.

ARMSTRONG TABLE STOVE
Cooks 3 things at once
Makes Waffles Too!

The Lone Wolf Returns

(Continued from page 94)

graced a virtuous lady of a sudden turned so venturesome as to call on a man in his lodgings alone. Almost anybody else it would surely have taken in; even Lanyard found himself for a moment at loss to account for this revolutionary innovation, a change of rôle made the more confounding by the fact that Liane had gone to the length of dressing it with garments of a semi-négligé sort whose circumspection was hardly akin to the spirit that sported them.

But one glimpse of Lanyard's eyes, one flash of their reclaimed intelligence, served to make plain the poverty of objective artifice as an aid to Liane's intentions. It indeed did more; it struck pale glints of panic from her own eyes, or something very like it in the sight of one who knew as yet no reason why it should discountenance the woman to find him, whom she had sought of her own accord, awake and in his proper mind.

She held a dead wait with a hand on the door knob behind her, dusky eyes quick in a face that wanted a shade or so of its habitually high illumination, lips a trace apart as if with a cry unsounded.

But the pause imposed by her illegible emotion was brief of life; with her next breath Liane recollected herself and, uttering a low sound of compassion, crossed the room to kneel by the head of the berth.

"No, no, my friend!" She spoke in French, her arms lightly forced back to the pillow the shoulders which Lanyard was lifting. "Rest tranquil—with that poor head! Thou dost still suffer greatly, my old one?"

Lanyard mumbled a dashed negative with lips that were muffled, before he could object, by lips ardent and tender, whose clinging intimacy he escaped at length only by moving his head aside.

Happily, that movement excited only a mumble of pain, entirely bearable; he was able to muster a smile by way of redressing the rebuff. "I say!" he remonstrated in his most British English, "we are getting on, rather—aren't we?"

The woman drew back sharply and, half kneeling, half resting on her heels, showed a face sad with reproach. "Hast thou forgotten, then?"

"More than I guessed, going on this bit of business, my dear." Lanyard was firm in his stand against French; it was easier to be unsentimental in sound Anglo-Saxon. "What bothers me most is this," he proceeded in querulous vein, a self-conscious smile accounting for his neglect of the stricken eyes staring into his: "I've remembered and forgotten much too much all at once. It's very discouraging—you may be interested to know—to wake up from what amounted to a sound long nap and find that seven perfectly useful months have been stolen while one slept."

"It is true, then, what I feared!"

"Afraid it is, Liane, if what you feared was that a blow on the head had bumped my right mind back to its throne."

Slowly and with a bitter smile the woman repeated the English phrase, "A blow on the head!"

"That's what did the trick, and I don't mind telling you it hurt like the devil."

"But what of the blow to my heart?" Her closed hand smote Liane's breast. "You complain with reason of having been robbed of seven months of memory; but what of me, who stand to lose seven months of memories?"

"Pardon?" Lanyard queried, politely dense.

"You loved me well in that time while you were your old, true self."

"Loved you, Liane? And forgot! Ah, no! you ask me to believe too much."

"You jest—and my heart is breaking."

"It's no joke to forget an experience like that, something which one man in a million would be lucky to know once in his life."

"One in a million!"

"I beg your pardon; I was counting in your unsuccessful lovers as well."

"But this is too much!"

With an abrupt movement the woman started up, to pause with face averted and hands fast laced. As promptly Lanyard tumbled out of the berth.

"Forgive me, Liane," he said contritely. "I dare say I am a bit light-headed; it would be surprising if I weren't, considering that I've experienced something of a shock today, and not by any means a physical shock merely—and am still shaken from it. You can hardly demand rational behavior of a revenant lately spewed back into life by a psychic earthquake. That it was a strictly private earthquake doesn't make its after effects any the less unsettling."

"True; it is you rather who have me to forgive." With a spontaneous generosity that shamed him, Liane swung back to Lanyard and caught both his hands to her bosom. "In my sadness and pain I forget you cannot understand . . ."

"Then make me understand. I've no one else to look to—and it would be unkindness to leave me in the dark."

"But give me time to consider . . ." She let go his hands and sank into the room's one chair. "It's going to hurt me to tell you, Michael, even more than it will hurt you."

"And how is that?"

"Because, I think . . ." She studied him awhile with a troubled gaze . . . "I think you have gone back to the ways of thought that were yours seven months ago."

"And what is so deplorable in that? Ways of thought about what?"

The woman leaned forward to bend her head to his in confidence, but gave a slight start instead and drew back with a veering glance as if disturbed by some noise unheard by Lanyard, then laid a finger to her lips, sprang up lightly and went to the port to look out. From this, in agreeable disappointment, she crossed back to the door, inclining to it an attentive ear for some seconds before opening it furtively to peer out, and concluding the performance with an expression of alarms allayed.

"I was mistaken," she announced, shooting the bolt, "there is nobody."

"Madame la Comtesse was expecting—"

She gave her head a shake of irritation excited by his levity, and without warning whipped from the folds of her négligé an automatic pistol, which she pressed into Lanyard's hand regardless of his efforts to refuse it.

"No, take it—take it, I say, while there is time."

"But what the deuce!"

"Take it, I tell you—you may need it soon." And then as Lanyard humored her for the sake of peace, she proceeded with every appearance of offering a complete explanation: "That dolt of a doctor told me you were unarmed."

"Bright? But how does he know? And why should he care?"

"Your effects were searched this morning while you were at breakfast, and the steward who picked you up after your fall took the trouble to find out that you had no weapon about you."

"Thoughtful of all hands, I'm sure!" Lanyard murmured in amazement. "But do tell me what I have done to deserve so much respect?"

"Presently," Liane promised in a hushed voice. She moved nearer and held out an open hand. "No," she insisted, and brusquely brushed aside the pistol when he tried to return it, "the necklace! Give me that now—we can come to explanations later. Let me hide it away before they come to put you under arrest—they may, at any moment."

"Indeed?" Impatience with all this, as it seemed, determined effort to mystify him to no end, resulted in the pistol's being flirted into the berth, and peremptory imprisonment of the woman's wrists. "Now!" Lanyard demanded, "come to your senses, Liane, be intelligible if you can. Why should I be in danger of arrest? What is this necklace you are raving about?"

"Give it to me first——"

"I know nothing of any necklace."

"You have forgotten; nevertheless, you have it. You told me you would never let it leave your person, you must have it hidden somewhere about you now. Find and give it to me before it is too late."

Her agitation was too truly rendered to seem put on for a purpose; and though he had not the least inkling of its cause, Lanyard reflected that in those seven months anything might have happened, the amplest reason might all too possibly exist for the distress of mind which Liane was so vividly portraying. Half persuaded, he released her wrists and, stepping back, ran the hands of old cunning through his garments, locating every spot which in former days he had been accustomed to use as a temporary cache for purloined property—and drawing every one blank. Winding up with a shrug of fatigued incredulity: "There is nothing," he declared shortly. "Now be so kind——"

"Nothing!" Consternation rang in that guarded cry. "They must have it already, then, they must have searched you and found it while you slept! The doctor spoke of having given you a sleeping powder—enough, he said, to keep you quiet till morning."

"I didn't take it."

"They must have thought you had, or you wouldn't have been left unwatched, I would have found it impossible to see you. You have been asleep?" Lanyard nodded. "You have slept all afternoon, and soundly?" He confessed that he had. Liane subsided, crushed by despair, upon the cushioned transom beneath the port. "It was the same to them as if you had taken their drug—the opportunity they needed. Now they have found the necklace—you are lost!"

Have you ever tried it this way?

When you do a bee-line from the office to an evening

YOU know, of course, that Listerine has dozens of uses as a safe antiseptic. But do you know of its unusual properties as a safe non-irritating deodorant?

Whenever you don't have time for a tub or a shower, or when these are not accessible, simply try dousing on Listerine. See how cool, refreshed and clean it leaves you feeling.

When you're hot and sticky after summer sports

When there are five hundred members and only four showers

And best of all, Listerine used this way as a deodorant cannot irritate or injure the most delicate skin. Rather, it is soothing, healing and evaporates quickly; and cannot stain garments.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY

SAINT LOUIS, U. S. A.

"A dollar a minute"

"That's what I figure my spare-time study with the I. C. S. was worth to me. It was the best investment I ever made. I'm now making $160 a week—or almost twice as much in a single hour as I used to make in a whole day!"

Every mail brings letters from some of the two million students of the International Correspondence Schools telling of promotions and increases in salary as the rewards of spare-time study.

What are you doing with the hours after supper? Can you afford to let them slip by unimproved when you can easily make them mean so much? One hour a day spent with the I. C. S. will prepare you for the position you want in the work you like best. Yes, it will! Put it up to us to prove it. Mark and mail this coupon now!

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 2517-B, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation on my part, please tell me how I can qualify for the position or in the subject before which I have marked an X:

BUSINESS TRAINING DEPARTMENT

☐ Business Management	☐ Salesmanship
☐ Industrial Management	☐ Advertising
☐ Personnel Organization	☐ Better Letters
☐ Traffic Management	☐ Foreign Trade
☐ Business Law	☐ Stenography and Typing
☐ Banking and Banking Law	☐ Business English
☐ Accountancy (including C.P.A.)	☐ Civil Service
☐ Nicholson Cost Accounting	☐ Railway Mail Clerk
☐ Bookkeeping	☐ Common School Subjects
☐ Private Secretary	☐ High School Subjects
☐ Business Spanish ☐ French	☐ Illustrating

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL DEPARTMENT

☐ Electrical Engineering	☐ Architect
☐ Electric Lighting	☐ Blue Print Reading
☐ Mechanical Engineer	☐ Contractor and Builder
☐ Mechanical Draftsman	☐ Architectural Draftsman
☐ Machine Shop Practice	☐ Concrete Builder
☐ Railroad Positions	☐ Structural Engineer
☐ Gas Engine Operating	☐ Chemistry ☐ Pharmacy
☐ Civil Engineer	☐ Automobile Work
☐ Surveying and Mapping	☐ Airplane Engines
☐ Metallurgy ☐ Mining	☐ Agriculture and Poultry
☐ Steam Engineering ☐ Radio	☐ Mathematics

Name.....
Street
Address..... 1-10-23
City..... State.....
Occupation.....

Persons residing in Canada should send this coupon to the International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Limited, Montreal, Canada

Bring Out the Hidden Beauty

Beneath that soiled, discolored, faded or aged complexion is one fair to look upon

Mercolized Wax

gradually, gently absorbs the devitalized surface skin, revealing the young, fresh, beautiful skin underneath. Used by refined women who prefer complexion of true naturalness. Have you tried it?

Mercolized Wax (beautifier) . . 95c
Powdered Saxolite (for wrinkles) 75c
Phelactine (hair remover) . . $1
Powdered Tarkroot (face rester) $1

All Drug Stores and Toilet Counters.

Dearborn Supply Co., 2358 Clybourn Ave., Chicago

"But I have often been 'lost' in my life," Lanyard retorted, unmoved more than by impatience with this everlasting beating about the bush. "And at present I feel less lost than quite newly found, and so prefer to think myself—until, at least, you consent to become more coherent."

Beneath the sheer silk perfect shoulders stirred disconsolately. "There is nothing one can do now—one can only wait."

"Let me recommend you to study myself, then—to my mind, a perfect pattern of patience."

Lanyard offered the cigarettes in an unfamiliar case he had found in his pockets, and when they were disdained philosophically helped himself, while the woman sat glowering at the door as if to wither the object of her spite, wherever he might lurk beyond those walls.

"That animal of a doctor! How dare he be so sly with me and at the same time such an imbecile!"

"Oh, very well!" said Lanyard, settling into the chair. "By all means let us begin with that good Doctor Bright. What has he done?"

"He came to me an hour ago, Michael, to put me on my guard against you."

"Considerate beggar. But do go on . . ."

"The idiot would like to make love to me. He thought he might worm into my good graces by warning me to keep an eye on my jewels, since it has transpired that you were the Lone Wolf."

"And since when has it transpired?"

"He told me that the captain had been advised by wireless, early this morning, to keep you under observation until we arrive at Nassau, where officers will board the vessel with a warrant for your arrest."

"Something to do with the missing necklace, of course."

"You're wanted in New York for stealing it. Your last great coup, my friend—and you bungled it."

"I did? Then I trust devoutly you are right, it was my last. From what you hint, Liane, I would seem to have been leading a busy life of late. If you would only be a little less vague . . ."

"If I hesitate to speak plainly," the woman reminded him gently, "it is because you are dear to me, Michael; I find it not easy to say anything that will give you pain."

"Console yourself by observing that I am prepared. You have told me so much already, a word here and a hint there, I could almost foretell this revelation you shrink from making." Lanyard shot a quizzical grin through the cigarette smoke. "I am accused of stealing a valuable necklace and making such an unworkmanlike job of it that I had to fly the States incognito. It would further appear that I wasn't very clever about making my escape, since my presence aboard this vessel is known and steps have been taken by the authorities to have me detained at her first port of call. For all of which, I presume, I have to thank that persevering hater of mine—and friend of yours—Morphew. What a memory the man must have! what a genius for bearing a grudge!"

"All that is good guesswork and substantially true"—the woman nodded regretfully—"all but your suspicions of Morphew. There you are wrong; he had nothing to do with this affair, Michael, it is all of your own contriving."

"You tell me that," Lanyard laughed, "and in the same breath that I am 'dear' to you! It's no good; Liane, you can't be Morphew's friend and mine."

"I tell you nothing but what of a certainty and my own knowledge I know. Morphew is nothing to me, you are everything; notwithstanding, your suspicions do him an injustice—he would have saved you in New York had you permitted. But you wouldn't listen to me when I prayed you to accept his offer of intervention . . ."

"That at least one finds easy to believe."

"And even now he would be your friend—yours as well as mine—if you would consent. Morphew stands prepared to save you yet, if we can find a way to slip through their fingers who await you at Nassau."

"But tell me how . . ."

"The very last thing before we sailed, Morphew sent Pagan to promise me, if I could persuade you to go ashore at Nassau and apply to his factors there, the agents who have charge of his bootlegging depot in the Bahamas, he would have us both conveyed secretly to France, in his own yacht."

"Truly?" Lanyard laughed again, flipped his cigarette through the port and sat up. "How charming of the man—but how strange! Who would ever suspect that rude and unlovely exterior disguised so much goodness and simplicity of heart!"

"You laugh because you do not trust me," Liane sullenly complained. "I have for months devoted myself to you—this is my reward."

"Prove me ungrateful, my dear," Lanyard lightly offered. "Prove me skeptical without sound cause and provocation—and you can ask nothing of me that I will refuse you in testimony to my penitence."

A stare of new intensity enveloped him. He saw her countenance overcast with petulance, an odd frame for eyes of singular wistfulness.

"You are wrong to tempt me with such a promise . . ."

"Why?" Lanyard parried. "Are you afraid of the test, or that I won't make good my word?"

"What makes me hesitate is fear lest you try to make your word good against your will. It's your love I want, Michael, not your duty—another name for hatred!"

"Do you truly believe you'd find me so contemptible, Liane? You should know me better than that."

"I know men better than you do, my dear friend; and when all's said, I know you are but little different from any other; only it is my lot to see you different . . ."

"Believe me," Lanyard began in some constraint, "I am not insensible——"

"No! say nothing now. When you have heard me out it shall be for you to say then whether or not I deserve better than mockery from you. But I prophesy, you will end by forgetting the fine promise you have just now made . . ."

Impressed against his bias, Lanyard gave a nod and nothing more; and then, seeing that she still hesitated as if distressed by his direct attention, he crossed to the port and stood with his lean, worn face ruddled by the sun's last rays.

It was going down in a flaming welter of rose and gold beyond a violet smudge to starboard, a blind loom of land at a distance difficult to guess because of the dazzle, though its relative nearness was manifest in the moderate sea that was running in its lee, all that was left to tell of that morning's fury; for while Lanyard looked, a small schooner swam astern, midway between the steamer and that dim shore, with slatting sails all black against the glare that burned the waters . . .

"Proceed, then," Lanyard prompted at length, watching the sun dip and vanish.

The woman's voice responded in a weary key from out the shadow at his elbow: "First of all, you must know you were mistaken about Mallison. He was a wretch, I don't dispute, capable of any infamy you please; but it was not he who made away with Folly's emeralds."

"You say that, no doubt, because he contrived to establish some sort of an alibi that resulted in his acquittal."

"He was never tried; he was granted liberty under bail and disappeared."

"And you reckon that proof of his innocence? Or is one to understand you absolve the fellow on Morphew's say-so?"

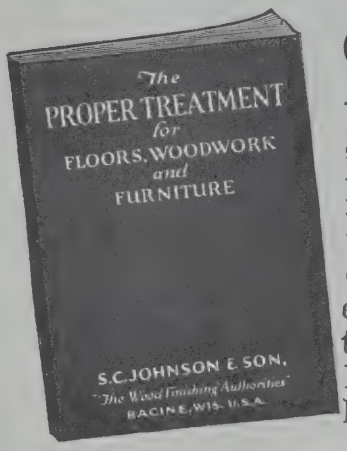
"But on your own, Michael."

"Mine!"

"You cannot know everything you confided to me after your accident; the many curious secrets you told me, such as that you remembered clearly having broken into Folly's and stolen her emeralds, beside yourself as you were that night with drink, and rebellious into the bargain against a social order that kept you poor and so prohibited your marrying Madame de Montalais."

The brief sub-tropic twilight was ebbing fast, night was sweeping swiftly over the face of the waters to blot out the last lingering souvenir of the routed sun. Lanyard looked down as it were into a well of gloom in which a blur of spectral pallor swam, source of those accents which were enunciating proofs of an intimacy with his mind and heart that passed all believing.

"I told you that!"



A low unhappy laugh floated up to him: "But more!"

"Under what circumstances?"

"Let me go back to the beginning . . . The night after that rencontre of yours with Mallison, Morphew dined me at the Abbaye, another of his establishments where the maître-d'hôtel happened to be a protégé of mine from Paris of pre-war days —but Morphew knew nothing about that. He had just finished telling how you had humiliated him before Folly and was making my blood curdle with vague threats to be revenged—oh but you were wrong to make an enemy of that one, Michael!—when he was called to the telephone. He came back grinning hideously and said his agents reported having traced you and Madame de Montalais to the Inn of the Green Woods. And you would never, Morphew boasted, return to New York the same man. I tried to wheedle him into disclosing his mind, but he was too wary, I learned nothing; and the best I could manage was to bribe my maître-d'hôtel, as soon as Morphew's back was turned again, to try to get a warning through to you by telephone. Then I made believe to be indisposed, got rid of Morphew and engaged an automobile I had used before . . . Never, my friend, shall I forget that ride! Not even that night of our flight to Cherbourg from Paris was its equal for wildness . . . if you remember . . ."

A hand found Lanyard's in the murk

THIS BOOK ON HOME BEAUTIFYING—FREE

CONTAINS complete instructions for finishing all wood —hard or soft—old or new. Tells just what materials to use and how to apply them. Our book is the work of experts—illustrated in color. Includes color card—gives covering capacities, etc. Contains full directions on the care of floors and linoleum—how you can easily make and keep them beautiful with

Johnson's Polishing Wax

Every room needs the brightening touch of Johnson's Polishing Wax. It will rejuvenate your furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum, and give your home an air of immaculate cleanliness. It imparts a hard, dry, oil-less polish which will not gather dust or show finger prints. Takes the drudgery from dusting.

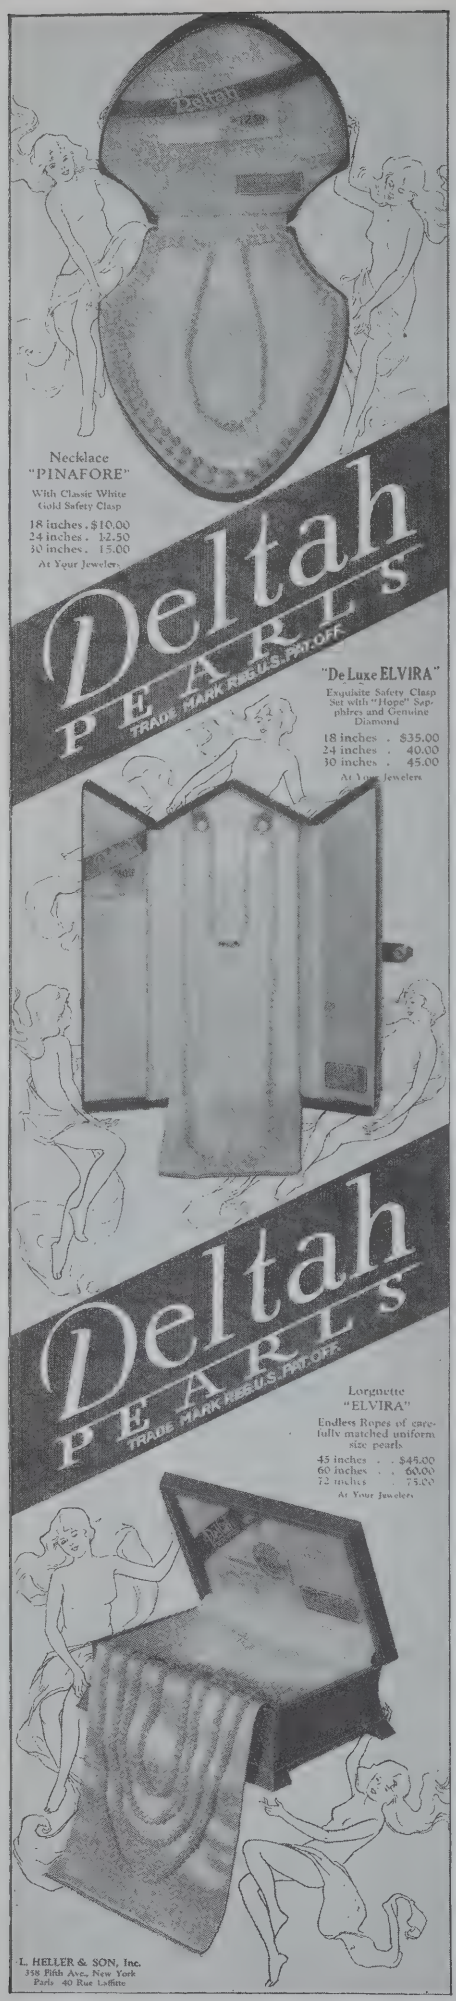
Johnson's Polishing Wax cleans, polishes, preserves and protects —all in one operation.

Johnson's Prepared Wax comes in three convenient forms—Paste Wax for polishing all floors and linoleum. Liquid Wax, the dust-proof polish for furniture, pianos, woodwork and automobiles. Powdered Wax makes perfect dancing floors.

$3.85 Floor Polishing Outfit for $3

With this outfit—a weighted polishing brush and a 1 lb. can of Johnson's Polishing Wax—you can easily keep your floors and linoleum like new. This special offer is good through dealers—or send $3.00 direct to us.

(Send $3.50 if you live West of the Rockies.)



S. C. Johnson & Son, Dept. K. S. 6, Racine, Wis. (Canadian Factory, Brantford.)
"The Wood Finishing Authorities"

Please send me free and postpaid the Johnson Book on Home Beautifying, "The Proper Treatment for Floors, Woodwork and Furniture."

Name _____

Address _____

Dealer's Name _____

and clasped it tightly. He suffered it, replying simply, "I remember."

"Let me tell you, Michael, when we swung wide to clear your automobile by the roadside, and that other in which Morphew's people were pursuing you came hurtling toward us like a Juggernaut gone mad, I did not hope to live another minute. As it turned out, my hired car came through with a crumpled fender for all damage. It was the other cannoned off and turned turtle in the ditch. The men in it escaped somehow with their lives, though they crawled back to the road too badly shaken to be dangerous. I left them trying to fit a tire from their wrecked car to yours, and took you and Madame de Montalais back to New York with me. She had wrenched an ankle, falling into the ditch when you flung her off the road, and was unable to walk; otherwise she had come to no harm. But you—it seemed a miracle you lived . . .

"You had your right arm and two ribs broken, and a great gash in your head—you'll find the scar under your hair. The surgeons said it meant concussion of the brain; you might survive but never could be your mental self again. It was two months before you were able to talk connectedly, more than a few words at a time. I took you to my apartment from the hospital and myself nursed you through your convalescence. As it progressed, one saw that mentally as well as bodily your recovery would be complete—it was your spirit had been wounded beyond mending. All your old vivacity was gone, Michael, you never laughed; you seemed fond of having me near you but fonder still of being solitary, sitting all alone with your black thoughts, brooding . . .

"Madame de Montalais came to see you daily. She, too, was quick to observe the change. I never knew what passed between you, naturally, but that you were neither of you happy it was easy to perceive. One day she called when I was out; I met her, leaving, as I returned—she had been weeping. She never called again. Not long after, her name appeared in the newspapers as one of the notables sailing on the Paris for France . . ."

The voice in the darkness ran out, Lanyard's hand was freed, a long pause was filled with the throbbing of the engines, the hiss and suck of water down the side, the mellow calling of the ship's bell.

In dull abstraction Lanyard counted its strokes: seven bells, half-past seven o'clock.

The port, a square of ultramarine let into a blank black wall, framed a nocturne, silken swells with dusky bosoms stung by starlight; on the nearest point of land a great red constant star following the progress of the steamer with unfriendly stare, somewhat astern another of sardonic green; far ahead, low upon the horizon, a third, more volatile, winking white and white . . . A thought like flotsam drifted with the dark tide of despond: a long swim to either light, even for a man in his prime . . .

Lanyard heard flat metallic tones pronounce "Continue, if you please" and realized that he had heard himself speaking.

"You never told me what had happened, but I was soon able to guess. A day or so later—I remember it was the first day when you were permitted to walk about a bit—you opened your heart to me in a way I hadn't looked for, and made mine very sad for you. You told me how your memory of that affair at Folly's had become clear and positive, somehow, in sequence to your accident, and had satisfied you there could be no profit for any man in contending against his nature, the arbiter of his fate. Nature, you said, had formed you a thief and an enemy of society—you had grown resigned to give over struggling to be other than as you had been made. I told you, no matter what you might do I would always be your friend—more, if you would. You were sweet to me that night, Michael, without committing yourself to definite promises; but the next day you disappeared. I was out for the afternoon, and neither of the maids saw you leave. You took nothing with you but the clothing you wore. I neither saw nor heard from you for many weeks. But New York did . . ."

Lanyard all at once swung round, caught the seated woman roughly by her shoulders, lifted her by main strength to her feet and with hard eyes searched the face revealed by the dull blue glimmer seeping in through the port.

"Is this the truth you are telling me, Liane?"

Pliant and passive in his hands, she answered, "The whole truth, Michael."

"You swear it?"

"By the love I bear you."

With a mutter of apology he released her, and silently, like a figure of fair marble sinking into a pool of ink, the pale shade of her subsided through the shadows, lost definition and rested as before.

"I am listening . . ."

"It didn't take the newspapers long to guess the Lone Wolf was at work again. In quick succession, Michael, you consummated a series of exploits that beggared the most lurid chapters of your old Parisian days."

"How can you say it was I?"

"You confessed to me yourself——"

"Be careful, Liane!"

"I tell you only the truth as I had it from your own lips. If you are reluctant to hear . . ."

"Forgive me."

"You came to me in my apartment without warning one midnight; at your wits' ends, police snapping at your heels, you turned to me . . . But it was no easy task to hide you, when rewards of more than fifty thousand dollars were being advertised for your arrest, and every Boy Scout in the land was carrying a copy of your photograph——"

"But I have never been photographed in my life except for passport purposes during the war; and my appearance today is not as it was then, I no longer wear a beard——"

"You nevertheless had recently been photographed by flashlight, in the act of opening a safe in the Stuyvesant Ashe home. Some ingenious member of the household, in anticipation of the Lone Wolf's visit, had rigged up a camera commanding the safe and a flashlight to be set off by electric current when the door was tampered with. You were caught at close range, facing the camera as you knelt with your ear to the safe door, listening to its mechanism. The likeness was exact and unmistakable; and all the papers reproduced it to further the hue and cry."

"You tell me that happened—and ask me to believe the Lone Wolf left that house without wrecking the camera!"

"To the contrary you destroyed a camera utterly; but there were two, the ingenuity of the inventor had been equal to that chance—one carefully concealed, the other where you might find it without too much trouble."

Lanyard had an unpleasant laugh in his throat. "Decidedly he was right who said a reformed crook could never come back. If I was the dupe of so cheap a trick . . . But to resume: I appealed to you—to a woman—to stand between me and the police . . . Ask them to believe that who once hunted the Lone Wolf across Europe and back again—and failed to catch him! . . . Well and good—what then?"

"The chase struck a false scent and passed us by; but from that time on you made your home with me. It was safe, that had been proved; and I was useful to you."

"How useful?"

"You had got together a collection of jewelry difficult to dispose of without courting arrest; also, you would have found it impracticable to take care of large sums of money such as this sale realized. I saw to all that for you; through Morphew I found a way to market the jewels, and in my own name I carried your funds in a separate account with my bankers."

"And I still called myself the Lone Wolf!"

"I think you were learning to be less jealous of your loneliness, Michael. You had learned—as most men do at some stage in life—that there was one woman at least whose devotion would never fail you."

"I used to know the Lone Wolf well—a strange belief for him to hold!"

"But life had forged yet another bond between us . . ."

The vibrations of Liane's words died into a suppliant silence. It grew long while in her hearing the pulsing of the engines aped the tempo of a funeral march. Lanyard made no move or sound. Vision tempered to the gloom and made keen by hunger saw his face, its salient lines picked out by gleams of deflected starlight, steadfast to the port, and inscrutably set.

If he would not speak she must . . .

"I loved you well, and love comes of loving . . . of being loved . . ."

"You wish me to understand," Lanyard translated bluntly, "I became your lover."

"Yes."

"Yet you knew I loved Madame de Montalais——"

"You swore to me all that was finished."

"And you believed?"

"I wanted to."

Another silence spun itself into minutes charged with emotion pent and mute. The woman felt rather than saw the sign of a hand that bade her resume. But her tongue stumbled, she was breathless with misgivings . . .

"What more do you wish me to say, Michael?"

"There is more to tell, surely, a hiatus to be filled in between that time and this." But still she faltered till he added in enforced patience: "I have yet to learn what brings us together aboard this vessel."

"Your own vanity must answer for that, Michael . . . You had been several weeks inactive, the newspaper sensation had begun to blow over, we were planning

Why Mar Beauty

By a dingy film on teeth?

This offers you a delightful test, to show how beauty is enhanced by pearly teeth. And how teeth can be protected as they never were before.

The method is used by millions. Dentists the world over now advise it. Won't you learn how much it means to you—and yours?

Removes the film

Your teeth are coated with a viscous film. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. Food stains, etc., discolor it. Then it forms cloudy coats. Tartar is based on film.

No old-time tooth paste could effectively combat it. So coated teeth were almost universal. And very few escaped the troubles caused by film.

Film holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Had to fight it

Tooth troubles became alarming in extent, so dental science saw the need to fight film. After much research, two ways were discovered. One acts to curdle film, one to remove it, without any harmful scouring.

Able authorities proved those methods effective. Then a new-type tooth paste was created, based on new discoveries. Those two great film combatants were embodied in it.

The name of that tooth paste is Pepsodent. It is now advised by leading dentists everywhere

Other discoveries

Modern research also found other things essential. So Pepsodent also multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids, the cause of tooth decay.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise ferment and form acids.

Thus every use gives manifold power to these great natural tooth-protecting agents.

50 nations use it

Careful people of some 50 nations now employ this method. As one result, cleaner, prettier teeth are seen everywhere today.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

The result will be a revelation, and it may lead to priceless benefits. Cut out the coupon now.

Avoid Harmful Grit

Pepsodent curdles the film and removes it without harmful scouring. Its polishing agent is far softer than enamel. Never use a film combatant which contains harsh grit.

Pepsodent PAT. OFF. REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific film combatant, which whitens, cleans and protects the teeth without the use of harmful grit. Now advised by leading dentists the world over.

10-Day Tube Free 1090

THE PEPSODENT COMPANY,
Dept. 977, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Mail 10-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

.....

.....

Only one tube to a family

Take your Dentist's Advice!

Dr. West's
TOOTH BRUSH
WECO Product

CLEANS
INSIDE and BETWEEN YOUR TEETH

Do You Clean Your Teeth the One Correct Way?

95 out of every 100 People do not.

95 out of every 100 people brush their teeth from right to left. The tooth brush skips the spots and crevices where decay most often lurks!

Cleans INSIDE

Cleans OUTSIDE

and BETWEEN

Here's The Latest Scientific Method

Approved by all Good Dentists

Brush down on your upper teeth — up on the lowers — from the gums toward the biting surfaces!

Because Dr. West's Tooth Brush is smaller and scientifically shaped, it is especially adapted to this new method. Start today! Your dealer will supply you, and your dentist will approve.

In Three Sizes At All Good Dealers

Patents allowed in United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Australia, New Zealand, Canada. Numerous other patents pending. Our rights will be fully protected.

THE WESTERN COMPANY · Chicago, New York

to return to Paris—though you balked at becoming indebted to Morphew for the forged passports he offered to secure. Then one day the Chief of Police gave out an interview exalting himself at your expense; and in that quaint, excitable temper which you had nursed ever since the motor accident, exasperated beyond reason, you vowed to expose the man's incompetence, and did—breaking into his home and making off with a necklace of diamonds which he had just presented to his wife. But somehow you must have blundered, or your luck had turned; you hardly escaped being caught, and left your path of flight so plainly marked it led the police to my very door. We had to fly New York between two suns, with no choice but to seek refuge in some country which did not require passports. This steamer was the first that sailed for South America; we secured passage, came aboard separately and pretended to be strangers till that officious doctor insisted on presenting you as a compatriot of mine."

"And now"—Lanyard demanded of himself more than of the woman—"what?"

"If you would only consent to listen to me . . ."

"By what you tell me, Liane, the experience would be anything but a novel one for you."

"Morphew remains my good friend——"

"Permit me to wish you joy of him."

"And is willing for my sake to be yours."

"Unfortunately I have the prejudice to be loved for my own blue eyes or not at all."

"I am not suspected; it would be a simple matter for me to send a wireless, in a code which Morphew gave me, to his factors at Nassau. They might easily manage some mishap for the men who wait there for you; or failing that, arrange an escape for you subsequent to your arrest——"

"Make your mind at ease on that account, Liane. I don't mean to be arrested."

"So much the better. Morphew maintains a secret base on one of the outlying cays of the Bahamas, where his boats rendezvous with those that fetch the liquor from overseas. With the aid of his factors, it should be an easy matter to smuggle you out to that base and on board some British vessel homeward bound."

"Many thanks; but I shall earn my salvation without the aid of Morphew's lot, or never. Moreover, I have no wish to see England again until I am able to go there openly and disembark in the sunlight, wearing my own face and name—Michael Lanyard."

"But that can never be!"

"In that event, I must end my days in America."

"But are you truly mad enough to imagine there could be any way?"

"There is but one course possible for me. I must find my way back to New York—under my own power, as the saying runs—and make reparation for the evil I have done——"

"Nothing of that was done by you in your right mind, Michael."

"Pardon—but it seems a nice question which mind of mine, today's or yesterday's, is 'right.' Neither do I think society will be disposed to split hairs concerning my liability for acts committed whilst my intelligence was—constructively, at least—under a cloud. Nor, for that matter, am I; if I may not clear the name of Michael Lanyard or wipe out the score against him, I have little use—no, none—for the liberty of André Duchemin."

In uncontrollable disquietude, the woman rose. "What do you propose then?"

"I have made no plan."

"If you won't have Morphew's help——"

"My dear Liane—that 'if' of yours is downright, voluptuous redundancy."

"But we are due at Nassau at dawn, the police will board us with the pilot boat——"

"Eight bells has just sounded; it should be daybreak by four o'clock, at this season. In other words, I command eight hours of darkness. And the Lone Wolf that lives on in Michael Lanyard, let me tell you, is hardly the half-witted cur you have sketched to me, who cowered behind a woman's skirts in terror of American police."

Discovering Liane's arm about him, her face strained up to him, Lanyard caught himself up sharply, shrugged and wagged a long-suffering head: "My dear Liane!"

She said in a sob: "You do not mean it——"

"But very truly, my dear."

"Yesterday your dear, today less than the dust!"

"You are mistaken. I owe you too much——"

"You will never repay it now. Did I not foretell that, when I had told you everything, you would forget your pledge to me? 'Prove me ungrateful'—out of your own mouth, Michael!— 'and you can ask nothing of me I will refuse to do in testimony to my penitence.' "

Still unresisting in her embrace, he asked: "And I am already proved ungrateful in your sight?"

"Do you not mean to forsake me, put me by, now I am of no more use?"

"I have not said so."

"What else do you intend, when you tell me of your determination to go back to New York?"

"One must first pay one's debts——"

"Then the debt you owe my love and devotion stands second to the debt you owe self-love?"

"Say rather, self-respect; wanting that, no man can claim to deserve any woman's love. Let me first of all settle my reckoning with society——"

"There will be nothing of you left for me!"

"In one breath you urge me to hold myself blameless for wrongs done to others that I don't remember, in the next you call me to account for obligations to you incurred under the same conditions."

"I am not concerned with consistency, Michael, but with love. You have made yourself too dear to me, even though you didn't know what you were doing—I can't go on without you now. You hold your dream of honesty dear; do not deny me my dream of decency. Back there in New York we joined our lives, outlaw and outcast; we must go on together or forego all hope for all time. Give me at least the fair chance you ask for yourself . . ."

Her prayers ran out in a mumble under a hand which gently closed her mouth; ears not deaf to them had been quick none the less to pick up footfalls in the passageway. Now in the hush that fell the knob of the stateroom door rattled, the door itself creaked to the pressure of a shoulder, someone swore indignantly beyond it, and immediately a knock weighted with authority resounded on its panels.

In the panting bosom pressed to his Lanyard felt the heart leap and flutter wildly. To a whisper of dismay, "They have come for you already!" he returned. "Never fear—they shan't get me."

The summons was repeated.

"What can you do?" Liane breathed.

"Nothing, so long as I am not free to move."

Her arms fell away, but her hands lingered upon his shoulders. In the passage several men were confabulating in mutters dulled by the intervening door. One became articulate in vexation: "I tell you, he didn't get enough dope in that powder to make him sleep like this!"

Again Liane's whisper: "What shall we do?"

Lanyard considered: "We can't keep them out . . . may as well let them in."

"But you said you wouldn't give yourself up——"

"No more do I mean to."

The knuckles of authority drummed on for a moment. When they ceased Lanyard was hailed right cheerily: "I say, Mr. Duchemin! wake up, let me in. It's I, Doctor Bright. Can't you hear me?"

"But Michael," the whisper implored him, "you can't defy the whole ship!"

"Why did you bring that pistol, then?"

"Not in anticipation of anything like this——"

"Don't worry—I shan't use it. I've a better plan. I count on you—stand by to draw the bolt when I give the word."

Lanyard watched the dim shape of Liane fall back to the door. Bright was yapping with a Judas tongue, bidding him open in the sacred name of fellowship. With the thick voice of one just wakened from the deep sweet sleep of an innocent Lanyard responded: "Half a minute! What's the row?" Then more quietly, "Ready, Liane?"

"Yes, but——"

"Fall back behind the door as you open it."

No time-wasting preparations to make, only a dressing gown to shrug out of, he stood in shirt and trousers, shoeless. "Now!"

As the bolt grated, Lanyard set a foot upon the transom, a hand to the sill of the window port, and lifted himself nimbly through that narrow outlet, dropping to the deck on feet as furtive as a cat's.

For an instant he stood glancing alertly forward, aft, and over the rail. The deck was deserted, a solitary coast light abeam blinked forlornly, a minute spark lost beyond a measureless waste of grim black water. Dubiously Lanyard considered it—a pull to daunt the heart of the boldest swimmer . . .

The dark port behind him turned into a square of staring amber. Through it broke a din of voices blasphemous in anger and disappointment. Lanyard darted aft.

The watch on the after deck witnessed the plunge of a dark body from the rail of the promenade deck down over the side. A man who appeared at the same rail an instant later lifted up a voice of authentic seafaring whine:

"Man oo-verboard!"

The watch took up the cry . . .

The nerve and daring of the Lone Wolf culminate in an exploit that will hold you breathless—in July COSMOPOLITAN.

She lacked poise

TWO women at luncheon were engaged in conversation. Although they were apparently of the same age, one was more vigorous and well-preserved. In her every manner were displayed poise and animation that were noticeably absent in her companion.

The other woman showed that in her mind was constant fear or uneasiness. You might have said, "She was self-conscious". Really she lacked poise.

The two women had been friends in early girlhood. The first woman was the president of a large club; was prominent in many activities; and in addition, had three children and many household duties. She was keen enough to observe her friend's sub-conscious anxiety and worry.

"Why worry over your health?"

"IT SEEMS too bad," she said, "that you should permit yourself to worry over your health, because to my mind it is entirely unnecessary. There is no reason why you should not be as vigorous and strong as I am."

The second woman told her that she had observed many women of her own age who had been obliged to drop their work and who had become semi-invalids.

Said the club president further: "You should by all means take a reasonable amount of exercise. Of course you cannot do any of the strenuous things that as a girl you might have done; but there is no question about the value of dancing, swimming and walking.

"Many women are careless about their diet and the matter of regular sleep. To be careful about these things is only common sense.

Feminine hygiene

"BUT then there is one thing to which many women fail to take heed. I refer to the vital matter of personal cleanliness or feminine hygiene.

"This means more than 'soap-and-water' cleanliness. You must attain it as the doctor does—by using an antiseptic effective for personal hygiene. It is this last and highest degree of cleanliness that brings a sense of security."

"Lysol" Disinfectant, originally prepared for use by the medical profession, is ideal for personal hygiene. In proper solution with water it is not caustic and does not irritate. Sold in all drug stores.

Use "Lysol" as an antiseptic solution
One-half Teaspoonful to one quart water
For personal hygiene
When baby comes
For wounds
For the sickroom
For the bathroom

Use "Lysol" as a disinfecting solution
Two teaspoonfuls to one quart water
For the kitchen
In the toilet
For sweeping
For floors, cellars, dark corners

Manufactured only by LYSOL, INC., 635 GREENWICH ST., NEW YORK CITY
Sole Distributors: LEHN & FINK, INC., NEW YORK
Canadian Agents*: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Limited, 10 McCaul St., Toronto

COMPLETE directions for use are in every package. The genuine "Lysol" Disinfectant is put up only in brown glass bottles containing 3, 7 or 16 ounces; each bottle is packed in a yellow carton. Insist upon obtaining genuine "Lysol" Disinfectant.

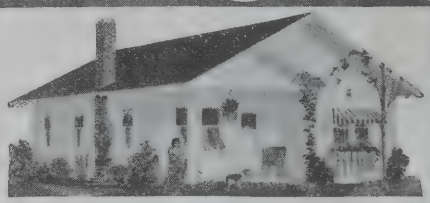
Lysol Disinfectant
Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

The ideal personal antiseptic

BAILEY BANKS & BIDDLE CO.
JEWELERS SILVERSMITHS STATIONERS
Philadelphia



DIAMOND
ENGAGEMENT AND JEWELED WEDDING RINGS
DIAMOND BAR PINS
DIAMOND BRACELETS

The Super-Quality, Design and Workmanship for which this House has been celebrated for almost a century

ETIQUETTE OF WEDDING STATIONERY
A Book indicating the different forms of wording for Invitations and Announcements will be mailed upon request

THE
GIFT SUGGESTION BOOK
Illustrates and prices the Exclusive Productions and Importations of this Establishment mailed to any part of the World upon request

7-Room House $975

You can buy all the material for a complete home direct from the manufacturer and save four profits on the lumber, millwork, hardware and labor.

Price quoted includes all lumber cut to fit, windows, doors, woodwork, glass, paints, hardware, nails, lath, roofing and complete drawings and instructions. Highest grade lumber for all interior woodwork, siding, and outside finish. Many other designs.

Send today for Free Aladdin Catalog No. 2388

The ALADDIN Co., BAY CITY MICHIGAN
Wilmington, North Carolina; Portland, Oregon; Toronto, Ontario

Moore Push-Pins
Glass Heads-Steel Points
Moore Push-less Hangers
To hang up things
Ask your dealer to show them
Sold Everywhere 10¢ per packet
Moore Push-Pin Co.
Wayne Junction Philadelphia

Elinor Glyn says-

"Thousands who don't dream they can write really can. YOU have ideas for stories and photoplays—why don't you turn them into cash? There are just as many stories of human interest right in your own vicinity as there are in Greenwich Village or the South Sea Islands. And editors will welcome a story or photoplay from you just as quickly as from any well-known writer if your story is good enough. They will pay you well for your ideas, too—a good deal bigger money than is paid in salaries. You can accept my advice because millions of copies of my stories have been sold. My book 'Three Weeks,' has been printed in every tongue, except Spanish. My photoplays are known to millions. I do not say this to boast, but merely to prove that you can be successful without being a 'genius.' I believe thousands of people can make money in this absorbing profession. I believe this so firmly that I am going to show YOU how easy it is when you know how. Simply write to my publishers, The Authors' Press. They will send you a handsome little book called 'The Short-Cut to Successful Writing.' This book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge—no obligation. Write for it NOW." Just address Elinor Glyn's publishers:
THE AUTHORS PRESS, Dept. 368, Auburn, N.Y.

Mercy

(Continued from page 105)

"Tell them?" groaned Walton, terrified, his dark face yellow at the thought—that story which he had now twice in two dreadful nights related for the first time to any human being, and which, when he told it on the second night, had seemed more awful than before. No. He could never thus parade his shame again. He looked so guilty that Mose railed on him with:

"Why, say—you reckon fellows on that board haven't done things they're ashamed of, some time or another? Why, if they thought their past was all coming out next Sunday morning they'd jump and run for the woods with you. They'd stand up and be shot with you before they'd have it told."

But Walton only smiled piteously and shook his head. What were any trifling lapses in the past of his elders compared to this black sin of his own youth? Nothing. Absolutely nothing.

"Those men would never consent to my staying here," he shuddered, covering his face with his hands.

The forceful features of Mose Mullen softened unbelievable, and his voice mellowed almost to trembling. "Why, say, Bob," he reproached him tenderly, "you just don't know those boys at all. Why, there isn't a man on that board that don't want to do the right thing. They just don't know what the right thing is. I'm going to show 'em."

And the very next night Mose was showing them. He had the elders sitting round him in an awed circle, hearing for the first time the reason why they had received the resignation of their minister. They were quite as much shocked as their president, George Fawcett, had been. They were appalled and rather pathetic as they struggled to comprehend this one-time infamy of the man whom, until this hour, they had worshiped almost to adoration. George, seeing this, emphasized the one extenuating circumstance of the Mullen narrative; for Mose had wrung out of Walton the admission that all these years he had been dividing his income to make provision for the education and support of those first two sons of his, now grown to manhood; and something for their mother.

But besides being a redeeming feature, this proved something else. It revealed that through all his covert life the man had allowed his wife to know where he was, giving her power over him, to hurl him from his pulpit, to fling him into jail even. It proved also that, having this power, she had not exercised it. She, so deeply injured, so cruelly hurt, had allowed him to go forward on a widening and mounting career of usefulness and never once had pricked the bright bubble of his fame. She may have been awed by what God was doing through him, or she may have been touched by that in Robert N. Wills or Walton which made people feel with and for him. But it seemed to the elders forbearance—forbearance almost divine.

And if she could be forbearing, so could they. That was what Mose Mullen argued.

"It isn't often a church gets a chance to do the right thing—to do a great big Christian thing," he told them, as he had told the pastor and his wife. "You've got it now. God has forgiven this man. The results show it. Can't this church forgive him? God has stood by him. Isn't this church going to stand by him—after what he's done for it?"

The elders twisted unhappily. The sin was old, but they had just heard of it. They saw it happening—this very night—the glowing young man, forgetting his wife and two babies to depart hastily with another glowing young woman who—why—the jaws of the elders dropped.

"Why," stammered one of them, "why, she—she's——" and then he stopped, breathless.

"Oh, yes; yes," explained Mose, quickly. "There was a divorce. She's been a wife ever since . . . ever since he got the divorce."

The elders leaned back with a relieved sigh; for they had felt all the time that the union of this man and this woman must have been somehow hallowed long before ever they met them. Yet it was hard for them not to see the whole thing in terms of headlines in a newspaper—clear across the top of the page, huge black letters, huge black phrases that would denounce and characterize a horrible black act and draw a horrible black smear across the face of a man—a man who had been, until they accepted his resignation last night, their pastor.

Arguing, pleading, old Mose, employing every verbal resource at his command, turned at last to poetry; for that is one of his charms; his mind is full of poetry.

"This life's a middling crooked trail and after forty year
Of knocking round, I'm free to say that right ain't always clear.
I've seen a lot of folks go wrong—get off the main highroad
An' fetch up in a swamp somewhere—almost before they knowed.
I don't set up to be no jedge of right and wrong in men;
I ain't been perfect all my life and may not be again;
An' when I see a chap who looks as though he'd gone astray,
I want to think he started right an' only lost his way."

Mose Mullen tried this from an anonymous vernacular poem and then marked its effect. When he saw a stern-lipped elder's mouth begin to quiver, he gushed two stanzas more, winding up with:

"I've seen 'em circlin' thro' the dusk with twilight getting gray
An' looking for the main highroad—poor chaps who'd lost the way."

Mullen almost sobbed out this last line and studied the jury of his elders as he did. Some of them were perspiring now. They were wavering; he saw it. They were visioning Robert N. Walton looking for "the main highroad," and seeming to find it—a main highroad that had led him at last to them. There were tears standing in every eye. George Fawcett was weeping shamelessly.

The voice of Mullen, "old Mose," who, some people thought, was hard, went on, melting in its tenderness, as he chanted rather than quoted the last verse, his body swaying with the rhythm. It ended:

"An' when I see a chap who looks as if he'd gone astray
I want to shove my hand in his and help him find the way."

Beautiful Women Everywhere

—women noted for their Beautiful Complexions use CARMEN POWDER

Oh! the witchery of a Beautiful Complexion—and you can have it. The same smooth, delicately tinted complexion which you admire—which everyone admires (perhaps with a teeny bit of envy), for its possessor is most probably one of the more than a million women noted for their beautiful complexions who rely on which is distinctively different and better than other powders, because it is so fine and so delicately tinted that it blends exquisitely with the complexion, giving the skin that clear transparency and velvety texture that only a perfect complexion naturally possesses. Delightfully perfumed with a rich and delicate odor. No creams or lotions are necessary as a base, because CARMEN POWDER is soft as down—so fine that it adheres closely—does not "blow off" or give that "spotted look."

CARMEN POWDER

Five Shades
White
Pink Flesh
Cream
Brunette

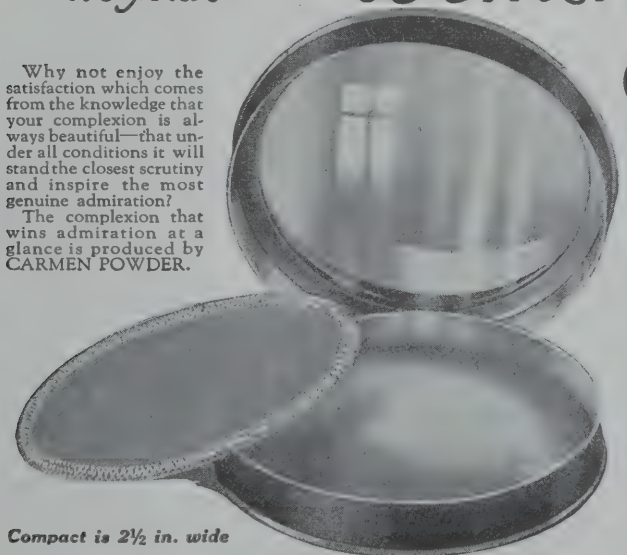
50¢

Picture is 2/3 size of box

How Does Your Complexion Look

When the Light Changes—
When the Dance Becomes Heated—
When the Wind Blows as You Motor?

There is a vast difference, you will find, between Carmen and other face powders.



Carmen, because it blends so exquisitely with both the color and texture of the skin, imparts a fresh beauty that is just as charming under the searching glare of the midday sun as it is under the soft glow of the reception room lamp.

And Carmen, no matter how heated the dance, never yields to perspiration. Though extremely fine, Carmen has "body" enough to withstand moisture. And adhering to the skin as it does, Carmen never blows off—no matter how windy the day or how long the motor ride.

The Greatest Hit in Years Women Everywhere Pronounce

Why not enjoy the satisfaction which comes from the knowledge that your complexion is always beautiful—that under all conditions it will stand the closest scrutiny and inspire the most genuine admiration?

The complexion that wins admiration at a glance is produced by CARMEN POWDER.

Compact is 2½ in. wide

CARMEN POWDER COMPACTS 50¢

the "last word" in powder quality in handy cake form. And at last you can have an article of supreme quality at a reasonable price.

CARMEN POWDER in Compact Form in handsome metal boxes, with full sized mirror and powder puff. You will like this dainty box of your favorite powder and find it a convenience.

CARMEN POWDER COMPACT BOXES, while containing a generously large cake of powder, are easily carried in the purse or pocket. CARMEN POWDER COMPACTS have the same dainty, delicate odor (a trifle more intensified) as have the regular toilet boxes of CARMEN, and cost just one-half the price of the ordinary COMPACTS.

Shades: White, Flesh, Brunette, "L'Autumn"

The new shade, "L'AUTUMN"—now just introduced (only in Compact)—is the result of long experimentation and is not to be duplicated in any other powder.

If your dealer has not yet stocked CARMEN POWDER COMPACTS, we will very promptly mail you the desired shade on receipt of the price.

STAFFORD-MILLER CO., St. Louis, Mo.

"More than a Million" Women Noted for their Beautiful Complexions Use Carmen Powder and Compacts.

Fishing?

You may not get any fish, but you'll get a wondrous appetite; you can be sure of that.

And you'll be ready for the lunch; that appetite will demand something good, something substantial.

The one best bet for any lunch is Kraft Cheese (in tins). We do not believe anyone can make cheese that has more real goodness and flavor—no one ever has. And best of all, it is chuck-full of nourishment. There's a square meal in that little round tin.

Take it anywhere, fair weather or foul, it's safely sealed in the parchment lined tin, so it's always decidedly cleaner and fresher. There are eight kinds, all good.

No rind—it spreads. No waste—100% cheese.

Cheese Recipe Book FREE

J. L. KRAFT & BROS. CO.
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
KRAFT-MacLAREN CHEESE CO., LTD.
MONTREAL, CANADA

"Boys," pleaded Mose, "let's shove our hands in Bob Walton's and help him find the way!"

It was an almost irresistible appeal. It won the hearts of the elders; yet nothing could win them from their conception of duty to the church.

"He can come before the full board Sunday afternoon and tell his story. It will be up to them." That was the nearest to a verdict that Mullen could wring from his jury. The men were still too appalled by what they had heard to be courageous in dealing out forgiveness.

And the full board! That meant the sixteen elders and the forty or fifty deacons. That meant Robert N. Walton's coming before these many people and harrowing his soul while he paraded his shame. Mose Mullen was heavy in his heart. He felt almost as if he had failed. He didn't know whether he could get Walton to consent or not. Besides, could sixty men be expected to keep a secret like this? He doubted it. It was almost to invite defeat—to assure it. But—there was no other way, and he so informed the minister, who, as he had foreseen, immediately took fright.

"Tell the whole board? all of them? right out in the open that way? I—I couldn't," faltered Walton. "I could never do it."

"How God Almighty does hate a coward!" frowned Mullen. "Stand up to the lick-log, Bob, and take your medicine."

By a combination of persistence and persuasion he actually got the man up to the point where he was willing to attempt the confession; but it was because he loved so many men in E——, because he wanted his great work to go on and because he did believe that he would never have courage to start again anywhere else.

Mrs. Walton, with her woman's intuitions, also was fearful. Sixteen men now knew their story, besides that terrible man who had written the denunciatory letter. She could not believe that sixteen elders could keep the secret from their wives; and she recalled bitterly those lines of Byron:

> And every woe a tear can claim,
> Except an erring sister's shame.

With all her years of sacrifice and suffering, she shrank from any pointing fingers and confided her fears to Mose. He, dear old rough diamond, comforted and bulwarked her with assurances of organized support.

"Mrs. Mullen will meet you in front of the church and kiss you," he promised. "She will walk right down the aisle and sit beside you. After the sermon three hundred women will come up and kiss you and put their arms around you."

But Walton's misgivings were even greater than his wife's. Difficult as it had been every Sunday morning of his life with her to drag himself to the church and into the pulpit, he found this the most difficult day of all. Especially did he fear that when he faced the Bible class, Hollis Gant, the letter writer, might stand up and denounce him. But in the class that morning, lo, there was Moses Mullen, strong and forceful, with his stocky figure, sitting right beside Hollis Gant, and on the other side of him a man I'd like to mention because it is a name known all over America now. His name and picture are this very morning of my writing on the front page of one of New York's great daily newspapers. But the same reasons which suppress the names of other actors in this moving drama suppress his.

Well, there they sat, these two strong, determined men, embracing the young zealot most affectionately and most effectively; and the sight of them made Walton feel how great is the practical strength of loyal personal friendship. It helped him to get through the entire morning service.

The demonstration of the women over Mrs. Walton took place just as old Mose had said it would; yet so skilfully was it managed that never a hint of design was manifest in it. It seemed just a sudden, spontaneous welling up of the esteem in which the women held the wife of their pastor. Not even Walton himself was permitted to suppose it was any more; and it heartened him amazingly. It gave him resolution to carry out his promise to go to the joint board meeting at four o'clock of this Sunday afternoon, buoyed up by the hope that he and his wife might thereby win the right to remain among these people who loved them so.

Now deacons, it will be recognized, are usually younger men than elders, more active, energetic and demonstrative. In any gathering of sixteen elders and forty or fifty deacons, it will be the deacons who give color to the mass appearance. That was what happened this day. And it wanted but one glimpse at the color of this meeting to know that those sixteen elders had kept their secret absolutely. They sat, grave, silent, repressed, as became elders; but the deacons were smiling and expectant—happy, unaware—supposing their beloved leader had called them together thus suddenly to break some delightful good news to them, to acquaint them with some new enterprise in Christ in which he would direct them.

There were but two unofficial members of the church present. Moses Mullen was one; Hollis Gant was the other. Him, Mose had brought along, that his desire to hear Robert N. Walton tell who and what he was might be fully gratified.

But this attitude of receptive joy on the part of his board changed somewhat the color of that story which Walton had intended to tell. It filled him with a fresh sense of his unworthiness. It plunged him into yet deeper sloughs of guilty consciousness. It made him abandon the hope that he might be permitted to remain here, and his confession from that moment had no external objective. It became, all in a second, an unburdening—nothing else. He stood brokenly, telling the class that he was not himself, that he was Robert N. Wills, a fraud, an imposter, an—he choked over the word and never uttered it. He stammered out that he had been a traducer in his life of the cause that for a quarter of a century he had upheld with his words. He tendered his resignation all over again; he told them he had preached his last sermon, that when this meeting was over he would slip out and away into that oblivion which is always the kindest abode a Judas may ever hope to find.

There was a hollow sob in Walton's voice as he uttered the last word; and there followed painful silence. "Most painful minute and a half I ever went through," one man said to me; though I doubt that it was a minute and a half. It could not have been more than a few seconds until that sob in the minister's throat was echoed by sixty men weeping as one. There were exclamations, cries, incoherent attempts to speak, to frame resolutions, to call out encouragement, with someone stating a resolution and the chair announcing that it was passed unanimously; after which the joint board meeting became a thing of motion, of eager, emotional men flowing forward, climbing over the pews, hurrying down the aisles to reach Robert N. Walton and take him into their arms, hold him to their hearts, seal to him their forgiveness and faith and loyalty forever.

When it was all over, out of the confusion minutes were evolved which showed that the board had utterly refused to accept the pastor's resignation and that a resolution had been passed unanimously declaring the affair of the afternoon to be "a forgotten incident" and binding all present never to discuss it with any member of the board or with anybody else so long as they lived. And they meant it. But it was one of those kinds of incidents that could never be forgotten.

Mose Mullen stood by while the board was milling round its pastor, happy for his friend, but proud, oh tremendously proud, for his church because it had shown its ability to rise high and do a great Christian act.

But there were certain practical considerations that immediately engaged his mind. If this were to become a forgotten incident, some of the forgetting had to be arranged for very practically. With a story known to sixty persons, however noble and determined their intent to keep it secret, it must inevitably leak out; and it might leak in such a way as to ruin the man they all were bent on saving. One printed line of this story and the damage would be done. Obviously that line must not be printed.

Now Mose, with all his cynicism, was a man of large faith in human nature. Within an hour of this meeting of the board he had called the newspaper men together—the reporters of the dailies of this populous city of E——, news organs that were not one whit behind others in America in enterprise. To these men Mullen told without reservation the story of Robert N. Walton. They sat gasping, gaping with widening eyes, checking only momentarily an impulse to rise and rush for the door. It was the greatest local news sensation these men had ever encountered. It was a U. P. story good for columns and columns the country across. They saw the headlines; not a mind but was busy with the framing of the "lead," when old Mose added quietly:

"But of course you mustn't say a word about it. You mustn't."

There followed a silence while the men imbibed the spirit of what it was this church was trying to do. And then they agreed. They mustn't. Each man gave his pledge. Of course managing editors had to be told; but they too rose to that spiritual height demanded of them by the indomitable Mullen. Not a line of the affair was printed.

That was a marvelous compact in itself —marvelous in its effect; yet after all it was purely negative. There was nothing negative about Walton. He could never thrive on negatives. His was a positive nature. He had to be cooperated with—not merely left alone. At the moment when Mullen was making all secure with

You won't turn him down!

Pretty confident grin on the little Eskimo kid! He knows his live, friendly drink will get a glad hello from the crowd. They all like it.

Clicquot Club is just about a perfect thirst quencher. Its tang and sparkle and fragrance make a happy combination for killing a thirst.

You couldn't have a purer drink—spring water, real Jamaica ginger, excellent fruit flavor and cane sugar. Those are the good things that go into Clicquot Club.

And the blend has been a favorite for 38 years.

Try Clicquot Club Sarsaparilla too—and the Root Beer and Birch Beer. Order from your grocer or druggist.

The Clicquot Club Company
Millis, Mass., U. S. A.

Clicquot Club
Pronounced Klee-ko
GINGER ALE

One easy turn of the Lorain Red Wheel gives you a choice of 44 measured and controlled oven heats for any kind of oven cooking or baking.

How Do You Can?

THERE are several ways to can, but the Oven Method is the one to be preferred. So says the U. S. Department of Agriculture in Farmers' Bulletin No. 203. Under the caption of "Canned Fruit Cooked in the Oven", the Government Experts have this to say:

"This method of canning fruit, in the opinion of the writer, is the one preferred. The work is easily and quickly done, and the fruit retains its shape, color and flavor better than when cooked in the preserving kettle."

But the Government Bulletin was written long before the advent of the Lorain Oven Heat Regulator, the wonderful device that exactly measures and controls the heat of the Gas Range Oven. And so, the Lorain Method of Oven Canning surpasses even the method recommended by the Government.

If you owned a Lorain-equipped Gas Range you could do many wonderful things in cookery. In the first place you'd never again experience a single failure in baking, roasting, etc. Also, you'd be able to cook a whole meal in the oven all at one time—while you're miles away enjoying yourself.

Wherever gas is available you'll find dealers who sell Lorain-equipped Gas Ranges. These dealers are always willing to explain or demonstrate the unusual advantages of this greatest of all time- and labor-saving appliances.

Send for a free copy of the Lorain Oven Canning Chart. It explains how to can 37 different fruits and vegetables by this new and better method.

AMERICAN STOVE COMPANY
Largest Makers of Gas Stoves in the World
176 Chouteau Ave. St. Louis, Mo.

LORAIN
OVEN HEAT REGULATOR

the newspaper men, Walton was at home in a chill of despair. Reaction had come to him. It would come, he saw, to the others. His brethern had been swept up to a crest of noble emotions; they would wallow presently in the trough of that sea. Officially and sincerely they had forgiven him; but—they would remember. They would take his hand tomorrow, but—they would remember! He would read it in the breaking of their glance. Every time they looked at him they would remember; every time they spoke of him they would remember the pitiable truth. He would know this and, with his sensitive nature, it would ruin him, make him sterile, useless. He might as well go, after all. It had been in vain. He was done for. That was what Walton was thinking; and shrewd old Mullen, knowing the man well, was realizing the same thing.

As he left the newspaper men he put it into words to that friend who had helped him police the zealot in the Bible class, by saying: "Bob Walton can be now just—just a singed cat or—he can be big—bigger than he ever was. Let's make him bigger."

The two joined hands upon the proposition and Mose began immediately to lay plans and within an hour to execute them—first at the church. That very night as the forty deacons were seating the congregation subtle propaganda was poured into receptive ears and the fires of a new and pentecostal enthusiasm for the minister were kindled. Walton felt it the minute he entered the church door and fear went out of him forever. He faced his people with a new courage and a new confidence; he felt a new freedom and a new power, and preached as he had never preached before.

Moses Mullen, watching keenly, saw this, felt it and rejoiced in it; but his astuteness descried another danger. There were the other churches—for this was one of the best churched cities in America; and these other churches all had ministers. The story would get round and, true to the genius of rumor, in its worst form; whereat some outraged preacher, jealous for the whiteness of the pulpit, might break out in fiery public denunciation. Yet far less than this would have quenched the sensitive spirit of Walton, who was keenly alive to the affectionate loyalties of his brothers of the cloth. Let but one of them gaze upon him with coldly accusing eye or draw his Prince Albert aside from him as he passed, and Walton would be done for. Yes, this story, once so many people knew it, was bound to run like a prairie fire; and Mose resolved to fight it as he would a conflagration on the plains, by backfire.

He called the ministers of the city of E—— together and he told them the true story of Robert N. Walton, extenuating nothing—but, the true story; and then he appealed to them to aid in a process of salvation and appealed with confidence. For he believed in these men exactly as he had believed in his own church board; that they were Christians; that they were human and brotherly and would leap at the opportunity to do a big Christian thing.

"Boys," he said familiarly, for he was older than most of them, "I want you to help this church save Bob Walton."

The ministers had listened, very much as the elders had, with spasms of shock and pain; but they were quicker to respond. With spontaneous generosity their hearts went out to the man. Knowing in their own souls how the minister is tempted, knowing better than anyone else what Walton's long struggle must have been like, they leaped to their feet with ready assurance of brotherly support.

But Mullen was not done yet with his backfiring. He turned next to his lodge—that lodge of twelve hundred Masons which he had induced Walton to join.

"You are ruining me," Walton protested, fearfully hurt, "telling everybody my story."

"No, I'm not," insisted Mullen, wise with the wisdom of the children of light and wily with the cunning of the generations of darkness. "No, I'm not." And he told the men of the lodge, told them with a good deal of emotion and unashamed pathos. Those twelve hundred Masons heard it with blanched faces, strained and breathless, and with a sigh of disappointment at realizing that their admired brother of the cloth was but flesh as they themselves were flesh. They were distressed by the facts, but got a quick perspective on them; they saw that the incident was long past; they perceived that he had done much to expiate it. Moreover, he was a brother Mason and in trouble, and it is a principle of their code to stand by a brother in trouble. Their sympathies were immediately enlisted.

"You can't just—tolerate him, brothers. You've got to go to him—lift him up." That was what Mullen had pointed out.

And the lodge did lift him up. It clamored for his appearance on every occasion. Those Masons made him speak at their banquets, participate at their funerals, solemnize their weddings. They applauded his every utterance and they pleaded with him to lead them into whatever good work he would. The lodge vied with the church, which was rallying more and more unitedly every week to multiply the power of his ministry. The Bible class applauded when he entered the room, applauded his every utterance, applauded when the lecture hour was over and he left them. As George Fawcett said to me: "They hung upon his words and upon his arms and were eager to do his bidding."

The clergy, too, were making good on their covenant with Moses Mullen. From that day forth the ministerial association began deliberately to put Robert N. Walton forward, to magnify him, to exalt him. Never was a joint meeting of the churches planned but Walton must be selected as the principal speaker; never a program of any sort but he had a chief place upon it; never a platform arrangement of church dignitaries but he must be assigned the seat of honor; and these joint church gatherings hailed him as if he were some bright messenger from another world.

The newspapers readily caught the habit of magnifying the man. The classic utterances of clergymen of better brain than he went into the waste basket or to an obscure corner of the paper while the chance opinion of Robert N. Walton on the proper composition of a golf ball would find itself a headline.

And through all of this period of what was possibly excessive laudation not once did any minister, though he might have labored unrecognized for years, lift one whisper of protest at undue honor accorded to Walton. Nor ever once did Walton himself manifest the slightest egotism, the slightest suggestion that all this appreciation was different from that given to other men, or in any wise a tribute to him. He accepted it beamingly as a means of magnifying his influence, and his influence was always for good. Men found it inspiring just to watch him swinging along the street, his shoulders squared bravely, though they knew what memory still burdened his heart and that he was sensitive with realizing that they did know.

They knew that he was sensitive because he never spoke about it himself, not even to his intimates; not more than once or twice in five years to George Fawcett and Mose Mullen, witnessing eloquently that within his heart a door was close locked upon the tragedy. Men of his denomination who had known him in the old days and came to him now in the new days and were entertained in his house, listened, longed, for one word of confidence, one word of appeal for understanding and sympathy; but he never uttered it.

During this period, however, certain details inevitably came out; details that showed how naïvely simple and trustful the man had been even in his duplicity. Mose discovered, for instance, that his name had never been changed; that he was still in fact Robert N. Wills; and one day, when the court room was empty, Mullen secured an order from a judge making the name officially that under which the man's long agony had been endured and his long triumph achieved.

It was learned too that certain other persons had known all along who Robert N. Walton was. There came the story of an admirer of his in a Western city who was always lauding "Brother Walton," and of her expression of wonder that a certain woman in the boarding house invariably left the room when she began to extoll the virtues of her favorite minister. She expressed this wonder to the landlady, only to be informed gently: "Perhaps it's because the lady is his wife that she cannot bear to have him praised."

This showed again that Walton had been somehow deliberately protected in the work he had chosen to do by some of those who knew him best.

All the while now, too, his influence was widening over the city and state. His character stood the test of all this popular acclaim. He hailed his opportunities joyously; he denied himself to few of them. When the country fell into war the deeply-lying patriotism in his heart was deeply stirred. He could rouse men for war service with the same good conscience that he roused them for the duties of peace.

No war meeting, nor ally of the minute men, no campaign for the raising of quotas on Liberty Loans was considered to have been properly launched if his voice was not heard in its behalf. He spoke one night at the state fair grounds to all the thousands that could crowd within the range of his voice and roused them to white-hot enthusiasm. Other states pleaded for him. Special trains whirled him hither and yon.

So he gave himself, his magnificent physical strength supporting him so well that it was with a kind of surprise that people heard one day that he was ill. It was Mrs. Walton who had divined prophetically, a good while before that these his fruitful fifties might be also his failing fifties.

It was front page news when the fact became public that he was ill; it was

All their charm and smartness depend upon their color and their texture

Don't let careless laundering shrink or fade them—

Washed this way your sport clothes keep their texture and their color

You look doubtfully at your smart Kasha cloth skirt, the little sports jacket with its quaint Egyptian design. They really ought to be washed, but will it ruin them? You can't bear to have them shrink and fade, lose their modish look.

Just one careless laundering—and the proudest of them isn't fit to wear again.

Wash all your sport things with Lux. Lux is safe for all these sensitive garments. There are no harsh ingredients in it to attack fuzzy woolen fibres or to stiffen and yellow silk.

Strong soap actually dissolves delicate fibres. Even a moderately strong soap or soap chip will destroy their finish, fade or streak their colors.

The feathery Lux suds cleanse all your pretty things gently without the rubbing that injures any fabric. If your sport things are safe in pure water they are just as safe in Lux.

Makers of all kinds of fine fabrics say, "Wash them in Lux"

Belding Bros. & Co., Silks
Mallinson Silks
Roessel Silks
Skinner Satins
Forsythe Blouses
Vanity Fair Silk Underwear
Dove Under-garments
Model Brassieres
McCallum Hosiery
"Onyx" Hosiery
McCutcheon's Linens
D. & J. Anderson Ginghams
Betty Wales Dresses
Mildred Louise Dresses
North Star Blankets
Pacific Mills Printed Cottons
Ascher's Knit Goods
Carter's Knit Underwear
Jaeger Woolens
The Fleisher Yarns
Orinoka Guaranteed Sunfast Draperies
Puritan Mills Draperies

Send today for valuable free booklet "How to Launder Silks, Woolens, Fine Cottons and Linens"

Lever Bros. Co., Dept. 81, 164 Broadway, Cambridge, Mass.

Good Food? Yes Good exercise? NO

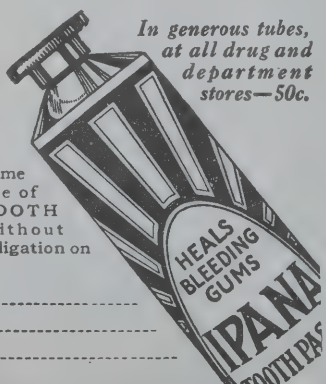
TEETH were meant to work hard; gums are healthiest when massaged in masticating rough food. And this soft modern food of ours gives little work to your teeth and even less exercise to your gums.

Does your tooth-brush "show pink"?

Because the gums get so little stimulation, they are, in late years, growing soft and flabby, and tooth troubles, due to weak gums—and most of them are—show a decided and alarming increase.

The dental profession is awake to the situation—nearly 3,000 have written to tell us how they combat soft and tender gums by the use of Ipana Tooth Paste.

In stubborn cases, they prescribe a gum-massage with Ipana after the ordinary cleaning with Ipana and the brush. For Ipana Tooth Paste, because of the presence of Ziratol, has a decided tendency to strengthen soft gums and keep them firm and healthy.



Ipana is a tooth paste that's good for your gums as well as your teeth. Its cleaning power is remarkable and its taste is unforgetably good. Send for a sample today.

IPANA
TOOTH PASTE

—made by the makers of Sal Hepatica

Bristol-Myers Co.
65 Rector St.
New York, N.Y.

In generous tubes, at all drug and department stores—50c.

Kindly send me a trial tube of IPANA TOOTH PASTE without charge or obligation on my part.

Name ----------
Address ----------
City ----------
State ----------

scare head news when it was known that he had been taken to a sanatorium; and from there bulletins of his condition were played up in the daily papers of E—— as if a president had been prostrated. The minds of all the city were centered in anxiety on that sanatorium. The reports grew grave, grew uncertain, grew hopeless. The churches, the lodges, the whole city, began to realize that their idol was very ill, but they were unprepared for the abrupt announcement that he was dead; but so it was. Those that loved him most stood by and saw his spirit flicker and go out. They saw his face at peace, saw that, of a truth, dark shadows lay beneath his eyes; saw about his mouth the lines of that heroic battle with sin which he had fought and won.

For an hour the people of E—— marveled that this strong man and vigorous, so valiant in every cause but his own, should lie down and die in just a day or two of illness; but presently they realized. He had worn himself out for them, spending and being spent; he had no vitality left with which to fight disease.

Then the city gave itself up to mourning. Never in its history or that of the state had so many hearts been sore over the death of any man. The body lay in state in Scottish Rite Cathedral—the home of that order to which he had belonged and whose members had rallied to him so loyally. Here hundreds of men passed his bier and wept as they looked upon features which told their own story of conflict—men who had sinned perhaps as he, battled with their weakness as he, and perhaps had not triumphed so gloriously.

Again his body lay in state out in that church where he had done his last great work. There was a flagpole in front of this church—a regular part of its equipment—and as his body was borne within, the Stars and Stripes that he had cherished so fondly were floated slowly to the peak, then lowered to half-mast; as flags were hanging elsewhere in the city.

To that very spot where he had stood, confessing to his board, the casket was borne while the organ wailed its requiem, and as the building echoed with the weeping of the congregation it woke in some minds the memory of the echoing sobs of the man himself while he had torn out the truth from his heart.

Flowers, flowers, flowers! They covered the casket, they covered the pulpit, they all but obscured the organ.

"I never saw such a funeral," said one minister to me, and he had seen many.

Orders, societies, associations, churches, individuals had sent their quotas and their tributes. There came poor and humble folk, whom his congregation wondered that he had found time to know, bringing poor little gifts of a single rose or geranium or hollyhock, culled from some wretched back-yard garden, and laid them with tears among the more elaborate floral pieces.

The church, for one to voice its grief, had sent far, borrowing from his high service one of those five boys who had entered the ministry under Robert N. Walton's persuasion in the little river town of B——. He tried to speak their sorrow for the people and mingled with it his own broken tribute to the man whose broken life had been mended so beautifully.

Two miles of automobiles followed the body to its last resting place; and when the lodge ritual was concluded, a bishop of the Episcopal Church, which of course was not the deceased's denomination, was escorted to the side of the widow, where he invoked God's blessing on her and the household. Facing the open grave he spoke the earth to earth, dust to dust and ashes to ashes, intoning with deepest solemnity, his rich voice trembling when he came to "We commit his body to the ground and his soul to Almighty God."

So they laid Robert N. Walton away.

"I have never seen anybody," testified George Fawcett to me, "who could so influence men by words and deeds. And if it hadn't been for Mose Mullen the church might have failed him."

There comes yet somehow one more heartthrob in knowing that when, seven months later, this church called a new pastor, it chose another one of those five boys from the town of B——, a man who had demonstrated great strength in leadership and who had now for ten years been occupying Walton's third pulpit in that flourishing city of C——. Today he stands in his pulpit at E——; and he finds it a solid work that his father in the Gospel has left to him.

Two thousand one hundred and forty-six persons gathered to welcome him on his first Sunday in the new field. The church had been shepherdless more than half a year, and yet the twelve-months' report is the greatest in the congregation's history. Walton had been building deep and strong. The church is not rich, but it had raised $58,000 in that year; it had given fifteen thousand to missions and benevolences; the Robert N. Walton Bible Class alone had given more than four thousand dollars to causes other than its share of Sunday school expenses; and plans for doubling the entire working plant of the church were ready for the new pastor's approval. That was the enduring nature of the work which had been done by a man who had lived nearly all his days in heartbreak house.

And this is his story! If it be over-embellished, over-emotionalized, the fault is mine. It has been hard—impossible—to write it coldly. If imagination has supplied details where participants were unwilling to or obviously could not be approached, it may be taken for granted that the fictions are less forceful than the realities. But the story of the man whose sin so humbled him, and of the church, the ministers, the lodges, the newspapers and the community which so exalted themselves in exalting him—that story is true. At the same time it is so marvelous that the men who lived through it can hardly believe it themselves.

"As I contemplate the life of Robert N. Walton," said that minister who had wondered at his funeral, "I am convinced that nothing but the grace of God could have made it possible."

And there are people who fancy that the grace of God is rather going out of fashion in the world!

Ida M. Evans is a name that stands for stories close to real life: One of them—an exceptionally powerful one—will appear in an early issue of COSMOPOLITAN inches into his leg. He seems to need something like that to give him ambition."

The Début of Battling Billson

(Continued from page 99)

"I don't see how you are going to arrange to have him knifed just before each fight."

"No," said Ukridge mournfully.

"What are you going to do about his future? Have you any plans?"

"Nothing definite. My aunt was looking for a companion to attend to her correspondence and take care of the canary last time I saw her. I might try to get the job for him."

And with a horrid mirthless laugh Stanley Featherstonehaugh Ukridge borrowed five shillings and passed out into the night.

I did not see Ukridge for the next few days, but I had news of him from our mutual friend George Tupper, whom I met prancing in uplifted mood down Whitehall.

"I say," said George Tupper without preamble and with a sort of dazed fervor, "they've given me an assistant under-secretaryship."

I pressed his hand. I would have slapped him on the back, but one does not slap the backs of eminent Foreign Office officials in Whitehall in broad daylight, even if one has been at school with them.

"Congratulations," I said. "There is no one whom I would more gladly see assisting under-secretaries. I heard rumors of this from Ukridge."

"Oh yes, I remember I told him it might be coming off. Good old Ukridge. I met him just now and told him the news, and he was delighted."

"How much did he touch you for?"

"Eh? Oh, only five pounds! Till Saturday. He expects to have a lot of money by then."

"Did you ever know the time when Ukridge didn't expect to have a lot of money?"

"I want you and Ukridge to come and have a bit of dinner with me to celebrate. How would Wednesday suit you?"

"Splendidly."

"Seven-thirty at the Regent Grill, then. Will you tell Ukridge?"

"I don't know where he's got to. I haven't seen him for nearly a week. Did he tell you where he was?"

"Out at some place at Barnes. What was the name of it?"

"The White Hart?"

"That's it."

"Tell me," I said, "how did he seem? Cheerful?"

"Very. Why?"

"The last time I saw him he was thinking of giving up the struggle. He had had reverses."

I proceeded to the White Hart immediately after luncheon. The fact that Ukridge was still at that hostelry and had regained his usual sunny outlook on life seemed to point to the fact that the clouds enveloping the future of Mr. Billson had cleared away and that the latter's hat was still in the ring.

That this was so was made clear to me directly I arrived. Inquiring for my

They know why they prefer "B.V.D."

THOSE clear thinking fellows who have found that it pays to keep "fit as a fiddle" are especially exacting in matters of personal comfort. They value the Unvarying Quality, Famous Fit and Long Wear assured by the "B.V.D." Red Woven Label.

From raw material to finished product we practice ceaseless care so that every "B.V.D." garment is of the quality that has brought world-wide preference for our product.

The cool, durable nainsook of "B.V.D." is woven in our own mills from selected cotton and finished in our bleachery.

In our factories vigilant inspection guards every process of skillful cutting, sturdy stitching, well sewn buttons and accurate finish.

There is only one "B.V.D." Underwear
It is always identified by this Red Woven Label

Union Suits (Pat. U.S.A.) Men's $1.50 and upward the suit Youths' 85c the suit

MADE FOR THE B.V.D. BEST RETAIL TRADE

Trade Mark Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. and Foreign Countries

Undershirts and Drawers 85c and upward the garment

The B.V.D. COMPANY, Inc., New York
Sole Makers of "B.V.D." Underwear

© 1923 The B.V.D. Co., Inc.

"NEXT TO MYSELF I LIKE 'B.V.D.' BEST"

PHOTOS Any negative enlarged to 5x10, or 35c
Films developed all sizes 5c, roll.
Prints 3 and 4c. each. Expert work.
"A little better for a little less."
M. A. Leese Co., 615 9th St. N. W.
Washington, D.C.

ENLARGED DIAMONDS

FOR A FEW CENTS A DAY

Don't send a cent. Ten days' Trial. If you are not convinced it is the Greatest Bargain in America, send it back at our expense. Only if pleased do you send $11.50 as first payment. Then send $1.50 weekly—at the rate of a few cents a day. This Bargain Cluster Ring with 7 Blue-White Perfect Cut Diamonds can be yours. No Red Tape. No Risk.

MILLION DOLLAR BARGAIN BOOK FREE

Million Dollar Bargain Book FREE Send for it today. It pictures thousands of bargains. Address Dept. A120.

J.M.LYON & CO.
2-4 Maiden Lane N.Y.

We Start You in Business, furnishing everything; men and women, opportunity lifetime to earn handsome income operating our "New System Specialty Candy Factories" anywhere. Booklet free.
HILLYER-RAGSDALE CO., East Orange, N. J.

PREPARE now for the finest vacation you ever had. Make it possible with the WATERFORD, a complete motor boat that you can pull up on the beach—drive in shallow water—over submerged logs or rocks in absolute safety. A regular family boat—moderately priced—that you will want at your cottage this summer.

Write for illustrated booklet "1500 Miles in Canadian Wilds" and descriptive folder.

DISAPPEARING PROPELLER BOAT CORPORATION
348 Robinson St., North Tonawanda, N. Y.

WATERFORD
The Disappearing Propeller Boat

A gift that is proof of good taste

Old Hampshire Bond

"The stationery of a gentleman"

No. 529. Old Hampshire Bond is a fine, crisp, quality paper. The box illustrated contains one quire, 24 sheets and envelopes of Royal Club size. Price, $1.50.

Old Hampshire Stationery is offered in numerous other boxes, for men and women, at $1.50 to $8.50.

Sold wherever fine stationery is found. If your stationer cannot supply you, we shall be glad to oblige on receipt of remittance.

A usable packet of Specimen Sheets and Envelopes will be sent on receipt of 10c.

Old Hampshire Stationery

Its popularity proves its worth

HAMPSHIRE PAPER COMPANY
Fine Stationery Department
South Hadley Falls, Mass.

PATENTS. INVENTORS should write for Free Guide Books and RECORD OF INVENTION BLANK before disclosing invention. Send model or sketch of your invention for our Free opinion of its patentable nature.
VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
753 Ninth St. Washington, D. C

The best summer vacation you ever had! Let us help you. See page 179.

BEAU BRUMMELL
Liquid Nail Polish

FOR a soft, gleaming polish that lasts for several days without peeling use Beau Brummell Liquid Nail Polish. It protects the nails and keeps the cuticle smooth and soft.

And Beau Brummell is quick. It gives the nails a delicate tint and a wonderful polish in just twenty seconds. Price 50c at drug, department stores or by mail.

Send a dime today for a generous sample. And for another dime you will receive a sample of Isabel Cassidy's Depilatory Powder.

ROELLY CHEMICAL CO.
74 Grand Street, New York

old friend, I was directed to an upper room, from which, as I approached, there came a peculiar thudding noise. It was caused, as I perceived on opening the door, by Mr. Billson. Clad in flannel trousers and a sweater, he was earnestly pounding a large leather object suspended from a wooden platform. His manager, seated on a soap box in a corner, regarded him the while with affectionate proprietorship.

"Hullo, old horse," said Ukridge, rising as I entered. "Glad to see you."

The din of Mr. Billson's bag punching, from which my arrival had not caused him to desist, was such as to render conversation difficult. We moved to the quieter retreat of he bar downstairs, where I informed Ukridge of the assistant under-secretary's invitation.

"I'll be there," said Ukridge. "There's one thing about good old Billson, you can trust him not to break training if you take your eye off him. And, of course, he realizes that this is a big thing. It'll be the making of him."

"Your aunt is considering engaging him, then?"

"My aunt? What on earth are you talking about? Collect yourself, laddie."

"When you left me, you were going to try to get him the job of looking after your aunt's canary."

"Oh, I was feeling rather sore then! That's all over. I had an earnest talk with the poor simp and he means business from now on. And so he ought to, dash it, with a magnificent opportunity like this."

"Like what?"

"We're on to a big thing now, laddie, the dickens of a big thing."

"I hope you've made sure the other man's a bachelor. Who is he?"

"Tod Bingham."

"Tod Bingham?" I groped in my memory. "You don't mean the middleweight champion?"

"That's the fellow."

"You don't expect me to believe that you've got a match on with a champion already?"

"It isn't exactly a match. It's like this. Tod Bingham is going round the East End halls offering two hundred quid to anyone who'll stay four rounds with him. Advertisement stuff. Good old Billson is going to unleash himself at the Shoreditch Empire next Saturday."

"Do you think he'll be able to stay four rounds?"

"Stay four rounds!" cried Ukridge. "Why, he could stay four rounds with a fellow armed with a Gatling gun and a couple of pickaxes. That money's as good as in our pockets, laddie. And once we're through with this job, there isn't a boxing place in England that won't jump at us. I don't mind telling you in confidence, old horse, that in a year from now I expect to be pulling in hundreds a week. Clean up a bit here first, you know, and then pop over to America and make an enormous fortune. Damme, I shan't know how to spend the money!"

"Why not buy some socks? I'm running a bit short of them."

"Now, laddie, laddie," said Ukridge reprovingly, "need we strike a jarring note? Is this the moment to fling your beastly socks in an old friend's face? A broader-minded spirit is what I would like to see."

I was ten minutes late in arriving at the Regent Grill on the Wednesday of George Tupper's invitation, and the spectacle of George in person standing bareheaded at the Piccadilly entrance filled me with guilty remorse. George was the best fellow in the world, but the atmosphere of the Foreign Office had increased the tendency he had always had from boyhood to a sort of precise fussiness, and it upset him if his affairs did not run exactly on schedule. The thought that my unpunctuality should have marred this great evening sent me hurrying towards him full of apologies.

"Oh, there you are!" said George. "I say, it's too bad . . ."

"I'm awfully sorry. My watch . . ."

"Ukridge!" cried George Tupper, and I perceived that it was not I who had caused his concern.

"Isn't he coming?" I asked, amazed. The idea of Ukridge evading a free meal was one of those that seem to make the solid foundations of the world rock.

"He's come. And he's brought a girl with him!"

"A girl!"

"In pink, with yellow hair," wailed George Tupper. "What am I to do?"

I pondered the point.

"It's a weird thing for even Ukridge to have done," I said, "but I suppose you'll have to give her dinner."

"But the place is full of people I know, and this girl's so—so spectacular."

I felt for him deeply, but I could see no way out of it.

"You don't think I could say I had been taken ill?"

"It would hurt Ukridge's feelings."

"I should enjoy hurting Ukridge's feelings, curse him!" said George Tupper fervently.

"And it would be an awful slam for the girl, whoever she is."

George Tupper sighed. His was a chivalrous nature. He drew himself up as if he were bracing himself for a dreadful ordeal.

"Oh well, I suppose there's nothing to do," he said. "Come along. I left them drinking cocktails in the lounge."

George had not erred when he described Ukridge's addition to the festivities as spectacular. Flamboyant would have been a suitable word. As she preceded us down the long dining room, her arm linked in George Tupper's—she seemed to have taken a liking to George—I had ample opportunity for studying her from her patent leather shoes to the mass of golden hair beneath her picture hat. She had a loud, clear voice, and she was telling George Tupper the rather intimate details of an internal complaint which had recently troubled an aunt of hers. If George had been the family physician, she could not have been franker; and I could see a dull glow spreading gradually over his shapely ears.

Perhaps Ukridge saw it, too, for he seemed to experience a slight twinge of conscience.

"I have an idea, laddie," he whispered, "that old Tuppy is a trifle peeved at my bringing Flossie along. If you get a chance, you might just murmur to him that it was military necessity."

"Who is she?" I asked.

"I told you about her. Flossie, the barmaid at the Crown in Kennington. Billson's fiancée."

I looked at him in amazement.

"Do you mean to tell me that you're courting death by flirting with Battling Billson's girl?"

"My dear old man, nothing like that," said Ukridge, shocked. "The whole thing is, I've got a particular favor to ask of her—rather a rummy request—and it was no good springing it on her in cold blood. There had to be a certain amount of champagne in advance, and my funds won't run to champagne. I'm taking her on to the Alhambra after dinner. I'll look you up tonight and tell you all about it."

We then proceeded to dine. It was not one of the pleasantest meals of my experience. The future Mrs. Billson prattled agreeably throughout, and Ukridge assisted her in keeping the conversation alive; but the shattered demeanor of George Tupper would have taken the sparkle out of any banquet. From time to time he pulled himself together and endeavored to play the host, but for the most part he maintained a pale and brooding silence; and it was a relief when Ukridge and his companion finally rose to leave.

"Well!" began George Tupper in a strangled voice, as they moved away down the aisle.

I lighted a cigar and sat back dutifully to listen.

Ukridge arrived at my rooms at midnight, his eyes gleaming through their pince-nez with a strange light. His manner was exuberant.

"It's all right," he said.

"I'm glad you think so."

"Did you explain to Tuppy?"

"I didn't get a chance. He was talking too hard."

"About me?"

"Yes. He said everything I've always felt about you, only far, far better than I could ever have put it."

Ukridge's face clouded for a moment, but cheerfulness returned.

"Oh, well, it can't be helped! He'll simmer down in a day or two. It had to be done, laddie. Life and death matter. And it's all right. Read this."

I took the letter he handed me. It was written in a scrawly hand.

"What's this?"

"Read it, laddie. I think it will meet the case."

I read:

"'Wilberforce.' Who on earth's Wilberforce?"

"I told you that was old Billson's name."

"Oh, yes!"

I returned to the letter.

WILBERFORCE:

I take my pen in hand to tell you that I can never be yours. You will no doubt be surprised to hear that I love another and a better man, so that it can never be. He loves me, and he is a better man than you.

Hoping this finds you in the pink as it leaves me at present,

Yours faithfully,
Florence Burns

"I told her to keep it snappy," said Ukridge.

"Well, she's certainly done it," I replied, handing back the letter. "I'm sorry.

Posed by Lois Wilson attractive Paramount motion picture star. Miss Wilson is one of many charming women of the screen who use and endorse Ingram's Milkweed Cream for promoting beauty of complexion. From a photograph by Donald Biddle Keys.

A complexion as fair as June roses can so easily be yours

DO YOU know how truly beautiful your complexion can be? Do you appreciate what delicate freshness, what fineness of texture you can gain for your skin? And with how little effort?

You can attain a complexion as fresh and radiant as the roses in June. You can achieve the dainty bloom of a clear, wholesome skin, just as thousands of attractive women have, if you begin at once the daily use of Ingram's Milkweed Cream.

Ingram's Milkweed Cream, you will find, is more than a face cream, more than a cleanser. It has an exclusive therapeutic property that serves to "tone-up"—revitalize—the sluggish tissues of the skin. Applied regularly, it heals and nourishes the skin cells, soothes away redness and roughness, banishes slight imperfections. Used faithfully—according to directions in the Health Hint booklet packed with every jar—it will help you to gain and retain a complexion that is genuinely beautiful.

Go to your druggist today and purchase a jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream in either the 50 cent or $1.00 size—the dollar size contains three times the quantity. Begin at once to gain a new charm of complexion. It will mean so much to you.

Ingram's Rouge—"Just to show the proper glow" use a touch of Ingram's Rouge on the cheeks. A safe preparation for delicately emphasizing the natural color. Offered in thin, artistic metal vanity-box, with large mirror and pad—does not bulge the purse. Five perfect shades, subtly perfumed—Light, Rose, Medium, Dark or the newest popular tint, American Blush—50c.

Ingram's Face Powder—A complexion powder especially distinguished by the fact that it stays on. Furthermore, a powder of unexcelled delicacy of texture and refinement of perfume. Four tints—White, Pink, Flesh, Brunette—in striking container, 50c.

FREDERICK F. INGRAM CO.
Established 1885
40 TENTH ST. DETROIT, MICH.

Canadian residents address F. F. Ingram Company, Windsor, Ontario. British residents address Sangers, 42A Hampstead Rd., London, N. W. 1. Australian residents address Law, Binns & Co., Commerce House, Melbourne. New Zealand residents address Hart, Pennington, Ltd., 33 Ghuznee Street, Wellington. Cuban residents address Espino & Co., Zulueta 36½, Havana.

Ingram's
Milkweed
Cream

Send a dime for Ingram's Beauty Purse—An attractive souvenir packet of the exquisite Ingram Toilet-Aids. Mail the coupon below with a silver dime and receive this dainty Beauty Purse for your hand bag.

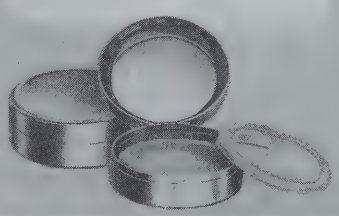
FREDERICK F. INGRAM CO., 40 Tenth St., Detroit, Mich.

Gentlemen: Enclosed please find one dime, in return for which please send me Ingram's Beauty Purse containing an elderdown powder pad, sample packets of Ingram's Face Powder and Ingram's Rouge, a sample tin of Ingram's Milkweed Cream, and, for the gentleman of the house, a sample tin of Ingram's Therapeutic Shaving Cream.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....



The appreciation of Day Dream voiced by Miss Lenore Ulric is shared by charming women in every walk of life—women who realize that they owe it to themselves to look their best.

Send 25c for a Day Dream "Acquaintance Box," (containing Perfume, Face Powder, Poudre Creme, Cold Cream and Soap). Address Dept. R Stearns, Perfumer, 6531 E. Jefferson Ave., Detroit, Mich.

STEARNS, PERFUMER
Detroit, Mich. Windsor, Ont.
Creator of Sadira and l'Amusette
Established 1855

Day Dream
"The Girl You Can't Forget"

Here is Day Dream in a new form—Day Dream Orange Rouge—unusually popular because it's such a natural aid to beauty. Day Dream Orange Rouge is already offered practically everywhere that the better type of toilet necessaries are sold. Inquire for it at your favorite shop.

From the little I saw of her, I thought her a nice girl—for Billson. Do you happen to know the other man's address? Because it would be a kindly act to send him a post card advising him to leave England for a year or two."

"The Shoreditch Empire will find him this week."

"What!"

"The other man is Tod Bingham."

"Tod Bingham!" The drama of the situation moved me. "Do you mean to say that Tod Bingham is in love with Battling Billson's girl?"

"No. He's never seen her."

"What do you mean?"

Ukridge sat down creakingly on the sofa. He slapped my knee with sudden and uncomfortable violence.

"Laddie," said Ukridge, "I will tell you all. Yesterday afternoon I found old Billson reading a copy of the Daily Sportsman. He isn't much of a reader as a rule, so I was rather interested to know what had gripped him. And do you know what it was, old horse?"

"I do not."

"It was an article about Tod Bingham. One of those sentimental blurbs they print about pugilists nowadays, saying what a good chap he was in private life and how he always sent a telegram to his old mother after each fight and gave her half the purse.

"Damme, there ought to be a censorship of the press. These blighters don't mind what they print. I don't suppose Tod Bingham has got an old mother, and if he has I'll bet he doesn't give her a bob. There were tears in that chump Billson's eyes as he showed me the article. Salt tears, laddie! 'Must be a nice feller!' he said.

"Well, I ask you! I mean to say, it's a bit thick when the man you've been pouring out money for and watching over like a baby sister starts getting sorry for a champion three days before he's due to fight him. A champion, mark you! It was bad enough his getting mushy about that fellow at Wonderland, but when it came to his being soft-hearted over Tod Bingham something nad to be done.

"Well, you know me. Brain like a buzz-saw. I saw the only way of counteracting this pernicious stuff was to get him so mad with Tod Bingham that he would forget all about his old mother, so I suddenly thought, why not get Flossie to pretend that Bingham had cut him out with her? Well, it's not the sort of thing you can ask a girl to do without preparing the ground a bit, so I brought her along to Tuppy's dinner. It was a master stroke, laddie. There's nothing softens the delicately nurtured like a good dinner, and there's no denying that old Tuppy did us well.

"She agreed the moment I put the thing to her, and sat down and wrote that letter without a blink. I think she thinks it's all a jolly practical joke. She's a light-hearted girl."

"Must be."

"It'll give poor old Billson a bit of a jar for the time being, I suppose, but it'll make him spread himself on Saturday night, and he'll be perfectly happy on Sunday morning when she tells him she didn't mean it and he realizes that he's got a hundred quid of Tod Bingham's in his trousers' pocket."

"I thought you said it was two hundred quid that Bingham was offering."

"I get a hundred," said Ukridge dreamily.

"The only flaw is, the letter doesn't give the other man's name. How is Billson to know it's Tod Bingham?"

"Why, damme, laddie, do use your intelligence. Billson isn't going to sit and yawn when he gets that letter. He'll buzz straight down to Kennington and ask Flossie."

"And then she will give the whole thing away."

"No she won't. I slipped her a couple of quid to promise she wouldn't. And that reminds me, old man, it has left me a bit short, so if you could possibly manage . . ."

"Good night," I said.

"But, laddie . . ."

"And God bless you," I added firmly.

The Shoreditch Empire is a roomy house, but it was crowded to the doors when I reached it on the Saturday night. In normal circumstances I suppose there would always have been a large audience on a Saturday, and this evening the lure of Tod Bingham's personal appearance had drawn more than capacity.

In return for my shilling I was accorded the privilege of standing against the wall at the back, a position from which I could not see a great deal of the performance.

From the occasional flashes which I got of the stage between the heads of my neighbors, however, and from the generally restless and impatient attitude of the audience, I gathered that I was not missing much.

The program of the Shoreditch Empire that week was essentially a one-man affair. The patrons had the air of suffering the preliminary acts as unavoidable obstacles that stood between them and the headliner. It was Tod Bingham whom they had come to see, and they were not cordial to the unfortunate serio-comics, tramp cyclists, jugglers, acrobats and ballad singers who intruded themselves during the earlier part of the evening. The cheer that arose as the curtain fell on a dramatic sketch came from the heart, for the next number on the program was that of the star.

A stout man in evening dress with a red handkerchief worn ambassadorially athwart his shirt front stepped out from the wings.

"Ladies and gentlemen!"

"'Ush!" cried the audience.

"Ladies and gentlemen!"

A voice: "Good ole Tod!" ("Cheese it!")

"Ladies and gentlemen," said the ambassador for the third time.

He scanned the house apprehensively. "Deeply regret have unfortunate disappointment to announce. Tod Bingham unfortunately unable to appear before you tonight."

A howl like the howl of wolves cheated of their prey or of an amphitheater full of Roman citizens on receipt of the news that the supply of lions had run out greeted these words.

We stared at each other with a wild surmise. Could this thing be, or was it not too thick for human belief?

"Wot's the matter with 'im?" demanded the gallery hoarsely.

"Yus, wot's the matter with 'im?" echoed we of the better element on the lower floor.

The ambassador sidled uneasily towards the prompt entrance. He seemed aware that he was not a popular favorite.

"'E 'as 'ad an unfortunate accident," he declared, nervousness beginning to sweep away his h's wholesale. "On 'is way 'ere to this 'all 'e was unfortunately run into by a truck, sustaining bruises and contusions which render 'im unfortunately unable to appear before you tonight. I beg to announce that 'is place will be taken by Professor Devine, who will render 'is marvelous imitations of various birds and familiar animals. Ladies and gentlemen," concluded the ambassador, stepping nimbly off the stage, "I thank you one and all."

The curtain rose and a dapper individual with a waxed mustache skipped on.

"Ladies and gentlemen, my first imitation will be of that well known songster, the common thrush—better known to some of you per'aps as the mavis or throstle. And in connection with my performance I wish to state that I 'ave nothing whatsoever in my mouth. The effects which I produce . . ."

I withdrew, and two-thirds of the audience started to do the same. From behind us, dying away as the doors closed, came the plaintive note of the common thrush feebly competing with that other and sterner bird which haunts those places of entertainment where audiences are critical and swift to take offense.

Out in the street a knot of Shoreditch's younger set were hanging on the lips of an excited orator in a battered hat and trousers which had been made for a larger man. Some stirring tale which he was telling held them spellbound. Words came raggedly through the noise of the traffic.

". . . like this. Then 'e 'its 'im another like that. Then they start . . . on the side of the jor . . ."

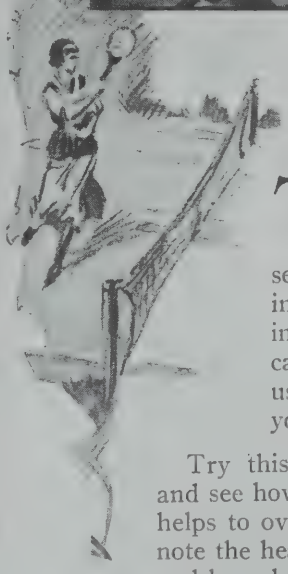
"Pass along, there!" interrupted an official voice. "Come on, there, pass along!"

The crowd thinned and resolved itself into its elements.

I found myself moving down the street in company with the wearer of the battered hat. Though we had not been formally introduced, he seemed to consider me a suitable recipient for his tale. He enrolled me at once as a nucleus for a fresh audience.

"'E comes up, this bloke does, just as Tod is goin' in at the stage door . . ."

"Tod?" I queried.



"Tod Bingham. 'E comes up just as 'e's goin' in at the stage door, and 'e says ''Ere!' and Tod says 'Yus?' and this bloke 'e says 'Put 'em up!' and Tod says 'Put wot up?' and this bloke says 'Yer 'ands,' and Tod says 'Wot, me?' sort of surprised. An' the next minute they're fightin' all over the shop . . ."

"But surely Tod Bingham was run over by a truck?"

The man in the battered hat surveyed me with the mingled scorn and resentment which the devout bestow on those of heretical views.

"Truck! 'E wasn't run over by no truck. Wot mikes yer fink 'e was run over by a truck? Wot 'ud 'e be doin' bein' run over by a truck? 'E 'ad it put

Know the Joy of A Smooth Healthy Skin

THE first step towards attaining a healthy skin is right living—spending hours in wholesome outdoor activities, etc. But the second, and equally important, is proper cleansing. Your skin is like a delicate fabric—easily injured by rough scrubbing or the use of a harsh, caustic soap. Why run the risk of hurting it by using anything that happens to be handy, when you know that Resinol Soap protects it?

Try this exceptional toilet soap for your complexion and see how gently yet thoroughly it cleanses the pores and helps to overcome skin defects. Take a Resinol bath and note the healthy glow that follows. Place it in the nursery and keep baby sweet, clean and contented.

A trial size cake will prove to you the delights of Resinol Soap. May we send you one free? Write Dept. 7-G, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

BUY RESINOL SOAP BY THE BOX FROM YOUR DRUGGIST OR TOILET GOODS DEALER

Resinol Soap

across 'im by this red-'eaded bloke, same as I'm tellin' yer."

A great light shone upon me.

"Red-headed?" I cried.

"Yus."

"A big man?"

"Yus."

"And you say he put it across Tod Bingham?"

"Put it across 'im proper. 'Ad to go 'ome in a keb, Tod did. Funny a bloke that could fight like that bloke could fight 'adn't the sense to go and do it on the stige and get some money for it. That's wot I think."

Across the street an arc lamp shed its cold rays. And into its glare there strode a man draped in a yellow mackintosh. The light gleamed on his pince-nez and lent a gruesome pallor to his set face. It was Ukridge retreating from Moscow.

"Others," I said, "are thinking the same."

And I hurried across the road to administer what feeble consolation I might.

There are moments when a fellow needs a friend.

Ukridge, the man with a genius for getting himself and his friends into tight places, does one of his choicest bits in July COSMOPOLITAN couple of funerals—relations where I couldn't dodge the last sad rites. Cheerless, this death stuff; sort o' brings you up with a jerk when you think of it. Most of us these days are frantically trying to forget man's inevitable destiny by running as wild as we dare—blindfolded. It isn't fashionable to be serious about anything. I tell you, my boy, I could count on the fingers of one hand all the people I know who ever take a good square look at life."

The Hope of Happiness

(Continued from page 56)

"Oh, not as bad as that!" said Bruce, surprised at Henderson's unwonted earnestness. "There must be a lot of people who are troubled about the state of their souls—who have some sort of ideals but are ashamed to haul them out!"

"Ashamed is the word!" Henderson affirmed. "We're afraid of being kidded if anybody sneaks up on us and catches us admiring the Ten Commandments or practicing the Christian virtues! Now I know the rattle of all the skeletons in all the closets in this town. If they all took a notion to trot up and down our main thoroughfares some moonlit evening they'd make quite a parade. You understand I'm not sitting in judgment on my fellow man; I merely view him at times like this, when I'm addressing a man of intellect like you, with a certain cheerful detachment. And I see things going on—and I take part in them—that I deplore. I swear I deplore them; particularly," he went on with a grim smile, "on days when I'm suffering from hang-over-itis."

"You must have been on a roaring tear last night. You have all the symptoms."

"A cruel injustice! I'm never terribly wicked. I drink more than I need at times and I flirt occasionally to keep my hand in. Maybelle doesn't mind if I wander a little, but when she whistles I'm right back at my own fireside pretending nothing happened."

"I'll wager you do!" laughed Bruce.

"Right now," Henderson went on, "I can see a few people we both know who are bound to come a cropper if they don't mind their steps. There's Connie Mills. Not a bad sort, Connie, but a little bit too afraid she isn't having as much fun as she's entitled to. And Shep—the most high-minded, unselfish fellow I know—he, poor nut, just perishing for somebody to love him!"

"By the way, what sort of a chap's George Whitford?" Bruce asked.

"First class," Bud answered promptly. "A real fellow; about the best we've got. Something of the soldier of fortune about him. A variety of talents; brilliant streak in him. Why do you ask? George getting on your preserves?"

"Lord, no! I was just wondering whether you'd knock him. I like him myself."

"Well, nearly everyone does. He appeals to the imagination. Just a little too keen about women, however, for his own good."

A buzzer sounded and Bruce went to the telephone by which visitors announced themselves from the hall below.

"Mr. Carroll? Certainly; come right up!"

"Carroll? Didn't know you were so chummy with him," Henderson grumbled, not pleased by the interruption.

"I run into him at the club occasionally. He's been threatening to drop in some evening. Seems to be a nice chap."

"Oh, yes, Carroll's all right!" Bud grinned. "We might proceed with our discussion of the Millses. Arthur ought to know a few merry facts not disclosed to the general public. He wears the mask of meekness, but that's purely secretarial, so to speak."

Carroll, having reached the apartment, at once began bantering Henderson about the Plantagenet Bud had lately sold him.

"I'm glad you came in," said Bruce. "Bud's conscience is hurting him; he's moaning over the general depravity of the world."

"Nothing original in that. Everybody's talking that stuff," said Carroll, taking a cigar from the box Bruce offered. He manifested a polite interest in the apartment and said he hoped Bruce was liking the town. "We want newcomers to feel at home. When a new man shows up we like to think he's here for life."

Carroll, Bruce knew, was a popular man in town, no doubt deriving special consideration from his association with Mills. His name was written into local history almost as far back as that of the Mills family. In giving up the law to become Mills's right-hand man it was assumed that he had done so merely for the benefit to be derived from contact with a man of Mills's large interests. In time it was believed that he would return to the law, which he had abandoned to go into Mills's office. He dabbled somewhat in politics, possibly, it was said, that he might be in a position to serve Mills when necessary in frustrating the evil designs of the State or the municipal government upon Mills's interests.

Bruce had wondered a little when Carroll intimated his purpose to look him up; he had even speculated as to whether Mills might not have prompted this demonstration of friendliness for some purpose of his own. It was maddening that he was unable to turn in any direction without running into Mills or someone close to him. But Carroll bore all the marks of a gentleman; he was socially in demand and it was grossly ungenerous to think that his call had any motive beyond a wish to be courteous to a new member of the community.

Carroll was tall and slender, with light brown hair and deep-set blue eyes. His clean-shaven face was rather deeply lined for a man of his years; there was something of the air of a student about him. But when he spoke it was in the crisp incisive tones of an executive. A second glance at his eyes discovered hints of reserve strength. Serving an exacting man had not destroyed his independence and self-respect. On the whole a person who knew what he was about, endowed with brains and not easily to be trampled upon or driven.

"You mustn't let Bud fool you about our home town. Most anything he says is bound to be wrong; it's temperamental with him. But you know him of old; I needn't tell you what a scoundrel he is."

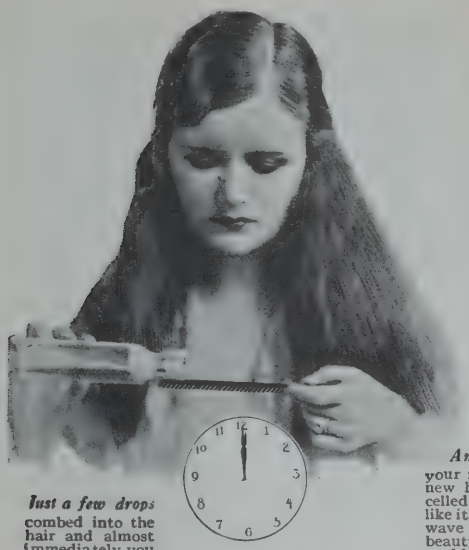
"Certainly not! You can't room with a man for four years without knowing all his weaknesses."

"Yes; I certainly know all yours," Henderson retorted. "But he isn't a bad fellow, Arthur. We must marry him off and settle him in life. I already see several good chances to plant him."

"You'd better let Maybelle do that," replied Carroll. "Your judgment in such delicate matters can't be trusted."

"Perhaps I'd better leave the room while you make a choice for me," said Bruce.

"What would you think of Leila Mills as a fitting mate for him?" asked Henderson.



"Excellent," Carroll affirmed. "It's about time Leila was married. You've met Miss Mills, haven't you, Storrs?"

"Yes; several times," said Bruce, wholly uncomfortable that the talk was verging again toward the Mills family. He suspected Bud of turning the conversation upon Leila merely to gratify his passion for gossip.

"Of course you've got the first call, Arthur," said Henderson with cheerful impudence. "The town is getting impatient waiting for you to show your hand."

"I'm sorry to keep my fellow citizens waiting," Carroll replied. "Of course there's always Miss Mills's own wishes to consider."

"Oh well, there is that! Bruce, with his

Just a few drops combed into the hair and almost immediately you can see "listless locks" begin to take on new life, new lustre, new silky sheen—stray ends and straggly strands molding into glorious waves and curls.

And in 20 minutes your mirror shows you a new head of hair—marcelled and curled as you like it best; with a natural wave that no artificial beauty-parlor process could possibly duplicate.

Marvelous New Spanish Liquid

Makes any hair naturally curly in 20 minutes

The Spanish Beggar's Priceless Gift

by Winnifred Ralston

FROM the day we started to school, Charity Winthrop and I were called the touseled-hair twins.

Our mothers despaired of us. Our hair simply wouldn't behave.

As we grew older the hated name still clung to us. It followed us through the grades and into boarding school. Then Charity's family moved to Spain and I didn't see her again until last New Year's eve.

A party of us had gone to the Drake Hotel for dinner that night. As usual I was terribly embarrassed and ashamed of my hair.

Horribly self-conscious I was sitting at the table, scarcely touching my food, wishing I were home. It seemed that everyone had wonderful, lustrous, curly hair but me and I felt they were all laughing or worse, pitying me behind my back.

My eyes strayed to the dance floor and there I saw a beautiful girl dancing with Tom Harvey. Her eye caught mine and to my surprise she smiled and started toward me.

About this girl's face was a halo of golden curls. I think she had the most beautiful hair I ever saw. My face must have turned scarlet as I compared it mentally with my own straggly, ugly mop.

Of course you have guessed her identity—Charity Winthrop who once had dull straight hair like mine.

It had been five long years since I had seen her. But I simply couldn't wait. I blurted out—"Charity Winthrop—tell me—what miracle has happened to your hair?"

She smiled and said mysteriously, "Come to my room and I will tell you the whole story."

Charity tells of the beggar's gift

"Our house in Madrid faced a little, old plaza where I often strolled after my siesta.

A Matchless Marcelle

"Miguel, the beggar, always occupied the end bench of the south end of the plaza. I always dropped a few centavos in his hat when I passed and he soon grew to know me.

"The day before I left Madrid I stopped to bid him goodby and pressed a gold coin in his palm."

"Hija mia," he said, "You have been very kind to an old man. Digamelo (tell me) senorita, what it is your heart most desires."

"I laughed at the idea, then said jokingly, 'Miguel, my hair is straight and dull. I would have it lustrous and curly'."

"Oigame, senorita," he said—"Many years ago—a Castilian prince was wedded to a Moorish beauty. Her hair was black as a raven's wing and straight as an arrow. Like you, this lady wanted los pelos rizos (curly hair). Her husband offered thousands of pesos to the man who would fulfill her wish. The prize fell to Pedro, the droguero. Out of roots and herbs he brewed a potion that converted the princess' straight, unruly hair into a glorious mass of ringlet curls.

"Pedro, son of the son of Pedro, has that secret today. Years ago I did him a great service. Here you will find him, go to him and tell your wish."

"I called a coche and gave the driver the address Miguel had given me.

"At the door of the apothecary shop, a funny old hawk-nosed Spaniard met me. I stammered out my explanation. When I finished, he bowed and vanished into his store. Presently he returned and handed me a bottle.

"Terribly excited—I could hardly wait until I reached home. When I was in my room alone, I took down my hair and applied the liquid as directed. In twenty minutes, not one second more, the transformation, which you have noted, had taken place.

"Come, Winnifred—apply it to your own hair and see what it can do for you."

Twenty minutes later as I looked into Charity's mirror I could hardly believe my eyes. The impossible had happened. My dull, straight hair had wound itself into curling tendrils. My head was a mass of ringlets and waves. It shone with a lustre it never had before.

You can imagine the amazement of the others in the party when I returned to the ballroom. Everybody noticed the change. Never did I have such a glorious night. I was popular. Men clustered about me. I had never been so happy.

The next morning when I awoke, I hardly dared look in my mirror fearing it had all been a dream. But it was true—gloriously true. My hair was curly and beautiful.

Lovely Curls

I asked Charity's permission to take a sample of the Spanish liquid to my cousin at the Century Laboratories. For days he worked, analyzing the liquid. Finally, he solved the problem, isolated the two Spanish herbs, the important ingredients.

They experimented on fifty women and the results were simply astounding. Now the Century Chemists are prepared to supply the wonderful Spanish Curling Liquid to women everywhere.

Take advantage of their generous trial offer—

I told my cousin I did not want one penny for the information I had given him. I did make one stipulation, however. I insisted that he introduce the discovery by selling it for a limited time at actual laboratory cost plus postage so that as many women as possible could take advantage of it. This he agreed to do.

No need to undergo the torture and expense of the so-called permanent wave, which might even destroy your hair. You can have natural curly hair in twenty minutes. One application will keep your hair beautiful for a week or more.

Don't delay another day. For the Century Chemists guarantee satisfaction or refund your money.

No Profit Distribution of $3.50 Bottles

(ONLY ONE TO A FAMILY)

Wavy Bob

We are offering for a limited time only, no-profit distribution of the regular $3.50 size of our Spanish Curling Liquid. The actual cost of preparing and compounding this Spanish Curling Fluid, including bottling, packing and shipping is $1.87. We have decided to ship the first bottle to each new user at actual cost price.

You do not have to send one penny in advance. Merely fill out the coupon below—then pay the postman $1.87 plus the few cents postage, when he delivers the liquid. If you are not satisfied in every way, even this low laboratory fee will be refunded promptly. This opportunity may never appear again. Miss Ralston urges that you take advantage of it at once.

CENTURY CHEMISTS
(Originators of the famous 40 Minute Beauty Clay)
Century Bldg., Chicago

Send No Money--Simply Sign and Mail Coupon

CENTURY CHEMISTS Dept. 128
Century Bldg., Chicago

Please send me, in plain wrapper, by insured parcel post, a full size $3.50 bottle of Liquid Marcelle (Spanish Curling Liquid). I will pay postman $1.87, plus few cents postage, on delivery, with the understanding that if, after a five-day trial, I am not elated with the results from this magic curling fluid, I may return the unused contents in the bottle, and you will immediately return my money in full.

Name .....

Street .....

Town ..... State .....

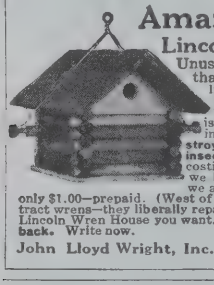
If apt to be out when postman calls, you may enclose $2 with coupon, and Liquid Marcelle will be sent you postpaid.

(Advertisement)

Easy to Learn Cartooning at Home

Earn $60 to $200 a Week in This Fascinating Profession

Sport, humorous, serious and animated cartoons — never have they been in such big demand! Successful cartoonists now earn $3,000 to over $100,000 a year. You can learn to draw these cartoons that SELL. Many of our students earn big money even while learning!



Easy Home-Study Method

Prepared by one of America's foremost cartoonists, this course teaches you to originate and draw all kinds of cartoons. You learn at home in spare time, yet all your work receives through the mail the individual help and criticism of prominent cartoon experts. Many successful cartoonists taught by this method.

Send for Free Book

Learn more about this method and the amazing opportunities open to you in this attractive fast-growing field. Our newly prepared Free Book is crammed with valuable information about this work, and explains fully this easy home-study method. Mail post card or letter for it TODAY!

WASHINGTON SCHOOL OF CARTOONING
1159 Marden Building Washington, D. C.

Amazing Bargain!

Lincoln Wren House $1.00

Unusually attractive bird house — that ONLY wrens can use. Looks like a miniature log cabin. Made of wood, tinted a soft brown color that attracts the wren, whose song is melodious and flute-like; amusing ways make it a favorite. It destroys large numbers of obnoxious insects. The equal of wren houses costing $5.00 to $7.00. And yet because we build in tremendous quantities — we are able to sell, knocked down, for only $1.00—prepaid. (West of Denver and Canada, $1.25.) Attract wrens—they liberally repay attention. Send $1.00 for each Lincoln Wren House you want. If you aren't delighted—money back. Write now.

John Lloyd Wright, Inc., 740 N. Wells St., Chicago

Let us show you the way to the best vacation you ever had. See page 179.

Make The Deaf Hear

New Invention Aids Thousands

Here's good news for all who suffer from deafness. The Dictograph Products Corporation announces the perfection of a remarkable device which has enabled thousands of deaf persons to hear as well as ever. The makers of this wonderful device say it is too much to expect you to believe this so they are going to give you a chance to try it at home. They offer to send it by prepaid parcel post on a ten-day free trial. They do not send it C. O. D.—they require no deposit — there is no obligation.

They send it entirely at their own expense and risk. They are making this extraordinary offer well knowing that the magic of this little instrument will so amaze and delight the user that the chances of its being returned are very slight. Thousands have already accepted this offer and report most gratifying results. There's no longer any need that you should endure the mental and physical strain which comes from a constant effort to hear. Now you can mingle with your friends without that feeling of sensitiveness from which all deaf persons suffer. Now you can take your place in the social and business world to which your talents entitle you and from which your affliction has, in a measure, excluded you. Just send your name and address to for descriptive literature and request blank.

The Dictograph Products Corporation, 1305 Candler Building, New York,

known affection for the arts, may prefer the lovely Millicent. He's not worth troubling about as a competitor. Well, I must skip back to Maybelle! Wait till I get downstairs before you begin knocking me!"

"Don't be in a rush," said Bruce.

"Oh, I'll go now!" said Bud as he lounged out. "I want you to have plenty of time to skin me properly!"

"Bud's a mighty good fellow," said Carroll when they were alone. "He and Maybelle give a real tang to our social affairs. I suppose we have Bud to thank for bringing you here."

"Oh, not altogether!" said Bruce. "I was alone in the world and my home town hasn't much to offer an architect."

"Your profession does need room. I was born right here and expect to be buried among my ancestors. Let me see—did I hear that you're from the East?"

The question on its face was courteously perfunctory; Mills would certainly not have done anything so clumsy, Bruce reflected, as to send Carroll to probe into his history.

"I'm an Ohioan—born in Laconia," he replied.

"Not really! I have an uncle and some cousins there. Just today we had a letter at the office from Laconia, an inquiry about a snarl in the title to some property. Mr. Mills's father—of the same name—once had some interests there—a stave factory, I think it was. Long before your day, of course. He bought some land near the plant—the Millses have always gone in strong for real estate—thinking he might need it if the business developed. Mr. Mills was there awhile as a young man. Suppose he didn't like the business, and his father sold out. I was there a few years ago visiting my relations and I met some Bruces—Miss Carolyn Bruce—awfully jolly girl—related to you?"

"My cousin. Bruce was my mother's name."

"The old saying about the smallness of the world! Splendid girl—not married yet?"

"Not when I heard from her last week."

"We might drive over there sometime next spring and see her."

"Fine. Carolyn was always a great pal of mine. Laconia's a sociable town. Everybody knows everybody else; it was like a big family. We can't laugh so gaily at the small towns; they've got a lot that's mighty fine. Our social and political regeneration has got to begin with the small units."

"I say that sometimes to Mr. Mills," Carroll continued. "But he's of the old ultra-conservative school; a pessimist as to the future, or pretends to be. He really sees most things pretty straight. But men of his sort hate the idea of change. They prefer things as they are."

"I think we all want the changes to come slowly—gradual evolution socially and politically," Bruce ventured. "That's the only safe way. The great business of the world is to find happiness—get rid of misery and violence and hatred. I'm for everything that moves toward that end."

"I'm with you there," Carroll replied quickly.

Bruce's liking for Carroll increased. Mills's secretary was not only an agreeable companion but he expressed views on many questions that showed knowledge and sound reasoning. He referred to Mills now and then, always with respect but never with any trace of subserviency. Bruce, now that his fear had passed, was deriving a degree of courage merely from talking with Carroll. Carroll, in daily contact with Mills, evidently was not afraid of him. And what had he, Bruce Storrs, to fear from Franklin Mills? There could not have been any scandal about Mills's affair with his mother or she herself would probably have mentioned it; or more likely she would never have told him her story. Carroll's visit was reassuring every way Bruce considered it.

"I got a glimpse of you at Deer Trail the other day. You were there about the superintendent's house—Mr. Mills spoke of you afterward—said you seemed to know your business. He's not so hard to please as many people think—only"—Carroll smiled—"it's always safer to do things his way."

"I imagine it is!" Bruce assented.

Carroll remained until the clock on the mantel chimed twelve.

"I hope you've enjoyed this as much as I have!" he said. "If there's anything I can do for you give me a ring. Mr. Mills is a regular client of Freeman's. We'll doubtless meet in a business way from time to time."

CHAPTER VII

ON THE following Sunday afternoon Bruce, having been reproved by Dale Freeman for his recent neglect of her, drove to the architect's house. He had hoped to find Millicent there and was disappointed not to find her.

"You expected to see someone in particular!" said Dale. "I can tell by the roving look in your eye."

"I was merely resenting the presence of these other people. My eyes are for you alone!"

"What a satisfactory boy you are! But it was Millicent, wasn't it?"

"Lady, lady! You're positively psychic! Do you also tell fortunes?"

"It's easy to tell yours! I see a beautiful blonde in your life! Sorry I can't produce Millie today. She's not crazy about my Sunday parties; she hates a crowd. I must arrange something small for you two. You must meet that girl who just came in alone—the one in the enchanting black gown. She's a Miss Abrams, a Jewess, very cultivated—lovely voice."

The rooms were soon crowded. Bruce was still talking to Miss Abrams when he caught sight of Shepherd and Constance Mills, who had drifted in with Fred Thomas. A young man with a flowing tie and melancholy dark eyes claimed Miss Abrams's attention and Bruce turned to find Shepherd at his elbow.

"Just the man I wanted to see!" exclaimed Shepherd. "Let's find a place where we can talk."

"Not so easy to find!" said Bruce. However, he led the way to Freeman's den, which had not been invaded, wondering what Franklin Mills's son could have to say to him.

"Do pardon me for cornering you this way," Shepherd began. "I looked for you several days at the club but you didn't show up."

Hair needs food

NO matter how unattractive your hair may be, it can be made really charming and lovely with this dainty new shampoo that does more than merely wash.

Your hair needs food just like a plant needs water—And Wildroot Taroleum Shampoo feeds it with purified crude oil and tar.

Its creamy, abundant lather cleanses.

Its purified crude oil and tar feed the scalp.

Its antiseptic qualities keep the hair healthy.

Sold everywhere

"I've been too busy to go up there for luncheon" Bruce replied. "You could always get track of me at the office."

"Yes, but this was—is—rather confidential for the present." Shepherd, clasping and unclasping his hands in an attempt to gain composure, now bent forward in his chair and addressed Bruce with a businesslike air. "What I want to talk to you about is that clubhouse for our workmen. You know I mentioned it some time ago?"

"Yes; I remember," Bruce replied, surprised that Shepherd still had the matter on his mind.

"It's troubled me a good deal," said Shepherd, with the earnestness that always increased his stammering. "I've felt that there's a duty—a real duty and an opportunity there. You know how it is when you get a thing in your head you can't get rid of—can't argue yourself out of?"

"Those perplexities are annoying. I'd assumed that you'd given the thing up."

"Well, I thought I had! But I'm determined now to go on. That neighborhood is so isolated—the people have no amusements unless they come to town. I'd like to go ahead so they can have some use of the house this winter."

Bruce nodded his sympathy with the idea.

"Now since I talked with you I've found some pictures of such houses. I've got 'em here." He drew from his pocket some pages torn from magazines. "I think we might spend a little more money than I thought at first would be available. We might go forty thousand to get about what's in this house I've marked with a pencil."

Bruce scrutinized the pictures and glanced over the explanatory text.

"The idea seems to be well worked out. There are many such clubhouses scattered over the country. You'd want the reading room and the play room for children and all those features?"

"Yes; and I like the idea of a comfortable sitting room where the women can gather and do their sewing and that sort of thing. And I'd like you to do this for me—begin getting up the plans right away."

Shepherd's tone was eager; his eyes were bright with excitement.

"But, Mr. Mills, I can hardly do that! After all I'm really only a subordinate in Mr. Freeman's office. It would be hardly square for me to take the commission—at least not without his consent."

Shepherd, who had not thought of this, frowned in his perplexity. Since his talk with Constance he had been anxious to get the work started before his father heard of it; and he had been hoping to run into Bruce somewhere to avoid visiting Freeman's office. He felt that if he had an architect who sympathized with the idea everything would be simplified. His father and Freeman met frequently, and Freeman, blunt and direct, was not a man who would connive at the construction of a building, in which presumably Franklin Mills was interested, without Mills's knowledge.

His sensitive face so clearly indicated his disappointment that Bruce, not knowing what lay behind this unexpected revival of the clubhouse plan, said, with every wish to be kind:

"Very likely Mr. Freeman would be glad to let me do the work—but I'd rather you

When you dance

WHEN you glide over the floor close to your partner—

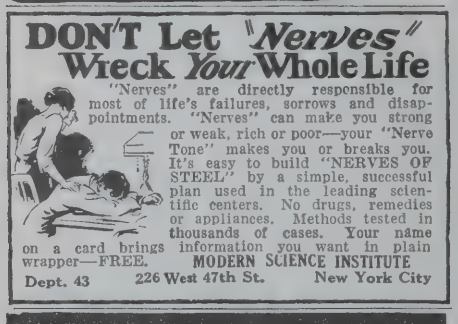
Are you one of those fortunate women whose hair is fluffy and soft to his cheek—perfumed with cleanliness?

Or is your hair greasy, dry, lifeless, with an odor that offends?

That is the thing a man notices first — and it can make him like you immensely or it can ruin his interest.

Thousands of women have found that Wildroot Hair Tonic brings out the hidden charm that is the key to loveliness — that it makes hair soft, wavy and lustrous.

After your Wildroot shampoo, massage Wildroot Hair Tonic into the scalp. Then notice the immediate results. Wildroot Co., Inc., Buffalo, N.Y.



WILDROOT HAIR TONIC

Sold everywhere

asked him. I'd hate to have him think I was going behind his back to take a job. You can understand how I'd feel about it."

"I hadn't thought of that at all!" said Shepherd sincerely. "And of course I respect your feeling." Then with a little toss of the head and a gesture that expressed his desire to be entirely frank, he added: "You understand I'm doing this on my own hook. I think I told you my father thought it unwise for the battery company to do it. But I'm going ahead on my own responsibility—with my own money."

"I see," said Bruce. "It's fine of you to want to do it."

"I've got to do it!" said Shepherd, slapping his hand on his knee. "And of course my father and the company being out of it, it's no one's concern but my own!"

The door was open. Connie Mills's laugh for a moment rose above the blur of talk in the adjoining rooms. Shepherd's head lifted and his lips tightened as though he gained confidence from his wife's propinquity. Mrs. Freeman appeared at the door, demanding to know if they wanted tea, and noting their absorption withdrew without waiting for an answer.

It was clear enough that Shepherd meant to put the scheme through without his father's consent, even in defiance of his wishes. The idea had become an obsession with the young man; but his sincere wish to promote the comfort and happiness of his employees spoke for so kind and generous a nature that Bruce shrank from wounding him.

Seeing Bruce hesitate, Shepherd began to explain the sale of his trust stock to obtain the money, which only increased Bruce's determination to have nothing to do with the matter.

"Why don't you take it up with Mr. Carroll?" Bruce suggested. "He might win your father over to your side."

"Oh, I couldn't do that! Carroll, you know, is bound to take father's view of things. Father will be all right about it when it's all done. Of course after the work starts he'll know, so it won't be a secret long. I'm going ahead as a little joke on him. I think he'll be tickled to know I've got so much initiative."

He laughed in his quick, eager way, hoping that he had made this convincing. Bruce, from his observation of Franklin Mills, was not so sanguine as to the outcome. Mills would undoubtedly be very angry. On the face of it he would have a right to be. And one instinctively felt like shielding Shepherd Mills from acts of folly.

"If you really want my advice," said Bruce after a moment's deliberation, "I'd take a little more time to this. Before you could get your plans we'll be having rough weather. I'd wait till spring, when you can develop your grounds and complete the whole thing at once. And it would be just as well to look around a bit—visit other cities and get the newest ideas."

"You think that? I supposed there'd be time to get the foundations in if I started right away."

"I wouldn't risk it; in fact I think it would be a serious mistake."

"Well, you are probably right," assented Shepherd, though reluctantly, and there was a plaintive note in his voice. "Thanks ever so much. I guess I'll take your advice. I'll let it go till spring."

"Damon and Pythias couldn't look more brotherly!" Constance Mills stood at the doorway viewing them with her languid smile. "It peeves me a good deal, Mr. Storrs, that you prefer my husband's society to mine."

"This is business, Connie," Shepherd said. "We've just finished."

"Let's say the party is just beginning," said Bruce. "I was just coming out to look you up."

"I can't believe it! But Leila just telephoned for us to come out to Deer Trail and bring any of Dale's crowd who look amusing. That includes you, of course, Mr. Storrs. Everyone's gone but Helen Torrence and Fred Thomas and Arthur Carroll. Mr. Mills is at the farm; it's a fad of his to have Sunday supper in the country. Leila hates it and sent out an S. O. S., so we can't desert her. No, Mr. Storrs, you can't duck! Millicent is there—that may add to the attractions!"

This with a meaningful glance at Bruce prompted him to say that Miss Harden's presence hardly diminished the attractions of the farm. There was real comedy in his inability to extricate himself from the net in which he constantly found himself enmeshed with the members of the house of Mills.

In discussing who had a car and who hadn't Freeman said his machine was working badly, to which Shepherd replied that there was plenty of room in his limousine for the Freemans and any others who were carless.

"Mr. Storrs will want to take his car," said Constance. "He oughtn't really to drive out alone——"

"Not alone, certainly not!" said Bruce. "I shall be honored if you will drive with me!"

II

"You didn't mind?" asked Constance when Bruce got his car under way.

"You mean do I mind driving you out? Please don't make me say how great the pleasure is!"

"You're poking fun at me; you always do!"

"Never! Why, if I followed my inclinations I'd come trotting up to your house every day. But it wouldn't do. You know that!"

"But I wouldn't want you to do that—not unless you——"

There was a bridge to cross and the pressure of traffic at the moment called for care in negotiating it.

"What were you saying?" he asked as they turned off the brilliantly lighted boulevard. The town lay behind and they moved through open country.

"You know," she said, "I gave you the sign that I wanted to be friends. I had a feeling you knew I needed——"

"What?" he demanded, curious as to the development of her technic.

"Oh, just a little attention! I've tried in every way to tell you that I'm horribly lonely."

"But you oughtn't to be!" he said, vaguely conscious that they were repeating themselves.

"Oh, I know what you think! You think I ought to be very content and happy. But happiness isn't so easy! We don't get it just by wishing."

"I suppose it's the hardest thing in the world to find," he assented.

It was now quite dark and the stars hung brilliant in the cloudless heavens. A mood of recklessness was upon him. In her fur coat, with a smart toque to match, Constance had not before seemed so beguiling. His meeting with her in the lonely road with George Whitford and her evident wish not to be seen that day by Franklin Mills or the members of his riding party had rather shaken his first assumption that she could be classified as a harmless flirt. Tonight he didn't care particularly. If Franklin Mills's daughter-in-law wanted to flirt with him he was ready to meet her halfway . . .

"It's strange, but you know I'm not a bit afraid of you. And the other evening when the rest of us couldn't do a thing with Leila she chose you to take her home. You have a way of inspiring confidence. Shep picks you out, when he hardly knows you, for confidential talks. I've been trying to analyze your—fascinations."

"Oh, come now! Your husband thought I might help him in a small perplexity—purely professional. Nothing to that! And your young sister-in-law was cross at the rest of you that day at Mrs. Torrence's and out of pique chose me to take her home."

"But I trust you!"

"Maybe you shouldn't!"

"Well, that afternoon you caught me out here with Mr. Whitford I knew you wouldn't tell on me. George was a trifle nervous about it. I told him you were the soul of discretion."

"But—I didn't see you! I didn't see you at all! I'm blind in both eyes and I can be deaf and dumb when necessary!"

"Oh, I knew you wouldn't rush over town telling on me! It's really not that! It's because I knew you wouldn't that I'm wondering what—what—it is that makes even your acquaintances feel that they can rely on you. You know you're quite a wonderful person. Leila and Millicent were talking about you only yesterday. Not schoolgirl twaddle, but real appreciation!"

"That's consoling! I'm glad of their good opinion. But you—what did you say!"

"Oh, I said I thought you were disagreeable and conceited and generally unpleasant!" She turned toward him with her indolent laugh. "You know I wouldn't say anything unkind of you." This in so low a tone that it was necessary for him to bend his head to hear. His cheek touched the furry edge of her hat thrillingly.

"It seems strange, our being together this way," she said. "I wish we hadn't a destination. I'd like to go right on—and on——"

"That would be all right as long as the gas held out!"

"You refuse to take me seriously!"

"I seem doomed to say the wrong thing to you! You'll have to teach me how to act and what to say."

"But I'd rather be the pupil! There are many things you could teach me!"

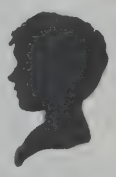
"Such as——"

"There's always love!" she replied softly, lingering upon the word; and again it was necessary to bend down to hear. She lifted her face; he felt rather than saw her eyes meeting his. Her breath, for a

A popular new Dome Shape with Bacchus fringe.

A Whiting & Davis Mesh Bag for a graduation present means a truly happy girl. The June Bride or the Bride of another June, whose anniversary you must remember, are equally captivated by the smartness and alluring beauty of a Whiting & Davis Mesh Bag.

WHITING & DAVIS COMPANY
Plainville Norfolk County Massachusetts



Whiting & Davis
"Gifts That Last"
Mesh Bags

In the Better Grades. Made of the Famous Whiting Soldered Mesh

Comfort Baby's Skin With Cuticura Soap And Fragrant Talcum

For sample Cuticura Talcum, a fascinating fragrance Address Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. D. Malden, Mass

Teach Your Child at Home by Our Novel Plan

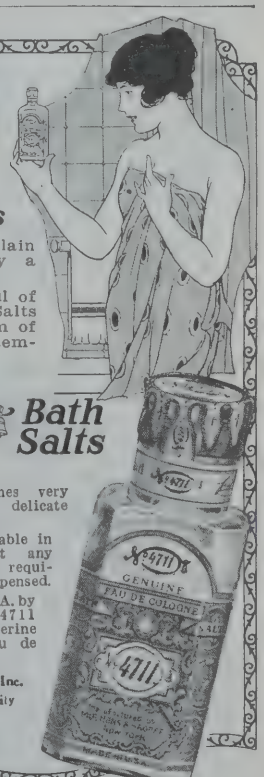
and give him practically the same educational advantages he would have were he in attendance at the best private day school. Write, Calvert School, 4 Chase St., Baltimore, Md.

Going Camping?

Let the Kampkook supply the home cooking convenience of your gas stove.

It's All Inside Compact and handy to carry. When not in use all parts pack inside case, protected against loss or breakage.

AMERICAN KAMPKOOK
THE IDEAL CAMP STOVE



Set up and going full blast in a jiffy. Makes its own gas from motor gasoline. Burns a hot blue flame; no smoke, soot or odor. Simple, dependable, wind proof, safe anywhere. Used by a half million campers. Six styles; $7.50 to $15.60. Write for catalog of Kampkooking necessities.

American Gas Machine Co., Inc.
835 Clark St., Albert Lea, Minn.

Bathing de luxe! with No. 4711 Bath Salts

A bath in plain water is merely a wash.

Add a spoonful of No. 4711 Bath Salts and it is a dream of luxury set in a temple of perfume.

No. 4711 Bath Salts

The water becomes very soft, the odor of it delicate and refreshing!

No. 4711 is available in seven perfumes, at any counter where toilet requisites of quality are dispensed.

Produced in U. S. A. by the makers of No. 4711 White Rose Glycerine Soap and 4711 Eau de Cologne.

MULHENS & KROPFF, Inc.
25 W. 45th St., N. Y. City

For a Spotless, Healthful Toilet

Spotless is the toilet bowl cleaned with Sani-Flush. The porcelain shines. Swiftly and easily, Sani-Flush removes all stains, discolorations, incrustations.

Just sprinkle a little Sani-Flush into the bowl. Follow directions on the can. Flush! No scrubbing—no scouring.

Sani-Flush reaches the hidden, unhealthful trap—cleans it, purifies it. Sani-Flush destroys all foul odors. It will not harm plumbing connections. There is nothing else that does the work of Sani-Flush.

Always keep Sani-Flush handy in the bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. Price 25c. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
Canton, Ohio

Foreign Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd.
Toronto, Canada
33 Farringdon Road, London, E. C. 1, England
China House, Sydney, Australia

Sani-Flush
Reg U S Pat Off
Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

Neet

Removes Hair Harmlessly
Off comes all your superfluous hair. Just spread on Neet the wonderful new cream, let it stay a little while, then rinse off all the hair with clear water. Used by physicians. Money back if it fails to please you. 50c at drug and Dept. stores. Liberal trial size 10c by mail.
Hannibal Pharmacal Co., 667 Locust, St. Louis
In Canada*—60c, trial size 10c., McGillivray Bros., Ltd., Agents, 184 Bay Street, Toronto, Ont.

fleeting instant on his cheek, caused him to give hurried consideration to the ancient question whether a woman who is willing should be kissed, or whether delicate ethical questions should outweigh the desirability of the kiss prospective. He kissed her—first tentatively on the cheek and then more ardently on the lips. She made no protest; he offered no apology. Both were silent for some time.

When she spoke it was to say, with serene irrelevance:

"How smoothly your car runs! It increases my respect for the Plantagenet."

"Oh, it's very satisfactory; some of Bud's claims for it are really true!"

Bruce was relieved; but he was equally perplexed. It was an ungallant assumption that any man might, in like circumstances, kiss Constance Mills. On the other hand it eased his conscience to find that she evidently thought so little of it. She had been quite willing to be kissed . . . She was a puzzling person, this young woman.

III

THE Freemans and the others who had started with them had taken short cuts and were already at the house. They passed through an entry hall into a big square living room with a balcony running round the second floor. It was a fit residence for the owner of the encompassing acres. Bruce felt the presence of Franklin Mills before he saw him. This was the kind of thing Mills would like. The house was in keeping with the fertile land, the prize herds, the high-bred horses with which he amused himself. Mills, leaving the group gathered about the open fire, welcomed the newcomers with something akin to a bluff heartiness, as though consciously or unconsciously he adopted a different tone in the country and wished to appear the unobtrusive but hospitable lord of the manor. Leila joined him as he talked a moment to Constance and Bruce.

"You see you can't dodge me! Awfully glad you came. Millie's here somewhere and I think old Bud Henderson will drop in later."

"There'll be supper pretty soon," said Mills. "We're just waiting for everybody to get here. I think you know everyone. It's a pleasure to see you here, Mr. Storrs. Please make yourself at home. Constance, see that Mr. Storrs has a cocktail."

The members of the company gathered about the fire began twitting Constance and Bruce about the length of time it had taken them to drive out. They demanded to know what Connie had talked to him about. He answered them in kind, appealing to Constance to confirm his assertion that they had taken the most expeditious route. They had discussed the political conditions in Poland, he declared.

"Come with me," said Mrs. Torrence, drawing him away. "I want to talk to you! I don't want you to get the idea that my house is a place where I pull nothing but rough parties! Please think better of me than that!"

"Heavens, woman! Such a thought never entered my head! I've been thinking seriously of coming back! I need some more of your spiritual uplift!"

"Good! There's more of that Bourbon! But I wanted to say that I was sorry Leila came to my house as she did. That is a problem—not a serious problem, but the child needs a little curbing. She has one good friend—Millicent Harden—that tall, lovely girl standing over there—do you know her?"

"Oh, yes; I've even played golf with her!"

"My! You really have an eye! Well, you might come to call on me! I'm a trifle old to be a good playmate for you; but you might take me on as a sort of aunt—not too old to be unsympathetic with youth. When nothing better offers, look me up!"

"I'd been thinking seriously of falling in love with you! Nothing is holding me back but my natural diffidence!"

She raised her hand warningly.

"Go no further! I can see that you've been well trained. But it isn't necessary to jolly me. I'm not half the fool I look. My self-respect didn't want you to get the idea that I'm a wild woman. I was worried that evening about Leila—she has a heart of gold but I don't dare take any special interest in her for the absurd reason—what do you think!—I've been suspected of having designs on—our host!"

She laughed until her face was scarlet. Her mirth was of the infectious sort; Bruce laughed with her; one had to, even when the provocation was slight.

"One doesn't talk of one's host," she said with a deep sigh, "but I was talked about enough when I married Mr. Torrence; I'll never try it again. But why am I taking you into my confidence? Merely that I want you to know my house isn't a booze shop all the time! I'm going to keep my eye on you. If I see you wandering too close to the rifle pits, I'll warn you! May I?"

"Of course you may!" said Bruce, conscious of an honest friendliness in this proffer, but not at once finding words to express his appreciation.

"Tell me, do I look as though I might be gassed?" he asked her.

"I don't know whether you're susceptible or not. But I like you! I'm going to prove it by doing you a favor. Come with me!"

The supper was a buffet affair and a colored butler was distributing plates and napkins. At one side of the room Franklin Mills was talking to Millicent. Bruce had glanced at them occasionally, thinking with a twinge how young Mills looked tonight, noting how easily he seemed to be holding the girl's interest, not as a man much older but as a contemporary. And he had everything to offer—his unassailable social position and the wealth to support it. As he crossed the room beside Mrs. Torrence, accommodating his long stride to her funny little pattering step, he saw a frown write itself fleetingly on Mills's brow. Millicent—in a soft blue Jersey sport dress, with a felt hat of the same shade adorned with a brilliant pheasant's wing—kept her eyes upon Mills until he had finished something he was saying.

"What's it all about?" demanded Mrs. Torrence, laying her hand upon Millicent's arm. "We knew you two were talking of something confidential and important; that's why we're interrupting you."

"Oh, we're discussing the horrors of Sunday—and whether it should be abolished!" said Millicent. "And Mr. Mills won't be serious!"

"Sunday's always a hard day," remarked Mrs. Torrence. "I'm always worn out trying to decide whether to go to church or stay at home."

"And today?" asked Mills.

"I went! The sermon was most disagreeable. Doctor Lindley told us we all know our duty to God and can't pretend that we don't!"

"Is that what he preached?" asked Mills with a vague smile. "What do you think of the proposition?"

"The man's right! But it doesn't make me any happier to know it," Mrs. Torrence replied. "Next Sunday I'll stay in bed."

She took Mills away for the avowed purpose of asking his private counsel in spiritual matters.

"Isn't she nice?" said Millicent.

"I'm bound to think so; she arranged this for me!"

"Did she?" asked Millicent with feigned innocence. "She did it neatly!"

"She promised to be my friend and then proved it," Bruce said and then added, "I'm not so sure our host quite liked being taken away."

"How foolish of you! He can always see me!" she replied indifferently. He thought she had not liked his remark.

Suddenly he hated Mills. His jealousy gave him a swift glimpse of Millicent as Mills's wife, presiding over his home, proud of the position he would be able to give her and ministering to his happiness. The old agony was again resurgent. Mills had no right to the love, even to the respect of a girl like Millicent Harden. His reckless mood of an hour ago was gone. He was ashamed of himself for having kissed Constance Mills; the shame was intensified now that he was with Millicent, touched by her sweetness and purity, reassured by her kindness.

"Don't scorn your food!" said Millicent, noting his abstraction. "It is of an exceeding goodness. Bring me up to date a little about yourself. Any more dark days?"

"No-o-o."

She laughed merrily at the prolongation of his denial.

"Come now! I'm beginning to think I'm of no use to you!"

"Right now I'm as happy as a little lark!" he declared.

She had begun to suspect that he had known unhappiness. A love affair, perhaps. Or it might have been the war that had taken something of the buoyancy of youth out of him. She was happy in the thought that she was able to help him. He was particularly responsive to a kind of humor she herself enjoyed, and they vied with each other in whimsical ridicule of the cubists in art and the symbolists in literature.

The guests were redistributing themselves and she suggested that he single out Leila for a little attention.

"Don't have prejudices! There's nothing in that," she said.

"I haven't a prejudice against Miss Mills!"

"Not so formal when you mention her! I'll give you permission to call her Leila! She'll like it!"

"But you haven't told me I might call you——"

"Millicent let it be!"

"Well, little one, how's your behavior?" demanded Leila when Bruce found her.

"Bad!" Bruce replied in her own key.

Eyes that Capture and Detain

Helene Chadwick Goldwyn star, famous for her beautiful eyes

ARE your eyes like that? Do they challenge with a look, tantalize with a glance?

You can make your eyes alluring by veiling them with dark, sweeping lashes. Use WINX, the Liquid Lashlux. Easily applied with the glass rod attached to the stopper, it beads the lashes, instantly making them appear darker and heavier. And it's waterproof—even swimming or weeping at the theatre will not affect it. Absolutely harmless.

WINX, the Liquid Lashlux, (black or brown) 75c. To nourish the lashes and promote their growth, use Cream Lashlux at night. Cream Lashlux, (black, brown or colorless) 50c. At drug or department stores, or by mail.

Send a dime for a sample of WINX the Liquid Lashlux. And for another dime we will mail you a generous sample of PERT, the waterproof rouge.

ROSS COMPANY
74 Grand Street, New York

WINX
The Liquid Lashlux

$2 Brings This Genuine DIAMOND RING

Set in Platinum

Seven brilliant steel blue genuine diamonds are massed in a setting of solid platinum so, that only close inspection will distinguish it from a solitaire valued at $750.00. Shank of ring is 18 K. white gold, in latest design. Price only $57.50—pay balance $5.55 a month for ten months.

10 Days' Trial

Simply send $2—if not satisfactory at the end of ten days, your deposit will be refunded to you. Can be supplied in gentleman's mounting without extra charge.

No Red Tape No Delay

"Royalton" Pearls Given

We are giving an 18-inch strand of genuine "Royalton" pearls fitted with solid gold clasp just to get you started as a customer.

Free Book of Gems

Most complete Jewelry Catalog ever issued of Diamonds, Watches and Jewelry—latest designs at lowest prices.

10 Months to Pay on Everything from our TWO MILLION DOLLAR STOCK.

Address Dept. 777.

ROYAL DIAMOND & WATCH CO.
35 Maiden Lane New York

Become Independent

Be a Nurse

Learn in spare time at home
Earn $30—$35 a week

Every woman should learn. We train Beginners, Practical Nurses, Mothers and Religious Workers by our Fascinating Home-study Method. Leading Chicago System. Endorsed by physicians. Established 22 years.

Earn while learning

If you are over 18 and under 55 years of age write for illustrated catalog and 32 Sample Lesson Pages with FREE details of Money-Back Guarantee and FREE NURSE'S EQUIPMENT.

Chicago School of Nursing, Dept. 86, 421 S. Ashland Blvd., Chicago

"HELP WANTED"
U. S. CIVIL SERVICE

Write To-Day for List of Government Positions Open—Men and Women Wanted over 16 years of age—Salary $1600 to $2000.
COUPON—UNITED GOVERNMENT TR. ASS'N., 229-K Dinan Bldg., Detroit Mich. Please send me free booklet and list of Government positions open.
Name _____ Street _____
City _____ State _____

40,000 Opportunities in Hotels!

You can have one of these well-paid, pleasant executive positions—40,000 of them in the big hotels of the United States—now America's Fourth Largest Industry. Statistics show that ONE IN EVERY TEN HOTELS WILL HAVE AN OPENING FOR A MANAGER THIS YEAR. Thousands of other positions are also open to those who qualify through training.

The Lewis Schools guarantee to give you the valuable knowledge that it has taken some of the most successful hotel men years to obtain—men who are now making $5,000 to $50,000 a year. All of your training will be under the personal direction of Clifford Lewis—a hotel expert of national reputation. A few spare-time hours a week given to the simple, clear lessons of the course will give you the training for a good position, a fine living and a handsome salary. The training will in no way interfere with your present work or recreation.

Send today for Free Book "YOUR BIG OPPORTUNITY." Don't wait a minute—you may lose the opportunity of a lifetime. Write TODAY—now! Your whole future may depend on it!

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOLS
Clifford Lewis, Pres., (Founded 1916) Room 254, Washington, D. C.
The Only Original Hotel Training School

"My example, I suppose. I've heard that I'm a bad influence in the community. Let's sit. You and I have got to have an understanding some day; why not now?"

"All right, but don't get too deep—Leila!"

"That's good! I didn't suppose you knew my name. Millie's put you up to that."

"She did. I hope you like it."

"Intensely! Are you falling in love with Millie!"

"That's a secret. If I said I was what would you say?"

"Atta boy! But—I don't think she is in love with you."

"Your penetration does you credit! I had thought of her as perishing for the hour when I would again dawn upon her sight!"

"You're going good! Really, though, she admits that she likes you ever so much."

"Is that the reason why you think she doesn't love me?"

"Of course! I'm in love myself. I'm simply wild about Freddy Thomas! But I'd die first before I'd admit the awful fact to even my dearest friend! That's love!"

"How about Freddy? Are you considering his feelings?"

"That's the wonderful part! You see, it's a secret. No one knows it but just Freddy and me!"

"Oh, I see! You pretend to hate Freddy and really you love him?"

"You're a thinker! What would you say if I told you I had a cute little flask upstairs and asked you to meet me in the pantry and have a little nip just to celebrate this event? I had only one cocktail; my cautious dada saw to that!"

"I'd meet you in the pantry and confiscate the flask!"

She regarded him fixedly for a moment and said with a bewilderingly swift change of manner:

"You know about life, people, things; I know you do! It's in your eyes and I'd know it if Millie hadn't said so. Do you really think it disgraceful for me to get—well, soused—as you've seen me several times? Dada and my aunts lecture me to death—and I hate it—but, well—what do you think?"

Her serious face demanded kindness. He felt infinitely older; she seemed very like a child tonight—an impulsive, friendly child.

"I think I'd cut it out. There's no good in it—for you or anyone else."

"I'll consider that!" she said gravely; then suddenly restless she suggested that they go into the long enclosed veranda that connected the house with the conservatories.

As they walked back and forth—Leila in frivolous humor now—Bruce caught a glimpse of her father and Millicent just inside the conservatory door. They were talking earnestly. Evidently they had paused to conclude some matter they had been discussing.

Millicent held three roses in her hand and lifted them occasionally to her face.

Still beset by uncertainties as to whether he would increase his chances of happiness by marrying again, Mills was wondering just how a man of his years could initiate a courtship with a girl of Millicent's age. It must be managed in such a way as to preserve his dignity—that at all hazards must be maintained inviolable.

They had been walking through the conservatory aisles inspecting his roses, which were cultivated by an expert whose salary was a large item of the farm expense. He had decided that it would be folly to attempt his wooing in the manner of youth; it was on her serious side that she was most likely to be approachable. Mrs. Torrence's comments on Doctor Lindley's sermon had interested him. He wondered whether his recent talk with the clergyman was responsible for the plain speech of which Mrs. Torrence had complained . . .

Millicent was asking questions about the development of new floral types and he was answering painstakingly, pleased by her interest.

"It's unfortunate that the human species can't be improved as easily. At least we don't see our way to improving it," he remarked.

He had never thought her so beautiful as now; her charm was rather enhanced by her informal dress. It would be quite possible for him to love her, love her even with a young man's ardor.

"Oh, patience, sir!" she smiled. "Evolution is still going on."

"Or going back! There's our old quarrel!" he laughed. "We always seem to get into it. But your idea that we're not creatures of chance—that there's some unseen power back of everything we call life—that's too much for me. I can understand Darwin—but you!"

"Honestly, now, are you perfectly satisfied to go on thinking we're all creatures of chance?"

"Sometimes I am and then again I'm not!" he replied with a shrug. "I can't quite understand why it is that with everything we have, money and the ability to amuse ourselves, we do at times inquire about that Something that never shows itself or gives us a word."

"Oh, but He does!" She held up the three perfect roses Mills had plucked for her. "He shows Himself in all beautiful things, and they're all trying to tell us that the Something we can't see or touch has a great deal to do with our lives."

"Millie," he said in a tone of mock despair, tapping her hand lightly, "you're an incorrigible mystic!"

They were interrupted by a knock on the glass door, which swung open, disclosing Leila and Bruce.

"Mr. Storrs and I are dying of curiosity! You've been talking here for ages!" cried Leila.

"Millie's been amusing herself at my expense," said Mills. "Mr. Storrs, I wish you'd tell me sometime what Miss Harden means when she reaches into the infinite and brings down——"

"Roses!" laughed Millicent.

In handling the strange scene between Bruce and his father —in July COSMOPOLITAN*—Meredith Nicholson makes you realize why he is one of the greatest living novelists* morning and do not make any appearance until I send for you. A good deal will depend on whether or not there is any hitch in my plans anywhere along the line. Mr. Halliday will, of course, occupy your husband's rooms, but no one expects you to see any more of him than you did of Neil, which hasn't been an awful lot the last couple of years."

Scandal Street

(Continued from page 85)

Sheila effaced herself wearily.

Friedman, who knew the house well, led Halliday to the wing lately occupied by the master, a bedroom, bath and a dressing room that had also the appurtenances of a den.

"This is your parking space, young fellow. You can probably find some of Neil's clothes that will fit you well enough until you can get some others made. What I want now is every stitch you have on and your papers. Taking off your clothes is your last official act as Harrison Halliday. From now on even I am going to try to think you're Neil Keeley. You're a good actor. I've watched you on the lot. See if you can fool me."

The telephone at Halliday's bedside rang at ten the next morning. He answered it himself, slightly dazed. He had been asleep only a couple of hours.

"Who is this?" demanded a voice—male.

"Harri——wait a minute." He altered his voice pitch a trifle. "Mr. Keeley talking."

"Good boy," applauded Sol Friedman. "Sorry if I got you out of bed, Neil, but I wanted to tell you that I am suspending work at the studio today on account of the death, last night, of young Harrison Halliday——"

"Halliday? Halliday?"

"You may not know him by name, Neil, but he's the man who doubled for you in some of the scenes where we didn't dare take any chances of your getting hurt."

"Yes, yes, I remember now. How did it happen?"

"Drunk, I guess. Car overturned and crushed him. Would scarcely have been able to make positive identification except for papers in his pockets. He doesn't seem to have any friends or relatives out here, and as soon as the coroner gives us a verdict I'm going to handle the funeral arrangements myself. Tomorrow morning, probably."

"Is there anything I can do?"

"No, not a thing. I was going to suggest that you spend the day out in the country somewhere, up in the hills or down at the beach. You'll find your car out in front of the house right where you left it last night. You forgot to put it in the garage, I noticed."

"Anything else?"

"No, I think not."

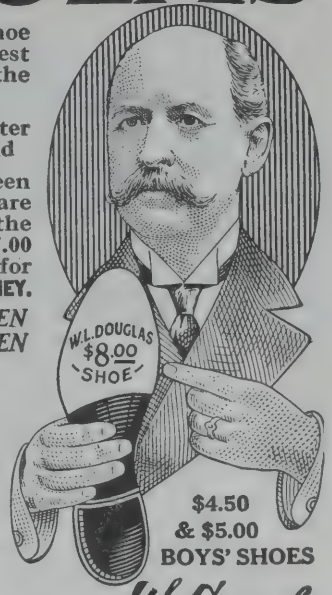
"Have I got a man, a valet?"

"No, you had one but he quit last week. You got mad at him for something."

"O. K. I'm going to get up and dress, then."

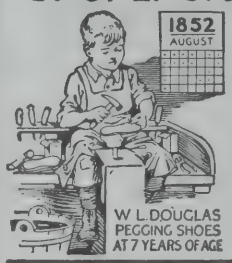
"Call me this afternoon at five o'clock for further information and instructions, if any."

"All right. Good by."



Halliday sat down on the edge of the finest bed he had ever slept in and

W. L. DOUGLAS



NAME AND PORTRAIT is the best known shoe Trade Mark in the world. It stands for the highest standard of quality, style and workmanship at the lowest possible cost.

W. L. DOUGLAS shoes are actually demanded year after year by more people than any other shoe in the world

BECAUSE W. L. Douglas for forty-six years has been making surpassingly good shoes. The smart styles are the leaders everywhere. When you are looking for the best shoes for your money examine W. L. Douglas $7.00 and $8.00 shoes. They are exceptionally good value for the price. WEAR W. L. DOUGLAS SHOES AND SAVE MONEY.

$5.$6.$7.$8.&$9. SHOES FOR MEN & WOMEN

W. L. DOUGLAS PEGGING SHOES AT 7 YEARS OF AGE

NO MATTER WHERE YOU LIVE shoe dealers can supply you with W. L. Douglas shoes. If not convenient to call at one of our 116 stores in the large cities, ask your shoe dealer for W. L. Douglas shoes. Protection against unreasonable profits is guaranteed by the name and price stamped on the sole of every pair before the shoes leave the factory. Refuse substitutes. The prices are the same everywhere.

IF NOT FOR SALE IN YOUR VICINITY WRITE FOR CATALOG.

$4.50 & $5.00 BOYS' SHOES

TO MERCHANTS: If no dealer in your town handles W. L. Douglas shoes, write today for exclusive rights to handle this quick-selling, quick turn-over line.

W. L. Douglas
President
W. L. Douglas Shoe Co.
146 Spark Street, Brockton, Mass.

$EARN MONEY$ AT HOME

We Pay 15 to 50 Dollars Weekly for Spare Time Work at Home Writing Show Cards—No Canvassing—Experience Unnecessary—Write Today.
DETROIT SHOW CARD SCHOOL
229 Dinan Building, Detroit, Mich.

Dear Sir:
Please send me your Booklet and Terms Free.

Name .....
Street .....
City ..... State .....

Reduce Your Flesh in Spots

Arms Legs Bust Double Chin

in fact the entire body or any part without dieting by wearing DR. WALTER'S Medicated Reducing

RUBBER GARMENTS

Bust Reducer, $6.00
Chin Reducer, $2.50

Anklets for Reducing and Shaping the Ankles, $7.00 per pair. Extra high $9.00.
Send ankle measurement when ordering

Send for illustrated Booklet.
DR. JEANNE C. WALTER
353 5th Ave., New York

the deaf hear WITH THE Vactuphone

New invention, resulting from radio experiments, enables the deaf to hear. Write for details or FREE Demonstration.
GLOBE PHONE Mfg. Co. Box 186-A Reading Mass.

BOATS

Canoes, rowboats, hunting and fish boats, outboard-motor boats and motor boats 16 to 26 feet. CATALOG FREE—SAVE MONEY—ORDER BY MAIL. State kind of boat in which interested. Immediate shipment from stock.
THOMPSON BROS. BOAT MFG. CO., 183 Ellis Ave., Peshtigo, Wis.

For Weddings, Graduations, Anniversaries, Etc.

Diamonds Here at 60% of Market Price

The Buys of a Lifetime

Never in three-quarters of a century in the diamond business, have we offered such bargains as we do now compared with prevailing prices. Diamonds right now at rock-bottom even in regular market. Yet ours are but 60% of market prices. The opportunity of a lifetime. Buy now—the trend is already upwards. but, our diamond prices are based on unpaid loan diamonds left on our hands for a fraction of their real value.

Why Pay Full Prices

Costs Nothing to See

This diamond banking house, ¾ century old, rated more than $1,000,000.00, takes this way of turning into cash the diamonds on which money was loaned and not repaid. Also many bargain gems from other sources. See these bargains as the wisest buyers do.

Send for Latest Bargain List

Every gem fully and minutely described. Radically different from a catalog. Any gem sent you on approval without slightest obligation to buy. Write now. The very stone you wish may be in this present list at a price that will amaze you. Send this coupon now.

JOS. DE ROY & SONS
Only Opposite Post Office
1099 DeRoy Bldg., Pittsburgh, Pa.

References by permission:—Bank of Pittsburgh—N. A. Marine National Bank—Union Trust Co. Pittsburgh, Pa. Your bank can look us up in mercantile agencies.

JOS. DE ROY & SONS
1099 DeRoy Bldg., Pittsburgh, Pa.
Gentlemen: Please send me absolutely free and prepaid, your new bargain list of diamonds, watches and other jewelry. It is distinctly understood that I assume no obligation of any kind.

Name _____
Address _____

As Low As $60 a Carat for Diamonds

EYES
You Can't Forget

There's nothing so wonderful, so truly alluring as beautiful EYES. If you long to possess the charm of clear, bright, bewitching EYES, use Murine.

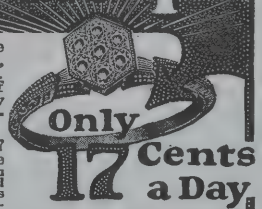
This time-tested lotion preserves and enhances the youthful glow and sparkle of the EYES. After a day in the open, Murine is delightfully soothing and refreshing to EYES irritated by sun, wind and dust.

EYES cleansed daily with Murine retain their beauty throughout advancing years. It's perfectly harmless—contains no belladonna or other hurtful ingredients.

Our fascinating booklet, "Beauty Lies Within the Eyes," is FREE on request

Murine Eye Remedy Co.
Dept. 22, Chicago

MURINE
FOR YOUR EYES



FREE TO DOG OWNERS

Polk Miller's famous Dog Book, 64 pages, on care, feeding and training, with ailment chart and Senator Vest's celebrated "Tribute to a Dog," etc. Also full list of Sergeant's Dog Medicines—the standard for 50 years. Just send your name and address. Our free advice department will be pleased to answer any question about your dog's health free.
Polk Miller Drug Co., Inc., 3 Governor St., Richmond, Va.

TAILORING SALESMEN—Fastest selling made to measure line, suits, overcoats, $29.50—one price, all wool, everything guaranteed. Profits in advance, steady job. Biggest old reliable house. Experienced or not, write us immediately. W. D. Smith & Co., Established 1895. Dept. 62, Chicago.

Sent for $1.00

7-Diamond Solitaire Cluster set in Platinum, resembles a two ct. Single Stone. Shank of Green Gold, artistically hand-carved and engraved. Only $52.50.

Only $1.00 down and 17 cents a day! On these amazingly easy terms you can buy this beautiful Diamond Ring. Shipment is made the moment your dollar reaches us—then if you're satisfied, pay the balance in ten months. Otherwise, return. No risk—no delay—transactions strictly confidential.

Only 17 Cents a Day

Diamond Book FREE
Contains nearly 3,000 illustrations of exquisite Diamonds, Watches and Jewelry—all on ten months' credit. Write for copy No. 88L.

THE HOUSE OF QUALITY
CAPITAL $1,000,000.
L·W·SWEET INC.
1650-1660 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

considered the day that lay ahead of him—also the future. His pyjamas were silk—the first of that material which he had ever worn. Across the back of a chair lay a dressing gown, also silk. The door of his bath stood ajar, revealing a room larger than his entire living quarters of recent date. Windows opened out into an enclosed garden of many levels, after the Japanese style, with tiny pools and channels crossed by gnarled, hump-backed bridges. There was a profusion of flowers.

Halliday sighed. Too bad that he had to arrive at prosperity by such a false route. He took little pleasure in contemplating the fruits of a success that was not his.

Not his? Whose, then? There was no one to claim those pyjamas, that dressing gown, the house, the garden; no one would successfully dispute his right to enjoy those things always if he chose to stay. Not Friedman—he couldn't say anything. Not——

His eyes fell on a framed photograph that stood on his dresser and he had his answer. There was the reason why all this could never be his, why he was merely a paid actor hired to do a certain part during the run of the comedy.

It was a marvelous photograph, all a little misty as if the light that diffused through the piled high hair were afraid to touch her face for fear it would vanish, for fear that it might bring out the tears that seemed lurking back of the eyes, for fear it might dispel the shy sweet smile that took hold of your heart by the coat lapels and asked you to be gentle and kind always.

It was the photograph of a woman whose loveliness was a little more than mortal, whose charm had been contributed by her godfathers and godmothers, the elves.

Halliday got up abruptly and put the portrait of Sheila Kane in a dresser drawer. That was one thing that he felt he had no right to use as a "prop" in his assumed character, even for the run of the comedy.

Sheila and Harrison Halliday attended the funeral together. It was a very trying ordeal. It had seemed to Halliday that the woman was the color of valley lilies always, but that morning she was whiter. The emotion that had to be repressed drained the last vestige of blood hue from her cheeks.

Shooting on the picture was resumed the following morning. Halliday had worked with the company long enough to know Neil Keeley's habits, and he did not show up until an assistant director had been sent to the house to rouse him. When he did arrive he gave a very fair impersonation, from memory, of a leading man with a headache.

It was easier to assume the character of Neil Keeley in real life than it was to be Lancelot on the set. Keeley, with all his vices, had a certain suavity, a finesse of performance, that made him the ideal lover. He had had much practice. But Halliday's lack of adroitness was excused on the ground of ill health, and, for a wonder, Fenway was more than ordinarily patient.

At any rate the net result of the day's work was just about as many scenes as usual, and Fenway professed to be satisfied.

Halliday rather hated to go home. Everything was all right on the lot, but Neil Keeley's shell didn't fit him. He was a stranger, a usurper in that house, and it seemed to mock him. It was lucky that Neil had not owned a dog. It would have been impossible to fool another man's pup.

But, gee, there was an idea. He'd get a dog. Then there'd be somebody who would be glad to see him come home. Halliday stopped at a kennel and bought an eight weeks old Scotch terrier.

The minute they got in the house the pup began to learn about waxed floors and oriental rugs by sliding across the room with dug-in frantic claws. He always upset going around the unbanked curves.

Halliday sat back and uncorked the first laugh that had come from his diaphragm in many a day and kept it up when the pup doggedly—pardon us, audience—tried navigation again and again.

The lady of the house, attracted by the uproar, came and stood in the doorway. She was in a lovely negligee, a draped Cashmere shawl that made her look like a little girl who is playing mama.

"Oh," she protested—her voice would never have carried far enough for the speaking stage—"you don't like dogs, you know!"

"Maybe I never have," Halliday retorted, "but I like this one. And I defy you not to."

The pup had come to sniff at the hem of her garment and she suddenly sat down and gathered him into her lap.

"I've always loved them," she said.

The terrier squirmed away. Youth was too short to be wasted in loving—yet. Later, perhaps, when every corner had been investigated, everything upsetable had been upset and everything chewable had been preliminarily sampled.

"He's the homeliest dog I ever saw," Sheila pointed out.

"Sh!" Halliday admonished quickly. "He doesn't know it. And I'm never going to let him look at himself in a mirror for fear it will destroy his misplaced self-confidence."

Sheila grinned at his fooling. The pup had paid his way already.

"Has he a name?"

"He will have in five minutes. What do you think of Johnny Walker?"

"Too common."

"Not nowadays."

"I prefer Bourbon anyway."

"You've named him, then. Come here, Bourbon!"

The pup came—probably because his master snapped his fingers at the same time.

And Bourbon is the name of the grizzled, gray, pig-shaped dog that has lived in that house ever since and probably will until the end of his days when he has completely forgotten whose teeth it was that gnawed each and every one of the spindles in the banister going upstairs.

That was the first time that Sheila ever unbent in Harrison Halliday's presence. She hated men as she knew them and she could not help but regard as an interloper the stranger who had usurped her husband's place.

Fortunately Halliday did not take the least advantage of her momentary friendliness and, when she retired again to her chill armor, did not endeavor to entice her out. As a result she came out soon of her own accord.

"You don't have to stay around here every evening," she told him a few nights later. "I'm used to being left entirely alone and if you want to look up your friends——"

"I have no friends."

"I'd forgotten. Neither had—but you seem as if you would have."

"No."

"Then let's give Scandal Street something to talk about by going out to dinner together somewhere."

It was the happiest evening Halliday had ever spent. She had given him the accolade, had signified that she recognized him as a gentleman and trusted him. He swore an oath to himself never to violate her confidence.

He played the part so well that when he had brought her home he said good night and left her at the door of the house before her rippling laugh brought him back.

"You live here, too, you know," she reminded him.

That night he got her picture out of his dresser drawer and looked at it long and avidly. Not that he expected to forget what she looked like before morning, but even the worshipers of the most spiritual gods like to have a tangible symbol of their divinity.

Another evening, not immediately but within a week, Harrison found a note on his dresser when he got home.

"We are invited to dinner at Julian Lewis's," it said simply. Harrison looked for another sentence, something to indicate whether they were going or not, but it was not there.

It seemed advisable to find out before he dressed so he went to find Sheila. He had never trespassed in the wing of the house which she occupied.

Even now he did not penetrate the unfamiliar temple but stood at the corridor and called "Sheila!" and then again "Sheila!" He was getting accustomed to using her first name.

The door of her room opened and her voice answered from far inside somewhere, "Yes, dear."

His heart jumped even though he knew the term of address was used only because her maid must be with her.

"I want to ask you a question."

"Tell Mr. Keeley to step to the door a minute," Sheila instructed from inside.

The maid opened the door wide and invited Halliday to approach.

It was silly that he should have so much emotion over taking those few simple steps. Those were ordinary floors which he trod, the corridor led to the door of an ordinary woman. Was she? He wondered if his dramatic sense was fooling him into idealizing her into something supermortal, or if she was, perhaps, different.

He tried to banish the diamond mist from his eyes. Because, if this was love, it was the most hopeless love since Héloïse and Abélard.

Halliday stood at her door. She was sitting in a silk lace swathe before her dressing table, her hair streaming down over her shoulders, half turned toward the door to see what he wanted. He caught his breath; she was so very lovely that way. Bourbon, lucky pup, was sleeping with his nose against the hem of her negligee.

"Your note didn't say whether or not we had accepted the Lewis's invitation to dinner," he reminded her.

"No, it didn't."

"Did you?"

"I accepted for myself."

"Was I invited?"

"Ye-es, but I don't think you are really expected."

"Why not?"

"Because you never went but once and then you were much too generous to yourself with your host's brandy. You don't like Mr. Lewis very well, you know."

"Do you?"

"Yes."

"That's probably the reason, then. You think it will be all right for me to stay home?"

"Yes."

"Then I'll go." After which amazing decision Halliday closed the argument by stalking away to his own rooms, where he dressed with meticulous care.

His host concealed his surprise, if any, at Neil Keeley's unprecedented acceptance of his invitation in person. Halliday looked in vain for Mrs. Lewis. There were several other guests, some moving picture people and a few society representatives, but no hostess. During dinner Mr. Lewis monopolized the attention of Sheila, who sat at his right, and allowed his other guests to shift more or less for themselves.

Halliday felt distinctly out of it because there seemed to be twosome love affairs going on all around the table.

Quite obviously Mons. Lewis rather fancied himself as Sheila's cave-gentleman. He was a handsome brute, big, powerful, interestingly gray but right at the top notch of his mature manhood. Halliday knew who he was now. His name was mentioned almost daily in the papers as a Scandal Street attorney. He handled legal matters for half the cinema celebrities; anything from drawing a new contract up to defense on a charge of murder. He had a reputation for stepping rather lively himself and was a plunger on the track at Tia Juana. Halliday wondered how on earth Sheila had ever allowed him to become an accepted and accredited admirer.

"You're not doing your duty by the liquid refreshment," Mr. Lewis reminded Halliday courteously, noticing perhaps that his guest of honor's husband was not having an uproarious time.

Halliday was half inclined to try to live up to Neil Keeley's reputation by making a blotter of himself. But that would be ridiculous. Why should he care whom Sheila lavished her favors upon? Any person in the world, a complete stranger even, had as much right to her sweetness as her pseudo-husband had. Was it possible to assume the character so thoroughly that he was jealous?

Still, Mr. Lewis's polite offer of stimulants reminded Halliday that in one particular at least he was falling down on his characterization. Neil Keeley would have been drunk long before the party had progressed that far.

Halliday couldn't take any more liquor without being uncomfortable but he began pouring out drinks and spilling them on the heavy rug under the table. That was pathetically easy to do as no one watched him at all. Apparently he had a reputation as an impossible dinner guest.

That Living Odeur!

Here is gayety and life, a new enticement—the fragrance of living flowers to contrast the artificiality of perfumes!

VIVANTE

—as different from the odeurs one now knows as a garden in the springtime from the stopper of a bottle—a miracle in perfume making.

As exclusive as a coronet!

As intriguing as an affair d'amour!

As tantalizingly feminine as the subtlety of a smile!

C'est tres important

So as to avoid the faux pas of discord in one's scheme of fragrance—a creme of one scent, poudre of another, a rouge of yet another!—L'odeur Vivante wafts its personality throughout all articles de toilette by Lournay.

You may obtain a small vial of Lournay Vivante by sending 15 cents to our American address.

Lournay

PARIS
7 Rue de L'Isly
NEW YORK
366 Fifth Avenue

1882

Shampooing

A task half done

Noted actresses all recognize the fact that hair to be beautiful needs more than just shampooing. They have no more choice in the color of their hair than you have. Their hair is more beautiful, because their profession — their very environment — soon teaches them how to make the best of what nature has given them.

Practically every woman has reasonably good hair — satisfactory in quantity, texture and color. So-called dull hair is the result of improper care. Ordinary shampooing is not enough; just washing cannot sufficiently improve dull, drab hair. Only a shampoo that adds "that little something" dull hair lacks, can really improve it.

Golden Glint Shampoo was made particularly for medium brown hair—to make it look brighter and more beautiful. When your hair appears lifeless, all you need do is have a Golden Glint Shampoo. It does more and IS more than an ordinary shampoo. With it you can correct—correct, mind you—any little shortcomings your hair may have. It places your hair in your own hands, so to speak.

Have a Golden Glint Shampoo today and give your hair the special treatment which is all it needs to make it as beautiful as you desire it. 25c a package at toilet goods counters or postpaid direct. J. W. Kobi Co., 131 Spring St., Seattle, Wash.

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL

Sold Everywhere

Mad Cap Rouge

In the shops of Paris orange tinted cream rouges are the vogue. Mad Cap is the Original Orange Rouge —is waterproof—won't rub off, and when applied in the morning assures lasting charm.

Send $1.00 bill for our special introductory offer of one 75c jar of Mad Cap Rouge and one 75c jar of Mad Cap Face Cream.

Kolar Laboratories, 10 S. Seeley Ave., Chicago

Eventually, and still in character, Halliday slumped over into a semblance of sleeping. The others finally noticed it and commented upon his condition as being conventional.

Later, when it came time to go home, Lewis said he would take Sheila and suggested that she leave Neil where he was to sleep it off.

Sheila objected, however, and they finally bundled him into the rear seat of the sedan. For a moment Halliday was flattered by her solicitude until he remembered that probably she was afraid to leave him there supposedly drunk for fear he would betray her by babbling the truth.

Sheila herself drove.

"How much longer are you going to stick to that dirty swine back there?" asked Lewis when they were well on their way.

"Sh!" warned Sheila.

"It isn't necessary. He's got enough alcohol in him to make him deaf, dumb and blind for twenty-four hours."

Sheila sighed. "I didn't think he'd get quite so drunk tonight."

"Why not?"

"Oh, he's been rather nice lately! I hoped—I don't know what I hoped. Anyway I don't hope anything any more. Are all men like that?"

"I'm not."

"No, but I'm not sure but I'm more afraid of you. Your vice is all of the head. Neil, there, doesn't mean the dreadful things he does. He never, as you do, thinks them all out in advance."

"I don't think of anything in advance except that I love you and am only waiting for the day that you will wake up and realize that you are wasting your life on that drunken pig. He'll kill himself or somebody will kill him sometime anyway. Why wait for death to do something the law will accomplish more quickly?"

They had arrived at the Keeley-Kane bungalow.

"You're going to kiss me good night," Lewis affirmed.

Sheila did not leave the driver's seat. "Why?" she asked idly. "I never have before."

"I know it, but you need something to rouse you from your lethargy. Good Lord, girl, you're only half alive."

Strange, the man in the back seat who was listening, watching, ready to spring if need be, had often thought the same thing. A lovely statue, half living, half marble—that was Sheila Kane. Wonderful, and yet only a part of her possibilities realized.

Lewis held her face between his two hands. If she had resisted, Halliday would have strangled him. But she didn't. She sat passive, listless, like one who is too tired to care. Lewis pressed her mouth with his lips.

Finally she sprang away.

"No! No! No!" she exclaimed.

"What's the matter?"

"I don't know. But I don't like to have you kiss me. You're not the right one."

"Oh," Lewis sneered, "so he still stands between us! I wish to God he was dead."

Sheila had clambered out of the car and now ran into the house, closing the door after herself. It locked automatically, as Lewis discovered by trying the knob.

He came back to the car and dragged

GET THIS WONDERFUL RING

These Amazingly Beautiful CORODITE Diamonds are the nearest approach to Genuine Diamonds that the ingenuity of man, aided by years of Scientific and chemical research, can produce. They have the same blazing flash and dazzling play of living rainbow fire. Standing the terrific acid test of direct comparison. Even lifetime experts need all their experience to see any difference. Prove this yourself.

Wear a Corodite Diamond for 7 Days

Make this test. You risk nothing. Wear a genuine Corodite and a Diamond side by side on the same finger for seven days, if you or your friends can tell the difference, send it back. You won't be out a single penny. If you keep the ring, the price printed here is all you pay. No additional installments. Remember, Corodites have the same facet cutting as genuine stones.

No. 1—Ladies' Solitaire 14K Gold S. Ring $2.84
No. 4—Ladies' Hand-Carved Basket Setting, plat. finish $3.96
No. 5—Ladies' Solitaire Bridal Blossom Engraved . . . $3.54
No. 6—Gents' Massive Hand-Carved Green Gold Gypsy $4.39
No. 7—Gents' Heavy Belcher 14K Gold S. Ring $3.68

Carat size gems. Beautiful mountings of most modern design, choice of Gold or Latest White Platinum finish. Unqualified 20-year guarantee. Handsome Art Leather Case free with each ring.

SEND NO MONEY Keep your money right at home, just send name, address and number of ring wanted and size as shown by strip of paper fitting tightly end to end around finger joint. Your ring will come by return mail. When ring arrives, pay postman amount shown above. If you decide not to keep ring, send it back within 7 days and your money will be immediately returned. Send today.

E. RICHWINE CO.
19 W. Jackson Blvd., Dept. 473. Chicago, Illinois
Sole Importers Genuine Corodite Diamonds

25 Song Parodies 25c

Be a parlor entertainer. Make a hit with the crowd. 25 parodies including "Georgette," "Hot Lips," "The Sheik," "Three O'clock In The Morning," "Tomorrow," and all the big hits mailed on receipt of 25c in stamps, special get-acquainted price. TRUMAN BROWN, 6251 Delmar, St. Louis, Mo.

FREE Annette Kellermann's Secret of a Beautiful Body and Perfect Health

Don't send a penny for this valuable and interesting book. Read how a little crippled girl became the most perfectly formed woman in the world. Read how Kellermann's methods can now be used by you, on 10 days free trial. Don't be handicapped by aches and pains, don't be satisfied with a poor complexion or an awkward figure. Get this book free.

Just Send Your Name Now

Only a limited number of copies to be sent free. Write at once. Miss Kellermann does not recommend drugs—just plain common sense. You feel renewed the first day. Don't miss this amazing book. Write to-day. Address

Annette Kellermann
Dept. 176, 29 West 34th St., New York

How to Select Safe Bonds

Every investor wishing to learn about bonds of absolute safety yet paying an attractive yield (ranging as high as 7%) should write at once for this book, which will be sent for the asking. It has been prepared by George M. Forman & Company.

YOUR COPY NOW READY

In every banking circle the name of George M. Forman & Company has always been associated with sound investments and an attractive yield. Just a postcard or a letter will bring your copy of our interesting book, "How to Select Safe Bonds."

GEORGE M. FORMAN & COMPANY, Dept. 506
105 W. Monroe Street, Chicago, Ill.
"38 Years Without Loss to a Customer"

LAW STUDY at HOME

Become a lawyer. Legally trained men win high positions and big success in business and public life. Greater opportunities now than ever before. Be independent—be a leader. Lawyers earn

$3,000 to $10,000 Annually

We guide you step by step. You can train at home during spare time. Let us send you records and letters from LaSalle students admitted to the bar in various states. Money refunded according to our Guarantee Bond if dissatisfied. Degree of LL. B. conferred. Thousands of successful students enrolled. Low cost, easy terms. We furnish all text material, including fourteen-volume Law Library. Get our valuable 120-page "Law Guide" and "Evidence" books FREE. Send for them—NOW.

LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 655-L, Chicago

Halliday out and threw him on the doorstep.

"There you are, you fool." He stood over Halliday meditatively and slapped him once with the palm of his hand. "No, I mustn't do that. It would be easy but there are better ways—better ways."

After he had gone Sheila came out and helped Halliday in.

She cried as she did it. Halliday wondered why. He did not dare tell her now that he was perfectly sober, not after having seen and heard so much. It would be too embarrassing. So he pretended to be quite dazed until she had left him in his room and closed the door after herself.

For days and days Sheila avoided him. He was in disgrace and knew there was no possibility of seeking a pardon. The full extent of his banishment was brought home when he discovered that Bourbon was regularly sleeping by her closed door—on the outside. Bourbon was technically his dog and she did not want to have anything to do with him.

Bourbon waited patiently. So did Halliday.

The picture was finished—at least the shooting of it was. Sheila went away—to Honolulu, the papers said; she had not said anything to Halliday about it.

Halliday dug out the picture of her that was hidden in his drawer, the picture that belonged to another man, a dead man.

Once with it sitting before him on his desk he started a letter to her.

Thus: "Dear Wife." That wouldn't do. He tore it up. Again: "Dear Sheila." It sounded presumptuous. "Dear Mrs. Keeley" was absurd.

So he began without any term of address.

"It has been many days since I have seen you. What are you doing with yourself? Do you ever think of me?"

That was all wrong. He was verging on the sentimental and that would lose him what little shred of her regard he possessed.

Apparently it was impossible to write her a letter that he dared send. So he went on and wrote one that he would never let anyone see, a private vent to his emotions.

> Not seeing you is much worse than being really ill. The place where my eyes want to rest is so conspicuously blank that I hunt around frantically for scenes that you have never colored with your presence. That isn't much use either, because something inside of me always whispers how much more wonderful it would be if you were there.
>
> Why try to fool myself? I love you. Everybody does, so I would be unconventional if I did not. Of course I tell myself that my love is a more understanding one than that of any of the others. I don't know. To me your charm is so much more wistfully compelling than that of any other mere woman on this earth that I think of you as something almost supernatural, as an elf who vanishes with the morning sun, a creature of lovely gossamer and mist who would be profaned by the earthly love of a man.
>
> Whatever you are, woman or spirit, you have taken all my heart and put tears of memory in my eyes so that I cannot see other things. To you, dear, I bring——

Someone had rapped on his door several times, but Halliday had scarcely noticed it. A louder hammering compelled his attention.

"Come in."

Tamaki, the Jap, entered.

"Misto Friedman here, sir."

"All right."

"Wait for you, he say. Come quick."

Halliday sighed. Such a summons must be obeyed.

So the impersonator put on his coat and went out to the car in front of the house where his employer was waiting.

"Want to talk to you about several things. We'll go over to my office. Sheila's in town. Arrived unexpectedly and telephoned me to get you."

"What for?"

The film magnate chewed his cigar a moment meditatively.

"I don't understand her myself. I wrote her a letter awhile back proposing that we go right on with the Keeley-Kane productions. In my opinion you are good enough. I'll put my money in another one. But she says no, nothing doing. She wants to work by herself, live by herself and forget the name Keeley as soon as she can get a divorce. Of course the last part is impossible. You can't be divorced from somebody you've never been married to. But the rest of it we've got to listen to even if it does cost me a small fortune to let you go. I hope it won't be necessary but of course that was the understanding with which we started this mix-up. You'll have to take a trip around the world or something like that and disappear from view while you're away. I'll take care of expenses and finance you in any other business you want to start up in so long as you keep out of pictures."

They were in Friedman's office by that time. Halliday had not heard everything that had been said. His mind had grasped the idea that he was not to be associated with Sheila any more and had gone off duty right there to indulge in a fit of dumb, unreasoning misery.

"You're quite prepared to sign off?" Friedman suggested regretfully.

"Yes. I'll do anything you say. You've been square with me and I have no claim."

"I've drawn up——"

Telephone buzzer.

"Hello . . . Yes. Sol Friedman speaking . . . Yes, Sheila . . . I'm damned . . . Yes. We'll wait here for you. Good by."

He hung up the receiver.

"Can you beat that?" he demanded of his visitor. "She says she's changed her mind and that she'll be right over to sign up for another picture as co-star with you. Far be it from me to complain about the vagary of the female brain that puts half a million into my pocket, but you can't tie Sheila for a complete change of front inside of sixty minutes by the clock."

Halliday did not notice what Friedman was saying. His mind was still in a confusion that it did not emerge from until Sheila herself stood in the doorway and released him from his gloomy enchantment into the sunshine by a single misty smile.

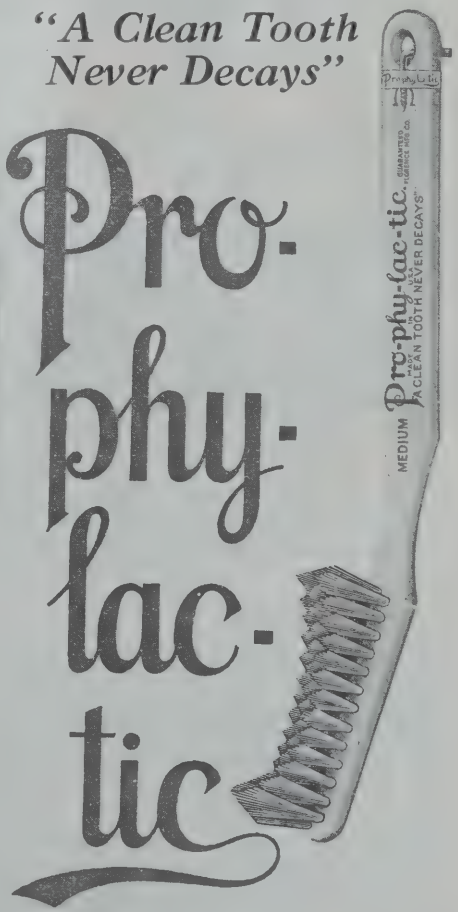
She was like the dewy dawn of a day after a night of countless hours.

Halliday never presumed to inquire why she had changed her mind. Upon Friedman's advice and example he let

Cleans every part of every tooth every time

WITH any tooth brush and some extra effort you can clean parts of all your teeth—or even all the surfaces of some teeth.

You can be sure that a Pro-phy-lac-tic Tooth Brush does a thorough job for every tooth.



The scientifically curved handle and the tufted bristles of the Pro-phy-lac-tic enables you to clean easily every part of every tooth every time you use that brush. Food may lodge around your teeth, but a Pro-phy-lac-tic finds its hiding place.

Pro-phy-lac-tic Tooth Brushes are made with hard, medium, and soft bristles. In three sizes—adults', youths' and children's. They are all guaranteed. We will replace the brush you buy, if it is not absolutely satisfactory.

Florence Manufacturing Co.
Florence, Mass.

Sold by all dealers in the United States, Canada and all parts of the world

"A Clean Tooth Never Decays"

Tooth Brush

BAYER Genuine ASPIRIN

SAY "BAYER" when you buy. Insist!

Unless you see the "Bayer Cross" on tablets, you are not getting the genuine Bayer product prescribed by physicians over 23 years and proved safe by millions for

Colds	Headache
Toothache	Rheumatism
Neuritis	Lumbago
Neuralgia	Pain, Pain

Accept only "Bayer" package which contains proper directions.

Handy "Bayer" boxes of 12 tablets—Also bottles of 24 and 100—Druggists.

Aspirin is the trade mark of Bayer Manufacture of Monoaceticacidester of Salicylicacid

Ride a Ranger The Finest bicycle ever built. 44 Styles, colors, sizes; made in our new factory. SAVE $10 to $25. Cash or easy payments. Delivered on approval, express prepaid, for 30 Days' Trial. No charge unless you are satisfied.

Tires Best quality at factory prices, express paid. Lamps, wheels, equipment, low prices. Write today for low factory prices and marvelous offers and terms.

Mead Cycle Company Dept. T-33 Chicago Write us today for free catalog

Beauty Culture Course at Home

Easy to Earn $40 to $75 a Week

Secrets of beauty parlors revealed. Thirty easy lessons can make you expert in all branches, massage, packs, dyeing, marcel, skin work, manicure, waves, bleach etc. in eight weeks. Study in spare time. Earn while you learn. Authorized diploma. Money back guarantee. 50,000 Opportunities. Get FREE Book.

ORIENTAL SYSTEM OF BEAUTY CULTURE
Dept. 176 1000 Diversey Blvd. Chicago

Statement of the Ownership, Management, etc., required by the Act of Congress of August 24, 1912, of Cosmopolitan Magazine, published monthly at New York, N. Y., for April 1, 1923. State of New York, County of New York, ss. Before me, a Notary in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared A. C. G. Hammesfahr, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Business Manager of the Cosmopolitan Magazine and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit: 1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are: Publisher International Magazine Company, 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.; Editor Ray Long, 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.; Managing Editor, Ida Verdon, 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.; Business Manager, A. C. G. Hammesfahr, 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y. 2. That the owners are: International Magazine Company, 119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.; Star Holding Corporation, Wilmington, Delaware, Sole Stockholder. (W. R. Hearst, 137 Riverside Drive, New York, N. Y., Sole Stockholder). 3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: None. 4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him. A. C. G. Hammesfahr, Business Manager. Sworn to and subscribed before me this 20th day of March, 1923. [SEAL] Oscar Tunnell, Jr., Notary Public, New York and Queens Co., New York County No. 149. (My commission expires March 30, 1923.)

well enough alone, feeling his way each day back to the paths of delightful quasi-intimacy, hoping now boldly that some day, sometime, he would dare to adore her openly. And tell her.

The new picture, "Atlantis," was three or four months under way when Halliday, resting at home one day after a strenuous night session at the studio, was notified by the Jap that a lady was calling, a lady who refused to be put off by the usual excuses that the star was sleeping, ill or absent. She claimed to know he was there and intended to see him on a matter of importance to himself.

Halliday put on his coat—he had been playing with Bourbon out in the garden—and went into the house.

The woman was there, a rather good looking girl, well dressed, a little heavier than she wanted to be probably, with well kept hands and well shod feet and ankles that the sheerest hose could not keep from appearing a trifle thick.

"Well?" said Halliday inquiringly.

"Not so good," the girl returned. "Not so good. I don't exactly expect you to kiss me right here and now, but you ought to register a little pleasure upon seeing me. Aren't you glad I escaped with my life when you steered us into the ditch that last time we were out on a party together?"

"I don't think I know what you are talking about."

"Oh-la-la-la, my dear! I'd heard that you had reformed. But don't be good around me. I know too much, too much that other people might be interested in."

"You must be mistaken. I never saw you before."

"You dirty liar." She advanced toward Halliday as if about to strike him and then stopped suddenly to study his face. "Humph!" She lowered her arm and pinned his eyes with her own. "I'm inclined to agree with you. Who are you?"

"My name is Neil Keeley, as you——"

"Tell that to somebody who didn't know Neil a lot better than his own wife. If you never saw me before you're not Neil, and if you're not there's a pretty kettle of fish set to fry." She appraised him carefully. "You're better looking than Neil, if anything. And you've got something on the ball he lacked. Women loved him but I think they would fall for you even harder. They'd trust you further. I guess we'll be friends. I'm living at the Hillview Apartments. My rooms are on the third floor, nice and quiet. Number thirty-three is my door. Shall I expect you this evening?"

"My dear girl," Halliday began, "I have no intention of——"

"Before you say it, take time to think. I'm all ready to like you or even more than that, but be careful not to hurt my feelings. Because, believe me, I can hurt back. Think what a riot it will make on the front page if the newspapers find out that Neil Keeley is dead and that his wife has been living for nearly a year with a man who isn't married to her. Wonderful stuff. And Scandal Street has been quiet so long the newspapers are just aching for something to bust loose. You'll be over this evening?"

Halliday looked her square in the eye to see if there was any sign of wavering. There wasn't.

"I'll be there," he said briefly.

Sheila, who was beginning to know his moods as any woman is bound to know the moods of a man who lives under the same roof with her, sensed Halliday's perturbation and tried to distract his attention from his troubles. She was very sweet about it.

"Which would you rather do, go over to the Montmartre and dance or sit right in your own home and have me dance for you?"

"What do you mean, dance for me?" Halliday asked suspiciously.

"I'll show you, my lord. I have one accomplishment you know nothing about. For a picture I did last season called 'Zimtoom' I learned a sort of a Nautch dance—got it from a real East Indian dancer. The audience has to sit cross-legged on a cushion on the floor in order to appreciate it properly. Can you do that?"

Halliday seated himself clumsily as directed and put himself in an attitude of grouchy expectancy.

"The costume, of course, isn't right," Sheila explained naïvely, "because I ought to have on long pantalettes, or whatever they call 'em, of silk, and bracelets with golden bells on my ankles. Orchestra, commence!"

She started the phonograph with a record of "The Song of India" and switched off all the lights but the grate fire.

If anyone else had done that dance it might have been vulgar, certainly voluptuous. But Sheila's body was only delightfully naughty. Halliday realized with a pang to what a tremendous degree of intimacy they had arrived for her to trust him unquestioningly like that.

She swayed to the music like a charmed cobra. She was a column of smoke stirred by eddying breezes, a weeping willow drooping over a brook, a slim waterfall clothed in its own misty spray.

She was beautiful, she was sweet and she was enticing. On the gentle current of the vanishing melody she floated to him and dropped at his feet, her eyes slightly aflame and questioning.

He did take her in his arms. She seemed to expect it and did not resist.

He might have kissed her, too, then and there for the first time, except in front of a camera of course, if Bourbon had not come scampering in for his after-dinner romp. By the time he had hopped into the party and had done a little kissing on his own hook, all sentiment had been knocked into a cocked hat.

Halliday looked at Sheila in surprise. The soft firelight was especially gentle to her and she looked scarcely a half grown child. He had been mad to consider her a woman. Yet there was a tantalizing memory of maturity about her as she had lain for that fleeting instant in his arms, an electricity about the cool tingle of her flesh where his cheek had touched her uncovered shoulder.

He was glad the pup had butted in—glad for the sake of the situation, that is. And he scrambled to his feet.

"Let's go to the Montmartre for a while," Sheila proposed, getting up too. "Will I be all right in this dress or——"

"I have another engagement," Halliday informed her with unintentional brusqueness.

"Why don't you say you don't want to take me?" she countered, laughing. "You never have any engagements in the evening. You almost always sit in your room writing letters. To whom, I ask you, to whom?"

"How do you know I write letters?"

"I've stood outside your door sometimes and heard you tear them up. Why don't you ever send them to her sometime?"

"I'm afraid she might be angry."

"Coward! Is your date for tonight with her?"

"Perhaps."

"Will you take me along?"

"No."

Sheila could be wilful upon occasion and she stamped her foot now like a child who has been denied a pleasure excursion. "I want to go. There's nothing to do and I'm bored."

"I'm sorry but——"

"Oh, very well, I'll get someone else to take me!"

She went to the telephone and called a number. Halliday watched her dumbly.

"Hello," she was saying, "I'd like to speak to Mr. Julian Lewis, please."

"Sheila!" Halliday interrupted her. "I'll——"

"Too late, kind sir, too late, I've baited my hook for another fish. Hello, Julian. Sheila speaking."

Halliday found his hat and went out, slamming the door after himself.

"I'm glad I dressed in my rags, too," his hostess assured him, glancing with approval at Halliday's dinner clothes. "I'm feeling just like a party." "WOMAN" was written in capital letters on the personality of the girl who had opened the door of Number 33 at the Hillview Apartments. "I thought you'd like the dress. Your taste and Neil's is pretty much alike in women, Mr.——"

"Neil Keeley, please," Halliday suggested.

"You want to keep that up even among friends?"

"Obviously I'm obliged to, Miss——"

"You don't know my name either do you, sweetie? Kiss me and I'll tell you." Halliday reluctantly approached her. She laughed. "They won't be hard to take after the first one. There, that's over. Boy, I like your lips. Well, all the names they had left when they came to christen me were Cora May Foreman. Call me either Cora or May unless you want to make up a sweet nothing of your own. Whisper any name you think of or just whistle and I'll come because I can feel how easy it will be to slip in your direction."

"Let's go out somewhere for a while," Halliday proposed with concealed apprehension.

"Then we can come back here later," she acquiesced.

They went to the newly opened dance resort, Montmartre, which was already half filled with tourists identifying each other as screen stars.

The cash customers recognized Halliday—or thought they did. There were only two or three better known faces in all the world than the one he was wearing, and everybody turned to look.

Halliday had been looked at before but usually when he was with Sheila, and he had been very proud and had attributed the attention to her simple but thrilling beauty. Now he felt strangely ashamed and would have welcomed any diversion.

A new kind of summer vacation?
See page 179.

EARN up to $400 per Mo.
Living Expenses Paid

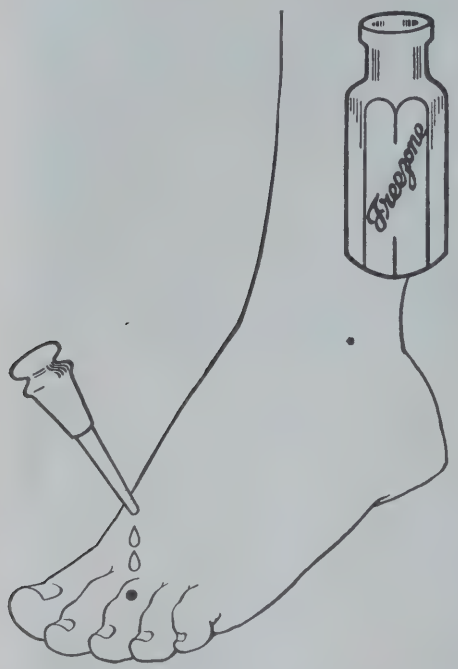
Hotels Need Trained Employees

Trained employees earn big pay. Have splendid chance for advancement to executive positions. Comfortable living in luxurious surroundings. Average men or women, ambitious, willing to learn, can easily qualify in a few weeks in spare hours at home.

More Positions Open Than We Can Fill

Hotels everywhere want our graduates; our method endorsed by leading hotel experts. Big opportunities also in tea rooms, cafeterias, clubs, etc. Write for particulars and bulletin listing many positions open.

STANDARD BUSINESS TRAINING INST.
Carlton Court Buffalo, N.Y.



Standard Business Training Inst.
Carlton Court, Buffalo, N.Y.

Send me free booklet, No. H-171, giving full information about Hotel Operation and Management Course-also Employment Bulletin

Name .....
Street .....
City .....

Corns

Lift Off with the Fingers

Doesn't hurt a bit! Drop a little "Freezone" on an aching corn, instantly that corn stops hurting, then shortly you lift it right off with fingers. Your druggist sells a tiny bottle of "Freezone" for a few cents, sufficient to remove every hard corn, soft corn, or corn between toes, and calluses, without pain, soreness.

High School Course in 2 Years

You can complete this simplified High School Course at home inside of two years. Meets all requirements for entrance to college and the leading professions. This and thirty-six other practical courses are described in our Free Bulletin. Send for it TODAY.

AMERICAN SCHOOL
Dept. H. A. 14 Drexel Avenue and 58th Street Chicago

From Gray Hair and middle-aged appearance to the attractiveness of youth in 15 minutes

Inecto Rapid is the discovery of Dr. Emile of the University of Paris, and differs from all other hair colorings because it repigmentizes the hair shaft instead of only coating the surface. It is specifically guaranteed to color naturally gray, faded or streaked hair to its original shade in fifteen minutes. The color is so natural it cannot be detected even under a microscope. It cannot injure the hair or interfere with its growth and is not affected by sunshine, salt water, shampooing, perspiration, Turkish baths, and does not prevent permanent waving.

97% of the best European hairdressers use it, as well as the finest American parlors. Thousands of women apply it in the privacy of their own homes.

SEND NO MONEY
Write for particulars with proof and our "Beauty Analysis Chart" Form Y-4
INECTO, Inc., Salons and Laboratories
33-35 W. 46th Street, New York, N. Y.
Largest Manufacturers of Hair Coloring in the World

Cora May was not suffering from the same shyness, however, and she paraded between tables with all the reticence of a circus calliope.

They were seated.

Sheila came in.

On the arm of Julian Lewis.

She passed right by the table where Halliday and his partner sat and cut him dead.

First Halliday flushed. That receded and he became cold with anger. Why should she do a thing like that? Was she not there with a man who was not her husband? For a moment he had forgotten that she had no husband.

Very well. If Sheila was going to be petty and mean he would retaliate.

Halliday became very attentive to Cora May. He made her laugh boisterously. And if he had not been the great Neil Keeley he would have been put off the floor for the way he danced with her.

That was all very well for the evening.

But in the morning there was a film of gray ashes over everything, on his tongue, on his ideals, on the pedestal where once his goddess had stood.

Sheila did not speak to him at all except as required in one scene they played together on the lot.

When Cora May called him up in the evening he evaded her. The next night he tried to do the same thing but there was a vague hint of a threat in her voice and he went over. She had a new fur-trimmed suit which he was allowed to pay for. He was glad to escape.

It was an intolerable situation. As he loved Sheila he must keep the other woman quiet, and every step he took in that direction drove Sheila more irrevocably from him.

There seemed to be no way out.

Save one.

If Cora May were dead then Sheila would be safe. There seemed no other method of sealing her lips so as to be certain that they would never be opened again.

After all, the world would not be much worse off without Cora May. Would not the world be more greatly benefited by keeping Sheila Kane in the niche where she was adored as an example of all that was sweet and good than by the continued existence of a woman whose influence at best was negligible and who might become a menace at any time?

Not that Halliday was a murderer. The idea of such a thing was beyond his wildest dreams.

But he remembered what had happened to Neil Keeley and Cora May once before. It might occur again, only in a more secluded spot and one where the bodies could never be recovered. He could make sure that there would be two bodies, not one, this time.

Sol Friedman called Halliday into his office.

"Neil," he said, "you're breaking Sheila's heart by the way you're acting with this Foreman girl. She's notorious, you know. Why do you do it? You didn't seem like that kind of a chap once."

Halliday sat a minute. He had to tell the chief.

"You know who Cora May Foreman is, don't you?"

"No. Who?"

"She was in the other seat of that roadster that went into the ditch a little over a year ago. She came to me and threatened to tell everything. I dared her to until she pointed out what the public would do to Sheila's reputation if it came out that she and I were living in the same house but not married to each other. Then I caved in. I couldn't stand for that."

"Why not?"

"Why not? Because I'm head over heels in love with Sheila, the same as you are, you old fraud, the same as any man is who ever comes in contact with her whether he is married or single, property man or star. I'd die for her just as cheerfully as any of the rest of you. But I think you're worrying yourself unduly if you think she gives a whoop what I do. She seems to be stepping out quite a bit with Julian Lewis herself."

Sol Friedman eyed his young star shrewdly. "A little jealous, eh, in addition to everything else? But don't worry about Lewis. He has been hanging around Sheila ever since she first came out here. He may not be a saint, but at least his reputation is good and his attention to Sheila isn't hurting her socially. The thing we've got to worry about is the other angle—the Cora May thing."

"I'll agree to handle that, one way or another," Halliday volunteered briefly.

"What do you mean 'or another'?"

"I'm not certain yet myself."

"Can we buy her off?"

"I don't think so. She gets nine-tenths of my salary now and you know that's quite an item. She thinks she's sure of that as long as she holds the whip over me. That part of it is easy, though."

"The hard part, I take it, is being with her?"

"Yes."

"Many men like her?"

Halliday shrugged. "She isn't repulsive, if that's what you mean, but I doubt if any man would be very mad about even Venus if she were his jailer."

There seemed nothing further to discuss and Halliday was not in the mood for shop talk so he rose to depart. "Can you suggest anything to do that I haven't done?"

"No, Neil, I'm darned if I can. But I'm glad you told me."

"Of course it's understood that Sheila is never to know anything about this. She's the kind of a generous, impulsive woman who wouldn't accept the only thing I can do for her in all my life. You won't mention this to her, will you?"

"Not under the circumstances, if you are quite sure you can keep Cora May quiet."

"I'm sure."

"O. K."

"Good by. Wait a minute. Can I borrow your big car for the afternoon? Mine's in the shop having an axle straightened."

"Certainly. Tell Tom I said he is under your orders for the day. He's out there in the parking space right now. As you go out ask my secretary to telephone the garage to send over the roadster."

Four hours' drive in the mountains Halliday left Sol Friedman's car and his chauffeur while he climbed an ex-wagon trail up the hillside through the scrub timber to a place that he recollected once to have seen when the company had been out on location filming some Holy Grail scenes.

It was there just as he remembered it, a great abandoned mine shaft with a tall heap of ore in back of it. Evidently it had once been a big paying property because there were several buildings grouped around the hole in the ground and there was a lot of hoisting machinery that could be seen through the flapping, half hung doors of the rotting sheds.

The shaft itself was a very large one, roofed over and dark inside. A barrier had been placed across the trail leading to it, a heavy oak beam, bolted on.

But Halliday had remembered that, too, and he had a hack saw under his coat.

It took him over an hour to cut off the heads of the bolts and push the timber down into the shaft.

After a long time it splashed.

When Halliday reached home that night he found several urgent messages from Cora, and almost as soon as he got in the telephone rang. As he answered it he heard Sheila's door close emphatically.

"I'm not going to see you tonight," he declared, "but we're going to spend all day together tomorrow. Listen to my plan. I'll call at about ten with luncheon and everything and take you to a gorgeous hilltop I found today. We can stay as long as we like. What say?"

"Fine, sweetie. You know I'd spend a day with you even if it was in Hades. I don't care if we never come back."

"Which is perhaps lucky," Halliday muttered, but not audibly.

It was pretty hard sledding to make love to Cora May with any semblance of conviction the next morning. He doubted, rather, if he was fooling her any.

But she went with him in the car and he drove out of the city as rapidly as possible. There was little danger of his plans miscarrying if he could get her out in the lonely hills.

They were perhaps an hour outside of the city limits, quite a way in the foothills, when Halliday noticed that his companion looked back furtively from time to time. She did not know that he saw her and he kept a weather eye on the rear view mirror, wondering what on earth she expected to see.

There was nothing.

After a while she did not look around any more.

Halliday wondered why until he picked up a faintly moving speck in the mirror and identified it as an automobile following them. That complicated matters.

At the first sharp turn in the mountain road he stopped, blocking the trail.

"What's the matter?" Cora asked.

"A little spark plug trouble," Halliday informed her. "It will only take a minute."

"We ought not to stop here—it's dangerous."

"Why?"

"Suppose another car should come around that curve in back of us."

"Very little chance of that, dear. You didn't see any car in back of us, did you?"

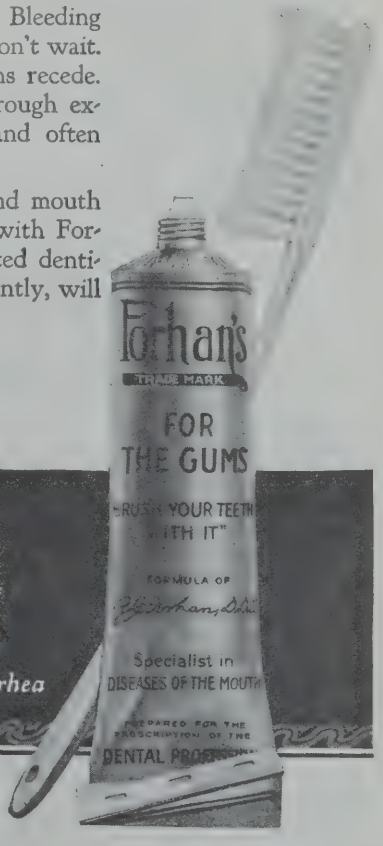
"N-n-no."

"We're safe, then. There are no roads running into this one for miles back. It's a lonesome track anyway."

He pretended to fix the spark plugs,

The Odds Are 4 to 1 Against You

Heed Nature's Warning —Bleeding Gums



Don't gamble with your teeth and health. You have far too much at stake. More, the odds are too heavy against you.

Teeth-destroying, health-sapping Pyorrhea strikes four persons out of every five that pass the age of forty. And thousands younger, too. The chances are 4 to 1 it will strike you unless you are vigilantly on guard.

Heed nature's warning when she gives it. Bleeding gums are the danger signal. Act at once. Don't wait. For Pyorrhea works fast. The tender gums recede. The teeth loosen, drop out or are lost through extraction. Pus-pockets form at the roots and often flood the system with infection.

Go immediately to your dentist for teeth and mouth inspection. Brush your teeth, twice daily, with Forhan's For the Gums. This healing, time-tested dentifrice, when used in time and used consistently, will prevent Pyorrhea or check its progress.

Forhan's For the Gums is the formula of R. J. Forhan, D. D. S. It will keep your teeth clean and white, your gums firm and healthy. It is pleasant to the taste. At all druggists, 35c and 60c.

Forhan's

FOR THE GUMS

More than a tooth paste—it checks Pyorrhea

Formula of R. J. Forhan, D.D.S.
Forhan Company, New York
Forhan's, Limited, Montreal

Yes—Absolutely Free

To Prove How to Restore Gray Hair

I personally request every gray haired person to write for my patented Free Trial package, and let me prove how easily, quickly and surely gray, faded or discolored hair can be restored to its perfect, natural color.

This offer would be impossible if I couldn't guarantee results. But I perfected my Restorer to bring back the original color to my own prematurely gray hair, and I know just what it will do.

My Restorer is a clear, colorless liquid, clean as water. Doesn't interfere with shampooing. Nothing to wash or rub off. Restored hair perfectly natural in all lights, no streaking or discoloration.

MAIL COUPON TODAY

Send today for the special patented Free Trial package which contains a trial bottle of my Restorer and full instructions for making the convincing test on one lock of hair. Indicate color of hair with X. Print name and address plainly. If possible, enclose a lock of your hair in your letter.

FREE TRIAL COUPON

Please print your name and address

Mary T. Goldman,
42F Goldman Bldg., St. Paul, Minn.

Please send your patented Free Trial Outfit. X shows color of hair. Black..... dark brown..... medium brown..... auburn (dark red)..... light brown..... light auburn (light red)..... blonde.....

Name.....

Street.....City.....

Eat and Be Well!

A condensed set of health rules—many of which may be easily followed right in your own home, or while traveling. You will find in this little book a wealth of information about food elements and their relation to physical welfare.

Control Your Weight Without Drugs or Tiresome Exercises

Effective weight control diets, acid and bland diets, laxative and blood-building diets, and diets used in the correction of various chronic maladies.

The book is for FREE circulation. Not a mail order advertisement. Name and address on card will bring it without cost or obligation.

DIET BOOK Sent Free

HEALTH EXTENSION BUREAU
224 Good Health Bldg. Battle Creek, Mich.

LOFTIS BROS. & CO. Estd. 1858

Genuine Diamonds Guaranteed
We import Diamonds direct from Europe and sell direct to you.

DIAMONDS WATCHES CASH or CREDIT

"Charlotte" Diamond Ring
Five radiant, blue white, perfect cut Diamonds. Entire ring is platinum.
$150
Others at $300 and $250

Our immense buying power is a great saving to you.

Since 1858 the House of Loftis has served the public and has built up the largest Diamond and Watch Credit business in the world on the policy of "SATISFACTION GUARANTEED or Money Refunded."

Wrist Watch
Rectangular Shape
18-K Solid White Gold, 17 Jewels, $39
14-K Solid White Gold, 15 Jewels, $32

Send for Free Catalog

Our Catalog is your shopping guide to unusual bargains in Diamond-set Jewelry, Watches, Wrist Watches, Pearls, Mesh Bags, Silverware, etc. Over 2,000 illustrations. Select as many articles as you wish and have all charged in one account. Sent prepaid for your Examination. Easy Credit Terms. Catalog explains everything.

Special Values		Credit Terms
Diamond Rings	$25.00	Credit terms on all articles: One-fifth down, balance divided into equal payments within eight months. Send for Catalog.
Diamond Bar Pins	25.00
Diamond Scarf Pins	15.00
Diamond-Set Onyx Rings	20.00
Men's Watches	15.00
Pearl Necklaces	10.00
Mesh Bags, fine mesh	15.00
Wedding Rings	5.00	We invite comparison of quality and prices.
Diamond Cuffs Links	25.00

LOFTIS BROS & CO. Estd. 1858

THE NATIONAL JEWELERS
Dept. A892 108 N. State St.
CHICAGO, ILL.
STORES IN LEADING CITIES

keeping an eye all the while on the girl in the front seat, who was evidently not entirely at ease.

"I think I'll take a little walk while you're finishing that," she suggested finally.

"But I'm just through," he objected. "You'll have plenty of time to walk when we get there. It would only waste your strength to get out now. Besides, here is the man we are waiting for."

The nose of a big car came poking cautiously around the treacherous mountain curve.

"Mr. Julian Lewis, I believe," Halliday said in greeting as the surprised driver pulled up to a stop. "Curious that we should meet out here on this little frequented mountain trail."

"Not very." The big man had recovered his aplomb immediately. "I was following you."

"Honest today, I see. How does it seem? You are doing your snouting in the interests of my wife, I suppose?"

"Why, no. My services are retained by the lady sitting in your car. You have no wife, I believe, Mr. Halliday."

So that was it. The cards were on the table.

"I admit," the attorney was continuing, "that when Miss Foreman came to me last night and laid the facts in the case before me I was very glad to find out that Mrs. Keeley is a widow, but primarily my weight is all thrown in the scales to see that Miss Foreman gets justice from you."

"Meaning?"

"Justice to a woman means marriage, or at least custom has made women think so."

"And I presume that you for your part would marry Mrs. Keeley?"

"Correct. You are the only thing that stands in my way. With you married to someone else the last obstacle is removed."

"Except that she may not care to accept the honor."

"She will. You forget that her reputation is in our hands. You have done so much to save it that surely she will be willing to make a slight sacrifice to carry on the good work."

"You would not force her into a union that is distasteful to her?"

Lewis laughed. "My dear Mr. Halliday, how little you know me. Of course I'd force her, just as I'm going to force you to marry Miss Foreman this pleasant California morning."

"Force me? How?"

"By the very facts in the case. Unless Miss Foreman is Mrs. Halliday before I leave you I'll spread the whole story when I go back. You have no alternative."

"Yes I have."

"Which is?"

"That you don't go back. Get out of that machine."

Lewis smiled. "Make me."

As Halliday stepped toward him the attorney reached for his hip pocket.

Halliday struck his arm and then, twining his fingers in his coat collar, yanked him out of the driver's seat without opening the door.

Tamaki, the Jap, kept taking out of his pocket and then replacing the letter which his master had given him that morning with strict injunction to deliver it about noon. Tamaki was afraid he would forget it and finally put the letter on the brim of his hat and then placed both of them on a chair in front of the back door.

They were there when Sheila came out to give some orders about dinner before leaving for the studio.

"What's this?" she asked, picking up the envelope.

"Letta Misto Keeley tell me to take Misto Friedman."

"Oh, is that what it is? Well, never mind about that. I'll deliver it myself and save you the trip. I'm going to see Mr. Friedman as soon as I get to the studio."

Which is the reason Sol Friedman received the note from Harrison Halliday at least two hours sooner than the latter had expected it to be delivered.

Sol asked Sheila to wait while he read it.

After he had finished a complete perusal, he looked up at Sheila.

"Sheila, my dear, once upon a time I rather thought that you were beginning to care for your—co-star. On the off chance that I was even partly right, I am going to show you this letter, although it is violating a promise that I made to Neil yesterday."

"Do you think you ought to?"

"Yes. I think it is a question of life or death."

She took the piece of paper gingerly and read:

> DEAR SOL:
>
> Remember that I told you that I would handle the Cora May Foreman angle of our problem if you would do the rest. Well, I am going to make good. You will recollect that once upon a time when Sheila decided that she did not want to work with me, you suggested that I take a trip around the world and never come back. Your suggestion was a good one and I am going to act upon it, starting this morning. The only difference between my plan and yours is that I am going to take Cora May Foreman with me and she isn't coming back either. I will depend upon you to take care that the press is properly informed of my trip with vague references to my itinerary, and also it will be up to you to see that Sheila never learns the truth. I can see no point in telling her even in the years to come when time may soften the bitter feelings which she has for me. You and I are the only persons in the world who know that I love her and that I am doing the only thing in my power to prove it.
>
> Yours faithfully,
> Neil Keeley
>
> P.S.—It is rather a relief to be using that signature for the last time.

Sheila handed the letter back. "I don't believe I quite understand what the letter means."

"I didn't think you would. But I do. It means that unless some sort of a miracle happens a young man who loves you is about to lay down his life in your service."

And then he went on to tell her a lot of facts, including one to the effect that his chauffeur had just made a report that morning as to the route of the trip which Halliday had taken the day before and the curious way he had acted at the old mine shaft. Sol Friedman was nobody's fool, and with the letter in hand he was able to piece together a pretty fair reconstruction of Halliday's plan.

In ten minutes Sheila and Sol were in his big car with Tom, the chauffeur, at the wheel, retracing the route over which he had driven Halliday the day before.

Only going twice as fast this time.

At a sharp turn in the mountain road they came upon a car which had been abandoned, a rather large and beautiful machine.

"This is Julian Lewis's car." Sheila identified it positively. "I've ridden in it scores of times."

"And here's blood in the road," contributed Tom. "And somebody fell here and was dragged away." He was following the tracks in the dust. "Here they put him in another car that was standing closer to the cut. The other car went on this way."

Julian Lewis was perhaps the stronger man of the two. But he was not animated by anger as was Harrison Halliday, and also he had a certain regard for his life. Harrison had none. In fact, he thought of it as a thing forfeited and he didn't give a hang what way he died.

That is the spirit which makes for deadly fighting.

Julian Lewis was unconscious in five minutes, unconscious and battered.

Harrison dragged him over to his own car and dumped him in the tonneau.

Cora May, who had stood by in helpless terror while the battering had been going on, hesitated about getting in the seat beside Harrison.

"You get in!" he ordered.

"What are you going to do?"

Harrison laughed. "I'm going up in the hills for a picnic, just as I had planned, and you are going along with me."

She hesitated and started as if to turn.

"Don't do that." He stopped her. "I would rather have one of my guests come willingly. But if necessary——" He stopped.

She looked to see if he meant it and then climbed into the seat.

The next two hours were spent in driving mountain roads at a rate of speed at which they had never been negotiated before. Harrison didn't care what he did and he was deaf to the protests of his highly nervous passenger.

The car reached the place where the trail branched off steeply to the mine shaft. Harrison drove past the branch trail, then backed up in his tracks, turned off, drove up the hill a way and then got out and dusted off the trail with his hat so that it looked as if his car had gone straight on by.

Perhaps his precautions would have fooled a pursuer if it had not happened that just as his car was vanishing amid the scrub timber another car came up the trail in time to see him disappear.

Harrison forced his car across rocky roads at the highest rate of speed he could achieve on that grade. What did he care if the springs broke now?

The trail flattened out a little just before it approached the mine buildings. The car gathered speed. Cora May, bewildered up to now, sensed the alertness in Halliday's attitude, guessed that whatever he was about to do boded no good to herself and that the climax was imminent.

She clutched his arm.

"Neil!" she screamed.

He threw her aside but she came back. He paid no attention. The muscles of his arms were tensed like drawn steel wire under her touch. Her clutching fingers

Wrinkled, cosmetic-filled skins —how to renew their youth

FACES loaded with cosmetics—body skin neglected except for the simple demands of hygiene—what result could be expected save an aged skin!

And in correcting such a condition, one must go back to nature—renew the vigor of the nerves of the skin; invigorate the tiny blood-vessels; treat the skin of the body, instead of using facial cosmetics alone.

ALCORUB—the name of a sane skin treatment

ALCORUB is an effective tonic for the nerves and blood-vessels of the skin. The ALCORUB treatment is applied to the skin of the body—not to the complexion. It is very simple—very easy—quite inexpensive. But it is sane and sound. Followed faithfully it will restore as much of youth and beauty as anyone can reasonably expect. It corrects excessive perspiration; cleanses clogged pores; restores a healthy blood supply to sallow, wasted skins; makes oily or pimply skins satin-smooth.

And so easy to use

Take a hot bath every other night before going to bed. Dry the body as usual. Then pour a little ALCORUB into your hand and rub the entire surface of the body until you feel a gentle glow. After the ALCORUB is all rubbed in, dash a second application of ALCORUB quickly over the skin and let it evaporate; it takes only a few seconds. Do not rub in this last application of ALCORUB.

Faithful use assures a clear skin

Begin with ALCORUB treatment tonight and continue it faithfully. Results will begin to show in a few weeks; before long your skin will be vastly improved.

Be careful to use ALCORUB exactly according to the directions here given. Only by this method will it give the benefit you need.

Ask your druggist or department store for ALCORUB. If not in stock they will get it if you insist.

U. S. INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL CO.
NEW YORK

ALCORUB

For the Beauty and Health of the Skin

made no more impression upon them than if he had been a block of wood set to hold the wheel just so.

He stepped on the accelerator. The car bounced and reared but kept going forward towards that black hole. He couldn't see but did not need to.

The car shot into the darkness of the shed.

Crash! It struck something that splintered.

That was strange. He had taken down the oak bar the day before.

Whatever it was gave way under the violence of the shock and the front wheels of the car went over the edge.

But the motor was dead, killed by the force of the impact, and the car hung poised with the chassis resting solidly on the floor timbers.

Tom, Friedman's chauffeur, stopped the sedan just outside the shed which covered the one-time mine hoist.

His passengers with sick apprehension went on foot into the dark hole.

An old man with a lantern in one hand and a heavy wrench in the other was talking to the driver of the car that hung half over the pit.

"Darned lucky for you, young fellow, that I just got through replacing the barrier that some wood thief stole on me yesterday. Otherwise you'd be down at the bottom of Kingdom Come."

Harrison Halliday was clambering wearily out of the driver's seat. It's disconcerting to find yourself alive when, according to plan, you should be several seconds dead.

He had not seen Sheila until she stepped into his arms and he found that she was crying.

"Why, what's the matter, dear?"

"I was afraid," she said.

"That I'd be killed?"

"That, and that you didn't love me."

Cora May Foreman surveyed the scene with swiftly recovered nerve.

"Very pretty," she said, "very pretty. But how the newspapers are going to chuckle when I spill my stuff about the love nest but no marriage license."

"Sorry to spoil your gloat, Miss Whatever-your-name-is," Sheila replied, looking up from Halliday's shoulder, "but your story won't have an awful kick. If you want to tell it to the newspaper men you will have to do it at our wedding supper tonight because they're all going to be there. I don't believe the public is going to be so interested in when we were married as in the fact that we are married."

Not until they were safe at home and Sol Friedman had gone to make the wedding arrangements did Halliday ask the question uppermost in his mind.

"Why were you so sure of my love?"

"I once read a letter of yours that you never sent."

"Oh, on that day you came back from Honolulu and changed your mind about working with me?"

"Yes. Later I thought it was addressed to that woman, but today I know the truth—and I like it."

Tap! Tap! Tap!

"Come in," permitted Sheila.

Enter Tamaki. Stands abashed at unaccustomed spectacle of mistress in master's arms.

"Pardon, but Misto Dog Bourbon have whip big p'lice dog nex' door and wishes to bleed on best Turkey rug. What shall do?'

"Let him do it," declared Sheila.

"Get him two rugs," supplemented her nearly husband.

"And have one yourself," Sheila finished. "This is the day of days. Tamaki, make yourself scarce unless you want to be embarrassed. We're shameless."

Tamaki understood a hint when it was delivered on the point of his jaw that way.

So he withdrew.

And in some unaccountable fashion we've been shoved outside of the door with him.

Darn! Sic semper tyrannis.

For one of the most irresistible stories Frank R. Adams ever wrote see COSMOPOLITAN for July—on sale at all news stands June tenth

The Garden of Peril

(Continued from page 80)

Bruce Kelly had done, and his complete confidence in ultimate recovery under the latter's skilful treatment, but that very fact, he went on to say, had forced him to the use of his revolver. For he did not want to recover. Sorrow for the loss of his brother and a complete and unconquerable boredom with life had decided him on making an end of things. He was only sorry for the grief this would cause his wife and relatives, and for that he begged their forgiveness. He also apologized to the Doctor and the coroner, and made the one last request that his body be left alone and "not carved up in any post-mortem business" as that was "more than he could stand the thought of."

Nothing to be done by any coroner on such evidence but bring in a verdict of temporary insanity; with which everyone agreed. How could a sane man be "unconquerably" bored with an existence that held a lovely and devoted wife and an impending income of £50,000 a year?

Bruce Kelly's strange desire to ignore the dead man's last request and hold a post-mortem just the same was looked upon as both morbid and heartless, and again public opinion backed the Coroner's decision that no good purpose could be served by such a course, while unnecessary pain might thereby be inflicted upon the widow. Poor little widow! Everyone felt for her hard luck. Losing husband, a title and the prospect of great wealth . . . all at the crack of a pistol! At the same time no one dared even hint sympathy for the loss of material things, to one so dazed by grief.

"I am like a child lost in a dark wood," was all she could pitifully say to those who came forward, nervous but generous in their offers of practical assistance and advice. "But Major Heseltine, my husband's cousin and best friend, will know what is best for me to do. I will just wait here quietly until he comes."

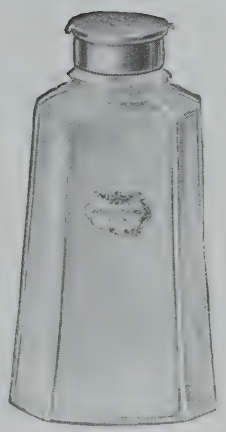
So events stood still, waiting upon the return of Punch. Arrangements for the transportation of Pam Heseltine's mortal body—now resting temporarily in the local cemetery—to the vaults of his ancestors at Scawnshane were suspended, and it seemed natural enough, meantime, that the stricken lady at Minto Lodge should make no plans for leaving Africa without the kindly direction of her kinsman's hand. At any rate she waited.

And in a garden a girl too waited; hoping and fearing; wondering if God would be good to her and let the process of saving Punch Heseltine from destruction come naturally or whether she must fight for it, even as Pam in the hour of his death had implored her. If the latter course, then she knew she would have to do it single-handed, and against great odds. There must be no dragging of the Doctor into it, nor raking of the dead man from his rest . . . even though with his own lips he had commanded her to leave nothing unsaid. But he himself had gone down to the grave loyal to disloyalty, faithful to betrayal, and it was not for Peril to unseal his secrets.

Yet she must save Punch from Doria; that was what it all reduced itself to. Pit her girlhood, her simplicity and her inexperience, against the guile, the charm, the dazzle of a siren! How was it possible she could prevail? She knew not . . . only that she must. And God was on her side. She knew that too, for He had brought Punch to her here that night when she lay weeping in an abandonment of grief—weeping for two things, for her little bush-baby's death, yes; but above all for the fact that she had seen Pam Heseltine's wife upon the breast of his cousin; their lips almost touching; and in the horror of it had realized that she loved that man and could not bear him to betray his honor.

And he had come there and found her weeping! And something in his gentleness and simplicity had revealed to her that he was without guilt in the matter. The woman had tempted, but he had resisted; indeed, she had the evidence of her own eyes on many a day, as they rode past, as to that state of things.

Yes—God was on her side, the God of her faith, and of all clean, loyal men; and she prayed to Him every night in her garden to give her the victory; and even while she prayed she listened for the jingle of spurs on the road, and a man's step on the path. And at last they came!



On the night that Punch Heseltine returned to his camp, and put forth again within the hour, he cared not who heard the ring of his horse's hoofs upon the Umtété road, nor who knew that they stopped at the gate of a garden on a hill; for this was no clandestine rendezvous he fared forth upon. There were things to be done on the morrow, he knew, disagreeable things, sad obligations, family duties.

Parfumeur to Queen Victoria of Spain
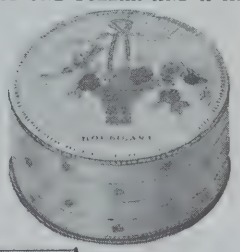
1923

PERFUMES so perfect, so exquisite in fragrance, so incomparable in quality, that for more than a century (since 1775) they have been the choice of the royal women of Europe; that is the history of HOUBIGANT perfumes. It is a history which speaks quite as eloquently for the HOUBIGANT perfumes of to-day, as for those created for Marie Antoinette and the patrician women of her brilliant court. Not only are all the famous HOUBIGANT extraits now available in America, but so also are all other HOUBIGANT toiletries. At smart shops everywhere you will find, for instance, among recent HOUBIGANT importations, the delightful talcum, complexion powder, and powder-compact pictured.

Quelques Fleurs
Le Parfum Idéal
Mon Boudoir
Le Temps des Lilas



Quelques Fleurs Poudre de Talc
—fragrant with the exquisite new Quelques Fleurs odeur.
PRICE ONE DOLLAR

Idéal Poudre-Compact
—of just the proper size to carry in the purse.
PRICE ONE DOLLAR AND A HALF

Mon Boudoir Poudre de Riz
—a new complexion powder of especially adherent quality.
PRICE ONE DOLLAR AND A HALF

HOUBIGANT Inc.
NEW YORK, 16 WEST 49TH ST. MONTREAL, 46 ST. ALEXANDER ST.

HOUBIGANT Paris

Extraits, Eaux de Toilette, Poudres a Sachet, Poudres de Riz, Poudres de Tale, Savons, Sels pour le Bain, Brillantines

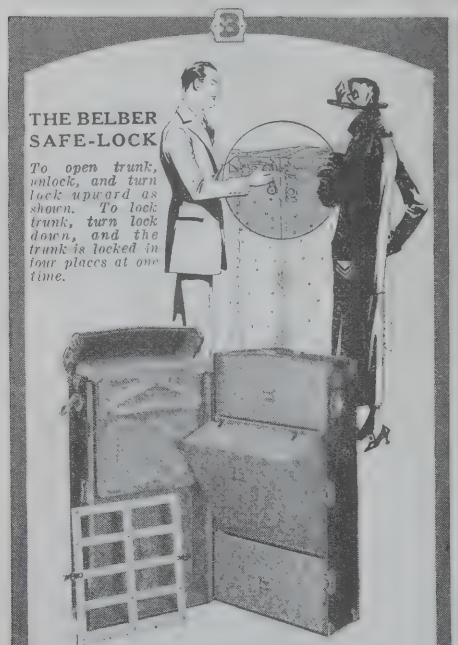
Get the Facts about Travel Costs

BEFORE formulating your summer vacation plans investigate the cost of crossing to Europe on one of our 14 delightful cabin steamers. On these cabin ships you obtain the best accommodations at extremely moderate rates, with excellent service and all the delights of a sea voyage.



These ships, with our famous de luxe liners — Olympic, Homeric, Belgenland, Lapland, and the world's largest ship Majestic—offer five sailings a week to England via Southampton, Liverpool and Plymouth; three to France via Cherbourg; and one each to Ireland, Belgium and Germany.

Here is complete ocean service at your price.

Whatever your requirements, we can meet them. Call or inquire for details.

WHITE STAR LINE
AMERICAN LINE — RED STAR LINE
INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE COMPANY

No. 1 Broadway, New York

Write for booklet, "The Style in Wardrobe Trunks—and how to pack!" The Belber Trunk & Bag Company, Philadelphia.

Belber
SAFE-LOCK
WARDROBE TRUNK

But tonight was his . . . his and Love's. Knowledge had come to him, in the silences of the veldt, that the very core of existence hid for him in this enchanted garden, though he could not be truly certain that the girl he hoped to find waiting there was truly his and for him until he held her against his heart, in the place where first he had found her.

It was just such another night as that. Dim and purple with the sparkle of a thousand stars overhead. Full of that profound silence which composes a myriad voices of nature: love calls of tree creatures and dwellers in the grass, whispering of leaves, rustle of flowers. On lone veldt places he had dreamed of this sweet spot, realizing that here dwelt heart's desire. All that woman can hold and give to man was here for him—the riches of the earth in the little circle of a girl's arms.

He knew when he found her at last, under the trees, and held his lips to hers, that all he dreamed of was true . . . That rare and wonderful gift of the gods had come into his possession—purity and passion in equal measure . . . and he drank deep from the fresh cup of her lips, a draught to fire his blood, yet cleanse his soul.

"A pool of lilies! . . . I will wash away all my madness in you, my darling."

No more roaming and fevered quest for Punch Heseltine! This lovely warm vase of life contained all he had sought the world over. Voyage and harbor were here; Europe and the wilderness; wine and spring water.

"I loved you from the moment I saw you sitting there in the gloom . . . so kind and gentle with poor old Pam, and his pack of cards!"

"I loved you before that . . . when you rode alone below my garden . . . with a moody look . . ."

"That was because I could not find you . . . I knew you were somewhere waiting for me . . . but I could not find you."

"O Punch! I was so afraid you would get lost on the way." He did not tell her how nearly that had come to pass, for, like Pam, he was one of those who did not "tell." But his kisses told her all she wanted to know of both past and future. Their happiness was such as to be almost too keen to be borne. They were only simple mortals after all, composed of very human elements. Moments flew into hours, and all too swiftly the wind of coming separation blew chill between them, shaking his heart, and making the lilies of the pool shiver and tremble.

"Let us get married quickly, my heart! . . . then no more parting!"

"Yes . . . quickly," she sighed under his lips; "then together forever."

Just at the last she remembered to give him Pam's letter, which she always carried with her; and he in turn remembered tasks both tiresome and tragic that awaited him. For a moment the shadow of Doria fell across their joy, but instantly passed, for all power and allure had long since gone out of that memory for him, replaced by this great and pure passion of his life. As for Peril, she knew that God had verily and indeed been on her side.

Later, in the quiet of his camp he read and pondered Pam's letter. Much of its inner meaning remained hidden for years, and some of it forever, as the writer had intended. But here and there a sentence carried a sharp edge or sounded a strangely warning ring.

> It is your duty to marry, and soon, if Scawnshane is not to pass forever from the Heseltines . . . Marry a girl who will love you (not herself) who will give you sons, and something to care for more satisfying than that pride of life and "lust of the eye" of which both you and I have been over-hot in the pursuit. Above all, bring fresh blood and clean blood into the old stock. But if for any reason all this is not in your plan . . . pause a bit, Punch, and do not be too proud to take counsel. The bearer of this letter has it in her hands to guide you.

So that was Pam's counsel in the hour of death! Thinking, even with finger on trigger, of his race—of the moral and physical emendation of the stock from which he sprang! Nothing very insane about such meditations, thought Punch; but then he very well knew that his cousin had not been insane. Though what had constituted the breaking point, what had driven him at the last to end his long weariness, remained a mystery. Only, in that final hour Pam had trusted and believed in him! That was a grace for which Punch Heseltine was to remain grateful his whole life—with a thankfulness to God that such trust had never been betrayed.

He went to Minto Lodge next day; but not before talking to Bruce Kelly and making wonderful plans for an immediate wedding and departure for England; and not before he had drunk again of dew and honey in the garden of heart's desire. It was with Peril's kisses warm on his lips that he stood before Doria.

Her reception of him was colder than the eternal snows. For of course she knew of his arrival the night before, and it infuriated her that he had not come straight to her. But though she meant for a while to keep that pose to punish him, there was guile in it too. She withdrew herself to icy distances, but her ice was for melting at the breath of passion. She was distant only to make nearness more certain; wayward only to be won; and so certain of him that she believed she could play the ice maiden for her own amusement before she showed him the glint of the fires that consumed her.

Strangely enough to his now cleared vision there was something about her, with her blue eyes and snowy draperies, that made him think of Natura Maligna, that beautiful spirit of the ice whom simple mountaineers believe in, one who haunts the cold blue caverns of the glacier, flickers alluringly above the treacherous pass and launches the avalanche for the destruction of men. And while he so thought, she in turn, subtly sensing something unfavorable to herself, was considering:

"Strange men, the Heseltines! It may be that he feels the shadow of Pam between us . . . the coldness of a dead hand! I must go softly, delicately, not to outrage that fantastic loyalty of his . . ."

Meanwhile they discussed those things which had necessarily to be discussed, everyday matters, such as the lease of Minto Lodge, one or two other obligations Pam had entered into since coming to Rhodesia, and which she desired Punch to look into. Important affairs, such as

This Summer— A New Vacation

If you have earned a vacation, take it.

As George Ade has it—"The planet you are now visiting may be the only one you ever see. Even if you get a transfer, the next one may not have any Grand Canyon or Niagara Falls."

But don't get in a rut. Don't be content to visit the same old places and see the same old sights summer after summer.

If you are a Westerner, take your vacation in the East. If you are an Easterner, go West and fill your soul with the rugged grandeur of the famous National Parks. And to both of you, Europe is within reach as never before.

Change, relaxation, the adjustment of your viewpoint to a broader horizon—that makes a real vacation.

Cosmopolitan Travel Service exists to smooth the way for you, to help you choose, to solve the petty travel problems that come up in planning such a vacation. As the first step, we have published five new booklets, dealing with the chief vacation attractions in this country and Canada. Write for those that interest you.

Send 6c. apiece for these booklets on Summer Travel

7. The Canadian Rockies and Northwest National Parks.

The Alpine grandeur of glaciers, lakes and crags of the Northern Rockies—Glacier National Park—Yellowstone National Park—Crater Lake—Mt. Rainier.

8. Colorado and California National Parks.

Rocky Mountain and Estes National Parks—the cliff dwellings of Mesa Verde—Yosemite National Park—California, the motor tourist's paradise.

9. Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Valley.

Suggested boat trips on the Great Lakes—hunting and fishing in the beautiful Canadian Lake region—the "Niagara-to-the-Sea" St. Lawrence River trip.

10. New England and The Adirondacks.

Picturesque Cape Cod and Buzzard's Bay—Historical old Boston—Maine, the "Vacationland"—The Berkshires and White Mountains—the lake-gemmed Adirondacks.

11. New York and Surrounding Resorts.

New York, "the unbelievable city"—the Hudson River and the Catskills—the New Jersey and Long Island shore resorts —Water trips out of New York.

These Booklets are also Available

1. South America and Central America, 4c.
2. Southern Europe and the Mediterranean, 4c.
3. The Pacific Coast and the Great Southwest, 4c.
4. The Orient, 4c.
6. That Trip to Europe, 10c.

Cosmopolitan TRAVEL SERVICE

119 W. 40th St. New York, N. Y.

Cosmopolitan Travel Service, 119 West 40th Street, New York City

Enclosed find.....cents in stamps. Please send me booklets Nos.....
(If you care to give the following additional information it will help us to help you.)

I plan to travel in (Names of countries or localities) .....

I will leave (Date) .....

Name .....

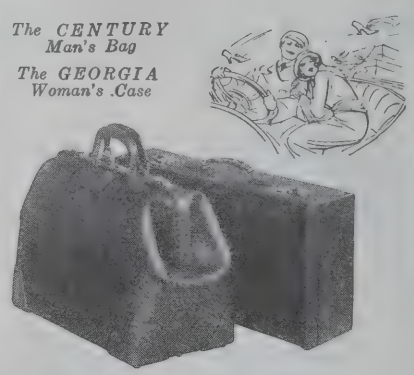
Address .....

FAMOUS STEAMERS
"Washington Irving" "Hendrick Hudson"
"Robert Fulton" "Albany"
"De Witt Clinton"
"Alexander Hamilton" (under construction)

Hudson River by Daylight

Don't miss it this year!—the most delightful inland water trip on the American continent. Inspiring views of lofty Palisades and headlands; beautiful shore vistas; points of historic interest. A new thrill at every turn.

The Pleasant Route To Vacation Lands



No matter which direction you travel, the Day Line forms the ideal connecting link between New York and the Catskills, Berkshires, Adirondacks, Saratoga, Lake George, Lake Champlain, Niagara Falls and all points North and East. Delightful One-Day Outings from New York.

Daily and Sunday service—season May 12 to Oct. 21. Rail tickets accepted. New York to Albany, Albany to New York.

Write for Illustrated Literature

Hudson River Day Line
Desbrosses Street Pier New York

The CENTURY Man's Bag
The GEORGIA Woman's Case

After the wedding

FOR the bridal trip—or any trip—long or short—take LIKLY Luggage. Its lasting goodness always makes the right impression.

LIKLY Luggage is smart in appearance—made from the finest leathers and beautifully finished by luggage artisans. It is roomy—strong—economical luggage to buy.

Sold by the best stores everywhere. If not obtainable in your locality, write to us. DISTRIBUTORS WANTED wherever LIKLY Luggage is not being sold.

HENRY LIKLY & CO.
Rochester, N. Y., U. S. A.

All LIKLY Luggage bears this label. Insist on it. It identifies LIKLY distinctive quality.

WRITE Dept. C for illustrated Price List of BAGS, CASES, TRUNKS and PORTFOLIOS.

LIKLY (LIKELY) Luggage

those connected with his income, the dead man had left in perfect order, and her position was simplified by the fact that they had some years before made "mutual" wills in each other's favor. Possession of his few hundreds a year would then come to her automatically on her return to England, where the will remained.

The mode of her return, too, was touched upon, and the arrangements for transporting poor Pam to Scawnshane gone into. Nor did she shirk reference to the manner of her husband's death. She hated the subject, indeed, and even her callous soul shrank from the lies she felt it necessary to tell. But an urgency to appear pitiful and blameless in the eyes of Punch was upon her, for now that the way lay open before them she suddenly feared that he might remember against her those unspoken invitations to treachery, the calls of her eyes and hands and lips which he had resisted, and won her in resisting. So, excusing herself, she traduced the dead.

"He never cared for me . . . I have known it for years, though no one has ever heard it from my lips until today. You don't know what my life has been, Punch . . . the faithlessness I have had to endure—and ignore . . . for the sake of the family name!" That ought to have its appeal, she thought. "You don't know what my longing has been for a real love. Someone who could offer me all that I too have to give . . ."

But he sat there rock-like, looking at her with strange eyes. Could it possibly be that he was untouched by this story of her wretchedness? She must try a different line.

"But I realize now that he was not entirely responsible . . . Poor Pam! And I can only be thankful that in my unhappiness I was not driven too far . . . That when the one great love came into my life . . . there was nothing and is nothing he could have reproached us"—hastily she corrected herself—"me, for."

Still that stone-like stare in the Heseltine eyes . . . and was that a flicker in them such as she had often surprised in the eyes of her husband—a flicker of irony? Not possible . . . never, never! She went blindly forward.

"At the last I think he realized . . . all that I had suffered. For he left a strange letter to me . . . asking my forgiveness (God knows, poor boy, he has it!) and seeming to wish for my future happiness." A daring inspiration came to her: What of a tender phrase in that letter, legacying her to Punch? "He even suggested," she faltered, "the form that happiness might take."

"You did not produce that letter at the inquest, to refute the theory that he was insane?"

Doria looked profoundly shocked; as indeed she was by the grimness of his voice.

"It was a sacredly private letter—written almost in the hour of his death. I destroyed it."

"Ah! He wrote me a letter too, in the hour of his death." She shot up from her chair, and Punch stopped, arrested by the panic of her eyes, the draining of blood from cheek and lip so that the paint flared out in bold relief; then he said slowly: "I did not destroy it."

"But—how did you get . . ." Her hand pressed hard against the laces of her bosom, her breath came short. "Who

Niagara to the Sea

Shooting the Rapids

The most satisfying trip in America for health and recreation. Almost 1000 miles of lakes, rivers and rapids, including the Thousand Islands, the exciting descent of the marvelous rapids, the historic associations of Montreal, quaint old Quebec, with its famous miracle-working Shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupre and the renowned Saguenay River, with its stupendous Capes, "Trinity" and "Eternity," higher than Gibraltar.

Send 2c postage for illustrated booklet, "Niagara to the Sea," including map and guide, to JOHN F. PIERCE, Pass. Traffic Manager, Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd., 135 C. S. L. Building, Montreal, Canada.

CANADA STEAMSHIP LINES

Clark's 4th Round the World Cruise
Jan. 19th, by specially chartered luxurious liner 4 mos., $1000 up including hotels, guides, drives, fees. Stop overs in Europe. Route: Havana, Panama Canal, San Francisco, Hawaiian Isl., 14 days Japan, China, Manila, Java, Singapore, Burmah, option 19 days in India, Egypt, Europe.
CLARK'S 21st MEDITERRANEAN CRUISE Feb. 2, specially chartered White Star S. S. "Baltic." 65 days, $600 up, including drives, guides, hotels, fees.
F. C. CLARK, Times Building.....New York

$3 DOWN BRINGS YOU GENUINE UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER

Standard Underwoods, factory rebuilt and guaranteed for FIVE YEARS. They look, write and wear like new. Latest models, perfect machines in every respect. See for yourself. Only $3.00 brings the machine. Try it ten days at our expense. Get all the facts now. Big illustrated typewriter book and bargain offer FREE. Write today.

Actual reproduction of Shipman-Ward Rebuilt Underwood.

Shipman-Ward Mfg. Co.
Typewriter Emporium
A-204 Shipman Building, Montrose and Ravenswood Aves., Chicago

WE TEACH COMMERCIAL ART

Meyer Both Company, the largest Commercial Art Organization in the World, offers you an unusual opportunity for practical training. If you like to draw develop your talent. Study this practical course—taught by this nationally known organization with twenty-two years success—who each year produces and sells to advertisers over 15,000 commercial drawings. Who else could give you so wide an experience. Meyer Both instruction is the difference between successful fact and experimental theory. Commercial Art is a highly paid, intensely interesting profession, equally open to men and women. Home study instruction.

Get Facts Before You Enroll in any School.
Ask the Advertising Manager of the leading newspapers in your city, anywhere in the United States, Canada, England or Australia about the Meyer Both Company—let them tell you about us. Write for our illustrated book telling about the success of our students—for one-half the cost of mailing—four cents in stamps.

MEYER BOTH COMPANY
Department of Art Instruction
Michigan Ave. at 20th St., Dept. 22 Chicago, Ill.

NOTE—To Art and Engraving Firms: Secure practical Artists among our graduates. Write us.

—the ideal vacation land

SWIM, canoe, golf, hike or rest in luxurious ease midst the scenic beauties of the "playground of the continent." Excellent hotel accommodations at reasonable cost add to the pleasures of a vacation of health, sport and fun at any of Canada's wonder spots.

Dress UP or Rough It

Canada is a great vacation land. Interesting places, scenic woods and waters are found all through the land. Minaki, Great Lakes Cruise, Highlands of Ontario, Algonquin Park (2721 square miles, altitude, 2000 feet), Murray Bay, the Lower St. Lawrence. See Toronto the Queen City and the Thousand Islands. See the Capital City—Ottawa. See the "old world in the new" at Montreal and historic Quebec.

For Real Fishing, Hunting and Camping

Sportsmen and outdoor lovers will revel in virgin streams and big game country in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

Low Tourist Fares. Write for booklet 26—mentioning district that interests you. Address the nearest Canadian National Railways office listed below.

BOSTON, 294 Washington St.
BUFFALO, 1019 Chamber of Commerce Bldg.
CHICAGO, 108 West Adams St.
CINCINNATI, 406 Traction Bldg.
CLEVELAND, 522 Kirby Bldg.
DETROIT, 527 Majestic Bldg.
DULUTH, 430 West Superior St.
KANSAS CITY, 334 Railway Exchange Bldg.
LOS ANGELES, 503 So. Spring St.
MINNEAPOLIS, 518 2nd Ave. So.
NEW YORK, 1270 Broadway
PHILADELPHIA, 702 Finance Bldg.
PITTSBURGH, 505 Park Bldg.
PORTLAND, ME., Grand Trunk Station
SAN FRANCISCO, 689 Market St.
SEATTLE, 902 2nd Ave.
ST. LOUIS, 305 Merchants Laclede Bldg.
ST. PAUL, Cor. 4th and Jackson Sts.

Canada welcomes United States tourists. No passports required.

Canadian National Railways

TRAVEL COSMOPOLITAN WAY

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN SUMMER TOURS

Personally Conducted—All Expense—Moderate Cost

Europe— 8 Tours June, July. $745.00 up. Enjoyable and educational itineraries.
Yellowstone— Every two weeks July, August. Special itinerary in Park. Colorado included.
Eastern— Every week. One and two-week Tours. The best of the East.
Western— July, August. Wonderful trips featuring Canadian Rockies, etc.

Standard Pullman sleepers used exclusively.
Write for full particulars
THE COSMOPOLITAN TOURS COMPANY
15 Dixie Terminal Arcade, Cincinnati, O.
We handle hundreds of pleased clients every season

INVENTORS Desiring to secure patent should write for our book, "How To Get Your Patent." Send model or sketch of invention for opinion of patentable nature.
RANDOLPH & CO.
Dept. 33 - - - - - - - - - - Washington, D. C.

could have . . ." With an effort she regained her composure and declared firmly: "It must be a forgery."

"Why should it be a forgery? Why, if at the hour of his death Pam thought of me too, of my happiness—gave me wise counsel? Why should that be a forgery?"

"I . . . I don't know . . ." she murmured faintly, and sank down again, her eyes wavering before the keenness of his. "Only that I did not know about it—cannot think when he wrote . . . May I see it, Punch?"

"No. It is as sacredly private—as yours was."

She blenched again, leaning back, putting a handkerchief to her lips to cover their trembling. What did he know? What had Pam written? Oh—something had gone desperately askew with this meeting that should have ended in triumphant wonder! Why did fear creep like a snake round her heart? What was this terrible conviction growing in her that Punch knew? What was the meaning of the cold probing glance of his? She could not bear it. Something in the strong quiet of his eyes shook her. The specter of doubt that assailed her grew and grew, until it seemed to fill all the room, and she could stand the suspense no longer.

"Punch!" she cried, and by a supreme effort threw into her voice all the spells of which she was mistress. But he sat unmoved, holding her with that dispassionate gaze, drying on her lips the wild words that sprang to them. Hypnotized, she began instead to murmur incoherent things about leaving the country, reiterating her plans; but in the middle of a sentence the passion that had brought her to the slaying of a man's soul and body unleashed itself again:

"Punch! You must come home, too. You can't stay on out here, whilst I—"

"I am going home." The quiet, the evenness of his tone chilled her. "The old man has cabled asking me to come to Scawnshane. Says he wants to see me there before he dies."

"Oh—I am so glad!" Hope quivered in her again; joy lifted up its head. "Punch—if we could take the same boat—go by the East Coast!" The sensuous languor of her soul flowed from her lips in a voice like liquid silver. "Stay awhile in Egypt . . ."

"I'm afraid that is out of the question, Doria." He chose his words courteously but with deliberation, for there must be no further ambiguity. "I have already arranged to sail . . . with my wife . . . from the Cape."

It seemed to her afterwards when she was alone that years had passed, a nightmare of darkness, immeasurable distances through which she had heard his voice, calm, cousinly, giving grave details of his approaching marriage with Peril Kelly . . . that girl!

At last she arose and from sheer force of habit faltered across the room to a mirror on the wall. A conviction filled her that in the last hour her face had changed; and she was right. The face that stared back at her showed like a crumbled ruin behind its veil of paint; base passion and ignoble defeat had stamped it indelibly; never again might it stir the hearts of men, nor repudiate its forty-eight years of existence.

THE END

Taking the mystery out of cross-roads

WITH a RAND McNALLY Official Auto Trails Map you don't have to hesitate at cross-roads—and then guess at the right fork. All you do is follow the painted poles by the side of the highway. You know your route before you start, your turn before you come to it.

RAND McNALLY Official Auto Trails Maps are published in convenient, large-scale sections that cover all touring areas in the United States and parts of Canada. As well as showing automobile highways with their official trail markings, they contain valuable information about hotels, garages and routes through cities.

Plan your trip before you start. Then start with the necessary RAND McNALLY Official Auto Trails Map in your pocket. They cost only 35c each at bookstores, stationers, news-stands, drug stores and hotels.

RAND McNALLY & COMPANY
Map Headquarters
Dept. T-49
536 S. Clark Street, Chicago
42 E. 22nd Street, New York
Branches: Philadelphia Washington Boston Pittsburgh Cleveland Detroit St. Louis San Francisco Los Angeles

Send for our free booklet "The Blazed Trails"

Built to Master a Mountain-

It has conquered the nation's hills

Within twelve weeks of its announcement, the new Chandler, with its Pikes Peak motor, had given spectacular high-gear performances on many of the most feared hills in America.

The purpose of these exhibitions was to confirm as generally and widely as possible, the phenomenal capacity displayed by the new Chandler motor in its decisive mastery of Pikes Peak.

Today there is hardly a section of the land boasting hills of any consequence where the new Chandler is not clearly established as a matchless master of hills and a peerless performer in traffic.

One ride in the new Chandler will tell you why 1923 is developing into the greatest of Chandler years.

Touring Car $1395 Chummy Sedan $1695 Royal Dispatch $1695
F. O. B. Cleveland

THE CHANDLER MOTOR CAR CO. · CLEVELAND
Export Department, 1819 Broadway, New York. Cable Address "Chanmotor."

Pikes Peak First!

Then these nationally known hills

Portland, Ore. Hall St. Hill
Uniontown, Pa. Uniontown Hill
Lincoln, Nebr. 13th St. Hill
Des Moines, Ia. 28th St. Hill
San Francisco, Cal. Twin Peaks
Portland, Maine Deering Ave. Hill
Atlanta, Ga. Buena Vista Hill
Omaha, Nebr. Dewey Hill
Scranton, Pa. Dead Man's Curve
Birmingham, Ala. Eula St. Hill
Madison, Wis. Summit Hill
Denver, Colo. Lookout Mountain
Boston, Mass. Corey Hill
Duluth, Minn. Thompson Hill
St. Louis, Mo. Calvary Hill and 67 others!

NEW CHANDLER SIX

CRANE BEAUTY IN THE OPEN : CRANE QUALITY IN ALL HIDDEN FITTINGS

The world-wide use of Crane products under varying conditions for upwards of sixty-seven years, is an indication of the universal acceptance and approval of Crane standards of design and quality.

Since 1855, Crane engineers and designers have labored to promote the progress of the various industries and arts which Crane products serve. The Crane name on valves, fittings and piping specialties used in industrial installations, has become the mark of uniform and dependable quality.

This prestige extends to Crane sanitation and heating fixtures for the home. Meeting the needs of smaller dwellings, Crane equipment also satisfies the exacting requirements of great town and country houses, huge apartment buildings and luxurious hotels and clubs.

CRANE

GENERAL OFFICES: CRANE BUILDING, 836 S. MICHIGAN AVE., CHICAGO

Branches and Sales Offices in One Hundred and Thirty-five Cities
National Exhibit Rooms: Chicago, New York, Atlantic City
Works: Chicago, Bridgeport, Birmingham, Chattanooga and Trenton

CRANE, LIMITED, MONTREAL. CRANE-BENNETT, LTD., LONDON
CRANE EXPORT CORPORATION: NEW YORK, SAN FRANCISCO
CIE CRANE, PARIS

Globe Valve No. 1-B Radiator Valve No. 220

Education Plus

YEARS ago to choose a school was easy. It was either public school or Hobson's choice. Now with the age crying "step on it," schools of various types deserve consideration. Most of them have already had it in our earlier issues.

The military schools are next in order. They count up toward the hundred. Their military features qualify graduates for commission in the Officers Reserve Corps. They, like others, must rally to the colors whenever they are called.

WITH all good schools they share a common denominator. They have the same academic ideals, with a plus,—a method to develop thoroughness, orderliness, regularity, reliability, cheerfulness, self-confidence, willing obedience, and in consequence the power to command. The voluntary they convert into the involuntary, they turn haphazard into habit. Out of even the unpromising they make genuine Americans.

The military school is American. It is as truly of our soil as ever Lincoln was. It is an outgrowth of conditions here. Europe cannot match it. Our best private schools hark back to English models. Many colleges like to talk of Oxford and of Cambridge. A while ago our universities were importing German Ph.Ds., along with German methods.

PREPARING boys for college, military schools bring them to their best in body, mind and soul. The physical they regard as sacramental. Upbuilding a sound body in which the mind and soul may live they confirm the line:

"Nor soul helps flesh, now, more than flesh helps soul."

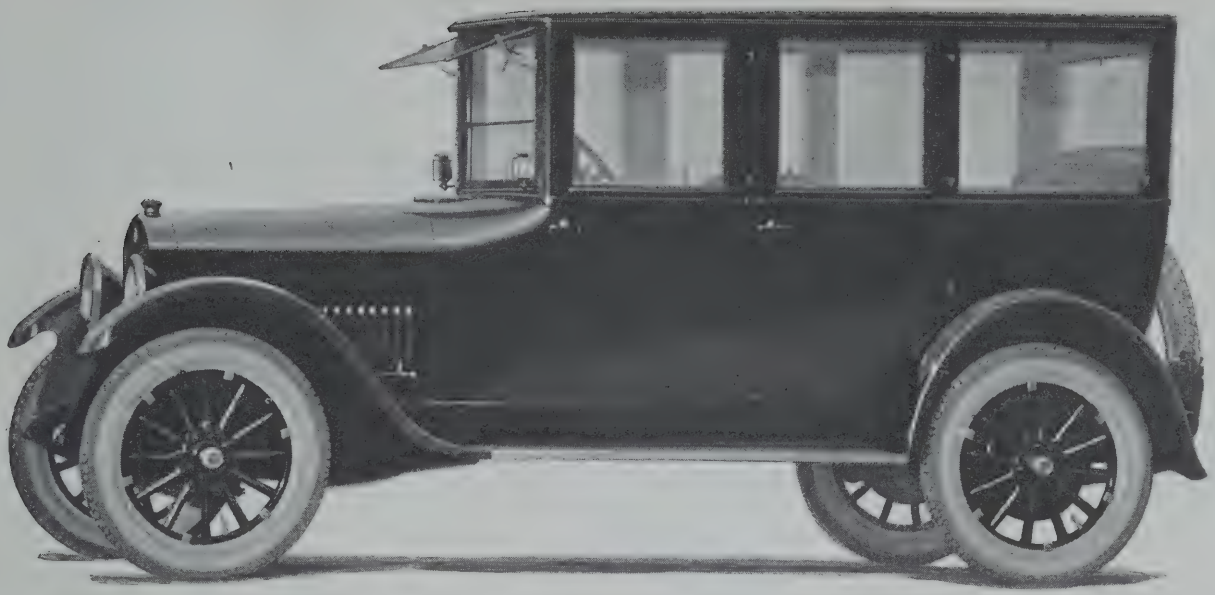
Young men escape the vagaries and upheavals of adolescence through a daily care which steadies the nerves, toughens the fibre, and establishes an equilibrium nothing ever shakes.

Nor is there in their classrooms any chance. The academic "will be served." Men get ready for college or for life. Between the military and non-military, no cleavage is or is to be. Both do work worth while. Those who think that military schools are mere reformatories would better think again. Those sure that they suppress individuality follow stars that light a desert way. Those suspicious lest our military schools may trifle with true education are playing hide and seek with actualities at a time when the Association is really concerned about the best and endeavoring to provide it.



BUT in all education worth the while, the training of the soul is the supreme purpose. Young people haunt us with their vague yearnings to be understood. Each has his own problem and to him it seems peculiar. Each is too shy or too inarticulate to explain it. How much we might do for them if we were only wise enough! But we are so busy playing the great game for money, power and fame, that most of us have lost our soul. Yet it is the soul young people want of us, the best we have for them.

The Association pledges every boy the soul of the good schools. In them the way is open into church. Conformity to convention is the normal course. Starting something new for the mere sake of change, boys never learn in them. One thing every boy is sure to learn,—when duty calls, in peace or war, to fight for home, for country, and for God. Such training, always democratic, adds the power to lead. One day in consequence we shall have a crop of leaders who will never know when they are beaten on any field of human service:

"Fight on, my men, says Sir
Andrew Barton,
I am hurt, but I am not slaine;
I'll lie me down and bleed a-while,
And then I'll rise and fight againe."

Lyman P. Powell

Director, Cosmopolitan Educational Department
119 West Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

STUDEBAKER

FOUR-DOOR SEDAN

THE well built car and the poorly constructed car look very much alike on the salesroom floor. Paint and varnish can cover a multitude of weaknesses in closed car construction.

But you can't ride on the paint.

The superior product begins to prove itself on the first day of use and strengthens its proof every day thereafter. At the end of a year the one car is ready to be traded in at a big depreciation. The Studebaker may not even need a fresh coat of paint.

In a Studebaker Sedan the quality is built into the job. The body will not begin to rattle or squeak after thousands of miles of hard usage. It will continue to be comfortable and easy riding and will present a fine appearance month after month as when new.

The mohair velvet plush upholstery will not be worn "shiny," the windows will still fit tightly and operate smoothly and the fittings will still be firmly in place even after thousands of miles of use.

There are closed cars that do not include heaters. Yet, you cannot be comfortable unless you are warm. Every Studebaker Sedan is completely equipped including a heater.

Studebaker's quantity production of cars of quality is responsible for the low price of this Sedan

STUDEBAKER

Detroit, Mich. South Bend, Ind. Walkerville, Ont.

Address All Correspondence to South Bend

MODELS AND PRICES—f. o. b. factories
LIGHT-SIX 5-Pass., 112" W. B., 40 H. P.	SPECIAL-SIX 5-Pass., 119" W. B., 50 H. P.	BIG-SIX 7-Pass., 126" W. B., 60 H. P.
Touring ..... $ 975	Touring $1275	Touring $1750
Roadster (3-Pass.) 975	Roadster (2-Pass.) 1250	Speedster (5-Pass.) 1835
Coupe-Roadster (2-Pass.) .. 1225	Coupe (4-Pass.) 1875	Coupe (5-Pass.) 2550
Sedan 1550	Sedan 2050	Sedan 2750

Prices Subject to Change Without Notice

Studebaker

THIS IS A STUDEBAKER YEAR

Cosmopolitan Educational Guide

SUMMER CAMPS FOR BOYS

Camp POK-O-MOONSHINE

ONE OF THE OLDEST AND BEST

For boys, in the Adirondacks, 18th Season. 30 counsellors. Five distinct sections, ages 8-10, 11-12 (two), 13-15, 16-18. Rate includes R. R. fares, laundry, hikes and two hours tutoring daily.
For catalogue address Dr. C. A. Robinson, Box C6, Peekskill, N. Y.

---

2 hours from N. Y. City HERE'S ONE, BOYS! 3 hours from Philadelphia

Among the pines where the Delaware River, Blue Ridge and Poconos unite to provide a location unrivaled for HEALTH, HAPPINESS, SAFETY and SPORT. New Bungalows, modern plumbing, camp's own string of horses, fleet of boats and canoes, camping trip outfits, large, well-kept athletic fields. Excellent food.

CAMP WYOMISSING

W. T. TRANSUE — NORTH WATER GAP, PA.

For boys who wish to know the Out-of-Doors, who want to learn how to do things and who desire an atmosphere of Good Sportsmanship.

ALL INCLUSIVE FEE — CATALOGUE — INSPECTION INVITED

CAMP MISHIKE "The Turtle"

A camp for boys in the deep woods, "beyond the end of the trail," near Winchester, in northern Wisconsin. Definite program of Forestry, Canoeing, Camping, Woodcraft, under direct supervision of practical foresters. An educational adventure for healthy boys with outdoor instincts. 1600 acres—4 miles of shore on 3 lakes. Booklet. Address
W. E. SANDERSON, Director, P. O. Box 555-C, Winchester, Wis.

On LAKE CHAMPLAIN

St. Ann's Camp (for Boys)

Conducted by the Marish Brothers. This ideal camp for city boys is located on Isle La Motte, Vermont. For particulars apply: St. Ann's Academy 153 E. 76th Street, New York City.

Camp Kawasawa Cumberland Bluffs, Lebanon, Tenn. A Summer Camp and School for boys, nine to eighteen years. Separate quarters for younger boys. Instruction in academic subjects, physical training and athletics. Camp fee $200, tuition included. Write for illustrated catalog. H. B. MOORE, Director.
St. Matthews, Ky.

Are you looking for a special type of camp? Let Cosmopolitan advise you.

CAMP JOLEF

Where boys have a summer they will never forget.
Three units according to age, each intelligently directed.
For Illustrated Booklet address
Director Physical Education
Board of Education, Olean, N. Y.
WAYNE, ME.

Wilderness
Camp For Boys

Mounted Unit—a new idea for a boy's summer. Horseback touring of Adirondack Mountains. Each boy will have a horse—his for the summer. Instructors and Doctor accompanying. Rate $275. (For Younger Boys)—Ground Camp of unusual activities on Horseshoe Lake. Rate $200. Catalog. Address RAYMOND RIORDON, at Highland, N. Y. until June 20. Later address Horseshoe, N. Y.

Maplewood Modified Camp

For boys under 15 yrs. 61st yr. Near Phila. Tent life optional. All sports carefully supervised. Good food. Location beautiful, elevated and healthful. Terms moderate. Fall term opens Sept. 20th.
Box 29, Chester Heights, Pa. J. C. SHORTLIDGE, Prin.

Kyle Camp For Boys, 6 to 16, Catskill Mountains. Bungalows only — no damp tents. All land and water sports. Physician and nurse. Your boy's health and diversion well looked after. Saddle horses and ponies. Movies. 36 buildings. 43 years with boys.
DR. PAUL KYLE, Kyle School for Boys since 1890.
Box 504, Irvington-on-Hudson, New York.

Camp Terra Alta

Directed by Commandant of Staunton Military Academy

On Lake Terra Alta, main line B. & O. R.R., 130 miles S. E. of Pittsburgh. Elevation 2800 ft. $20,000 equipment. Athletic and water sports, bowling, billiards, wireless, hikes. Physical drill and target practice. Tutoring. Music. $200. Booklet. Until June 5th address The Commandant, Box 451-A, Staunton, Va. After June 5th, Terra Alta, W. Va.

CAMP WEKUSHTON For Boys, 10 to 18. In Walkill Valley, Ulster Co., New York. Baseball, Basketball, Aquatics, Tennis, Track Athletics; Dramatics, Educational. Rates $100 season, 10 weeks. Write for illustrated circular.
JOHN F. RUSSELL.
132 Quincy St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Olympic Camp—

Summer Camp for boys, 8 to 17 inclusive. Located near Port Huron, on Lake Huron, Mich., 315 acres. Tutoring for those who wish it. Radio, Horseback. For catalog address FRED SEFTON, University of Akron, Akron, Ohio.

Camp Algonquin Asquam Lake, N. H. In the foothills of the White Mountains. Oldest existing boys' camp. For boys who love nature and a wholesome, active, outdoor life. The camp builds and strengthens the character, the body and the mind. 38th year. Circular. EDWIN DEMERITTE, Director.
1404 Raleigh Ave., Norfolk, Virginia.

TOSEBO CAMP

MANISTEE, MICH. 12th year

The Summer Camp that is different. Send for interesting booklet. Address Noble Hill, Todd Seminary for Boys, Box D2, Woodstock, Ill.

Are you looking for a special type of camp? Let Cosmopolitan advise you.

CAMP KINAPIK

The Wooderaft Camp for Boys from 6-16. On Kezar Lake, Maine. Endorsed by Ernest Thompson Seton. For illustrated booklet address
HARVEY C. WENT, Director.
Bridgeport, Conn.

Cosmopolitan recommends the camps listed on these pages.

Camp Idlewild

33rd year

LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE, N. H.

Where a boy lives on a regular Robinson Crusoe island. Exploring, Trail Making, Aquaplaning with Speed Boat, Swimming, Sailing, Canoeing, Radio, Land and Water Baseball, Tennis, Rifle, Life Saving and Boy Scout activities. Long canoe and mountain trips included in tuition. Good food in abundance. "Ice Cream twice a day." Experienced councilors. Separate camps for Juniors and Seniors. Complete equipment for health and comfort. Illustrated booklet.
L. D. Roys, 4 Bowdoin St., Cambridge, Mass.
Teela-Wooket, "The Horseback Camps" for Girls, Roxbury, Vt.

KAHKOU CANOE TOURS

(Established 1893)

Two hundred miles through the Maine Woods, and down the famous Allagash River. For full particulars write
S. K. HOOPER.
Morristown, New Jersey.

For Boys CAMP MIAMI

Directed outdoor life along the Big Miami River. All the activities and sports a boy likes. Instruction under experienced faculty. Booklet

COL. ORVON GRAFF BROWN, President
Box 23, Germantown, Ohio

Under direction of Miami Military Institute

SUMMER CAMPS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

MONTESSORI CAMP, Children 3 to 12 years. Wyeombe, Pa. 70 miles from New York. Ten years' experience in Scientific Direction. Specialists only. References exchanged, reservations limited. Rate $200. ANNA WINDLE PAIST, Directress.
Montessori First Boarding and Day School
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

KENTHOPE WEST CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA

High location, 25 miles from Philadelphia. A summer home with mother care for little folks, 5-12. Simple, farm-home life and activities. Fresh eggs, vegetables, tested milk. Free riding, tennis, swimming, wading, spacious playgrounds. Supervised play and sports. May 1st to Oct. 1st
MRS. ANNE KAY HUMPHREY, Kenthope, West Chester, Pa.

Mills Adirondack Camp, Schroon River, Chestertown. Summer School of Classic Dancing. Pine Groves. Sports. Swimming. Canoeing. Resident physician. Mother's care. Counselor's. Recreation and dining cottages. Floored tents. Girls—5-20 years. Boys, midgets, juniors. DR. and MRS. W. HOUGH MILLS, 926 W. Genesee St., Syracuse, N. Y.

Why not send your boy or girl to one of the good camps described in Cosmopolitan? They are worth while.

CAMPS FOR GIRLS

CAMP MINNE-WAWA for GIRLS

Adirondack Mountains,
Pine Lake,
CLEMONS, N. Y.

Riding Featured. Athletics, Dancing, Aquatics, Dramatics, Pageant given every summer. Hikes, Ticonderoga, Ausable Chasm, Canoe Trips, Lake Champlain and Lake George. Arts and Crafts. Three Directors. Specialists taking active part in camp work.
Ages 8-18. Councillor Staff Completed. Camp fee $300
Address CHRISTINE DOBBINS,
Inspector of Athletics, Public Schools,
606 WEST 116th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Ask Cosmopolitan to assist you in locating any school or college you desire.

THE TALL PINES CAMP

A summer fairyland for girls 7 to 18. Secluded among tall, fragrant pines near Bennington, N. H., with a beautiful, clear lake and its sandy beach for its front door. 1300 ft. elevation. Horseback riding, mountain climbing, water sports, arts and crafts. Every camp comfort with good living. The Club (separate) for older girls, college age and those employed, receives girls for shorter outings—one week or longer. All the camp privileges. State whether Camp or Club booklet is wanted. Address

MISS EVELINA REAVELEY
36-D, Washington Square Gloucester, Mass.

Sargent Camps

FOR GIRLS PETERBORO, N. H.

Promotes a healthy, happy, useful life. Skilled leaders. Unexcelled equipment and care. Water sports, hiking, riding, tennis, dramatics, handicrafts.

JUNIOR CAMP. 8 to 15.
SENIOR CAMP. 15 to 20.
CAMP CLUB. A distinct unit for girls over twenty. All modern improvements. Campers accepted for two weeks or more. June to September inclusive.

For illustrated booklet address

Camp Secretary, 8 Everett St., Cambridge, Mass.

Nanwall, A Riding Camp for Girls. 160 acres of Maine woods and hills. Specializing horseback riding. Daily rides for every camper with special riding trips Swimming, handcraft, nature study. Storm-proof lodges —No tents. Vegetables, milk, home-made butter, eggs from our farm. Fixed fee including riding, no extras. MRS. NINA H. ARMSTRONG, Camp Director, 205 Washington Ave., Bridgeport, Ct.

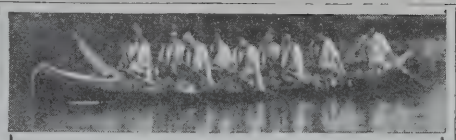
Wanakena Camp, Lake George, N. Y. For Girls, where "Everyone happily occupied and safe" is the ideal. Field and water sports, motor-boating, aquaplaning, riding, dancing, handicrafts. Fine Radio outfit. Experienced councilors, trained nurse. Booklet. MRS. R. B. BONTECOU, Pilot Knob-on-Lake George, N. Y. Address until May 15th, 10 Myrtle Terrace, Springfield, Mass.

Pine Tree Camp for Girls. On beautiful Naomi Lake 2,000 feet above sea, in pine-laden air of Pocono Mountains. Four hours from New York and Philadelphia. Experienced councilors. Horseback riding, tennis, baseball, canoeing, "hikes." Handicrafts, gardening. 12th year. MISS BLANCHE D. PRICE.
404 W. School Lane, Philadelphia, Pa.

Camp Owaissa MONTEREY, MASS.
On Lake Garfield, in the Berkshires. For Girls. 9th Season. Beautiful Lodge, 3 verandas overhanging lake. Electric light, running water. Bungalows. Swimming, Canoeing, Horseback, Handcraft. All Athletics. $300 Season. 612 W. 178th St., New York City. (MRS.) ELLEN C. OLIVER.

Wetomachek Camps for Girls Powers Lake, Wisconsin. Under the management of The Chicago Normal School of Physical Education. Junior and Senior Camps. July and August. For girls ages 9 to 22. A strong force of trained counselors. References required. Write for booklet. REGISTRAR.
Dept. C, 5026 Greenwood Ave., Chicago, Illinois.

For Girls under 20 Roxbury Vermont



"THE HORSEBACK CAMPS"

Teela-Wooket, a 300-acre wonderland in the heart of the Green Mountains, is famous for its fine saddle horses, free riding and thorough instruction in horsemanship. Separate Junior and Senior camps, with athletic fields, clay tennis courts, private pond, bungalows, hot and cold showers. Excellent food in abundance. Enthusiastic, responsible counselors. 11th season.

Camp Idlewild for the Brothers, Lake Winnepesaukee, N. H.
Illustrated Booklets
Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Roys, 10 Bowdoin St., Cambridge, Mass.

TRAVEL SCHOOLS

Travel School Unusual educational and cultural advantages offered by this exclusive American School. Its popularity will necessitate early closing of the list for the 1923-24 group. Fall in New York, Winter in Florida and Spring in Washington, D. C. Address Miss M. A. ZUEHORST, c/o Cosmopolitan School Bureau, New York, N. Y.

Camp Assawaghkemeck

A camp for girls where nature is at her loveliest. Two hours from New York, in Shawangunk Mountains, near Middletown. Here are lofty peaks, deep chasms, waterfalls and pine-covered islands in a gem lake. Girls swim, canoe, climb, follow woodland trails, study nature and ride horseback. Arts and crafts. Catholic, conducted by the Ursuline Sisters, of Ursuline Academy. For booklet address Ursuline Sisters, Box C, Middletown, N. Y.

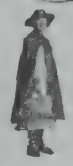
POTTAWOTTAMIE

A Camp for Girls



On a private island in beautiful Gull Lake, Mich. Swimming, canoeing, sailing, gymnastics, games, nature and folk dancing, basketry, nature study. Girl Scout course. Splendid equipment, expert instructors. Under auspices of Battle Creek Sanitarium. Rates moderate. Address Dean for illustrated announcement.

Kellogg School of Physical Education
Box 430, Battle Creek, Michigan

(Battle Creek Sanitarium—Home of School)

SCHOOL OF NURSING

Practical three-year course in highly ethical institution; largest of its kind in the world. All branches of modern nursing covered in curriculum; unexcelled facilities; large faculty; pleasant, interesting atmosphere; attractive dormitories. High School graduates preferred. Spring and summer classes now forming. For book address Sanitarium School of Nursing
Box 102, Battle Creek, Michigan

Serve Humanity by learning Nursing Profession. Excellent salaries for OUR graduates with more demand than we can supply. You are paid while you study at this STATE ACCREDITED school. H. S. Ed. desirable. Enjoyable school life. Catalog.
Dept. C, SUPT. OF NURSES, Hahnemann Hospital, Chicago.

Douglas Park Maternity Hospital
Training school for Nurses, short course in obstetrics to beginners or Post-graduates. Or affiliated 2-year General course. Liberal allowance, room, board, washing.
1900 S. Kedzie Ave., Chicago, Illinois.

Training School for Nurses Michael Reese Hospital. Accredited 3-year course. Entrance Requirements; Physical fitness, 4 years' High School or its equivalent. Textbooks, uniforms, room, board and monthly allowance during training. Student Loan Fund. Write to Dept. 101, Chicago, Ill. MICHAEL REESE HOSPITAL.

CONSERVATORIES OF MUSIC

Kenneth M. Bradley
Pres. and Director

Bush Conservatory
CHICAGO

Edgar Nelson
Vice-Pres.
E. H. Schwenker
Secy.

An Institution of National Prominence

Accredited courses leading to Certificate, Diploma and Degrees in

EXPRESSION OPERA MUSIC LANGUAGES DANCING

Unsurpassed faculty of more than 80 instructors, including many world renowned artists. Special courses for teachers and soloists leading to the Free Master School

Only Conservatory in Chicago maintaining extensive Student Dormitories with exclusive use of buildings

Fall term begins Sept. 10. Dormitory reservations now. For illustrated catalog describing this great institution and its many advantages, address

C. M. JONES, Registrar. 839 North Dearborn Street, CHICAGO

Cincinnati Conservatory of Music

57th YEAR with SUMMER SESSION
INCORPORATED

Located in a city of noteworthy musical achievements, the Cincinnati Conservatory has through its artist faculty of international reputation developed an atmosphere which gives unusual inspiration to the student. Every branch of Musical Education is Provided. Public School Music course accredited by the State. Degrees awarded to qualified students. Dormitories and auditorium on the beautiful campus.

OVER HALF A CENTURY IN THE FRONT RANK OF AMERICAN MUSIC SCHOOLS

Send for catalog and terms to MISS BERTHA BAUR, Directress Oak Street, Cincinnati

CONWAY MILITARY BAND SCHOOL

Develops not merely "performers," but true artists. Instruction on two instruments; teachers of national renown. Conducting and band arrangements part of course. Orchestra practice in large Conservatory orchestra. Daily band rehearsals under Patrick Conway. Dormitories. Associated with Ithaca Conservatory of Music. Address

THE CONWAY MILITARY BAND SCHOOL
602 De Witt Park, Ithaca, New York

American Conservatory
Chicago's foremost School of Music and Dramatic Art. 37th season. Master Summer School June 25 to July 28. Dormitory accommodations. Apply for free catalog. Address JOHN J. HATTSTAEDT, Pres., 550 Kimball Hall, Chicago, Illinois.

Institute of Musical Art of the city of New York. Conducted only for students of real musical ability and serious purposes. Preparatory centers in all parts of Greater New York. Address FRANK DAMROSCH, Director.
120 Claremont Ave., cor. 122nd St., New York City.

New York School of Music and Arts
All branches of music. Day and boarding pupils.
RALFE LEECH STERNER, Director.
150 Riverside Drive, New York City, N. Y.

Combs Conservatory of Music 38th year. Individual Instruction. Normal Training Course for Teachers. Public School Music Supervision. 4 Pupils' Recitals a week. Daily Supervision. Technic Classes. 2 Pupils' Symphony Orchestras. Dormitories for Women. Degrees Conferred. 1319 S. Broad St., Philadelphia, Pa. G. R. COMBS, Director.

LAWRENCE CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC
All branches of Music, Expression, Art. Enjoys the intellectual and social advantages of Lawrence College. Superior Public School Music Course. Dormitories. Send for catalogue. CARL J. WATERMAN, Dean.
Box C, Appleton, Wisconsin.

Lyceum Arts Conservatory (Inc.)
All branches of Music and Dramatic Art. Summer Normal School 6 weeks, June 18—July 28. Write for free catalog. Studios, Theater and Dormitories in our own building, ideally located in the heart of the North Side Art Center. 1160 N. Dearborn St., Dept. 45, Chicago, Ill.

ITHACA CONSERVATORY of MUSIC

No. 2
De Witt Park
Ithaca, N. Y.

All instruments. Vocal, Dramatic Art, Physical Training. All graduates eligible to teach in N. Y. State Public Schools. Special advantages in concert work. Master Courses with world-famous artists in all departments. Ten buildings, including Dormitories, Auditorium, Gymnasium, Studio and Administration Buildings. Year Book sent on request. The popular and inspirational Summer School Courses begin July 2nd. Fall term opens September 20th.

In writing Cosmopolitan give tuition, location and kind of school desired.

Suffield

A School for Boys

THOROUGH training of brain, body, and morals. Attractive New England town, 3½ hours from New York City. Complete equipment, modern buildings, gymnasium and athletic fields. Strong athletics. Active Y. M. C. A. Thorough preparation for college and scientific schools. Comprehensive commmercial course preparing for business. Intimate advisory care of each boy. 90th year. Separate department for young boys. House mother.

Chief Justice William H. Taft says:

"I congratulate you on the honored tradition which surrounds this school. More and more we are making our preparatory schools into communities like those English schools, Manchester, Rugby, Eton, where the boys are given the ideas of manliness, straightforwardness, decency of life. That is what you have cultivated here at Suffield."

Extract from Speech to Suffield Alumni.

HOBART G. TRUESDELL, A.M., Pd.D., Principal

11 Main Street Suffield, Conn.

KISKI

A SCHOOL for BOYS

KISKIMINETAS Springs School, affectionately known as KISKI, permits the boys to grow up out-of-doors. 200 acres of wooded highland overlooking river. Special preparation for college or technical schools. University certificate privileges. Individual attention through preceptorial system; outdoor sports under competent instructors. Fine moral tone throughout school. Several football and baseball fields. Tennis. Excellent 9-hole golf course. Gymnasium. Swimming pool. Bowling alleys. Rate $900.

For catalog, address Box 814.

DR. A. W. WILSON, JR.
President,
SALTSBURG, PA.

New Mexico Military Institute

In the Sunshine State

A school of distinction offering exceptional high school and junior college work under the most favorable conditions. Balanced program of academic, military and physical training. All sports, including polo and swimming. R.O.T.C. Altitude 3700 feet. Outdoor life the year round. Bracing air, dry climate. A cavalry school. Every boy rides. Moderate rates.

COL. J. C. TROUTMAN, Supt., Box E, Roswell, New Mexico

Blair Academy

Clinton Hall Recitation Building

The BLAIR spirit is an inspiration to the real boy to profit by the advantages of the liberal endowment, the thorough equipment, imposing buildings and the beautiful location in the hill country.

The boys join with the Headmaster and Faculty in maintaining the high standard of scholarship and morality, true democracy, personal responsibility and manliness.

Lower School for boys eleven to fourteen years of age.

The catalogue is a help, but to be appreciated, Blair must be seen. Visitors always welcome.

JOHN C. SHARPE, LL. D., Headmaster
Box C Blairstown, New Jersey

Hitchcock Military Academy

18 miles from San Francisco. Everything to make your boy staunch, sturdy American. All year round outdoor life. Splendid equipment. Experienced instructors. Academy fully accredited by Colleges. Indoor rifle range. Physical Culture, Football, Tennis, etc. Swimming Pool. High Morals. Thorough training of mind, body and character. Separate room for every pupil. Juniors in separate building. 46th year opens first Wednesday in September. Write for illustrated catalog to REX C. SHERER, President, San Rafael, Calif.

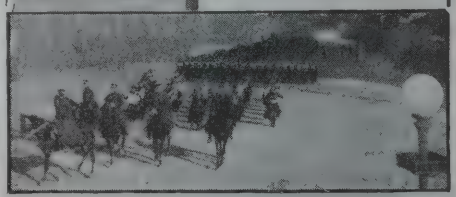
CULVER

MILITARY ACADEMY



Where boys learn to be intelligent, strong, straightforward, honorable. 83% of Culver men enter college. Strong business courses. Plenty of work and play is each day's routine at Culver. A great variety of sports gives each boy a chance to excel. Culver has a $2,000,000 equipment. For catalog address

The Adjutant's Aide
CULVER, Ind.

POWDER POINT SCHOOL

Will understand your boy and help him to understand himself. Address HEADMASTER.

71 King Caesar Road, Duxbury, Mass.

Williston — A progressive school with eighty years of solid achievement behind it. Thorough preparation for all colleges. Junior School for Young Boys. A distinct school in its own building; separate faculty. Address

ARCHIBALD V. GALBRAITH, Principal.
Box F, Easthampton, Mass.

IRVING SCHOOL for Boys

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, N. Y.

25 miles from New York, in the beautiful, historic "Irving" country. 86th year. 31 years under present Head Master. Extensive grounds. Modern and complete equipment. Prepares for all colleges and technical schools. Equipment includes Athletic Field, Gymnasium and Swimming Pool. Address

J. M. FURMAN, L.H.D., Head Master, Box 915

THE McORMOND SUMMER SCHOOL, Simsbury, Conn.

Intensive training for all college entrance examinations and make-up work in secondary schools. Subjects thoroughly taught. Expert tutors. All the equipment of Westminster School, including recreation facilities.

RAYMOND R. McORMOND, A.B., Director, Simsbury, Conn.

COOK ACADEMY

A boys' school in the healthful Finger Lake region. Under Christian influence. Prepares for college or business. All athletics. Swimming pool. 50th year. For catalog address PRINCIPAL,

Box C, Montour Falls, N. Y.

Main Building

Franklin & Marshall Academy

Box 420, LANCASTER, PA. Founded 1787

Prepares boys for all colleges and technical schools. Entered about 1000 boys to some 60 colleges in the last 25 years. Beautiful elevated grounds. Fine school home. Modern equipment. Thorough work. All student activities. Terms moderate. Catalog.

EDWIN M. HARTMAN, A.M., Pd.D., Principal

The PRINCETON TUTORING SCHOOL

College preparatory. Distinctive methods. Not a cramming School. Masters—University Specialists of ability with successful experience.

Send for booklet giving information of courses.

JOHN G. HUN, Headmaster.
"Edgehill" Princeton, N. J.

PAGE

Military Academy

A big school for little boys

A school whose military system is modified to meet the needs of growing boys. Thoroughness in primary and grammar grade work goes hand in hand with military training to inculcate orderliness, promptitude and obedience. Page will give your boy the right start toward earnest, successful manhood. The high, healthful location between city and ocean affords a beautiful home in a matchless climate.

You should have the latest Page catalog. Address

ROBERT A. GIBBS, Headmaster
Route 7, Box 944,
Los Angeles, California

WORCESTER ACADEMY

WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS

FOR BOYS OF ABILITY WITH COLLEGE VISION

The school you have been looking for is listed in this number.

PENNSYLVANIA
Military College

During the past one hundred and two years thousands of young men have learned here the meaning of honor, thoroughness and discipline.

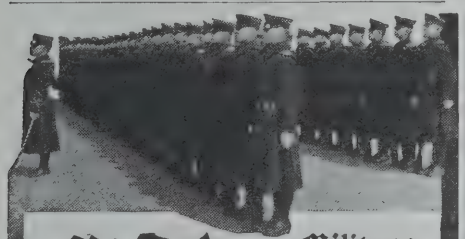
Civil Engineering, Chemistry, Commerce and Finance. Preparatory school for younger boys.

COL. CHARLES E. HYATT
Box 124 Chester, Pa.

KOHUT A Boarding School for younger boys, emphasizing character building, sound scholarship, physical development. 15th year. On Post Road, 22 miles from N. Y. City. Address H. J. Kugel, Prin., Harrison (Westchester Co.), New York.

Mohegan Lake School (Military) Thorough preparation for College, Technical School or Business, with certificate privileges. Average number of pupils to a class, 8. Healthful location on Mohegan Lake. Physical training and Athletics under professional direction. A. E. LINDER, A.M., Prin. Box 57, Mohegan Lake, Westchester County, New York.

Wenonah Military Academy



12 miles from Philadelphia. Well chosen teaching staff prepares for college or business. Special School for Juniors.
Clayton A. Snyder, Supt. C. Meade Lorence, Com.
Box 403, Wenonah, New Jersey

Roosevelt Military Academy

Perpetuates the vigorous ideals and robust Americanism of Theodore Roosevelt. Strong outdoor life; progressive curriculum. Fits boys for leadership. Senior and Junior Schools. Fall Term September 26th. Catalog. John C. Carrington, Headmaster, West Englewood, N. J

Rutgers Preparatory School 157th year. Invest for your boy in a school where the men understand boys, and where school morale favors success. Strong athletics. Refined life. Prepares for best colleges. Your boy's age and aim? Write for catalogue to
C. M. Hays, Registrar, New Brunswick, N. J.

Freehold Military School For 80 select young boys. Just enough of the Military training to inculcate habits of obedience, promptness, orderliness and self-reliance. Study and play carefully supervised. N. Y., 42 miles; Phila., 66 miles. "The school with the personal touch."
Box 64, Freehold, N. J. MAJOR CHARLES M. DUNCAN.

St. John's Military Academy
EPISCOPAL THE AMERICAN RUGBY

Look carefully at the above picture. Note all the details. Compare it with others. Ask your military friends to criticize it. It is a snapshot of one of the six cadet companies at St. John's. It is a group of lads who have placed themselves in harmony with the St. John's system and who are reaping their reward in erect, sturdy bodies, and alert, wide-awake minds. It is visual evidence of that thoroughness which marks St. John's training in all departments. St. John's training is man training; it is comprehensive; and along with mind and body, it develops character. Summer Tutoring School.
Send for catalog. Address

ST. JOHN'S MILITARY ACADEMY
Box 2F, Delafield, Waukesha Co., Wis.

The Candler Floating School

School Term: Sept. 15, 1923 to June 10, 1924

S. S. Candler
13,500 Tons Displacement
465.5 feet long
49 feet wide

A Great Educational Institution Having The Entire World For Its Laboratory

A permanent school along lines of remarkable magnitude. Exceptional opportunity afforded young men to gain, from actual observation as an integral part of their regular studies, an intimate knowledge of the social and economic conditions of contemporary civilizations and the world's present and past learning, culture and history. The school year embraces nine months' world travel and study under a faculty of noted men from leading American institutions. All interior excursions and visits to museums, libraries, palaces, cathedrals, etc., made in small groups under direction of faculty members. Classes include last two years of high school and first two years of liberal arts college.

Oil-burning ship, elaborately remodeled with every convenience for study, recreation, health and safety. Free services to students of school physicians, surgeons, trained nurses, and dentists. Crew entirely separate from student body. Closest attention to moral environment and welfare. Strictly select and limited enrollment. Write for descriptive catalog.

CANDLER FLOATING SCHOOL COMPANY, 1131-A Candler Bldg., ATLANTA, GA.

Kingsley School In beautiful hill country, free from city and town distractions. Prepares boys for leading colleges. Academic and commercial courses. Diploma granted. Public speaking. Upper and lower schools. For catalog address HEADMASTER.
Box C, Essex Fells, N. J.

BINGHAM MILITARY SCHOOL
ASHEVILLE, N. C.

Founded 1793. Removed in 1891 from Mebane, N. C. to the world-famous climate of Asheville. Since this removal, 40 states and several foreign countries have been represented in its area of patronage. Careful, thorough training by experienced teachers. R. O. T. C. Unit. All athletics. Lower School for boys 10 to 14. Address Box C.

COL. R. BINGHAM, Supt. Emeritus
COL. S. R. McKEE, Superintendent

ST. JOHN'S SCHOOL
Ossining-on-Hudson, N. Y.

For manly boys. Thorough preparation for college and business. Military training. High standard academic work. Individual instruction, small classes. Physical Culture and Athletics. Gymnasium and Drill Hall, Swimming Pool, Athletic Field. Junior Hall, a separate school for boys under thirteen. Write for catalog.
William Addison Ranney, A.M., Principal

YOUR SON

GIVE your son the self-reliance founded on good education—good physique—good discipline.

This Academy combines with thorough education, wholesome military training—an ideal foundation for good citizenship. Splendid location, modern buildings, supervised athletics and study. Commercial courses, manual training. College Preparatory and Junior Schools.

Illustrated catalog will be sent upon request

New York Military Academy
CORNWALL-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK
Brig.-Gen. MILTON F. DAVIS, U.S.A., Supt.

The SWAVELY School
In the National Capital, most interesting city in the world

Offers thorough college preparation for boys. For 19 years our graduates have been making excellent records in leading colleges. Conducted on cottage plan, boys and masters live together. Gymnasium. Indoor and outdoor athletics and activities fostered. Situated three miles from White House. For catalog, address E. Swavely, Headmaster, 4104 Connecticut Ave. Washington, D. C.

WENTWORTH
MILITARY ACADEMY
Lexington, Mo., 43 Miles from Kansas City

Oldest Military School west of the Mississippi River. High School Department affords thorough preparation for College, Government Academies, or Business. Junior College Department affords two years of regular college work. Separate Grade School for younger boys. Government Supervision R. O. T. C.

Fifty-acre Campus. Largest Gymnasium in Missouri. Indoor Swimming Pool with heated and filtered water. Every facility for interesting and developing, in body, mind and character, the American growing boy. For catalog, with full particulars, address

COL. SANDFORD SELLERS, Superintendent
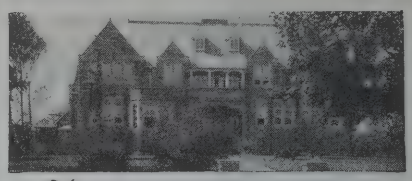
Box 181, Washington Avenue Lexington, Missouri

There is one school best adapted to you. Why not ask Cosmopolitan.



CULVER is for the boy who is up and doing all the time. In the Woodcraft School he gets out into the woods, eating around camp fires, traveling by canoe and trail. The older fellows learn seamanship, sailing naval cutters, or get the fine points of horsemanship on Culver's famous horses. Even flying is taught at Culver. Culver boys live man-fashion life. They must be self-reliant and quick thinking. Every sport and activity a fellow wants in the summer. Write for the catalog of school that interests you most.

Address: THE ADJUTANT, Culver, Indiana on Lake Maxinkuckee

CULVER SUMMER SCHOOLS

Naval Woodcraft Cavalry Aviation
On Lake Maxinkuckee

Swarthmore Preparatory School

Nationally known boy's school with man-making mission. Fine academic and athletic spirit. Prepares for college or life's work. Spacious grounds in college town. Athletic fields, gymnasium, swimming pool, modern buildings. Junior Department for boys 10 to 14 years.

W. P. TOMLINSON, Headmaster
Box 4, Swarthmore, Pa.

GEORGIA MILITARY ACADEMY

The South's Most Splendidly Equipped and Highly Standardized Prep School

Near Atlanta, about 1200 feet elevation, in the foothills of Blue Ridge Mountains. Highest standards of scholarship and discipline. Cadets live in homes with the officers and their families. Thorough preparation for College, Government Academies, Schools of Engineering, and business life.

RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS

Open eleven months in the year—nine months regular session, two months in Camp Highland Lake, July and August. Address COL. J. C. WOODWARD, College Park, Ga.

MANLIUS

SAINT JOHN'S SCHOOL, MANLIUS
College Preparatory

Among the hills. 11 miles from Syracuse. Elaborate equipment. A happy school life, with well-ordered recreation and athletics. Essentially a college preparatory school. Graduates now attending 51 colleges. Military feature secures precision and promptitude. Business course. Also Junior School for boys 10 to 14. 35 years under present management. Catalog. Address

General William Verbeck
President
Box 16, Manlius
N. Y.

THE CASCADILLA SCHOOLS

College Prep. Boarding School for Boys. Est. 1870

Wait Hall and Upper House

A school specializing in College or University preparation. Stands for sound academic training, true physical development, Self-reliant manhood. Boys in small classes receive individual attention from specialist instructors. Recreation building and athletic field on Lake Cayuga. Complete navy outfit. Winning crews and teams result from superior facilities and a fine school spirit. Graduates certified to higher institutions admitting on certificate. Special Tutoring School. October-July. Under experienced teachers. Send for catalogs.

F.B. Chamberlin, Director, Box 102. Ithaca, N. Y.

MIAMI

MILITARY INSTITUTE

Thorough preparation for college or business life. Special attention to the physical development of boys. Military training for healthful bodies and for mental discipline. In country surroundings with a big city's advantages near. Gymnasium and all out-door athletic sports. Rates conservative. 38th year. For booklets address the president.

Box 231, Germantown, O.
near Dayton

Recreational Camp—July and August
Write for booklet

Bellefonte Academy 118th year. Amidst hunting grounds and fishing streams. 11 teachers for 100 select boys. Strong athletic teams. Tennis courts. ¼ mile track. Concrete pool and skating pond 323 feet long. Illustrated catalog.
JAMES S. HUGHES, A.M., Princeton '85, Headmaster.
Bellefonte, Pa.

Gettysburg Academy A finely equipped boarding school for 100 boys. Modern, homelike buildings. Beautiful and healthful location near the mountains. Ath. field. All sports. New swimming pool. Separate Junior Dormitory. $375 to $450. 97th year. CHARLES H. HUBER, Litt.D., Box C, Gettysburg, Pennsylvania. Headmaster.

Nazareth Hall Military Academy
Box 10, Nazareth, Pa. Founded 1743. College preparatory and business courses. Senior, Intermediate and Junior Departments. Gymnasium and Swimming pool. All outdoor sports. Minimum age of Junior Dept., 9 years. Address the REV. A. D. THAELER, D.D., Principal.

KEYSTONE ACADEMY 1868-1923
A thorough four year preparation for College under influences which instill character, self-reliance, and self-control. Situated in the mountainous section near Scranton. Modern equipped gymnasium, all outdoor sports. Moderate rates. For catalogue and information, Box E, Factoryville, Pa. CURTIS E. COE, Principal.

Perkiomen School for Boys College Preparatory, Music, Business. All athletics. 20-acre campus. Scholarships. Development of Character and Training for Service our aim. Junior School for younger boys in separate cottage. Catalog. OSCAR S. KRIEBEL, D.D.
Box 106, Pennsburg, Pa.

Blackstone Military Academy College Preparatory and home school for boys in healthful Piedmont section of Virginia. Full Commercial courses. New fire-proof Administration Building. Barracks and complete Gymnasium ready by Fall. Tuition $525.00. For catalogue address COL. E. S. LIGON, President, Box A, Blackstone, Va.

Massanutten Academy Box I Woodstock, Va.
A preparatory school with teacher for every 10 boys. Military. In beautiful Shenandoah Valley, 100 miles from Washington. Modern equipment, new gymnasium. Athletics under trained director. Music. 25th year. $500.
HOWARD J. BENCHOFF, A.M., Pd.D., Headmaster.

KEMPER MILITARY SCHOOL

Est. 1844

HIGH SCHOOL AND JUNIOR COLLEGE

Develops the boy and trains him for leadership by a comprehensive system of athletic, military and general activities.

COL. T. A. JOHNSTON
Superintendent
712 Third Street
Boonville, Missouri

BORDENTOWN MILITARY INSTITUTE
Thorough preparation for college or business. Efficient faculty, small classes, individual attention. Boys taught how to study. Supervised athletics. 38th year. Catalogue.
COL. T. D. LANDON, Principal and Commandant,
Drawer C-5, Bordentown-on-the-Delaware, N. J.

St. Luke's School Wayne (Main Line of P.R.R.), Pa. The beautiful location, extensive grounds, patronage, experienced instruction, moral influence, make an unusual appeal to parents and boys. College or business preparation. Junior school for younger boys. Booklet. JESSE E. PHILIPS, A.M., Asso. Headmaster.
CHARLES HENRY STROUT, A.M., Headmaster.

Carson Long Institute 87th year. In the mountains, 5½ hours from New York and 6 hours from Pittsburgh. Boys taught how to learn, how to labor, how to live. College preparatory. Separate Junior School. Military training. Individual Instruction. Character Building Supreme. Terms, $400. Camp and Summer Session; rate, $165. Box A, New Bloomfield, Pa.

HARRISBURG ACADEMY
Senior and Junior departments. Modern, individual instruction in college preparatory and general courses. New fireproof buildings with large sunny rooms. Cottage dormitory system. Athletic field. Moderate rates.
ARTHUR E. BROWN, Headmaster, Box C. Harrisburg, Pa.

Lake Forest ACADEMY FOR BOYS

NON-MILITARY

Exclusively College Preparatory—diploma admits to ALL certificate universities. Direct preparation for Yale, Princeton, Harvard, etc. 66th year. Honor Ideals. On Lake Michigan, one hour north of Chicago. Modern buildings, gym., swimming pool. All athletics. Endowed. For Catalog, address:

John Wayne Richards
Box 118,
Lake Forest, Ill.

PEDDIE An Endowed School for Boys

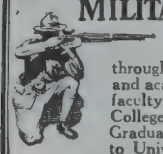
An endowed school thoroughly preparing boys for college. Study hours supervised by experienced teachers. The correct and healthful development of the body is behind the mental training of every boy. Athletics for all. Gymnasium and swimming pool. 60-acre campus. Lower school for boys 10-14 years. 58th year. Booklet. Address

ROGER W. SWETLAND,
LL.D., Headmaster, Box 6K
Hightstown, N. J.

Summer Session—July 9-August 31

Tome School

A National Boarding School for Boys. On the Susquehanna, between Philadelphia and Baltimore. College Board standards, faculty of specialists. Single Rooms. Gymnasium, swimming pool and all athletics. Modern granite buildings. Rate, $1100.



Murray Peabody Brush
Ph.D., Port Deposit,
Maryland

Read here the messages of America's progressive schools.

MISSOURI

MILITARY ACADEMY

Develops red-blooded American manhood, through carefully co-ordinated military and academic training. Equipment and faculty exceptional. Unit R. O. T. C. College Preparatory. Business and Music. Graduates admitted without examination to Universities. "Big Brother" plan of government brings boys into close personal touch with instructors. Lower school for smaller boys. All Athletics. Debating and Literary Societies. Glee Club, Band and Orchestra. Special terms to good musicians. Capacity taxed annually. Early enrollment necessary. Address

COL. E. Y. BURTON, Pres., Box 121, Mexico, Mo.
Write about our Summer School

FISHBURNE
Military School

Est. 1879. At foot of Blue Ridge Mountains. 1300 feet elevation. 4 hours west of Washington. Instructor for every ten cadets. Public speaking classes. Gymnasium. Swimming Pool. All athletics. $250,000 barracks, modern equipment, absolutely fireproof. Catalog.

MAJOR M. H. HUDGINS, Principal
Box C, Waynesboro, Virginia

Chatham Training School An endowed Preparatory School for boys offering the essentials of education without the frills. Conducted to make men and not money. Necessary expenses only $390. New Academic and Gymnasium Building costing $70,000 in addition to $100,000 plant. Catalog on request. A. H. CAMDEN, Pres., Box C, Chatham, Va.

Greenbrier Military School

Modern school, 7 miles from White Sulphur Springs. 2300 ft. elevation, on Main Line C. & O. R. R. Station Ronceverte. $125,000 on new buildings and improvements, including Gymnasium. Terms $525. Catalog. Address Box 15, Lewisburg, W. Va. COL. H. B. MOORE, A.M., Prin.

Blue Ridge School for Boys Hendersonville, N. C.

A select, accredited, preparatory school, splendidly equipped and ideally located in healthful invigorating climate. Satisfied patronage, high moral tone, cultured homelike environments. Junior department. Summer term. For catalogue, address J. R. SANDIFER, Headmaster, Box C.

A GOOD COLLEGE AT A MODERATE COST

$350 entire cost for a year, including board, room and laundry. Standard College, A Grade. In healthful Piedmont Region of N.C. Quaker Control. Men and Women—Special openings for men.
Address, Guilford College Guilford N. C.

Riverside

A military academy of the highest grade, fifty miles north of Atlanta. In Blue Ridge foothills. Personal supervision. Compulsory Gymnasium Work. R.O.T.C. unit. Individual instruction; all athletics. For catalog address
Box C, Gainesville, Georgia.

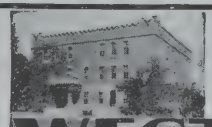
Branham & Hughes Military Academy

Ideal place for training boys in character and scholarship. Thirty miles south of Nashville. New buildings. Improved facilities. Endorsed by eminent educators. Thirtieth year. U. S. Officer detailed. Be sure to read our catalogue.
Address Box 3, Spring Hill, Tennessee.

The Columbia Military Academy

Built by the U. S. Government. Half-million dollar plant. Sixty-seven acre campus, athletic fields, splendid equipment. A teacher to every fifteen boys. R. O. T. C. under direction U. S. Army Officer. Write for catalogue. Give age of boy. Box 203, Columbia, Tennessee.

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY
An Ideal Home School for Manly Boys



Boys 10 to 20 years old prepared for the Universities, Government Academies or Business.

1,600 feet above sea level; pure, dry, bracing mountain air. Separate building and special teachers for younger boys. Military training develops obedience, health and manly carriage. Gymnasium, swimming pool and athletic park. Daily drills. Personal, individual instruction by our tutorial system. Academy sixty-three years old. $600,000 plant, full equipment, absolutely fireproof. Illustrated catalog free. Address

COL. THOS. H. RUSSELL, B. S., Pres., Box C, Staunton, Va.

There is nothing out of which to make men except boys. The schools that advertise with us can help you.

Barracks "A", one of six fireproof Buildings

WESTERN MILITARY ACADEMY

A SCHOOL where scholastic attainment is the goal. Boys thoroughly prepared for college, technical school and for business.
ACCREDITED. Annual enrollment continuously has exceeded capacity. Early application for September is necessary. Catalog of Dept. 22, Alton, Illinois. COL. GEORGE D. EATON, Supt.
MAJOR RALPH L. JACKSON, Principal.

DANVILLE MILITARY INSTITUTE

In famous Piedmont, Virginia. Prepares for colleges and U. S. Academies. Modern buildings, large campus, all healthful sports. Not conducted for profit. Rates $502. Address for catalog.

COL. WILLIAM M. KEMPER
Superintendent
Box C Danville, Virginia

KENTUCKY MILITARY INSTITUTE with a Winter Home in Florida

The New idea in education. Combines sightseeing with school work. Outdoor life means physical and moral gain. Your boy merits these. For special information write Box 103, Lyndon, Ky.

ELGIN ACADEMY, Elgin, Ill.

Accredited. Boys enter colleges without examination. All athletics. Near Chicago. Endowed; Moderate rate. Catalog of Dept. C.

MORGAN PARK

MILITARY ACADEMY. Col. H. D. Abells, Supt., Box 100, Morgan Park, Chicago, Ill. Character building. Lower School. High standards. Individual attention. 50th anniversary year.

ONARGA MILITARY SCHOOL

trains for character. 4 modernly equipped buildings. 85 miles south of Chicago. College prep. and business. Endowed—hence half usual expense. Send for catalog. Col. J. E. Bittinger, Supt., Dept. C, Onarga, Ill.

HOWE SCHOOL

College preparatory for boys. Christian influences, individual attention. 40 acres, 9 buildings, beautiful lakes. Summer school. Separate school for younger boys. Catalog. Address THE RECTOR, Box 290, Howe, Ind.

WESTERN RESERVE ACADEMY

An endowed residence school for boys. Fine new buildings. Six year course of preparation for any college or technical school. Thorough courses in agriculture. All athletics. Moderate rates. For catalogue, address Box A67, Hudson, Ohio. H. O. SLUSS, Prin.

OHIO MILITARY INSTITUTE

High, beautiful location. Military drill subordinate to academic work. Lower school for younger boys. Certificates admit to colleges. Athletics. A. M. HENSHAW, Superintendent.
Box 44, College Hill, Ohio. (near Cincinnati.)

SHATTUCK SCHOOL (Episcopal)

A school that knows boys' physical and mental needs. Prepares for best colleges, or business. All athletics. Military drill. 57th year.
Address Box C, Faribault, Minn.

Pasadena Military Academy

Offers thorough grounding in fundamentals of English education. Fifth to eighth grammar grades with full high school and college preparatory courses. Accredited by University of California. Completely modern equipment. Honor system. Catalogue. R. D. No. 2, Box 12C, Pasadena, Cal.

San Diego Army and Navy Academy

Prepares for Colleges, West Point and Annapolis. University of California's highest scholastic rating. Christian influences. Land and water sports all year. Summer session July 1—September 1. Catalog. Address CAPT. THOS. A. DAVIS.
Box C, Pacific Beach Sta., San Diego, Cal.

PALO ALTO MILITARY ACADEMY

A Special School-Exclusively for Primary and Grammar Grades
In session 12 months in the year. Bicycle club. Outdoor swimming pool. Supervised rifle practice. Summer term and camp. COL. R. P. KELLY, Supt., Box 306-C, Palo Alto, Cal.

PORTER MILITARY ACADEMY Est. 1867

Naval launches, U. S. Destroyer in distance

Prepares for college or business life in a mild climate permitting outdoor life and sports the year around. Military training under U. S. Army officers. R. O. T. C. Naval Unit with U. S. Naval Cutters and high-powered launch. Sea trips on U. S. War Vessels. Modern equipment—9-acre campus and school farm. Unique training in carefulness and the value of money. For illustrated catalog address
REV. WALTER MITCHELL, D. D., Rector
Box F, Charleston, S. C.

Randolph-Macon Academy
Box 404, Front Royal, Va.

A School for Boys with Military Training

A branch of the Randolph-Macon System. Liberal gifts make unusual advantages possible. $200,000 Equipment. Prepares for College or Scientific Schools. Gymnasium, physical culture and outdoor sports. $450. 32nd session opens September 18th, 1923. For catalog address
CHARLES L. MELTON, A.M., Principal.

Tennessee Military Institute

A school where orderliness, respect for government, and the desire to make good replace recklessness and the "don't care" attitude; where every boy is put on his mettle to measure himself by established school standards.
Good name of school rests on thorough academic work, efficient military training and physical development, and the spirit of T.M.I., which inspires boys to their best achievement. Sound government through sensible restraints and incentives to good conduct. Health record unsurpassed. Mild climate, outdoor exercises all year. R.O.T.C. Modern buildings and equipment, laboratories, gymnasium, swimming pool, cinder track. All athletics. Charges moderate. For Catalog address

COL. C. R. ENDSLEY, Supt., Box 313
Sweetwater, Tennessee

THORPE ACADEMY, Lake Forest, Ill.

Address the Principal.
For boys under 15 Semi-military
On Lake Michigan. Small classes. Uniforms worn. One hour from Chicago. Strong faculty. Rapid progress. Non-Sectarian. Address Lake Forest for CAMP THORPE, Pelican Lake, Wis.

Lukin Military Academy SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS

A select Southern school—Personal supervision and individual instruction. Primary, Intermediate and College Preparatory Courses. Artesian water and unexcelled climate. CHAS. J. LUKIN, President.
San Antonio, Texas. Address THE SECRETARY.

URBAN MILITARY ACADEMY

For those desiring the best. Admits boys up to fifteen years, but carries its students through full college preparation. Individual attention in classes and outside. Careful, sympathetic supervision. Daily and systematic exercise. A boys' school after a boy's own heart. Radio, sports, horseback riding. Extensive school estate, pony range, athletic fields. Swimming pool. For catalog, address

THE COMMANDANT,
Los Angeles, California

Send Us The Boy

and we will return you the man.

Study, Athletics, Water Sports, Strong College bred faculty. Teacher to every 20 boys. Separate Junior Department and campus for boys 8 to 15. Send for our illustrated catalogue.

GULF COAST MILITARY ACADEMY
R3, Gulfport, Mississippi
America's great open air school on the Gulf.

Do you wish to know about other resident schools not advertised here? Ask Cosmopolitan.

BRENAU
COLLEGE CONSERVATORY

For Young Women

GAINESVILLE, GEORGIA

50 Miles North of Atlanta

Standard courses leading to the degrees of A.B., B.O. and Mus. B. Special students in music, oratory and art—household economics—secretarial branches and physical culture.

Faculty of 40 college graduates—student body of 500, thirty states represented—non-sectarian, seven fraternities — Homelike atmosphere, democratic spirit, Student Self-Government.

Combines best features of School, Club and Home

Modern equipment. 96 acres, 32 buildings, including up-to-date gymnasium with swimming pool. Healthful climate in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains. Outdoor sports, riding, boating, etc.

For Particulars address
BRENAU Box B Gainesville, Ga.

Lasell Seminary

Est. 1851. A girls' school of finest New England traditions, doing highly specialized work. To develop a truly intelligent and cultured womanhood, developing the arts of home making and management and teaching girls to preside with dignity and grace, are primary school aims. Besides preparing for leading women's colleges, Lasell offers a wide range of elective courses — Music, Art, Secretarial, Home Economics.

Hill-crest location in beautiful Auburndale village, 10 miles out of Boston. All the cultural advantages of the city available under chaperonage. 30-acre campus with lawns, gardens, drives, great old trees, 15 buildings. Every provision for athletics and healthful indoor and outdoor recreation.

WOODLAND PARK
The Junior School for Girls
Catalogs on Application

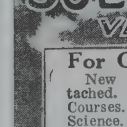
CAMP TECONNET Opens July 1st
Guy M. Winslow, Ph.D., Principal
Chas. F. Towne, A.M., Assoc. Principal
109 Woodland Road, Auburndale, Mass.

A COLLEGE FOR WOMEN AT BOSTON UNIVERSITY

Cultural and business subjects. Courses in the management of personal business affairs. 1, 2, and 4-year programs. Certificate or degree. Special work for prospective secretaries and high school instructors. Catalog. DEAN T. LAWRENCE DAVIS, 27 Garrison Street, Boston, Mass.

The MACDUFFIE SCHOOL for GIRLS

Emphasizing College Preparation
One Year Tutoring Course



Principals — Dr. and Mrs. John MacDUFFIE
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

THE GATEWAY

A school for girls, offering regular college preparatory work. One year Tutoring, General and Special courses.
MISS ALICE E. REYNOLDS, Principal.
St. Ronan Terrace, New Haven, Conn.

Drew Seminary The Carmel School for Girls on beautiful Lake Gleneida. 49 miles from New York. 600 feet elevation. High scholastic standing. Small classes. General and special courses. Athletics. 58th year. Moderate charges. For catalog address DR. CLARENCE P. MCCLELLAND, President. Box 500, Carmel, N. Y.

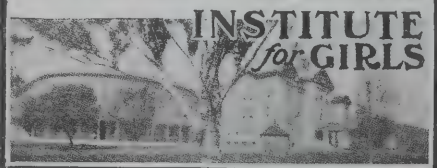
HIGHLAND MANOR, Tarrytown-On-Hudson, N. Y.
Non-sectarian boarding school for girls on a beautiful estate. Liberal Arts, College Preparatory, Post Graduate, Secretarial. Thorough music courses, all branches. Homemaking. Journalism. Primary, Intermediate. Outdoor Life.
EUGENE H. LEHMAN.
Box C, Tarrytown-on-Hudson, N. Y. Tel..Tarrytown 1505.

The Castle
Miss Mason's School for Girls
Box 700 Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

SULLINS COLLEGE
VIRGINIA PARK

For Girls and Young Women.

New buildings. Every room has bath attached. High School and Junior College Courses. Music, Art, Expression, Domestic Science. Secretarial Courses. Gymnasium. Swimming Pool, beautiful lake, water sports, horseback riding, tennis. Fine outdoor life. Mountain climate. Students from 40 states. Write for Catalogue and views.
W. E. MARTIN, Ph.D., President
Box A, Bristol, Va.



A Good School for Girls

Close, personal touch and instruction for each girl. Thorough college preparation. Six diploma courses. Fine democratic spirit, sensible dress regulations, happy school life. Beautiful hill country near New York. 50 acres. Gymnasium. Swimming pool. 50th year.

ROBERT J. TREVORROW, President
Box 13 Hackettstown, N. J.

CENTENARY COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE for GIRLS

Kendall Hall

Boarding and Day School for Girls
Junior High, College Preparation with one special intensive year
Secretarial, Domestic Science, Music and Art Courses

Amid magnificent estates. 40 acres. Ocean frontage. Park-like grounds. Boston 20 miles.

Summer session opens July 9th. Intensive training for college and school examinations.

MR. and MRS. C. P. KENDALL
Prides Crossing Beverly, Mass.

THE Scudder SCHOOL

West Seventy-second St., at Riverside Drive, New York
"A Modern School for the Modern Girl"
7 buildings; 200 students. Unusual practical courses. (A) SELECT HIGH SCHOOL:—Preparatory and general. (B) POST GRADUATE:—1. Domestic Science and Home Management: 1-yr. course with diploma. 2. Secretarial: includes Spanish, French, Library Methods, etc. 3. Social Welfare and Community Service:—a new profession for women. Practical instruction with opportunity for actual experience. Gymnasium, swimming, etc. Dormitories like college life. Address MISS C. S. SCUDDER.
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y. 244 W. 72d St.

Wilkesbarre Institute

Founded 1854

Wilkesbarre, Pa.

Offers an unusual opportunity for limited number of girls to receive special instructions preparatory to entering college. Girls ten years old and over accepted. Boarding department is separated from school building and located in delightful residential section. A home school where each girl receives individual attention. Faculty of twenty members. For catalogue and information address Miss ANNA M. OLCOTT, Principal, 78 South Franklin Street.

IRVING 68th year

In beautiful Cumberland Valley, near Harrisburg. Two years college preparatory. College course with A.B. degree. MUSIC: Piano, Voice, Violin, Pipe Organ, Theory. Home Economics, Secretaryship, Expression. A school of select patronage. Outdoor sports and activities. Swimming pool. Terms, $450 to $750. For catalog, address

Irving College and Music Conservatory
E. E. Campbell, Pres., Box C, Mechanicsburg, Pa.

The Ely School for Girls

Greenwich, Conn.

In the country. One hour from New York. Junior and Upper Schools. General, College Preparatory and Graduate Courses. Also one-year course, intensive college preparatory review.

Beechwood inc.

An established cultural and practical school for young women. Faculty built by years of selection. Many graduates occupy positions of responsibility.

EVERY young woman should be trained for social power and individual efficiency. This is the aim of Beechwood. It combines the advantages of country and city training. Complete courses. Junior College Departments, College Preparatory, Music, Art, Magazine Illustration, Design, Fashion Illustration, Physical Education, Expression, Home Economics, Public School Music, Secretaryship, Normal Gymnastics, Normal Kindergarten, Large Faculty, Swimming Pool, Athletic Field, Gymnasium. Large New Pipe Organ. Rates moderate. Catalog. Address Beechwood School,

Box 400, Jenkintown, Pa., Suburb of Philadelphia

Mount Ida School

6 miles from Boston

Send for New Year Book

FOR GIRLS

We send students to college on certificate and examination. Many girls, however, after leaving high school do not wish to go to college. But often they desire advanced work in a new environment with competent instructors, and to select studies best meeting their tastes and interests.

We offer just these opportunities. Students take English or Literature, but the course otherwise is elective. All subjects count for diploma. Graduation from high school not necessary for entrance.

All the opportunities of Boston in Music, Art, and historical associations are freely used. Special work in Voice, Piano, Violin, 'Cello, Harp, and Pipe Organ, with eminent Boston masters.

Outdoor Sports. 8 acres for athletics. We make a specialty of Horseback Riding (our own stables); Golf Course; Tennis, both grass and dirt courts; Field Sports; Canoeing. Our Gymnasium is 45 by 90 ft., with Swimming Pool.

A finely equipped school—nine buildings.

Domestic Art, Elocution, Costume Design, Home Decoration. Excellent Secretarial Courses; Courses in Business Management; Junior College Courses.

Some rooms with hot and cold water. Students for 1923-24 are being accepted in the order of their applications.

Special car for Western girls from Chicago Sept. 25.

Exceptional opportunities with a delightful home life. 1646 Summit St., NEWTON, Mass.

Russell Sage College

Founded by Mrs. Russell Sage in connection with Emma Willard School

A School of Practical Arts

Designed for the higher education of women, particularly on vocational and professional lines. Secretarial Work and Household Economics. B.A. and B.S. degrees.

Address Secretary
RUSSELL SAGE COLLEGE TROY, N. Y.

Princeton School For Girls

Miss Gildner's Preparatory School for Girls 12 and over. Princeton, N. J.

College preparatory, advanced college-entrance, general high school, two-year graduate courses. Music, art, dancing, expression, dramatics, secretaryship, domestic science, athletics, sports, riding. 57 acre estate, beautiful colonial residence. Separate cottage, "Gildcrest," for Junior School.

Miss Laura C. Gildner, A.M.
Director

ST. MARY'S - DALLAS

For girls. 35th year. Rt. Rev. Alexander C. Garrett, Founder and President.

College, Academic, and College Preparatory courses. Strong special departments, Music, Art, Home Economics, Expression, Dramatics. Harold von Mickwitz, Director, St. Mary's Institute of Musical Art. Mild climate, outdoor athletics all year. Large campus, beautiful new dormitory. Episcopal. For catalog, address
Anna Martin Crocker, A.B., Principal Box 10, Dallas, Texas

THE VELTIN SCHOOL

For Girls. A Fireproof, Sanitary School Building. Classes limited to twelve pupils. Primary Department. General Course. College Preparatory. Unusual advantages in French are offered in every class.
160 and 162 West 74th St., New York.

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Pre-Academic, Academic and College Courses leading to Degrees. Two-year Finishing Course. Gymnasium. Swimming Pool, Riding, Music, Arts. Paris Branch—Chateau de la Mucette. For catalogue apply to Reverend Mother.

WALLCOURT

Miss Goldsmith's School for Girls.

18-acres, in heart of Finger Lake Region. College Preparatory, General and Special Courses, including secretarial work. Dramatics. Music, Supervised athletics. Catalog. Address Principal WALLCOURT SCHOOL.
Aurora-on-Cayuga, N. Y.

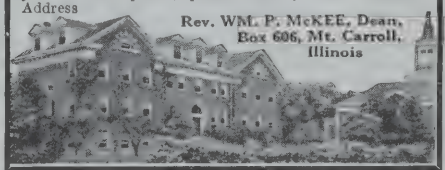
PUTNAM HALL SCHOOL

FOR GIRLS

Vassar preparatory. Social Secretary course. All outdoor sports. Hockey field. Sleeping porches. Campus of four acres.

ELLEN CLIZBE BARTLETT, A.B., Principal.
Box 805, Poughkeepsie, New York.

The MARY LYON SCHOOL



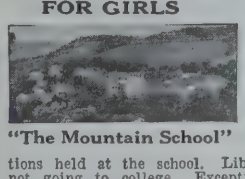
A country school in a college town. College Preparatory. General and cultural courses. Buildings thoroughly modern and beautiful. New gymnasium and swimming pool. All out-door activities. MR. and MRS. Box 1500, Swarthmore, Pa. H. M. CRIST, Prin.

Francis Shimer School

Junior College Academy

For Girls and Young Women. 9 modern buildings, new college dormitory. 35 acres. College department two years with diploma. Four years academy work. Home Economics. Music. Art. Golf. Hockey. 71st year. Term opens September 12th, 1923. Catalog. Address
Rev. WM. P. McKEE, Dean, Box 606, Mt. Carroll, Illinois

Moravian Seminary and College for Women



Founded 1742, Elementary, College Prep., B.A. and B.S. Expression, Domestic Science, Art, Music. Accredited Teacher Training. Gymnasium. Large campus. Select patronage. Capacity 100. R. RIEMER, Pres.
Box "C," Bethlehem, Pa.

Bremestead

HORSESHOE, N. Y. School for girls in heart of Adirondacks yet easily accessible. College preparatory and special courses. Unusual opportunities for winter sports. Occasional week-ends at Lake Placid. For catalog address MRS. RUTH E. SENGSTAKEN, REGISTRAR, 536 Decatur Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BIRMINGHAM SCHOOL

FOR GIRLS Founded 1853

"The Mountain School"

Healthful location in Allegheny Mts. School park land of 100 acres. Six modern, homelike buildings for 100 girls. Thorough preparation for college, entrance examinations held at the school. Liberal courses for girls not going to college. Exceptional Faculty. Strong Music Dept., with unusual equipment. Fine and Applied Arts, Domestic Science. Gymnasium and Swimming Pool. Athletic Training and Dancing. Main Line Penna. R. R. Illustrated Catalogue.
P. S. Moulton, Headmaster; Alvan R. Grier, Pres.
Box 101, Birmingham, Pa.

The HARCUM SCHOOL

For Girls 10 Miles from Phila.

A home school emphasizing college preparation. Special academic course for girls not going to college. Two year graduate course for high school graduates. Music and art under noted artists. Located in a college town. New stone buildings, large grounds. Athletics, riding. Catalog. Address

THE HARCUM SCHOOL
Mrs. Edith Hatcher Harcum, B.L., Head of School, Mrs. L. May Willis, B.P., Principal, Box C. Bryn Mawr, Pa.

The Colonial School

For Girls

In the refined residential section of Washington. Courses include grades, academic, college preparatory, collegiate, fine arts, domestic science, secretarial and business training. Gymnastics, athletics, dramatics. Attractive social life with cultured home influences. For catalog, address

Miss Jessie Truman,
Associate Principal
1531 Eighteenth Street
Washington, D. C.

If you fail to find your needs supplied why not ask Cosmopolitan.

MARYLAND COLLEGE

1853 for Women 1923

LOCATED in Green Spring Valley, ten miles from Baltimore. Twelve-acre campus. Modern fireproof buildings. Out-door Athletics. Swimming Pool. Strong Faculty. Four-year courses leading to all degrees. Personal supervision. Catalog on request.

Box 6C Lutherville, Md.

DARLINGTON

For Young Women

Since 1851 Darlington has been developing personality, vitality and efficiency among young women of the nation. Beautiful 60-acre estate. Junior College courses in Personnel Engineering, Secretarial, Household Management, Physical Education and Cultural Arts. College Preparatory or High School courses. Gymnasium, athletic fields, swimming pool, bowling alleys, riding and dancing. Catalog.

CHRISTINE F. BYE, Principal
Box 600 West Chester, Pa.

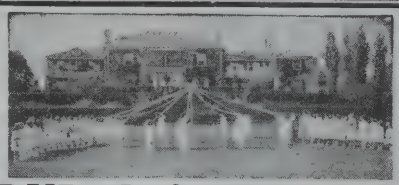
WARD-BELMONT



FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG WOMEN

RESERVATIONS for the 1923-24 session should be made as soon as possible to insure entrance.

WARD-BELMONT offers courses to meet individual needs of students covering 4 years preparatory and 2 years college work. Strong Music and Art Departments. Also Literature, Expression, Physical Training, Home Economics and Secretarial. Outdoor sports and swimming pool. Woody Crest, the Farm and Country Club affords week-end trips into the open country.

Applications should include references. Booklets on request. Address

WARD-BELMONT
Belmont Heights Box 2, Nashville, Tenn.

RYDAL

Junior Department of the OGONTZ SCHOOL

A home school for limited number of girls 9-14 years. Teacher of strong personality and experience in charge. Catalog. Address

Miss Abby A. Sutherland, Rydal, Montgomery Co., Pa.

Penn Hall School for Girls

AIM—Full Development of True Womanhood

COURSE OF STUDY	AMUSEMENTS
College Preparatory	Horseback Riding
Modern Language	Basketball
Domestic Science	Hockey, Tennis
Music, Art, Expression	Boating, Golf
	Corrective Gymnastics

New Gymnasium and Swimming Pool

Certificate privileges. Rooms with private bath. May each year spent at Atlantic City. Work continues without interruption. Rates, $800. For catalogue and view book address

FRANK S. MAGILL, A.M., Principal, Box N
Chambersburg, Pa.

Cedar Crest A college with modern dormitories and equipment, attractive suburban site, congenial campus life. Degree and certificate courses. Liberal Arts, A.B.; Secretarial Science, B.S.S.; Household Arts, B.S.; Music and Expression, A.B. New Department in Religious Education and Social Service.
Allentown, Pa. WM. C. CURTIS, Litt.D., Pres.

HIGHLAND HALL

Founded 1867. Autumn and Spring Camp part of School life. In historic Hollidaysburg, in the Alleghanies.
College preparatory, general, post-graduate courses.
ELLEN C. KEATES A. B. Prin., Hollidaysburg, Pa.

CHEVY CHASE SCHOOL A school for the girl of today and tomorrow. Courses: Preparatory: two-year advanced for high school graduates; special. Unrivaled location at the national capital. For catalog, address
FREDERIC ERNEST FARRINGTON, Ph.D., Headmaster.
Box C, Chevy Chase School, Washington, D. C.

GUNSTON HALL

A School for Girls—Established 1892. Preparatory and Academic Courses. Two years' Post-Graduate and College work. Music, Art and Expression.
MRS. BEVERLEY R. MASON, Principal.
1918 Florida Ave., Washington, D. C.

Lindenwood College

Fifty minutes from St. Louis

The pioneer college for young women of the Southwest. Founded 1827. Two and four-year courses leading to degrees. Liberal Arts, Fine Arts, Home Economics, Business departments.

School of Music of Unexcelled Merit

114-acre campus. Exceptional facilities for golf, hockey, tennis, all outdoor sports. Gymnasium, Swimming pool. For catalog, address

J. L. ROEMER, D.D., President
Box 323 St. Charles, Mo.

FAIRMONT School For Girls

Washington, D. C. Regular and Special Courses. Advanced Courses for High School graduates. Music, Art, Expression. Educational advantages of National Capital. For catalogue, address FAIRMONT SCHOOL, 2103 S Street, Washington, D. C.

THE GIRLS' LATIN SCHOOL

34th year. College Preparatory and Academic. Thorough preparation for colleges. Faculty of college-trained Christian women. Selected students. Cultural advantages due to location. Exceptionally beautiful home. Catalog. MISS WILMOT, A.B., Headmistress.
1230 St. Paul Street, Baltimore, Maryland.

Stuart Hall

Episcopal school for girls—Eightieth Session. Rich in traditions of the past; alive to the needs of the present. Thorough college preparation. Outdoor sports. Address
MRS. H. N. HILLS, A.B.
Box A, Staunton, Virginia.

Randolph-Macon Institute For Girls. Limited to 100. College preparatory and special courses for those not wishing to go to college. Vocal and Instrumental Music, Art, and Expression. Attractive home life. Gymnasium. Branch of the Randolph-Macon System. Rates $500. Catalogue.
Danville, Va. Address CHAS. G. EVANS, A.M., Prin.

Averett College for Young Women. High School and Junior College Courses. Founded 1859. Accredited. Faculty of specialists. Modern equipment. Gymnasium and swimming pool. Music, Home Economics, Commercial, etc. Moderate rates. Catalog. JAMES P. CRAFT, A.M. (Harvard), Pres.
Box CO, Danville, Virginia.

GULF-PARK COLLEGE

By-the-Sea

Looking out to sea

Junior College for young women. National patronage. Ideal location on Gulf Coast. Healthful, congenial climate. Four years high school, two years college. Cultural courses include Music, Art, Expression, Home Economics, Secretarial work. All modern equipment. Year round outdoor life. Land and water sports. For illustrated catalog, address

GULF-PARK
Box K, Gulfport, Mississippi

VIRGINIA COLLEGE for Young Women

Box Z ROANOKE, VA.

In the Valley of Virginia, famed for health and beauty. Elective, Preparatory and full Junior College courses. Music, Art, Expression. Domestic Science. Catalogue. Address MATTIE P. HARRIS, President.
MRS. GERTRUDE HARRIS BOATWRIGHT, Vice-President.

FORT LOUDOUN SEMINARY

Winchester, Virginia.

For girls. Delightful location in the beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Literary and Business courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, Languages. Gymnasium, swimming pool and all outdoor exercises. Opens Sept. 20th. Terms $450. For catalog, address KATH. GLASS GREENE, Pres.

LINDEN HALL

School for 100 Girls
178th Year

In Far-famed Lancaster Co., "Garden Spot of the U. S." College Preparatory, General Academic, Home Economics, Secretarial, Music, Art, Expression. Courses for High School Graduates. Separate Junior and Intermediate Depts. Gymnasium. Swimming Pool. Attractive, wholesome home life. Careful supervision. Catalog. Address
Box 113, Lititz, Pa. F. W. STENGEL, D.D.

Mary Baldwin College and Mary Baldwin Seminary

Est. in 1842. For Young Ladies. Staunton, Virginia.

Term begins Sept. 6th. In Shenandoah Valley of Virginia. Unsurpassed climate, modern equipment. Students from 33 states. Courses: Collegiate, 4 years, A.B. Degree; Preparatory, 4 years. Music, Art, Expression, Domestic Science. Athletics—Gymnasium and Field. Catalogue.

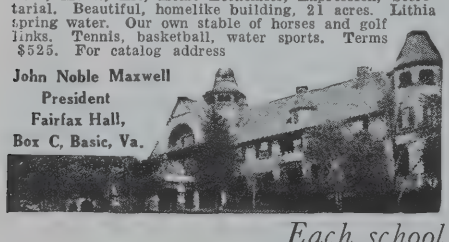
SOUTHERN COLLEGE

Junior College and Finishing

One year or two year courses for H. S. students. Music, Art, Expression, Domestic Science, Social Training. Gymnasium, Tennis, Basketball, Historic pilgrimages.

Arthur Kyle Davis, A. M., 201 College Place, Petersburg, Va.

PENNSYLVANIA, Overbrook.
Miss Sayward's School For Girls. Suburb of Philadelphia. College Preparatory and Secretarial Courses. Music, Domestic Science. Physical training, outdoor sports, horseback riding, swimming. Develops character, mind and body. Write Dept. C.
MISS JANET SAYWARD, Principal.



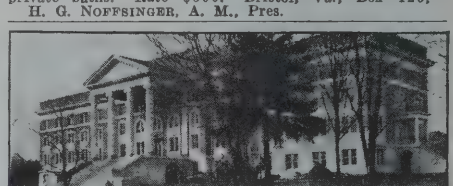
Eastern College For Girls and Young Women. Forty-five minutes from Washington, D. C. H. S. and Junior College Courses. Music, Art, Expression, Secretarial, Physical Education, Household Arts. Buildings modern. Private bath. Horseback riding. Outdoor sports. Camping trips. For catalog, address R. H. HOLLIDAY, Box A, Manassas, Virginia. President.

Virginia Intermont College for Girls and Young Women. 39th year. 25 states. H.S. & Jr. College. Music, Art, Expression, Domestic Science and Secretarial Courses. Bracing climate. Alt. 1900 ft. Gym. Swimming pool, new dormitory with private baths. Rate $500. Bristol, Va., Box 125.
H. G. NOFFSINGER, A. M., Pres.

Fairfax Hall

For Girls. In the Blue Ridge Mountains, 4 hours from Washington, 17 minutes from Staunton. Two main line railroads. College preparatory, 1 year graduate work, Music, Art, Home Economics, Expression, Secretarial. Beautiful, homelike building, 21 acres. Lithia spring water. Our own stable of horses and golf links. Tennis, basketball, water sports. Terms $525. For catalog address

John Noble Maxwell
President
Fairfax Hall,
Box C, Basic, Va.



Bishopthorpe Manor

Box 237, Bethlehem, Pa.

Prepares girls for college or for life. Special two-year finishing course for High School graduates. Music, Art, Household Arts and Sciences. Arts and Crafts, Expression and Secretarial work.

High healthful location on the slope of the Lehigh Mountains. Near New York and Philadelphia. Bishop Ethelbert Talbot, Visitor.

New gymnasium and tiled swimming pool. Tennis, basketball, skating, riding, etc. Aesthetic and Folk Dancing. Address Claude N. Wyant, Principal.

LEWISBURG SEMINARY

For Girls. College preparatory. Two years college work. Near White Sulphur Springs. Altitude 2300 ft. Music, Expression, Art, Home Economics. Terms reasonable. Fireproof dormitory. Catalog on request. Address

LEWISBURG SEMINARY
Box 88 Lewisburg, W. Va.

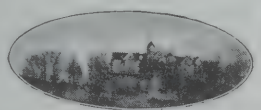
Each school has an individuality. Read its story carefully.

Ossining School
FOR GIRLS



We offer, with diploma, Academic, College Preparatory, Art, Music, Dramatic, Secretarial and Home-making Courses, including Horticulture.

Students may enter regular courses or, with parents' approval, may specialize as desired. In beautiful Westchester, 30 miles from New York. 55th year. Write for Year Book. Address Ossining-on-Hudson, New York. Box 6-C.

CLARA C. FULLER, Principal

Southern Seminary
A School of Character

56th year. For girls and young women. In the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia. Ten miles from the world-famed Natural Bridge and historic Lexington. Courses: College preparatory, four years; seminary and collegiate, two years; piano, pipe organ, voice, violin, expression, art, commercial and home economics. Sports: Outdoor and gymnasium; mountain-climbing, horseback riding and canoeing. Health record 100 per cent. Rate $490. Catalog, Box 912, Buena Vista, Va.

ASHLEY HALL

A girls' school offering a broad variety of courses. College preparation for best women's colleges. Modern equipment. Swimming pool. Mild climate permits outdoor work the year around. Catalogue. Address MARY VARDRINE MCBEE, Box C, Charleston, S. C. M.A., Principal.

Hamilton College

A fully accredited Junior College for young women. Located in the healthful Blue Grass Region of Kentucky. Two years of college and four years of standard college preparatory courses. Music, Expression, Art. For catalog and views, address HAMILTON COLLEGE, Box B, Lexington, Ky.

FERRY HALL

College preparatory, general high school and advanced courses. Also special instruction in music, expression and domestic arts and sciences. Located in a well-known residence suburb on the shore of Lake Michigan, 28 miles from Chicago. For catalog address MISS ELOISE R. TREMAIN, Prin. Box 301, Lake Forest, Ill.

ST. MARY'S SCHOOL (Episc.)

Oldest School for Girls in Middle West

Individual Training. H. S. and 2 years of college. All athletics. Also "St. Margarets" for younger girls. Early application necessary. Write for catalog desired, to Dr. F. L. Carrington, Box C, Knoxville, Ill.

Illinois Woman's College

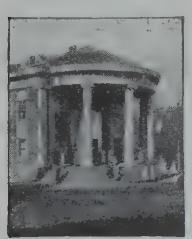
A standard college. A.B., B.S., B.M. degrees. Professional training in Music, Art, Expression, Domestic Science, Secretarial and Physical Education. New gymnasium with pool. Six buildings. All athletics. For catalog address ILLINOIS WOMAN'S COLLEGE, Box E, Jacksonville, Ill.

TUDOR HALL SCHOOL

Successful preparation for all colleges for women, and for universities. General and Special Courses. Fireproof school and residence buildings. Science laboratories. Art studio. Gymnasium. Roof playground. Catalogue. Indianapolis, Ind. MISS FREDONIA ALLEN, Prin.

Glendale.

Founded 1853. Distinctive—Junior College and Preparatory School. Everything young women should know for true culture, practical success and genuine happiness. DR. THOMAS FRANKLIN MARSHALL, President. Box 7, Glendale (suburban to Cincinnati), Ohio.



Oxford College

for Women. Founded 1830. Standard College course with B. A. degree. Music courses with B. M. degree. Normal courses in Household Economics, Public School Music and Art. Rates $450. Write for "Seven Points." Address OXFORD COLLEGE. Box 62, Oxford, Ohio.

Lenox Hall

Select School for Girls. Enrollment limited. For catalogue address MRS. M. LOUISE THOMAS, Principal. MISSOURI, Kirkwood, Box 1021.

National Park Seminary

For Young Women

Suburbs of Washington, D. C.

James E. Ament, Ph.D., LL.D.
President

Two-year Junior College courses for high school or preparatory school graduates. Vocational courses. Music, Art, Expression, Home Economics and Secretarial courses. College preparatory for younger girls. 90-acre campus, 32 buildings in Rock Creek valley, midst "woods and templed hills." Gymnasium, Swimming pool. Athletics. 8 unique club houses afford students unusual social advantages. Address

REGISTRAR, Box 115, Forest Glen, Maryland

WALNUT LANE SCHOOL

66th Year

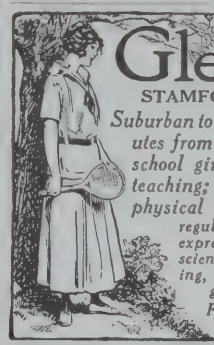
Oldest School for Girls in Philadelphia

Junior College for High School Graduates

Entrance examinations not required

College Preparatory and Academic School

CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC: Piano, voice, violin, harp.
VOCATIONAL COURSES: Secretarial. Home Economics.



Piano	Art	Domestic Science	Spanish
Voice	Expression	Short Story Writing	French
Violin	Secretarial	Interior Decoration	German
Harp	Sewing	Psychology	Sociology

ATHLETICS: Horseback Riding; Swimming; Basketball; Tennis; Country Tramping; Dancing; Military Drill.

MISS S. EDNA JOHNSTON, A.B., Principal
Box E Germantown, Phila., Penna.

Hillcrest, Miss Davison's School

14th year. For girls from 5 to 14 years of age. Best home influences. Limited number. Individual care. Mental, moral and physical development equally cared for. Unusual advantages in music.. Only normal, healthy children are accepted. MISS SARAH M. DAVISON, Principal, Box 4C, Beaver Dam, Wis.

Glen Eden

STAMFORD, CONNECTICUT

Suburban to New York City; fifty minutes from Fifth Avenue. For high-school girls or graduates. Expert teaching; social culture; scientific physical training; athletics. All regular studies; also music, art, expression and stagecraft, domestic science, secretarial branches, dancing, riding. Superb buildings and grounds; charmingly homelike. For booklet and views address The Principal.

OAK HALL

ST. PAUL'S DISTINCTIVE SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

70th year. Day and Boarding. College preparatory, general courses. Music and dramatic arts. Happy school life. Individual care. Skating, Swimming, Riding, Tennis. Big new gymnasium. Booklet. MR. and MRS. R. A. MOORE, Principals. 578 Holly Ave., St. Paul, Minn.

The Highlands

A College preparatory school for girls. General and domestic science courses. Music, Art. Very mild winter climate—year round outdoor athletics. Horseback riding, swimming, hiking. Junior department. Close personal touch, happy school life. Booklet.
Austin, Texas. MRS. ELIZABETH N. MATHER, Prin.

WESTLAKE SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

College preparatory, advanced courses, Music, Art Expression and Domestic Science. Separate department for younger girls. Spacious grounds permit all sports. Swimming pool. Tennis courts. Catalog.
333 S. Westmoreland Ave., Los Angeles, Cal.

The Anna Head School

Boarding and day school for girls. High school graduates admitted without examination to all colleges using accrediting system. Students prepared for college board examinations. Post Graduate Department. Also Primary and Intermediate Departments. Address MISS MARY E. WILSON, Box A, Berkeley, California. Principal.

GIRLS' COLLEGIATE SCHOOL

1008 West Adams Street, Los Angeles, California
Thirty-Second year begins Sept. 27th. Accredited. Offers General, College Preparatory, Special Courses—2 years post-graduate work, vocational, cultural. Beautiful Spanish buildings. Outdoor life a reality.
MISS PARSONS and MISS DENNEN, Principals.

SCHOOLS OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE

Home Economics

Positions always open for graduates of our accredited Courses for Dietitians and Teachers; both fields offer excellent opportunities to ambitious young women. School affiliated with famous Battle Creek Sanitarium. Unexcelled laboratory facilities and unusual opportunity for practical experience. Inspiring college atmosphere; tuition and all expenses moderate. For illustrated Prospectus, address Dean.

Sanitarium School of Home Economics
Box 331, Battle Creek, Michigan

School of Domestic Arts and Science

Summer Session June 4 to July 31. Cookery, Menu Planning, Marketing, Nutrition, Sewing, Millinery. Institutional Management with Tea Room and Cafeteria practice. LILLIAN A. KEMP, Director.
Dept. 9, 6 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

The Miss Farmer's School of Cookery

Home of the Boston Cooking School Cook Book. Cookery and Household technique for the home and for professional use. Six months and intensive short courses. Send for booklet. MISS ALICE BRADLEY, Principal.
30 Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass.

Schools of Kindergarten Training

CONN. FROEBEL NORMAL

Kindergarten Primary Training School, 183 West Ave., Bridgeport, Conn.

Academic, kindergarten, primary and playground courses. Residence and day school. Big opportunities for our graduates. State certificate. 25th year. Booklets.
Address MARY C. MILLS, Principal.

HARRIETTE MELISSA MILLS KINDERGARTEN-PRIMARY TRAINING SCHOOL

Affiliated with New York University

Students enrolled for Sept. and Feb. Exceptional residence facilities. Excellent positions for graduates. Address MISS HARRIETTE MELISSA MILLS, Principal, Five-C, New York University Bldg., Washington Square, New York City

Oberlin Kindergarten—Primary Training School

Accredited. Two year course. Prepares for Kindergarten and Primary Teaching. Practice Teaching. Admission to our residence halls in order of application. Fall term opens Sept. 18, 1923. For catalog address MISS ROSE C. DEAN, 125 Elm St., Oberlin, Ohio.

The Lesley School of Kindergarten and Primary Training

Two year course. Industrial and playground work. Dormitory. New school building. Address
MRS. EDITH LESLEY WOLFARD.
29 Everett St., Cambridge, Mass.

THE FANNIE A. SMITH Kindergarten Training School

Our graduates in great demand. Intensive courses in theory and practice. Unusual facilities for practical work. New school building. Opportunity for outdoor life. Catalog. FANNIE A. SMITH, Principal.
1124 Iranistan Ave., Bridgeport, Conn.

National Kindergarten

AND ELEMENTARY COLLEGE

36th year. Accredited. Summer School June 18-August 10. Two and three-year courses. Six Dormitories on College grounds. Write for Bulletin and Book of Views.
Dept. 52, 2944 Michigan Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

Perry Kindergarten Normal School

Founded 1898 by Annie Moseley Perry. Thorough training for kindergarten, primary, and playground positions. Supervised practice teaching. Send for booklet, "Training Children." HARRIOT HAMBLEN JONES, Principal.
25 Huntington Ave., Room 314, Boston, Mass.

SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

TILTON

In the foothills of the White Mountains. The School consists of ten buildings, including large gymnasium, new dining-hall and separate dormitories. Twenty-five-acre athletic field. Winter sports. Preparation for all colleges and scientific schools. Courses in Business, Manual Training, Music and for high school graduates. Christian influence. Catalog and views.

Lower School for Young Boys

Entirely distinct buildings. Number limited. All advantages of Tilton faculty, gymnasium and athletic field. Supervised study and play. House mothers. Separate booklet. Faculty and equipment superior to most high-priced schools and endowment permits unusually moderate rate. For information about either school address George L. Plimpton, Principal, 32 School Street, Tilton, N. H.

Ardsley Heights Country School

"A Real House of Childhood" amid Westchester hills, only ½ hour from New York City. Real mothering and individual care for little people 5-12. All summer sports, lots of fun and lots of good food. Moderate rates.
N. Y., Ardsley, Secretary.

Mrs. Burt's School for Tiny Tots

An all-year boarding school where children up to 14 years have a Mother's care; kindergarten, primary and grammar grades, music, dancing; best of food; medical attention; trained nurse. Also Cottage Boarding Dept. at Todsville.
MRS. M. LEWTAS BURT, 1120 Constant Ave., Peekskill, N.Y.

Wayland Academy

Founded 1855. College preparatory with high standards. A boys' school of 75. A girls' school of 50. Endowed. A true home school with Christian atmosphere. Athletics. Music Department. Faculty 14. Students from 18 states. Rate $500. E. P. BROWN, Prin.
Box E C., Beaver Dam, Wisconsin.

Grand River Institute

Founded 1831. Strictly high-grade, co-educational preparatory school. Exceptional equipment made possible by endowment. New dormitories and gymnasium. Strong departments in Music and Oratory. Rates $400.
EARL W. HAMBLIN, Principal.
Box H2, Austinburg, O. On Penn. R.R. near Ashtabula.

The Cazenovia Seminary

Co-educational. A College Preparatory and Finishing School of the highest type. Founded 1824. Junior Pupils in separate cottages. Endowed. Adirondack elevation. All Athletics. Winter Sports. Special Secretarial Courses. CHARLES E. HAMILTON, A.M., D.D., President, Box C, Cazenovia, N. Y.

GEORGE SCHOOL

Co-educational with Separate Dormitory Buildings. College Preparatory, also Manual Training and Citizenship courses. 227 acres on Neshaminy Creek. Athletics. Friends' management.
G. A. WALTON, A. M., Principal, Box 281, George School, Pa.

Dean Academy

57th year. Young men and young women find here a homelike atmosphere, thorough and efficient training in every department of a broad culture, a loyal and helpful school spirit. Liberal endowment permits liberal terms. $400 to $500 per year. Special course in domestic science. For catalogue address Franklin, Mass. A. W. PEIRCE, Litt.D., Headmaster.

WYOMING SEMINARY

A co-educational school strong in character building. College preparation, Business, Music, Art, Oratory and Home Economics. Gymnasium and Athletic field. 79th year. Endowed. Catalog.
L. L. SPRAGUE, D.D., L.H.D., Pres.
Kingston, Pa.

DEVEREUX SCHOOLS

BERWYN, PENNSYLVANIA

Boys Junior Girls

UNIQUE IN PURPOSE—PROGRESSIVE IN METHOD—Three separate tutoring schools for children who need scientific observation and guidance.

Pre-school Age through High School. Special emphasis placed on health education. Academic and cultural courses. Vocational training for manually minded students. Male faculty in department for older boys. Sixty-five acres—outdoor camp in summer session.

THE FREER SCHOOL

For girls of retarded development. Limited enrollment permits intimate care. 9 miles from Boston.
MISS CORA E. MORSE, Principal.
31 Park Circle, Arlington Heights, Mass.

Children made receptive to knowledge by corrective medical treatment. Training and teaching. Send for booklet. "Marydell," Langhorne, Bucks Co., Pa.

The Training School at Vineland New Jersey

Devoted to the interests of those whose minds have not developed normally. Schools, shops, farms, research laboratory. $900 per annum.
E. R. JOHNSTONE, Director. C. EMERSON NASH, Superintendent.
Box 408, Vineland, New Jersey.

The Hedley School

The "Individual" School for boys and girls needing personal attention and special instruction.

MRS. J. R. HEDLEY, Principal. J. R. HEDLEY, M.D., Resident Physician.
Box C, Glenside, Pennsylvania (12 miles from Phila.)

The Binghamton Training School

An ideal private home-school for nervous, backward and mental defectives. No age limit. Physical Culture. Manual training and all branches. Open year round. Terms $75 per month and up. MR. and MRS. AUGUST A. BOLDT, 110 Fairview Ave., Binghamton, New York. Supt.

MISS WOODS' SCHOOL

For EXCEPTIONAL CHILDREN

Individual training will develop the child who does not progress satisfactorily. 24 miles from Phila. Booklet
MOLLIE WOODS HARE, Principal
Box 164 Langhorne, Pa.

SCHOOLS of PHYSICAL EDUCATION

PHYSICAL EDUCATION

Broad field for young women, offering attractive and varied positions. Qualified directors of physical training in big demand. Three-year diploma course, including summer course in Summer Camp activities, with practical training in all forms of physical exercise, recreation, and health education. School affiliated with famous Battle Creek Sanitarium — superb equipment and faculty of specialists. Excellent opportunity for individual physical development. For Illustrated Announcement, address Dean,
KELLOGG SCHOOL OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION
Box 230, Battle Creek, Michigan

American College of Physical Education

Accredited. Co-Educational. Dormitory for Women. Fall Term Sept. 19th. Summer session June 19th. Summer Camp for Women. Graduate Placement Bureau. Two-year Normal, Three-year and Degree Courses. Catalog on request. Dept. C5, 4622 Grand Blvd., Chicago.

The Marjorie Webster School of Expression and Physical Education

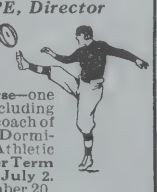
2-year Normal course. 1-year Professional course. Fall school opens September 17. Day and Night School. Dormitory. Catalogue. 1415 Massachusetts Ave., N. W., Wash., D. C.



Posse Normal School of Gymnastics

For women. 33rd year. Modern building. Courses of one, two and three years. Present conditions have created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds. Summer Camp. Apply to THE SECRETARY.
779 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

ITHACA SCHOOL of Physical Education

DR. ALBERT H. SHARPE, Director

Normal Course for Men and Women—two years. Graduates eligible to teach in N. Y. State Public Schools.
Athletic Coaching Course—one year. Large faculty including "Jack" Moakley, head coach of 1920 Olympic Team. Dormitories, Gymnasium, Athletic Field. Six Week Summer Term on Cayuga Lake Begins July 2. Fall Term opens September 20.
202 DeWitt Park, Ithaca, N. Y.

Physical Education

For Women. (Accredited.) Summer School July 2-Aug. 11. Apply now. Strong Faculty. Splendid dormitories. 2-year Normal Course.
Chicago Normal School of Physical Education
Dept. 23. 5026 Greenwood Avenue, Chicago, Illinois

The Sargent School for Physical Education

Established 1881 Booklet on request
D. A. SARGENT L. W. SARGENT
Cambridge 38, Mass.

Schools of Elocution and Dramatic Art

FOUNDED 1884
AMERICAN ACADEMY OF DRAMATIC ARTS
FRANKLIN H. SARGENT, President
The Leading Institution for Dramatic and Expressional Training

A TEACHER'S SUMMER COURSE in Theatre Arts, Stage Crafts, and Play Producing, July 16 to August 25
All courses of instruction under the direction of the Established Faculty
Catalogs of either course from SECRETARY
Room 144F Carnegie Hall, NEW YORK

The Williams School of Expression and Dramatic Art

GEORGE C. WILLIAMS, Dean

Teachers' Course, Lyceum Course; Dramatic Course; Personal Culture Course. Each with private instruction. Graduates eligible to teach in N. Y. State Public Schools. Gymnasium; Little Theatre. Catalog. 102 DeWitt Park, Ithaca, N. Y. Summer courses begin June 4th and July 2nd. Fall term opens Sept. 20th.

CHAUTAUQUA AND LYCEUM Arts School

(Affiliated with the famous Ithaca Conservatory of Music)

EDWARD AMHERST OTT, Dean, for the past twenty-five years associated with the Redpath Lyceum Bureau.
Special training for the Concert Platform, for Entertainers and Lecturers in the Lyceum and Chautauqua. Music, Elocution, Impersonations, Novelty Features. Short cut to lucrative public profession. Address
Chautauqua and Lyceum Arts School,
502 DeWitt Park, Ithaca, N. Y.

Emerson College of Oratory

Largest School of Oratory, Belles-lettres and Pedagogy in America. Summer Session. 44th year. Degrees granted. Address HARRY SEYMOUR ROSS, Dean, Huntington Chambers, Boston.

The Academy of Speech Arts

Two year intensive vocational and cultural course in Oratory, Platform and Dramatic Art, Pantomime, and Esthetic Dancing. Physical Culture. Resident and day pupils. Address MAUD GATCHELL HICKS, B.L.I., Dir. (Formerly member of Faculty, Emerson College of Oratory.)
29 Fairfield St., Boston, Mass.

EDITH COBURN NOYES SCHOOL

Dramatic Training—Character Development
Voice, Diction, Psychology, Design, French
Write for complete list of courses
EDITH COBURN NOYES, Principal, Symphony Chambers, Boston

The National School

OF ELOCUTION AND ORATORY

The oldest chartered school of Expression in America. Degrees granted. Public speaking. Physical Training. English, Dramatic Art, Professional and Finishing Course. Dormitories. For catalog address D. R. SHOEMAKER, Prin.
4010-12 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia School of Expression & Dramatic Art

Professional Stage Preparation, New York Agencies give recognition. Oratory, Vocabulary, General Culture and Finishing Courses. Catalog. ELIZABETH L. SCHREINER, Prin. Diplomas.
Presser Bldg., Chestnut at 17th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

25 YEARS THE STANDARD TRAINING SCHOOL FOR THEATRE ARTS

ALVIENE SCHOOL OF DRAMATIC ARTS

DRAMA ORATORY MUSICAL COMEDY PHOTO PLAY DANCE ARTS

Four schools in one
Practical stage training
The Schools student's stock and theatre afford public stage appearances
Write for detailed catalog mentioning study desired to Secretary Alviene Schools, Suite 21
43 West 72nd St., New York
Bet. B'way & Central Park W.

PEIRCE SCHOOL of BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

College grade courses giving an efficient preparation for the responsibilities of business life.
Business Administration Course (2 years)
Accounting Course (2 years)
Other Courses
Secretarial Courses for women; Teacher-Training Courses (accredited); Shorthand, Salesmanship, Business.
Summer School: July 2
Fall Term: Sept. 4
Write for 59th Year Book
The Secretary
Pine Street, West of Broad
Philadelphia
The School You Have Always Known

The Brown School of Commerce

Develops highly efficient Business Executives and Secretaries. Small group instruction. Day classes for women. Night, co-educational. Fine-paying positions await our graduates. Address Box C,
25 West 45th Street, New York City

Eastman School of Business

For more than 60 years the leading American Business College. Thoro training in every business pursuit. Accounting, Banking, Civil Service, Secretarial and Teachers' courses. Both sexes. Has trained over 50,000 successful men. Open all year. Enter any weekday. Catalog. C. C. GAINES, Box 655, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

BURDETT COLLEGE, BOSTON

Founded 1879

Two-year courses (College grade); Business Administration; Accounting; Secretarial, for young men and women of executive calibre. Also shorter business courses. Graduates in demand.
Send for special catalogue to S. E. PEARSON, Registrar

MISCELLANEOUS

"STAMMERING Its Cause and Cure"

You can be quickly cured if you stammer. Send 10 cents, coin or stamps, for 288 page cloth bound book on Stammering and Stuttering. It tells how I cured myself after Stammering and Stuttering for 20 years. BENJAMIN N. BOGUE
2485 Bogue Building, 1147 N. Illinois St. Indianapolis

Martin Institute for Speech Correction

Stammering, Stuttering, Lisping, Loss of Voice, Monotonous Pitch, Attention Deafness and Cognate defects corrected. Conducted by Dr. Frederick Martin (himself once a confirmed stammerer). Normal course for Teachers of Speech Improvement. 402 DeWitt Park, Ithaca, N. Y.

Cosmopolitan recommends the Schools listed on these pages.

The Quigley Institute for Stammerers has cured every person who has taken its course. Personal, individual instruction by the founder, who cured himself after thirty years of stammering. Equally effective for children and adults. Resident and day pupils. For particulars, address Dept. C, 1727 Master St., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Universities, Profes'nal & Trade Sch's

Electrical Engineering

men with training are in demand. For more than a quarter of a century, this school has been training men of ambition and limited time, for the electrical industries. Condensed course in Electrical Engineering enables graduates to secure good positions and promotions. Theoretical and Practical Electricity. Mathematics, Steam and Gas Engines and Mechanical Drawing. Students construct dynamos, install wiring and test electrical machinery. Course with diploma complete

In One Year

Over 3000 men trained. Thoroughly equipped fireproof dormitories, dining hall, laboratories, shops.
Free catalog. 31st year begins Sept. 26, 1923.
BLISS ELECTRICAL SCHOOL
149 Takoma Ave., Washington, D. C.

ROCHESTER ATHENAEUM AND MECHANICS INSTITUTE

Rochester, N.Y. Industrial Arts—Household Arts—Applied Arts 39th Year

A modern, well-equipped Institute Offering Normal, Vocational and Professional Training for Men and Women.

Four Year Courses: Teacher Training in Home Economics for Women, leading to degree of B. S. Retail Distribution, for Men and Women.

Three Year Courses: Industrial Teacher Training for Men; Continuation School Teacher Training for Women; Teacher Training in Art and Craft Education for Men and Women; Commercial Illustration, Design and Interior Decoration, Architecture, Craft, Occupational Therapy, Costume Design.

Two Year Courses: Mechanics, Electricity, Chemistry, Costume Design and Trade Dressmaking, Dietetics.

One Year Courses: Vocational and Trade Teacher Training, Lunch Room and Institutional Management, Trade Millinery, Home Making, Ceramics. Modern Dormitory for Women.

WRITE Department C for illustrated bulletin and book of views. State Course desired.

Rochester Athenaeum and Mechanics Institute, Rochester, N.Y.

New York School of Applied Design

For Women. 32nd year. Textile Designing, Poster and Commercial Art, Fashion Drawing, Interior Decoration, Illustration, Historic Ornament. Preparatory courses. Positions and Orders filled.

160 Lexington Avenue, New York City.

TEMPLE UNIVERSITY

Broad and Montgomery Avenue
Philadelphia, Pa.

College of Liberal Arts and Sciences
Teachers College
School of Commerce

Professional Schools:——Theology, Law, Medicine, Pharmacy, Dentistry, Chiropody

School of Music
University High School
Training School for Nurses

Co-educational

SEND FOR BULLETIN

South Dakota School of Mines

A State institution in a mountainous country (the beautiful Black Hills) with unsurpassed field facilities. Courses in Mining, Metallurgical, Chemical, Civil, and Electrical Engineering. Good laboratories and library and staff of experienced technical men. Tuition exceptionally low. For particulars address, President, SOUTH DAKOTA STATE SCHOOL OF MINES, Box Y, Rapid City, S. D.

VALPARAISO UNIVERSITY is one of the largest institutions of learning in the U. S. Summer School opens May 29, 1923, and will continue for 12 weeks. Thorough Instruction at Lowest Expense. Catalog free. Address

Dept. 4, University Hall, Valparaiso, Ind.

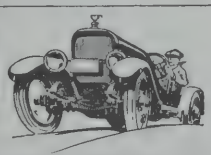
Tri-State College of Engineering

Makes you a Civil, Mechanical, Electrical or Chemical Engineer in two years, 48 weeks each. No entrance examinations. High School Diploma not required. Compact courses made up of essentials only. Expenses low. For catalog, address 20 C Street, Angola, Ind.

Columbia School of Drafting

Specializing in training of professional Draftsmen—Mechanical, Architectural and others; personal instruction; complete course 3 to 9 months. For information address Local Dept. 1973, R. C. Claflin, Pres., 14th and T Sts., N. W., Wash., D. C

Learn Electricity



Practical Course in the Great Shops of Coyne. Complete in 3 months. Enter any time. Drafting and Radio included. Special limited offer. Act NOW! Send for Big Free Catalog.

Coyne Electrical School, Dept. A-117
1300-1310 W. Harrison St., Chicago, Ill.

BE AN AUCTIONEER

Receive from $10 to $500 per day. Summer term opens at Boulder, Colorado, June 25; at Decatur, Indiana, July 30. For free catalog, address REPPERT'S AUCTION SCHOOL, Box 47, Decatur, Indiana.

Have a Business of Your Own

Get into the Automobile Business,—the world's Greatest Industry. Start a business in your own town. Thousands of opportunities for Trained Men. Twelve Million Autos, Trucks and Tractors to repair; twelve million Batteries to keep in service; fifty million Tires to repair and replace. Thousands of our Graduates

Earn $2000 to $10,000 Yearly

Fit yourself for a better job at bigger pay. Auto factories and service stations continually asking for our graduates. Big Auto Factories endorse our school. Detroit, the "Heart of the Auto Industry" is the logical place to learn the business. Get the facts. Be a winner! Have a Business of your own. Write today for illustrated catalog.

MICHIGAN STATE AUTOMOBILE SCHOOL
4006 Auto Bldg., Detroit (The Auto Center)

NEW MEXICO SCHOOL of MINES

A technical school with 4-year courses in Mining, Metallurgical and Geological Engineering and General Science. Strong faculty consisting largely of sucessful engineers. Excellent equipment. Classes not overcrowded. Climate notably mild, dry, and healthful. Near metal and coal mining districts. Field work throughout regular semesters—no summer attendance required. Low non-resident tuition. Dormitories. Write for catalog.

E. H. Wells, President Socorro, New Mexico

LEARN MECHANICAL DENTISTRY

Earn $35 to $125 a week. Taught by actual practice—day or night. Three months' course. Modern laboratories. No previous training required. Established 30 years. For 36-page catalog, write Dept. 3

BODEE DENTAL INSTITUTE

New York 136 W. 52d St. Philadelphia 1305 N. Broad St. Buffalo 1226 Main St. Brooklyn 15 Flatbush Ave.

LE MASTER INSTITUTE

39 minutes from New York City.

Standard Electrical, Civil, Mechanical, Chemical, and Industrial Engineering Courses completed in two years. No entrance examinations. Regular High School course in two years prepares for leading colleges. Bulletin free.

Drawer 139, East Orange, New Jersey.

Colorado School of Mines

(Est. 1872) Golden

Study Mining Engineering

at the oldest Mining College in the United States, located in heart of nation's greatest mining districts, where practically every ore is mined and smelted; 10 buildings, mine camp equipped for practical instruction. Tuition nominal. Students in demand. Four-year courses in Metal Mining, Metallurgy, Geological Engineering, Chemical, Mechanical, Civil, Electrical and Petroleum Engineering, leading to degrees. Scholarships for each state and for foreign countries available to students entering the freshman class. Ask for special Catalog free

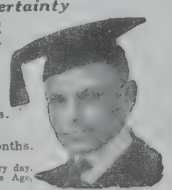
Autumn Term Begins Sept. 3, 1923

Registrar, School of Mines, P. O. Box W, Golden, Colorado

Earn $200 to $500 A Month!

Photographers and Photo-Engravers command big salaries. The largest and best college of its kind in the world will teach you these fascinating professions in a few months. Established over 30 years. Demand for graduates far exceeds supply. Hundreds of our students now earning big pay. Good positions secured. Tuition and living expense low. Write for beautifully illustrated book—now!

Illinois College of Photography, Box 563, Effingham, Illinois



ELECTRICITY

As Taught in This Great School Makes Future Success a Certainty

We teach by scientific laboratory methods and practical shop work. Specialists for seventeen years in training young men for Electrical Engineering with B.S. Degree in 3 years.

We also teach—
Automotive Electricity in 3 months.
A.C. & D.C. Armature Winding in 3 months.
Practical Electricity in 6 months.
Electrotechnics in 12 to 18 months.
Commercial Electrical Engineering in 12 months.
A plan for every student, regardless of age and education.

ENTER ANY TIME. Radio Broadcasting WIAO every day. Write NOW for BIG, FREE illustrated book. State Age, Education, and Course Interested in.

SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING OF MILWAUKEE
C-6, 415 Marshall Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

BECOME A PROFESSIONAL PHOTOGRAPHER

EARNING $35 TO $125 A WEEK

Three to six months' course. Motion Picture, Commercial Portraiture. Practical instruction. Modern equipment. Ask for Catalog No. 95.

N. Y. INSTITUTE of PHOTOGRAPHY

NEW YORK 141 W. 36 St. CHICAGO 630 So. Wabash Ave. BROOKLYN 505 State St.

THE FIRST QUESTION Put to Your Boy

—When he steps forth from school into the business world, will be, "What experience have you had, young man?"

Such an inquiry is natural, logical and reasonable — experience does count! The average American boy today leaves school with only a theoretical knowledge of the problems he must face. Of course, he must have the right amount of education, for he would be seriously handicapped without it. But, supposing he could have some business training with it—some practical experience in business methods? What an asset that would be to him!

Your boy can acquire this elemental training as a member of our Junior Leaders' Business League—a national organization of regular fellows, between 8 and 16 years of age, who are earning money and learning the important rudiments of business and salesmanship. The finest crowd of ambitious, energetic boys in this great land of ours! And they are destined to become the big business men of tomorrow, because they're learning now, while they are schoolboys, the real meaning of business ability.

Every Junior Leader learns:

(1.) To develop self-confidence and initiative.

(2.) How to earn the money to start and maintain his first bank account.

(3.) The importance of being courteous, prompt, thrifty, reliable and industrious.

(4.) To prepare himself for his future success in life.

Don't you think these are worthwhile assets for your boy to have? We'll help him, and work with him right clean through! Simply send us his full name and address on the coupon below and he will be sent complete business instructions telling him just what to do and how to start.

"The Boy Who Succeeds Becomes The Man of Success"

Mr. D. V. Hill, (J. C.)
Junior Leaders' Business League,
International Magazine Company,
119 West 40th Street,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Hill: Please send full particulars about the Junior Leaders' Business League to the boy whose name and address appears below. He wants to earn his own spending money and make good.

Boy's Name .....

Street .....

Town..... State.....

One Rouge - has achieved the last step to perfection - It Stays On PERT, the waterproof rouge, has been so perfected that even constant powdering will not affect it. It lasts all day or evening until removed with cold cream or soap and water.

PERT is an orange colored cream in the jar and pink when applied; to this change of color is due its easy blending and its amazing naturalness. PERT contains no oil.

Do you want to be especially adorable? Then put a tiny speck of PERT on your lips and to the tips of your ears. You will be delighted with the effect. At drug or department stores, or by mail, 75c.

Send a dime for a generous sample. And for another dime you will receive a sample of WINX, the Liquid Lashlux, for darkening the lashes and making them appear heavier.

ROSS COMPANY
Makers of WINX, the Liquid Lashlux
74 Grand Street, New York

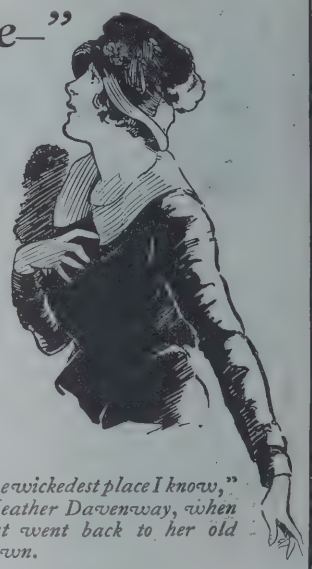
Pert
The Waterproof Rouge

A Picture You Would Love to Own

HARRISON FISHER is supreme in portraying the beauty of young motherhood, and the appealing innocence of childhood. You will want to own this picture —Fisher's latest and greatest.

This picture, in full color, 11x14 inches, only 25c.
(See Cover)

No. N-319. "The Morning Kiss"



Special Bargain Offer:

For $2.00 we will send you the above picture and an assortment of twelve others—thirteen in all—11x14 inches, in full colors, all by Harrison Fisher, America's Most Famous Artist. Regular price 25c each, or $3.25 for all. While this offer lasts you can save $1.25 on your order.

Catalogue of 200 other pictures sent free with order or sent alone for 10 cents

COSMOPOLITAN PRINT DEPARTMENT, 119 W. 40th St., New York City

"It's a Wicked Place—"

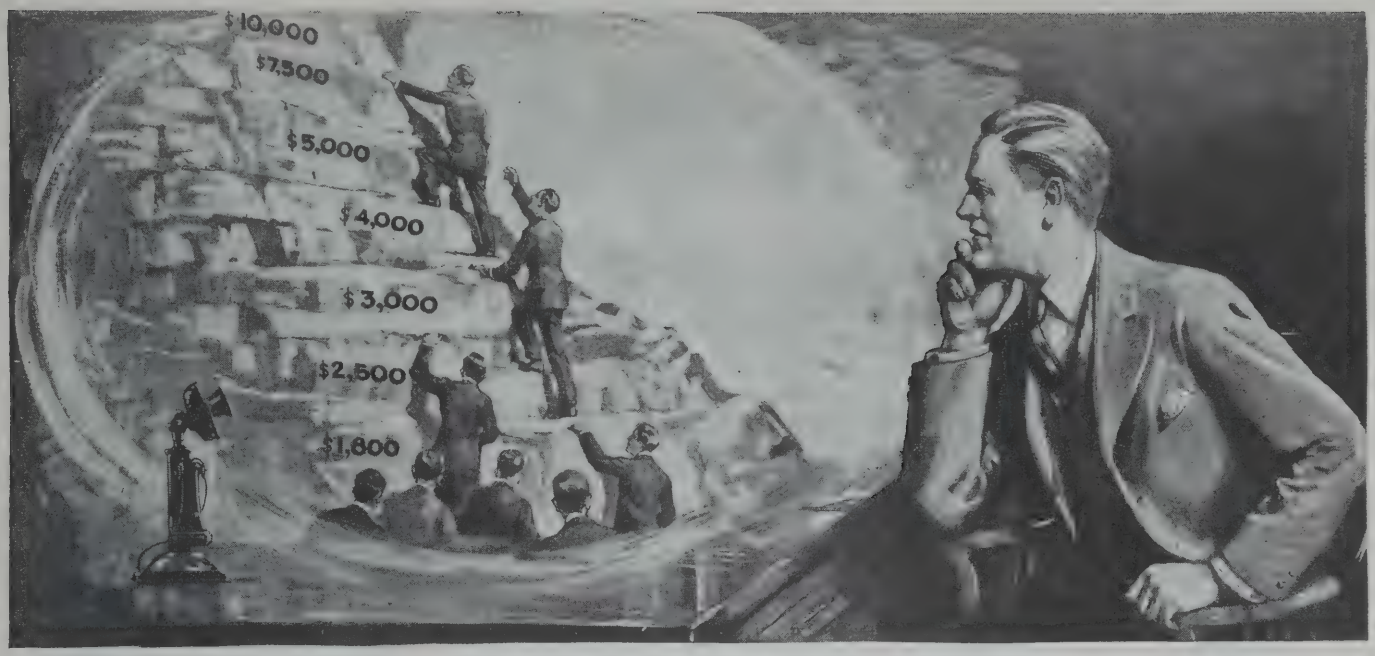
—"It's the wickedest place I know," cried Heather Davenway, when she first went back to her old home town.

Under a Thousand Eyes

The Best Novel of a Small Town You Have Ever Read

By Florence Bingham
LIVINGSTON

WAS she fair to the home of her childhood? Was Elbert Hubbard right when he said, "The Devil made the Small Town"?



Under a Thousand Eyes tells of a girl who went back home to "rescue" her mother from the narrow life of the Small Town—and how the Small Town took her city airs away from her.

Under a Thousand Eyes is the story of folks you know in your old home town—good folks, bad folks, average folks. Big-hearted folks, broad-minded folks, small-minded folks. Just folks. You—and your neighbors.

Under a Thousand Eyes will do you more good than a trip back home.
Get your copy today. Read it tonight.

Buy it wherever books are sold
$2.00

Cosmopolitan Book Corporation
119 West 40th St., New York City

Are You Climbing To Bigger Pay?

—Or Are You Watching Others Climb?

Any number of routine men at the foot of the ascent—and all of them wondering how they can get up higher!

Out of the crowd, now and then, a man makes a start—he begins to climb.

"A mighty stiff grade"—that's the way the first big step appears to the man who is standing still. He has no confidence.

"Mighty good sport"—that's the way the event strikes the man who is climbing. The thing that perplexes him is why in the world he didn't get into action sooner.

The power that carries him up the grade to a bigger job? —Confidence in his own ability.

And the thing that gives him confidence—the only thing that can give a man real and dependable confidence? — Specialized training!

* * * *

During the last fourteen years more than 350,000 ambitious men, enrolled with LaSalle Extension University, have broken away from the crowd and are on their way to bigger jobs and splendid incomes.

James C Pitton, of Tacoma, Washington, writes:

> "I have your course in Business Management to thank for the position I now hold. When I took up your work I was barely making a living. Today I sit in the manager's chair of one of the largest financial institutions in the United States and Canada. My earnings this year will be in the neighborhood of $10,000 and I have the greatest opportunity that any man could wish for in the way of promotion to bigger things."

When Charles S. Jones took up home-study training in Higher Accountancy under the LaSalle Problem Method, he was earning only $100 a month. Three years later, on the letterhead of Henry & Jones, Certified Accountants, El Paso, Texas, he writes:

> "My income is a trifle in excess of $8,000 and I am just beginning to grow. I have recently enrolled for your full Law course and expect to complete my business education with LaSalle."

During only three months' time as many as 1089 LaSalle members wrote to the University telling of the raises they had received as a result of home-study training under the Problem Method. The majority of these men had not yet completed their courses, yet the average increase per man was 56 per cent.

To the man unacquainted with the LaSalle Problem Method, results so prompt and definite seem extraordinary. As a matter of fact, anything else would be extraordinary—for the Problem Method represents just the difference between reading how to do a thing and actually doing it for oneself. In other words the LaSalle member masters the principles of business by solving actual business problems—under the direction of some of the ablest men in their respective fields in America.

* * * *

Which do you see ahead of you in the next twelve months—the cliff, or the path that will take you to the top?

If you are determined to climb, you should find out at once about the LaSalle Problem Method and how it can direct you to a bigger job. The coupon will bring you full information, together with particulars of our convenient-payment plan; also your free copy of that inspiring book—"Ten Years' Promotion in One."

Break away from the men who are holding you back—the men who would make you think that "you haven't a chance." Find out today what YOU must do to command big money.

Mail the coupon NOW.

LaSalle Extension University

The Largest Business Training Institution in the World

LaSALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY Dept. 655-R Chicago, Illinois

Please send me catalog and full information regarding the course and service I have marked with an X below. Also a copy of your book, "Ten Years' Promotion in One," all without obligation to me.

- ☐ Business Management: Training for Official, Managerial, Sales and Executive positions.
- ☐ Modern Salesmanship: Training for Sales and Advertising Executives, Solicitors, Sales Promotion Managers, Salesmen, Manufacturers' Agents and all those engaged in retail, wholesale or specialty selling.
- ☐ Higher Accountancy: Training for positions as Auditor, Comptroller, Certified Public Accountant, Cost Accountant, etc.
- ☐ Law: Training for Bar; LL. B. Degree.
- ☐ Commercial Law: Reading, Reference and Consultation Service for Business Men.
- ☐ Traffic Management—Foreign and Domestic: Training for positions as Railroad or Industrial Traffic Manager, etc.
- ☐ Railway Station Management: Training for Railway Auditors, Comptrollers, Accountants, Clerks, Station Agents, Members of Railway and Public Utilities Commissions, etc.
- ☐ Banking and Finance: Training for executive positions in Banks and Financial Institutions.
- ☐ Modern Foremanship and Production Methods: Training in the direction and handling of industrial forces—for Executives, Managers, Superintendents, Contractors, Foremen, Sub-foremen, etc.
- ☐ Industrial Management Efficiency: For Executives, Managers, Office and Shop Employes and those desiring practical training in industrial management principles and practice.
- ☐ Personnel and Employment Management: Training for Employers, Employment Managers, Executives, Industrial Engineers.
- ☐ Modern Business Correspondence and Practice: Training for Sales and Collection Correspondents; Sales Promotion Managers; Credit and Office Managers; Correspondence Supervisors, Secretaries, etc.
- ☐ Expert Bookkeeping: Training for position as Head Bookkeeper.
- ☐ Business English: Training for Business Correspondents and Copy Writers.
- ☐ Commercial Spanish: Training for positions as Foreign Correspondent with Spanish-speaking countries.
- ☐ Effective Speaking: Training in the art of forceful, effective speech for Ministers, Salesmen, Fraternal Leaders, Politicians, Clubmen, etc.
- ☐ C. P. A. Coaching for Advanced Accountants.

Name..... Present Position..... Address.....

Pleasure Island
Romance in Chocolates

Plunder from the Spanish Main! Modern treasure ships bring back from those tropic isles sugar, spices, vanilla, chocolate, nuts and fruits. The charm of far-off, forgotten shores and storied seas is expressed in this pirate's chest of delectable sweets. The very fragrance of the opened box prepares one for the feast in store.

Delving into the treasures is a delight to any candy lover. Beneath the top trays of unusual chocolates are money bags filled with gold and silver wrapped pieces, the finest coinage of the candy maker's art.

And then as you settle back to revel in these luxuries, here are the Whitman's masterpieces you will find:

Majestic, Minty Mallow, Plum Pudding, Temptation, Messenger, Mellowmint, Fancies, Milk Cocoanut Cream, Cocoanette, Pecan Marshmallow, Double Walnut, Jordan Almond, Filbert Clusters, Liquid Raisin, Liquid Pineapple, Liquid Cherry, Amaracene, Milk Chocolate Blossoms, Peanut Carmel, Marshmallow Block, Dollar Mints, Honey White Nougat, Brazil Nut and Fudge-Marshmallow.

Truly a treasure-trove is this picturesque package, so reminiscent of the brave tale of Robert Louis Stevenson!

"Pleasure Island" is sold by those good stores selected as agents for Whitman's. There is one in your neighborhood.

STEPHEN F. WHITMAN & SON, Inc., Philadelphia, U. S. A.
Also makers of Whitman's Instantaneous Chocolate, Cocoa and Marshmallow Whip

The Mark of Quality

Robert Owen, business man and philanthropist of the early nineteenth century, was the originator of the personal trade-mark. He put his name on every package of yarn he made, saying, "I'm proud of my goods and I stand back of them with the best thing I own—my name!"

Robert Owen's creed by which he won great business success, was simply this —"I have found that the best way to look out for No. 1 is to look out for No. 2."

The Covenant in the Name

IN the markets of the world today there are names which carry the weight of written agreements. To the buying public they represent the maker's personal contract to maintain the highest standards of quality.

This desirable public acceptance must be guarded unceasingly by the manufacturer if his vantage ground is to be preserved.

The Firestone organization is keenly alert to the responsibilities as well as the rewards, in the ratification of the Firestone name by car-owners everywhere. The public, expecting more in Firestone Cords, is given more for the money.

The thousands of expert workers, employed in the building of these fine tires, are fully conscious of the covenant made under the Firestone pledge of Most Miles per Dollar.

With production facilities and working conditions conducive to the most efficient effort, they have brought the Firestone Cord to its present high point of perfection—fulfilling the trust imposed in this name by so great a following.

Most Miles per Dollar

Firestone

Keep a Kodak story of the children

Autographic Kodaks $6.50 up

Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y., The Kodak City

THE CUNEO-HENNEBERRY CO. CHICAGO

CENTRAL CIRCULATION BOOKSTACKS
The person charging this material is responsible for its return to the library from which it was borrowed on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.
TO RENEW CALL TELEPHONE CENTER, 333-8400
UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

OCT 15 1992

When renewing by phone, write new due date below previous due date. L162

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS-URBANA
3 0112 033619807